I come now to do a little bit of stock-taking of the government with reference to the speech from the throne. It was not a very exciting document. One never expects that the speech from the throne can be set to music. It is almost bound to be a drab document but this year it seems to me that it is particularly drab. Furthermore, I thought that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was singularly disappointing in not doing anything to give some inspiration which might derive from the speech from the throne. Let us take, for example, the reference to the Colombo plan. As I say, you cannot have that put in blank verse in the speech from the throne. However, I thought the Prime Minister might have had something inspiring to say about it.

As a matter of fact, the most exciting thing that has happened since this house last met is the revelation of split personalities in the government and the fact that each seems to know so little of what the other is doing. Indeed, they have had to seek inspiration outside of the house. They had a great dinner the other night, evidently, at which the "tumult and the shouting" was in great evidence. We have a new and interesting description of two of our colleagues in this house, namely the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who are described as the hardrock men. I find that to be an interesting description. It suggests a certain toughness, a certain impenetrability to the views of other people.

The report of the meeting was interesting in that it contained some wisdom from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He referred to the coming election and to the by-elections. He even admitted that in the by-elections we in this party had some little encouragement. But so far as the minister was concerned, it seemed to me that he regarded the by-elections as just good clean fun; they did not mean anything. According to him, in by-elections people went out and voted without much sense of responsibility. But when the real test came, namely the general election, he indicated that these wandering people would come back to their true fold and that there no longer would be any sign of weakness.

We in this party like to think that we are generous-hearted, broadminded people. We like to think that we are trying to see good in others. We like to think we are trying to see good even in the government. We should like to show a generous attitude. We should like to find uses for the government. But as a matter of fact, as I look across the floor, I am not able to find any examples. The only things I can find are warnings. Of course, a warning is extremely useful in some ways. It can be as useful as an example. I propose to refer to one or two warnings. Time forbids my dealing with them at great length but I shall select those that I think are most worthy of being preferred. I am going to refer to the Department of Justice. I am sorry the minister is not here. I hope I shall say nothing that he could contradict having regard to its accuracy. I may say some things that he would wish to controvert. However, I shall try to be careful as to my facts.

I want to go back to a matter that I raised last July in this house. It was not the best time to raise it. It was one of those times when we were sitting all night or nearly all night. I felt a little bit apologetic, but I raised the matter then, and I raise it now. It is a matter which every man and woman in this house I am sure will agree on. I think there has been great inertia and at least the appearance of indifference. I do not think that is what this house would wish. I hope that what I say may perhaps contribute a little bit—and that others may contribute more—towards seeing that this question with which I propose to deal, namely the question of probation, shall not be delayed year after year as it has been since 1938 when the Archambault report was brought in. I will qualify that statement to this extent. I think our judgment on the government should be lenient until the end of the war but the war ended nearly 11 years ago and, as I shall seek to show, progress since then has been trivial indeed.

As to the merits of probation we do not need to argue. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has expressed himself in most candid and forthright terms on that matter. I just wish to recall to the attention of the house one or two important points so that we shall know exactly what we are talking about and the importance of it. It has had extraordinary success in England. In 1937 Lord Samuel, speaking 30 years after the passing of the Probation of Offenders Act, made an astonishing statement to the effect that committals to prison had been reduced from 180,000 to less than 60,000. The writer of the article in the publication Welfare says that if the speech had been made in 1950, the number of 60,000 could have been reduced to less than 35,000. In other words, that would be a reduction from 180,000 to 35,000. Compared with their probation figures, our own figures are quite trivial. In England in 1950 approximately 34,000 were put on probation. Here in Canada the number was 3,600. It is not surprising that in these circumstances Professor Jaffray of the school of social work should say:

> In Canada we have made little use of adult probation as a method of treatment.

I want to make it clear that that statement was made five years ago and that I think the situation has improved and is improving. However, I still believe that what we have done is trivial. I believe that this government is primarily responsible. As appears in the Canadian Bar Review of 1949, at page 1040—and I think we should all blush to find this said about our situation—Professor Jaffray says this:

> Our Canadian system of handling offenders is fundamentally irresponsible. It is irresponsible because it is broken into so many separate bits and pieces that real responsibility cannot be placed. No one authority can be charged with the inefficiency of the system with its high rates of recidivism,—

I wish one could get a simpler word. I understand it means repeaters.

> —its wasteful costs. Hence we have drifted and are still drifting.

I am going to give you briefly a little close-up on probation because I think it is important that we should get a vivid impression of exactly what it is we are talking about. If we could only have that impression in this house I am quite sure there would be no delay. I am quite sure that before the estimates of the department come before the house this year, action would be taken. It is for that reason that I am on my feet. I refer to a broadcast given the other day by Anne Francis, a well-known broadcaster on the C.B.C. She begins in this way:

> Several years ago a woman—let us call her Mary—was brought into the criminal court of a big Canadian city. Mary had been stealing from her employer for many months. She had taken several hundred dollars before he became suspicious and brought a charge against her. The magistrate found her guilty of theft. He did not sentence her to serve a term in prison but instead put her on probation for two years. He did that because he thought she would have a better chance of going straight if she were allowed to live a normal life under strict supervision.
> There were several reasons why he made this decision. Mary was in her twenties and this was her first offence. She had been deserted by her husband and was supporting a two-year old daughter. She was devoted to her baby and had spent most of the stolen money on toys and clothes for the child. The magistrate felt it was important for her to keep her baby who, like all children, needed the love and security which only a mother can give. He also felt that putting Mary into prison and separating her from the baby would increase her resentment toward society and make it harder for her to find her way back to an honest way of life.
> Furthermore, since she was young and a first offender, he did not want her to be forced to consort with the hard boiled, unrepentant type of woman who is found in any prison in Canada. Finally, he felt it was an essential part of her rehabilitation to pay back the money she had stolen, and of course she could not do that, while she was sitting in idleness in a county jail or earning at most 25 cents a day in a reformatory or in the federal prison.
> Now, after the magistrate had given Mary a suspended sentence and put her on probation, her lawyer arranged a civil contract with her employer under which it was agreed that she should pay him back in monthly instalments. The probation officer found her a job and a suitable place to live close to a day foster home where she could leave her baby while she was at work. Mary gave the officer permission to tell her new boss and the landlady about her background. This avoided the danger of her being exposed later on and so losing her job and her lodgings. It also removed one of the fears which often incapacitate people who have a criminal record.

I shall just condense the rest of it by saying that under supervision this woman was able to pay back the stolen money and restore herself to a decent, honest life.

I want to add one other thing and that deals with the cost of this business. There are two main reasons why people are put on probation. First of all, it is a more effective way of administering justice, and it is certainly cheaper than sending people to prison. It is more effective because it reforms a larger number of people. Statistics show that only 25 per cent of the people put on probation come into court again, while over 70 per cent of those sent to prison break the law again. These figures are given in a report by the John Howard Society.

I want to point out also that the difference in cost is terrific. It costs $50 a year to keep a man or woman on probation, while it costs $1,500 to keep a person in prison. I have said that I believe everyone in this house will be agreed that is a good thing to do.

I should like now to view the unconscionable delay, the inertia and the apparent indifference with which the Department of Justice under the present minister, and indeed under the former minister of justice, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), has dealt with this.

The beginning of this history of delay, inertia and indifference goes back to 1936. At that time the Archambault commission was appointed. Amongst other duties it was to report on the conditional release of prisoners, including parole or release on probation, conditional release under the Ticket of Leave Act, and remission generally. In 1938 the commission reported and No. 70 of its recommendations reads as follows:

> A probation system, modelled upon the system now in force in England, should be adopted throughout Canada, both for adults and young offenders.

Then, No. 74 reads:

> The pay and duties of probation officers should be the subject of an agreement between the provincial and federal authorities.

I want to draw that particularly to the attention of members because what I shall bring to their attention later is that we have this old bogey of dominion-provincial authority raised again. We are left between two stools.

Lest I forget later, I should like to remind the minister of that old catch phrase from a music hall play, "Where there is a will there are three ways". I think the evidence I shall bring here will show that this thing has just been dawdling along with nobody taking hold of it; nobody apparently really keen about it. Let us go on from the Archambault report in 1938. I have said already that I think we should be rather gentle in our criticism until the end of the war because we have to remember that people were then engrossed in other things. When I brought this up last July, the Minister of Justice pointed out that a meeting was called in the autumn of 1947 for the purpose of discussing the implementation of the Archambault report. This had been followed by the carrying out of probation in several of the provinces.

This is true, but when you look at the figures it is a very disappointing statement. There are 89 probation officers in Ontario and 17 in British Columbia. I was actually given figures showing that there are none in Manitoba and only two in Nova Scotia. I want to say that the latest circular I have would seem to indicate that more of a beginning has been made in these provinces. But I say without fear of being contradicted that the result has been unsatisfactory. Even though I hope and believe it is improving now, we are still away behind.

The next step to which I shall refer was the appointment of a committee in 1953. Speaking last July at page 5917 of Hansard the minister said that this committee was appointed "with a view to providing the foundation upon which we could reasonably call the provinces together in a dominion-provincial conference". I find that a most disappointing statement. I might say that, before the minister entered the house, I had remarked that I was beginning from the end of the war because wartime was a special time. In 1953, eight years after the end of the war, a committee was appointed, as the minister says, "with a view to providing the foundation upon which we could reasonably call the provinces together in a dominion-provincial conference".

Then, 18 months later, last July, the minister told us he expected to receive a report from this committee in October. Speaking on July 8, 1955, at page 5917 of Hansard, the minister said:

> We thought that if we could get a report, which we expect to receive about October of this year, we would then have a mass of data which we could place before the provinces—in a matter which is their business and not ours—

When the minister says it is their business and not ours, I want to remind him what the Archambault report, the federal government's own commission, said many years before. It said:

> A probation system, modelled upon the system now in force in England, should be adopted throughout Canada, both for adults and young offenders—
> The pay and duties of probation officers should be the subject of an agreement between the provincial and federal authorities.

It seemed to me that was manifest good sense. I think it could be done. I believe the provinces would jump at it. It seems to me nothing short of a calamity that many months had gone by since the appointment of that last committee. I fear there may be still great delay. I will repeat what I said before the minister came in. I am on my feet because I should like to make any contribution, however small, to expedite this affair. I hope other members will speak about it because I think everyone in this house will agree about its being a good thing. It is only the old bogey about the division of responsibility that is being raised.

Now, last Friday, nearly 11 years after the completion of the war, the minister answered a question as to when he thought the committee might report by saying, at page 348 of Hansard for January 20, 1956:

> ..I think that the best I can say, conservatively, at the present time . . . is that it will be made during the present session of parliament.

I can only say I hope it will be early during the present session of parliament. Another point arises, of course, and that is the very difficult point as to whether probation was really included.

I must say the minister did not help very much to clear that up by what he said in this house last Friday when he was asked a question. He said that the committee was to deal with "parole" and "remission." He was asked then whether that included probation, and if not whether the situation could be clarified, and so on. What the minister said in answer to that perplexed me. He said in answer to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), as reported at page 349 of Hansard:

> I think my hon. friend, like myself, is a lawyer and I am sure he would know the principles of constitutional law well enough to recognize the difficulty we would have in the federal field in setting up a commission of inquiry to investigate that which comes under the provincial field of jurisdiction.

Later on I asked him whether, if he thought there was any constitutional difficulty in the way, he would communicate with the provinces and get their concurrence, which I am sure would be forthcoming. The minister's answer to that confused me a good deal because he said:

> During the whole course of this inquiry, I have had no reason to suppose that there was any difficulty whatsoever in this regard.

Just before that he seemed to me to be saying, we must not do this because it is not within our constitutional power. Later on he seemed to say the opposite. What I am saying at the moment is, I hope it will be clear that probation will be dealt with. I have been troubled about it. The words that the minister read on to the record the other day did not seem to me to be clear, and I can only say I hope that when this comes down we will not have to wait further for the full treatment of the probation question.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will permit me perhaps I might, on a point of privilege, endeavour to explain in greater detail what I tried to make clear in my interjection the other day, to which he has just alluded. It is true that this matter of probation comes under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, I want to be obliging to the minister, but if he is going to make a speech I suggest he should do it in his own time, since I am told that he can speak later.

Mr. Garson: Perhaps it would be more appropriate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the Minister of Justice will permit me, I think he is fully entitled to rise and briefly clarify any misinterpretation which may have been put upon his remarks; but if he is going to go to the extent of debating the merits, or giving us the history of what has gone on, under these circumstances I think I must agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that the minister should make a speech. My understanding is that all hon. members have the right to clarify or correct a misinterpretation which may have been put upon their remarks, but I think that it should go no farther than that.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Garson: I would like it understood, Mr. Speaker, that the time taken in any brief remarks I make would not be charged against my hon. friend; otherwise, I would very much prefer to resume my seat and rise again after he has finished his remarks. Perhaps that is what I had better do.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, what I have been trying to say is that the government's own commission gave it certain advice. It was set up, let us say, ten years ago, although actually it was before the war. Let us take ten years as the working field. Now, those years have gone by. The minister seemed to speak with a good deal of satisfaction of certain things that were done in 1947. That was two years after the war. Even between 1947 and 1953 there was a period of six years. Then, a committee was appointed in 1953, which was more than two years ago. I do not want the minister to tell us that there were busy men on that committee. Of course they were busy and that was a matter he had to take into consideration when he appointed them. There are busy men on the Gordon commission but nevertheless that Gordon commission, whatever else we can say about it, is going full steam ahead getting its evidence. I do not know what this other committee has done. All I know is that they have had two years, twenty-four months, with more and more unnecessary expenditure of money and more and more waste of human material, which is even worse. How the minister could say last July that he thought there had been nothing remiss in the conduct of the Department of Justice I cannot understand. That shocked me very badly, and I can only hope that deep down in his heart the minister did not quite mean that seriously. I would further hope that at the present time he is trying very hard to speed up this matter. I hope further that when the estimates come down this year there will be some evidence of this.

It is, to put it mildly, shocking to be informed, as I am informed, that in England they are dispensing with penal institutions while we are building three more penitentiaries. If that remark needs correction the minister can do it later. It is my information that while they are dispensing with houses of correction in England, we are having to add to ours. Why that should be I would like to know. It seems to me to bear out fully what Professor Jaffray said and what I urged earlier in this house, about our system namely, to put it mildly, "fundamentally irresponsible".

There is one other point that bothered me, and I should like to mention it before I pass on from this subject, and that is the minister's reference to a mass of data. Now, a mass of data always suggests to me that you are going to have weeks or even months of going and coming discussing this or that. Without, of course, expert knowledge on the matter, it seems to me that this problem is so simple that I cannot believe there are a lot of new techniques that need to be involved. As I said earlier, where there is a will there are three ways. I would assume that what has been done in Ontario would at any rate be of useful assistance to other provinces. I would assume, for example, that if a province has two probation officers, the only thing that is really necessary for them to work better is to have more help. Again I say I hope we will not be told when the estimates come down, oh, yes, the committee has reported; it has reported earlier than the minister said, and the mass of data which they have produced is now being studied, and so on. I hope that others in this house will join me, when the estimates come down later in the session, in holding the minister accountable for action.

I want to say a word about the Department of Finance. I want to give the minister some advice as a warning, because I think he needs a warning. It is that when people play with sharp tools they may slip in their hands, and if they do not injure them they may injure somebody else. That is what I think the minister can do.

I heard the minister speak in Toronto just two weeks ago today. It was a very pleasant speech, and I would not think that one could make much political capital out of it, because he kept close to shore all the way.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is mixing his metaphors.

Mr. Macdonnell: You know, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a view current that cabinet ministers never come to Toronto, that they must not be seen there. That is not true, but an interesting thing happened there, and it shows how the people in Toronto are getting a bit down about this. In introducing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), the president of the club said this:

> He has the distinction of being very nearly a cabinet minister from Toronto. If he had not moved to Markdale he might have been that rarest of rare birds, a cabinet minister from Toronto.

To me, that raised a very interesting point. We know that a cabinet minister cannot live in Toronto, but how near can he live? After all, the Minister of Finance is less than 100 miles away, and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Bennett), is within 100 miles of Toronto. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) is about 200 miles away. He is pretty safe. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is about 300 miles away; the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is between 700 and 800 miles away; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is at the head of the lakes. I suppose that is as near to the wheat-growing area as he would dare to live.

So there you have it. The only other thing one thinks of is the Liberals who have been elected in Toronto. Of course they are not going to stay there long; we all know that, but still they have been in this house and they must be disappointed. The only comfort I can give to them are those words of Milton with which we are all familiar: "They also serve who only stand and wait."

I want to give a little warning to the minister about what I call the precipitate use of sharp tools. The minister has evidently concentrated on that part of financial policy which we call monetary. As I understand it, the technicians have now divided financial policy into what they call fiscal and monetary. Fiscal includes tariff, excise, subsidy and taxation, but monetary includes just dealing with the technique of money and its chief instrument is the interest rate.

It is very interesting to see what has happened. With regard to the interest rate, the argument made for the interest rate as an instrument and I think there may be something in it, is that it is more impersonal in that it hits everybody. Tariffs hit this person or that person, as do taxes, but the interest rate hits everybody. For that reason it is very important that it be dealt with wisely, temperately and cautiously. When we examine what has been going on in the Department of Finance during the last eight or nine months I very much doubt whether we would come to the conclusion that they have followed those rules.

Let me say at this point that it was made perfectly clear to us two years ago when the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act were revised that these matters are controlled in the Department of Finance. I say that particularly because otherwise I think it would be a questionable matter, if one were in any way criticizing civil servants. I think that would be improper, but I want to stress the fact that the banking and commerce committee was told by the ex-minister of finance and the ex-governor of the bank that the Department of Finance called the tune and if there was any difference of opinion it was the governor of the bank who had to give way. I say that because I want it to be perfectly clear that in what I am saying I am criticizing the Department of Finance, which I am entitled to criticize.

I am not going to talk at length about the bank rate. The "bank rate" sounds far enough away to most of us, although we do know that for generations in England the bank rate has been a portentous thing and that the raising and lowering of the bank rate has had substantial effects on the economy of the whole country. A change of a fraction of one per cent in the bank rate could have far-reaching consequences, because it could and did affect the prices of the highest grade securities in which financial institutions, notably banks, are heavy investors. For that reason a slight change in the rate can be a devastating thing to people dealing with hundreds of millions in bonds.

For instance, the changes last autumn contributed to a change of three points in the price of high grade bonds. It seems clear that the department is quite confident that the entire economy can be controlled, and accurately and even mechanically controlled, by monetary measures. Some will feel that this confident view is the product of the classroom and the ivory tower, and that it should be regarded with some misgiving. I think many people will feel that good old human nature enters into this, and that human nature has a way of not being controlled from the classroom or the ivory tower.

My time is running out. I must be very brief and take advantage of the time left to me and make two or three points. I want to point out that in February last the bank rate in Canada was dropped from 2 per cent to 1½ per cent. That was going against the current. That was doing what no other central bank was doing. Other central banks were either raising their rates or were standing pat. It indicated, in other words, what we call an easy money policy. It was lower than that of any other central bank. Then the United States boom began to spread to Canada and in quick succession the bank rate was raised in August from 1½ per cent to 2 per cent, in September from 2 per cent to 2¼ per cent, and in November from 2¼ per cent to 2¾ per cent. This, as I said, had a definite effect on the bond market. Incidentally, 2¾ per cent was the highest rate in the history of the bank. One thing I want to add is that there were heavy demands, rather overwhelming demands as we can read from the bank reports, made on the banks in regard to increasing their reserves. Hon. members will remember that in the last revision of the act the working rate had been 10 per cent. It was not a statutory rate but a working rate, and 8 per cent on a weekly average was made the statutory rate, which greatly eased the position of the banks.

Last November proposals were put up to them to almost double their reserves, which was a very formidable demand to have made. There is just one thing I have time for and that is to point out what can be the practical results of this manipulation of interest rates and of the whole question of reserves and of the relationship between the central bank, the Department of Finance and the commercial banks. I am reading now from the Globe and Mail of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I am very sorry but I am afraid I will have to interrupt the hon. member. I have allowed him two minutes over his time on account of the interruption that was made.

Mr. Macdonnell: Could I have just 30 seconds to read a quotation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I do not wish to appear to be harsh on the hon. member, but it has been pointed out previously in a similar situation that we have a time limit on the debate, and therefore any courtesies extended to one hon. member will automatically work to the detriment of another.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might now rise on a point of privilege and endeavour to clear up the misapprehension which my hon. friend who has just taken his seat voiced a few minutes ago.

Mr. Drew: On a point of order, the minister is entitled to rise on a question of privilege to correct a misstatement, but it is not his right to correct a misapprehension of the hon. member who has just spoken. I am quite certain we know where any misapprehension lies, but that is not the point. It is not his right to correct a misapprehension. He has a right to make a speech. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that following the course you have just followed, if this is merely a question of making one of these general speeches and correcting what the minister regards as a misapprehension it has no place as an interjection here unless it is a speech.

Mr. Garson: If I may rise now on a point of order, to deal with the remarks which have just been interjected by the Leader of the Opposition, it is my understanding that citation 235 of Beauchesne, third edition, reads as follows:

> A member who, during a debate, has spoken to a question may again be heard to offer explanation of some material part of his speech which has been misunderstood; but he must not introduce new matter or endeavour to strengthen by new arguments, his former position which he alleges to have been misunderstood, or to reply to other members.

Mr. Fulton: You have not spoken in this debate.

Mr. Garson: The time for such explanations is at the conclusion of the speech which calls for it.

Mr. Lennard: You have not spoken yet in this debate.

Mr. Garson: I took my seat on the previous occasion just a few moments ago.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order—

Mr. Garson: May I just finish.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): At the moment the Minister of Justice is outlining a point of order.

Mr. Garson: I was right in the middle of a sentence, as I think my hon. friend from Kamloops will agree.

Mr. Lennard: Take half an hour. Take all the time you like.

Mr. Garson: Thank you. I was endeavouring, in the first instance when I interrupted the hon. member for Greenwood, endeavouring to correct what, if I may bring myself within the terms of the citation I have just read, was a quite unintentional misunderstanding by him of what I had said previously and what he has now been misquoting. May I put it this way, the question of probation comes under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister concluded his point of order?

An hon. Member: No, not yet.

An hon. Member: It will take him all afternoon.

Mr. Garson: I had concluded my point of order.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister has placed himself beyond the terms of the citation he read because that refers to misapprehension with respect to a speech made during the course of the debate. I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand he has not spoken in this debate and therefore there could be no misapprehension as to what he has said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The citation which I had in mind is the one referred to by the Minister of Justice. In the interests of this debate and of hon. members on both sides of the house I suggest that the Minister of Justice be permitted to state his question of privilege or personal explanation as covered by citation 235. It will then be my responsibility to decide before he has gone very far whether or not it is a question of privilege, but I cannot make that decision until I hear him.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, the matter of probation comes entirely under provincial jurisdiction, while the question of remission and parole comes clearly under federal jurisdiction. We could not with propriety issue a royal commission or set up an advisory committee in relation to a matter which comes under provincial jurisdiction, namely the question of probation. But it is entirely proper, as I tried to point out on previous occasions on which my hon. friend and I exchanged views in this connection, for the federal government to set up an advisory committee upon remission and parole. In that connection it is also quite proper for us to make it clear to those who are advising us that there is no limitation whatever imposed upon their reference in the hope, which I feel confident will be realized, that in the course of their inquiries our advisers will find it possible in their examination of remission and parole to examine also all questions of probation which are related to these federal questions of remission and parole.

If, for example, as I understand was the case, our advisers go to study these questions in Great Britain where there are no jurisdictional problems of a federal state but they have a unitary government, these three subject matters are all under the control of that unitary government; and it would be manifestly absurd if our advisers examined remission and parole in Great Britain without reference to the related question of probation.

An hon. Member: What is the point of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. At this stage I trust the Minister of Justice will permit me to say that I listened to the speech by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and the reference referred to. In his opening sentences I think the Minister of Justice dealt with the question which had been raised, that is remission versus probation. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that he has made the distinction clear and I think any further elaboration of the subject could be regarded only as debating its merits and not the interpretation put upon it by the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) on the address, and in doing so I should like to emphasize my congratulations by saying that I am sure everyone will agree that they did credit to themselves, to the people who elected them and to the party which they represent. It is to the credit of the government that they are recognizing the position of the women of this nation in this very public way.

Perhaps hon. members will recall that last year for the first time in history certain duties were performed by a lady senator. This year a fine gesture has been made to the women of Canada in the choice of the hon. member for Timiskaming as the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Perhaps in that connection some hon. members may have noted certain press items a week or two ago concerning some ardent women's organizations in Toronto, or at least in Ontario. They brought to the attention of the public generally the fact that there were too many people in the House of Commons with hairdos of which they did not approve, and that most of them should be eliminated.

I am just wondering whether this recognition on the part of the government of the women of Canada will encourage them toward further efforts of organization in an effort to see that people with more splendid hairdos than some of the unfortunate people in this house have to put up with are sent to this house. Perhaps this will draw a lengthening shadow over the prospects of some hon. members here.

I am saying this more or less facetiously, but the fact is that if the women of Canada should really organize, with the strength they have there is no doubt that we would have many more of that sex as members of this House of Commons. Perhaps it would be a good thing, because they tell me that the ladies arrive at decisions, and more often right decisions, by intuition rather than by lengthy processes of reasoning. That might prove to be a great time-saver in this House of Commons. With the encouragement to women to enter politics, as this government has encouraged them, perhaps the time will come when the complexion of this house will be radically changed, when it will be more colourful than it is today.

I think I would be remiss in my duty as representing the constituency of Qu'Appelle and as a Saskatchewan member if I did not mention the visit this past year of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to Saskatchewan. I represent the constituency which we like to call the pioneer constituency of Saskatchewan. Many of the pioneers were at that gathering in front of the legislative buildings in Regina, and some of them expressed to me how wonderful it was to be able to attend a meeting at which the Prime Minister spoke so well. On behalf of Qu'Appelle constituency, and I am sure I can include the rest of Saskatchewan, we were most happy to have the Prime Minister with us in the celebration of our jubilee.

There is one other matter I should like to mention before I deal with the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I refer to the laying of a wreath on November 11 on the cenotaph here in Ottawa. On behalf of Qu'Appelle constituency, and on behalf of the lady from Qu'Appelle who took part in that ceremony, I should like to express my appreciation. I refer to Mrs. John Leboldus, who was chosen by the Canadian Legion and government to represent the mothers of Canada in the laying of a wreath at that time. Although not in the best of health, Mrs. Leboldus nevertheless agreed to perform that ceremony. Mr. and Mrs. Leboldus have been in Qu'Appelle constituency ever since they emigrated from Europe at the turn of the century. They have made a very fine record for themselves as pioneers, and have raised a very large family.

The gesture on the part of the Canadian Legion and the government in having Mrs. Leboldus perform this function at the cenotaph was appreciated very much for another reason. Western Canada, as you know, has a great many immigrants, and here is a mother who only at the turn of the century came to Canada. She and her husband both became Canadians, homesteaded and built up a wonderful home and a wonderful family. When the supreme test came they sacrificed three sons in the second world war. One can imagine the anxiety of that mother when it is realized that, besides these three, there were other members of the family in the services during the war.

On behalf of the people of Qu'Appelle and Mr. and Mrs. John Leboldus, I wish to thank the Canadian Legion and the government for having invited her here to perform that function. It was a splendid gesture to those people who came from central Europe to pioneer in this country.

I should now like to turn to the speech from the throne. In doing so, before coming to what I consider the most important part of that speech as far as western Canada is concerned, I should like to draw attention to a few of the paragraphs preceding it. There has been much comment with respect to this speech, praise and otherwise, both in the press and from hon. members in this house. As far as we in this house are concerned, I quite realize that it all depends on what benches one occupies. Naturally the opposition cannot praise the speech; if they did the political repercussions might not be too happy. So, being in opposition, they must perforce play down, shall I say, the importance of the speech from the throne.

However, the more one reads and studies that speech, the more one realizes that it covers a very wide field of national and international endeavours by the government. First of all this paragraph struck me:

> The government . . . is continuing its constant efforts through diplomacy and negotiation and through the United Nations and other international agencies, to bring about better understanding between nations.

That statement that we are continuing our efforts along the lines indicated is very important. The securing and maintaining of peace and bringing about an end of the cold war is of paramount importance to our economic life, from every direction you may care to view it.

Last year, as you will remember, the hot spot in international affairs was the area off the coast of China. This year the scene has shifted and the hot spot is in the Middle East but during the year the Canadian government, with its usual vigilance, has paid attention to international affairs. I might mention particularly the performance of our Minister of National Health and Welfare at the United Nations, where he did such wonderful work on behalf of this nation toward the maintenance of peace in the world. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, on his world tour, made those personal contacts which are so important to the maintenance of proper human relationships on which all peace is built. The Minister of Fisheries, in spite of his accident, has done wonderful work and no doubt we shall reap results from that visit in a very definite way as the result of better understanding among the nations of the world.

What strikes me as very significant is that this government is vigilant as regards this particular matter mentioned in the speech from the throne, to a degree that all too many people fail to realize. In the world of today, arms alone do not guarantee security; they are but a bargaining force, shall I say, which can be used if necessary if everything else fails in trying to establish good human relationships. But the importance of the work of these men I have mentioned in establishing and maintaining peace, and the direction along which this government is travelling in that regard, cannot be overemphasized.

I was glad to notice in the next paragraph of the speech that the Prime Minister has accepted the invitation to attend the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers to be held in London. Here is a matter that should be given wider publicity as a matter of national pride. When one thinks of Canada, a nation of some 16 million people, meeting at this commonwealth conference with representatives of perhaps 450 million people, and then assesses the strength and influence which our Prime Minister as a Canadian wields among those representatives of close to half a billion people, it almost borders on the fantastic. It emphasizes the virility of this nation of ours, and it also emphasizes the calibre of the men whom we are able to send from these shores to these international gatherings. You can be represented at a conference but, unless you have a personality who can establish the proper human relationships, and can conduct himself in such a way that he will be respected and his opinions will count, your influence will be greatly minimized.

Canadians should be made aware and should have emphasized to them that the powerful influence Canada is wielding in the world today is altogether out of proportion to our population. This means that while our population is small, the calibre of people who are doing the job of world public relations is extremely high indeed.

There is just one more thing I wish to mention before I come to the paragraph which I said I consider to be the most important for western Canada, namely the paragraph which states that the royal commission to examine and report upon our economic prospects is proceeding with its inquiry. I attended the meeting of this commission in the legislative buildings at Regina last summer and heard the submissions that were made. They covered a fairly wide range of subjects, all the way from the South Saskatchewan dam to the suggestion that there be worked out a national wheat policy which would be of benefit not only to western Canada but to the nation as a whole.

As to that submission, I notice that the government has already beaten the commission to the draw in this sense. Part of what has been submitted has already been in the mind of the government and is coming on to the satute books shortly. That will be another step in framing a national policy with regard to western wheat. I refer to the recognition of the storage difficulties we have out west and the fact that the government is already doing something in that regard. This royal commission will be a great benefit to the people of Canada in this particular sense, as far as I am concerned.

When these various national issues are discussed among the people, to me it has always been a saddening thought that we are obliged to discuss them on the basis of politics. In doing so, naturally every part is obliged to emphasize its particular angles and sometimes that emphasis is placed disproportionately having regard to the facts. I do not know of any other sphere of public discussion in which the facts take such a beating as they take on a political platform. I have always tried to keep the facts more or less in line.

Mr. Argue: More or less.

Mr. Mang: I am afraid it is less from over there on the other side. The facts take a beating.

Mr. Ellis: Especially at Liberal meetings.

Mr. Mang: When you have a commission of this kind making a factual survey and study of the issues that are involved in making this a prosperous and happy nation, we should have a high respect, shall I say, for the facts involved in any particular part of any discussion of our economy. Therein, to my mind, lies the real value of that commission. The submissions are impartial. The commissioners are impartial. We are apt to get facts that we can present to the public and then, upon that presentation, we can have an assessment as to what our proper course of action should be.

Just in order to keep the record straight, I should perhaps deal with two or three references, all of them kindly, that have been made to me. One was made by my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) who honoured me by describing me as a dirt farmer. I might say that for most of my life I have been engaged in farming in the pioneer constituency of Saskatchewan, namely Qu'Appelle. During that time I have had varied experiences. The ups and downs of farming have hit me as much as they have hit anyone else. I am pleased that he referred to me as a dirt farmer. Of course that is an expression we have out west. It does not necessarily mean that you work without gloves or anything like that. It means that your visible means of support is the acres you cultivate.

I make reference to what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said for another reason. He stated that last year in the budget debate I indicated that the western farmer was not bankrupt. I still hold to that view, because to be bankrupt is to have your assets completely wiped out. There is a difference between being bankrupt and being short of cash. Many big businesses are short of cash although they are far from being bankrupt. I would add that I wish he had quoted me at greater length because, as reported at page 3105 of Hansard of April 22 last year, what I said was this:

> We are far from bankrupt in western Canada. Indeed, our wealth is quite substantial . . . but at the moment we are short of cash.

That was last April. I felt that I was stating the facts, and I felt it my duty to draw to the attention of this house the fact that we were short of cash. Then I gave reasons, and so forth. I wish the hon. member had quoted that part. I wish he had gone on and quoted the other problems with which we are confronted and with which I dealt with at that time. I said that in this economic adjustment we were called upon to make in the international markets of the world, the farmer was taking the lead. I quoted from the wheat board report to show that we had dropped our price by 32½ cents on the basis of No. 1 Northern, and that the prices of the goods we had to buy—because of higher profits and higher wages—had increased by an average of say 9 per cent; that this widening gap could not continue; that if it did, there would be only one answer.

Of course we farmers in this country are not alone in that kind of situation. You have it in practically every agricultural country in the world. With all the touting of the agricultural policies across the line, you have it in the United States. You have the farm problem as the No. 1 problem in that country. In spite of all the measures which are being used and which we are asked to copy in this country, nevertheless the farm problem is the same. In similar way I can quote from reports with regard to India. In India you have the same trend.

All of this means that we must work out and adopt some national policy with respect to agriculture, or must improve the national policy with respect to agriculture as these difficulties arise. This government is taking steps to do so—

Mr. Nicholson: Too little and too late.

Mr. Mang: —and will continue to do so. There was a statement made by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) with which I could not quite agree. He stated that the western farmer today—since the hon. member referred to me I am taking the liberty of referring to him—is in the worst cash position in which he has ever been.

An hon. Member: Don't you agree with it?

Mr. Mang: No. That is not the case, because I farmed during those hungry thirties when not only did we have no cash—

Mr. Ellis: And you had a Liberal government then, too?

Mr. Mang: We had it in Saskatchewan, too. I remember the time when not only did we have no cash but in some areas of Saskatchewan we did not have enough to eat. Those were the days of real depression. At that time we were bankrupt because we owed about $600 million, our machines were worn out and our clothing was worn down. A great percentage of our women were using flour sacks for dresses. We had cod fish shipped in from Nova Scotia. The farmers were in distress. It is for that reason I tell the hon. member for Moose Mountain that we are not in that position today.

Now, what is the position? Perhaps at this point I should mention another member, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), who stated he was very sympathetic toward me in connection with the largest protest meeting held in Saskatchewan. At that time I was speaking along with my distinguished friend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and the Liberal leader in the province, Mr. McDonald. The hon. member for Saskatoon said he was sympathetic toward me, and I thank him very much for that. However, I had feelings of sympathy as well at that meeting. My feelings of sympathy were directed toward the facts. If you ever heard a manhandling of facts, I think that was the place they got it. At that meeting I tried to deal with the situation as we have it in Saskatchewan, and perhaps the hon. members might be interested, just briefly, in that discussion of the cash shortage, which I mentioned last year and which has been mentioned very often this year.

I pointed out that while this shortage was generally prevalent in Saskatchewan, that did not mean we were bankrupt as Saskatchewan farmers. After surveying the situation and having many discussions with many people, farmers, elevator men, businessmen and anyone with whom I could talk, I found that the difficulties arose largely from the fact we were not able to make the usual deliveries because of congestion in the storage facilities and box car difficulties.

Our farmers could be divided roughly into three groups; the hon. member for Assiniboia will remember I said that. There was a small percentage who were not in immediate need of cash and would not take it regardless of the form in which it was available, whether through elevators or banks. Then there were those people who for several years now had had their land flooded and had neither wheat nor credit. They were unable to cultivate their land to any extent last year. Those people were the ones who were really in great difficulties. Then there was this large group in between who, while not bankrupt, were short of cash.

This situation was presented at the Saskatchewan conference and was the outcome of the situation I just mentioned, the delivery situation. It was dealt with at Saskatoon but there was no unanimity in the presentation of the case to the government down here, and that is one of the reasons for cash being made available through the banks. It results from the lack of a positive recommendation in that regard.

When I spoke at the Regina meeting which I just mentioned I made reference to that; I pointed out that in the west we were divided into different factions in presenting our case. We were divided politically in the west. I need not mention it here, but the Social Credit is in control in Alberta. in Saskatchewan we have a socialist government, and in Manitoba we have a Liberal administration. Politically we were not united, and the united farmers and the wheat pool did not see eye to eye on a good many things. Then the delegation came here with that form of presentation. The government here had to decide for themselves the best and most immediate way to make cash available.

Mr. Ellis: Do you agree with that policy?

Mr. Mang: Those were some of the things I stated. Of course the meeting had been called as a protest meeting. It was one of those protest and demand meetings. You know, we are often short of facts at those meetings. As I stated before, when I was invited to speak I had a set of these ready-made resolutions presented to me. They were presented to the other delegates, too. At that meeting there were some 900 or 1,000 people. As soon as the political actors were off the stage, including myself, there was about 25 per cent of the people left, and in the dying minutes of the meeting those resolutions were passed.

I say that because when you want to get something done, whether or not you get what you are after depends upon how you go at it. This attitude of trying to bulldoze this government into doing certain things through the medium of protest and demand simply does not work. I think perhaps I had just as much influence as all the protest and demand meetings that were held out there. During the middle of October I made a trip to Ottawa with regard to this matter of the western economy and had a very nice interview with the Prime Minister, with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Argue: Did you ask for bank loans?

Mr. Mang: I wanted to get that on the record. What I asked for was that cash be made available in the most practical way and the speediest way possible. If those conditions are fulfilled by handing out cash through the elevators I will be quite satisfied. What we want is the fastest possible action.

Mr. Argue: Does the hon. member believe in the 5 per cent interest rate?

Mr. Ellis: Is the hon. member satisfied with bank loans?

Mr. Mang: I have not taken out one yet; I may have to when I get back.

Mr. Ellis: The hon. member is satisfied with the policy?

Mr. Mang: As of now, yes. Now, go ahead and quote me in your next broadcast. Let me point out that in an emergency such as now exists—

Mr. Argue: We now know why we have the bank loan. The hon. member has given the answer.

Mr. Mang: No, I did not ask for bank loans. The hon. member for Assiniboia is a past master at mangling and mutilating facts. The hon. member—and I have heard him over and over again—belongs to that cult which believes that the only way you can get anything done is through protests and demands. During the past summer he did his level best to organize a mass march on Ottawa. One of his keenest disappointments was that he did not succeed. I heard him make that statement at the Regina meeting, and it was widely carried in the press. He did his level best to organize a mass march on the basis of protests and demands, and thereby force the issue. Probably he would have been chosen leader. I did not want to go into all these things, but since he has brought them up I thought I should refer to them.

I hold in my hand a clipping from a western paper which reads:

> Mr. Argue was described as the farm expert among the federal C.C.F. group, but he was supported on the platform by Roy Knight, M.P. for Saskatoon; Hon. J. H. Sturdy and Arthur Stone, legislative members for Saskatoon; and Robert Walker, M.L.A. for Hanley.
> The federal government's plan to guarantee bank loans to farmers in the present crisis was condemned by Mr. Argue. He said farmers would be called on to pay interest on their own money and when they started to mortgage their income, they were finished. They would only get deeper into the economic morass.

I do not want to quote it all.

Mr. Knowles: Go ahead.

Mr. Mang: I do not want to take up the time. At the Regina meeting—

Mr. Knowles: It is better than your own speech.

Mr. Mang: —the hon. member for Assiniboia said, "What is left now is a march on Ottawa." Those were some of the tactics used. Once the socialist government in Saskatchewan has nothing to protest about or no demands to make, socialism will disappear from the prairies. In every election out in the west thus far the socialists have attained power on the basis of protests, and the individuals from that party have obtained seats in this house in the same way.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Democracy cannot work in any other way.

Mr. Mang: I have been sidetracked.

Mr. Knowles: You would have done better to stay with foreign affairs.

Mr. Argue: Did the hon. member ask the Prime Minister for cash advances?

Mr. Mang: Many policies have been discussed. There are many ways in which the economic situation with respect to surpluses could be improved in Saskatchewan. There have been surpluses in the world in the past, and we have had surpluses in Saskatchewan. Our economy is so based that we must have a certain amount of surplus at times. Our yields fluctuate. We can drop something like 200 million bushels in our yields in one year. That was clearly illustrated by last year's record and this year's record. Those wide fluctuations have created surpluses, the statistics of which are on the record, and I will not go into them. Our friends across the way have always had some solutions. They are the greatest ones for dreaming up resolutions of any party we have had in western Canada. I should like to quote something I saw the other day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am afraid there will be no time for quotations. He has exhausted his time.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, of all the subjects mentioned in the speech from the throne, to my mind the most important is that which deals with agriculture. The speech from the throne indicates that the government recognizes some of the injustices done to agriculture, and they are going to make some small effort to recompense the farmers for some of their losses.

I wish to refer to that for just a minute, Mr. Speaker, because this is one place where I should like to congratulate the government. I congratulate the government on their endeavour to bring in legislation to relieve the farmer of the necessity of having to pay storage on an abnormal carryover. The carryover will amount to about 178 million bushels this year, and the government has suggested that the farmers should be compensated in some way for that cost.

The storage charges on this carryover have gone from 8 cents a bushel to 10 cents a bushel. Last year they were around 16 cents a bushel, and they could go as high as 20 cents. That means a cash outlay by the farmers of about $30 million. The government have at long last recognized that this is an imposition, and they suggest in the speech from the throne that the farmer should be compensated for this loss. They are to be commended for that, Mr. Speaker. Now that they have recognized the farmer has been unjustly penalized and forced to carry over this abnormal surplus from year to year, it is only right and proper that the government should compensate the farmers for the losses they have sustained in this respect over the last two, three or four years. It would mean that the farmers would have about $50 or $60 million coming to them in compensation, which they have had little hope of receiving up to the present time.

I now want to turn to the more immediate problem in agriculture. Throughout this debate great emphasis has been laid on the condition of agriculture. It is not just some mere passing fancy. Proof of the economic condition of agriculture has been definitely established. The dominion bureau of statistics stated just recently that in 1951 the income of the prairie farmers amounted to $1,127 million; in 1952, it was $1,082 million; in 1953, it was $884 million; in 1954, it was $376 million; and the bureau estimates that in 1955 the income will be still lower. According to the Albertan of November 25 last, the Alberta wheat pool has stated that farm income dropped 55 per cent between 1951 and 1954, and they, too, forecast a further drop in 1955.

If this is not a tremendous loss of income to the farmers, I should like to know what it is. It is not merely being short of cash. This represents a definite loss, and no one could argue otherwise. The provincial bureau of statistics reports that the Alberta farm income was nearly $3 million lower during the first eight months of 1955 than it was in the same period in 1954. That is the income for just one province and surely that is not "just being a little short of cash". This is definite and positive proof that the agricultural industry throughout the western provinces is facing a difficult situation indeed.

It has been stated over and over again in this house that the farmers are in dire need of cash. Throughout the fall I visited different parts of my constituency at the request of organizations which were holding protest meetings. The farmers are reluctant to hold protest meetings in my constituency but they did it this time because circumstances forced them to do it. The meetings that were held were certainly of a non-political nature. As far as I am aware these meetings were not called by any political organization, that is in the sense of a political party. It is true that various political parties were represented there, but when one finds farmers being forced to sell their grain to machine companies for as low as 60 cents a bushel, and in a great many cases, 75 cents a bushel, one can well understand that the farmers are becoming hard up for cash.

It was, of course, against the law to sell grain to machine companies who in turn sold it to feeders, but what were the farmers to do? The situation was common knowledge; therefore no one was going to lay a complaint. Certainly the federal authorities would not lay a complaint, nor did they; because it was as a result of their policy that the farmers were forced to sell their grain at such tremendously low prices, with disastrous results for a great many farmers. It seems queer that in the face of such huge surpluses the federal government, after all these years, has no policy by which it can adequately dispose of these surpluses.

Do not think for a moment that the situation I have described is imaginary. There are places in the world where people are desperately in need of assistance, and it is so reported by the Edmonton Journal on October 17. They quote a statement made by the United Nations food and agricultural organization. As you well know, that organization was set up and designed purposely to do away with huge surpluses of food in view of the want existing in the world. The Canadian government did not give their support to this organization, and we in this House of Commons can take the credit for contributing in a large measure to the holding back of the otherwise successful efforts of the FAO. I will now read what this organization had to say:

> Seventy per cent of the world's population will go to bed undernourished tonight.

Huge surpluses glut warehouses in a lucky few countries while the world's dinner pail scrapes close to the bottom in vast areas. Millions are hungry.

At this point they raise the question, what are we doing about it? However, that is not the only place where people are destitute and we can find an instance closer to home. The Albertan of October 31 reports an instance in the United States. Let me read just a section:

Chronic Poverty Still Rife in U.S.—

Many Americans are still chronically poor despite general prosperity, a congressional staff report said Sunday. It said this poverty endangers the future economic strength of the nation.

In general, the study pointed to the south, farms, and the non-white population as areas having a disproportionate share of poor folks. But there are depressed areas outside the south, and in cities as well as on the farm.

The report was written by the staff of the joint committee on the economic report, the major economic study group in congress. It was prepared for a subcommittee, headed by Senator John Sparkman (Dem. Ala.), which from Nov. 18 to 23 will hold hearings on the problems of poverty.

I can vouch for the accuracy of a part of that statement because I visited those areas and saw that poverty was rampant there. We do not have to take the word of the FAO, nor do we have to go to the United States to find great want and poverty. We can find it in the city of Ottawa and in the city of Hull. There is not a province in this country which does not have people who are destitute and in want. Our old age pensioners, for example, are required to live on $40 a month. Because of the policy of this government we are unable, under this outmoded financial system, to raise sufficient cash to enable these people to buy one additional loaf of bread when they are so greatly in need, despite our huge surpluses.

Who is to blame for this situation? We talk about being wealthy. Our gross national product this year will be over $26 billion, yet we require our old age pensioners to eke out an existence on $40 a month. What is the solution? The only solution this government has is the one offered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other evening, when he was vying with the Progressive Conservatives to see which of them had reduced the acreage the greater. Curtailing production seems to be the only answer of this government. I would like to read the words of the minister recorded at page 125 of Hansard:

The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that we immediately adopt the soil bank plan of the United States government. I suppose he thought that would be a new plan. We in Canada invented the soil bank plan back in 1941.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

"We", of course, refers to the Liberals. He continued:

We paid our producers to take their acreage out of wheat and put it into coarse grains or summerfallow. As a result of that policy, we reduced acreage in wheat from 27¾ million acres in 1940 to 16 million acres in 1943, a reduction of 11¾ million acres. During the year 1955 only about 20 million acres are planted to wheat, which is a reduction of 7¾ million acres planted to wheat since 1940.

This is the government's policy, despite the fact that millions of people are going to bed hungry every night. The government stands up and brags about it as if that would solve the economic problems throughout the world and make it a better world in which to live.

I noticed when the minister was speaking that rather than place the blame where it belongs, on the policy of the Liberal government in getting rid of our surpluses, he attempted to blame the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties for being frightened of surpluses. I shall, of course, let the C.C.F. speak for themselves, but I must point out that has never been the policy of Social Credit.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Nor of the C.C.F.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): In January of this year the Social Credit caucus issued a report through its magazine "The Canadian Social Crediter" which said:

It is obvious that the federal government does not have the answer to surplus production. We do not look upon surpluses as a calamity. It is only when we bungle the handling of them that they become such. If we provide proper storage, widely dispersed on the farms, and are prepared to use the national credit to finance the cash advances against the surpluses so stored, these surpluses can become a blessing to our country and the world in the years ahead.

As a long range program towards a permanent solution to the problem of surplus grain production the Canadian government should undertake a vigorous sales campaign to sell our surplus agricultural products to other nations requiring additional food supplies. To this end we should be prepared to enter into barter deals, credit deals and to accept at least some currencies of the importing countries in exchange for our surplus grain.

That certainly gives the lie to what the minister said the other day in regard to the policy of the Social Credit party in respect to surpluses. Social Credit policy is designed to take care of surpluses, while the policies of the old-line parties, both Liberal and Conservative, are designed for and function only in connection with scarcities. Let there be no misunderstanding about that.

It takes a great deal to convince the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the western farmer is in difficulty. During the summer and fall, as I have indicated already, I was home and attended some of these meetings. Some were held by the F.U.A., which is a non-political organization made up of all political classes throughout the west. They passed resolutions which were forwarded to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and some to the Prime Minister. Meetings were held by chambers of commerce, one being at Gleichen. I was invited to that meeting, which passed a resolution which was sent to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister. Then farmers held meetings on their own; in all these cases resolutions were forwarded to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister. I have not the time on this occasion to read them all, but I have them here and in passing I should like to say something about the requests made in these resolutions.

Most of them ask that 90 per cent of the initial payment be advanced. That was not an unreasonable request. Then they asked something in respect to the interest rate. They said that no interest should be charged, but in any case that it should not be greater than 2 per cent. They had two reasons for that. The first was that it was just an advance on their own grain, and the second was that the provincial government of Alberta had loaned money to municipalities at 2 per cent on self-liquidating projects. They reasoned, and quite properly so, that if the provincial government with its limited resources could lend money at 2 per cent then surely the federal government with its vast resources could lend money at not more than 2 per cent.

They asked also that we extend our sales program to cover a wider field for the sale of our wheat. In doing so we must be prepared to accept local currencies in payment for some of that wheat, that being particularly true of Great Britain. Then we must be prepared to accept some barter deals. It must be remembered that when we ask other countries to buy from us we must be prepared to buy their goods. Not one of these things asked by these meetings was unreasonable.

Then there were other organizations that asked certain things of the government. Here is one presentation which was submitted to the government with respect to the urgent need for cash advances on farm-stored grain. This is dated October 11, 1955 and is in the form of a submission to the government. Who signed it? I want to put these names on the record because I may refer to them later on. This was presented by:

Alberta department of agriculture
Manitoba department of agriculture
Saskatchewan department of agriculture
Saskatchewan wheat pool
Manitoba farmers' union
United grain growers
Saskatchewan federation of agriculture
Manitoba federation of agriculture and cooperation
Alberta federation of agriculture
Saskatchewan farmers' union
Alberta wheat pool
Interprovincial farm union council
Alberta farmers' union
Manitoba wheat pool

What did they ask for? I quote from page 5 of this brief as follows:

—for advances to farmers on grain in store on the farm . . .

Then further it states

While the principle of cash advances on farm-stored grain was unanimously endorsed—

Notice that; unanimously endorsed:

—by the organizations present at the conference, various proposals were offered on the mechanics of making those advances.

There surely is evidence as to the need that the people of western Canada were asking this government to consider. What did the minister do? From almost every walk of life throughout the entire west he received the same request, but did he accept that? No, he did not. That was not eastern Canada, Ontario or Quebec, asking for something. What did he decide to do in the face of that evidence? I quote from page 127 of Hansard of January 16, where he is reported as follows:

I went to western Canada for one reason only, namely to see just what the situation was there and the extent to which it could be remedied.

He was not taking the word of these different organizations I have mentioned. And further down:

I made up my mind that something should be done to assist the farmers—and particularly the small operators—to finance themselves until marketing could return to normal. I recommend to the government that the system of loans that was used in 1951 be made available again this year.

And again:

The government decided the only practical way to handle the matter would be to arrange guaranteed loans from the chartered banks.

That is what the minister was not asked to do by 90 per cent of the people out west, but that is what he decided to do after having gone west. He recommended the plan that was in operation in 1951; that was the solution of the government. You will notice that in the submission I read and in the resolutions presented to the minister and the Prime Minister, most of them asked for advances, but this is what the minister said in regard to those appeals:

Recently there has been a great drive for advances on farm-stored grain.

And again:

Who are its supporters? The supporters are the enemies of marketing through the wheat board.

That is what the minister is saying of the departments of agriculture of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan wheat pool, the united grain growers and all these different organizations. How ridiculous can we get in this house? Those are the very organizations which fought for the creation of the wheat board despite the minister's protests when he first took it over. Those are the organizations which are being accused of being saboteurs of the wheat board. Could anything be further from the truth? The minister knows there is not an organization in western Canada that is asking that the wheat board be done away with.

The minister went west to get out of giving advances to the farmers at low rates of interest. When he came back he said he had decided to give loans at 5 per cent regardless of what these different organizations had asked for. That is what he did. The explosive issue in the west is the interest rate. Western farmers with huge stocks of grain on their hands in the midst of a wheat glut have asked for cash advances from the Canadian wheat board or bank loans at low rates of interest. I suggest that so far they have not got that.

Now let me speak about the interest rate and the minister's views in that regard. As reported on page 127 of Hansard of January 16, 1956, he said:

> It has been said that the interest rate is too high at 5 per cent. I have been a borrower from banks all my life, and I have never yet succeeded in borrowing money from a bank at less than 5 per cent.

He must be a very poor businessman, though he may have accumulated millions, because I have borrowed money from banks at less than 5 per cent. What was my guarantee? The dominion government. What is the guarantee for these bank loans? The dominion government. I have borrowed money from banks at 3½ per cent with a dominion government guarantee, a dominion bond. What is behind a dominion bond? The dominion government. What is behind these bank loans the banks are going to make to the farmers at 5 per cent? The dominion government. But the farmers have to pay 5 per cent on this. Yet the minister says:

> I therefore cannot be too greatly concerned about objections to guaranteed loans bearing an interest rate of 5 per cent.

It is merely an excuse to give another handout to the chartered banks. Believe me, the chartered banks do not need much of a handout. They can look after themselves quite well. According to the Albertan of Wednesday, October 26, which says "Two Banks Hike Dividend Payments", let me show you how hard up the banks are. This report says:

> Two leading Canadian chartered banks, the Royal Bank of Canada and the Bank of Montreal, Tuesday announced increases in dividend payments for the current quarter.
> The Royal Bank of Canada announced an increase of 7½ cents to 45 cents from 37½ cents in addition to a bonus of 20 cents a share, payable December 1, 1955, to shareholders of record at the close of business, October 31, 1955.
> Bank of Montreal announced shareholders of record October 31, 1955, will receive an extra dividend of 20 cents a share on $10 par capital stock, payable December 15, 1955, as well as a quarterly dividend of 35 cents, an increase of 5 cents. The regular dividend is payable December 1, 1955.

This shows that the banks are quite capable of looking after themselves. Yet the government comes along with a guarantee for the banks to take a mortgage on the grain, and the farmers have to pay 5 per cent. The minister says he is not worrying too much over them anyway. Perhaps the minister has been influenced by some of the presentations made by Liberal members of this house who have spoken about the condition of western farmers. Perhaps he should not pay so much attention to them.

I do not think it was ever the intention of the minister that the farmer should use this facility to any great extent. In fact I am quite positive of that. What did he say in regard to it? As shown on page 129 of Hansard of this session, he said:

> Apart from that, it did not seem to me that there was any particular burden on the farmer through this condition of plenty.

The reference was to the question of storage. He disbelieves all the provincial departments of agriculture. He goes out west, comes back and says, "I do not think that there is any particular burden on the farmer through this condition of plenty." He was basing his plan on the 1951 plan. He knew, when he did that, that only 1,500 farmers took advantage of that plan, and they borrowed only $625,000 altogether. Why? Because the interest rate was too high and they could not afford it. Now, in spite of all this objection, 2,200 farmers have so far taken advantage of it, and over $2 million has already been loaned—more than that, I suppose, if we had the up to date figures. That shows whether or not the farmers are merely a little hard up for cash. They are in dire need of cash or they would not be going to the banks.

I said a moment ago that the federal government had no expectation that farmers were going to use this plan to any great extent. I can give you no better authority than the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Calgary, as reported in the Calgary Herald of 28th November, 1955. He said:

> It is my hope and belief that comparatively limited use will be made of the lending facilities, that most farmers are either in a position to carry on without borrowing, or are in a position to finance in the ordinary way.

That should give everyone a clear understanding of what was in the minister's mind when he made this proposition regarding loans to farmers. He never intended it to be used. He certainly was not carrying out the requests of the organizations throughout western Canada.

The minister has said that the Social Crediters have no plan. Let me review quickly what we have suggested from time to time. The Social Crediters have advanced the two-price system. We were the first to mention it in this house or anywhere in Canada. We have suggested the extension of markets by the acceptance of sterling, particularly from Great Britain, in part payment, and the acceptance of barter where necessary. We have suggested too that provision be made for a normal carryover in case of need during crop failure years, the storage to be paid on that carryover by the federal government.

I have not the time to speak about other things that are important, such as old age pensions, and the conditions existing in the Banff national park. I have not the time to speak about the trans-Canada highway, about which I should like to speak. I have not time on this occasion to go into the question of the coal mining industry, which has been so depleted in western Canada. These questions will receive attention when the proper time comes.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I gladly join previous speakers in this debate in congratulating the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am quite sure that their respective constituents will be proud of their representatives and also—at least I hope so—of their speeches, which will serve as models and leave a happy impression on the general tone and level of debate in this house.

In the course of these remarks I intend to express a few personal views on the agricultural problem in Canada, and on nothing else. According to the census of 1951, the farming population in this country, and I don't mean the rural population but only those people who live directly from agriculture, is 2,911,996. If we add to this figure the number of those who live indirectly from agriculture, we would certainly reach three millions. The dairy industry alone numbers about two million people, heads of families and dependents, who earn their living directly through it, while an additional 370,000 people earn their living indirectly from dairying. All this goes to show that, at least as far as mere numbers are concerned, the agricultural class in this country occupies a highly important place. But what at this time, is its economic position? Is it sharing in the general prosperity about which such proud boasts are being made, and rightly so, in this country? Is it benefiting as well as the individuals of the other classes from the general buoyant state of the economy? The answer is clearly no. In this connection I should like to quote two opinions.

First of all there is that of Mr. J. Edouard Labelle, president of the Provincial Bank of Canada. This view was expressed at the 55th annual meeting of shareholders.

> Unless very particular measures are taken to improve the economical state of the agricultural industry, the widening of the price gap between agricultural and industrial products would most certainly lower the standard of living of a large section of our population while, at the same time, improving that of many other groups of citizens. Such a situation would hardly be tolerable, neither from the point of view of the general good, nor from that of justice and equity.

And here is now the opinion expressed by Mr. A. C. Ashforth, president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, at the last general meeting of the shareholders.

> Profits obtained in the field of business were widely spread over our entire economy. If there was a weak point, it was in the field of agriculture. I am not referring to the volume of our agricultural production, which was great, but to the differences between prices of agricultural products and those of industrial products and also between farm income and that of city dwellers. This tendency is not new, but its persistency is troublesome.
> Agricultural prices and income have remained weak as compared with the greatly increased revenues of other sectors of the economy. In 1951, farmers received more than 12 per cent of the national income; today, they are getting about 7 per cent.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that comparisons are seldom fair and sometimes invidious. Nonetheless, I shall attempt a comparison between the farmers' situation and that of salaried workers. From 1951 to 1954, inclusively, the individual income of salaried workers in Canada increased by nearly 17 per cent. This information is taken from a statement made by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and quoted from the record of the 1955 session, at page 2794. In the same statement, page 2773, the minister admitted a reduction of nearly a third in the net income of farmers for a single year, namely from 1953 to 1954.

On the other hand, if we refer to the Statistical Review of June 1955, we find that, for the whole period 1951 to 1954, while the income of salaried workers increased by 17 per cent, the net income of farmers decreased by 47 per cent.

I am very glad for our working class that, on the average, salaries have greatly increased but I regret the sad plight of our farmers who, during the same period, have seen their returns decrease by an alarming percentage.

The farmer, just like the wage earner, is a consumer as a householder but he is also a consumer, and to a much greater extent, as the head of a farm.

Now the price of all he needs to run his farm is constantly going up while the price he gets for his products is going down. For instance, according to the figures provided by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in a brief submitted by a delegation that came down here in Ottawa on March 3, 1955, we have the following comparison which is very illuminating on that question: the wholesale price of farm products in 1951 was represented by the index number 190.

In 1956, that figure was down to 154, a decrease of 19 per cent. On the other hand, during the same period, the price paid by the farmer for the goods and services he buys is represented by the index number 173 in 1951, and 177 in 1954, an increase of 2·3 per cent.

In short, for the same period, the price of what the farmer has to sell shows a large decrease and the price of what he has to buy shows a small increase.

When speaking of price increases one naturally thinks of the prohibitive level at which we now find the prices of feed, fertilizers, and farm implements.

One thinks also of the price of seed which in 1954 and 1955—and I imagine that the same thing will happen again this year—went up considerably due to very poor weather conditions.

On this point of seed grain in particular, I received numerous resolutions and appeals which were also transmitted to the federal government and to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for help in buying grain. The Catholic farmers' union of Ste. Clothilde de Beauce, the councils of the municipalities of St. Jules and St. Victor, the municipal corporation of Beauce county, which is, after all, one of the most important bodies in my county, were among the institutions which sent me those resolutions.

The sale of pork even if it is protected by a floor price of 23 cents, surely does not bring in returns representing adequate compensation for the many hours of work the farmer spends looking after his herd. In my humble opinion, this price should be brought up to 26 cents.

The position is still worse with regard to the sale of lamb, veal and beef, and I do not hesitate to state that this sector too should be covered by a floor price that would ensure a reasonable income to the farmer in exchange for his work and that would stop speculative manoeuvres from entering the picture, with the result that the consumer is obliged to pay an exorbitant retail price for meat that has been bought at a ridiculously low price from the primary producer.

If we look at the position of the apple or potato producers of the maritimes, we feel hardly more reassured, and I also favour perhaps more efficient measures that would help these specialized producers.

And what about the western wheat producers? I must admit that I have never had more sympathy than I should for those farmers who, from time to time, like everybody, perhaps, have to face considerable difficulties. Yet, I think that their present position is serious enough, and I hope that the legislation announced in the speech from the throne will be able to settle their problem which is certainly of national scope.

I do not want unduly to darken the picture of our farm problem, but I think that it would scarcely be exaggerated to state that, on the whole, Canadian farmers are badly off. I am not saying that the government failed to take action in the matter, or that it did not try; far from it. Something more must be done however or we must proceed in some other way, this last suggestion being probably the better of the two.

I have said nothing yet about the dairy farmer. I concede that, so far, he has enjoyed some protection but I shudder at the thought that, sooner or later, under unmanageable pressure, the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) might give up his policy of price support for butter, a policy which I humbly suggest is embodied in one of the best pieces of legislation enacted in the last few years. Farmers are, however, rightfully apprehensive because in 1952, the support price was established for a period of three years while last year it was extended for one year only. Even if, in fact, this legislation were renewed each year, the procedure followed is unquestionably wrong since the dairy farmer never knows just where he stands from one year to the other and has no definite information on which to rely for the management of his business. That is far from being comparable to the request of industrial workers for a guaranteed annual wage.

However, we may rightfully believe that this step has become necessary, at least partly, because of a refusal to deal realistically with the problem of butter substitutes. I have stated on several occasions, but I want to repeat it once more, that price support legislation on butter has not been detrimental to workers or salaried people in general; on the contrary, I am convinced that it has saved them some money, although the latest sales of butter at a discount may have cost those people a few cents. Everyone will remember that in the winter of 1951-52 when dealers got hold of all the butter available at a price barely above the minimum price, they were selling it at 80 cents, 90 cents or even a dollar a pound retail.

The position would have been the same year after year if the government had abandoned its support price. Salaried people who are inclined to complain against an artificial price which they believe established for the sole benefit of the producer, would have paid dearly indeed, in certain months of the year, for the small savings they could have made during the other months.

Producers and consumers would both have had to pay the piper, because speculators and middlemen, who fortunately are not numerous, would have made a fortune at their expense. Even if the minister had no other reason to take this step, he should be congratulated for the enactment and maintenance of that legislation.

There are several other reasons which justify its maintenance, but I shall not repeat them. There is one however which I need no excuse to emphasize once again. It is the dangerous decrease in purchasing power which would occur among a large group of consumers—I said at the beginning that there were 2,370,000—if the dairy industry was allowed to fall off by a discontinuation of the price support legislation.

It has been said in certain quarters that it was scandalous to sell to foreign countries at 37 to 39 cents a pound a product for which we have to pay 63, 64 and even 65 cents. I take exception to that opinion, unless someone can show me that it would have been possible to act otherwise without completely dislocating the price structure on the local market and without ending up, although by different means with the same result, namely bankruptcy for the dairy farmer.

Oh! It is something altogether different if we want to give away our butter to our needy people or to foreign countries; it is no longer an economic problem but one of charity, of kindness and it should be considered from that angle. Under those circumstances, I humbly believe that parliament or at least the government should see to it that two essential conditions are fulfilled: first, that Canadian taxpayers can support the additional burden, because when we give something away, there is always someone who pays the shot; and second that our charitable gesture will not disrupt an important sector of our economy, thus increasing the number of needy people.

If those two conditions were met, the humble representative of Beauce county would not be far behind those who are now strongly urging us to make donations to our needy people and even to those of foreign countries.

In the meantime, let us proceed wisely and strive to avoid increasing the number of people in Canada to whom we must give assistance, as would happen if we let our dairy farmers become poverty-stricken.

I take this opportunity of congratulating the right hon. Minister of Agriculture who has agreed to sell a certain quantity of our surplus butter at 40 cents a pound, I believe, to educational institutions, hospitals and charitable institutions. This does not affect the market price, for several reasons, one in particular, that is that in some of those institutions margarine has been used rather widely. In fact some farmers also use it.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Not in Quebec!

Mr. Poulin: And speaking of margarine, it seems that the government should be blamed for its failure to do away with that product which is surely the greatest threat to the dairy industry.

Before that product invaded the Canadian market, around 1949, Canada produced approximately the quantity of butter we needed; it even happened that from time to time we were forced to import some. But that is an old story known to everyone, and to some people in particular. It is only since margarine has been tolerated in Canada that we really have butter surpluses which are gradually increasing in proportion with the consumption of margarine. That is not surprising, since in 1949 each Canadian used 29 pounds of butter per year, while 5 years later, in 1954, he used only 20·7 pounds, that is 40 per cent less.

During that same period production of margarine greatly increased, from none at all in 1948 to 115,000,000 pounds in 1954, the average consumption being 7·5 pounds per capita for that same year. We can readily understand why butter consumption has decreased in Canada, and why we have a surplus.

But what is not so easy to understand is why the Canadian government does not take the necessary steps to decrease production or use of a substitute which, in short, such at least is my humble opinion, does not help anybody, unless it is a few large concerns. I say for the tenth time that flooding the market with margarine will finally kill the dairy industry, deprive 2,370,000 Canadian consumers of their purchasing power, give rise to a national depression and cause unemployment among workers and salaried people.

I would like to repeat here a question I asked several times, not only in the house but before the good people of the constituency I represent: do workers and salaried people at large prefer eating butter at 63 cents a pound and have jobs, or run the risk of eating margarine at 35 cents a pound while being unemployed?

The price of butter is undoubtedly too high, but one must not forget that if we take the salary average in 1939, the Canadian worker could purchase 1·5 pounds of butter with one hour's wages while in 1955 he could purchase 2·3 pounds.

On the other hand, farmers have not remained idle in that connection and they have made serious efforts to lower their cost of production. While engaging in much more intensive cultivation, thereby lowering their cost of production, they have greatly increased the number of their milch cows and their average yield. Time does not permit me to prove all this with statistics, but they are readily available.

But the farmer has gone even further: he pays for the costs of advertising to increase consumption of liquid milk, thereby causing a relative decrease in the production of butter. In that connection, I am happy to say that in 1954, the province of Quebec won first place for milk consumption per person, that is 1·03 pints per day. In 1956, $362,000 are earmarked for advertisement by Canadian dairy producers. It can therefore be said that farmers did what they could to lower their cost of production. They made an intelligent and reasonable effort, with the help of federal and provincial experts, to make available to the Canadian consumer, at the lowest possible price, a product that is gradually being replaced by another one which, in last resort, will benefit no one.

How does the outcome of this situation look to responsible people? Do they not believe that it could develop into a national calamity? Does the government consider that the problem is quite serious? It seems that we must reply in the affirmative since, in the case of butter for example, the government agrees to sell that product at a loss of 22 to 24 cents per pound and that in the case of wheat it announces legislation that will cost several million dollars in one year to Canadian taxpayers. But will the government be satisfied with that? Will it consider the possibility of resorting to other means to change the situation? Personally, I said only what I think about the matter.

Although I am expressing the feelings and wishes of the agricultural people of Beauce county, there might be other ways of dealing with the situation. It might be that the steps we are suggesting, we the humble and small people, are but stop-gaps, expedient, arbitrary remedies which sometimes succeed more or less; or are they tested and scientific remedies, the result of an all-embracing approach not only of the agricultural problem as a whole but even of its effects on the other sectors of our economy? I believe it is time we should be told.

Personally, I cannot very well lay claims to wisdom because I have been sitting here only since 1949. However, I may say that since I have come here I have not heard a single truly objective and comprehensive statement on those problems from the right hon. Minister of Agriculture. We need general directives from experts who have the facilities for investigating the whole agricultural problem throughout the country. I know that such investigations and studies should first be initiated by those concerned, but it cannot be denied that our farmers in general have seriously undertaken that investigation; I referred to this briefly a moment ago. I also know that such investigations concern more directly provincial authorities and it must be admitted that all provincial governments without exception have given special attention to the agricultural problems of their respective areas. However, there is some advice and certain leadership that should come from higher up and which take into account the situation in the country as a whole and not only one particular district. For instance, I am thinking of the payment of subsidies for the shipment of grain from western Canada into the east, which is beneficial to the agricultural economy of several provinces and has some happy effects on the country as a whole.

This leads to the statement that the whole agricultural problem of Canada should be re-examined, taking into account modern scientific data as well as the developments of recent years in all sectors of the Canadian economy. The effects of the success or failure of these methods in a given district on Canadian citizens as a whole should also be taken into account. This is undoubtedly a matter for the experts of the central government.

May I add that this should not affect in the least the freedom and prior rights of the provinces in matters pertaining to agriculture.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to add a few words about an agricultural industry particular to eastern Canada and especially to the province of Quebec and even more so to the constituency I represent in the house, namely the maple sugar industry.

The following figures give some idea of the extent of that production. These statistics are for 1951, that being the last year for which, unfortunately, the data which I need is complete.

The revenue from this source for 1951, was as follows: For the whole of Canada, $8,555,000; for the province of Quebec, $6,797,000; for the county of Beauce, $943,716. That is close to a million. I can say that in 1954 and 1955 the figures must be somewhat over a million. There are sugar bushes on 2,086 farms of this constituency, out of a total of 4,465. That is to say that 46·7 per cent of farmers take part in this type of activity which, according to the 1951 figures—and the corresponding figures would be larger for the last few years—has brought them an annual revenue of $452.40, this revenue being 13·9 per cent of the total figure for this production for the province of Quebec and 11 per cent of the total for the whole of Canada.

The county of Beauce ranks first among counties producing this commodity in Canada. The second on the list is that of Megantic, whose production is valued at 77 per cent of the first.

It will therefore be easy to understand how important that product is for the farmers of the constituency I represent.

For those who are unfamiliar with the situation, let me explain very briefly how it happens that the maple sugar industry appeared in the public accounts of the government.

The Food and Drugs Act states that there shall be no obnoxious or poisonous substance in these products. Well, it was found in 1936 that Canadian maple products contained traces of lead. If I am not mistaken, the United States, our largest customer for those products, were the ones to point out this anomaly. Shipments were stopped immediately and the whole industry was threatened by ruin. It was found afterwards that the presence of lead in maple sugar was due to the solder used in the manufacture of the sap collecting-pails. All those therefore had to be changed. After lengthy research, it was found that, to prevent the presence of lead in maple sugar, it was necessary to use aluminum pails.

However, this change was a very costly undertaking and the farmers could not finance this overnight.

It was then that an appeal was made to the Quebec and Ottawa governments. It was decided that the cost of replacement would be shared equally, one third by each government and one third by the owner of the sugar bush.

Thus through the co-operation of the governments concerned equipment has gradually been renewed since 1941. In recent years, Canadian parliament has approved the following expenditures in that connection: 1952-53, $500,000; 1953-54, $300,000; 1954-55, $100,000; and 1955-56, 0.

The Quebec legislature has spent similar amounts, except in 1955-56 needless to say, so that until 1955 the Quebec provincial government and the Ottawa government had each spent $3,500,000 thus permitting the renewal of 17,308,823 pails out of a possible total of 21 to 22 millions. The Quebec government has maintained its policy and is still paying one third of the cost of replacement. The federal government gave up its program when the 1955-56 budget was brought down. There are still therefore a small number of these producers who will not benefit from the same advantages as others and who will be unable to deliver their product on its natural market. I do not see why the government which, for a dozen years, took part in this program, would not, for two or three more years, be as generous as it has been in the past in order to complete a piece of work so well begun, a work which has been greatly beneficial to a particular class of producers which really deserve a special attention.

I therefore hope that, among many steps to be taken to help agriculture as a whole and a class of producers in particular, the right hon. Minister of Agriculture will be kind enough to insert in his next budget an amount of $100,000 for the replacement of pails for collecting maple sap. Farmers of the Beauce district in particular, since they are the most directly concerned, will no doubt be grateful to him, as they have been in the past.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my congratulations to those of the speakers who have preceded me in this debate to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I might say that I had the opportunity of getting to know the mover of the address a bit better this summer, and I was very glad that she was given the honour of moving the address. I say that, not as a large number of members have because she is a woman, but because she is herself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to turn to less agreeable questions, I should like to say something first of all on an income tax matter. During the past year I have heard a constantly increasing number of complaints over departmental rulings that what the taxpayer considered was a capital gain was in fact taxable income upon which he was then called to pay an impost. In many cases the transaction involved took place many years previously, with the result that the man who had to pay quite a considerable sum including the interest on the money involved found himself in an extremely difficult situation, sometimes a ruinous situation, because his business had expanded or contracted, as the case might be, to the point where he found it extremely difficult to make this payment.

Under our income tax laws capital gains are not taxable. However, the department seems to have been following a policy under which capital gains in effect are being taxed in a large number of cases. The result of this is a great state of uncertainty on the part of many people as to what their situation is, and as a consequence of this uncertainty the expansion of a business or the start of a new enterprise is frequently prevented. In addition too, in many cases people get into difficulties such as the one I mentioned a short time ago.

The trouble in regard to this matter seems to be that there is no definition in the Income Tax Act of what is taxable income and what is capital gain. As a result the taxpayer is at the mercy of the officials of the income tax department and their rulings vary from time to time and from place to place, with the result that quite frequently nobody knows what the situation is in regard to any particular transaction.

The situation has grown so difficult so far as some people are concerned that they have actually told me they would prefer to have capital gains taxable rather than be left in their present position of uncertainty. That is a change in the Income Tax Act to which I do not think many of us here would be agreeable. I think the system under which capital gains are not taxable, such as we have in this country and in Great Britain, is preferable to the one which exists in the United States where they are taxable.

However, when some people consider that the system I mentioned would be better, in that they might know definitely just where they are, I think it is a good indication of how serious the situation is in relation to a large number of people. As I say, I think this could be corrected fairly readily by writing into the Income Tax Act a definition of what non-taxable gains consist of so that everybody would know where they stood.

I remember from my student days that one of the accepted principles of taxation is that a tax should be certain so that the taxpayer knows exactly what his situation is and what he is liable for. That is exactly what we do not have in Canada. At the present time, so far as capital gains are concerned, we have an uncertain tax, and as a result we have a great state of uncertainty on the part of a large number of businessmen. This is a situation which affects small businessmen and individuals in particular. It is not a matter which greatly affects large corporations, because in most cases they have the resources to meet any difficulties of that type which might arise. In view of this I would hope there would be some action at this session to clear up the present situation by legislation and put it on a more satisfactory basis.

I turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the problem of most concern to western Canada: that is the inability of farmers to market their grain, the reduced prices which the farmers receive for the grain they do manage to deliver, and the consequent drastic reduction in income. We have in western Canada, as has been pointed out several times already in this debate, an extremely serious situation. It is one which affects not only the prairie provinces but the entire country, and the repercussions will be increasingly felt by the rest of the country as time goes on. We have had statistics put on the record several times as to the reduction in income of farmers in the west, particularly the reduction in their net income, the amount of money they actually have to spend.

I am not going to take the time of the house in repeating those statistics. Mention has also been made of the desperate situation in which many farmers find themselves, in that they are trading in their grain to implement dealers, in many cases, and to dealers of all kinds at prices ranging from 60 to 65 and 70 cents a bushel. These transactions are, of course, outside the normal channels of trade, and I presume if the situation were not as desperate as it is probably the wheat board or the government might take some punitive legal action against some of the people engaging in these transactions.

As the matter stands I think everyone is only too delighted that these farmers are able to discharge their debts and secure some of the goods they need by this means. When the normal selling price of grain at the head of the lakes is supposed to be approximately $1.70 a bushel; when the initial payment is $1.40 a bushel, and farmers are selling grain for 60, 65 or 70 cents a bushel in order to obtain sufficient cash to carry them through, it gives a pretty good idea of how serious the situation is and how desperate some of these farmers are.

In order to meet the situation the government has made only two very inadequate proposals, each of which is the subject of a resolution on the order paper and one of which will be adopted in the very near future. In view of this I am not going to deal with either of these proposals in detail, but I do wish to indicate the inadequacy of each of them to meet the problem with which we are faced in western Canada.

The first of these proposals is the loan scheme which is already in effect. It has had the main effect, I would say, of angering and exasperating the western farmers. According to the last figures we have had it is true that some 2,000 farmers have taken advantage of this scheme, and it is also true that a great many more than that have applied; and that is one of the difficulties. A considerable number of farmers, I am informed, have had great difficulty in securing loans. Many of the people who are most in need of loans, as happens in connection with most bank loans, are the very ones who have been unable to secure them.

Apart from that altogether there are two serious difficulties as far as this bank loan scheme is concerned. The first is that the amount of $1,500 is quite inadequate as far as a very large number of farmers are concerned. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce said he was not interested in those people who did not think $1,500 was quite an adequate sum. If he had to meet $500 or $1,000 worth of harvesting expenses, which is the case with a very large number of farmers, or if the farm were a large one it would be more than that, perhaps he would think that a $1,500 loan was not of much use. That is actually the situation. It is not sufficient to cover the harvesting and other expenses of a very large number of farmers.

The other thing which is wrong is the interest rate of 5 per cent. To the western farmer that appears as just an extra toll on what he has already earned or produced. He does not think there should be an interest rate on this loan at all; in other words he does not think it should be a loan—this is something I will come to later—but that it should be a cash advance. If it is to be a loan he considers that an interest rate of 5 per cent is greatly in excess of what it should be, considering that it is to be a government-guaranteed loan.

Apparently the government have realized that this $1,500 loan scheme is inadequate, because they have since put forward a second proposal to pay the carrying charges on what they call abnormal carryovers of wheat, which are defined as any amount of wheat in excess of 178 million bushels. This move is a good one as far as it goes, but the inadequacy of the move to meet the present situation, particularly the shortage of cash in the hands of western farmers, is shown immediately when we begin to figure out what this will mean to the average farmer in western Canada in the form of cash in his pockets. At the present time and for several months to come it will mean not one cent more in his pockets; it is not going to help his cash position in the slightest for several months. At some time in the future, several months hence, the average farmer will get from $150 to $200 more than he would get otherwise. Therefore, as I say, the scheme is all right as far as it goes, but as far as meeting the present desperate cash shortage it is no good. Even when it will be paid in the form of participation certificates or something of that sort months hence it is not going to go very far.

The fact that these are the only proposals of the government to meet the present grain difficulties shows that one of two things exists. Either there is a complete lack of realization on the part of the government as to the seriousness of the situation, or there is a complete bankruptcy of ideas as to how to deal with the situation. A week ago today the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a speech dealing with the subject I am dealing with at the moment. I am sure that speech must have occasioned a great deal of profane language in western Canada. I will wager that at least 90 per cent of the farmers who read that speech, no matter what their political complexion, engaged in extremely unflattering remarks as far as the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his understanding of their plight were concerned.

In that speech the minister complained about people complaining that there was a surplus of wheat and said that a surplus was a good thing, that he would far sooner have a surplus than a deficit. As far as abstract theory is concerned I presume we could all agree with that. Most of us would rather have a surplus than a deficit. But to the farmer who has part of that surplus sitting on his farm, in many cases exposed to the weather and in all cases deteriorating, and who is unable to get cash for it in order to meet his requirements for food, tractor fuel and all sorts of things, that surplus is anything but a good thing; it is something about which he is anything but pleased to have.

There is no use in the Minister of Trade and Commerce or anyone else dealing with these things on the basis of what you might call abstract theory as to the desirability of having a big surplus of wheat or food of any kind with which to feed the starving world. That is all very well; but as far as the man who has actually produced the grain is concerned, if that surplus is sitting on his farm and he cannot get any money for it, he is in desperate circumstances none the less. He is wondering how he is going to eat, rather than wondering how the hungry world is going to be fed. As far as we in this house are concerned he is the man we are dealing with; it is his problem we have to keep most in mind. I am very much afraid that he is not the man the Minister of Trade and Commerce has most in mind.

The minister said also in his speech that the demand for cash advances for wheat stored on the farm did not come from the farmers, that this demand came from the people in the cities and those who were opposed to the wheat board. Of all the peculiar statements the minister has made, of all what you might call the questionable and ridiculous statements he has made in the eleven years I have been in this house, that one takes the prize. It is the most extraordinary statement of all. The people whom he attacks as wanting to get rid of the wheat board, as has been pointed out before, are the people who were really responsible for bringing it into existence. If that is the best defence the minister can make then I think it would be better for him not to talk on wheat at all, because he merely acerbates the people most concerned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I had just begun to comment on the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on wheat in this house a week ago, and had been dealing with the incredibly ill-informed statement he made that the farmers in western Canada are not asking for cash advances. On the contrary, I believe that practically all the farmers in western Canada not only have been asking for but want cash advances on farm-stored grain.

The minister went on to say that loans on grain could not be made by the wheat board, that there were too many difficulties in the way. I should like to point out that the farmers have not asked for loans from the board and are not asking for them now. What they have asked for are cash advances, which is a very different thing indeed.

I can see no real difficulty in the wheat board making cash advances to farmers on grain they have not yet delivered. It is merely an extension of what they have been doing every day for the past seven years on grain which is actually delivered. They get the delivery in the permit book and issue a cheque for it. It would be essentially the same thing for them to make a cash advance, enter it in the order book and, of course, when the grain is delivered—and there is nowhere else the farmer can deliver it except to the board—the amount of cash advance would be deducted from the value of the grain. That does not present any serious difficulty and, particularly, it does not convert the wheat board into a lending institution or a banking institution.

It is rather peculiar that a number of the western Liberal members seemed to have changed their tune in regard to cash advances on farm-stored grain since coming to Ottawa. Out in the west they were proponents of it because practically all their farmer constituents were asking for it. Since coming here they have been following the minister's line and trying to say that cash advances are not required, are not wanted and so on. The result is that we are getting some double personalities developed among these people.

An outstanding example is the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). I notice there is a reprint about him having become the two-bodied or two-tongued member for Rosthern, advocating cash advances in the west and condemning them here. Apparently he and other western Liberal members have taken very much to heart the talk given at the Liberal dinner last week by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, at which he said that they must stand by the party line, right or wrong. Therefore they are standing by it, in spite of what their former position might have been when they were out among their own constituents.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce also said that the interest rate of 5 per cent on the bank loans being made was quite a fair rate of interest, and that when he had had to borrow money, which was frequently, he had always had to pay 5 per cent or more. I would say to him that he must consider the risk. This is one of the big items to consider as far as lending money is concerned, and apparently the banks thought that he was a risk deserving of 5 per cent or more. It is necessary to consider that these loans are backed by the dominion government. The wheat board, when it pays the farmer for the grain for which it does take delivery, has borrowed the money at less than 5 per cent. Any other government guaranteed loans such as this could carry a lesser rate of interest than 5 per cent because the risk is not great; in fact it is almost negligible.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce attributed the surplus and the troubles that exist in the grain situation to a variety of causes: first, the weather; second, the United States policy; third, the speeches made by his political opponents, which he said were preventing the sale of grain. In other words, his statements in this regard reminded me of one of the old sayings of world war I: "You can send my mother, my sister or my brother, but for God's sake don't send me." The minister, in effect, is saying the same thing except that it is "Don't blame me; blame everybody else."

The minister said there had been a succession of good crops, which by and large is true, that dry years would come again and the situation would right itself. In other words the government has no answer to the wheat problem except a series of crop failures. That is the only long-term solution it has. Evidently it proposes to sit down and wait for these crop failures to come, and to leave these farmers to their troubles in the meantime.

This attitude on the part of the government sums up my chief criticism of it in regard to grain matters. The government accepts no responsibility for allowing the present situation to develop. It admits to no failure of any kind in the marketing of grain, nor any failure of any other sort, but it does nothing whatever except wait for crop failures to cure the situation.

I believe there will be poorer years for grain production than have been experienced throughout the world during the past five or six years. However, I think we must expect that the average world grain crop will be larger in the future than it was 10, 20 or 30 years ago. There are a variety of reasons why I think that opinion is well founded. To begin with, European countries are now growing considerably more wheat, particularly, than they were in the past, because of a desire for economic sufficiency on their part due to the danger of war and the desire not to be caught short of bread grains and supplies of that sort. Throughout the world better methods of tillage—and that is particularly true of this continent—have been put into operation, and that again has raised the general level of yield, either in good or in bad years. Similarly, wider use of fertilizer has tended to raise the yield. Then again, more irrigation has raised the yield. Not only does irrigation raise the yield on the land directly irrigated, but it raises the general water table and thus raises the yield on a great deal of the surrounding land which is not directly irrigated.

For all those reasons the general level of world grain crops will be greater than it has been in the past. If we are going to be realistic we must face that situation and accept it as a fact, instead of trying to blink it off and saying, "We shall have dry years, and all our troubles will disappear."

On the other side of the picture, too, the consumption of bread grains has not been going up proportionately to the increase in population. The average person on this continent particularly is not eating the amount of bread or wheat products he did in the past. When I was a boy I remember there would be a big stack of wheatcakes or pancakes for breakfast. How many people eat a stack of pancakes for breakfast now? Very few, even in the rural areas, let alone in the cities. The same thing applies right through the picture. In other words the consumption of wheat has been going down on the average per person, and probably that will continue.

Taking all these factors together, our wheat surplus is likely to be a continuing problem and one for which we must seek a long-term solution. It is not something we can blink off. We cannot say that time and the weather will look after it. A glance at the carryover figures for the past six or seven years shows that the surplus is a mounting problem, one that is growing worse year by year. I have the figures here, and these are the only figures I shall use. I should like to put them on the record to show the way in which our surplus is constantly increasing.

In the crop year 1949-50, we had a carryover of 112 million bushels. The next year, 1950-51, it was 189 million bushels, up 77 million bushels. The next year, 1951-52, the carryover was 217 million bushels, up 28 million from the previous year. In 1952-53 it was 369 million bushels, up 152 million. In 1953-54 it was 587 million bushels, up 218 million bushels from the large carryover of 1952-53.

Then in 1954-55 we had a poor crop; we grew less than 300 million bushels of grain. That was the one really poor crop we have had in a long period, owing to a variety of reasons, and the carryover fell to 481 million bushels. Then we had a reasonably good crop last year and the carryover this year will probably be between 580 million and 590 million bushels, bringing us back up to the high figure of 1953-54. What that indicates is that with anything like a normal crop we are not able to export enough grain or to consume enough at home to take care of what we are growing. We are producing more than we can get rid of. As a result we have this surplus mounting and mounting.

One of the serious aspects of this mounting surplus is the matter of the carrying charges on it, which have already amounted to a large sum, an amount of money which would otherwise have gone in the farmers' pockets and from there into the general stream of the economy, thus benefiting everyone in the country. If these surpluses continue to mount the cost of the carrying charges on them—just looking after these surpluses—will be a continuing and increasing drain not only on the farmers but on the general economy. This drain, under the proposed government measure of a storage payment plan, is going to be partially transferred to the general taxpayer, but of course it is still going to be a drain. That plan, which I think is sound enough, is still going to cause a great deal of discontent in other parts of Canada and a cry—which we do not like in the west—that the western farmer is being subsidized by the rest of the country, that there is no justification for it and so on and so forth.

Another feature of the cost of the carrying charges which I should like to point out is this. They have caused a constantly increasing spread between the price at which the wheat has been sold either at home or abroad and the price received by the farmer. The spread used to be a few cents, but it has gone up and up so that at the present time the farmer receives—and I will not go into the statistics—much less than he used to receive for a bushel of grain, chiefly because of these carrying charges. The cost of these carrying charges alone in the spread they have caused between the price received by the farmer and the price the grain is sold for is a sufficient reason to indicate to the average farmer that a surplus—contrary to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said—is not a good thing as far as he is concerned, and he is extremely unhappy about it.

As I stated, the minister and the government have done nothing whatever about a long-term solution to our wheat surplus problem. Apparently they have not even gone to the extent of giving serious thought to the problem, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has scoffed at every suggestion which has been made with regard to dealing with that surplus. In his speech last week, for example, as reported at page 125 of Hansard, he had this to say:

> Well, we should plant at least 20 million acres of wheat. I believe that our economy requires production to that extent. I will admit at once that if we get five more wet years in succession, 20 million acres of wheat will produce an accumulating surplus in this country.

And so on. Then he goes on further to say this:

> Therefore, I reject the soil bank plan or any other plan—

The minister rejects the soil bank plan, and he rejects any other plan before he even hears it.

> —destined eventually to place wheat in the deficit column. If we cannot keep wheat supplies in balance, let us have a surplus of wheat, but let us never adopt a policy that can produce less wheat than our markets will take.

The whole trouble is that we are producing more wheat than our markets will take. I would be quite happy if we were producing just the amount of wheat our markets would take or anything close to that amount. But unfortunately we are producing a great deal more than that and that fact, of course, is the whole cause of the difficulty.

In connection with this statement to which I have referred, one might well ask this question. Why does our economy require 20 million acres of land in wheat? Especially is that so if we cannot sell wheat? One might just as well say, picking a figure out of a hat, "Our economy requires 25 million acres of land in wheat", or 15 million acres of land in wheat. There is no magic in the figure 20 million acres. It just happens that 20 million acres is what we had in wheat last year. There is nothing to show that is what we should continue to have or that it is the ideal amount for us to have.

As a matter of fact I should think it would be much more sensible to say that the acreage our economy requires to have in wheat is only that acreage which will produce the amount of wheat which can be economically raised and disposed of. That is the acreage we should aim for, and not any particular fixed figure. The land that we have in wheat probably should go up and down considerably from time to time, depending on what the world markets are.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has attributed a great deal of our difficulty to the United States policy of giveaways, selling for blocked currencies and things of that sort. I think it is quite evident that this policy of the United States has cut down our potential markets considerably. At the same time, however, I think we must admit that the United States has taken a much more realistic and practical attitude toward their wheat surplus than has our government toward our wheat surplus. The United States giveaways are preventing our sales at the present time. There is no question about that fact. But there is some hope that these giveaways and the reduction in acreage by their soil bank plan will eventually remove the United States as such a serious competitor for world markets as they have been during these past two or three years. However, it looks as though a period of several years will have elapsed before that end is accomplished. It is going to take some considerable time.

In the meantime I believe that we ourselves must look for some solution in order to look after our own surplus. I do not see that we can just continue to let the surplus mount up and up and consequently continually reduce the price to the farmer and lower his standard of living. I would suggest a considerable extension of the present P.F.R.A. measures which have already taken a considerable amount of land out of wheat production. The minister said there were about 27 million acres in wheat in 1940. The figure is now down to 20 million acres. A great deal of that reduction is due to work done by P.F.R.A. I should think that an extension of the work of that agency should be our first step in reducing the amount of wheat we are producing.

As a matter of fact, if the amount of $30 million a year which it is now proposed should be spent on the carrying charges for wheat, according to the projected bill, had been spent annually for the last three or four years in converting areas in southern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta from wheat production into grass and establishing farmers on that grassland in the livestock business, we would not at the present time be in as serious a situation as that in which we find ourselves with regard to our wheat surplus. At the same time we would have built up that soil and would have made out of it a permanent resource to meet any projected period of scarcity in the future, such as that which the minister envisages, when we may want to increase production considerably.

I believe a plan of this nature should be put into operation forthwith. It should be the first step in cutting down our wheat acreage and our wheat production in order to attempt to get into some sort of reasonable balance with what we have a prospect of consuming at home and selling abroad.

I can see no good sense whatever in producing the same amount we have been producing and engaging in these giveaway programs, or selling it for sterling or blocked currencies. In any event, apparently the British government does not want to deal in that way. They are not willing to accept our wheat on the basis of selling for sterling. They would just as soon pay dollars for it. I can see no advantage to us in trying to dispose of our surplus wheat by means of these giveaway programs, whatever particular form they may take. On the other hand it seems completely foolish and stupid to produce a great deal of wheat which you cannot dispose of in any form. It seems to me the logical thing to do is to begin cutting down production.

I would strongly recommend that steps be taken immediately, as I said, to extend the operations of the P.F.R.A. plan with that in mind.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I should embrace this opportunity to bring before the house certain matters which are of vital concern to my constituents and which, in my opinion, are too urgent to be left over until the estimates are before us. Before going further I should like to identify myself with those who have complimented the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply on the excellent manner in which they have discharged their duties.

The speech from the throne lists a record of achievements during the past year and outlines a program of legislation for this session of which all Canadians may feel justly proud. There is, however, one omission which I know will be a cause of general regret to my constituents and, I believe, to all the fishermen in Newfoundland. I refer of course to the lack of any reference to unemployment insurance benefits for fishermen.

The number of Newfoundland fishermen has been steadily declining since confederation. This decline has been most severe along the southwest coast, particularly in the riding of Burin-Burgeo which I have the honour to represent. At the time of confederation six years ago the total number of Newfoundland fishermen was estimated at 28,000. Today they are estimated at around 8,000. These figures speak for themselves. It must be borne in mind also that a considerable number of these 8,000, probably as many as 25 per cent, are men of 50 years of age and over. They are too old to secure employment in secondary industries where the labour supply is regulated by labour organizations. They are too old to stand the physical strain of working in the mines or in the forests.

Many factors have contributed to this exodus from the Newfoundland fishing industry. In my opinion the two most important factors have been the lack of unemployment insurance benefits on the one hand, and on the other the availability of alternate employment with unemployment insurance benefits as well as, in some cases, better remuneration. For 450 years the Newfoundland fisherman toiled, suffered and died, but he always managed to cling to the hope that some day things would be better.

Then came confederation, and he hailed it as the dawn of a new day; the day for which he had waited so patiently and so long; the day of fulfilment of the hope that had been deferred through four and a half centuries. His soul was stirred at the prospect of becoming a Canadian citizen and sharing in the great Canadian democracy—a democracy based on lofty ideals such as the strong helping the weak and equal treatment for all, great and small, rich and poor alike. He heard wonderful stories of the fabulous natural wealth of Canada, and he looked forward to sharing the prosperity which was certain to result from its development. He was aware also of the vast resources of the federal government, financial and otherwise. He looked forward to the speedy employment of those resources in finding a solution to his problems. He expected a quick expansion of his markets and a steady rise in his standard of living.

Six years have passed, and the Newfoundland fisherman looks at his fishing industry. What does he see? He sees a depressed and declining industry. He sees his numbers reduced from 28,000 to 8,000. He sees the once great Labrador fishery completely gone. He sees the inshore fishery rapidly disappearing. He sees his living costs and his operating costs steadily mounting and greatly increased. He sees the price of his product remaining stationary and sometimes falling below the pre-confederation level. He looks out from the south coast over the nation and sees the greatest production and the greatest prosperity in the history of Canada.

Then he turns his gaze along his own south coast. He looks at places like Marystown, Lamaline, Garnish, Belleoram, St. Jacques, English Harbour West, Mose Ambrose, Jersey Harbour, Harbour Breton, Rencontre West, Francois, Grand Bruit, Rose Blanche, Burnt Islands, and many others. I mention those settlements because they were once famous as centres of the south coast fishing industry. I could have mentioned many other smaller places in between those settlements. But as he looks at those places which were once prosperous and flourishing, he sees now ghost towns. He sees them all in distress, economically sick; some dead and others dying. He sees that everyone is prosperous except the fisherman. He is still the hewer of wood and the drawer of water.

He must still take all the risks, endure all the hardships and suffer through life under a subsistence level. At the same time he sees others benefiting from his product and earning a better living for themselves. Those who handle it enjoy unemployment insurance benefits at every stage, from his boat to the consumer.

It is true that like other Canadian citizens he gets the family allowance and old age pension. He finds them a real blessing, but good as these are they are poor substitutes for a livelihood. As a means of livelihood, the only natural resource on the southwest coast is fish. Other sections of the province prominent in fishery development plans have additional resources. They have mineral resources and forest resources, but the riding of Burin-Burgeo is a have-not riding.

With the exception of a fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence, we have only fish, nothing else; but fish we do have of all varieties and in abundance, herring, mackerel, lobster, cod, salmon, haddock, rose fish, halibut, sole and many others. Furthermore, we have numerous fishing grounds from one mile to twelve miles offshore, plenty of year-round open ports with fine natural harbours, and an all year round fishing season. The lack of development of these resources leaves the south coast fisherman with no alternative but to abandon his occupation, abandon his house, his property, his friends, pull up his stakes and move to the mainland. This is a sad spectacle to contemplate and one that is not in the best interests of either Newfoundland or Canada.

The Newfoundland fisherman feels entitled to a fairer share of Canada's prosperity than he has hitherto received, but he sees no chance of economic improvement in the near future. His day of deliverance seems as far off as ever. The bright vision which he associated with confederation is beginning to fade, and in its place is coming a sense of futility and despair.

The deferment of unemployment insurance benefits and the reasons for withholding them have added to his disappointment. Let us look at some of these reasons. Wage earners in other occupations can qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, but wage earners who are fishermen cannot because they number only six or seven thousand. Another reason given is that fishermen cannot qualify for unemployment benefits because they are certain to be unemployed in the off season. In this respect, how do the fishermen differ from the great lakes seamen, the dockers and the stevedores in the various ports along the shores of the lakes and of the St. Lawrence seaway? Are not these also certain to be unemployed in the off season when the freeze-up comes?

A third reason given is that a satisfactory plan of unemployment insurance for fishermen would not be actuarially sound. I find it difficult to believe that this principle is rigidly applied to other individual industries. If it were so, surely it would necessitate a different rate of contributions and a different scale of benefits for every single industry, because no two industries are exactly alike either in their economic structure or their economic potential. The very fact that all workers pay the same rate of contributions, based on earnings, and receive the same scale of benefits, based on contributions, to me seems to prove that actuarial considerations apply to industry collectively and not to each separate industry. In other words unemployment insurance benefits have become another social security measure, and I see no justification for excluding fishermen from those benefits.

No one would wish to minimize the benefits of price supports, deficiency payments, salt rebates, storm damage insurance, small loans for fishermen and other measures which this government has provided to assist the fishermen. These measures, however, can never cure the sick fishing industry. At best they can prolong a miserable existence. In many instances the effectiveness of these measures is considerably curtailed by the regulations with which they are circumscribed. It will take many years before their combined cumulative effect can have any significant impact on the fishing industry of Newfoundland.

If the Newfoundland fishing industry is to be revived something more than economic aid must be forthcoming. Something must be done to inspire the fisherman with a new hope and a new courage; something must be done to give him a sense of belonging to a great Canadian family who are interested in him and are anxious to help him. One thing more than anything else that will accomplish this goal is unemployment insurance benefits.

I know it is not easy to work out a satisfactory scheme, but I believe it can be done and I am glad to learn that there is still hope; that the idea has not been abandoned but that it is still under study by a committee set up for the purpose. I trust that it will be possible to work out a satisfactory solution and bring in the necessary legislation before the end of this session. I must emphasize again that speed is of the essence, because at the present rate of exodus, if it is delayed much longer very soon there will be no Newfoundland fishermen left.

A short while ago, Mr. Speaker, I referred to the disappearance of our deep sea banking fleet. Confederation has also had an adverse effect on our coastal shipping. Our coastal fleet is in grave danger of disappearance. Prior to confederation we could boast of a coastal fleet of over a thousand ships. Today there are probably fewer than 200 left. The rapid decline in coastal shipping is due, in the first place, to the high mortality rate suffered by both men and ships. During the past year 32 vessels were shipwrecked and became a total loss, five of them from my own riding; and one of those was lost with all hands. In addition, several others were sold.

In the second place, there is no incentive to replace those ships for two reasons. One reason is the high construction cost of Canadian shipyards, which require a capital outlay far in excess of what the ordinary shipowner can afford. The second reason is the high operating cost resulting from Canadian standards, and regulations of various federal departments, which make it impossible to operate at sufficient profit to amortize the original investment. For example, Canadian steamship inspection regulations require ships of 150 tons and over to undergo a complete inspection every year. This very often runs to a cost of thousands of dollars, and eats up the low earnings of the ship. Ships under 150 tons are required to undergo an inspection every four years. This regulation favours a ship which it is no longer economical to operate. A 200-ton ship can be operated with exactly the same crew and at practically the same expense as a ship of 150 tons.

I therefore urge the Minister of Transport and his colleagues to endeavour to have these Canadian steamship inspection regulations changed so that only ships of over 250 tons would be subject to annual inspection.

The second reason for our high cost of operation is the absence of small marine docks. Consequently Newfoundland ships requiring repairs, cleaning, maintenance or painting are forced to make the long journey to Sydney or Halifax for docking. The only alternative is to go to St. Pierre and Miquelon, which is a foreign land and in which case duty must be paid not only on the materials used but also on the cost of the labour employed. We hope that the Minister of Public Works will be able to come to our rescue and provide small public docks at strategic points along our coast.

Another extra cost which falls on Newfoundland ship owners comes as a result of the regulation which compels Newfoundland ships to go to Halifax to obtain a de-rat certificate; that is, a document which certifies that the ship is free from rodents. This discrimination has existed for six years, and I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not wish to have it continue any longer. I therefore urge him to take the necessary steps to have this service performed in Newfoundland, as was done prior to confederation.

This drastic reduction in the Newfoundland coastal shipping is a matter of great concern to all our people, because Newfoundland is an island and all our supplies must be brought in by sea. Also, most of our 1,300 settlements have no road communication whatsoever and are entirely dependent on ships of under 250 tons because their harbours are not large enough to accommodate ships of a larger size. To meet this emergency I would suggest to the Minister of Finance and his colleagues that the 50 per cent surcharge, together with tariff and other import restrictions, be removed entirely from ships up to 500 tons. Suitable ships are no longer available in eastern Canada, and since construction costs are so prohibitive the only way the Newfoundland ship owners can secure replacements is to obtain them from foreign sources. These tariff restrictions do not help the Canadian shipbuilding industry, but serve only to put the Newfoundland operator out of the shipping business. The only alternative would be a government subsidy, because Newfoundland must have ships or perish.

While I am dealing with the subject of coastal shipping I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Transport the need for additional navigation aids, particularly light and whistle buoys. Newfoundland has a much greater coastline than any other province, and much of it is dotted with treacherous shoals and sunken rocks. We need a large number of navigation aids to bring us up to the standard enjoyed by the other maritime provinces. Indeed, there are many buoys which were used to mark shoals prior to confederation which have not yet been replaced because we have not had any supply and service ship capable of handling them. We are happy to learn that such a ship is now going to be constructed. In view of the lives lost every year we hope that additional navigation aids will be forthcoming at an early date.

Before concluding my remarks I should like to draw to the attention of the Postmaster General the plight of another group of Newfoundlanders for whom confederation has been a doubtful blessing. I refer once more to the postmaster-telegrapher. To understand the plight of this group it must be remembered that prior to confederation they were full time employees of the Newfoundland government and as such they enjoyed civil service status. With the coming of confederation those employees who happened to find themselves in offices classified as revenue post offices lost their civil service status completely. They retained only their pension rights, which happened to be safeguarded by one of the terms of union; but their other rights and privileges, which were considerable and included vacations with pay, sick leave with pay, and government paid substitutes during vacation, they lost altogether along with their civil service status.

No one seems to know what their present status is. The Post Office Department regards them as casual or part-time employees, though strangely enough should one of them wish to retire for health reasons he suddenly becomes subject to all the red tape that applies to the highest paid civil servant. As telegraph operators they are also casual employees. The C.N.T. regards them as part-time agents whose services they rent from the Post Office Department and for which they pay the Post Office Department for each postmaster individually, in proportion to the traffic handled.

Recently these postmaster-telegraphers received notice from the C.N.T. to the effect that wireless telephones would be substituted for their present Morse instruments, and in consequence of that change the remuneration paid for them to the Post Office Department would be greatly reduced.

If this reduction is passed on to them a human tragedy will result, because their present salaries barely keep them at subsistence level. Many of these postmaster-telegraphers are married and have families to support. Many of them own their own homes in settlements where they have served for periods ranging from 10 to 20 years. They cannot afford to pull up stakes and sacrifice the homes which they have acquired at such great sacrifice. They have not the means to do this even if it were their wish. Another serious aspect of the problem is the effect this change will have upon their pensions, because pensions are based on salaries and if salaries go down the pensions are automatically reduced.

Although these employees are regarded as part-time employees by both the post office and the C.N.T. between the two they actually have a full-time job. Whether or not there is traffic to be handled their duties compel them to remain in their offices during regular business hours. Their ordinary work week is exactly the same as that of other civil servants and in many cases it is a little longer because the C.N.T. offices remain open until six p.m. Sometimes they have to work overtime, for which they get no extra remuneration.

As I see it, this is primarily a problem for the Post Office Department, because in as much as the post office uses part of their services and rents the remainder to the C.N.T. in such a way that a full work week is used up, I feel the postmaster-telegraphers should therefore be regarded as full-time employees of the Post Office Department. I hope the Postmaster General will interest himself in the plight of these employees and do everything possible to see that they do not suffer any further injustice.

While I am on my feet I should perhaps remind the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Justice that this is the season for turrs in Newfoundland. We are looking forward to a satisfactory solution to this problem and we hope there will be no repetition of certain incidents which occurred last year when fishermen attempted to take these birds.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud of Canada's growing influence in international affairs and of the contribution Canada is making to the maintenance of peace and the preservation of democracy. Democracy is on trial today. It is being judged not by what we preach but by what we practice. It is being judged by our faithfulness to the ideals we profess, and above all by our concern for the individual, particularly the little man, the primary producer who must always remain at the bottom of the economic ladder.

It is on such matters as these which I have mentioned today that democracy will stand or fall. It is in such matters which vitally impinge on human lives that democracy can make its greatest contribution to the cause of peace and freedom. If democracy fails to meet these human needs, both physical and spiritual, then our other efforts, either within NATO or without, can never be fully effective.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to add my trickle of words to the torrent of eloquence which has flowed around this chamber since January 10, I am deeply conscious of the fact that I am a very dimly glowing parliamentary asteroid surrounded by a galaxy of brilliant and scintillating parliamentary stars. Regardless of that, I rise in all humility to add my few words, ideas and suggestions to this debate.

Before proceeding I must compliment the Liberal member who has just taken his seat for having informed the house that all is not well in his constituency, and that Liberal policies have not to date produced a satisfactory state of affairs so far as his riding is concerned. I am sure he is representing his constituents completely and properly in bringing their complaints in the way he has to the attention of the government and the house this evening.

During the parliamentary recess, which my constituents insist on terming the parliamentary holiday, I had an opportunity of visiting all parts of my riding from its northern to its southern boundary. I had the opportunity of addressing a good many public meetings, labour organizations, veterans' organizations, women's institutes, church groups, farmers' institutes, chambers of commerce, public schools, high schools and service clubs. So I think I can properly say that I had an opportunity to find out the thinking of my constituents on international, national and local problems.

During my tours around my constituency I had some interesting and at times amusing experiences, experiences which indicated the variety and diversity of human nature and the differences in reaction to certain situations and questions. I am in the habit of giving what I term reports from parliament hill once a week over the Nelson and Trail radio stations in my constituency, which I understand my constituents appreciate very much largely because they cannot listen satisfactorily to any other Canadian stations, so I have a monopoly in our district.

One lady told me that she found my talks most stimulating. She said that as a matter of fact on two occasions her radio had caught fire when I was speaking. I am quite sure it was not my language which caused the fire. Yet another lady listening to the same report from parliament hill told me somewhat the opposite. She said that she found my radio talks most soothing, and always did her ironing while I was giving my report from parliament hill because the time went so quickly.

I could give quite a number of illustrations of the confusion that arises in the minds of people in regard to federal and provincial jurisdictions and the use of legal terms. Just before coming down here I said to a chap who was cutting some timber, "Is there anything you would like me to bring up while in Ottawa?" That is the best way to put it, you know. This man, who is a good logger, is of French-Canadian descent. He said, "Yes, I wish you would bring this up". I said, "What is it?" He said, "I have been logging in this country for 40 years and every contract I have had with the provincial government has said that His Majesty or Her Majesty gets a royalty of so much a pole or so much per thousand feet of logs. I do not think that is fair as I have to do the work. I cannot see why Her Majesty should get that royalty". I had to explain to him that that was a matter of provincial jurisdiction and that "royalty" was simply a term which meant that the state, the government of British Columbia, got that amount. He was quite satisfied with my explanation, and I did not have to bring that question to Ottawa.

People are interested not only in policies and programs but in events, in procedures and in personalities. In no part of my riding do my constituents enjoy Canadian television. We have some United States television piped in on a very limited scale to Rossland, Nelson and Trail, but there is no Canadian television. Over a large section of my riding my constituents have very little opportunity to listen to Canadian programs because of weak signals and for certain other reasons such as the nature of the country, and so on.

Therefore at the conclusion of the talks I give to my people I am often asked to answer questions, which is something members of the C.C.F. always welcome, and to describe events and procedures and even personalities. I have done a little bit on the amateur stage at different times, and on occasion I am asked to imitate various prominent personalities in this country. I must say that on these occasions I always try to be fair. Once a lady got up and said, "Can you tell us something about the member for Prince Albert? Can you give us an imitation of his mannerisms?" I said that in fairness I thought I could best describe the hon. member as the greatest melodramatic parliamentary tragedian in Canadian history.

On another occasion I was asked about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I said I could not imitate him because I had not the capacity to imitate his ability and his industry, but I said I could best describe him as the Sir Stafford Cripps of the Canadian House of Commons, as a great successor to Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, and a member who is doing a great deal for the people he represents and the people of Canada.

On another occasion a lady asked me about that smuggling member from Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) who once boasted of his activities in that connection in this house. I explained that I thought he was actually using parliamentary poetic licence when he described the incident in question in order to emphasize the necessity for the lowering of tariffs on certain goods coming from the United States into Canada. I assured the lady that he was a gentleman of thorough integrity and, if you met him outside this house, you would take him to be a reputable country solicitor.

I was asked on another occasion about the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), and I must say that I did a bit of a skit on his account and tried my best to imitate and indicate his witty and witless remarks.

I have gone over those experiences merely to indicate the interest of people in the country not only in the policies and programs but in the personalities in this House of Commons.

During this pre-election period—and I think this is a pre-election period—it has been noticeable, in the first days since the session opened, that there is a temptation to outbid one another in the auction of ideas in connection with national matters and federal-provincial relations. While we are all very much interested in doing the best we can for Canada as a whole, for our constituents and for the provinces from which we come, there is a great necessity at this time for us as representatives of democracy to act with a sense of responsibility.

Mr. Studer: Another socialist gone now.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) has such a limited understanding of socialism that he would not realize that our program and our policies are based on the foundation of responsibility to the nation.

Mr. Studer: If someone else produces it.

Mr. Herridge: In my opinion our greatness as a nation, our progress in the ultimate sense of the word, will grow into a dead end if a majority of our citizens accept the philosophy that votes can be traded for a road, a bridge, a politically timed adjustment in income tax or a job. Without concern for facts related to the principles of justice and a sense of responsibility, we in this country shall very soon flounder in a moral wilderness.

As I said before, all of us are interested in federal-provincial relations because the problems that face the federal and provincial governments and all of us in this country require a very responsible approach to this situation. In my opinion, if more people would be concerned with provincial responsibilities instead of provincial rights, there would be no loss of those rights. I believe that government services in a genuine democracy should be performed at the lowest level of government having the capacity to do the job. Whilst this government may be called upon to assist with fiscal arrangements, the closer you can get administration to the people, the more democratic and satisfactory that administration will be.

Our constitutional difficulties and the people's needs can only be met, in my opinion, by a spirit of co-operation between federal and provincial governments, by a recognition of rights on both sides, by the acceptance of responsibilities and scientific fiscal arrangements between the governments concerned. Surely that is within the capacity of the governments concerned with these difficult problems.

Before going on to other aspects in my remarks, I wish to say that this group advocates and advances our program with an understanding of Canadian conditions and circumstances and in the full knowledge that, in this modern world, government action is required to provide a more equitable distribution of wealth and a more equitable distribution of the benefits society has created as a whole.

That is all I am going to say in general language and terms. Before dealing with other aspects, however, I must say that during my tours around my constituency I did hear people of all parties make complimentary references to the good work done by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) as a representative of Canada during the past year at the United Nations.

I support the remarks of the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), speaking in this debate on Thursday, January 12. There is no necessity for me to repeat in detail what he had to say, but I wish to refer to one or two things and possibly present them in a somewhat different form.

Before doing that, I must say I was glad to see legislation proposed that will provide equal pay for equal work to those women who come within the scope of the federal government. I was glad to see that amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act are proposed, I understand, for an increase in the amount of loan available.

I was sorry there was so little reference in the throne speech to national health insurance, and no reference to the establishment of a Canada Council. I am not going to deal with national health insurance, because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre dealt very fully, completely and effectively with that question in his remarks this morning.

When speaking in the house on Thursday, January 12, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, in part, the following, as shown on page 56 of Hansard:

> The increasing United States dominance in Canadian industry is a matter of legitimate concern. I am sure this concern is shared by Canadians everywhere.

I was very glad the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made those remarks and dealt with that question, because many people in Canada in all walks of life are feeling some concern about the increasing United States dominance of Canadian investment and Canadian industry. Not only is that reflected in conversations but it comes up at public meetings, and in editorials and articles in responsible publications and newspapers across this country. I can only deal briefly with three here this evening because of lack of time. I should like to deal with an article that appeared in the Financial Post recently entitled "Foreign Investors Should Become Canadian." I should like to quote briefly from that editorial:

> "Modern history is filled with sad examples of foreign corporations operating in a country with almost complete disregard for their inherent obligations to the people and to the country in which they operate."
> That frank warning to U.S. investors in Canada came in an address by Dr. G. Edward Hall before the annual Boston conference on distribution this week . . .
> It was not enough for American corporations operating in Canada, as Dr. Hall said, to pay taxes and observe the law. They should become Canadian. He urged them to make the same disclosures in their company reports of Canadian operations as Canadian companies do, to offer capital stock in their Canadian plants and to fill key roles in Canadian operations with Canadians.

Then I noticed that on Friday, January 20, the Ottawa Citizen dealt with this question. I quote in part what it said:

The lack of Canadian participation in enterprises controlled by foreign capital is becoming a matter of increasing concern. Mr. James Muir, chairman and president of the Royal Bank of Canada, added his voice to those pleading for more investment by Canadians in the nation's resources when he addressed the Canadian Club in Ottawa yesterday. His appeal deserves wide discussion.

True, between 1946 and 1953 Canadians themselves contributed about 75 per cent of the capital employed in the country's development. But much of the remaining 25 per cent, invested from abroad, went into risk ventures. Mr. Muir pointed out, for example, that "non-resident ownership in petroleum was 59 per cent of the industry at the end of 1953." Canadians have tended to invest their money in safer enterprises and in bonds.

While foreign investment in Canadian enterprises brings many benefits, including not only fresh capital but new technical skills, Canadians themselves are often unable to participate at the managerial level. If the nation is to advance to maturity, the situation should be remedied.

Then in today's Montreal Gazette I see this article. The heading is "Labour Group urges Duplessis to get Canada Alcan Priority", and the article reads as follows:

The Quebec federation of labour (AFL-TLC) has urged Premier Duplessis to induce the Aluminum Company of Canada to give Canadian consumers priority on available aluminum supplies.

In a weekend telegram sent to the premier, the federation said:

"Respectfully request on behalf of affiliated organizations that you use your good offices to induce the Aluminum Company of Canada to supply requirements of Canadian fabricators of aluminum products rather than giving American manufacturers priority on available aluminum supplies because they offer premium prices.

"Alcan has reduced shipments to Canadian fabricators of aluminum products by 40 per cent, thus causing lay-offs at a time when governments and employers are making every effort to reduce winter unemployment.

"Canadian consumption of aluminum amounts to less than 15 per cent of total production in our country and it is only right Canadian needs should be fully supplied before foreign commitments are met.

"Alcan should not be permitted to take advantage of the temporary aluminum shortage to cut supplies to Canadian fabricators and to extort premium prices for such aluminum as they have available."

That is a case where Canadians supply the power for this great industry but United States consumers come first in the minds of the company's executives, and where Canadian workmen employed in those factories go on short time because of those rearrangements. We in this group are strongly opposed to this sort of thing. This increasing investment of United States capital, without further control over the situation means increasing control of our natural resources, distribution of production, employment and investment in this country. Our forests, minerals, oil and gas are being increasingly exploited to the first advantage of United States corporations.

In finishing up, Mr. Speaker, may I say that yesterday I had a letter from a constituent of mine. I am not going to read it, but in order to be quite accurate in my statement I am going to read briefly from a paraphrase of that letter. Some years ago this man invested some money in Canadian Western Lumber Company Limited because of his faith in our ability to develop our own natural resources. Later, Canadian Western Lumber Company made a deal with the Pacific Mills on the Elk Falls pulp plant and obtained a forest management licence in British Columbia. Still later, Crown Zellerbach corporation—the owners of Pacific Mills—bought out Canadian Western Lumber Company and paid the shareholders in shares in Crown Zellerbach corporation. Thus the shareholders and owners of the Canadian company became shareholders in the larger United States corporation. In substance what this amounts to is that a Canadian, in order to participate in this particular Canadian enterprise, does so through share ownership in a United States corporation. When the profits earned are distributed, they are paid from California, and the United States government collects a 15 per cent income tax on profits belonging to a Canadian and made by the development of Canadian natural resources. In other words we pay a commission to Uncle Sam for investing our own money to develop our own natural resources. A similar situation exists with respect to the operations of nearly every large United States corporation in Canada. United States investment in Canada results in increasing control of our natural resources, our economy as a whole, the employment situation and the distribution of Canadian production to Canadian consumers. Surely the protection of Canadian interests demands more control and direction of these vast, largely foreign-owned private enterprises. We in this group believe that there should be a national investment policy. We believe there certainly should be some greater control and direction of the operations of these United States industries.

Labour organizations in my constituency are concerned about amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act because a considerable number of workers have been unable to establish a new benefit period under section 45 (2) of the act, and they urge that it be rescinded. I shall have more to say about that matter later.

Smelter workers, miners and railroaders are interested in industrial pension plans and particularly in the Income Tax Act and the regulations concerning the operation of these industrial pensions. I want to say in passing that there is no one in this house who has spent more time on the study of industrial pensions and superannuation than has the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. For 14 years continuously, session after session since he first entered the House of Commons, he has dealt with this problem of industrial pensions and superannuation for civil servants and others from various angles. When this question comes before the house I am quite sure we shall have from him some extremely informative remarks.

The farmers in my constituency are much concerned about markets—I am not going to deal with that aspect of the question tonight —tariffs, and amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act. Potato growers particularly are concerned about the potato marketing situation and ask for some equality of tariff arrangements in respect of potatoes as between Canada and the United States.

As I mentioned before, I am glad to hear of the proposed amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act to increase the amount that can be loaned to farmers under this act. I should like to bring to the attention of the house a situation that was brought to my attention last year. I want to do this in order to show how sometimes regulations and administration can be somewhat impractical and unsound. I have in my constituency a farmer who farms 490 acres of excellent land on a bench at a somewhat high level in the mountains. He has 300 acres in hay and 190 acres in pasture. He has about 50 head of beef cattle and he produces annually, in addition to the pasture, about 100 tons of hay. He cannot haul that hay from the fields down to his homesite because the road is a mountain road and it is impractical to do so, especially under winter conditions. He therefore keeps his cattle up there, and he keeps his hay up there. He feeds his cattle and drives them down the trail whenever they are ready to go to market.

That farmer asked for a relatively small loan from the Canadian Farm Loan Board. He is a farmer of long experience, farming on first-class land and with a record of good production throughout the years. That loan was refused because his house does not happen to be actually on the property he is farming. As a matter of fact it is some 5 miles or 6 miles away. I think that situation is unsound and impractical. A farmer of that type should receive a loan. When the act is being amended, and the regulations, I trust that something will be done to assist farmers operating under these circumstances.

Our farmers are also interested in the little cherry disease investigation. On that account the British Columbia fruit growers' association local in my constituency at Robson are asking for space in the new federal building at Castlegar. A very small amount of space is required, perhaps a room about 10 by 10, for the storage of orchard maps, spray records, experimental cages, insecticides and other records. I do hope the Minister of Agriculture will be able to persuade the Minister of Public Works that it is necessary that this small space be provided for this very important investigation.

I want to say a few words about war veterans allowances. I am very sorry that there is no provision in the throne speech for amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act to raise the permissive income for single men to $1,200 and for married men to $2,000. I am sorry there is no provision for amendments to include benefits to veterans who served in world war I in the United Kingdom, and also widows of veterans who have 20 years of residence in this country. I am sorry there is no provision for the payment of allowances to those who have to live outside of Canada for health reasons. They are very few in number and live under very difficult conditions. I was very sorry to hear the minister's answer when I asked him about this question the other day. I do hope this matter, so important to so few, will receive further consideration from the minister.

So far as the Veterans Land Act is concerned, my veteran constituents are still hopeful that the government will see fit to reduce the acreage for small holdings under that legislation. In addition, they would very much prefer to have all the housing legislation in which veterans are concerned brought under the direction of the Veterans Land Act administration. They do not like this idea of starting out with the Veterans Land Act administration and then being handed over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The women in my constituency have indicated their interest in national health insurance, improved disability pensions, old age security legislation, succession duties and the establishment of the Canada Council. I shall have to refer to those later this session.

At this point I want to say a few words about public works. First of all my constituents are very interested in the trans-Canada highway. They do urge a thorough consideration of every route. I noticed in the Revelstoke Review dated December 1 a news item saying, "Rogers Pass Most Likely Says Winters." Now we have the Rogers pass route suggested by the minister and the Big Bend route built. There is another route that has not received sufficient consideration, and that is the Jumbo pass route which goes from Invermere over into the Kootenay country and then north to Revelstoke. I do urge, on behalf of my constituents, that the federal government use its good influences with the British Columbia government to see that a thorough survey is made of this route. We have the time to make certain, before any decision is made, that we choose the right route for this section of the trans-Canada highway.

I also ask, on behalf of the Trail chamber of commerce and other organizations, that the Department of Public Works reconsider the possibility of the removal of Rock island, thus lessening the flood danger at Trail. I know the engineers have not considered that the removal of the island would bring about that desired result. But there are some prominent and well known engineers within the constituency who are still convinced that the lowering of Rock Island would add greater protection to Trail during flood periods, and at little expense.

Then I should like to see an investigation of the possibility of dredging the Kootenay river in the Creston area. There was some dredging done there some years ago. I do not know whether that would come under public works or the international joint commission, but I should like consideration given to the possibility of dredging the Kootenay river between Kootenay lake and the international boundary in order to lower the level of the river and avoid excessive erosion of the dikes built around the wheat fields and other farm properties in the Creston area.

Then I suggest there should be some dredging at the mouth of the Columbia, near Arrowhead. The Columbia has changed its course in recent years. If the original main channel were dredged so as to divert the main flow of the water into the main lake instead of the north arm, it would prevent the rapid silting up of the channel entering the Arrowhead docks, and would also lessen the difficulties with the very large ice floes that come down the Columbia in the winter months, making navigation very difficult at certain periods.

I also ask for a further appropriation for the continuation of the good work that is being done on the Duncan river. I tramped up that river for miles this summer, and by removing the log jams and straightening the river it will again become navigable between Duncan lake and Kootenay lake. I have a word or two now for the Minister of Transport. I am trying not to miss anybody. I was talking to the captains of the passenger ferries on the Arrow lakes and the captains of the tugs that are hauling concentrates to railhead and towing logs. Recently we had a passenger service established by the provincial government from Beaton to Nakusp. On account of the changed schedules the ferries are often running when it is dark, in the winter months, and the captains of the ferry and the tugs have all suggested that for safety purposes there is a necessity for blinker lights at Cape Horn, Albert Point, Johnson Point and Whiskey Point between Nakusp and Beaton.

So far as the minister is concerned, I do want to bring to his attention that there is a great and continuous demand for low power relay stations at Nakusp, Rosebery and Balfour to serve those good citizens who still at this time are denied any satisfactory radio reception from Canadian stations.

So far as the Minister of National Revenue is concerned, the people of Castlegar would like to see provision made at the Castlegar airport for customs inspection, and an improved arrangement for clearing customs between Nelway and Nelson. The people of my district would like a 24-hour service at Patterson. In addition, I suggest that United States visitors using the Columbia water course to come up from the United States into the Arrow lakes should be allowed to report at Trail rather than at Waneta because of the navigation hazards. There is nothing at Waneta to indicate the spot at which they are supposed to call. They have to beach expensive boats on rocky beaches. They have to turn in at Waneta just at a time when they are entering this very dangerous water which is flowing very fast, in whirlpools and so on. I do ask the minister to give consideration to that very modest request. In fact I represent a most reasonable people whose requests are most modest in every respect.

I see that I have five minutes left, so I want to say a word or two about the Columbia basin development. The first development in the Kootenays was the development of the fur industry in the early days. Then came the development of the mining industry, the forest industry and agriculture and fruit farming. Now there is the development of water resources on a large scale all over British Columbia. The international rivers improvements bill was debated in the house and in committee, and the basis of understanding of this vast proposed development in Canada and the United States was widened. I think that bill lays a foundation for an orderly, scientific and proper approach to the development of these international rivers in Canada.

Last October we had the pleasure of a visit from Senator Richard L. Neuberger, a member of the committee on interior and insular affairs in the Senate of the United States. I had correspondence on this and phone calls from him. I had the opportunity to make and was very willing to make arrangements for his trip and itinerary while he was in the Kootenay country. I must say that we were all very pleased that he visited our district.

I wonder whether you are getting a bit restless, Mr. Speaker, but I am just concluding. Since I cannot deal with it more fully, I advise everyone to read the report the senator gave to that committee. Printed copies may be obtained from Washington, dated December 15 of last year. It is a most fair, comprehensive and informative report.

In view of the situation that exists now, I think I am safe in saying that the people in my constituency and in the whole of the basin in British Columbia want action. They want co-operation among all governments, the Canadian government, the British Columbia government and the government of the United States. They want a district authority for the Columbia river basin, first proposed by the members of this group in 1949. I am pleased to note that the Progressive Conservatives are now supporting our program in that respect. According to this group, here is a great opportunity for a public investment program and an opportunity for co-operation among all governments and between public and private power authorities, in the interests and to the advantage of the people of the Columbia river basin in Canada and of Canada as a whole.

Mr. N. C. Schneider (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, in this debate on the speech from the throne I shall avail myself of its purpose, which is to give to each member an opportunity to present the problems and the wishes of his constituency. There is an old saying that members of parliament point with pride and view with alarm. I shall do both this evening.

I must first remind you of the high honour given to Waterloo North in the selection of the Kitchener-Waterloo Dutchmen senior O.H.A. hockey club to represent Canada at the 1956 Olympic games at Cortina, Italy. Anyone seeing this team in action will be assured of their excellent qualifications for this high honour. They have played Canada's national game in a clean, fast style, using good combination and team play. While they are among the lightest in weight of any men in their league, they are fast. They can take tough play, and if compelled to they can also give it. I am taking these few minutes to tell you of our pride in this hockey team, but I remind you that they are also your hockey team. Almost all nationalities making up Canada's population are represented on your Olympic team, the Scottish by such names as McKenzie and Logan. How can we lose with a captain named McKenzie? The English are represented by Woodall and White; the French by Brodeur and Theberge; the Pennsylvania Dutch by Laufman and Martin, and so forth. Elmira, the biggest little hockey town in Canada, in the north of the riding, has contributed three native sons to this fine team.

You will be interested in the personnel of this team and the occupation of its members. They are all clean-cut, typical young Canadians. Two are high school teachers; three are salesmen; two are college students; one is a lumberman and one is a bricklayer; three are carpenters. All of them are steadily employed at a trade or profession.

The name "Dutchmen" has been used for years, honouring the Pennsylvania Dutch who pioneered and settled Waterloo county in the early 1800's. The team played warm-up games in Scotland and Czechoslovakia before their opening Olympic game on January 26. They have not only won those games but they have won the admiration of their opponents for their good sportsmanship. I am sure this house will wish them Godspeed, victory in their matches, and a safe return on February 10.

I would remind hon. members that today is the first day of the issue of our new hockey stamp. It is a beautiful piece of art work, and is a credit to the Post Office Department.

The towns and cities of Waterloo county are highly industrialized. The rural districts are developed in agriculture, and contain some of the finest purebred cattle and hogs herds as well as diversified crops.

Our farmers and dairymen are sensitive to the problems of marketing Canadian-produced butter, animal fats and oils. I wish to draw the attention of the house to a problem which seriously affects every livestock producer in Canada, and contributes to the steadily shrinking income of our farmer. Farm cash income in 1952 was $2,800 million. In 1954 it had fallen to $2,300 million, a reduction of $471,500,000 or 16 per cent. With a steadily increasing wage rate in industry in the cities this unbalance must be rectified. In the next few minutes I will submit an idea which will assist considerably in raising the income of all livestock producers. It will turn our good Canadian dollars back to our own Canadian farmers rather than to foreign farmers and planters.

We heard appeals from almost every province for the maintenance of the floor price on Canadian butter, and I am sure that the favourable decision has been approved generally. But I frankly believe that a price a little closer to world markets would eventually benefit the dairymen and take business away from margarine. Anyone having even a slight knowledge of farming will agree that dairying is the backbone and the mainstay of agriculture today, and must be preserved and kept on a strong and stable basis. A high degree of livestock activity is essential on any good farm, not only for the sake of diversification but also for the fertility of the land.

There is another basic industry of our country which I feel has been almost entirely forgotten. This industry is also an indispensable part of agriculture in all parts of Canada. This industry supplies the main dish in practically every meal on the national dining table, and the question I am raising has a direct bearing on the income of the farmer producer and the ultimate cost and selling price to the consumer.

As we have been gradually changing from a nation of workers in the fields and outdoors to an ever greater percentage of factory, office and indoor workers, our eating habits have changed so that today we find very few people who will accept the normal cuts of beef and pork as they come from the top grades of cattle and hogs. They will not buy fat. Canadian animal fats are a serious problem today, and I feel it is time that we faced the facts and tried to be realistic, and took the necessary steps to give them their rightful place in our economy.

Canadian animal fats belong to and are necessary in our Canadian climate. Canadian edible beef fat and lard can now be processed at moderate cost in a way which removes all animal fat odours. The deodorizing of these fats requires operations quite similar to those used in preparing vegetable oils, and the product is equal and even superior to vegetable oil products in food value and shortening qualities. Any argument that animal fats are more fattening than vegetable oils in our diet can be disproved by the fact that animals gain their fats from the same vegetable feeds. Fat is fat whether you eat it in the form of butter, margarine, vegetable shortening, lard or beef fat.

Very few people realize the extent of the present importation of foreign vegetable oils and their impact on the Canadian livestock and dairy industry. In the past year a grand total of 232,797,000 pounds of foreign edible oils was imported into Canada. This includes crude or unrefined oil and oil pressed from seeds which are imported. This figure makes little impression on most people unless you give some comparison. A tank car carries 60,000 pounds of vegetable oil. If all this imported edible vegetable oil for a year were to pass in review before you it would require 77 trains with 50 tank cars in each train.

I will not take the time of the house to explain how this large volume of business in imported vegetable oil has been built up. In the early days oils such as peanut oil, cottonseed, palm, cocoanut and soya bean oil were considerably cheaper than our Canadian animal fats and their bland flavour or lack of any flavour seemed to make them preferred to the animal fats. Modern processing removes these odours, and the shortening qualities of pure lard are superior to any pure vegetable or blended shortening. I feel that the time has come for the government to take action to control this flood of imported oil so that Canadian animal oil products may take their rightful place and realize a price nearer to their actual cost of production.

I would ask the house to pay particular attention to the next statement, as it is the basis of my appeal. The meat processor today pays approximately 23 cents per pound for hogs. When the carcass is separated into various cuts he must trim down the 1½ to 2½ inches of fat on hams, loins and shoulders to about the quarter inch of fat which is now demanded by the consumer. There is also leaf lard which is rendered out with these surplus fats. Processing these surplus fats is an expensive operation, involving a shrinkage of 33 per cent in weight and high cost coal, labour and equipment. The surplus fat for which the processor paid 23 cents per pound has now been converted to lard costing approximately 36 cents per pound in bulk, including no cost for packaging, delivery or overhead.

I have current market reports offering tank cars of pure Canadian high grade lard at 11½ cents per pound. Small meat packers offer over the retail counter at 12 cents per pound lard which cost them 36 cents per pound to produce. With the amount of excess fat on each hog varying from 19 pounds on an A grade hog to 35 pounds on C grade, it is difficult to figure the loss per hog. I am sure that any processor would agree that at today's prices there is a loss of $4 per hog because of the surplus fat. As more than 5 million hogs are slaughtered annually, we have a total loss of $20 million to the industry. These figures will vary according to the amount of surplus fat trimmed off by the processor and the number of heavy hogs slaughtered.

There is a similar story in the case of beef marketing. We find that beef fat is bought on the hoof at an average of about 15 cents per pound. This includes cheaper cattle at 11 cents per pound up to the best grades at 19 and 19½ cents per pound. I struck an average of 15 cents a pound, which I think is fair. There are about 65 pounds of surplus fat on each carcass. By the time this goes through the same costly rendering and shrinkage it costs the processor about 40 cents per pound, and you can buy any amount of first-class edible beef tallow at this time at 10 cents per pound in tank car lots. With a marketing of 1,635,000 cattle, at inspected slaughterhouses only in Canada last year, and figuring a loss of at least $19.50 on each, there is a total loss amounting to $31,882,000.

I should make it clear at this time that I do not advocate an embargo on all these imported vegetable oils. If freedom means anything to Canada, I believe that anyone wanting to use margarine should have the right to do so, and we all know that its low price has been a great help to many large families with low or moderate incomes.

This total loss of over $51 million in the disposal of these surplus animal fats is caused by the importation in 1954 of 232,797,000 pounds of foreign vegetable oils. Would it not be reasonable to reduce this importation by imposing quotas so that Canadian livestock processors would be encouraged to process Canadian animal fats? If our Canadian fats could be sold at prices equal to those of refined imported vegetable oil products it would enable the processor to pay considerably more to the farmer in higher prices for his livestock or to sell the meat cuts much cheaper to the consumer. Of the 232 million pounds of edible vegetable oil imported, 103 million pounds were used in the manufacture of shortening. Is it reasonable to import this oil when we have good Canadian fats which will serve the same purpose and render a fair return to Canadian agriculture?

I suggest to this house that we should at least put a limit to this ever increasing volume of imported edible vegetable oil, and peg it where it is. As our country grows this will gradually work to the benefit of our own good Canadian fats and oils.

I must confess that I take no pleasure in speaking on a problem which has been increasing for the past few years for the rubber footwear workers in my riding and in three ridings in Quebec, at Granby, St. Jerome and Lachine. The rubber footwear industry in Canada is 100 years old and until recently employed as many as 7,500 people, two-thirds of whom live in Quebec and one-third in Ontario. Generations have contributed to the skill and ingenuity required in this trade, and Canadian footwear has set a standard all over the world.

Not long ago Canadian footwear had a high volume of export business. Farmers, fishermen, lumbermen and miners in most foreign countries accepted it as top quality and our factories were humming. It was not surprising that other countries took up this industry and developed a product patterned exactly on our models. With cheap labour and lower costs it is also not surprising that they have taken away practically all our export business. But what is more surprising still is the fact that these substandard, starvation-wage operators have gained a foothold for their footwear in Canada in such volume that if it continues this hundred-year old Canadian industry is most certainly doomed.

The least difficult lines are naturally being taken over first. Rubber canvas shoe imports into Canada started in 1949, and have now reached 54 per cent of the Canadian market with 2,186,928 pairs in the first ten months of 1955. Canadian-made shoes had a corresponding reduction in Canadian sales. Waterproof rubber footwear, which is a different line, is now being shipped into Canada in ever-increasing quantities. Standing at less than 1 per cent in 1949, imports of rubber boots and rubbers have now increased to 945,652 pairs, which represents 8½ per cent of Canadian requirements in the first ten months of 1955.

The effect of this loss of business on Canadian employment is a reduction of persons employed from 7,350 in 1948 to 4,500 in 1955. Some of the rubber companies have ceased operations in footwear and have absorbed these workers into tire making. Some of these footwear factories are in small towns where there is very little other employment available.

Foreign competition, principally from Hong Kong but also from Japan and other low-wage countries, has taken advantage of low labour costs. Their wages are so low that theirs is an altogether different way of life, paying 7 cents per hour to girls as compared with $1.45 per hour for the same operation in Canada. Men earn from 10 to 15 cents per hour in Hong Kong.

We know this is a real problem for the Department of Trade and Commerce, and we realize that we must buy from these countries if we wish to continue to sell them our wheat.

Higher tariff protection is not the answer. A fair valuation for duty purposes based on fair Canadian costs would help, but I believe that a quota would be a fair way to control this unfair competition.

I am sure all members of this house will agree that we must not allow this industry to be eliminated. If trouble comes we can be sure that we cannot depend on Hong Kong and Japan for this essential commodity, holding a high priority for the armed forces, the farmer, the miner and the fisherman and every Canadian.

There is nothing in the present trade agreements to prevent these substandard countries from taking over our entire rubber footwear business, and they are already working on the production of automobile and truck tires. A delegation from Japan recently visited one Canadian footwear manufacturer and boldly proposed that they would make a highly profitable deal with him if he would stop manufacturing and allow them to supply his entire needs according to his own models and specifications.

The four members who have rubber footwear plants in their ridings earnestly request this house to seriously consider the future of these remaining 4,500 workers and the essential character of the product they make. In the announcement of GATT agreements it was clearly explained that if any Canadian industry were threatened, escape clauses could be invoked. The three members from Quebec join me in the claim that this is a clear case of such a threat, and we ask your serious consideration of this problem.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words by way of introduction this evening, and with your permission I shall go no further than to refer to the remarks of the two speakers who have preceded me. I think I am fortunate in the position in which I find myself this evening, that is so far as the type of speech delivered by the two previous speakers is concerned.

The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) referred to the fact that the team which is striving for Olympic honours for Canada this year is the well known Kitchener-Waterloo Dutchmen. I should like to inform the house that one of the leading players on that team, as a matter of fact the captain, is a product of my native city. Jack McKenzie was raised in Brandon and played for the Brandon Wheat Kings in the early part of the fifties. He grew up in my neighbourhood and was a member of my boys' group. I am sure that with such an outstanding specimen from the west the Dutchmen may be assured of success in their tour overseas.

I am speaking tonight from a slightly different location in the house than that which I occupied last year. I have moved to the left, but I want to assure you that that is only in a geographic sense. As I listened to my worthy friend and colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), I thought if I had been moving around my constituency and had been asked to describe some of the members of the house I would have described the hon. member for Kootenay West as being the best Conservative in the C.C.F. party. It was an excellent Conservative dissertation which he gave the house tonight. I do not know who is influencing whom since I moved down to this corner of the chamber.

Rather than go further with my remarks tonight, I wonder if it would be possible for me to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Dinsdale the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CANADA-UNITED STATES EMIGRATION

Question No. 4—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. How many people have emigrated from Canada to the United States in each of the years, 1954 and 1955?

2. How many of these were university graduates, and of such graduates, how many graduated as engineers?

3. How many people emigrated from the United States to Canada in each of the years, 1954 and 1955?

Answer by: Mr. Pickersgill:

1 and 2. The government of Canada does not maintain statistics on emigration from Canada to the United States.

3. Immigration to Canada from the United States in the calendar years 1954 and 1955 was as follows according to the records of the immigration branch:

1955	9,760*

In addition to the immigration totals shown above, the following table shows the number of Canadian citizens who returned to Canada for permanent residence, following residence in the United States, in the calendar years 1954 and 1955:

Calendar year	No. of returning Canadians
1955	3,554 (11 months total)

* Statistics for December are not yet available.

BUTTER STORAGE AND SALES

Question No. 8—Mr. Blair:

1. How many pounds of butter were in storage as of January 1, 1956?

2. Of these, how many pounds have been in storage since before July 1, 1955?

3. To what countries has butter been sold since July 1, 1955?

4. How many pounds were sold to each country and at what price per pound for each shipment?

Answer by: Mr. Gardiner:

1. The bureau of statistics reports that there were 100,030,000 pounds of creamery butter in storage on January 1, 1956.

Of this quantity the agricultural prices support board owned 81,215,517 pounds.

2. No information is available on private holdings which were in storage before July 1, 1955, but the agricultural prices support board still held 36,548,517 pounds of butter in storage which had been purchased before July 1, 1955.

3. Small quantities of butter have been sold to a number of countries since July 1, 1955, by the regular Canadian trade and the government has sold butter for export basis Canadian seaboard. Documents indicate that the butter sold for export from government stocks was destined for East Germany and Czechoslovakia.

4. Government sales shipped since July 1, 1955, include 6,024,760 pounds in two shipments en route to East Germany on the basis of 37 cents per pound f.a.s. Montreal and 895,639 pounds en route for Czechoslovakia on the basis of 39 cents per pound f.a.s. Montreal.

COARSE PAPER COMPANIES PROSECUTION

Question No. 27—Mr. MacInnis:

1. Who were the lawyers for the crown in the prosecution of the coarse paper companies at Vancouver in 1955?

2. What amount was paid to such lawyers for (a) fees; (b) expenses?

Answer by: Mr. Garson:

1. G. S. Wismer, Q.C., and L. H. Jackson, both of Vancouver.

	Fees	Disbursements	Total
G. S. Wismer, Q.C.	23,421.82	1,482.36	24,904.18
L. H. Jackson ...	18,469.50	1,426.99	19,896.49
Total	41,891.32	2,909.35	44,800.67

FINE PAPER COMPANIES PROSECUTION

Question No. 28—Mr. MacInnis:

1. Have prosecutions been instituted against the fine paper companies in Vancouver which were alleged to be violating the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act?

2. If such companies were prosecuted, who were the lawyers for the crown?

3. What amount was paid to such lawyers for (a) fees; (b) expenses?

Answer by: Mr. Garson:

1. No. The report of an investigation into alleged combines in the manufacture, distribution and sale of fine papers made in October, 1952, named seven manufacturers and 32 wholesalers as parties to alleged combines. All the manufacturers and the majority of the wholesalers were located in Ontario and Quebec. One prosecution only was brought and that was in Ontario, charging the Ontario and Quebec parties.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 24, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PETERBOROUGH—REFERENCE TO INSTALLATION OF TELEVISION EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General or to his parliamentary assistant. I have not given notice of the question because I thought they would know the answer. The question is this. Is the Post Office Department going ahead with the installation of television spying equipment in the Peterborough post office despite coast to coast protests against depriving the worker of his privacy?

Mr. Dufresne: The post office officials have been wrong.

[Later:]

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): As the Postmaster General is now in his seat, would he be able to answer the question I asked just a few minutes ago?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): As the hon. member has just pointed out, when he put his question I was not in the house. Would he repeat it?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It is my fault. I thought one of the cabinet ministers had told the Postmaster General what the question was. My question is: Is the Post Office Department going ahead with the installation of T.V. spying equipment in the Peterborough post office despite protests from coast to coast against this equipment?

Mr. Lapointe: First may I say, Mr. Speaker, and I believe it has already been pointed out, that the installation of the T.V. system in the Peterborough post office is being undertaken purely on an experimental basis and it must be taken as such. It is meant to replace, if it proves to be practical, economical and successful, the observation galleries which exist in post offices throughout the country and have been used for the last 60 years, so I am informed, not only in the postal service of this country but in other postal services elsewhere. The system would not be used for any purposes other than those for which the observation galleries are designed and are being used at the present time. If, as I say, this system proved to be practical, economical and worth while and was installed elsewhere, those are the only circumstances and conditions under which it would be used.

PROVISION OF DOORS ON WASH ROOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General a further question in regard to the Peterborough post office. Has consideration been given to putting doors on the wash rooms in the Peterborough post office?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that perhaps hon. members are using this question time in order to save themselves a certain amount of correspondence.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): No.

Mr. Speaker: So far as I have heard, the question is certainly not one of urgent and national character.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, the postal workers throughout Canada think it is urgent to have doors on wash rooms.

Mr. Speaker: I sympathize very much with the opinions of the postal workers of Canada, but unfortunately they are not members of this house, nor do they occupy the chair.

FREIGHT RATES

LUMBER—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED RATE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received any representations opposing a proposed 7 per cent increase in freight rates on lumber effective February 25 of this year? If so, will he inform the house of the position taken by the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall), the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) have all drawn my attention to the question of a proposed increase in freight rates on lumber and lumber products moving from western Canada to eastern Canada.

Mr. Philpott: Also the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott).

Mr. Marler: And also, as the hon. member points out, the hon. member for Vancouver South. I should merely like to inform the house that an application has been made by both railways to the board of transport commissioners for an increase in the rates to which I have just referred. Those who are opposed to the increase will have a period of 30 days, which I understand ends on February 25, in which to make representations to the board of transport commissioners on this subject.

Coming to the more specific question of whether I have received representations on the subject, I should like to say that I have received a telegram from the secretary-manager of the interior lumber manufacturers' association asking me to use every means at my disposal in the interests of the British Columbia lumber industry to prevent this unjust and unnecessary 7 per cent increase in Canadian rates. I may say that I have transmitted this telegram to the board of transport commissioners.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT—INQUIRY AS TO UPWARD REVISION OF RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a recent press release in which the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway attacked the Crowsnest rate charges as being neither just nor reasonable? If so, can the minister give an assurance that there will be no upward revision of the Crowsnest rates?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the questions just put by the hon. member, I wish to say that my attention has not been drawn to the press release to which he has just referred. So far as the Crowsnest rate is concerned, an upward revision is not under consideration at this time.

GRAIN

REPORTED MOVEMENT OF EMPTY BOX CARS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question of which I sent him notice in last night's mail. In view of the shortage of box cars for western grain, can the minister state whether the Canadian National is in fact shipping a large number of cars empty out of Edmonton into British Columbia, I presume to pick up the lumber about which he has just been speaking? Can he state the numbers, if such is the fact, and could he suggest to the management that such cars might better be employed being sent there full?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question but it reached me only about three-quarters of an hour ago and I have not been able to obtain the information necessary to answer it. I shall try to obtain it by tomorrow.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO CABINET REPRESENTATION FOR SOUTHERN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): In view of the results of the recent Spadina by-election, can the Prime Minister state whether or not the great industrial belt in southern Ontario might expect to be represented in the cabinet in the near future?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not think that is a question I should answer on the orders of the day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DIVE BOMBER TRAINING—INQUIRY AS TO USE OF CHIPMUNK AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. Has dive bomber training, as was practised during world war II with Harvard aircraft, been discontinued or is it still continued as part of the training program? Has the Chipmunk aircraft not replaced the Harvard aircraft as a primary trainer?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): In the absence of the minister may I take this as notice of the question?

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR LOWER INTEREST RATE ON N.H.A. LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works or his parliamentary assistant.

In view of a statement in the Globe and Mail that the metropolitan Toronto council had stated in its brief to the royal commission on economic prospects that less than a third—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ellis: —of the families in that area earn the minimum income to qualify for an N.H.A. loan—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ellis: —will the government consider lowering the interest rate on N.H.A. loans so that a higher proportion of low income people can qualify?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): I am not aware of this statement but I will look it up and try to give an answer tomorrow.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REFERENCE TO PROPOSED MORAN DAM ON FRASER RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries? I discussed it with the minister yesterday, but I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman had an opportunity to bring it to the attention of his assistant. Has the Department of Fisheries, or the government as a whole, received any representations from the government of British Columbia, or any other body, regarding the proposed Moran dam on the Fraser river? If so, are discussions under way as to ways and means by which the interests of fisheries and power would be reconciled?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I was absent from Ottawa yesterday and was prevented from discussing this with the departmental officials. I will do so as soon as possible and give the hon. member an answer tomorrow.

POTATOES

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH STARCH PRODUCERS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has any agreement been entered into or consummated between the government or the Department of Agriculture and the starch manufacturers of New Brunswick? If so, what proportion is the government going to pay per barrel of potatoes in the diversion program for starch?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I suggested to the hon. member the other day when he was discussing the matter, we have made a proposal to the people of New Brunswick. That proposal has gone to the government as well as to the producers, and we are prepared to carry it out. It is in the exact words of the document that I sent over to him the other day.

Mr. Montgomery: I take it that nothing further has been done?

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member told the house the other day, we have had our officials down there. I am not sure that they are back yet. They have been down there discussing the whole question with the people of New Brunswick.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT MAKING COST OF OXYGEN DEDUCTIBLE EXPENSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Is the minister aware that the cost of oxygen to keep a patient alive has been disallowed as a deductible expense and that this disallowance has been confirmed by the income tax appeal board? Will the minister consider amending the act to take care of this unfair situation?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the decision of the income tax appeal board. As has been the custom with all my predecessors, we consider all tax matters every year.

FRUIT

NOVA SCOTIA APPLES—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Have final arrangements yet been made between his department of the government and the growers of apples with respect to the proposals made by the government two weeks ago?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the apple proposals are in much the same position as the potato proposals. We have made the proposals to the officials in Nova Scotia and have had men down there consulting with them.

EGGS

PROCEDURE FOLLOWED WITH RESPECT TO SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the government take the eggs when they go below the floor price of 38 cents?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The egg proposals are a little different from the butter proposals. Under the butter proposals there is a standing offer of 58 cents a pound for grade A butter, but under the egg proposals we undertake to take any eggs which are in storage as of the first of December in the year in question. In the meantime, we shall consider only the taking of eggs which have been purchased at or above the floor throughout the year. Records of that are kept throughout the year, and then it is dealt with towards the end of the season.

Mr. Hodgson: May I ask a supplementary question? Is the minister aware that the eggs are selling at the grading stations now from 27 cents to 35 cents, and at 35 cents for grade A large?

Mr. Gardiner: Thirty-five cents would be about it. The price is 38 cents plus carrying charges as of December 31, and it would still be above the floor at 35 cents out in some country districts. As a rule, the average is 32 cents.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Hahn.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, as a member of this house from western Canada, I would be very remiss in my duty if I did not take the opportunity at this time to deal with the critical grain marketing situation prevailing on the prairies.

Last fall I received continued representations from the farmers in my area concerning this problem and, in addition to the representation from individual farmers, I also had the privilege of meeting with the representatives of the various farm organizations. I recall that, at the session we had with the board of directors of the Manitoba federation of agriculture, one of the warnings they issued was that the various political parties in this house should not play politics with this critical situation. I think, Mr. Speaker, that was a very necessary warning because, almost from the earliest times of wheat production in the prairie region, there have been politicians in the wheat bin, and it has not helped at all to clarify the situation.

As I have listened to other hon. members from western Canada speak on this topic, it has been encouraging to note that there is a large degree of unanimity among the members of the opposition regardless of their party affiliations. It has been encouraging to note that it appears for the first time that we are going to have a united vote of protest on the part of the combined opposition in a matter pertaining to the welfare of our grain growing farmers on the western prairies. One of the difficulties through the years has been the variety of solutions and opinions which have been expressed by western members in regard to the grain problem. I think it will help considerably in rallying the attention of the government to this problem if we have this united vote on the matter.

If we are going to achieve any semblance of good government under our democratic system we must avoid extremes. The tendency which has been peculiar to western Canada, based largely on the continuing economic instability, to pursue extreme philosophies to their conclusion undoubtedly has worked against the general welfare of the west.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but may I ask hon. members who are supposed to be listening to try to achieve that result as much as possible.

Mr. Dinsdale: These differences of opinion, arising largely from the pursuit of extreme philosophies to their logical conclusions, should be worked out within the framework of national parties and not in the House of Commons on the basis of multi-parties. I emphasize again that that is one reason why I am delighted to see this unanimity of opinion at this time.

Unfortunately we have not been able to gain the support of western members who support the government, and that is quite understandable. As I have listened to the statements of the various ministers directly responsible for dealing with this matter it appears to me that there is a sharp difference of opinion in their respective appraisals of the problem. I am reminded of the opinion of Sir Winston Churchill when he was required from time to time to deal with urgent problems facing the nation and had to consult with the economists of the day. He summed it up by saying, "Whenever I ask England's six leading economists a question I get seven answers, two from Mr. Keynes".

As I have listened to the interpretation of the problem given by the various ministers responsible I am persuaded to paraphrase Sir Winston Churchill: that whenever we listen to the answers from the various ministers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), we get a different answer from each and two from the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

That conclusion arises largely from the speech made in this house just over a week ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I listened to it carefully at the time and I have since tried to analyse it carefully as it appears in Hansard. In examining it I have come to the conclusion that it was merely the use of the red herring technique, an appeal to the traditional prejudices of the prairies in order to divide the western members on this issue. It was not a very subtle appeal and not nearly so skilfully done as has happened in the past in the case of a former Liberal prime minister of this country.

The speech lumped together the Financial Post, the Winnipeg Free Press, the C.C.F. party and the farmers' union as being out to destroy the wheat board by advocating cash advances on farm stored grain. The most amazing part of the whole speech was that it linked the C.C.F. and the farmers' union with the grain exchange which has become the scapegoat for the perpetual grain problem on the prairies. That was an amazing burst of demagogical oratory and, of course, it will not go over very successfully on the prairies. There have already been press reactions to that effect.

It was further intimated that it was not the farmers who were advocating cash advances on farm stored grain but rather the city boys. As I have indicated, this is amazing to me and, having seen the situation as a western member, it is completely out of touch with reality. In fact, as I examined the speech from the throne I came to the conclusion that in dealing with this matter it was also out of touch with reality. The only reference to the problems of the grain farmers was something to the effect that some sectors of the economy are not participating fully in Canada's high level of prosperity. That is true, and it has been true over the years so far as our western agricultural economy is concerned.

If we examine the history of grain production on the prairies, it has been one series of crises after another, at one time a period of shortage, at another time a period of abundance, although in recent times periods of abundance seem to occur more frequently than periods of shortage. That of course is largely due to changed production techniques, mechanization on the farms and so on. As a westerner raised on the prairies, my whole life has been influenced strongly by these continuing fluctuations and changes. My father, who homesteaded in the west in the early days, went broke during one of these critical periods.

Our problems with respect to lack of adequate financing for education, etc., largely arise from the uncertainties of the western grain producing economy. The loss of our young people through migration to eastern Canada and also south of the border in search of job opportunities is intimately connected with the unstable economic situation that has always prevailed on the prairies. It has resulted in widely fluctuating prices. It is connected of course with the inherent instability that is peculiar to agriculture and, as far as grain is concerned, arises largely from the fact that we are dependent on an uncontrollable and unpredictable export market to dispose of the major part of our production.

Today, and I would emphasize this point, the problem is much more serious than it ever was because it is connected with rapidly changing external conditions that affect the Canadian economy, among them being the declining world market for grain. In this connection it is significant to note that even India is making an attempt to become self-sufficient in the production of wheat. We need hardly refer to the stiff competition we are receiving from the United States producers. That matter has been discussed at length.

As well as the change in the external economy, we have the rapid changes in the internal economy as Canada proceeds from a primary economy depending on extractive industries to a secondary economy depending more and more on manufacturing. It only stands to reason that prairie agriculture, based largely on one product, will be caught in a vicious price squeeze as this trend continues. Surpluses are up. The costs are up. Markets are down. As a result, prices are going down. That is the essence of the situation as it faces the prairie producer at the moment.

In spite of the optimistic assurances of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and also of the Minister of Agriculture, from direct contact with producers in my own area—and we are one of the more stable and diversified areas in Manitoba—I can say that there is an urgent, immediate problem today. It requires much broader treatment than the plan of government bank loans that has been referred to as the Howe plan, and the storage proposals that we shall be considering in this house within the next few days. The latter proposal will of course help, but it does not begin to get to the root of the matter which has caused this perpetual state of economic instability in the prairies since that region was first opened to settlement.

There is a short-term problem and it must be dealt with. As farmer after farmer has indicated, as have all farm organizations from the west, it can only be met by putting cash immediately into the hands of the producers. Farming has changed. It is no longer a subsistence matter where you can carry on your operation within the confines of the one-unit farm. Farming today has become a business proposition and the farmer needs ready cash, as does any other business man, if he is going to carry on his operation successfully. The only way to get that ready cash into his hands is by means of the widely advocated cash advances on farm-stored grain.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has tried to imply that the farmers are not asking for this measure and he tries to draw a red herring across the trail by saying that it is the city boys who want it and not the farmers. In my area the city boys to whom he refers are the local merchants of the small towns. In my area we have no large cities. They are the local merchants who make up the membership of our town councils, who serve on the school boards and who, in fact, carry the day to day responsibility of grassroots democracy in western Canada. They are the ones who have been making appeals to me.

Three years ago, as a matter of fact, when this surplus problem first began to appear on the prairies, we had community after community going on the strictly cash basis, refusing to extend credit to the neighbouring farm communities because the memory of the thirties was vivid in their minds. They realized that as this surplus problem continued to grow—and actually it has grown—they would not be able to carry the responsibility of financing the farm economy which today operates on a monetary basis rather than on the former subsistence basis. In fact, the farm economy is today much more vulnerable than it ever was in any former period of crisis on the prairies. Hence the city boys referred to are the town merchants—the small businessmen—who are the heart of our local government in this country of ours. Any attempt to arouse the traditional prejudice that exists between farm and city, between the rural areas and the urban areas, is an emotional appeal to try to stir up feelings of hostility and hatred. Today it will not take root.

Then the matter of the threat to the wheat board was emphasized. It was indicated that anybody advocating cash advances was out to destroy the wheat board. This is an appeal to fear because ever since the thirties the western farmer has clung desperately to the wheat board as the symbol for his economic salvation. When criticism of the wheat board arises, it is invariably said that at least 90 per cent of our prairie producers are in support of the wheat board. I would say that statement is broadly true. The reason the farmer is in favour of the wheat board is the instability and the insecurity to which he has been subjected down through the years. Hence you can always arouse a positive response in favour of government proposals if you imply that any other proposal is a threat to the wheat board. It is similar to the "King or chaos" appeal that was made back in 1935. Professor Lower has summed up that appeal in this manner. It will be recalled that the present administration first came to power in this country in 1935. Professor Lower describes the victory as follows:

> The victory was not a tribute to Mr. King. It was not a proclamation in defence of liberty. It was not even in pronouncement on the issues of the day. Liberalism as it emerged in Canada after 1935 was the counterpart of Baldwin Conservatism in Great Britain, of Le Front Populaire in France and of Rooseveltian democracy in the United States. It represented the huddling together of frightened people uncertain of their way in a chaotic world.

I think that is a fair and honest appraisal of the situation then prevailing. Unfortunately you can still get that fear response. The farmers still cling desperately to the hope that they feel lies within the wheat board marketing of their grain which has in the past tended to iron out some of the wild price fluctuations arising from a basically unstable economy. That the cash advance formula is going to destroy the wheat board is a strange suggestion indeed, because the wheat board principle of marketing was established in 1935 in order to deal with the repeated crises that come to our grain economy. If the wheat board cannot deal with the problem existing at the moment, anyone who makes that suggestion is merely indicating that it has fallen short of performing the task it was originally designed to perform. Perhaps it is high time that we had a complete reappraisal of the grain marketing problem in the light of changed conditions to see wherein the present methods are impractical.

There is just one more point in the speech to which I should like to refer briefly. There was an indication that the western farmer, if he were given cash advances for his grain, might before the time period expired, dispose of the crop already covered by the cash advance other than to the wheat board. He might sell it for feed to local farmers and so forth. This implies that the western grain producer is dishonest. I feel that is the last implication that could be made in his case. I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who comes from the west, would be only too willing to support me in this conclusion. During the thirties when governments came to the assistance of local municipal councils the farmers, at least those in Manitoba and my area, would not take full advantage of the money available to relieve them of their financial difficulties because they felt that in the long haul they would be able to take care of a major part of their accumulated indebtedness.

Farmers are essentially honest. Local governments are scrupulously honest. They do not behave in the way that the large centralized government in this country might have a tendency to behave. There is no reason at all for distrusting the integrity of the prairie farmer in this cash advance proposition.

While there is a short-term problem which must be dealt with by immediate emergency measures, there is also the continuing long-term problem which has been with us right from the beginning. As I have intimated this problem is aggravated today, Mr. Speaker, by the changing circumstances of the Canadian economy. We are moving to a secondary phase of production. Unfortunately Canada, unlike other countries that have passed through that transition, is not following the traditional paths of young countries progressing from primary activities like agriculture, forestry, mining and oil drilling into the more advanced activities such as manufacturing. We are still mainly occupied in producing raw materials which the more advanced countries like the United States make into finished products. We are hewers of wood and drawers of water for the more highly developed countries, and this has been the deliberate policy of our government.

Actually, the manufacturing share of the national income is not as impressive as it appears from a superficial observation. It has been dropping off since the peak year of 1943. We must remember that in this manufacturing are included such activities as sawing logs, producing pig iron, pulp and paper, smelting and refining of non-ferrous metals. Even including those, the manufacturing share of the national income has been dropping off from the peak year of 1943.

The next point I do not have to emphasize. It has already been adequately discussed by several members, including the leader of the C.C.F. party. This manufacturing process has come largely under the control of United States influences, and that again is a development that needs very close scrutiny by Canada. Recently, many voices have been raised on this subject. The most recent that has come to my attention has been that of our own Manitoba minister of industry and commerce, Mr. Turner. Speaking in New York last week, he invited further United States financial and technological aid in western Canadian development, but called also for a greater Canadian share in the ownership, financing and management of Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies. Canadians are not happy when they find themselves outside in their own country. These are words from our Manitoba minister of industry and commerce. This is becoming a matter of increasing interest in this country and it is something that bears very directly on the economic problem that we have in the midwestern region.

There is one more difficulty in this switch from primary to secondary industry. It is all concentrated in one part of Canada, mainly along what has become known as Canada's Ruhr valley, the St. Lawrence river. Unfortunately, because of that concentration, the western provinces are not finding the degree of secondary industrial activity to take up the economic slack that is resulting from the changing nature of our agricultural industry. I am reminded by an hon. member from the maritimes sitting behind me that it is also a problem that is peculiar to the maritimes. Western Canada is ripe for the establishment of industries. Our Manitoba minister is constantly harping on that theme. Opportunities have been missed by this government, particularly in the very extensive defence industry development.

The Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe, when he was asking for special powers to deal with defence emergencies, stated at page 5379 of Hansard for June 28, 1955:

> I do not know whether they were thinking about the amounts of money I am talking about, but I can just tell you this. In the case of the Orenda engine and the CF-100 aircraft we had paid A.V. Roe Company $122 million before the first finished aircraft was delivered.

I believe $122 million would go a long way towards sparking our western Canadian economy and the production of military aircraft is largely a non-economic business. The government of Canada is the only customer and that sort of operation could take place successfully anywhere in the Canadian economy.

Private companies have begun to establish branch plants in the west. This is one of the most encouraging developments because it may overcome this long-term economic difficulty. If the government would reduce its high level of corporation taxes, I am sure we would see more of that sort of decentralization occurring. A start was made in this direction last year by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and we heartily endorse that procedure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to bring these remarks to a conclusion, I should like to point out that Manitoba, while it is suffering from the general problems of agriculture on the prairies, is perhaps not so seriously affected as is Saskatchewan. We have a diversified economy, both on the farm and in the urban areas to a larger degree, but we are still not participating fully in the tremendous upsurge of development that has taken place in this country during the past 10 years.

Several Liberal speakers have intimated that the members of the opposition preach blue ruin. My friend and neighbour from the constituency of Lisgar made much of this sentiment that the opposition are out to preach blue ruin, and particularly the leader of the official opposition. Well, I take very decided issue with that because in his trans-Canada tour last year he preached anything but blue ruin. I have before me the newspaper report of the speech he made in Manitoba's oil town of Virden. He used words to this effect:

"Many Canadians are still not fully aware of what has happened in their country during the last twenty-five years. From the United States border to the Arctic there has been development almost beyond the scope of imagination."

Mr. Drew said he has completely sounded out the picture during his travelling throughout the country, and it boils down to a decision between developing our own country or farming out the job.

"The right answer, if we make it, will result in industrial development across the nation, increased employment and the elimination of seasonal unemployment.

"This is the beginning of Canada's golden age, an age of vast expansion and even wider contribution."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is far from the blue ruin charge that Liberal spokesmen have made against the opposition and against the Leader of the Opposition in this debate.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

In conclusion, I say I can heartily endorse the amendment that is before the house in these words:

We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia, and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems and their disregard of the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house.

There are shortages of steel, shortages of nickel, shortages of aluminum, according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Howe). The United States is going ahead with a multimillion dollar steel expansion program. Russia has threatened that in the next five years she is going to outstrip the west in production. Canada has a large role to play in the west's program of development, not only internally but externally. If the government in office cannot carry the burden I would suggest that it move out and make room for somebody else who can do the job.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I at the beginning add my word—and I do this most sincerely—of congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address. If I do this without any adjectival embellishments, it is not because I do not think that it has been richly deserved, but because at this stage of the debate I feel they may be getting a little bored with these expressions. May I merely say—if I may make use of the expression—that it is a fine example of mixed doubles in action.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, this morning to discuss first the question of the export of military equipment to the Middle East and secondly—and this I hope will put the first question in perspective—the political situation in that part of the world, with particular reference to the relations between Israel and her Arab neighbours.

As to the first question, I wish to outline the principles which governed the policy of the government in this matter and then give particulars regarding the application of those principles and that policy, both as to the procedures that are followed and the results in terms of shipments over the last two years.

This question was first raised in this session, Mr. Speaker, by questions from the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), on Wednesday, January 11, when he asked whether there had been any recent—I emphasize that word recent—shipments to or orders for aircraft for Egypt. The question reached me an hour or so before the opening of the house. I made immediate inquiries and the facts for the last three months were ascertained in the very short time available.

I replied, therefore, that before giving a final answer I would have to make inquiries of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I added that I did not know of any such recent orders or shipments, having in mind by "recent" the period of the last two or three months, which I had already examined.

Later, Mr. Speaker, after I had checked further back I stated on Tuesday, January 17, that while there were no recent orders, a request for 15 Harvard trainers received last June was approved in July, and that three of these had been shipped the day before I made this statement, that is, on January 16, in consequence of an export permit which had been granted early last September to a private company. As soon as that information was received, it was given to the house. There was no concealment and no delay. There has been a suggestion that there was a suspiciously long period of six days between the question and the final reply. Well, Mr. Speaker, as you know two of these days were Saturday and Sunday when parliament was not sitting, and the hon. member himself who asked the question had already asked me on the Friday not to give the reply, which I had ready on Monday, until Tuesday as he would not be in the house until then. So I suggest there is nothing to any suggestion that there was any undue or suspicious delay.

The hon. member has, in the house and to the press outside of the house, made statements on this matter which I feel are not accurate and that I think is surprising because of his demand, his very right demand, for scrupulous accuracy in respect of the information which he asks from the government.

He said, for instance, to the press or he is at least reported by the press as saying on January 11 that, according to reliable information, 25 Harvards had been shipped to Egypt by Canadian Car and Foundry Company. That, Mr. Speaker, was not the case and because the Egyptian ambassador denied that statement, as well as another inaccurate press statement that army type trucks were about to be shipped to Egypt, the hon. member saw fit to make a personal attack on him. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that he felt it necessary to make this uncalled for attack on the representative in Canada of a power with which we have now, and for long have had, friendly relations.

The hon. member also—drawing from his experience as a visitor to Israel last summer—is reported in the press as saying that these 15 Harvard trainers could wreak havoc out there. That is, of course, an exaggerated and misleading statement as anyone who knows anything about the capabilities and purpose of these aircraft would realize, and the opposition that they would encounter if they took to the air as combat aircraft. It is true that after reconversion operations, which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) said yesterday would take two months, you could put guns in these Harvards, but even that does not make them into effective combat planes, as my hon. friend knows. You can put a Bren gun on a bicycle but that does not make it into a tank.

Now, what are the principles, the rules governing the shipment of military equipment from this country? These principles are the result of careful consideration and are, I think, sound and reasonable. The decisions based on them are made only after studying the relevant factors in every case submitted to us. The system of controls and checks through which policies and decisions are carried out is as effective as that of any other free country.

The basis of our control system is the Export and Import Permits Act of 1954, which superseded the Export and Import Permits Act of 1947. Incidentally, both these acts were discussed in the house and the earlier one was referred to a committee, and in all the discussion of these two acts no reference was made at that time by the hon. members opposite to the question of arms shipment. Under the act of 1954 it is illegal to export or attempt to export to any destination affected any item included in an export control list except under an export permit issued by or under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The exporter must present this permit at the time he clears his shipment through Canadian customs at the port. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has the power to amend, suspend or to cancel permits if changing circumstances should render this necessary after issuance of a permit and before a shipment is made. The act provides severe penalties for those convicted of offences. The powers for enforcing the controls, imposing severe penalties, and revoking permits if circumstances so require are provided in that act. Shipments are, of course, checked by the customs authorities at the ports and action can be taken then as well as at the permit stage if required. Procedures are also laid down to prevent diversion and there is co-operation with many governments in the free world to ensure that so far as possible such procedures are effective.

There was published in the Canada Gazette on May 27, 1954, the export control list established in accordance with the provisions of the act. Group 8 within that list is headed, "Arms, Ammunition, Implements or Munitions of War; Military, Naval or Air Stores". The list of arms, aircraft, etc., specifically includes parts of these various items. So much for the legislative basis for our policy.

The following principles govern the policy of the government in carrying out this act.

(1) In the case of certain allied and associated states, for example, NATO and most commonwealth countries there are no restrictions on the export of military equipment, except—and the exceptions are important—those of supply, of domestic requirement and of security.

(2) No shipment of any kind to the Sino-Soviet bloc is permitted.

(3) Shipments of any significance are made to other areas only after consideration and approval at cabinet level, according to a procedure which I will later describe. Special attention is given—and special care shown—in respect of areas of tension or strife or what we call sensitive areas. A list of such areas, they are now 34 in number, is kept and, naturally, is modified from time to time as conditions change.

(4) Arms shipments are made only to the defence department or regular military establishment of the country concerned; and the recipient government may be required to give appropriate assurance regarding re-export.

(5) Shipments are not permitted if, in our opinion, they exceed the legitimate defence requirements of the state in question or which would themselves constitute a threat to neighbouring countries.

(6) Shipments are not permitted to sensitive areas of arms of such a character that they might increase any temptation to commit an aggression or begin a preventive war.

It is not, however, our policy to put a complete embargo on arms shipments except to the Sino-Soviet bloc, or to other countries, if any, who are a threat to our own security or where the United Nations has declared an embargo.

An embargo on all shipments in other cases, if it became general international policy and practice in the free world, might frustrate the right of nations under the United Nations charter to defend themselves; or it might drive them wholly into the arms of Russia and its satellites as the only source of supply. It might perpetuate inequalities between states in respect of their defensive capacities, thereby creating fear and insecurity; and encouraging aggression. One state might, for instance, have its own defence industries, and another—its neighbour—might be wholly dependent on imported defence equipment. An embargo could not possibly operate fairly in such cases, and might indeed encourage armed conflict over disputed territory. I can assure you that this is no hypothetical argument.

Let us see, for instance, how such an embargo—if it could have been agreed on and enforced internationally—would have operated in the Middle East in respect of Israel and its Arab neighbours. I gather from observations made in this house and outside that this is the policy that is advocated by at least certain members of opposition parties.

This area has been one of tension and unrest and indeed danger from the very day that the State of Israel was created. That creation—it should not be forgotten—was the result of a United Nations decision which Canada supported. If the embargo principle had been adopted, Israel would have been completely powerless to defend her very existence; unless she had agreed in desperation to throw herself into the arms of communist suppliers. If it had suited their purposes, and for a price—and it would have been a high price—the Moscow government which controlled these suppliers would have been quite happy to arrange such a deal.

An alternative, which could be in hon. members' minds, would have been to permit certain quantities and types of military equipment to go to Israel during this period of tension and to allow nothing whatsoever to go to any Arab state in any circumstances. That would, of course, have been considered as an unfriendly policy by those states with which Canada has normal diplomatic relations. Neither this policy nor that of the complete embargo for both sides has, so far as I know, been adopted by any country. Indeed a policy of control which has been adopted by the United Kingdom, the United States and France, the policy which has been accepted by the free world, is that which we ourselves are now following.

Another important principle which we have followed is that of consultation and exchange of information about orders and requests—except those of no significance in quantity or nature—with certain governments who have special responsibilities in this field. We do that so that one country may know what the others are doing and thereby ensure that so far as possible the principles that I have mentioned above are adhered to.

If, for instance, we are asked to supply some ammunition for 25-pounders for a particular country—and we have been asked for that, and it is still before cabinet—we try to find out, before taking any action, not only whether such an order would be excessive having regard to the number of guns involved, and existing stocks, but whether orders for this ammunition have also been received by other governments. The responsibility for the decision, however, is of course ours.

Now, what is the procedure by which this policy is carried out?

Under the law, as I have said, the export permit must be given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Before doing so, if the destination is one of those 34 sensitive areas where consultation is required, he consults with both the Departments of National Defence and External Affairs and acts only after agreement with those two departments. If the application is a particularly significant one, either in quantity or because of the political circumstances surrounding it, and even though the three ministers may have agreed to the permit, the matter is referred to the whole cabinet.

In the case of shipments to NATO or most commonwealth countries, the Minister of Trade and Commerce may act after consultation only with the Department of National Defence, in order to make sure that security and supply factors are considered as well as our own defence requirements.

In all cases where government surplus supplies are involved, the matter must also go to the treasury board for approval. Even after there has been ministerial agreement on an export permit, that board, a committee of the cabinet, may also ask the full cabinet to reconsider a decision taken.

Now, having indicated the procedures laid down, I should like to show how they were applied to the case of the 15 Harvard trainers approved for export last July.

In the spring of 1955 a supplier of these aircraft received inquiries from qualified representatives of the Egyptian government concerning 15 Harvard trainers. There were also received at the same time somewhat less formal inquiries about F-86 jet fighters. There was no problem regarding the jets. The reception by the government to the idea was negative and the matter was dropped even though that order, and others for jets about which we have been approached from other quarters, would have been very attractive commercially and would have assisted in maintaining work and employment in our aircraft industry.

As for the Harvards, the matter was brought to the attention of the Department of Trade and Commerce by the company and referred by that department to the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs for an opinion. The Department of National Defence studied the matter from the point of view of possible domestic requirements and of the military implications of supplying these aircraft to the particular government in question.

Information was also exchanged with certain friendly governments about the request. No objections were raised to the transaction from these or any other quarters. After all these steps had been taken, and as the matter in my judgment raised no new policy issue or important international consideration, and as the planes could not be made into effective combat aircraft, and as the request fell within the criteria I have mentioned already, I gave my approval. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was so informed and an export permit was issued in due course.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the date?

Mr. Pearson: The first week in September. Before proceeding further I should like to answer the question addressed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in these terms:

> Whether any field artillery weapons are being or have been dismantled and the parts sold separately by the War Assets Corporation under circumstances which would make it possible for those parts to be sold outside of Canada.

That was the question. I am informed by the corporation, on the basis of a check going back to January 1, 1952, that where any gun barrels or breech blocks have been disposed of they have been sold as scrap and in respect of each sale there is evidence available that they were mutilated prior to delivery as scrap. Such scrap also requires an export permit. Surplus field artillery or surplus artillery parts, as opposed to scrap, that is to mutilated parts, can be sold abroad but always subject to the export control procedures I have mentioned.

What are the results of this policy in respect to arms shipments to the Middle East? An impression may have been created that Canadian arms were flowing into that area in great quantities. That is not the case. The amounts involved are small and do not contravene the principles which I have outlined as governing our policy. The impression may have also been given that we were releasing modern and dangerous weapons whose capabilities could disrupt the military balance among the countries in that region and encourage all-out aggression or an arms race. That also is not the case.

There are certain figures I should like to give and I give these figures although similar figures are not given in respect to arms shipments by other countries. In 1954 export permits for military equipment to the value of $735,574.60 were granted for Israel; for Egypt the figure was only $296; for all other Arab states, none.

In 1955 the figure for Israel was $1,332,-110.59; for Egypt, $770,825; for all other Arab states, $70. The figures for the two years were $2,067,685.19 for Israel, and $771,121 for Egypt.

The Harvard trainers and spare parts for them were responsible for practically the whole of the Egyptian figure. The main items covered by the other figures are:

Harvard aircraft parts
75 mm. shells
Anti-tank equipment
Tracks and spare parts for world war II type tanks (Shermans)
25-pounder guns and accessories
·303 calibre Browning machine guns
3·7" anti-aircraft guns, accessories, spare parts and ammunition (This was a large proportion of the total)

The anti-aircraft guns are of course defensive weapons, and the 25-pounder guns are trailer guns in this case. In respect to the tank tracks and spare parts, which constituted a rather large proportion of the total, we were at our request given written and official assurances that they would not be re-exported and that they were all required for normal maintenance and servicing purposes for the existing stock of tanks. I have available the exact descriptions by item, quantity, value and destination of all the items covered by the totals I have mentioned. I am reluctant to make these figures public as the recipient government—there is only one in this case because in the case of Egypt the totals have already been made public—feels that, in spite of the relatively small amounts involved, the information might be prejudicial to her security. I would, however, be happy to let any hon. member who may desire, see all these details in confidence.

These figures show what has been approved. If there could be shown a similar table for the dollar value of the requests for military equipment that have not been approved the amount would be many times as great. Some requests had to be refused in toto, such as those for F-86 jet aircraft. Others covered a legitimate requirement of a type which did not contravene the principles we had established but in our opinion the amount was excessive for such requirements.

I mention these cases of rejection to make it clear that the procedures I described earlier are not merely a complicated method of in fact releasing everything we are asked for. The procedures do constitute an effective control system. This control has been applied because in the view of the government it is important that Canada should not contribute to the development of an arms race in the Middle East or any place else; that is, should not permit exports which would give either of the conflicting sides—if there is a conflict, a political conflict—a military advantage which the other would be bound to try to correct by increasing its military purchases in turn.

Surely the policies and controls which I have described and the nature of the exports which we have permitted make nonsense of the unfair and extravagant suggestion by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) that our actions in the field were comparable in this field with the activities of the Soviet bloc in these troubled regions. I think on the contrary the evidence is that we have been handling this matter carefully and conscientiously and with a sense of international responsibility.

I should like to turn now to the political situation in the area in order to give the background to the question we have been discussing. It is a situation which has been disturbing and unsettled, as I have already said, since the very foundation of the state of Israel. It is becoming increasingly clear that some solution must be found for the problem of the relationship between Israel and her Arab neighbours if that situation is to improve. If it does not improve it will get worse and the danger of conflict will increase. This is especially the case because there are governments which are cynically hoping to obtain political advantage from keeping the Arab-Israeli dispute burning without any concern for the damage that this would cause the Israeli and Arab people, or the danger to peace that might result. I think there would be no contribution on our part to improving the chances of peace in that area by cutting off all shipments of defence equipment to the state of Israel, if that is the policy of my hon. friends opposite.

It is the realization of this danger, the danger of conflict, which prompted western statesmen recently to offer the assistance of their governments and themselves in helping Israel and the Arab states find a solution for their disputes and problems. We in this government are very much in accord with the spirit of such pronouncements which point to the necessity of a settlement based on conciliation, understanding and compromise, which alone can afford a real basis of security and prosperity for both the Arab and Israeli peoples. The difficulties, Mr. Speaker, are great and the dangers are very real, as they always are when passions are high and feelings are deep.

We can sympathize with and understand the fear felt in Israel when they hear across their borders threats of destruction; and, of course, the United Nations did not establish the state of Israel in order to see its obliteration. Similarly, we can understand the feelings of Arab peoples at the alienation of land which was occupied by Arabs for centuries; we can sympathize with the sufferings of the many thousands of Arab refugees who have been made homeless. But surely to both sides the advantages of a confirmed and secure peace, instead of the present condition of precarious armistice, are so great both economically and politically that a negotiated settlement should not be impossible.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, mention the armistice without paying tribute here, and I know the house will join me in this, to the work of Major General Burns, the chief of the United Nations truce supervision organization for Palestine. He is not, of course, serving as a Canadian but as a United Nations official. Nevertheless, since he is a Canadian, I am sure that all hon. members are as proud as I am of his devoted and skilful work in safeguarding the armistice in most difficult and, indeed, at times dangerous circumstances, and of the high regard in which he is held by both sides for his sincerity and impartiality.

As hon. members know, I have had the privilege recently of exchanging views with Israeli and Egyptian leaders. In July the Egyptian foreign minister visited Ottawa and I had the honour of being received by the premier of Egypt, Colonel Nasser, at Cairo on my way back from southeast Asia in November. I might at this point answer a particular question put to me by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he inquired whether I would "equalize" Canada's position in the Middle East by going to Israel, in view of my visit to Egypt. I hope that it may soon be possible for me to visit Israel to see for myself the exciting and constructive things that are being done there. The reasons why I could not do so during my recent journey have been fully explained already, and I will not waste the time of the house in repeating them here, especially as they were made known to and understood in Israel at that time. I was all the more pleased, therefore, because I had not been able to visit Israel on this trip, to welcome to Ottawa at the beginning of December Mr. Sharett, the foreign minister of Israel, who came here at the invitation of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Prince Albert that our attitude should be "equal" but I doubt whether anyone would seriously contend that the criterion of such an attitude is an exact and prompt balancing of my journeys to foreign capitals. This "equality" which, as I say, I endorse, must rest on a sturdier basis than that.

In any event, during 1955 two cabinet ministers, two senators and six members of parliament visited Israel from Canada and each spent some time there. The members included the leaders of two parties, and, above all, they included the hon. member for Prince Albert himself. I am flattered, Mr. Speaker—indeed, I am flabbergasted—by the suggestion that all of these visits by such distinguished Canadians were more than equalled by a day and a half stopover by me in Cairo on the way home from a Colombo plan meeting.

My own discussions with Egyptian and Israeli leaders about the problems of the Middle East and my study of these problems, which I share with others in the house, have left me with the impression that, while the issues are complex and difficult, and even dangerous, there is a basic desire for peace on both sides because it is realized, it must be realized, that this is indispensable to social and economic progress. There seems, then, to be at least this foundation upon which a settlement could be reached.

I believe that the western powers are ready and anxious—I know that Canada is —to assist in the achievement of a settlement. I hope sincerely that the Soviet government and its friends are equally anxious. If they are, they will not stimulate and encourage an arms race in the Middle East which can have no good result, except for the political machinations of the stimulators. I agree, of course, with the hon. member for Winnipeg North that the way to blunt the machinations of those who seek to gain advantage from inflaming the troubles of the Middle East is to bring about peace there. I am sure any Canadian government, any government, would wish to do what it could, along with other similarly disposed governments, to assist in bringing about such a peace.

With all respect, however, I do not think that the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North made much of a contribution to that end. Among other things he complained of the "passionate admiration" of officials in the London foreign office for the Arabs. His own attitude seemed to me to be one of passionate hostility to the Arab governments. Passion on either side of this issue is not likely to help; indeed, it already has hindered and bedevilled the chances of a settlement. The hon. member implored this government to pay a "more significant part" in bringing about such a settlement.

The attitude he took in the house, however, would make it more difficult, not less difficult, for any Canadian representative, if he were charged with any responsibility in this matter, to be considered as an impartial and objective conciliator and to pay effectively what he referred to as an "honourable part".

It is easy enough to criticize indiscriminately those powers and those persons who have had to cope directly with this complex issue. It is easy enough to put forward proposals which fortunately no one is expected to put into practice. If our response to recent Soviet moves in the Middle East were to abandon friendly relations with the Arab states and support Israel, completely and exclusively, with our diplomacy and our arms, then we should indeed be playing the communist game. The moral position of the western powers in that area is based on the fact that they have, though not without mistakes and contradictions, tried to preserve peace on a basis of mutual accommodation rather than on the triumph of one side over the other. I suggest we must not abandon that position because the Russians have done so for their own purposes.

The important question is, however, how can an honourable and satisfactory solution be brought about? The main issues are now commonly known. It seems clear that both sides, if they recognize the desirability of a settlement, must give something to achieve it, must make some compromise. There can never be a negotiated settlement where one side or the other remains adamant. Each must enter into negotiations prepared for some sort of give and take although, of course, no one would expect one of the sides to make prior or unilateral concessions.

It seems to me that an essential, indeed, a first requirement, is that the Arab states should recognize the legitimate and permanent existence of the state of Israel. That, as I see it, necessitates abandonment by them of the impractical stipulation that we must return to the United Nations resolutions of 1947 which provided for a divided Palestine. The Arab states took up arms to prevent these resolutions becoming effective and I do not see how they can claim the right to have them accepted now as the price of peace in that area. The people of Israel have the right to know that their national existence is not at stake. That seems to me to be fundamental. Efforts to bring peace and all its benefits to the Middle East will be of no avail unless Israel and the people of Israel are released from the overhanging fear which naturally envelops the country as a result of the threats of destruction and of the political and economic warfare directed against it by its neighbours. Deep fear leads to desperate acts which, though they cannot be condoned, may at least be understood. Surely it is essential, therefore, that this basic cause of fear must be removed if there is to be a solution of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Just as we should like to see Israel freed from the fears and economic pressures which are being imposed on her, we must also hope that the Arab populations will be enabled to move forward toward their goals of economic betterment and social progress. There have, indeed, been concrete proofs that this is the hope of the West.

It may perhaps be said that there is fear also on the part of the Arab states lest they should be attacked. But so far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker, the 1950 tripartite declaration of the three leading western powers is still valid, that they would oppose the changing of borders by force. Moreover, the United Nations is dedicated to the prevention of aggression and the house will be aware of the fact that only recently the security council of the United Nations, in considering a most regrettable development of the Arab-Israeli dispute, gave unanimous evidence of its determined opposition to the resort to aggressive force. These, I maintain, are no inconsiderable safeguards. They would be even stronger if there were permanent frontiers settled by negotiation.

The Arab states on their part are, however, entitled to certain assurances. There must be a fair and honourable solution to the problem of Arab refugees. That is a subject which my hon. friend touched on the other day. The unhappy plight of these refugees is of serious concern not only to the Arab countries and to Israel because it poisons their relations but also, for humanitarian and political reasons, to the whole free world. These unfortunate people have largely been maintained by the United Nations, and Canada has contributed its share toward their support. But that cannot go on much longer. Shelter and a dole are pitiful substitutes for a permanent home and opportunities for gainful work. As I see it, some compensation should be paid these refugees by Israel for loss of land and home. But it is clear that so large a number cannot return to their former land, which is now in the state of Israel whose total population is less than two million; nor in all probability would many desire to live in what would now be to them an alien country. A limited amount of repatriation might be possible such as that which would be involved, for example, in the reuniting of families. For the rest, resettlement as an international operation, to which Israel among others would make a contribution, seems to be the only answer.

But even more important is the question of boundaries. There are at present, Mr. Speaker, armistice demarcation lines. They are therefore lines which have not been finally determined by a peace settlement. I believe that they could be susceptible to readjustments. This, of course, is by no means to suggest one-sided concessions of territory or any such thing as the "truncation" of Israel which would be crippling to the new state. But perhaps certain boundary rearrangements could be made so as to produce mutually acceptable permanent borders. There is no doubt, in my mind at least, that if the permanent borders could be agreed upon in this way the United Nations would be deeply interested in the maintenance of their security.

In return for the international guarantee which might result from this interest, with security and stability in the area which would result, I should think both the state of Israel and the Arab states would be willing at least to discuss such readjustments at a peace conference table. It seems to me also that any state which would refuse to discuss peace at such a conference table—and on some such basis of principles as that outlined above, although sketchily—would be taking on a very heavy responsibility indeed. I share, however, the optimism of the Secretary General of the United Nations, who is now visiting this area on a mission of conciliation and peace, that such an uncompromising attitude will not be adopted by anyone and that a settlement based on justice and security will be found. Please God it may be so and that this tense and torn area, the Holy Land of so many millions, may become again a land of prosperity and of peace.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the reading of this statement this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has served principally to expose the fumbling and floundering way in which the government has handled this issue since it arose in this house. It is not without significance that while this statement was being read by the minister ten officials of his department were reading the same statement in the gallery. I presume they have all had a part in preparing it. One naturally asks this question. With a battery of competent assistants like that why could this statement not have been prepared and submitted long ago? Indeed, since this issue first rose to the point of being a matter of discussion and interest in the house, the attitude of the government and its handling of the issue have been characterized by evasion, want of candour, ineptitude and incompetence or a mixture of all four.

This is the 24th day of January, Mr. Speaker. It was on the 11th day of January, may I remind you—13 days ago—that this question was first raised in the house. It was at that time that the same hon. gentleman from whom we have just received this statement this morning said this as reported at page 9 of Hansard:

> . . . I believe I can say at once that I know of no shipments of Canadian aircraft to Egypt or of any orders for such shipments.

That statement, of course, is completely at odds with the information that he has now disclosed to the house. He says he did not know at that time. However, he has told us this morning that this matter was before the cabinet at the end of the summer, that it went through various departments and that the permit was issued in the first week of September. Why the minister did not know what was going on in a matter as delicate as this, namely the shipment of arms to an area of the world that he has correctly described as one in which a sensitive situation exists, will remain a question to be answered, because it has not yet been answered.

I would ask you to look at the whole record of contradictions and evasions in the period of 13 days. If hon members opposite think that they have heard a comprehensive statement this morning, let every one of them be fair enough and honest enough to ask himself this question. If the matter is so clear, so simple and so forthright, why could it not have been delivered to the house many days ago? If it is simple, if it is comprehensive, all the more is emphasis given to the contempt that this government has shown in withholding this information from the house and in not withdrawing earlier contradictory and misleading statements.

I have pointed to that statement made just 13 days ago, Mr. Speaker. It has taken a long time to correct that one. It will not be forgotten that, on the following day when the question was renewed in the house, the inquiry was met with evasion on the part of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

It will not be forgotten either, sir, that the question was raised again on January 16 by my colleague the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes), when he turned to another minister, this time the silent Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney), and asked of him what shipments of military equipment were being sent over the week-end on the Star of Assuan, and the destination thereof. The Minister of National Defence made the bland reply that he had no knowledge of the matter. So far, Mr. Speaker, from the Prime Minister, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and from the Minister of National Defence we have a sum total of no knowledge of the matter. This was five days after the issue had been raised.

Then, we move forward to the following day, January 17. Here now we are told, this time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that approval had been given last summer for the sale and shipment of 15 reconditioned Harvard training aircraft of world war II vintage. He added that these, of course, were not combat aircraft. Then, when further discussion followed, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made this statement as recorded on page 184 of Hansard for January 17, 1956:

—I do not know how you could put a gun mounting on a Harvard training aircraft.

As he made that statement, the Minister of National Defence was sitting beside him in the very next chair but did not open his mouth. He simply turned his favourite ear to his colleague.

On the following day, January 18, now a full week after the issue had first been raised in the house, we had from the government a statement that no consideration had been given to the question of cancelling the export permit for the shipment of these training planes to Egypt. There was a statement also from the government that they knew of no reason for reconsidering the matter or believing that the permit should be cancelled.

Then again, on January 19, we have the Secretary of State for External Affairs coming forward with a limited form of correction. It was a very half-hearted form of correction of a misstatement given to this house which should have been corrected at the time it was given. It should have been corrected by his colleague the Minister of National Defence. When it was readverted to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs one would have thought that if the attitude of the minister towards parliament was a correct one, his remarks would have been attended by some form of apology for the misleading statement he had made on January 17. But, of course, ministers opposite do not apologize. They simply lay down the party line. They heed the demand of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that from now on Liberals shall toe the line whether they are in this house or in the other place.

On the 19th we have this very limited form of correction by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who says on page 277 of Hansard for that date:

I am quite ready to amend and amplify the answer which I gave on this point . . .

He says:

I said I did not believe this could be done.

He was referring to the fact that gun mountings could be put on Harvard training aircraft.

Apparently it can be done.

He was well aware by that time that photographs had been issued by the Department of National Defence showing Harvard training aircraft with guns mounted on them. Is that not an amazingly generous statement from a minister of this haughty and autocratic government? He says: "Apparently it can be done." Such unwonted generosity is enough to overcome one.

Now, we move forward to January 20. Here the matter is raised in challenging form by my leader who set before the house a motion to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely the need for a definite government policy regarding the shipment from Canada to foreign countries of arms, military equipment and ammunition and the effective supervision thereof. God bless the Leader of the Opposition for putting this issue forward in such terms that it could no longer be evaded by a government which has been looking for every avenue of escape, every opportunity of evasion.

Mr. MacDougall: The Lord will have to do more than bless him; He will have to vote for him.

Mr. Fleming: May He help you, because you are badly in need of it. From the discussion that day, sir, there emerged an undertaking on the part of the Prime Minister which will be found at page 344 of Hansard for January 20, 1956, when he said:

. . . there will be no shipments for that area—

He mentioned the Middle East, but I think it should have included the Near East too, because indications had been given there might be shipments to that area. Then even the Prime Minister, after giving what appeared to be the first clear-cut statement on the matter and at least an undertaking to the house, had to come forward yesterday and, in keeping with the handling of this matter by the government right from the start, somewhat qualify the undertaking he had given to the house on January 20.

One matter remained crystal clear from the statement of the Prime Minister on January

20. It has not been withdrawn yet nor has it been the subject of one of those corrective statements, and that is that in matters of this kind the decision is reached at the cabinet level. In his statement this morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs has emphasized that. He has made the unqualified statement that with respect to the contract to sell these 15 Harvard aircraft to Egypt, of which three have been shipped and 12 remain to be shipped, the decision to sell those aircraft to Egypt was reached at the cabinet level. Let no hon. member opposite overlook that fact. This has been done by a decision at the cabinet level—yes, and it was done five months ago according to the record.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Seven months.

Mr. Fleming: There, you see; you have more of it. It is not enough, sir, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs contradicts himself about four times in the last 13 days, but our old friend—I am sorry, our friend—the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to step into this. He just cannot keep out of anything where there is confusion.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The date was July 7.

Mr. Fleming: Confusion is not enough. He has to get into it and add to the confusion. Now, this morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs said—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member has accused me of inaccuracy and I was just trying to prevent him from an inaccuracy. The date of the order in council was July 7, 1955.

Mr. Fleming: Then that makes six months and four days until the secretary of state made his first misleading statement in the house within the hearing of the right hon. gentleman who has just interrupted. Why did he not rise and correct the Secretary of State for External Affairs before that hon. gentleman put himself in the foolish position in which he just put himself?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I just rose to correct the hon. member who is speaking, but he has not thanked me as yet.

Mr. Fleming: When the Minister of Trade and Commerce does or says the first thing for which I ought to thank him, Mr. Speaker, then I certainly shall thank him; but that has not happened as yet, sir. The statement the Secretary of State for External Affairs made this morning, the one to which I was directing the attention of the house, was that the permit had been issued in the first week of September.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is right, but the order in council was passed on July 7. He told you that, but you were not listening. You were thinking of your own speech.

Mr. Fleming: The house was sitting at the time and the Secretary of State for External Affairs was here. The permit was issued, as we were told this morning, in the first week of September.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This is the great issue of the Conservative party for this session, I assume, 15 training aircraft.

Mr. Fleming: I will tell you there is another one, and that is the way in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce tries to reduce every Liberal member opposite to the rank of a cypher by telling him to toe the line. It will be so until the end of time as long as the Minister of Trade and Commerce is where he is. We have seen evidence in abundance so far of the haughty, autocratic attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce towards parliament, with which he has infected his colleagues. The leopard cannot change his spots.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member is funnier now than I was the other night.

Mr. Fleming: I do not see how I could be. I will say this, I have not made any serious effort to compete with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in trying to be funny. I would not enter into any competition with him in cracking the whip over the heads of innocent members of the house.

Now, sir, how are cabinet decisions reached? I have always observed, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce leaves when he does not like things that are being said in the house. It will not be forgotten by hon. members that he frequently found it necessary to leave the house in the midst of an historic debate last June and July when Her Majesty's loyal opposition won the day for parliament and for freedom. And so, the Minister of Trade and Commerce having now withdrawn his presence from the house at the moment, perhaps it will be evidence to hon. gentlemen opposite who may have any lingering doubts in their minds at this time that the house can get on without him.

Now, sir, is it possible that decisions are reached on very delicate matters, matters of high importance, by general admission at the cabinet level, without members of the cabinet knowing about them? That seems to be an issue that is raised here. We are told that a decision was reached by the cabinet. At least, I presume that is what is meant when they say it is taken at the cabinet level, unless it is a matter of decision perhaps on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce exercising some of his powers under the Defence Production Act. Perhaps that is regarded by the government as reaching decisions at the cabinet level; but in the untutored minds of the others of us it could, I think, be taken to mean that decision was reached by the cabinet. And yet, it appeared that no one member of the cabinet, when this important issue was raised in the house in January, 1956, knew anything about it, not one of them. On the contrary, we are faced with this concatenation of contradictions, flounderings and evasions; confusion thrice confounded. That has been the record of this government. That is the record of men who, we are told, dealt personally with this shipment of airplanes six months ago.

Well, sir, it takes more than the at times flippant way in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs dealt with the subject this morning to put the record right and to restore a proper relationship between the government opposite and parliament.

When it comes to the policy, I think I may fairly say that in my view the policy which ought to guide Canada is this. First of all, we must all recognize the grave danger to peace that exists in this area of the world that we have been discussing, and particularly along the border between Israel, Egypt and Syria. It is indeed a sensitive area; and any responsible policy with regard to this situation must be based, in the first instance, upon the recognition of the gravity of the situation there.

Second, it must take account of the fact that we have friendly relations with both sides, and that the paramount interest of the rest of the world, ourselves included, must be the preservation of peace, because it would be a bold man indeed who would say that if open warfare broke out in that part of the world, it could be confined to the local area.

The third factor in this situation, sir, and the one which this government has characteristically, systematically and deliberately left out of its calculations is that parliament must decide. It is a matter for parliamentary decision; it is a matter on which parliament is entitled to all relevant and proper information. It is not something to be decided on the basis of denial to parliament of essential information, or on the basis of telling parliament in effect that it is more the concern of the government than it is that of the elected representatives of the people in parliament.

Every Canadian has a stake in world peace, and the extent to which that grave situation in that part of the world constitutes or contains a threat to the peace of the world, every Canadian from the Atlantic to the Pacific has a stake in that situation and a deep concern over it. It is in parliament that matters of this kind must be decided; it is in parliament that decisions must be taken with regard to the proper policies to be followed in these matters; and this government has lamentably failed in its duty to parliament on this issue.

And, sir, so much contradiction has so far bestrewn the record of government statements on this matter, in the period of the thirteen days since it was first raised in the house, that it must shake the confidence of any member in the house in regard to any statements on the matter that now come from the government. Sir, it seems to me, in the face of the statements and misstatements that we have listened to in the past thirteen days, and in the face of the evasion of the government of searching questions on this point, that before we are through this issue ought to be referred to a committee of this house so that there will be an opportunity to probe into the facts first hand, to bring officials concerned before such a committee and question them as to the facts.

Sir, I believe it is one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, prior to the adjournment I had been discussing the government statement concerning the shipment of arms abroad. I point out that this whole issue in this house arose out of a shipment of airplanes to Egypt. It should be seen in that light and in that light alone. It is no secret that arms have been shipped abroad by Canada in recent years not simply to her NATO partners but also to countries in the very area of the globe where the troubles do now most seriously threaten. Indeed one has only to look at the publications of the Department of Trade and Commerce that are available to hon. members and to the public to see what is the value of arms shipped to Israel, to Egypt and to other countries in this troubled area in recent years. There is no surprise about that. No question was raised in regard to the shipment of arms to Israel. The Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning sought to throw out a challenge in that respect to hon. members of this house to declare whether they were advocating a complete cessation of shipment of arms or military equipment to Israel. I wish to make it quite clear that this question does not arise and is not raised in this debate. It is rather an issue as to government incompetence and blundering and as to the rights of parliament to be treated as a parliament.

When the house heard me making some passing comments upon the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the blunders which it exposed, I am sure the house observed that I exercised restraint out of deference to my old professor. Regardless of whether or not the professors of one's student days are old in years, when one looks back on one's student days one invariably refers to one's professors of those days as old professors. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was my professor in history 33 years ago and I can only say that his knowledge of ancient history is much more accurate than his knowledge of recent history on the strength of his showing here today.

I just wished to make that comment by way of explaining the very evident restraint under which I spoke today. It was out of the deference that a former student naturally pays to his former professor; and in his charitable approach to these questions—I am speaking now for myself—he is bound to ascribe the errors into which his old professor has fallen to the fact that apparently the professor has been keeping bad political company in recent years.

In the limited time that remains I have several other matters upon which I should like to touch, although I am afraid I cannot touch on them more than briefly in view of the limitations of time. I have, first of all, a word on the subject of radio broadcasting and television.

At the end of July the government announced in this house that a royal commission was to be appointed to inquire into the whole question of the control of radio broadcasting and television in Canada. The government took another long time to announce the appointment of the commission. The announcement came about the first of December. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce were here—and we note that he has again taken his departure—we would have occasion perhaps to comment on the fact that six months seems to be the time within which the government forgets about the things it has done or promised to do.

Apparently the government nearly forgot about the appointment of the royal commission until the very end of the year, almost on the eve of the opening of the session of parliament. They finally got around to appointing a royal commission and I have no criticism, at this stage at any rate, of the men whom they have selected for that commission; but I do wish to say that I deplore the decision of that commission not to open its hearings until the first of April. This whole question is an urgent one. The government dilly-dallied with it far too long. We were pressing for an inquiry of this kind a year ago. The Prime Minister gave some indication that he was considering it at that time but the government went on dilly-dallying in a manner that is so familiar to this house, and now this commission has announced that it is not going to commence its hearings prior to the first of April.

I regret that very much because it means, of course, that debate on the subject is going to be hampered during the course of this session and it is quite evident that we cannot expect the report of the royal commission to be available at the present session. If the government is contemplating an election this year this would neatly serve its purposes. I do not suggest that the commission has deliberately been a party to meeting the government's exigencies in this matter, but it is unfortunate that the delay in the opening of the sittings is going to create that benefit for the government in trying to cover up the short-comings of its policies in that respect and this tremendous burden of cost under which virtually the whole policy in regard to television is breaking down today.

I have time to make only one comment on the matter of political telecasting. It is evident from the speech the Prime Minister made in this house two weeks ago that he personally has had a good deal to do with delaying political telecasting in this country. It suits the interests of the government to keep political telecasting from the people because, of course, government ministers are frequently called upon to broadcast over television. When we raised this question in the radio committee last spring we were told, of course, that when these ministers are telecasting they are making statements of general interest to the country, as though no member of the opposition was ever to be called upon to make comments before a television audience on similar matters.

The reason the government has been delaying any sensible attempt to make political telecasting available to the Canadian people is quite evident; they have the advantage now, they are exploiting that advantage, they want to continue to claim that advantage, and to play the dog in the manger. This cannot be held up any longer. It is about time the government grew up in this respect and realized that other countries have political telecasting. There is no reason why Canada cannot have it on the basis of a fair division of time among political parties. Moreover, we do not propose to submit to any form of government censorship in that respect, as was proposed by the representative of the Liberal party who attended the recent meeting of political parties with officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to discuss this subject.

I have just one comment to make on one matter that was raised by the hon. member who moved the address. It is in regard to the appointment of a woman to the civil service commission. For my part I support and advocate the appointment of a woman to fill the present vacancy on the civil service commission, as I think I was the first member in this house to advocate some years ago the appointment of a woman to the board of directors of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I should like to say now I entirely support the proposal to appoint a woman to that commission. There are capable and competent women available for the appointment.

I have just one or two observations to make to the Minister of Finance. I realize that perhaps by the time this subject is next discussed his proposals may already have been introduced to the house, but in framing his budget proposals I hope he will not overlook three things that have been overlooked in the past and which are now crying for immediate remedy. The first is that the limitation upon the policy and the legislation of making grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes, where the federally-owned property exceeds 2 per cent of the total assessment roll of the municipality, ought to be widened. Those provisions should be widened so that grants will be made to municipalities out of the federal treasury equivalent to taxes on all federally-owned property in municipalities. These municipalities are suffering today very greatly from an urgent need of revenue. They are obliged to provide services for these properties and the provision of such services is not confined to municipalities where the federally-owned property happens to exceed 2 per cent of the total assessment roll.

The second point is that the federal sales and excise taxes on goods purchased by municipal bodies, whether municipal councils or school boards or boards of education, should be eliminated. We have advocated this for years, and the time has come for action.

The third point to which I hope the Minister of Finance will give effect in writing his budget proposals is that the present exemptions from income tax, $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons, are entirely inadequate and should be increased. If the Minister of Finance is not prepared to go as far as Conservative policy advocates in this respect, namely $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons without dependents, then at least we hope he will take a generous step in that direction.

There is one other matter quite unrelated to what I have been discussing with which I should like to deal. In view of recent events I think it should be commented upon. I refer to the succession of crimes committed upon young girls in a number of Canadian cities. This has been mentioned by several hon. members previously in this debate. The expression "sex deviate" is I think too euphonious to apply to the kind of people we are speaking of. I do not share in the inclination to speak of these people as though they were just sick, as though they were well-meaning people who could not be held to be responsible for the results of their criminal acts. I think we will be taking a more realistic approach to this problem, for problem it is, if we call these people by their true names, criminals, rapists, murderers, brutal inhuman monsters.

In London, Hamilton, Toronto and other cities there has of late been a shocking succession of crimes of this kind. The public is aroused today as it rarely has been. It is a great pity that the report of the royal commission which is studying this question or some aspects of it is not now available. Let us hope that it will be available early enough during the course of this session so that whatever legislation may be intended to arise out of that report may be brought into effect at this session.

Part of the trouble of course is inadequate enforcement of existing laws and inadequate police forces to cope with crimes of this kind which are usually practised by stealth. I think the unhappy and sordid experience has pointed to the need of strengthening the law in relation to the protection of society. That points in the direction of detention. When I speak of detention I do not mean just to pat these criminals on the head and tell them to be good boys. The warning I should like to give is a warning against a soft approach in dealing with this problem. We are not dealing with soft people, we are dealing with monsters and murderers.

I had wished to say something today concerning our trade but I fear that that must wait for another occasion.

I wish to close these remarks by directing some observations to hon. gentlemen opposite who in the last analysis by their attitudes at this session will determine whether there is or is not to be a change in attitude on the part of the government. Let me say to them that the attitude of the government toward parliament which was manifested last summer in the debate on the defence production bill is evident again. There is no indication as yet that this government has learned the sound and salutary lesson which it ought to have learned from that experience of last summer. Apparently we are just back where we were before with the government determined to have its own imperious way regardless of parliament. We, Her Majesty's loyal opposition, must continue to fight for parliament's rights and to defend those freedoms of the people which are inherent in parliament and in a proper relationship between parliament and the government. Make no mistake about it, if that battle has to be waged we are here to wage it. But it rests with hon. gentlemen opposite, the private members supporting this government, to decide whether there is going to be a continuance of that haughty and overbearing attitude toward parliament.

There have been certain developments in this house since the conclusion of that historic and momentous debate last July. At that time there happened to be at least two Liberal members of this house who were independent in their approach and who over the years stood firmly on their feet and even on occasion did not hesitate to be critical of a course of action taken by the government. But those two hon. members are no longer with us. I refer to the former member for Spadina and the former member for Temiscouata. Whatever there was in the Liberal ranks by way of independence as represented by the attitude of those two hon. members has now been removed from the Liberal membership in this house.

We do not hear an independent voice of any Liberal in this house any more. The member for Spadina, to whom I referred, has been succeeded by a Conservative member, and properly so. The former member for Temiscouata, with his original and independent approach to questions, has been succeeded by an hon. gentleman who while vocal enough during his campaign has since proclaimed that he will be mute in this session and has imposed upon himself a self-denying ordinance of vocal asceticism.

I can only say to that hon. gentleman at the outset of his parliamentary career, and I do so in good part, that he should carry on the tradition of Temiscouata, the tradition of independence, the tradition of a member who stands up and does not forbear to be critical of the government and its errors. An example has been left by the hon. gentleman who preceded the hon. member and who made the name of that riding famous in this house and throughout the country. He did not make that name famous by being a mere sycophant of the government, and I commend his example to his successor.

In the amendment introduced by my leader we have complained of a lack of leadership on the part of the government, of its indifference and its inertia. We see in this government a complete unwillingness to face up to problems. The problems are there and every member of the house but the government knows of them. Hon. members from the prairies representing the government, like the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) for instance, know what kind of a wheat problem there is today and how it jeopardizes the whole economy, not only that of the west but of all Canada.

We wish to hear these voices of Liberals from western Canada. We have heard very few of them so far. They are voices that ought to be heard, and in the absence of leadership on the part of the government I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is about time for some of the backbenchers opposite to be heard to draw to the attention of the government the existence of these problems. The government has no solution. The government has ceased to think, but the denial of solutions will not cure the problems. The problems are there. We demand action.

(Translation):

Mr. Lionel Bertrand (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be long in my remarks but I thought I had to call the attention of the government during this debate to a situation existing in my county and which concerns more particularly the rubberized fabric footwear industry. I believe that it is here in the house that members of parliament should, with as much sincerity in their words as loyalty towards their constituents, voice the representations which have been made to them and deserve to be brought to the attention of those who run the country.

In these last 16 years I have never been reluctant to speak in this house on behalf of the people of Terrebonne county who, four times, have shown me not only their usual unflagging friendship but also increasing confidence. I have never been reluctant either to speak in this house for any group that might think itself aggrieved by the laws of this country and, with a courtesy I want to mention here, would come to me with its representations.

At this time it is the officers of the Dominion Rubber Company, in St. Jerome, the employees of that plant and the labour organizations of that city who request my support in order that the Canadian rubberized fabric footwear industry be not jeopardized any further by the importation of the same kind of footwear made in Hong Kong, and particularly in Japan, and which are being dumped in large quantities on our Canadian market.

I believe there are in Canada seven companies directly concerned with the manufacture of rubberized fabric footwear. They are B. F. Goodrich Canada Limited, in Kitchener, Ontario; British Rubber Co. Limited, in Lachine; Acton Rubber Limited, at Acton Vale; Kaufman Rubber Co., in Kitchener; Miner Rubber Company Limited, in Granby; United Rubber Limited, in Toronto and Dominion Rubber Co. Limited, in Montreal. This last named company operates a very large plant in St. Jerome, in the county I represent.

These companies, I take it, manufacture leather footwear, tires and other products, but all manufacture canvas footwear and rubber footwear, rubber being a basic product they have to use in various ways. However, I understand that the manufacture of canvas and rubberized fabric footwear, becomes, though in varying degree, an indispensable factor in their general progress.

I know that in my constituency, at St. Jerome, there is an extensive production of rubber soled canvas footwear and of waterproof rubberized footwear, including overshoes.

I am told that, in the field of rubberized fabric footwear, the Canadian production which, in 1947, was 24 million pairs, had gone down to 12 million pairs in 1954. I am also told that whereas the pre-war export figure of rubberized fabric footwear was six million pairs, the corresponding figure in 1954 was only 92,000 pairs, including a high proportion of special types.

It is not my intention to enter into a lengthy enumeration of figures and statistics; the government knows about them. But I do wish to dwell for a moment on the reasons for this state of affairs. Canadian production of canvas and rubberized fabric footwear has decreased significantly. Production for export, in fact, has gone down so much that, right now, it is practically non-existent. The explanation, it would seem, is that our Canadian products must face the unbearable competition of similar products manufactured in India, the United Kingdom and mainly Hong Kong, products which have access to our markets, under trade treaties. This situation will become even more desperate since Japan, which now has a trade treaty with this country, is also flooding our markets with canvas and rubberized fabric footwear, Japan has always been and is still recognized as a major producer of that commodity.

A few years ago our Canadian firms could serve the domestic market and also produce millions of pairs for export. Now not only have they lost their export market but they are also in the process of losing their domestic market too. Imports into this country of canvas and rubberized fabric footwear are constantly on the increase. These products, which are manufactured by extremely cheap labour can be sold in this country, with all taxes paid, at a price far below the very lowest manufacturing costs of the same product in Canada. Here are some figures which have been provided by the federal bureau of statistics. In October 1955, 211,903 pairs of canvas footwear entered the Canadian market as against 4,568 pairs in 1954. In October 1955, 163,593 pairs of waterproof rubberized fabric footwear entered this country, as against 89,981 in 1954.

I gather from these few figures that the rubberized footwear industry in Canada is at a low ebb. On June 22 last, their representatives officially presented the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) with a brief during an interview at which I had the privilege to be present. Later on, a committee consisting of the representatives of the departments, companies and trade unions concerned, was set up to review the situation. And all I could personally find out is that the Dominion Rubber plant, at St. Jerome, is no longer operating at capacity, the number of workers that used to be employed in that plant has been substantially reduced, and that the people are deeply concerned about it.

The Canadian rubberized fabric footwear industry has requested an embargo on those products. My information is that the government could not grant this request for the only reason that Canada, having signed treaties with the countries referred to, has to take the products that those countries manufacture if it wants to sell them products that they lack. Now, in those countries I am referring to, the manufacture of canvas or rubberized fabric footwear represents a prosperous industry, and Canada seems to be forced to take their products, even though by so doing it prejudices and paralyzes production in the Canadian industries concerned with the manufacture of similar products. That, I believe, is the reply given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). In his opinion, he must first consider the general economy of the country and Canada must keep its rank in international trade. I know that if we trade with someone the advantages cannot all be on the same side and that concessions, which sometimes hurt, must be made. If I am not mistaken, the volume of goods we sell to these countries greatly exceeds that of the goods we buy from them. That deserves consideration, which proves, Mr. Speaker, that it is not always easy to govern a country like Canada.

It remains, however, that Canadian industries are seriously prejudiced in their production by the treaties we sign. Let us suppose for a moment that the government, for the most legitimate reasons under the circumstances, could not prohibit the importation of foreign goods into Canada. Could it not, however, by revising its trade treaties, set a maximum quantity on canvas rubberized fabric footwear admitted into Canada? At present, our companies are faced with the constant threat of imports increasing even more from month to month and they are appalled at the prospect of an industry going to ruin, an industry built up at the cost of great sacrifices and on which so many other fields of economic activity are dependent.

If the government did set a quota on the volume of canvas or rubberized fabric footwear that foreign countries could ship to us, Canadian companies could at least know the eventual extent of the competition and then take steps to face it, either by means of publicity, or by new methods of production, or by manufacturing new and more attractive types. At present they are loathe to adopt a definite stand. They simply see the fruit of long years of labour crumbling before a situation they have to accept, that is forced upon them. Under the circumstances, it is impossible for them to face competition. Shoes from Hong Kong and Japan, which are of good quality, I am told, are sold, however, at much lower prices, for the simple reason that salaries paid in industries in Hong Kong and Japan are ridiculously low. I am assured that the salary of a woman represents 6 cents an hour and that the man earning 15 cents an hour must have an exceptional yield. At the same time, it is quite obvious, the average salary paid in our footwear industries amounts to $1.45 an hour. There is also a matter of employment. I understand that at present employment in this country reaches an unprecedented high but, nonetheless, some cities must not be deprived of their share of national prosperity. In St. Jerome, several hundred workers, employed for years by the Dominion Rubber Company, do not work at their regular jobs because the factory no longer manufactures for export and is slowed down to the level of the local market which is already saturated with imported products.

In my opinion, the government could do something. It is not so much the case of the Dominion Rubber Company that I am pleading at this time as that of the working class of my constituency. I am not much of an economist, but I dare say that, if the government has to stick to its decision and, first and foremost, consider the economy of this country as a whole; if, in order to ensure a still more marked advance in other and perhaps more elaborate fields of our national economy, the government necessarily has to jeopardize existing Canadian industries, it should also, to my mind, adopt certain legislation to compensate the losses sustained by these industries because of government decisions.

We are paying subsidies for wheat; I am not opposed to this, for it is an important phase of our economic life. We are devoting large sums of money to the support of agricultural products; I don't object, for agriculture is the wealth of a nation. I am aware that it is not a matter of compensating the losses of private companies by means of a subsidy, but I wonder whether the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) could not, in all cases where Canadian industries are in any way prejudiced because of our laws, give them a priority with regard to the numerous contracts his department is placing every year, and which, I think, these industries could easily accept without much retooling. It seems to me that this would be only fair. What I am primarily aiming at is to have in my county, as well as everywhere else, an abundance of remunerative employment. The government confers contracts by the million every year. Would it not be possible to direct some of these contracts towards industries like the canvas or rubberized fabric footwear factories, and those that are or could be some day equally affected as a result of our trade?

I am making these few suggestions with the best intent. I submit them because I believe them to be appropriate. I put them forward because I think that, in so doing, I am advocating a just cause. Some tariff barriers, the raising of customs or excise duties, the imposition of quotas or compensation; these are suggestions that do not all deserve to fall on stony ground.

Just a last word, Mr. Speaker. At a time when discussions between the central power and the provinces are being held with regard to the adoption of a national health insurance scheme, I must say this: the people of the county of Terrebonne favour such legislation. Our social security program will only be complete when legislation of this kind is incorporated in the statute books. In this century of speed, every Canadian must be sheltered from insecurity. I wish that, out of this meeting will spring, for the good of all, other social security legislation that Canadians are expecting and that it would be fitting for the government to apply as soon as possible.

(Text):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, may I first be permitted to associate myself with all those who have already expressed their admiration for the man who always presides with so much dignity, tact, competence and fairness over the debates in this honourable house. I should also like to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

You will undoubtedly note, Mr. Speaker, that contrary to my usual practice I am now expressing myself in the language spoken by the majority. I am doing so—and I have decided with pleasure to make my whole speech today in the language of Shakespeare —in order to show my admiration for the hon. members on both sides of the house who, since the opening of the present session, have quite successfully made a magnificent effort to use my mother tongue for a few minutes during their speeches. I congratulate them and thank them. I rejoice at the ever-increasing number of those who speak the two official languages of our country. Their noble gesture is a consecration of the well-established principle that Canada is a bilingual country. May their example inspire all Canadians, particularly those who are at the head of the various departments of the federal administration. Unfortunately, many of them seem to ignore completely the principle of bilingualism.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to salute the electors of the constituency of Quebec West whom I have the honour of representing in this house and to assure them once again of my most faithful devotion. May I be permitted to say to my electors, and more particularly to those of the labour classes who form the great majority, that for them I shall not cease to ask all they need not only to ensure their existence but to make them feel that they are on the same level with the other classes of society. This leads me to ask the government to give special attention to the alarming unemployment problem which still prevails this winter in my constituency and also in the whole city of Quebec. Even though the federal statistics proclaim an improvement in the employment situation, the fact remains that the situation is just as serious this winter as it was last year. The statistics published are far from representative of the true situation. They merely indicate the number of those who receive unemployment insurance benefits and forget to mention those who, by the nature of their work, are not eligible to receive such benefits but who are unemployed nevertheless.

Furthermore, there are those who do not possess a sufficient number of stamps to entitle them to collect any benefits. What of those who have already used up all the benefits to which they were entitled and no longer receive any? They are not included in these statistics. Last but not least, we find a great number of unemployed persons whose rightful demands have been rejected because of this interpretation of the law by an all-powerful bureaucracy. It is only by adding up all these unemployed persons that a true picture of the unemployment situation is given. This is something the government is not interested in making public in order to conceal its own incompetency in finding a solution to the problem. I shall return to this subject in a few moments.

Until the situation improves, would it not be possible to undertake more public works as they are the only truly efficient remedy?

I have often requested public works of a nature that might be helpful to the unemployed, works which would improve the lot of the working people and would also provide improvement in the field of public health to the benefit of my fellow citizens. The St. Charles and Lairet rivers which cross my city did not improve during the past year and continue to threaten public health. These two open dumps, which are a local and national disgrace, still continue during the summer months to spread foul and dangerous odours over the city of Quebec. Incidentally the extremely hot summer we had last year contributed to imposing upon our people a torture that they alone can describe.

When will the government decide to take some action? When will the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), as the member for Quebec East, give some thought to his poor electors who are considered as real orphans without any representation in the parliament of Canada? I ask the government and more particularly the Prime Minister to have, if not affection for those he is supposed to represent, at least a little sympathy. The people of Quebec pay their taxes to their government and I believe they are entitled to a little more consideration. I repeat what I stated in Quebec on October 25 last when reporting on my mandate. I have no objection to protecting the health and life of those who live thousands and thousands of miles from our country. However, if the government refuses to apply to the letter the proverb that charity begins at home, then I think it is only logical we should demand that they should begin protecting the health and life of those who daily contribute their work, their labour and their taxes to the greatness and prosperity of Canada.

If instead of spending the summer at St. Patrice de Riviere-du-Loup, 120 miles from Quebec city, which is situated on the enchanting shores of the river that bears his name, the Prime Minister had decided to build a summer home on the shores of the Lairet river, he would have soon freed his constituency from the foul smell which, like his electors and mine, he would have been compelled to breathe. The Prime Minister behaves, therefore, perhaps not with wisdom but at least with caution by staying 120 miles from his constituency during the summer, since this is the best way to remain in good health.

As for the electors of Quebec East, those poor orphans who never see their member except in the newspapers, they are far less important. They continue to be poisoned little by little through contact with these rivers. Nevertheless they have the satisfaction, if I may call it that, of saying that they are represented in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Canada.

I would venture a suggestion to the Prime Minister in this connection. If his government does not want to undertake this work, if it prefers to throw federal responsibilities on the shoulders of the provincial government, why does it not grant the city of Quebec an annual subsidy which would allow the municipality to undertake the work? This subsidy would be a logical compensation for property taxes the government does not pay on its many buildings and sites. If this were done, the federal government would be following the generous example set by the government of my province which has granted the city of Quebec a subsidy of $1 million to help solve its administrative problems. Just two years ago the provincial government granted a quarter of a million dollars for the same purpose. If the Prime Minister could accept that suggestion, which would be beneficial to Quebec, and would specify as the purpose of the grant the deepening of the St. Charles river and the reclamation of the Lairet river, I would be the first to congratulate him in the name of those who, for too many years, have had to put up with these dumps.

Another means of helping the working class and of fulfilling in some way the needs of these larger families would be to increase family allowances, even doubling them if possible, because the cost of living has more than doubled since the enactment of that social legislation. There is not a single government, not a single industry, that has not substantially increased the salaries of its employees since 1945. Even the indemnity of the representatives of the people has been doubled under the pretext that the cost of living has risen in that proportion. How could one argue today, Mr. Speaker, that family allowances fulfil the aims for which they were established when one knows that the 1945 dollar has lost more than 50 per cent of its value? I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to discuss this important matter with his colleagues in the cabinet and bring forth the necessary remedy at this session.

While I am on the subject of social security, may I be permitted to ask the minister to amend, with the least possible delay and make more generous the legislation enacted at the last session to help disabled people. It should extend to all those who, at birth or later in life, are affected by a disability or disease which prevents them from earning their living. As it stands, the act helps only a few and I am under the impression that the cost of administration is as high as the cost of the pensions.

I wish to thank the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) for having agreed, after numerous protests it is true, to postpone the implementation of the rule which prevented stevedores and seamen who operate on the St. Lawrence and the great lakes from drawing their unemployment benefits during the winter. This rule was the work of bureaucracy and a blatant injustice to these seasonal workers. If these people cannot engage in their regular occupation during the winter, it is not through an act of chance but through an act of God. If they did not get these benefits to which their numerous contributions entitled them, I can tell the minister that the economic expansion of my city and my district would be seriously prejudiced.

Speaking of bureaucracy I should like to tell this same minister, if he does not know already, that the employees of the various unemployment insurance commission offices have a handbook that was drafted and distributed by the senior officials of the commission and which deals with the interpretation of the act passed by parliament at the last session. If I recall correctly, under the legislation enacted last year the amount of benefits was increased while the number of weeks during which an insured worker drew benefits was decreased. I want to tell the house that since the enactment of the new legislation the commission has paid much less than before. Through the intervention of bureaucracy and its interpretation of the act, I assert that at least 60 per cent of the claims submitted to the Quebec offices are rejected.

Thus, distress and difficulties are on the increase in our families. This, Mr. Speaker, through the complacency of the government in power, is still another encroachment of bureaucracy upon the supremacy of parliament. Legislation must be applied according to the spirit of the lawmaker and not sabotaged through the whims and fancies of bureaucrats whose influence is growing ever more dangerous to the prosperity of this country. I am not blaming in the least the minor officials, but I do blame those who in certain departments and commissions seem to have more authority than the minister himself and parliament. It is more than ever time to put a brake on the influence of a few overly ambitious bureaucrats and to return to the true democratic system; that is to the authority of the people's representatives responsible to those same people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on something which was the subject matter of a question I put a week ago to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), concerning the sale of butter to communist countries.

Nobody in this house was opposed to the establishment of a support price for butter of 58 cents a pound. On the contrary, every member supported this measure on the ground that it safeguarded the dairy industry of this country. This industry is so important that it would be unwise to prejudice it in any way.

However, because of the inertia of the government and its excessive optimism, and because also of the incompetence and lack of foresight of those whose business it was to conserve our markets, we find ourselves in a deplorable position. We have had to keep in storage, regularly over the years, approximately 60 million pounds of butter, and this year over 80 million pounds.

The consumer must still pay between 63 and 65 cents a pound for this commodity, besides having to pay, through his taxes, the difference between the support price and the selling price; that is, about 25 cents a pound.

Production being far above domestic consumption, the government decided to sell its surpluses in the communist countries. If every pound of butter sold in those countries had corresponded to the price paid by the Canadian consumer, or, at least, to the price guaranteed the producer by the government, there would have been no protests such as those which have arisen in all parts of this country. But when one thinks that Canada is selling butter to communist countries at 37 cents a pound while the Canadian consumer pays at least 25 cents per pound more for the very same butter, I say that that is a policy of exploitation of public funds for the benefit of the most dangerous enemies of democracy. While Moscow continues to sell its satellites, at a good price, deadly weapons which might eventually be turned against us, the Canadian government is exploiting the labour of our farmers and the taxes of our fellow citizens by selling butter at bargain rates. That is going beyond the bounds of generosity. It is such as to bring upon us economic chaos and ruin.

Why should the Canadian people not benefit from this generosity? They are the ones who are constantly paying the shot. Why, for once, should they not at least have the satisfaction of paying for something for themselves?

I, therefore, object with all my energy to the money and work of the Canadian people being used to feed our most dangerous enemies, those who nurse the hope of crushing us in order to establish in Canada the policy of slavery and persecution so much in honour in these countries under the whip of the Kremlin. If we do not put a stop to government extravagance, it will not be surprising to see before too long our surpluses of butter being shipped to red China, which the government is about to recognize.

A debate is to be held shortly on the recognition of communist China, a debate in which I will certainly take part, so I shall not deal any further with this matter today. Suffice it to say that this recognition by Canada would amount on our part to giving our agreement to slavery and our guilty approval to concentration camps and religious persecution. In a word, it would amount to voting in favour of banditry in its most heinous form.

Mr. Speaker, how can you expect the Canadian people not to look forward to an opportunity to pronounce its verdict on its administrators and by this verdict condemn their policies which are becoming increasingly disastrous for the future and security of Canada?

The Liberal party is panic-stricken in the face of failure of its administration and the fate it can expect at the next general election. They can amuse themselves on the other side of the house and take the situation lightly, but we feel more than ever before the indignation of a whole population, and indigation which will manifest itself soon by the fall of the regime.

The Conservative party, to which I have the honour to belong, led by a man of vision and a great statesman, is making giant strides on the road to victory which will mean the liberation of the Canadian people from a party that was once great because of its leaders, but which is now being drawn rapidly into the valley of humiliation. Already we have significant signs of the defeat in store for that party. The last by-elections in the country have shown clearly that deliverance is not far away.

Confusion and discord are rife in the Liberal party, and the younger members would like the old guard to disappear, particularly those who have been in the cabinet twenty years and have come to look upon themselves as the dictators of this country.

Mr. Knowles: No names mentioned?

Mr. Dufresne: No names mentioned.

I would like to make a short excursion into the different counties where by-elections were held not long ago and analyse, Mr. Speaker, the results which were encouraging to us and which should give food for thought to our friends to the right.

In Toronto-Spadina, a Liberal majority of nearly 9,000 some two years ago has been reversed and the citizens of that constituency have elected a brilliant and devoted member who is sitting here, to my right, and who will make a generous and intelligent contribution to our party and to Canada. But there is an interesting fact to be noted. The Canadian communists, who had an official candidate, got nearly 5,000 votes, which means that when the communists do not have an official candidate in certain ridings they vote solidly for the Liberal party. As a matter of fact, that was the recommendation which Mr. Tim Buck himself made to them in 1945.

I leave the province of Ontario to go into New Brunswick, into the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska where a Liberal stronghold was demolished and became a Conservative fortress. The new and dynamic member for that riding, a man with an engaging personality, did not wait long to show that he was a formidable parliamentarian, when he made known the needs of his large constituency and sharply criticized the Liberal government for its inertia and its indifference. And when he shouted, "We in New Brunswick are fed up with the Liberal government", he was voicing the feelings not only of his province but of all Canadians. I congratulate him on his election and on his firm stand, and I am very happy to have given him last September my small but very sincere support.

We have also had by-elections in the province of Quebec, and the constituencies of Quebec South, Bellechasse and St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville have had such sharp reductions in the enormous Liberal majorities of previous elections that these meagre results demonstrate clearly what will happen at the next general election. Yet these by-elections gave us the opportunity to add up the different kinds of Liberals whom we have and who will probably appear in many other counties. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we are now convinced that panic has seized the party, for it now consists of eight different kinds of followers. Let us count them and keep them in mind.

First of all, there are the official Liberals whom the masters of the party want to impose and whom the people reject. Then we find the self-imposed Liberals whom the party has to accept. There are others who are called collaborators. There are also the straight Liberals, the independent Liberals, the St. Laurent Liberals and Liberals-in-a-hurry; that is, socialists and communistic liberals or those who vote for the liberals when there is no official communist candidate.

At last we come to the future paradise on earth, right in the promised land, the county of counties where a spoiled child may obtain the only thing he has not got yet, a seat in parliament. I refer, of course, to Temiscouata. Many are the Liberal members who rejoiced at the victory of their new colleague and who are still trying to prove that it was a significant victory.

Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. Everything that could possibly be done in order to ensure the election of this "papa's son", as he calls himself, was done.

Mr. Speaker: I want to believe that the hon. member is speaking in rather a light vein but on the other hand he knows that under our rules he should not use any expressions which will involve personalities, and when he refers to an hon. member he must preface his remarks by the words, "the hon. member for Temiscouata".

Mr. Dufresne: Under the rules of the house, am I not entitled to read some of the statements made by the hon. member for Temiscouata at the time when he was only a candidate in the by-election?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member and myself should enter upon an argument in this regard.

An hon. Member: Call him the hon. member.

Mr. Dufresne: Practically every Liberal member in the province of Quebec, including the ministers, made an effort and even gave a speech in his support. Those who are generally silent in this house, and you know, Mr. Speaker, that the greater part are silent, suddenly found they were gifted speakers. This was necessary because the prestige of their leader was at stake. This powerful army of ministers, members and party workers—and perhaps I should add senators —should not, however, take the credit for this success. True, a week after the beginning of the Temiscouata campaign the candidate received a prepared text and was instructed not to depart from it. However, I am convinced that he himself had roused the sympathy and the pity of the people by his former speeches. A Prime Minister's son is a rare thing, quite an attraction, and when he talks people swallow his words. They cannot but think he is a saviour and will, through his great influence, transform the poor county of Temiscouata into a heaven on earth.

It was delightful to hear him say, "My friends of Temiscouata, I am papa's son. Is this a bad thing for the people of Temiscouata? I am not only papa's son, but mamma's little cabbage. Is this not wonderful for Temiscouata county? For don't forget, mamma being the Prime Minister's wife, she has to attend many official functions where she meets influential ministers. I am going to give you an illustration. Suppose I have not been able to see daddy at all during the day, I still can say to mamma: 'Mamma, you are going to a banquet tonight, and no doubt you will be sitting next to Mr. Howe—you know Mr. Howe, the Minister of Trade and Commerce—Mamma, would you be kind enough to say a good word to Mr. Howe on behalf of the people of Temiscouata?' The following day she might have dinner with Mr. Pearson,—you know Mr. Pearson, the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Well, I would say, 'Mamma, speak to Mr. Pearson about my Temiscouata people'. Is it bad for Temiscouata to be papa's son and mamma's little cabbage?" That is the end of the quotation. I understand now why the people of that constituency could not resist voting for him. Political pull—

Mr. Maltais: May I ask a question?

Mr. Dufresne: You may ask any questions you like when my time has expired.

An hon. Member: You are afraid.

Mr. Dufresne: I am not afraid of anyone.

An hon. Member: Your time is nearly over.

Mr. Dufresne: I am prepared to answer any questions when my time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

Political pull meant something when he said to his constituents, quite seriously: "I am the only one, besides my mother, who can see the Prime Minister early in the morning, when he is still in his pyjamas, to discuss with him a matter of concern for Temiscouata."

Was this not the same man who said at Riviere-Bleue on September 11, 1955, in order to prove his so-called importance: "I am the Gray Eminence of Louis St. Laurent, therefore he is not the one who governs, I am. Is it not better to have a candidate who governs the whole country?" And to all these declarations, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal members who accompanied him applauded loud and long. So convinced did they become of these childish sayings that last Thursday the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), in his speech on the address, made the following comment, and I quote from Hansard of that day at page 303:

> During that by-election, which won him the right to represent one of the greatest counties in the province, the hon. member for Temiscouata has indeed shown uncommon leadership and thus proved himself worthy of the man whose name he so proudly bears.

What a man! What a leader!

The hon. member for Temiscouata should have warned the people of his constituency, however, when he was still a candidate that he did not intend to take part in any debate in the house or state before his colleagues the needs of his county and that he was going to remain silent so that his remarks might not be construed as being papa's words. It is not the voice of papa which the constituents of Temiscouata want to hear in the defence of their interests but rather the voice of the man whom they have chosen to represent them. No, no, Mr. Speaker; if this is the latest 1956 edition of the Liberal party, then the succession proves disastrous. I appeal to the people of Canada and say that the time has come for a change.

An hon. Member: What an appeal.

An hon. Member: That appeal would not be heard.

Mr. Dufresne: Let us give the distinguished leader of the Conservative party an opportunity to show his real statesmanship, and under his enlightened leadership Canada will advance towards the fulfilment of her great destiny.

Mr. Maltais: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Yes, go ahead.

Mr. Maltais: From the statement of my hon. colleague that the customers in Quebec were required to pay 60 cents plus a subsidy which they were compelled to pay to make up the difference between 33 cents and 60 cents which amounted to 25 cents per pound, and seeing that he put a lot of emphasis on the fact that the people of Quebec—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Dufresne: I think I know what the question is and I will answer right away.

Mr. Maltais: Answer my question right away. Does the hon. member say that the taxpayer should not pay that subsidy, that he should refuse to pay it in the form of a tax? Does not the hon. member know of the party in France which preaches that the people should not pay taxes? Is the hon. member advocating the same thing in Quebec?

Mr. Dufresne: May I say to the hon. member for Charlevoix that if he wants to read my speech in Hansard—I hope he can read—he will find out that I have never said anything like what he suggests. I am going to answer the hon. member by saying that I hope the people of the city of Quebec are given exactly the same privileges that this government is giving to the people in communist countries, our dangerous enemies, because I know they will be glad to have butter on their table at 37 or 39 cents a pound and for which they have to pay 63 or 65 cents.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, a great portion of this debate so far has been taken up with a discussion of the problems of western Canada. Amendments have been moved that propose to rectify this injustice. I am greatly disturbed at the fact that members of parliament should consider a bountiful harvest as a serious national problem, to use their own words. I can immediately assure hon. members of this house that the primary producers in the county from which I come would not view a bountiful harvest as a serious national problem.

Some of the primary producers in my county had a lean year this year, and this has been the case for two or three years past. This has not been due to overproduction, it was due to scarcity. I can assure you that they would be most grateful today if they had a year's production stored away safely with a guaranteed price assured to them. I do believe that there are members in this house from western Canada and that there are farmers in western Canada who have gone down on their knees to thank God for the four or five consecutive bountiful harvests He has provided for them.

I do not intend to discuss this matter at great length except to say that in my opinion there is shown a great lack of appreciation of the enormous benefits we have received. I only wish I could report that there are primary producers in the maritime provinces who are in the same position. On Christmas eve, just a few weeks ago, a member of the Salvation Army delivered a copy of their paper at my home. It is always a privilege and pleasure to support this unselfish organization. That particular issue contained a poem written by Colonel Edward Joy entitled "The Silent Mill" which reads:

> One winter's day I came upon a mill,
> Its long, gaunt sweeps were silent, quiet, and still;
> And, looking to the leaden, low-ring sky,
> I thought, "God has no care for such as I."
> The miller came, and saw me dreary stand—
> A blot of sadness on the snow-white land;
> And called, "Why thus so cheerless thou?"
> I answered, "Why? The mill is silent now."
> Said he, "Dost think that God has ceased to care,
> And that His thought for us is waste and bare?
> Oh, faithless one, why doubt and sigh and weep?
> God still His promises to us doth keep."
> "Come, look and see! The Lord doth still provide,
> His creatures' wants are safe and sure supplied."
> And then the granary door he wide did pull;
> I looked, and lo, a storehouse deep and full.

I think that is descriptive of the attitude we as Christians should take when our storehouses are deep and full.

For a few moments I should like to deal with certain remarks made a few days ago by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne). At the present time the hon. member is sitting with the Tories, but I can assure you that in my province there is a great deal of confusion as to which political party he supports. During the recent Tory convention which was held at the Chateau Laurier the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the Conservative party, strongly denounced any action toward or thought of a coalition with any other political group. That statement was loudly applauded by all the delegates and all members of parliament belonging to that party.

Much to my amazement, I find the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska strongly supporting the Social Credit movement, both verbally and financially. My statement is supported and borne out by a letter written by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, and published in the Vers Demain, a paper which is supported and published by the Social Credit party. I want to put that letter on the record. It was published on January 15 and was written by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska on November 29 last. I shall not go into the first two paragraphs because in them the hon. member is simply praising the work this organization is doing in our province, but the last paragraph reads:

> I was to enclose a cheque in my last letter, and it gives me pleasure to send you the amount of $50 for new subscribers to Vers Demain, a newspaper published at the right moment and which I read attentively and with a deep feeling of interest. Could you give me a list of books and writings that would allow me to study your movement more thoroughly?
> If I can be of some use in any way, do not hesitate to let me know.
> Yours truly,
> J. C. Van Horne, M.P.

Mr. Van Horne: On a point of order, I am a member for all of Restigouche-Madawaska, not just a few.

An hon. Member: Pretty weak.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I do hope the leader of the official opposition, the leader of the Social Credit party in this house and the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska can get together and decide where that gentleman should sit. This energetic member had been in the chamber less than a week when he saw fit to use language which was most unparliamentary and which showed a lack of common sense and good judgment, language such as I have never heard before in the 15 or 16 sessions I have been here.

Many maritime organizations have suggested over the years that all maritime members should work together for the good of the maritime provinces. I am sure that this new member made a fine approach in that regard. The excuse which he gave for making such a statement was certainly weak.

Mr. Van Horne: I notice you have not done very much for the maritimes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not interrupt the hon. member the other day when he was speaking.

Mr. Van Horne: That is why the people down there—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Tory members in referring to the speech of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska emphasized other arguments he had made, but my experience is that any weak argument generally needs extraordinary emphasis. The remarks made by the hon. member in the House of Commons may have made an impression upon members of his own group, but as far as those who are familiar with the facts are concerned they did not go too far. In his speech the hon. member referred to the premier of our province in glowing terms and he quoted the remarks—

Mr. Van Horne: He is the best premier we have ever had.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): —of Premier Flemming before the Gordon commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the attention of the house. I did not interrupt the hon. member when he spoke, and I would ask the same indulgence.

Mr. Van Horne: Because I was not speaking nonsense like you.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska not to interrupt unless the member who has the floor consents.

An hon. Member: He wants to blow his horn.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He quoted these remarks of the premier of New Brunswick before the Gordon commission:

> Though it is my firm conviction that the great economic experiment undertaken by confederation to make trade flow artificially east and west instead of naturally north and south was like trying to make water run uphill—it has turned out to be like our own famous magnetic hill in New Brunswick—a definite illusion.

I agree 100 per cent, Mr. Speaker, with that statement of the premier of the province of New Brunswick. I can hardly realize, however, that it could come from a Tory premier. To me it seems like the criminal returning to the scene of his crime. It must be that his conscience is bothering him. We were given a very fine opportunity to rectify this great injustice in 1911. What stand did the Tory party take at that time, the party to which the hon. member belongs today? What stand did the father of the premier who made this statement take at that time? What stand do they take today? You will find they are the same flag wavers today they were 45 years ago; no truck nor trade with the Yankees.

If Premier Flemming is really sincere in the statement I have quoted may I say to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska that it has taken 45 years for the Conservatives in New Brunswick to realize that the attitude taken by their party in 1911 has retarded the growth and expansion of the maritimes over that period of time, and has contributed greatly to the growth and expansion of the central provinces of Canada.

That is the price the maritime provinces have paid for the greatest Tory blunder of all times, and now the hon. member is trying to blame us for it. When Premier Flemming says that the defeat of reciprocity forced the maritime provinces to trade artificially rather than naturally he is absolutely correct. I fear, however, that he would have a real problem on his hands to convince the federal Conservative members that his statement was correct, that the situation could be met by adopting the method suggested by Sir Wilfrid Laurier 45 years ago.

The hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) said during his remarks a few days ago that Rip Van Winkle woke up after 20 years. Poor old Rip Van Winkle's record has been completely broken by the Tories in the province of New Brunswick. It has taken them 45 years to realize that we have been trading artificially east and west when we should have been trading naturally north and south. Again I agree with the premier of New Brunswick that for 45 years we have been trying to make water run uphill, and they have only now decided that that statement is correct.

On January 18 the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska asked the Minister of Finance a question regarding the financing of the Beechwood power project in New Brunswick. This seemed to me a very odd question for him to ask because during his remarks, which are to be found in Hansard, he stated that we had power to sell in the province of New Brunswick and would be prepared to sell it to the county of Temiscouata in the province of Quebec in order to serve industries for that county. In one breath he is saying we need federal assistance to develop power, and in the next breath he is informing people that New Brunswick has power to sell. In my opinion this is another irresponsible statement.

In that connection, however, I look back to the great Tory disaster at Grand Falls, when our heritage was given away; when one of the power sites we had in the province that should have been developed was sold to United States interests by a Tory government. It may be that incident which makes him believe that power is still for sale in that province.

On page 174 of Hansard of January 16 the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska speaks of making use of our idle and wasting natural resources. He does not state, however that from the forests on our crown lands we receive revenue by way of stumpage, and that from our coal mines we receive a certain amount for every ton of coal taken from the ground. He failed to say that the ore discovered in northern New Brunswick through the efforts of a Liberal government is given away without one cent of revenue to our people. It is like the Grand Falls project. The people of our province are being sold completely down the river.

In New Brunswick we also have far different mining regulations than in any other province of Canada. All rights of the individual land owner have been taken completely from him by the provincial government. In other words, the big interests have taken over our heritage. The whole procedure has been shrouded in secrecy. I agree with one statement the hon. member made; these developments are controlled by a very few.

In describing the Beechwood project the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska failed to mention one fact, namely that there is a fly in the ointment so far as that project is concerned. At the present time we have a $50 million cart without a horse. The Beechwood development will never be economically sound until we get storage rights in Quebec and Maine. The people of New Brunswick are anxious that an explanation be made regarding this development. Why is there this great haste to start the project before the storage rights are guaranteed?

In my opinion a similar investment in the development of power from steam plants would have given us more power at less cost. I am firmly convinced that the natural flow of the Saint John river is a most unreliable source of power. I believe the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) was absolutely right when he made this statement.

Then the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska went on to discuss family allowances. When the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel) informed him that the leader of his party had opposed family allowances the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska said, "That is not true." I have here a dozen statements made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on this subject when he was premier of the province of Ontario, but I will not quote them all. I have quite a number of radio addresses and statements that were made by him in the Ontario legislature, and I believe the statements he made at that time were sincere in every way. In a broadcast on August 9, 1944, he said:

> But I assure you that the government of Ontario intends to do everything within its power to make sure that this iniquitous bill does not go into effect. It is not this bill alone but the whole principle involved which we intend to resist.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Listen to that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has used the word "untrue". I state that what he has said now is untrue. He knows he has been told in this house on other occasions that the statement he has made is utterly untrue. We supported family allowances.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, we supported family allowances and, in fact, I have stated on earlier occasions in this house that it was with the assistance of the government I had the honour to lead that family allowances were introduced in the province of Ontario. We assisted in every way.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): What a joke.

An hon. Member: What a laugh.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): These statements are known to all the people of Canada and to the members of this house.

Mr. Drew: They are known to you, and you know that these statements are false.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Here is another statement taken from the Globe and Mail of August 3, 1944:

> The government of Ontario will resist, in every way possible, this carefully planned attempt to break our constitution by a steady process of attrition.

Would these statements by the Leader of the Opposition be considered so complimentary by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska? Many Canadian citizens do not view them in that light.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the statement the hon. member has made is false. That has been stated before. He has just put his finger on it. The issue that was being discussed was the constitutional issue of the right of the provinces to have their position stated with regard to matters of this kind. What I have stated before is that it was a matter of record—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to continue?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: I stated that it is a matter of record.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is extremely difficult at the moment for me to accede to the request on the one hand of the hon. member who has the floor to continue his speech, and on the other hand that of the Leader of the Opposition who wishes to interject a correction because the words that apparently are being dealt with are words that were uttered by the Leader of the Opposition prior to coming into the house.

Mr. Drew: That is quite right.

Mr. Speaker: If the Leader of the Opposition wishes, at the end of the hon. member's speech, to correct a part of the hon. member's statement concerning him which is contrary to the facts, he will be allowed to do so.

Mr. Drew: I intervened only because the hon. member repeated a falsehood.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I think the Leader of the Opposition should deal with the broadcasting stations and the press, which have copied the statement and put this out to the public. I do not believe he should tell me I am inaccurate. If there is anything that is inaccurate it is the press and the radio of this country. That is where the correction should be made, not here.

Mr. Drew: It has been dealt with often, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska then raised in this house a subject which in my honest but humble opinion should never be mentioned in the House of Commons by any Tory member from New Brunswick. I refer to the matter of old age security or old age pensions. The attitude taken on this subject by the Conservative party in my province for 10 years, I can assure you, fills many black pages of our provincial history. In 1926, when the old age pension act passed this house, we had a Tory government in New Brunswick. They had promised the old people in that province that they would be paid old age pensions immediately after that election, but for four years they sat there with their arms folded and did nothing.

In 1930 came the grand betrayal of all time. That was when the Tory candidates from one end of my province to the other, had in the hands of every clergyman in the province the application forms for old age pensions, urging them to get the forms into the hands of the old people immediately because after that election they were paying old age pensions. That procedure won the 1930 election; then they folded their arms for five long years. God knows that if ever there was a period in the history of my province when the old people needed a little boost it was during the hungry thirties, when we had a Tory government in New Brunswick and a Tory government at Ottawa. They did not pay them one single dollar.

The Liberals took over in 1935 with a promise to pay pensions within a year. Ten months from the day they took office, pensions were paid. For any Tory from my province to mention old age pensions today is to do something he ought not do. He had better leave the matter alone, because it is a black record so far as they are concerned in New Brunswick. It took the people down there 17 years to forget it, but I have not forgotten it yet. It is like the old hymn "I Love to Tell the Story". It is a privilege for me to get to my feet and do so, because I lived through that period and I saw the people suffer.

Then the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, in his remarks as reported in Hansard of January 16 at page 2 of the translation said this:

> If the government had been loyal to the Canadian people, it would have raised the amount of this pension in proportion with the rise in the cost of living.

In those hungry thirties I have just mentioned—that is up until 1935—we had, as I have said, a Tory government in New Brunswick and a Tory government here in Ottawa. I should like to ask the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska whether or not the 20 cents a day paid by his government at that time was based on the cost of living. That dole of 20 cents a day is the only social service that any Tory government in my province or here can ever take credit for, in my memory.

The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) have also suggested that this federal government can see only as far as the Rideau canal, as far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned.

An hon. Member: That was not my statement.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It may not have been your statement but it was the statement of one of your group. He said that the federal government could see only as far as the Rideau canal.

An hon. Member: He does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Don't worry; I am just talking about some things you do not like me to talk about.

An hon. Member: Tell the truth.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am telling the truth.

Mr. Hodgson: Partially.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I will defy any Tory to show where I have ever said anything at all that was untrue.

Mr. Drew: I have shown you one case.

Mr. Montgomery: I can show—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The hon. member has spoken once.

Mr. Montgomery: And I will speak again.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I know it hurts.

Mr. Montgomery: It does not hurt.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): These are the latest figures available for federal assistance to New Brunswick.

Mr. Hodgson: It was Mackenzie King who said, "Not a five cent piece to a Tory government".

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): These are the latest figures available with regard to federal assistance to my province. They are for 1955. There was $55 million for Camp Gagetown; $7 million for the Chatham air base; $20 million for public works; $16 million for family allowances; $13 million for old age security. I am giving these amounts in round figures. There was $1,500,000 for old age assistance; $256,000 for blind persons allowances; $1,500,000 for hospital grants and other services; $18 million for payments under federal provincial tax agreements and $1,500,000 for loss of the right to levy customs duties. Those amounts total about $133 million, when it is said that the federal government has not done anything, and when the total revenue of the provincial government is about $50 million, including the $18 million we give them. In other words they are collecting about $33 million in provincial revenue and we have increased that by $100 million, and they still feel that we are not doing anything.

Mr. Hodgson: How long has that been going on?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It has been going on ever since we have had a Liberal government. I mentioned the fact that there was an amount of $1,500,000 to make up for the loss of the right to levy customs duties, but that is not quite correct. We still have not any customs duties down in my province but, as the result of the sales tax which the Tories promised to discard, we now have an interprovincial tax. For example, if I have an automobile in my own county and I want to trade it, I can do so, and I am given a credit of $700 or $1,000, whatever the trade-in value is. In other words, I do not have to pay the 4 per cent tax on the trade-in value. But if I trade that car in Nova Scotia I must pay it. So, we have now a customs duty as between provinces, as a result of the action of the Conservative government in New Brunswick.

Mr. Studer: They are almost as bad as the socialists in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I want to put something else on the record. I have quoted figures showing contributions to my province by the federal government. It might be of interest to note that our total income tax payments in that province are less than $20 million. I will agree that if we had won the election in 1911 they would be $50 million today. The Tories have kept the figure at $20 million for 45 years.

The figures I have quoted, I believe, would convince any fair-minded person that everything possible is being done by this government to try to assist us in that province of ours. It was a bold stand taken by the Prime Minister to try to distribute the wealth of this country equitably and fairly. No other government ever had the energy and vision to do such a thing. Even with regard to the discussions going on in this building today with regard to health insurance, what is the suggestion he puts forward? It is that the provinces pay according to their ability. How could anything be fairer than that? If the doctors and the hospitals had the same vision we would not need health insurance. If the wealthy paid plenty and the poor paid nothing, we would not need health insurance.

The attitude of this government has been to try to distribute the wealth of this country equitably and fairly, and that is what they have done in my province. I want to give them full credit for it, even though some people may not agree with me. In fact without the $18 million which we are given under the federal-provincial tax rental plan we could not exist in my province. The services we now have would have to be greatly reduced, because that amount is more than one-third of our total revenue.

It must have been most embarrassing to those sitting to my left when the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska criticized our appropriation of $26 million under the Colombo plan. Many of the hon. members of his party have said that this was not enough, that it was a niggardly amount and it was not sufficient.

Mr. Van Horne: That is not correct.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Your words are in Hansard and I believe I can understand them. Certainly the members of this party do not agree with such statements.

I do feel his crowning effort came when he criticized the billion dollar gift to Britain. In this statement he definitely refers to the British people as "foreigners". I know that must hurt a great number of the members sitting in his group. The years of blood, sweat, tears and sacrifice of those gallant people who faced the German hordes alone for two long years mean very little to this hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. The leadership of that great man, Sir Winston Churchill, perhaps the greatest of all time, is just another name to him. It is very noticeable that the Tory press in my province made no reference to this statement. But in my humble opinion, never in the history of this old world of ours did so many owe so much to so few as during those long dark years when Britain stood alone behind this great leader, defending the freedom which all democratic countries enjoy at this time. Their sacrifice was not in vain.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): After listening to a portion of the debate this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I wonder just what the purpose of our meeting in parliament really is. I believe that once again we have come together in a parliamentary session for intelligently reasoning together and exchanging counsel on all those things which affect our people and the conditions in which they presently live. We are here to re-examine methods in order that we may operate successfully in the future and keep our communities and our country strong. In that respect I believe every single member has an important role to play and at the very outset of the session I believe it is a good idea for us to evaluate that role.

This parliament accepts as the symbol of progress the right of members to justly criticize and give full and unrestricted expression to their thoughts. This, of course, does not preclude members on the government side from continuing to backslap their government for past accomplishments and repeating unimportant platitudes with respect to their present policy. I do not wish to offend anyone, but it seems to me that is not characteristic of a progressive democracy. The decisive characteristic of a progressive democracy is the far more important right and, indeed, the duty of members from all parties to offer a better way, better ideas and better alternatives to many of our present policies which today deny making economic and social security, with freedom, abundantly available to all our people.

We believe that the strengthening of our way of life can best be done by constructive criticisms and the early acceptance and management of our affairs on solid moral and economic principles. We are dedicated to such a cause, and we in the Social Credit movement shall continue to call upon the people of Canada to recognize that this movement is indeed the alternative to the old line parties. Our parliament meets at a time when there are certain happenings in the world which stress the urgency of putting our own house in the very best order. There are many opportunities for us to do that. The speech from the throne contains the following:

> Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being.

> Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being.

May I just dwell on that for a moment. We live in one of the wealthiest countries in the world. I certainly do not know of any other place on God's earth that has the potentialities for development which face us here in Canada in abundance. We have enormous quantities of the best wheat in the world; food, clothing and all the other essential materials from our fields and our factories. Great as our production is, it is only a scratch on the surface compared with what it could be if we gave inducements for capacity production. When we add to this picture the political freedom of our society, then surely we recognize that this parliament has the greatest opportunities ever, not only to raise the living standards of Canadians to the very highest levels but also to help others raise theirs.

By doing this we will not only be serving humanity but also making a contribution toward reversing the present setback which the free world has experienced in international affairs. Let us be honest. The struggle between the east and the west is not going well for our side. Since in my opinion communism is simply the outgrowth and essentially the result of people losing faith in there being another way to resolve injustice, exploitation and hunger, there is a big job to be done. This job is to make democracy so dramatically dynamic and real that all will want to emulate us.

In order to make that a reality I believe we should come to grips with the essential issues. Clearly the problem is not one of production. The grain growers of our west have produced record crops, but their sector of the economy has not fully participated in the increased well-being. Our factories have produced an abundance of goods, but people cannot afford to acquire all the essentials they need. When they do so it is only by means of instalment buying, which is nothing more than mortgaging most of their future earnings to pay for the things they need today. The problem then, in my opinion, is one of the interchangeability of goods, distribution, marketing, and purchasing power. Since the accepted medium of exchange is essentially money, in some form or other, the problem is one of finance.

I am not saying that all our fiscal policies are wrong. I am saying that many of them are only temporary solutions, since the very problem they try to solve remains unsolved and is becoming more serious all the time. Since monetary science performs an important function in modern society, I propose that in this session of parliament we set up a council of research to undertake a comprehensive study into all the factors of production, exchange, prices, consumption of goods and services. I grant that this would not provide all the answers to our problems. There are many unforeseeable factors that enter into such problems. The findings of such a research council, I do believe, could have historical significance and might well establish a solid and a secure background for sound fiscal policy formulation.

The terms of reference of such a research council should be all-embracing, and in my opinion very similar to the terms of reference given to the national survey of potential product capacity in the United States, an organization of 60 technicians and economists which was financed by the United States government in 1934 for the purpose of discovering: first, the ratio of actual production to capacity production; second, the manpower required for (a) existing production (b) capacity production; third, the degree of interdependence among industries to ascertain possible bottlenecks in the flow of materials from the natural resources to the ultimate consumer; and fourth, what purchasing power would be necessary to command capacity operation of the existing plant, at any given price level.

It is interesting to note that the national survey of potential product capacity was also empowered to translate capacity production into consumer goods and services, and translate the consumption of these goods and services into terms of life (a) for society; and, (b) for the individual.

The royal commission appointed last year for the purpose of investigating the economic prospects of Canada's future was certainly a step in the right direction, and it had the support of all members of parliament. Its terms of reference, however, limit its study to economic potential and development and not, as I understand it, to the distribution of that potential.

We all approve the setting up of the national research council and various boards to study the natural sciences. Would not a major research project investigating the field of monetary and social science be equally important? Professor C. L. Barber, assistant professor of economics at the University of Manitoba, concluded his article on Canada's economic prospects, appearing in the autumn edition of the Queen's Quarterly, 1955, with these words:

> The truth of the matter is, of course, that economists do not have the data they need to determine how long our present prosperity will last. While they understand a good deal more about the way our economic system operates than they did in 1930, very little research has been done on the vital question of what determines our economy's capital requirements. I know of no major research project that has investigated or is currently investigating the relation between population growth and the demand for capital. And the relationship of technological progress to capital requirements is still largely unexplored. The analysis of capital requirements has been listed as one of the topics which the new royal commission on Canada's economic prospects intends to explore. But in the time at their disposal they can hardly more than scratch the surface of this important topic. If our government in Ottawa can find $300,000 to finance the hasty and forced research that is inevitably produced by a royal commission, it can scarcely afford not to set aside funds to finance a long-range program of economic research. Canada badly needs a program of research in the social science field that is the counterpart of that provided by the national research council for the natural sciences. Until the results of such a research program are available economists can do little more than guess at the answer to my initial question..

I should like to turn at this time to a few specific sectors of our economy. The total figures of our gross national production and disposable income make it clear that we are enjoying a high level of prosperity, but there are facts behind the figures which indicate that very many people do not share in that prosperity. I think the lesson to be learned is that the mere fact of an increase in the gross production is not sufficient in itself for real prosperity unless that production is accompanied by government policies that make possible the consumption of that production.

I believe it is time to talk straight, and this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is the place to do it. Every member in this house fully understands the value of our agriculture and the wonderful contribution that is being made by farmers of our country in the production of food. The number of speeches that have been made on the subject is an indication of that understanding.

In my own province, farm products exceed Alberta oil and coal wealth. Those of us living in urban constituencies know that the farmer not only feeds us, but we also rely on him buying the services of our city merchants and the products of our workers. Consequently the decline in his farm cash income affects all of us. Let me give one single example of this effect on heavy industry. This is taken from the dominion bureau of statistics news notes of October 28, 1955:

> Less harvesting machinery sold. Canadian farmers bought only $26,194,827 worth of new harvesting machinery last year, 62·4 per cent less than in 1953 when the wholesale value of sales totalled $69,579,783.

Just how serious the cash drop has been is further shown in the latest figures released by the dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin, volume 25, No. 14, Friday, January 20, 1956, as follows:

> Cash income from the sale of farm products and from participation payments on previous years' prairie grain crops in 1955 amounted to an estimated $2,323,330,000, 2·3 per cent below the 1954 estimate of $2,377,800,000 and 18·5 per cent below the all-time high of $2,849,300,000 in 1952.

This means that farmers have suffered a loss of $526 million of revenue in 1955 as compared with revenues received in 1952. It does seem very peculiar that in a world in which hundreds of millions of people are threatened by starvation and when even in a great producing country such as Canada there are many people who have not enough to eat, our farmers should be forced into economic uncertainty. Here in this very city of Ottawa one sees posters appealing for donations to buy food for hungry children in distant lands, and pictures of children with puffed-up stomachs.

The point I make is that methods must be found to see that our farmer is paid cash, and methods must also be designed so that those nations that require our food are able to get it, irrespective of whether they have gold or dollars.

My second point is that whether we have a poor wheat crop or a bumper harvest, farmers just never get a square deal. Long before this time the government entered into an arrangement with the farmers. The farmer was to produce; the government was to sell. Let us ask ourselves, who has broken that contract? Mr. Speaker, this government cannot escape answering to the western farmers for their omissions. As a matter of fact the farmers' problems have never been solved by the Liberal government, with the one exception of wartime financing when there was a greatly increased domestic and foreign demand created by the havoc of war. Even at this late hour, when the farmers are united in protest, the government has nothing better to offer them than legislation which, while it may assist some, carries with it far too much liability because it is an open invitation to the farmer to get into debt. It is not debt the farmer wants for having produced a great abundance of the very staff of life, bread; it is a fair cash return for a job well done.

Fortunately there are brighter sides to the picture. The decline in the number of unemployed is perhaps one of the best pieces of news we have heard thus far. It is good news in comparison with the situation a few months ago. We recall that unemployment had reached the top figure of 633,000 last March. It is presently claimed that our current unemployment figure in Canada is slightly over 200,000, and that this figure is normal. Certainly unemployment is never normal for a person who wants a job and cannot find one, and it is certainly not normal for the family that depends upon the earnings of that person.

I submit that the undertaking of one project alone would solve the present unemployment situation. The urgency of a trans-Canada highway system to meet the requirements of western Canada merits attention at this time. It was my privilege to have spoken on this matter in previous sessions, at which time I referred to the desirability of the federal government assisting the various provincial governments in the building of a road from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast by way of Saskatoon, Edmonton, Jasper park and the Yellowhead route. We have consistently asked for that consideration. The other day the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Yuill) also stressed the importance of the Yellowhead route.

All that is needed is a little action from the Liberal government. The federal government's expenditures on highways is completely out of line with the income it receives from the various industries associated with good roads. The provincial governments have a big enough job building their own local and marketing roads without having the additional burden of constructing throughways and possible defence roads.

I should like to say how pleased I was to see that we will be considering new legislation on housing. This will, I am sure, contribute much to the elimination of poverty and slum conditions in which juvenile delinquency thrives and which impair the health of our people.

There is one other area in which there is a very great need. During my visit home it was my pleasure to meet with many of the old age pensioners in my constituency and to address their society in Edmonton. In numerous meetings with them I have learned to understand more fully the many extremely difficult problems they face because of the inadequacy of their pensions and the high cost of living. They impress me in other ways, too. I found them to be one of the most alert and thoughtful groups of citizens in our country. They are alert to what is happening in parliament, and they are thoughtful of the difficulties involved in the furtherance of aid to them by governments. Their case is very strong. Because I believe in it, I think it is proper for me to focus the attention of hon. members on it. It is true we have come a long way together in the field of social security legislation, and we are all grateful for that. Equally true is the fact that those on fixed incomes, such as old age pensioners, veterans, the blind and handicapped and all low income groups, are struggling desperately to make ends meet in the face of rising costs.

If everything else in our economy had remained static, perhaps their claim for additional help would be less justified. However, this is not the case at the present time. The production of our country is moving substantially upward, and it is not unreasonable to expect that this prosperity be reflected in improved welfare of the aged and others.

In January, 1951, when the federal old age security pension was made effective, the national income and national production in our country at that time must certainly have had a bearing on the amount this government earmarked for the senior citizens. Since that date the national income and the value of the gross national product have risen by over $2 billion in each category. This would work out to an average increase in income of over $120 for every man, woman and child in Canada.

We hear a great deal of talk from various hon. members regarding the need for markets. I have always maintained that one of the best markets we could have is right here in our own country, our own people. If this market is to be used the purchasing power of the people must be increased in the same ratio as our production. If we weigh the problem carefully we see that elementary mathematics are on the side of the demand for an increase of at least $10 for old age pensioners. This would merely mean placing the present pension with the addition of $10 in the same ratio as the pension they received in 1951. As I see it, social justice is also on their side, because after all what is our job if not to devise policies which will alleviate the burdens of the people and fairly distribute increased bounty amongst every level of the Canadian people.

I think the same principle applies to the blind of our country. Just a few days ago I received a letter from the Canadian National Institute for the Blind written by Mr. W. E. Milton, assistant superintendent of the western division, and by Mr. A. DeCoursey, chairman of the Alberta division of the Canadian Council of the Blind, which reads as follows:

> Last year, in response to representations by the C.N.I.B. and The Canadian Council of the Blind, parliament amended the Blind Persons Act to lower the qualifying age for blindness allowance to 18 and to slightly raise the means test ceilings on allowable income. We greatly appreciated your support of these amendments and your interest in the welfare of the blind.
> Further to the letter you recently received from our national headquarters, we are writing to urge your support of our current one-point legislative objective. This important objective, a federal allowance without means test to all blind Canadians over and above the existing maintenance allowance to help meet the unavoidable expense of blindness, was advocated but not implemented last year. It is explained in the attached pamphlet and continues to be an urgent need. The principle of such an allowance is endorsed by the United Nations and by the world council for the welfare of the blind, and is in effect in some countries.
> You will be interested to learn that, at March 31, 1955, the blind population of Canada exceeded 21,000 persons. Only 7,570 of these were in receipt of the blindness allowance. Approximately 1,400 were too young to qualify while 7,344 were 70 and over and therefore, in receipt of the old age security pension. The remainder about 5,000 were ineligible for various reasons including inability to qualify under the rigid means test which limits a single person to an annual income including the allowance of $960 and a married person to $1,560.
> It will be obvious that the unavoidable expense of blindness is a real concern to every blind adult regardless of whether he qualifies or not for the maintenance allowance provided by the Blind Persons Act. Present legislation ignores his blindness if he is employed, but the unusual expense of blindness continues. Present legislation ignores his blindness when he reaches 70 and recognizes only his age. We, who know the need, earnestly solicit your support of our reasonable aim.
> With appreciation for past courtesies and best wishes for 1956, we remain.

There are a few signs of warning that we should heed. The debt in which people find themselves is at an all-time high. I believe that most hon. members who read the local papers will have seen the report in yesterday's Ottawa Journal which was captioned "Consumer Credit Up $305,000,000" and which read as follows:

> Consumer credit ballooned during the third quarter of 1955 to $2,212,000,000, up $305,000,000 from the first quarter of the year.

The taxation policies of this government make it virtually impossible for people to save and put away a little bit for a rainy day. I urge this government to make tax reductions, especially for the relief of those in the lower income brackets. It is a complete fallacy to claim that government revenue would decline. The very reverse is true, because reduced taxes would increase purchasing power in the hands of the people which in turn would stimulate consumption, investment and production. Consequently in the end our government would benefit by a greater increase in our economy.

In carrying out our program let us continue to guard against what I consider to be a real danger, namely the growth of the bigger and bigger government, which means more centralization and bureaucracy. There is far too much of that even now, and our efforts should be to reverse the trend. I think one way to do it would be to decentralize decisions as much as possible, and make available to every level of government adequate finances to enable it to do a good job.

The failure of the last two federal-provincial conferences, one in April and one in October, to my mind was a result of the government's refusal to do that very thing. There is more truth than fiction in the statement that Ottawa continues to attempt to create the impression that they are doing the provinces a favour by giving back to them a small share of the provinces' income. In the present crisis of outside events, when we need unity more than anything else, I think it is inexcusible for this government to continue hogging everything.

I think decentralization could be brought about in many other fields, such as the fields of aviation, radio and television. Why should the government have monopolies in these fields and then ask the taxpayer to foot the bill? Would it not be more sensible for us to bring about the desired expansion in these fields by inviting various voluntary and private organizations to enter them? There is every indication that there are many such organizations which would like to do so. There would be a double effect; on the one hand we would have the expanded services which are required, and on the other hand the cost of such expansion would not necessarily fall upon the shoulders of the Canadian taxpayer.

On previous occasions I have drawn to the attention of responsible ministers the need of a post office building in Beverly, Alberta. I examined the situation several times last autumn, and I can honestly say that the facilities are deplorably inadequate. In view of the requests made by their member in numerous debates the public there have a right to know why this government is still ignoring their request. I think these people are entitled to have a public building in which satisfactory post office premises would be available. Through me they once again respectfully draw the attention of the new minister to their need.

In conclusion may I just join with others in my constituency and elsewhere and ask in all sincerity that this government, which is charged with the responsibility for making decisions, do so solely in the light of objective thought and respond to the observations on some of the problems which I have briefly outlined.

Mr. N. A. Matheson (Queens): Mr. Speaker, there are a few things I should like to discuss briefly. Yesterday I was at home in my riding of Queens, and while there I met with and talked to a great number of people. I met and talked with many more during the last weeks and months of 1955. There are many things about which my people are happy, but there are several things which are causing concern and I should like to mention two of them.

Our provincial economy is largely dependent upon agriculture. While Canada as a whole is prosperous and booming, that is not true of agriculture in our province. This industry has experienced comparatively difficult times. Potatoes constitute only one phase of our agricultural economy, but they are the main cash crop of many farmers. They provide the extra cash which pays outstanding bills and provides the means to make purchases for the home or for the farm plant. You know as well as I do that when our farmers have cash to spend the urban centres benefit. Charlottetown, the capital city, is in the centre of my riding, surrounded by rural areas.

Right now the question of a tariff on potatoes is causing concern in my area. This matter was the subject of an intensive inquiry during the past summer by the tariff board, whose hearings in Ottawa I attended. Members of the board visited various parts of Canada and talked to producers and shippers and investigated the industry as a whole pretty thoroughly. I was glad to hear during the last day or two from the Minister of Finance that this problem is going to be studied further in the near future.

The change last year in the Unemployment Insurance Act has caused considerable difficulty at home. Our office advises that as a result of one of the changes made, approximately one-third of those eligible previously for benefits were ineligible last fall. I believe I was one of the first in Canada to draw this problem to the attention of the Minister of Labour, who happened to be in my area early last fall when I discussed the matter with him. I have discussed it further with him since coming to Ottawa. I know that other areas face the same problem, and I hope those responsible can effect a solution. I see no reason why they cannot.

I want to thank the Minister of Labour for having come to my constituency at that time, and also I want to thank the Minister of Finance who was in our province yesterday, when he spoke to several meetings. I feel quite sure that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught), would want to associate his name with what I am saying, as he was there with us.

The hon. member for Prince had a most unhappy experience recently, when his constituency was hit extremely hard by a severe sleet storm. The western part of my riding was also affected adversely, and as a result there are many people who will not have their electric power restored for several weeks. But the entire area of Prince took the brunt of the storm, and they have had and are having extremely difficult times. They are still having difficulty, and it will continue for some time to come. I want to express my sympathy to those who are so very seriously handicapped by the loss of service and the crippling disruptions that loss entails.

Yesterday, while in Charlottetown, I talked to the manager of our local employment office. He was very happy, he told me, about the manner in which business firms and people generally are co-operating in the very fine effort his office is making to stir up interest in providing extra winter employment for people who would otherwise be idle. I know he would like me to put his appreciation on record today.

I spoke a few minutes ago about some of the economic difficulties we have in our area. I regret the manner in which some of the members opposite approach the problems of the maritimes. I say that because I do not think we can get anywhere by just being belligerent. My own idea is that we should seek to attract listeners and get their attention.

It is true that other parts of Canada have prospered beyond the fondest dreams of some of the people in our area. They have advantages of geographic location. They are close to large centres of population. This means good markets. They are close to sources of abundant power which is available at a cost that makes it economically feasible to use that power in industry. They have many advantages, and I recognize that.

I bow to no one in my loyalty to my own area, but our lack of progress perhaps may not all be the fault of someone else or some other place. In my own personal experience I have found one cannot advance just by pushing somebody else down. You have to climb the rungs of the ladder yourself if you are going to ascend. In this connection I am very happy to note that the Atlantic provinces economic council is a most live and active organization in our area. It is generally known as APEC and is composed of some of the best men in our provinces. They are probing and searching for ways and means to advance our interests, to promote new and better industries and to improve and extend, if possible, the ones we now have.

If I may state their object in a few words it is this: self-help for the provinces in which they are working. A number of men from my own province are working with that organization. I do not mean we shall not accept and, indeed, seek help and economic assistance from the federal government in an effort to improve our position. I have in mind now a project that would be of tremendous benefit to us in Prince Edward Island. I think it would also be a boon to some of the adjacent provinces, particularly New Brunswick. It would practically revolutionize our transportation facilities so far as connection with the mainland is concerned.

We have a modern and powerful icebreaking car ferry. We have a second stand-by boat that is now over 40 years old. These ships render a good service to the extent that their facilities enable them to do so, but there are times when their facilities are not capable of handling the traffic that is offering. At best the delays are annoying to the tourist, and they are very costly to the industrialist and the businessman. If one misses a boat he may have to wait several hours for the next one.

The proposal I have in mind would end these delays and would assure us of continuous communication with the mainland as was envisioned in the pact of confederation. I am proposing a causeway across the strait of Northumberland. Before someone tells me this is fantastic or even economically unsound, let me say that the proposal has received and is now receiving the very serious attention of people who are qualified to consider and discuss such things. I cannot give any details, because the knowledge I have of details is knowledge given to me in confidence for the moment. I can say, however, that preliminary studies of the project indicate that the proposal may well be feasible from an economic standpoint and is entirely feasible from an engineering standpoint.

Several firms qualified to study such things have been looking into the possibilities. Included among them is one of the most highly regarded causeway engineers on this continent. May I suggest that the annual deficit on the operations of the car ferries on the Borden-Tormentine run would finance the cost of construction. By that I mean it would pay the interest on the money it would take to build the causeway.

The distance across this strip of water is much greater than across the strait of Canso, where a causeway was built and is now in efficient operation. On the other hand the water is not nearly as deep. Certainly the development would be most desirable in so far as the improved service that would be rendered is concerned. There would hardly be any comparison between the service that would be available and what is available now.

A causeway would translate into terms of modern development and modern thinking the pledge of confederation to provide continuous communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Some might say it would join Prince Edward Island to Canada. I should like to say that it would join Canada to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the house for too long. At the outset I should like to join the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Matheson), who has just taken his seat, and pay my tribute to APEC, the Atlantic provinces economic council, which through its own efforts is trying to find ways and means to benefit our provinces. I should have liked to be able to express the same complimentary remarks about the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), but I am afraid I have heard him make that speech too often in the house to compliment him on it. It is the type of stump speech we have heard for the past 35 or 40 years in the little schoolhouses of the province of New Brunswick.

The hon. member referred in uncomplimentary terms to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. The people of Restigouche-Madawaska have expressed their opinion of the hon. member for that constituency, and have done so in no uncertain terms in a constituency which for over 50 years, I believe, with two exceptions, has returned Liberal members to the house with large majorities. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, a young man who had never been in politics before, came into the picture and by his personality and his hard work, and by placing the issues before the people of that constituency, won it for the Conservative party. I think that speaks for itself, and no detraction by the hon. member for Charlotte or anyone else can take that away from him.

Mr. Robichaud: It will not last long.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member also spoke about the government of New Brunswick. We have a Conservative government in the province of New Brunswick after 20 years of Liberal government, and I predict that when the present government go to the people they will come back with a larger majority than they have at the present time. To cast reflections in connection with Grand Falls is an old, old story.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Is it not correct?

Mr. Brooks: The pulp and paper industry we have in the province of New Brunswick today was based on the hydro development at Grand Falls, and there are thousands of people in Edmundston, Campbellton and other sections of New Brunswick who today thank the Conservative government of that time for developing Grand Falls and getting this industry for us. If the hon. member wants to talk about industry, why does he not speak about Milltown in his own constituency?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I can assure the hon. member that Milltown is working nearly full time, and that things are going very well.

Mr. Brooks: That is the very statement I was going to make, but no thanks to the Liberal government. If matters had been left to the Liberal government Milltown would have been closed the same as Marysville, and there would not have been any work in Milltown.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Brooks: But owing to the energy of the people of that town—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I want to tell the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that the provincial government he speaks of found money for other industries in the province, but they could not find any for Milltown.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. Perhaps it might be well, before this discussion goes further, to remind the house that matters of fact in debate are not matters of privilege.

Mr. Brooks: There are just these few things I want to mention. I am not going to take up much time answering them. The answers are too obvious. The people of New Brunswick know them.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I'll say they are obvious.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member spoke about $18 million given to us in subsidies, while in the next breath he said that the people of the province of New Brunswick pay $20 million in income tax. Where is the gift from the federal government if they give us $18 million in subsidies and we pay out $20 million in income tax?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am suggesting $130 million.

Mr. Brooks: That is characteristic of the whole argument the hon. member tried to make this afternoon.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I did not try to make it. I made it.

Mr. Brooks: The biggest boast he has made in the House of Commons since I came here was that he was a smuggler and a lawbreaker. He does that in the face of the minister who is supposed to administer the laws of this country.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is parliamentary language for you. Apparently I got under his skin.

An hon. Member: You admitted it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes; I admitted it and I am proud of it.

Mr. Brooks: He has admitted it and he says he is proud of it. Having admitted being a smuggler and lawbreaker, he says I do not know what I am talking about.

An hon. Member: There are other things that are lawbreaking.

Mr. Brooks: In a paragraph in the speech from the throne I was pleased to note that the royal commission to examine and report upon our economic prospects is proceeding with its inquiry. I am hoping they will recommend for one thing the decentralization of industry in this country. It is something we in the maritimes have asked for on many occasions, and it is something in which this federal government could have given us a good lead in connection with the matter of defence production. It is also something which I believe would have been economically and militarily sound.

Another paragraph in the speech from the throne states as follows, as reported at page 2 of Hansard:

> Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being.

It is also a statement of fact, Mr. Speaker, that in certain sections of this country there has been a high level of prosperity. However, we in the maritime provinces have not enjoyed that prosperity, although we are pleased that other sections of the country have done so. This has been true not only for this year but for a great many years in our part of the world.

The people who today are suffering the most and who have the greatest problems are the farmers of the dominion. We have in this country today great surpluses of wheat, of butter and of apples. We cannot sell our apples, as a matter of fact, and we have a surplus of potatoes. I sometimes wonder what would happen if potatoes and apples were non-perishable goods, as are wheat and butter. If they were non-perishable, in addition to having millions of bushels of wheat and millions of pounds of butter stored up in this country I am satisfied that we would have millions of bushels of apples and millions of bushels of potatoes.

This is a great problem for the Dominion of Canada. The fact that we cannot export or sell our goods is a greater problem for us than for any other country in the world. In order to live, Canada must export from 20 to 25 per cent of her goods. In the United States 95 per cent of the production is consumed there. Hence the problem, so far as they are concerned, is not the great one that it is for us.

I am not going to discuss wheat this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, because I know little about that problem. I know a little bit more about butter. In my constituency of Royal, particularly in the county of Kings, we are a dairy-producing section. We have some of the finest dairy herds you will find anywhere, not only in the maritime provinces but in Canada. My town of Sussex is known as the dairy centre of the maritime provinces. In the town of Sussex we have two large and well-run butter factories.

The fact that it is not possible for Canada to sell all her butter creates a serious problem in my section of the country. I know there are many young men today who say this: If the future of the dairy industry and the butter industry does not get any brighter, I shall have to give up the farm or leave the farm that my father worked for years, leave the herds of cattle which it has taken so many years to improve, and find work in some other part of the country.

Just recently we were honoured in the province of New Brunswick by having held there a meeting of the dairy farmers of Canada. We were pleased indeed to have this convention held in the city of Saint John on the 14th day of this month. I might say that it is the first time this convention has ever been held in the maritime provinces. To have these men representing 455,000 producers meet in our province was a great compliment to us and, I believe, a great inspiration.

I was pleased to read in the paper the objectives of the dairy farmers of Canada. They are as follows:

> With their primary objective "To promote the betterment of the dairy industry, and to co-operate with all organizations to this end," the dairy farmers of Canada have many other aims. They endeavour to maintain and improve the high quality of Canadian dairy foods; to encourage the adoption of uniform grade standards; to promote research by recognized government and other established agencies, and to develop markets, lower production costs and generally benefit the industry and the consumer.

These are laudable objectives, and I am sure we wish the dairy farmers every success.

I am not one who would try to prescribe a solution for the present situation. I have always felt that our farm products should have greater sale in Great Britain. Before the war we had a great market in Great Britain, particularly for our apples, wheat and cheese. Had some effort been made to try to develop this market further since the last war, I believe that we would not have in Canada today such large surpluses of wheat and of butter.

By the way, I might say this. When one reads the press it is extremely confusing to note that while, according to an answer received from the minister's department, there is in Canada a surplus of some 100 million pounds of butter, nevertheless the Minister of Agriculture says that there is no surplus. It is very difficult indeed to reconcile statements of that kind. So far as I am concerned, and I believe so far as the people of Canada are concerned, they are going to believe the statements put out by the bureau of statistics.

Another complaint which the dairy farmers have, and which I feel is a very just complaint, is that we are using too much vegetable oil in this country. Many times in my own constituency I have heard it said that some effort should be made to curtail the large quantity of vegetable oils being used today. I understand that vegetable oils which are imported into Canada are the basis for margarine. In an address to the national dairy council at Lake Louise on September 5, the president of the council had this to say:

> It may be noted in this connection that our good neighbours across our southern border are this year anticipating a record crop of soy beans. The price of soy beans has already dropped drastically, and is reflected in recent large price reductions of margarine in Canada. In other words, our dairy farmers are being exposed to price competition from foreign produced oils in large surplus supply, without benefit of any effective tariff and without any attempt being made to meet the competition in the only way the consumer will recognize, namely, price.
> It is ironic that the consumer demand for cheaper food which comes largely from foreign sources, is undermining the prosperity of a large segment of our producers of basic raw products and thereby also undermining the prosperity of these same consumers.

As I said a moment ago I think the dairy farmers have a very just cause for complaint in this connection.

I have been quite interested in the speeches made by hon. members from my own province. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska upon his maiden speech. He gives every indication of being a very courageous and valuable member of this house. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, a young member who is certainly taking his place in this House of Commons. I congratulate the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. I doubt if there is anyone in the house who understands the problems of the potato producer in Canada better than this hon. member.

I should like to say a few words with reference to some matters which were brought up by hon. members opposite. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) again mentioned the Chignecto canal. The hon. member knows my attitude on this subject. The Chignecto canal is something which was discussed in this house long before the hon. member for Wetmorland ever had any connection with politics. I recall my old friend Mr. Black, the former member for Cumberland, speaking on this matter many years ago. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) has spoken on it on many occasions, and I have done the same. I do not believe there was ever a time in the history of New Brunswick when the Chignecto canal meant more to the people than it does now.

I shall not weary the house by reading it, but in 1949 when we were discussing the St. Lawrence seaway I made a speech in which I said that if the St. Lawrence seaway were developed, we in the province of New Brunswick were prepared to pay our full share of the cost of this development. However, the only practical benefit we could receive would be through building the Chignecto canal, which I consider to be supplementary to the St. Lawrence seaway. It would mean a reduction of over 400 miles in the carrying of freight from Saint John, New Brunswick, the bay of Fundy or ports along the New England coast. I do not see how the federal government, when it goes on with the development of this St. Lawrence seaway, can neglect the Chignecto canal.

But I want to say to the hon. member for Westmorland—and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Lusby) who also mentioned it—if they had been here five or six years ago when a delegation came from the maritime provinces, representatives from all parts of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and had seen the brush-off those men received from this government in the railway committee room they would feel, as I feel, that if the Chignecto canal is ever built it will have to be built by some other government than the present one. The Conservative party has been in favour of the Chignecto canal ever since it was mentioned here a number of years ago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another subject about which I should like to speak for a few minutes, and that is Passamaquoddy. Before I do so, I want to say to the hon. member for Charlotte that I was very much surprised at what seemed to me to be an attack on the Beechwood project here this afternoon. We do not expect that Beechwood will be the answer to all our problems so far as hydro development is concerned. It will hardly more than carry the load over the next eight or ten years. It is not necessary in the development of Beechwood, as the hon. member knows, that we obtain storage rights in Quebec or Maine. If the full development of the Saint John river is ever undertaken, then it will be necessary to obtain such rights. However, so far as Beechwood is concerned, the storage we have in the province of New Brunswick alone will give a waterhead sufficient for the development of this project. When the hon. member tries to draw a red herring across the Beechwood project by saying we must obtain authority from Maine and Quebec, he is making a statement which he knows is incorrect.

Now, so far as the 'Quoddy development is concerned, that has been advocated for a good many years. There is a long history to the proposed development of tidal power on the Passamaquoddy river. I recall that when I was a member of the provincial legislature some years ago a man by the name of Dexter Cooper, one of the leading hydroelectric engineers in the world, came before us with a model for the proposed development of hydroelectric power from the rise and fall of the tide in the Passamaquoddy river. He explained it to the members then, but there was not much interest in New Brunswick at that time. As a matter of fact the reception was rather lukewarm.

Then the depression came and after that the war, and there was very little interest taken in the proposal except in the United States. President Roosevelt was very much interested in it. He had lived during the summer months on Campobello island near the Passamaquoddy, so he knew the possibilities of developing hydroelectric power there. He was in favour of it as was his successor, President Truman. The state of Maine has been able to interest not only the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, but they have been able to get congress to vote money for further investigation into this development.

Stated briefly, I believe this development is feasible. I believe also that if it is developed, and if the province of New Brunswick and the Dominion of Canada will share in the development and the province of New Brunswick is able to get its full share of the horsepower, which is considered to be about a million—New Brunswick's share would probably be about 450,000 horsepower—New Brunswick would be placed on a par with any other province in this Dominion of Canada so far as electric power is concerned, and we would have sufficient power for any industries that might wish to come to our province in the future.

As I said a moment ago, there was indifference in the past, and I am afraid that at Washington they still think there is indifference on the part of the people of Canada, represented, of course, by this government. I received a letter dated February 9, 1953, from Senator Margaret Smith, of Maine. That is nearly three years ago. The matter was then being brought up at Washington by Senator Smith. Her letter reads:

Dear Mr. Brooks:

Washington is very interested in the Quoddy proposal. However, there is a general impression here that Canada has a relatively negative attitude on the proposal—

I sometimes wonder whether that is true. I hope it is not, Mr. Speaker. I hope this government will do everything it possibly can to prove whether or not it is a feasible proposition. If it is proved feasible, I hope the government will do everything it possibly can to develop this great waterpower.

I continue to quote:

—and that impression is acting somewhat to the prejudice of the proposal. I hope that is not true and that you can help to clear up the matter.

Enclosed is a copy of the current legislation. The Maine delegation has a conference set for this coming Tuesday morning to talk with President Eisenhower on the proposal.

Thank you for your generous comments about my senatorial record. I have a real affection for our neighbour Canada and enjoy every opportunity I have to go to Canada.

Sincerely yours,

Margaret Smith.

There is another matter which I had intended to mention briefly, but it has been well discussed by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. White), the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), and others. I refer to veterans affairs. I was disappointed that no mention of veterans was made in the speech from the throne this year. They should have been mentioned. There are problems. The other day the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) mentioned the war veterans allowance ceilings, and suggested that they should be raised to $1,200 for single veterans and $2,000 for married veterans. Members of the committee know that last year and other years I had amendments and resolutions to this effect.

The senior hon. member for Halifax mentioned service in England. I should like to say to the hon. member for Halifax that for the past 15 years, ever since the War Veterans Allowance Act has been discussed either in committee or in this House of Commons, opposition members and our party in particular have pressed for the inclusion of the soldiers who served in England under the war veterans allowance. It has been turned down repeatedly by his own party. I assure him that if he ever expects these men to be included under the terms of the War Veterans Allowance Act he will have to look to some party other than his own to take the initiative.

Certain amendments to the Pension Act should be considered this year as well. Since I am speaking of veterans affairs, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief reference to a trip I made overseas this year in company with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness). First I want to thank the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney), for the kindness they showed in making the arrangements for us to visit the cemeteries in France, Holland, Belgium and Italy.

At the outset may I say there is a mistaken idea, not only among our own people but among people of other nations, that those cemeteries are cared for and looked after by the people of the different countries in which they are located. That is not true. I read in the visitors' books of many of the cemeteries that some persons from Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Great Britain, who had visited the cemeteries, had written in the following remarks: "We are grateful to the people of Holland", or "We are grateful to the people of France", or Belgium, "for the care they are taking of our soldiers' graves."

Nothing could be further from the fact, Mr. Speaker. These graves are being cared for by the imperial war graves commission. This is an organization that was set up in 1917. The head of it is the Duke of Gloucester. There are representatives from all of the countries of the commonwealth. They have a tremendous task to perform. They care for the graves of 1,104,000 men who died in the first war and 569,000 who died in the second war. Their activities extend to Africa, Asia, Europe and wherever commonwealth or British Empire soldiers are buried.

I was amazed and pleased; I can hardly find adjectives to describe the manner in which those graves and cemeteries are looked after. There could not be any finer cemeteries anywhere in the world than the cemeteries that are being looked after by the imperial war graves commission. In those graves you will find lying side by side men from all parts of the commonwealth and the British Empire, soldiers from Australia, New Zealand, Canada, India, South Africa, or wherever they may have come from. The resting places of our dead are places of beauty and peace. On every grave you will see flowers, rose bushes, or shrubs of some kind blooming.

If any hon. member has an opportunity to visit Europe, I suggest that he go and see for himself. It would be impossible for him to visit all the cemeteries, because it would take weeks. The hon. member for Calgary North and I spent three weeks there and we did not see nearly all the cemeteries. None of them is truly Canadian, but those that approach the nearest to being Canadian and are called Canadian are at Beny-sur-Mer, Bretteville-sur-Laize, Dieppe, Calais, Bergen op Zoom, Cassino and Ortona in Italy.

In addition to visiting the graves we visited the memorials. The Canadian memorial at Vimy Ridge is probably the finest memorial of any nation in the world. I was a little concerned to read in the press not long ago an account of the visit to this memorial of Captain Sharpe of the 1st Canadian division. He went there on November 11 expecting to find a ceremony of some kind, and was very much surprised to find that only he and the caretaker visited the memorial on that occasion. The caretaker presented him with a wreath and asked him to place it on the memorial, which he was very proud and happy to do. Upon his return to Canada he wrote an article and expressed surprise that a ceremony was not held at Vimy Ridge on November 11. I am sure this information must come as a surprise to a great many people and I think it is a matter that should be very carefully looked into.

Another memorial in which I am particularly interested is the Newfoundland memorial in Belgium, and I want to congratulate the people of Newfoundland for arranging for this splendid memorial. It is perhaps the most practical memorial of any I saw. It consists of 100 acres of land which have been left in the same state they were in following the war; that is, there are trenches, shell holes and machine gun emplacements there which present a realistic picture of battle conditions. There is just one thing I might criticize in relation to this memorial; that is the caretaker's home, which is in a state of disrepair. I think some attention should be given to it.

Mr. Lapointe: It is being repaired this year.

Mr. Brooks: The minister informs me that it is being looked after this year. Another memorial which is of particular interest to people in the maritime provinces is the one erected by the 85th battalion. The 85th battalion is supposed to have advanced, and I think it did advance, farther than any other unit of the Canadian army at Passchendaele. At the spot where they were held up they have erected a monument. The 85th battalion association has looked after the care and maintenance of this memorial for approximately 40 years. Many of the men of the 85th battalion have passed away and it will be only a matter of time, I think, until this organization will not be functioning.

This memorial is not under the care of the imperial war graves commission and I would recommend to the minister that it should be. It is quite difficult to find, in that it is in the centre of a wheat field. Doubtless the association owns the land immediately surrounding the memorial, but I doubt if the path leading into it is in their possession. This is a matter which I hope the department will look into.

I have nothing more to say, Mr. Speaker, except to make it clear that in speaking about the people in these different countries not taking part in the decorating of the graves, is because the imperial war graves commission do not wish them to do so. They fear they will litter up the graves with material which they would not wish to have there. We did learn, however, that school children from various countries, together with their masters, visited the graves and were told about the Canadian soldiers and others of the commonwealth. The cemeteries are visited practically every day by some of the people who live in those areas.

(Translation):

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of this speech, I should like to congratulate the movers of the address in reply (Mrs. Shipley and Mr. Laflamme) on the way they handled their task.

The hon. member for Timiskaming pointed out various matters of great concern to her on behalf of her constituency and, as it is the first time that a member of the fair sex moves the address in reply, she deserves the compliments that have been extended to her by the members of this house.

The young and new member for Bellechasse also deserves congratulations from his colleagues, and I do hope that he will often take part in the debates which will be held in this house.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, in the time I have at my disposal I intend to speak on two subjects which will no doubt be the subject of many discussions in this house and throughout Canada in the years to come. Automation and free enterprise have been responsible for many discussions, and I should like to express my views thereon.

During the past year or so people have become aware of a new word. They have already become familiar with such terms as atomic energy, radar, and microwave for television and electronics. Now they hear and read about automation and a few of us look forward to the great new things that automation will mean to the world. Others are worried and fearful and think it will bring about unemployment and poverty.

Just what is automation, and what does it mean to us all? Automation is really nothing new. It is just the continuation of a long, long process of technological advance. It really began a way back when man first invented the lever to help him to lift a heavy object, and it continued through all the ages as man sought to make his daily work easier and his production greater.

For a long time no one feared these improvements in working tools because they could see how helpful they were. Then, about a century ago, men invented machines that could do much of the work they had had to do. They began using steam to provide the power that had formerly been created by man's muscles. Then they used water power to make electricity.

This brought about what was called the industrial revolution. Machines, it was found, could knit yarns and make it unnecessary for thousands of women and children to work in the knitting mills. Machines could do more in less time and work became easier.

People were frightened then, too, because they thought the machine would do them out of jobs. Some of them went so far as to smash the machinery, thinking it was a job thief. But the machines did not make unemployment. They created new employment. Thousands of people had new jobs at higher pay, making the machines. Working conditions were improved. The things the machines made cost less to produce, so more people could buy them. And as more people bought them there were new jobs in the mills and new jobs making the machines, delivering and selling the goods they produced. Everybody was better off than they had ever been before.

During this century we have seen even greater advances in mechanization. Nobody would want to go back to the days of hand work, when everybody worked long hours for poor pay and were unable even to buy the things they produced. How many people could own their own homes today if all our houses were built as they were in the past? In those days, home building could be done only during the summer. Plasterers and bricklayers, masons and roofers worked only six months a year. Everything was done by hand, from the digging of cellars to the laying of shingles.

Then technological improvements began in the building trades. Mehanical shovels dug out excavations in a matter of hours instead of days. Electrical welders went to work. Building materials were fabricated in the factories. Thousands of houses could be built in a season, and year-round employment was provided for those making components.

The same is true, of course, in many industries. The motor car and the television set are possible only because of mechanization. The telephone and the electric refrigerator would be impossible if they had to be made by hand.

All of us accept these modern things, and when we think of it we realize that we could have none of them without machinery. Every year in research departments and in experimental factories new things are made and new ways are devised for making them. All this is simply technological development, new advances in the field of technology. And all this helps to make possible our modern way of life.

Now we come back to that new word, automation. It is really just a further step in technological advancement. Certainly it goes far beyond what our forefathers thought could ever happen in our industrial world. The first machines required many men to operate them. Under automation there will be many machines which do all the things the human operators used to do. New machines will work automatically.

The simplest illustration is the automatic gear shift on a new car. It has always been necessary for the driver of a car to change gears when he wanted to stop and start, drive through mud or snow, or speed up or slow down. Now an automatic gear shift does all that for him. The car knows when to change gears and does it all by itself. So we have automation.

In a factory automation will work the same way. At a certain time of day the automatic machinery will start a press or a weaving machine going; it will watch to make sure the machine is operating efficiently, and it will stop the machine when a certain amount of production has been achieved. It will also do such things as test the product from time to time and make sure that nothing is wrong.

So it will not be necessary to have an operator standing guard all the time to keep the machine running. This is what is called a push-button operation; you push a button and the machine does the rest.

What will be the next result of automation? In the first place it will release a number of people from humdrum jobs and enable them to take work with more opportunity. It will do away with the need for common labour and make more jobs for skilled workers. In short it will upgrade our workers, giving them better employment, better working conditions and better pay. At the same time it will reduce our production costs and enable more people to buy the things they want.

Instead of being afraid of automation we should welcome it. It is another step along the road to a more abundant life for everyone. Automation, the word of the future, holds out great promise to us all today. It is part of the brave new world in which we live, and is something our children will accept as one of our great contributions to their happiness.

So much for automation. Another term which is so often misunderstood is the word enterprise. Many people have misinterpreted this word, many fear it and many praise it. In the first place, let us admit that there is no such thing in this world as free enterprise, if by free we mean enterprise that is completely beyond any control. In fact none of us would want such a thing. If there were perfectly free enterprise there would be no government, no laws, no control. There would just be chaos. So I think all of us agree that we have enterprise, but it is subject to many laws and conditions which make it acceptable to society.

No individual or company is allowed to carry on an enterprise which is harmful to society. We do not permit the selling of dope or narcotics except under strict medical and governmental supervision. We have imposed certain restrictions on the selling of comic books. We do not permit people to publish libelous statements. In all these respects enterprise is not free.

At the same time I think it is also a mistake to refer to private enterprise. Certainly there are some enterprises that are private, that are carried on by one man or by very few men, but most of our great enterprises in the country are public enterprises in the sense that they are made possible by joint ownership of a great many people. The telephone company, for instance, is owned by hundreds of thousands of shareholders. Every big manufacturing company has many, many shareholders, and so do all our great corporations.

In law we make a distinction between private and public companies. A private company is restricted to a certain number of shareholders, usually less than 50. A public company sells its stock on the market and may have many, many owners. So it is correct to say that our enterprise in Canada is very seldom private. It is usually the result of participation by the public.

We in Canada have been fortunate in devising a method by which enterprise can thrive. We admit the responsibility of the government in certain fields, but in the bulk of our national activities we rely upon the enterprise of those Canadians who seek to build and create and serve their fellows at a profit. We all believe in one form or another of the profit system.

The man who works for wages sells his time and his labour at a profit. He seeks enough for his efforts to enable him to buy the things he wants and do the things he likes to do. He realizes, also, that those who pay him must be able to realize a profit on his services or they will soon be out of business and he will be out of a job. The need for a profit goes all along the line. Our whole economy is based upon the desire and ability of each of us to profit by his own endeavours.

And because this system exists we enjoy the second highest standard of living in the world and are one of the great development countries of the world.

Since the last war Canada has seen the investment of millions of dollars and the employment of hundreds of thousands of people. We are growing, and we are growing quickly, because not only do we have the resources here to develop but we have the right economic and political climate in which to develop them. Nobody wishes to invest his time or his money in something of which he can be deprived without warning. No one wishes to live in a country where his political freedom is constantly in danger.

In Canada neither of these conditions exists. We on this side of the house recognize the need for supervision and control. We realize that in essence all the resources of Canada belong to the people of Canada, and that these people must not be exploited. But we realize also that our resources are of no value unless they are developed, and that in order to develop them we must encourage enterprise and allow it to be rewarded by a profit.

Enterprise in this country recognizes its responsibility to the people. It seeks to provide employment for Canadians and to encourage them to develop their skills and increase their earnings. It endeavours to provide goods and services at reasonable prices, and it maintains strong competition in order to give the public an opportunity to pick and choose. We have on our markets many cars in many models, our banks compete strenuously for customers, and in men's and women's wear we stock our counters with a great variety of styles and colours.

There was a time when some people thought this enterprise system was wasteful. They thought it would be preferable to have only one company and one product in a line; then, they thought, costs would be lower and prices would be cheaper. Now, however, we know that competition leads to lower cost production methods, competition creates new markets, competition lowers prices. That is the fruit of enterprise. More goods of better quality at lower prices all come from our system of letting men freely and honestly seek to improve their products or their services. It has brought us unparalleled prosperity. It has provided work and opportunity for most of our citizens.

Because we are enterprising people, and because we believe in true enterprise that seeks to serve rather than exploit, we in Canada are envied by people in other parts of the globe. Many thousands of people have come here to live with us, and many more thousands will follow. Some of them come from countries where true enterprise has never existed, or where it has been stamped out by false theorists. Those who have lived where there is no enterprise know what it is to live without freedom. Under our blue skies, in this great expanse of territory, they will find rewards for hard work, for skill, for ingenuity, for perseverance and for courage. This is not an easy land in which to live. It is not a land for weaklings or for people who place security above all else.

Canada has been built upon struggle. We have had to fight against nature. We have been forced to work hard because we are next door to a rich and powerful neighbour. But we have established certain values that have paid us well. We have rich soil waiting to be worked. We have great mineral deposits waiting to be brought out of the rock. We have vast forests and fisheries waiting to be developed. There is room here for men and women with enterprise. They can and will make this country one of the most favoured lands on earth.

Now may I take just a few minutes to talk about the common-sense aspects of economics. Let us look at the situation on this continent and in the world today as it affects us as plain, ordinary, everyday citizens. In Canada today we are enjoying another spurt in what is the greatest boom in history. Everybody and his uncle today are buying motor cars. Almost every home you visit has a television set. Everywhere you look there are new homes under construction, and the furniture companies are just waiting to sell the new owners the furniture to go in them. All this means jobs, higher pay, more vacations and more spending, until it all goes round just like a circle.

The danger is, of course, that in our mad rush to buy new things we may forget some of the other values of life. When you are busy making the payments on a car it is sometimes hard to remember that nobody is calling on the family next door because they happen to belong to another race, have a different religion or speak a different language. Yet surely good neighbourliness is just as important as driving a motor car. Or is it? That is one of the things we should take time to think about, even if it means turning off the radio or the television set.

James Farley, the United States politician, recently pointed out that the United States, with all its prosperity, is losing some of its spiritual wealth. Like everybody else Farley enjoys the good things of life, but he thinks one of the good things is good behaviour based upon faith and a sense of spiritual values. Perhaps we should all take time out to consider whether or not we are becoming so obsessed with material things that we are forgetting the basic values of our civilization. It sometimes seems strange today to suggest that man cannot live by bread alone. Some cynics laugh and say "No, he needs cake as well". But the truth is that it is spiritual food we need to supplement our bread, not richer material food.

I am not one of those who believe that the world is going to the dogs just because we all have more money to spend and more leisure time in which to spend it. No one, I think, would want to go back to the days of the hungry thirties when a man did not know where his next job was coming from. Prices are high today, but we have the money to pay them. Prices were low back in 1935, but very few people could afford to buy what they needed. The good old days sound wonderful to the old-timers, and sometimes we can even convince the younger generation that it was fun to live in the horse and carriage age, but the truth is that we all have a chance to live better lives today than our parents or our grandparents did 50 or 75 years ago.

Nobody has all the answers. But we can all seek some of them on our own. A United States magazine recently suggested that juvenile delinquency today is a result of our lack of discipline. We try to understand children instead of training them to do right. That is one editor's answer. James Farley says we should pay more attention to spiritual values, and no matter what church we go to or what faith we hold we should seek better understanding there.

Labour unions demand higher wages. Employers say if wages go up prices must rise, too. Consumers, and that includes both labour and employers, sit in the middle, caught either way. To the amateur in economics it is all very confusing. But sometimes the amateurs are smarter than the professionals. Why not have a discussion group in your own families and invite the neighbours in as well to discuss everyday problems? See what you think about these problems and reach your own conclusions. Are we too material? Think it over. You probably have the right answer yourself.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be of congratulation to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I might say, however, that I am not going to lay it on too thick, because I think there is a saturation point beyond which one must not go since there is always a danger of spoiling people by praising them too much.

Tonight I want to talk about the people in my constituency and the conditions in which they find themselves. I am going to make some criticisms but I am also going to offer some suggestions which, if followed, I think would benefit the people I represent. I travelled in my constituency during the recess and logged some 10,000 miles. I talked to a great number of people about their problems, and I think I know something about them. One of the last of my constituents whom I saw before coming to Ottawa was a man I met on the streets of Saskatoon. He said to me, "I hope you people down there will be able to do something to alleviate the conditions that we are experiencing at the present time." Tonight it is my purpose to try to do just that. I want to try to do something that will help the people whom I represent.

First of all may I say that I deplore the fact that some of the members in this chamber and at least one of the cabinet ministers have played down the real situation existing in the wheat-growing areas of western Canada. I have lived in that country for over 50 years. I homesteaded there and went through all the pioneering stages. Never since the hungry thirties, and not even then, have I seen a greater scarcity of money. The situation then was not much worse than it is at the present time. The whole plea of the population in that whole area is this: Try to get some money in the pockets of the farmers.

During this debate most of the talk has been centred around the farmers' need for cash and certainly their need is great, because their costs of operation have been going up steadily and their income has been going down rapidly. Not only have farmers come to me; never before have so many businessmen come to see me to ask if something could not be done to get money into the hands of the farmers.

The farmers are in this position. Last year they had a small crop of extremely poor quality, and they received little money for it. The result was that many of the merchants in the smaller towns advanced credit.

Those merchants are obliged to pay cash for the things which they sell on credit. Many of these merchants are in the position of not being able to meet their commitments and of not knowing how long they are going to be able to carry on. They are almost in a worse position than are the farmers because they have rent to pay, help to pay and so forth and so on. I therefore deprecate the fact that at least one cabinet minister has played down the situation there.

I may also say that I attended many meetings of farmers. Those meetings were attended not only by farmers but by businessmen, heads of boards of trade and so on. They all asked for one thing, namely that the government should make an advance payment to farmers for grain stored on the farm. I am not going to spend any time belabouring that point, because the government and this house has decided that that is not going to be done. But as I said before, I deplore the fact that at least one minister of the crown has played down the real situation that exists in that country.

I read now an extract from the Globe and Mail of January 24 reporting what happened when the Minister of Agriculture was speaking in the city of Winnipeg. According to the extract this is what he said:

> Agriculture Minister Gardiner said today that farmers are not as hard up "as some people would try to have us believe."

I think the minister is playing down the actual situation. I am going to say this. If there were an election tomorrow, neither the Minister of Agriculture nor any other Liberal would be back here from Saskatchewan. I have never seen the people as angry as they are now over the lack of action on the part of this government in the present situation. They are angry at the government and I am quite sure they are going to be angry at some of their own members—that is the Liberal members from the western provinces —for not standing up in this house and at least making an attempt to get a better deal for their people.

I was quite interested in some items that have appeared in the press, particularly one editorial that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press. Everybody knows that the Winnipeg Free Press has been a supporter of this government. It is known as a Liberal newspaper. This is what they have to say about the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). This editorial is dated January 23, 1956 and reads as follows:

> The constituency of Rosthern in Saskatchewan should consider itself well served. It has two House of Commons members. Official lists, it is true, show only Mr. Walter Tucker as the member. But lists are poor things. They cannot show that there is a western Mr. Tucker and there is also an eastern Mr. Tucker, quite distinct.

On the afternoon of October 17 the executive of the Liberal association met, 50 strong, in Rosthern. That evening the western Mr. Tucker wired Prime Minister St. Laurent and Trade Minister Howe and, on behalf of the meeting, pressed for cash advances on farm stored grain.

But the air of Ottawa has caused a strange metamorphosis; and on January 17 the eastern Tucker rose in the House of Commons and repudiated the western Tucker. The eastern Tucker was not only against cash advances on farm stored grain. More than that: he charged that the C.C.F. party, by its advocacy of cash advances on such grains, was attempting to wreck the Canadian wheat board.

The implications of the eastern Tucker's charges are obvious; they charge the western Tucker with attempting to wreck the Canadian wheat board; for the western Tucker also advocated these cash advances.

The eastern Tucker was, of course, simply parroting Mr. Howe. But he seems to be stepping beyond the line of duty, or even the requirements of expediency, when he carries Mr. Howe's theory of guilt by association even farther than Mr. Howe did. It may be tempting to a Saskatchewan politician to feel that anything is good enough to throw at the C.C.F. But it is, apart from anything else, poor politics.

The charge that the C.C.F. is against the wheat board simply will not stick. And while Mr. Howe was wise enough to refrain from so direct an attack on the C.C.F., he was also kind enough to refrain from listing the Liberal Association of Rosthern, and the western Tucker as its spokesman, among the enemies of the wheat board. It really was rather cruel of the eastern Tucker to step in and do it himself.

That statement was printed prior to a report that was made by Mr. Arthur Blakely of the Montreal Gazette on January 20, with respect to a meeting that was held by the Liberal party the evening before. This report reads as follows:

> The big Liberal party dinner honouring trade minister C. D. Howe and agriculture minister James G. Gardiner on the completion of 20 years of continuous service in the federal cabinet, turned out to be quite an affair. As a matter of fact, it still has the Liberal back benches buzzing.

I am going to leave out part of this statement and start in again where it is headed "Leadership Assured". Leadership was what they had been discussing.

> The matter of leadership out of the way, the two honoured right honourables selected another text. At all costs, they advised Liberal backbenchers, toe the party line.
> Mr. Howe was emphatic on this point. Ruggedly individualistic courses of action, by individual Liberals, could bring on trouble. And plenty of it. And in that way the existing Liberal majority—however large it might appear—could be wiped out.
> Superb leadership had long been a Liberal asset. And when the Prime Minister had decided on a given course of action, that should be accepted as the proper policy by all true Liberals, whether they agreed with it or not. Decisions by the leadership were taken only with the greatest of care. And they could be disregarded only at the cost of inviting political disaster.
> "We must pay a good deal of attention to the party line," Mr. Howe warned. "If the party is wrong, you are going to be defeated anyway. We stand or fall together."

Once this party line was laid down "I don't care whether you are a member of the House of Commons or the Senate, that line should be adhered to."

Later, in another section headed "Party Loyalty", we find this:

Mr. Gardiner, who has had his wayward moments on such issues as the $65 million payment to the wheat farmers and the south Saskatchewan dam project, added his plea.

"When the majority of the Liberal party agrees that a thing should be done, I'm going to work to see that it is done."

And he submitted, for consideration of the faithful, something in the way of an object lesson.

Years ago, when Mackenzie King had been prime minister the government accepted a decision which he had strongly opposed. In the commons, when the matter came under debate, Mr. King asked him to speak in support of the measure.

He did so. And with such effect that as he was leaving the house, a colleague stopped him offered his congratulations and said with admiration, what would you have sounded like had you really believed in what you were saying?

I take it from that, Mr. Speaker, that whenever the Minister of Agriculture speaks now we will not know whether or not he believes in what he is saying.

Last fall I attended a meeting of farmers. At the end of the meeting a farmer asked me this question. Is it true that there is a great deal of empty elevator space in the city of Saskatoon? He said he was talking to a man who worked there and he told him there was a lot of space in the elevator. My answer was that I could not conceive that there would be any elevator space in any terminal elevator in Canada at this time, because I thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce was too good a businessman to allow space to be empty when it was needed so badly, and when the farmers needed the money so badly.

I did not think very much more about my answer to that question until some time in November, when I picked up a copy of the Edmonton Journal in which there was a report of a meeting attended by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the city of Edmonton. I do not remember the exact figures, but the report was to the effect that there was a considerable amount of storage space available both at Vancouver and at the lakehead. On January 20, 1956, I asked this question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as reported at page 347 of Hansard:

Would the minister present the latest figures concerning the amount of empty space now available in terminal elevators?

I might say that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had stated in the course of his address that there was space available in the elevators for something like 100 million bushels. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) interjected at that time and said, "No, the amount would not be much over half of that". When I got the answer to the question I found that the interior elevators had space available for 700,000 bushels of wheat; the Pacific coast terminals at Vancouver and New Westminster had space for 8,200,000 bushels; Victoria, 400,000 bushels; Prince Rupert 700,000 bushels; and Churchill 600,000 bushels.

I am not going to say anything about the eastern terminals because the minister pointed out that as the lakes were frozen we could expect to have quite a lot of space available there. I find, however, that the space available in western elevators amounted to 44,700,000 bushels. Well, there is something wrong there. There must be a nigger in the woodpile somewhere. Who is responsible? I have always believed that the responsibility lay with the transport controller. In the debate a few days ago we were given to understand that the railroads were making the adjustments and saying where the railroad cars were going to go. This is a serious situation.

I shall refer to only the effective amount of storage, because as the minister said the other day they want to keep 10 per cent of the space available in case a certain amount of the grain has to be dried or something like that. The effective storage space available now is 44,700,000 bushels. One of the suggestions I am going to make is this. We should get the transport controller to work. We should make that name plate on his door worth something. We should see that cars are made available so this space in the terminal elevators could be filled. I believe the transport controller should be given orders to get this done and get it done quickly. If it were done, and done rapidly, we could then distribute to the farmers $53,640,000—without any cost to the government and without making any loans. I am going to prophesy right here that this is a far greater amount of money than will be borrowed by the farmers under the loan scheme.

I want an answer to these questions, and I hope some minister will give that answer. The Minister of Agriculture has not spoken as yet. I am sure the farmers of this country and the members of this parliament will want to know why this space has not been filled. Have the railroads been going on their own without any direction? Is it because the Crowsnest rates are low? Speaking in Montreal a few days ago the presidents of both railways objected to the Crowsnest pass rates. They claimed that those rates were only one-third of the rates they were getting on some other products. Are the railways passing up the hauling of wheat because they can make more money on other products? If that is the case it is time the controller stepped in and saw to it that the farmers in western Canada got their fair share of box cars.

Are we short of box cars? The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce said some new box cars were going to be made available soon. We have had this trouble in other years, and the transport controller was appointed to do just what he should have been doing during these past months. We had trouble when the lake boats were hauling iron ore and passing up the hauling of wheat. If the government sees to it that the transport controller goes to work and makes cars available to fill this space, then this $50 or $60 million can be paid to the farmers as soon as that grain is delivered. It is a pity it could not have been done before, because the farmers in western Canada are running up against another problem, something that is new.

Our crises follow each other in succession year after year. We have never experienced this crisis before, though I remember one winter in 1906-07 when we had a tremendous amount of snow. Today the roads in western Canada are blocked with snow. There is so much snow it is almost impossible to clear it. I have been getting letters and I have been reading in the papers about farmers trying to get into town by means of teams of horses. They have not many horses, and the horses they have cannot work because they have not done any work for two or three years. It is going to be almost impossible for many farmers to deliver much grain, even if box cars are made available, unless the government accepts the suggestion I am now going to make.

About the only farmers who are going to be able to deliver grain are those living on built-up highways which are snowplowed. The back concession roads cannot be opened and probably will not be opened until May. I suggest that the farmers who live in the back concessions be allowed to exchange wheat with the farmers who live on the built-up roads, so the farmers in the back concessions can get some money out of the little quota that is to be made available, I do not know when.

My other suggestion is this. To put a little more money in the pockets of the farmers, enough to keep them going, the government should make an interim payment on the 1954-55 crop, and make it soon. These are my suggestions.

[Mr. Campbell.]

I now wish to say something about the wheat surplus. Since a lot has been said about this surplus I am not going to repeat what has been said up to now, but my attention has been drawn to an editorial that appeared in the Western Producer of December 1, 1955. It is a long editorial, and of course I cannot put it all on Hansard. It deals with FAO and what FAO was set up for. The Minister of Agriculture should tell this house why FAO has failed and why something has not been done along the lines of the great plans that the people who set up FAO had for the handling of surpluses.

As I said, I am not going to read the whole editorial because it is too long, but I am going to read a short extract from what President Eisenhower had to say about surpluses a year after he took office. The editorial reads:

> Here is President Eisenhower speaking after a year in office and declaring a new kind of total war:
> ". . . total war, not upon any human enemy, but upon the brute forces of poverty and need. The peace we seek, founded upon decent trust and co-operative effort amongst nations, can be fortified—not by weapons of war, but by wheat and cotton, by milk and wool, by meat, by timber and by rice. These are words that translate into every language of the globe."
> What an exhilarating prospect but what a bleak realization with Mr. Benson today wringing his hands over unsaleable surpluses and calling for sharp cuts in production!
> More recently there was Sir Anthony Eden to this effect:
> "We all know what unparalleled resources the scientific and technical advances of the age have placed within our reach. We have only to stretch out our hand and the human race can enter an era of prosperity, such as has never been seen."
> The other day the foreign office called Bulganin hypocritical. What would be the appropriate term for Sir Anthony who dares talk about "only stretching out the hand" well aware that "the hungry sheep look up and are not fed."
> One could quote interminably in this vein from the great and near-great of the world, but we must content ourselves with only another from Lord Boyd-Orr, first FAO chairman. A few months ago he complained of international conferences "talking about isms instead of about food and food production where they would know what they were talking about." In the same speech he said:
> "In a world where two-thirds of the people are hungry, there is no world food surplus. If the plans which FAO put forward in 1946 had been carried through, there would have been a big world reserve of food, with a big fund behind it, and in the countries where there was a surplus, that would have been bought and the farmers would have got the money and the food would have been sold to the countries that were hungry."

I come to another matter I wish to discuss, namely air mail service to the town of Lloydminster in Saskatchewan. When the former minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, introduced this legislation he made a definite commitment to this house. He was talking about the increase in the postal rates on first-class mail. He said:

> When the new rates come into effect all first-class mail will be carried by air if air carriage will speed up delivery. Canada already has the most advanced air mail service of any country in the world and this service will be further improved.

This quotation may be found in Hansard of Tuesday, December 8, 1953, at page 691.

The chamber of commerce of the town of Lloydminster, the board of trade of North Battleford, and the provincial board of trade have all passed resolutions and have all written the government and the Post Office Department asking that this mail service be made available to the people in that community. The town of Lloydminster is situated on the border between the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. It was first settled by the Barr colony. It is also the centre of the first oil development in Saskatchewan.

I have not time to go into all the resolutions that were passed by these different organizations. I ask the government and the Postmaster General to see to it that the commitment that was made by Mr. Abbott when he was minister of finance is carried out, and that the benefits which can be derived by the carriage of mail by air be extended to that district.

There is another matter I might have brought up when I was discussing the wheat problem, namely inland storage. The board of trade of North Battleford and many farmers' organizations in that area have been requesting the government for years to do something about an interior elevator at that point. They have sent in resolution after resolution. I saw the Minister of Trade and Commerce about this matter several years ago. We think the time has now come when the Minister of Trade and Commerce should take a different look at this situation. Because the city of North Battleford is centrally located, wheat can be shipped to the port of Churchill in Hudson bay; it can be shipped to the west coast, or to the great lakes. I urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce to take another look at the suggestion and see if it would be possible to give us inland storage, which is needed so badly at that point.

I am going to make another suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture. I see he is just leaving the house. Perhaps he will sit down for a few minutes, because I will not take up very much more time.

Mr. Gardiner: I am glad the hon. member thinks it is still necessary for me to be here.

Mr. Campbell: We have heard a lot about diversification. At this time many of our farmers are wondering what would be the best course to take and where they can diversify their farm production. The Minister of Agriculture and his department should give more leadership than they are giving along those lines. I know of certain farmers who grew a considerable amount of rape last year. How many more acres of land can be put into rape? How many more cattle can be produced? How many hogs should we produce next year? How much land should be put down to grass, and so on and so forth?

I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his department should give a lead. I heard Professor Ramsay speaking in Saskatoon a few days before I came here. He urged that the farmers go in for more cattle. He pointed out that in the past we had shipped more than 400,000 head of cattle to the United States in one year. The minister and his department are in a better position than anyone else to give leadership as to how much diversification there should be and what changes should be made. I would ask that he endeavour to do something between now and the spring, and that he give an indication to the farmers concerning the possibility of changing to other products, how much they might produce and how much they could expect to market in the future.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, may I have the pleasure of joining with those who have preceded me in extending congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. May I also say I believe they have honourably discharged their responsibility, which in itself was an honour to them and to their constituencies.

Last session when I spoke in this debate I gave a description of the riding of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, which is the riding I have the honour to represent. I do not propose to repeat that now, but there is one point I should like to mention. The industrial town of Corner Brook is situated at the mouth of the Humber river, at the bottom of Humber arm, 30 miles inland from the sea along the south shore of bay of Islands. In 1923 the settlement of Corner Brook consisted of just a few families who depended for their prosperity on the operation of a small lumbering industry. In that year the government of the day decided to build a paper mill on this site. Since that time it has grown to become the largest integrated pulp and paper mill in the world. It has a daily production of over 1,200 tons and at peak periods employs 10,000 people in the plant and the wood areas. Just to the east of Corner Brook is an area known as Corner Brook East, which is perhaps more familiarly known by Newfoundlanders as Humbermouth. This area for many years depended for its prosperity on the fact that it was a terminal for the Newfoundland railway. It still is a railway terminal for the C.N.R.

Just to the west of Corner Brook is an area known as Corner Brook West which grew up because of the operation of the paper mill there. Still further west is an area known as Curling, a very old and well established settlement. Heretofore these four townships were governed by separate town councils. Last spring a plebiscite was held and the people of the four areas voted to amalgamate and form one unit. In August of last year an election was held and a mayor and eight councillors were elected. On January 1 of this year, just about three weeks ago, these four townships were officially incorporated into the new city of Corner Brook, which is the second largest city in Newfoundland and the twenty-eighth in Canada.

The year 1955 was a prosperous year for Newfoundland. In fact I think I am able to say that it was the most prosperous year in the entire history of Newfoundland. In those industries which brought prosperity to Newfoundland there was one exception, the fishing industry. The total landings of ground fish in 1955 amounted to 545 million pounds, with a value of $13·2 million. This was a decrease of 62·4 million pounds or $1·5 million from the year 1954. The herring industry, which is particularly important in my area, also experienced a decrease in 1955. This decrease amounted to approximately 2 million pounds compared to the catch of 1954. On the other hand the lobster industry, which is also extremely important in my area, had an excellent year; 5·3 million pounds for the whole of Newfoundland were landed, with a value of $1·4 million. It is interesting to note here that since the year 1930 the lobster industry in Newfoundland has shown a continuous increase year after year. The year 1955 produced the highest catch of all the years since 1930. This increase has not been due solely to an increased number of fishermen engaged in that branch of the fishing industry, but is also due to the fact that regulations governing the lobster fishing industry were rigidly enforced, and it is also due to the co-operation of the fishermen themselves.

We all recognize that the provincial government in Newfoundland and the fishing industry itself are giving very serious consideration to what should be done to improve the status of those men who are engaged in that industry, but while I say that fishing is generally a provincial matter there is also a national aspect to that industry. In that respect I believe the federal government can do much to help in the work that is going on in Newfoundland to improve the lot of the fishermen, and I should like to make three suggestions.

I would suggest first—and this relates to my own riding in particular—that the federal Department of Fisheries make a complete survey of the fishing potential on the west coast of Newfoundland so the different types of fish, the quantity of fish and where the different types can be found will be known by those people who might be inclined to invest money in the fishing industry. In that way the government would be giving some guidance to those people who might invest money in the industry as is done, for example, for those who might invest money in mining.

Second, I would urge the Department of Fisheries to establish more bait depots along the coast, particularly in my own riding. We need bait depots for the operation of the industry. Some people ask why there is so much talk at this time about bait depots in Newfoundland when years ago the fishing industry was operating without the use of bait depots.

The answer, of course, is very simple. In the first place, in Newfoundland we do not now get the same adequate supplies of bait at the right time of year and in the right place that we used to get years ago. Second, if we are going to improve the lot of the fishermen it is necessary that they go to work earlier in the year and that they remain at their task until later in the year. In Newfoundland we are not able to secure sufficient fresh bait early in the year, nor are we able to secure sufficient fresh bait later on in the year to keep our men working long enough to increase their production sufficiently to give them a good return for their work. In the lobster industry in particular if fresh bait is not available at the time the lobster fishing begins, then the lobster fishermen are seriously handicapped.

The establishment of bait depots would be of vast assistance to them. In my area there is but one bait depot, at Port aux Choix, which was built three or four years ago. If the federal Department of Fisheries intended this to be an experiment I can assure the department that it has been highly successful; and in the light of what has been done in that area and from my own experience I know that the catch in that area has been more than doubled because of that bait depot. I suggest that bait depots be built at strategic points along this coast, and I would suggest such points as Lark Harbour, Bonne Bay, Cow Head and Reefs Harbour.

My third suggestion does not apply to my own riding or province alone but to all parts of Canada where the fishing industry is prosecuted. I refer to unemployment insurance for fishermen. I believe that if unemployment insurance were extended to the fishermen of Canada it would do much to encourage them to carry on in the industry in which they make their living. Last year when the unemployment insurance commission presented its report to the committee we all noticed that it was a negative report. Maybe there were some who felt that a more positive approach would have been more acceptable, but on reflection I am not too sure that a negative approach is wrong. At least it does point out the obstacles which have to be overcome if we are to have fishermen included among those who are considered to be insurable.

These are the three suggestions I would make; first, a full-fledged survey of the fishing potential of the west coast of Newfoundland; second, the establishment of more bait depots, and third, the inclusion of fishermen in the unemployment insurance scheme.

I turn now to the problem of transportation in Newfoundland, and may I say that this has always been a big problem for us in the island province. For many years the only method of trans-insular transportation was by the Newfoundland railway. Although this railroad is of narrow gauge it has given real service to our island since the project was first discussed in 1847 and brought to practical reality by the railway bill of 1881. There has been a steady improvement in the services and facilities since the first cross-country train left St. John's on July 24, 1898. We can trace its growth from the days when it was known as the Reid Newfoundland railway to the time it was operated as a state concern giving yeoman service during world war II, until finally it became a part of the Canadian National Railways in 1949.

Since confederation there has been a tremendous increase in the amount of traffic with which the Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland has had to cope. In 1955 carloadings were up 13 per cent over 1954. From 1949 to 1954 freight coming into Newfoundland from Nova Scotia was up 65 per cent; in the same period local freight was up 28 per cent; passenger traffic had increased by 17 per cent; express by 50 per cent, and the mail traffic had doubled.

A real effort has been made by the C.N.R. to cope with the problem of increasing traffic. The completion of the dieselization of the Newfoundland district, together with the increase in rolling stock, will do much to increase efficiency on the C.N.R. in Newfoundland. In addition I would suggest that the plans for the immediate future include the improvement of terminal facilities at Deer Lake, Corner Brook and the Stephenville area so as to provide a service more compatible with the growing needs of these expanding communities.

I recognize that a proportion of C.N.R. operations in Newfoundland have to do with the coastal steamship service. The problem here has been accentuated by a serious decrease in the number of vessels engaged in the local trade. If I may digress here for a moment I should like to support my colleague, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter), in the plea he made here the other evening for an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act so the annual inspection regulations which now apply to all vessels over 150 tons will apply only to vessels over 250 tons. Coming back again to the C.N.R., I believe that some of the problems with which they are now faced will be solved at least in part when the two new ships now under construction in the United Kingdom are put into service.

During the recess as I went around my riding I was happy to hear from time to time of the good work being done by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. May I as a backbencher commend them for the stature which they have given to Canada in the councils of the world. They have discharged their responsibilities with credit to Canada and distinction to themselves.

I think it is true that we live in a world fraught with danger. I remember that a few years ago, before the atomic bomb became a reality, in certain circles there was some doubt as to what would happen if the atom were ever split. Some wondered if there would not be a chain reaction which would destroy the whole universe. Today we know that such a result is improbable, but I do not think that in the world in which we live today we are entirely out of the woods. The presence of the atomic and hydrogen bombs may, under certain conditions, initiate within the minds of men a chain reaction which may produce exactly the same effect.

I was pleased to note that in the speech from the throne mention was made of Canada's continued and further participation in the Colombo plan. In the awakening of nationalism in the countries of Asia there must of necessity be the growth of a desire on the part of the peoples concerned to improve their standards of living and take their places among the peoples of the world. The decision on the part of western countries to help them achieve that aim will have a real impact upon these countries, and we sincerely hope will be a stroke for the advancement of world peace.

During wartime the democratic nations of the world spent billions of dollars to ensure that man might swim through the sea like a fish. The democratic nations spent billions to ensure that man would fly through the air like a bird, and I think it is a great thing in peacetime that the free nations of the world can afford to spend a little in an attempt to ensure that free men will walk the earth as men.

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in the throne speech debate, but when I returned to Toronto this week end I received many messages, telephone calls and letters asking that I raise my voice in parliament on behalf of what could only be described as an aroused citizenry. The number of sex crimes which are taking place in and around Toronto and throughout the country have alarmed people right across the country. I know the Minister of Justice must feel sympathetic and appreciate the fear that parents have, and I know that all hon. members of this house must feel horror and revulsion on reading of these crimes which are increasing week by week.

Mr. Speaker, through you I do beseech the Minister of Justice to give leadership in this matter. As things stand now the people, and I am speaking particularly of Toronto, are far ahead of the government in their concern and fear, and in their determination that something must be done immediately. On Monday afternoon in Toronto a 13-year old girl, the victim of a sex maniac, was buried. A little more than a week ago in London a five-year old child, the victim of a sex maniac, was buried. In Hamilton eight women have been assaulted in as many weeks. After each of these crimes we read in the newspapers that the police have rounded up 300 or 400 known sex degenerates for questioning. Surely our laws are wrong, Mr. Speaker, when they allow 300 to 400 known suspects to roam the streets. Surely our laws are wrong when innocent little girls are the prey of these known maniacs.

We have been warned by medical men and psychiatrists that sex offenders are not responsible. You punish them but they strike again and again. Our magistrates and our judges are not doctors or psychiatrists, and in our courts minor offenders of this nature are not recognized when they first appear in court. The result is that such afflicted people are not sent for the necessary treatment at a time when future crimes might be prevented. The permanent solution of this problem, it seems to me, rests with the government and the government alone. There must be a revision of our Criminal Code to provide for the holding of offenders or even suspects indefinitely, whether they be held in prison for crimes they have committed or whether they be held for psychiatric treatment.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would not attempt to misrepresent the law that she helped to pass. There is provision in the code at the present time to hold them indefinitely, and all that is required is that action be taken by the law enforcement authorities in the various provincial centres to that end.

Miss Aitken: Again I say that the law is not being enforced.

Mrs. Shipley: That is provincial.

Miss Aitken: From the large number of people who have appealed to me, both as a member of the house and as a journalist, I know the public feel that the law is not being enforced. What can be done about it I do not know, but these people blame the government for the situation.

Mr. Garson: Certainly we cannot enforce it. It is not our responsibility.

An hon. Member: Well, take some responsibility and do something about it.

Miss Aitken: In St. Catharines the other day a man committed an offence against two little girls and was taken to court. He pleaded guilty, but he claimed that he was drunk when he committed the offence. Press reports said that he was extremely embarrassed and contrite, but to be embarrassed and contrite was no comfort to the parents of those little girls or to the little girls themselves. However, it seemed to be some comfort to the judge, because he gave the man a suspended sentence of two years. If the man had stolen a motor rug from a parked car he would have received a greater sentence. I claim that the magistrate in giving that sentence was simply adding another young man to the 300 or 400 known persons suspected of sex deviation; yet the man's only defence was that he was drunk at the time.

Is it any wonder that citizens are aroused? Under the Criminal Code the maximum penalty for rape is life imprisonment. Yet last September here in Ottawa a man who had committed rape was given 10 years. Under our Criminal Code indecent assault calls for a maximum penalty of five years. Yet in Toronto within the past few months a youth of 19 assaulted a nine-year-old girl and was given nine months.

I know that a royal commission under Chief Justice McRuer is engaged at the present time in studying aspects of this terrible problem and, as I understand it, the report is to be forthcoming within the next few months. But, Mr. Speaker—and again I am speaking not only for my own constituents but for many thousands of parents in Toronto—we cannot wait for that academic and careful study while these murders are taking place.

In Toronto an organization was formed some time ago called the parents' action league. Its purpose is not to study the problem but to take action, to go on the offensive against this scourge of our society. Like all modern societies it is becoming known by its initials and is referred to as PAL. The parents' action league is urging that magistrates send sex offenders or even suspects to hospitals for psychiatric study. The provincial government of Ontario is trying to co-operate within the confines of its authority. Offenders are to be segregated at Guelph reformatory and an extension of psychiatric facilities is to be carried out in all Ontario hospitals.

The parents' action league now represents about 70 organizations. Indeed, I think you can say it represents three million people in the province of Ontario. But it is not the parents' action league or any other citizens' group that can give leadership in solving this problem. We the people are calling on the Minister of Justice, who tells us that the code is there, to take action. It is the setting up of psychiatric institutions that is needed. It is a cure, a preventative that is needed, and I feel that is the responsibility of the dominion government.

Even before the royal commission finishes its deliberations it is essential to take known sex degenerates out of circulation. At the funeral of little five-year-old Susan Cadieux of London, who was assaulted and murdered, Father O'Rourke had this to say:

> Degenerates like mad dogs are allowed to roam our streets at will.

In the press report of that tragic funeral there was one sentence that caught my eye, and it was this:

> In that assemblage of people the shame and degradation of one man rests on all men.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I do beseech the Minister of Justice to give us the leadership in solving this problem for which people are asking. Throughout our society fear and horror run rampant while we wait for the government to assume its responsibility and take action.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to extend the traditional congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and more particularly to the hon. member for Timiskaming because she is something in the nature of a trail blazer and very possibly the honour accorded to her now may be the augury of greater things to come in the legislative councils of the country.

In this debate many hon. members have complained of the paucity of information contained in the speech from the throne and the legislative program of the government. I think, however, this is probably understandable, because if the government does not intend to submit legislation to parliament but rather intends to deal with matters by the more expeditious method of order in council, why bother announcing legislation in the speech from the throne?

As usually happens in debates of this type, the more interesting points are often raised in speeches from the opposition side of the house. I was particularly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who chose to complain of the influx of United States capital in the development of the resources of this country. I do not happen to share his alarm in this respect, because I believe that capital is essential for the development of the country. If a foreign nation chooses to put its capital into our country, I believe we should welcome it.

Mr. Studer: Saskatchewan goes begging for it.

Mr. Trainor: I also note that in a recent address Mr. Muir, the president of the Royal Bank of Canada, stated that while in the occasional field this type of investment was excessive, on the whole he did not think it was nearly as bad as many people thought it was. I therefore do not think it is a subject that should give us too much concern. As a matter of fact we ought to welcome it, because we want to see our resources developed and we want to see our country grow. It certainly cannot grow without financial resources.

I also noted that the hon. member for Yorkton was greatly concerned about three large soap companies and bemoaned the fact that Canadians were unable to participate in these organizations. For his information I may say that all three companies have their securities listed on the New York stock exchange, and they are available to him by the simple expedient of going down to his bank and placing an order. He can become a partner in any of these organizations and can participate in the enormous profits that he appears to think are available there.

All this stuff is typical of the sniping at private business that is indulged in by the socialists and, I may say, by the Liberal socialists of whom there appear to be more than a few in the present government. This is merely a manifestation of the operation of the free market. There is no greater guarantee of freedom, economic and political, than that which exists through the operation of the free market. When a man buys something on the free market he is, in effect, casting his vote as a citizen in a free economy. True, his vote may be outweighted by other votes, but the sum total of those votes will determine the economic outlook of the people. There does not seem to be any possibility of achieving such economic freedom under any other system. I know that the socialists argue in favour of what I think they call the controlled economy. Is that the expression they use?

Mr. Knowles: The monopolistic system is what we have.

Mr. Trainor: You would substitute the controlled economy. Is not that the expression you use?

Mr. Herridge: Control by the many instead of by the few.

Mr. Trainor: All right. Let us take the controlled economy as an example. How would it work? I submit that it would be impossible to have political freedom under such a system because such a system would mean that the government would operate all business enterprises and all features of the economy. How would it be possible to hold democratic elections under such a system? I think it would be impossible to hold democratic elections. One would be obliged to resort to elections in the Russian style, with one party and one slate of candidates.

It is no accident that the Russians resort to this system. It is simply the result of a controlled economy. You might just as well explode a bomb under the economy as hold an election under those circumstances. You cannot take the directing heads of a business out of their chairs whenever you feel like it without producing a drastic effect on the operation of the business. The holding of an election would simply be taking the directors out of their directing chairs. The socialists and the Liberal socialists are merely trying to bribe the citizens of the country to relinquish their freedom as the price of so-called security. In other words the choice is between liberty and a mess of security pottage.

As a member representing a western constituency I would feel somewhat remiss in my duty if I omitted all reference to wheat. It is not that I know much about wheat, but I hear a good deal about it and about its effect on the economy of western Canada. To my mind there are two separate and distinct problems involved in the wheat situation. The one is immediate. It is the problem of relieving the crisis that exists in the western economy. Judging from the debates here there seems to be only one logical way of achieving this end, namely by putting money in the pockets of the farmers, which money in turn will permeate the whole economy. It seems that the simplest and easiest way of achieving this end is to grant advances on farm-stored grain. The government have introduced substitute measures providing loans at 5 per cent and the payment of storage charges. These provisions seem to be inadequate; at least they are so interpreted by the farmers.

Mr. Gardiner: I thought the hon. member was in favour of private industry?

Mr. Trainor: This is an emergency problem.

Mr. Gardiner: You want the government to get into this.

Mr. Trainor: This is a fire, a conflagration that is burning in the economy. You must do something about it. I say it is an immediate problem. I do not suggest that procedure as a permanent practice because I do not believe that even the western farmer would wish to the supported in perpetuity on the charity of the Canadian taxpayer. A different solution must be found for the long-term problem, but the immediate problem must be met in this way because the situation has gone too far. It is the moral responsibility of this government to do it.

After all, they said in effect to the western farmer, "We will buy your wheat and we will dispose of it. It is definitely illegal for you to dispose of it in any way except through us." If there is not a moral obligation implicit in that statement, I do not know what a moral obligation is. Therefore I say that the immediate obligation is the payment of advances on farm-stored grain. If there is any member from a western rural riding, a grain-growing riding, who wishes to dispute that I would challenge him to appear on the public platform in his constituency and say that he did not believe advances on farm-stored grain was the correct solution, but that the government plan of 5 per cent loans was right. He should take heed, however, of the experience of the Minister of Justice in this regard. He tried it.

Mr. Gardiner: I tried it in my constituency in two or three places.

Mr. Trainor: I do not know what your experience was, but I do know what the experience of the Minister of Justice was. The press reports state that his suggestion was greeted by hoots of derision. If other members chose to do that they would probably receive a similar response.

However, that is only the immediate question. There is the whole question of agricultural marketing which seems to bedevil this country, and has done so for some years. So far as we can see it is probably going to continue to do so. There has to be some constructive solution found for this difficulty. I would make a simple suggestion to the Prime Minister. We have heard a good deal of special pleading and a number of exparte solutions presented here. One does not always like to depend upon amateurs for a solution to this type of problem. I believe this problem demands the best brains we have in the country; therefore I suggest that the Prime Minister set up a royal commission to solve the marketing problems of this country, not only with regard to wheat but for agricultural products as a whole. Possibly such a commission might come forward with a solution. If not, they would at least have amassed all the evidence and there would be a basis for an intelligent discussion of the subject. I offer this solution very humbly as something of which the Prime Minister might take note.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call attention to what I think is an extraordinary departure in the field of diplomatic procedure. I refer to a current periodical, to wit Look, in which appears an article by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) presuming to lecture the United States administration about the deficiencies of their foreign policy. I am not prepared to criticize the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps this is the new diplomacy. If so, I would suggest that he let us have a very good look at it, because to my mind it has implications that go far beyond the simple presentation of a point of view. This procedure would probably be all right if you could hold it to a one-way street, but you cannot very well indulge in such opinion presentation without conceding the other fellow the right to do likewise.

We may have an exchange of diplomatic opinion carried out through the periodical press. I would hesitate to peruse our periodical press if I were to find that Mr. Dulles had been belabouring the conduct of foreign affairs in this country. I do not feel it would be quite proper; it would be an offence against propriety. As a matter of fact this practice is rather insidious, because we do not know where it might end. It could even end up that we might have interference in domestic fields as well as foreign affairs. We might have the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or even the Prime Minister appearing on the hustings in the United States in defence of the Democratic party. I have no doubt they would be very welcome.

On the other hand, we would have to expect the reverse of that. We might be faced with having Dean Acheson, Mr. Truman and others of the Democratic party up here trying to hold the fort for the weakening Liberal party.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Dulles would be on your side.

Mr. Trainor: Oh, no, he is not. As a matter of fact, we might possibly muster some support for our side, and perhaps the socialists could find a few men who would talk for them. However, I would suggest that this seems to be somewhat of an offence against propriety. I do not believe such diplomatic exchange has been recognized before. It may be that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has discovered a new modus operandi, shall we say? Perhaps the whole pattern of diplomatic exchange is going to change. However, I can see implications that are not altogether palatable, and I do not believe they would be palatable to many in the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the gravest situations with which we are faced in this country today is unquestionably our agricultural situation. I do trust that the Prime Minister will take note of all the contributions to this debate, because if he does I cannot see any reason to expect that he will not take constructive action to relieve the situation.

(Translation):

Mr. Arthur Masse (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, may I offer my congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply who, on this occasion, have shown us why their electors have honoured them with their confidence.

The remarks I propose to make will express the feelings shared by my constituents.

I shall first review the developments of the past year, briefly comment on the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne and inform you of the projects dear to the electors of the constituency of Kamouraska. The subject matter of my speech will therefore be as follows: the past, the present and the constituency of Kamouraska, for which I have great admiration, like Mr. Arthur Buies, who wrote such interesting chronicles about that community.

Each session, since I have the privilege of sitting in this house, I have heard nothing but complaints and lamentations from my hon. friends opposite. Yet, we have had a by-election in Quebec, in a riding quite close to mine, and the people of Temiscouata, who are close friends of the citizens of the constituency of Kamouraska, did not hesitate to renew their confidence in the Liberal party.

Mr. Dufresne: They have felt quite disappointed since.

Mr. Masse: If the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) spoke at the time as he did in the house this afternoon, I am not at all surprised with the result.

I went into that constituency not to make promises but to tell the people I am convinced that the Liberal party was doing its best to maintain unity in this country and to ensure the proper balance of our national economy.

As a son of a farming family, whose members have been living for generations on the family farm, I like to keep myself abreast of the development of my district, while at the same time keeping informed about what is happening outside.

In order to answer the arguments of those who claim that everything is amiss in this country, I should like to quote an article from the publication "1955 Report on the Prairie Provinces". I will not quote the whole article; it would be somewhat too long and especially too disastrous for our hon. friends opposite.

(Text):

An agricultural province must take a long-term view of things. With this in mind, it is revealing that Saskatchewan farms have a record of production, particularly during the past ten years, that has no equal for an area of similar size and population.

The extent of the Saskatchewan market can be appreciated when we consider that from 1944 to 1954, inclusive, 112,000 farmers in this province produced wheat, coarse grains, livestock, poultry and eggs, dairy and miscellaneous products to a value exceeding $6 billion.

Manufacturing in Saskatchewan has also been on the ascent, with the result that during the same period our factories have produced goods to the value of over $2 billion.

(Translation):

The article continues in about the same vein.

(Text):

Industrial development in this province continues to show encouraging growth. During 1954, 341 new companies were incorporated, with a total capital of over $47 million.

(Translation):

And now I should like to quote an article from the Monetary Times concerning the province of Quebec:

(Text):

The year 1955 surprised economists. After a slow start, the pace of production seemed to quicken. Experts hope that when all the statistics are assembled, the present year will prove to have been the most prosperous in the history of the province.

The people of Quebec have never forgotten the heroic efforts of their ancestors to clear, possess and maintain the land they own, the success of today and the hope of the future.

Agricultural production is down slightly this year. Preliminary estimates suggest net value of farm output was $325·2 millions, compared with $325·9 millions in 1954.

Farm cash income dropped somewhat this year.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that prices of agricultural products have decreased to a certain extent in the course of the year. We cannot deny statistics. However, in the light of the extracts I quoted from the Monetary Times, it seems to me that we should be happy with the progress made by Canada during the last year.

Like the hon. members who preceded me, I have listened to and reread the speech from the throne, and I am still convinced it has been conceived with the purpose of serving the interests of the whole of Canada. Of course, the leaders of our country are men and, admittedly, anything human must fall short of perfection. Nevertheless, I remain convinced that the Liberal party does its best to maintain unity between the various groups making up the Canadian nation. With the best of goodwill, it cannot perform miracles. It cannot change wheat into uranium, nor surpluses into dollar bills. However, it must be admitted that the speech from the throne is so conceived as to balance the economy of the country.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have just been informed by the Clerk that it is 9.30 p.m. Pursuant to the provisions of standing order 38, paragraph 4, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on the amendment to the amendment and the amendment now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the main motion lost.

May I point out to hon. members that the taking of a division is an extremely delicate operation, especially for the Clerk and his assistants. I would venture to say that if there are no errors in the division list as it appears in the Votes and Proceedings tomorrow, it will be because those gentlemen have performed a miracle tonight. I would ask hon. members for their co-operation.

May I direct that appeal especially to hon. members sitting in the vicinity of the table, having in mind the fact that the microphones are open and that they do not discriminate. They pick up the noise that is being made around the table, and this noise competes with the voice of the Clerk Assistant who calls out the names. It also makes matters difficult for the Clerk who must catch all these names, and for the deputy clerk who must register the vote as it is being taken. I hope that hon. members, who realize the importance of the taking of a vote, will give us their co-operation.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: In order to preserve all rights and in order to give hon. members an opportunity to discuss what may happen tomorrow, it looks as though I might as well give the floor to someone who will not move an amendment. I will therefore give it to the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa.

Mr. Knowles: He might move an amendment.

Mr. Fleming: Not he.

Mr. Speaker: I would be surprised if he did so.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

It being eight minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 25, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADDRESS TO BOTH HOUSES BY PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can inform the house whether or not the Prime Minister of Great Britain will be addressing the joint houses of parliament and if so at what time?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be able to inform the house that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has accepted an invitation to address both houses of parliament here on February 6 at 2.30 in the afternoon.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT AS TO PROVISION FOR PERSONS DENIED BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): There is a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which I have not yet answered. It has to do with the qualification of certain claimants for unemployment insurance following upon the application of the provisions of the new act. Other members have referred to this matter in speeches and otherwise and I hope that this statement may serve to clarify the matter for them.

The new act was not long in force when the commission found the rate of disqualification for regular benefits under it exceeded the rate experienced under the old act. A survey was undertaken by the commission and it was found that the interpretation which had been placed on section 119(b) was the cause of the disqualification in a substantial number of cases.

Section 119 (b) reads in part as follows:

> 119. For the purposes of establishing a benefit period and calculating the rate of benefit . . . under this act . . .
> (b) Six days in respect of which contributions were payable and paid under the old act shall be deemed to be a contribution week . . .

The narrow view given to the subsection was that six daily contributions, regardless of whether they were earned in one, two or three weeks, would count for no more than one weekly contribution under the new act, and nothing less than six daily contributions would count as a contribution week.

As a result of the survey the commission reconsidered the subsection and came to the conclusion that the view was too restrictive and was not in accordance with the spirit and intent of the new act.

Here, in a few words, is what the commission proposes to do. The ordinary provisions of the present act concerning the computation of the number of contribution weeks will be applied to all calendar weeks occurring before the act came into effect. In order to do this, the earnings of an insured person during the calendar week must be known; if they were $9 or over, the week would count as a full contribution week under the present act, and if they were less than $9, the week would count as half a contribution week. However, for the calendar week under the old act for which the evidence necessary to establish the earnings as above is not available, the statutory week provided for in section 119 (b) of the present act will be applied. This consists in dividing the total number of daily contributions for a period by six, and counting the result as so many contribution weeks for the purposes of the present act.

I am further informed that the commission is giving instructions to their field offices to expedite the review of the claims on which entitlement was not established, and to ensure prompt readjudication and retroactive payment to those who will be relieved as a result and who have proven, or can now prove, unemployment since the commencement of their claim.

The great majority, if not all, of those who were not qualified for regular benefits during October, November and December, are now in receipt of seasonal benefits which now provide benefits at the same rates as those established for regular benefits.

We all know that the local offices of the commission will be encountering, in a few weeks, their peak load, and I am sure that hon. members will realize that these readjudications and retroactive payments cannot be accomplished in a day. However, they can be assured that everything in the commission's power will be done to expedite the matter. Since claimants in this category are already registered at their local offices, I can give assurance on behalf of the commission that such claimants will be notified direct by their local offices to call.

I must thank all the hon. members who brought the situation to my attention and that of the commission. This is an expression of our common solicitude for those workers who stand in need of all the protection which last year's revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act was designed to afford.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Are we correct in assuming that this reinterpretation that has been made by the commission is not made under the transitional provisions of the act but is rather a permanent reinterpretation?

Mr. Gregg: It is made under a reinterpretation of section 119.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of his earlier statement today. Could the minister explain what relation the reinterpretation of section 119 will have to the application of section 45 (2)?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid it would take too much of the time of the house if I attempted to explain it this afternoon. I tried to cover that point in the latter part of my statement. It will apply in a different way to different claimants. Our local offices know who those claimants are and, in the light of the activity in those offices, they will immediately, as from today, call the claimants in, talk to them individually and deal with them as such.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED ROBBERY AT OSHAWA OFFICE OF COMMISSION

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to answer a question from the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White), which he asked some days ago. His question concerned a robbery at Oshawa involving unemployment insurance funds. The replies to his two questions are as follows:

1. The unemployment insurance commission has received a report which is being studied. This shows that two employees of the commission were held up on their way from the bank to the local office and robbed of $6,000.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Investigation by the Oshawa police is proceeding and the commission feels that any further statement at this time might impede the progress of that investigation.

2. Two methods of payment of benefit are used: (1) by warrant; (2) by cash.

Where the volume of claims justifies it, payment is made by cash and this practice is followed at 90 of the 192 places at which local offices are located.

REQUEST FOR PAYMENT OF BENEFITS WITHOUT REGARD FOR TYPE OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): May I direct another question to the Minister of Labour. Will his department also consider the payment of benefits under the scale in operation under the new act without regard for the type of contributions that were made?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I would be glad to take my hon. friend's question as notice. In answering it briefly now, however, it will be remembered that the provisions of this new act have been in effect now for less than four months. As it has gone along the commission, under the powers granted it for the making of regulations by order in council or by the commission itself, has taken steps consistently each month to achieve those smaller adjustments which have been indicated as essential. As I said the other day, the new act has worked out very well on the whole. Following this interpretation I have given today, I should like the commission to have eight or ten months or a year in which to observe its further operations, after which they will be in a position to iron out any further difficulties that may remain.

BUTTER

REFERENCE TO SALES TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of the statement of the Minister of Agriculture last week in Winnipeg, as reported by the Canadian Press, that there is no surplus of butter—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Rowe: —and that we are now facing the danger of a shortage, I should like to ask this question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture: Why have we recently sold eight million pounds and why do we propose to sell an additional four million pounds to communist countries at 40 per cent less than the price the Canadian taxpayers paid for it?

An hon. Member: Are you against it?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be very glad to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the question, and I am sure he will be glad to answer it upon his return.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SHIPMENT OF ARMS TO EGYPT—REFERENCE TO MINISTER'S STATEMENT IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the statement he made yesterday concerning shipments of arms abroad? In the spare parts of world war II type tanks which he said were included in the shipments to Egypt, are any breech blocks included?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thought my hon. friend would have remembered what I said yesterday in giving the details of shipments in regard to particular countries in the Middle East; that I was inhibited by the reluctance expressed by one government to have a disclosure made of all the details because of the security and intelligence considerations involved. There is no reluctance on our part, and there would be no hesitation in making every single detail available. But the reluctance of the government concerned, in accordance with considerations of international courtesy, has to be taken into account.

By correspondence with that government, oral and written, we are attempting to convince them that the security considerations in this matter are not as important as are those considerations which would indicate that all these details should be released. As soon as we have completed those discussions I may be in a position to make a further and more detailed statement.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask a supplementary question? In approving the sale of spare parts of world war II type tanks to Egypt has the government taken into consideration the fact that the British tanks which recently found their way to Egypt via Belgium were complete except for breech blocks?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should also have thought my hon. friend would have remembered that yesterday in regard to this matter I said that in respect to this particular kind of shipment we have an assurance, written and official, from the government in question that these spare parts were to be used only in connection with tanks which already belong to their armed forces.

Mr. Fleming: It is for that reason that I ask my question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's statement simply leads me to repeat my question.

Mr. Pearson: I can answer that particular question by saying yes, all relevant factors were taken into consideration.

Mr. Fleming: What then is the fact in this regard?

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question concerning a proposal I put forward yesterday? Is the government willing to have set up a committee of this house to inquire into arms shipments abroad?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no consideration has been given to the suggestion the hon. member made yesterday about setting up a select committee to inquire into that matter.

INQUIRY AS TO SHIPMENT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister the following question? Has any military equipment been supplied by Canada to any South American countries within the last two years?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am afraid I will have to take the hon. member's question as notice. It goes back over quite a long period. I am quite sure nothing of importance has been supplied to any South American country, but in making an answer in the house I would want to be perfectly accurate and I should like to review all that has been done during the period mentioned by the hon. member.

SHIPMENT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SENSITIVE AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has any military equipment been supplied by Canada within the last two years to any of the 34 sensitive areas mentioned yesterday by the minister, exclusive of Israel and Egypt, and if so to which areas?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I had better not rely on my recollection in respect of that very involved and all-embracing question. I shall look into that matter and give an answer in due course.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of what was said yesterday about sensitive areas, may I ask the Prime Minister if the assurance he gave the house a few days ago in regard to no further shipments to those areas still stands?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it would be fair for me to consider that the debate in the house on that matter has ended.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGE IN SUPREME COURT RULES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice relating to the situation resulting from the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which was announced yesterday in respect to the Coffin case. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation or other appropriate provisions to amend the rules of the supreme court regarding applications for leave to appeal in murder cases, and is this among the amendments contemplated in the announcement contained in the speech from the throne?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The announcement contained in the speech from the throne refers to amendments to the Supreme Court Act generally, and among those were amendments of the character referred to by my hon. friend. Upon these no decision has yet been reached.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED USE OF BUTTER IN MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. Taking into account our occasional problem with regard to butter surpluses, is it true that margarine has been or is being extensively used in our military establishments?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, may I take this question as notice.

LONG BRANCH—INQUIRY RESPECTING DEMOLITION OF SHACKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence? Has the Department of National Defence ever ordered the demolition of the shacks on its property at Long Branch, Toronto? If so, have these orders been carried out? If not, why not, and what use is now being made of these shacks?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister, may I take this question as notice?

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO DETAILS OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the matter of flood loss assistance to Saskatchewan been settled? If so, can the Prime Minister say on what basis settlement has been made? Was it on the same basis used with respect to the Red river flood and the flood in the Fraser river valley in 1950? If not, why not?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the first question is yes; the federal government made proposals of assistance to the province of Saskatchewan last October. This contained an offer to share the cost of repairing homes and associated structures damaged in the floods of last spring. It was a proposal similar to the arrangement made in the case of the Ontario floods in the fall of 1954.

Under this arrangement, which has been accepted by the province, although the premier has expressed some disappointment about it, the federal government has agreed to assume 50 per cent of the expenditures in those cases where the provincial government has rendered assistance along the following lines.

The first $100 of damage to be met by the owner with the provincial government making reimbursement of 80 per cent of the balance of the assessed damage up to a maximum payment of $5,000 for any one establishment. This would cover the repair of homes and associated structures. Naturally this does not limit the extent of the assistance the provincial government may see fit to provide but fixes the proportion in which the federal government would share.

As to the second question, the form of assistance is not identical with that given in respect to the Red river and the Fraser valley floods where in both instances the damage caused was of much greater relative magnitude. Moreover, since those earlier events parliament has passed legislation which had to be taken into consideration when the Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan flood situations were being studied.

This legislation, the Canada Water Conservation Act, passed in 1953 takes into account the responsibility of the provinces in the control of floods, but at the same time makes federal assistance available in connection with major projects upon the application of any province. I may say that no proposals have been submitted by the government of Saskatchewan under this legislation.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Could he inform the house of the amount of contribution the federal government will pay under this agreement?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do not have that amount. The arrangement provided that there would be co-operation between the officials of the finance department and officials of the appropriate department of the government of Saskatchewan to determine what the amounts would be. I shall ascertain whether the matter has been completed and as soon as possible give the hon. member the total of the federal contribution.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister say what consideration was given to paying compensation on account of damage to municipal roads? This damage was very extensive.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That matter was very carefully considered, and the premier of Saskatchewan was informed that the federal government could not undertake to share in the repairs to municipal works.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask another supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister inform the house whether consideration was given to those individual farmers who will not be compensated under any other legislation for complete crop loss owing to flooding?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, consideration was given to all the representations—and I can assure you that the premier of Saskatchewan did not omit any of them—that were submitted to the government. This was the answer that we finally gave to the government of Saskatchewan.

CHEESE

INQUIRY RESPECTING IMPORTS FROM NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister any information as to whether or not there are likely to be any imports of New Zealand cheddar cheese into Canada during the next six months?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not had advance information, either through the spirits or otherwise, of the intentions of the New Zealand government. I shall be glad to make inquiries and see whether anyone in the department knows anything about them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HANSELL—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR CHARLOTTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As shown on page 484 of Hansard, in a speech by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), he stated:

> My statement is supported and borne out by a letter written by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, and published in the Vers Demain, a paper which is supported and published by the Social Credit party.

My point of privilege is this. While Vers Demain is published by the union of electors in Montreal, it is not published by the Social Credit party with which the Social Credit members in this house are affiliated.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES IN SAFETY REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. As a result of the reports made available some time ago with respect to the serious airplane crashes at Moose Jaw and Brampton, has the minister made a decision as to any changes which might be made in the air regulations to provide greater safety in the air?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall take my hon. friend's question as notice and see what reply I should make to him tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for York West? Have representations been received by the minister or by the air transport board asking for any change in the matter of flight hours and hours between flights for air-line pilots? If so, has consideration been given to any such representations?

Mr. Marler: I am quite unable to recall, offhand, whether any such representations have been received by officials of the department. I shall have to make inquiries.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): May I ask a supplementary question? Has the minister received representations on a wide basis from all interested parties, both air lines and other operators, in connection with any proposed changes?

Mr. Marler: The minister, Mr. Speaker, has not received any such representations, but representations may have been made to the officials of my department. I would have to make inquiries.

GRAIN

REPORTED MOVEMENT OF EMPTY BOX CARS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I should like to reply to a question asked me yesterday by the hon. member for Saskatoon. He asked, speaking of box cars, if empty cars were being moved by the Canadian National Railways from Edmonton to British Columbia. The management of the Canadian National Railways advise me that the railway is not shipping empty box cars west from Edmonton into British Columbia.

TAXATION

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Hamilton (York West).]

Has the Prime Minister received a request from Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan that a new federal-provincial conference on taxation be convened this spring? Is the Prime Minister prepared to have such a conference called?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will have to reread the numerous letters I have received recently from Premier Douglas to be in a position to make an accurate reply to the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: Is the Prime Minister prepared to have a new federal-provincial conference on taxation called this spring? That is the question.

[Later:]

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister arising out of the answer he gave a moment ago to the hon. member for Assiniboia. Would the Prime Minister indicate to the house how many of the other provincial premiers requested that such a conference be convened?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I have no recollection of any request from any of the provincial premiers for a new conference. I think there is a suggestion in a letter from the premier of Saskatchewan that there should be a resumption of the conference on dominion fiscal matters to continue the discussions we had last October, and to give further consideration to the proposals to the provinces, a copy of which I tabled in the house the other day.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): As a supplementary question, may we take it from the Prime Minister's answer that his latest offer is not the final offer the government is making?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It is the last offer that the government has made, sir.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REFERENCE TO PROPOSED MORAN DAM ON FRASER RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops asked me the following question:

Has the Department of Fisheries, or the government as a whole, received any representations from the government of British Columbia, or any other body, regarding the proposed Moran dam on the Fraser river? If so, are discussions under way as to ways and means by which the interests of fisheries and power would be reconciled?

The only representations to the federal government regarding the proposed Moran dam have been in the form of a request from an engineering consultant of the Moran Power Development Limited to A. J. Whitmore, chief supervisor of fisheries in British Columbia, to meet for the purpose of discussing the project and to consider the problem of providing facilities to meet the fisheries needs. The first meeting took place on November 17, 1955, in the Department of Fisheries offices in Vancouver. Another meeting took place on January 13, 1956. Discussions will continue in an effort to reconcile the interests of fisheries and power.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. gentleman to say again from whom the invitation was received? I did not catch it.

Mr. MacNaught: The invitation was received from an engineering consultant of the Moran Power Development Limited. This engineer's name was Russell E. Potter of Victoria, B.C.

Mr. Fulton: Is that the company which we understand has been formed in New York?

Mr. MacNaught: I have no information on that point.

WAR ASSETS

EXTENT OF MUTILATION OF GUN BARRELS WHEN SOLD AS SCRAP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production. When mutilated gun barrels or breech blocks are sold as scrap, as mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday, is evidence produced to show that such barrels and blocks are beyond repair?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The instructions to the disposal corporation are that before guns are scrapped, and before they leave the possession of the corporation, the breech blocks are to be demolished. In other words, they are mutilated beyond repair.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR LOWER INTEREST RATE ON N.H.A. LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Regina City asked a question regarding the interest rates under the National Housing Act. In reply I would point out that whether or not the various interest rates under the National Housing Act will be changed is a matter of government policy upon which an announcement would be made at the time of the making of the change.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Like very many other members who have risen in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by complimenting the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address. I should like particularly to compliment the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) on the very able address she gave, and also the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) on the good job he did in his first speech in the house.

From the line-up of business that appears before us, it would seem that this is going to be an interesting session. First of all, we are going to start on Friday examining the government's wheat policy in order to try to find out why the government has made such a colossal failure of that policy. Back in the forties this government assured the wheat farmers of Canada that if they would accept a price considerably lower than the world price for their wheat, this government would always guarantee that it would sell their wheat for them at good prices. During the past two years it has become evident the government has failed dismally in doing this, yet it has the colossal effrontery to ask the wheat farmers of Canada to pay 5 per cent on the money which the government should have paid to them, and which should be in their own bank accounts drawing interest or invested in government bonds which would yield a much greater rate of interest.

So far the government seems to be relying on its old policy of hope and grope. There is no indication it has any plan for improving the situation. It appears that when the crop comes in next year the situation will get worse. On Friday, therefore, we of the opposition will look to the government to hear some plan for improving the situation which has been so bad for the past two years.

Then, we are going to discuss the pipe-line policy. I think it has become evident to anyone who has examined this situation that there is only a very slight hope the federal power commission in the United States will grant Trans-Canada Pipe Lines' application in time for it to meet the deadline of April 30. There are considerable forces arrayed against Trans-Canada's application in the United States, and they have available to them what are known as due processes of law by which they can hold up an application by anything up to two years. It appears certain that those due processes of law are going to be applied against Trans-Canada's application. Towards the end of April we are going to learn this government has no alternative plan to the present Trans-Canada plan. We are going to see this government once again start floundering around in a morass of uncertainty and indecision such as has characterized so many of its deliberations and operations during the past few months.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall examine some of the matters that came up for discussion during the by-elections. For instance, in the Spadina by-election one matter which was of great importance to the people there was the question of immigration. I talked to many people in that riding who came to Canada many years ago. They had settled down, had become citizens, and had established themselves in business and in the professions, and had become extremely good citizens of this country. They told me that recently they had applied to this government for permission to bring friends and relatives to Canada. They had offered financial guarantees and guarantees of jobs, but on many occasions they had been turned down without any explanation, and that is most infuriating to people who feel that at least they are entitled to an explanantion of government action of that kind. Those people resent very strongly a government program which appears to have no direction, is guided by no policy, and is operated simply through the whims of individual bureaucrats. They resent very much the arrogance of a government that appears to have forgotten that it was elected to serve the people and not to rule them.

The government was surprised on that election night when a previous majority of 9,000 votes, received only two short years before—and it was much more than that because in the 1953 election the Liberal candidate received two and one-half times the Conservative vote, 15,000 against 6,000—was turned into a Conservative majority. This time we won by a very comfortable majority. If the government was surprised at that result, then it would do well to talk to the people in areas like Spadina and find out why they resent the arrogant treatment that this government is handing out to the people of Canada today.

In the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska there were two very important matters which caused the government once again to receive a stunning defeat at the hands of the electors in the by-election. First of all, the people of New Brunswick feel very strongly about the production of power. They need power, as do most provinces of this country, but particularly New Brunswick, which does not have very much manufacturing industry and which needs it. They need power to attract industry to their area. New Brunswick desperately needs power, not only to attract industry, but also to make it possible to smelt the new-found ores which are being discovered every day in that area.

After seventeen years of procrastination by the Liberal government, in 1952 a Conservative government was formed and Premier Hugh John Flemming set to work to give New Brunswick power which had been so long denied to it. He asked the government in Ottawa to help him in one way, and in one way only, by simply backing his power bonds so that he could obtain the money he needed to go ahead with his project at a lower rate of interest. This would not have cost the federal government one penny; it would not have cost the federal taxpayer one penny. It would simply have required the confidence of this government in the province of New Brunswick in its desire to help itself to produce power to attract industry and smelt its own ores and generally help itself. But what did this government do? It turned them down flat, in exactly the same way as it turned down the application made on several occasions by the province of Saskatchewan for assistance to build its very much needed and very practical South Saskatchewan dam, which would provide much needed irrigation and power to attract industries to that province.

The people of New Brunswick resented the attitude of this government, and they showed that resentment very clearly at the polls on election day when a former Liberal majority of 6,000 was turned into a Conservative majority of 2,200.

Another matter which annoyed the people of New Brunswick very much, and quite rightly, was this government's potato marketing program, or lack of it. The potato growers of New Brunswick have to contend with a high United States tariff against the potatoes that they would like to sell in the United States. We allow United States potatoes to come into Canada free of duty. Those potatoes are permitted to come across the United States border free of duty; to be loaded on freight cars in New Brunswick; and be shipped to centres like Toronto and Montreal under the preferential maritime freight rates, and be sold in competition with New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island potatoes.

The potato growers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island ask simply that they be given the same advantage in the United States as United States potatoes are given in this country. But this government refuses to stand up to the United States government and ask for what is nothing more than a fair and even deal. The government should ask for the same kind of treatment for Canadian potatoes as we give United States potatoes, but this government has become accustomed to being subservient to the United States government, and it has not the courage to stand up to it. The result is, our growers are at a very severe disadvantage when compared with the growers in the United States. As I say, these matters are causing the people of Canada to develop a rising resentment against this dictatorial, arrogant government. If the by-election reverses which the government has received have not convinced it that it should pay more attention to the wishes of the people, and less attention to how they think the people should be treated, then perhaps it should examine the last three Gallup polls which have shown the political trend of the federal parties in this country.

The Gallup poll is not something to be taken lightly, because during the past several general elections it has been demonstrated to be surprisingly accurate in forecasting the results of those general elections. In each case it has never been farther out than 2 per cent, and in most cases not more than one per cent; therefore, it is something to be considered very seriously.

During the past six months three Gallup polls have been taken, and in every area of Canada the people selected by the Gallup poll canvassers have been asked this question: "If there were an election held today, which party's candidate would you support?"

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What was the answer to that question?

Mr. Hees: I am just going to give it. During those three successive polls, the Liberal party has dropped five percentage points, or 10 per cent of its former strength in a short six-months period.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What is its strength?

Mr. Hees: Your present strength is 46 per cent; it has dropped from 51 per cent in six months.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What is yours?

Mr. Hees: Our strength has risen from 26 per cent to 32 per cent, 6 percentage points, or an increase of 23 per cent, in the six-months period.

Mr. Dickey: A policy of scarcity again.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A very close race.

Mr. Hees: What makes those figures particularly significant, Mr. Speaker—and we like to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce ignore these things because it is the kind of thing that causes a government very easily to find itself out of power after a general election—

Mr. Dickey: Thanks for the warning.

Mr. Hees: What makes these figures particularly significant is the fact that it is very rarely that you find people changing their political allegiance during a period of high prosperity, and there is no question that we have a period of high prosperity today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Not through action on the part of this government but simply owing to the hard work and ingenuity of the Canadian people, and in spite of the fact that this government's policies are not conducive to producing a high level of income.

As I say, during periods of high prosperity it is very strange to find people changing their political allegiance. Most people will say at a time such as that, "Well, I have a good job, so why should I pay attention to what the government is doing"? When during a period such as this you find that the people are paying a great deal of attention to what the government is doing, and are expressing their opinion very keenly and sharply in by-elections and in Gallup polls, it is something to which any sensible politician pays a great deal of attention. But you can see that these figures are going right over the heads of the Liberal party because they have been in power for a long time and, in their usual casual and arrogant fashion, they think they are going to be in power for a long time to come. I can tell them, however, that the figures indicate that the people of Canada are getting fed up with this tired, arrogant Liberal government, which has been here too long, and are getting very close to a change.

I should like now to deal briefly with a statement which was made in Montreal a week ago by Mr. R. M. Fowler, president of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, when he appeared before the Gordon commission. During that interview he expressed the opinion that he thought it would be better for Canada to remain primarily a hewer of wood and a drawer of water rather than, as he put it, "to become busily engaged in taking in each other's washing." I think that most Canadians were rather shocked at an expression of opinion of that kind by a man high up in the ranks of industry. But, after all, when you look the thing over a little more carefully, it is perhaps not surprising that Mr. Fowler made this statement because he is the government's latest appointment to head one of its royal commissions. In voicing the opinion which he expressed, he was simply echoing the opinion which this government has made it very clear during the past few years, is its opinion, namely that it would sooner have Canada remain a hewer of wood and a drawer of water.

By examining Mr. Fowler's statement, we can perhaps get to understand what makes the government pursue such a short-sighted policy. For this reason I have decided to deal for a few minutes with this statement, and to see if we can make some sense out of it. Mr. Fowler reported that in his opinion it would be better to have a smaller population working primarily in primary industry, rather than to have a larger population, as he put it, "busily engaged in taking in each other's washing." Mr. Fowler obviously considers that manufacturing finished products by Canadian workmen, using Canadian raw materials and working in Canadian plants, and deriving the additional employment and wealth which the processing of our own raw materials would provide, is something which should be avoided at all costs. He would obviously prefer to have us continue to ship most of our primary products out of the country in their raw state, to provide jobs for workmen in other countries, and then turn around and buy back many of those finished products for our own use here in Canada. That is the kind of thinking which unfortunately is close to government thinking. That is the reason why the industrial expansion of this country has not been nearly as rapid as it could or should be.

No sensible person would suggest for one moment that we should not sell to other countries the primary products which we ourselves cannot process. We derive much needed and welcome wealth and employment from the production of primary products which we sell to other people. What we in this country need is for this government to encourage the development of secondary industries so that, in addition to selling primary products outside of the country, we may benefit as well from the additional employment and wealth which would result from the processing of a much larger proportion of our raw materials right here in Canada.

Judging from his remark about taking in each other's washing, Mr. Fowler is obviously under the impression that additional manufacturing in Canada would be limited to production for the Canadian market alone. Most industrial nations derive additional employment and wealth from manufacturing for export markets as well as to supply their own needs. There is no reason in the world why Canadian workmen in Canadian plants and using Canadian raw material should not compete just as successfully for world markets as do our competitors. We have here in Canada everything that is needed for a great industrial expansion. In fact we are far more richly endowed than are many of our competitors who are competing successfully for the world market today.

Let us have a look at what we have. First of all we can produce enough food to feed several times our present population. Secondly, we have almost limitless supplies of timber and iron ore, which are the two basic requirements of any industrial program. We have tremendous resources of every kind of power, including hydro electric, coal, oil, gas and uranium. We have tremendous resources of nickel, copper, lead, zinc, and almost every other metal used in industry. We have capital, and we have proved that we can attract it from outside. We have the brains necessary to direct an important industrial expansion in this country. However, we must realize one thing. If we are going to produce more, then of course we must be able to sell more; and we are going to be able to sell more only if we can attract additional customers through better designs or lower prices or a combination of both.

One step I suggest we could take in the direction of improving our designs and lowering our costs would be to follow the excellent example of Great Britain and the United States in undertaking greatly expanded industrial research programs. These programs have been aimed at developing new and better designs and more efficient methods of production, and they have paid off handsomely for both countries in the way of enlarged sales.

Another way of making our products more competitive by reducing prices, would be to reduce our present high commodity taxes, which are today helping to price many of our products out of the market. I believe a thorough examination of the possibilities that could be obtained in the way of winning new markets by lowering prices through lower commodity taxes, is something which is long overdue. In order that we may examine all possible means of obtaining additional markets through better designs and lower prices, I believe the government should set up a committee of this house just as soon as possible, with power to call industrial and labour leaders, economists, and others with special experience and qualifications, to examine three things. First of all, it could examine what might reasonably be expected in the way of developing new products and better means of production through a greatly expanded research program. Secondly, it could examine and give a thorough revision of our industrial taxation policies, and could examine any other suggestions which would be brought before that committee.

The results which have been obtained through expanded research programs in other countries are available for examination. There is no problem there. I feel confident that the submissions which would be received before the committee would convince the government that any initial tax revenue losses would be quickly made up by the additional taxes which would be borne by the additional production made possible through more competitive prices. If our production increased rapidly, and I believe it would, the additional taxes which would accrue to the government would be found revenue, and there would also be the additional income taxes which would be paid by the many additional thousands of workers who would find employment through a program of this kind.

I am sure that many other suggestions will be brought before the committee for improving the competitive situation. I think a thorough study of these suggestions would give the government the information it requires on which to base the necessary action to encourage a great expansion of industry in this country. If the proper economic atmosphere is created by sensible and farsighted government action, new industries will be encouraged to start up, and present industry will be encouraged to expand. This will mean jobs for many thousands more Canadians, at increasing rates of pay. It will mean less dependence upon the production of primary products, which will mean a more stable economy. It will make possible increased social security measures, by increasing the sources which pay for social security. It will mean lower taxes, because the tax base will be constantly broadening owing to a rapidly increasing population. It will mean the development of this country to its full potential.

And so, for the reasons I have mentioned, I urge the government to set up a committee of this house as early as possible to study this vitally important matter, and when that has been done, to bring in legislation which will encourage new industries to start up; present industries to expand; and enable this country to develop industrially as our tremendous supplies of raw materials, power, brains, manpower and capital undoubtedly merit.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising I share the privilege of those who have preceded me of offering my very sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) will agree that we could describe her efforts in no more complimentary terms than to say they were what we would expect from one who thinks, acts and speaks as a true citizen of the north. When I listened to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) seconding the motion my mind carried me back to the time when I had a similar task to perform and indicated the great contrast there was between the competence and sangfroid with which he delivered his speech and the high state of nervousness in which I was on a similar occasion.

I rise to take part in this debate for one purpose and one purpose only. For some time now since the recent outbreak of sex offences we have been receiving from worried parents throughout the country large numbers of letters which make it very clear that a great number of them are under a misapprehension as to the law which is applicable to these offences at the present time. I appreciated the reference of the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) yesterday to my feeling of sympathy with those who write these letters and with all those who as parents are worried about the situation that exists. I too am a parent and not only do I feel sympathetic with them, I am sympathetic with my own worries as a parent. In our family we instructed our children about the dangers of having anything to do with strangers long before we were able to explain to them what they might fear from having to do with strangers.

However, when we find that this widespread misapprehension as to the law concerning sexual offences is shared, not only by the general public but by members of the House of Commons and by some of the best editors in the country, I think it is definitely in the public interest that we should put on the record what is the law at the present time. Perhaps we should have done this before now.

One of the best editorials that I have seen upon the subject is one which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 12, 1956. In many respects it was an admirable statement. It started out in these terms:

> A new outbreak of sex offences, some of them involving young children, has again roused public concern. The problem is not simple and no wholly satisfactory method of dealing with it has been found. There is still a great deal to be learned about the psychological aspects of sex deviation, and even well-informed specialists in this field are inclined to be cautious in prescribing remedies.

I think those sentences constitute an intelligent opening statement with which most responsible people agree. The editorial goes on:

> Nevertheless, it is becoming clear that some action will have to be taken, and a far more earnest approach by the public authority is called for.
> The government—

I think it is obvious from the context that the government referred to is the federal government.

> —is not without appreciation of its duty and a royal commission is at present studying the problem with a view to making recommendations for more effective legal treatment of the matter. Following a similar outbreak of sex offences which shocked public opinion seven or eight years ago, parliament did strengthen the law relating to "preventive detention" of several types of sex offenders.

That statement is also quite correct and to the point. The law in effect at the present time is in the consolidated criminal code. Hon. members of the house will recall that the provisions in the consolidated code in relation to sex offences are almost a verbatim re-enactment of the legislation which was introduced by this government in 1948 to deal with this same subject matter.

The suggestion is made—perhaps not always made, but sometimes implied—that the law is not sufficiently severe, but I should like to list the punishment provided for various sex offences. These are all maximum of course and the judge or magistrate sitting on the case can impose a lesser penalty if he thinks the circumstances warrant it.

Rape—life imprisonment and whipping.

Attempted rape—imprisonment for ten years and whipping.

Carnal knowledge—that is sexual intercourse with a female under the age of 14 years—life imprisonment and whipping.

Indecent assault on a female—five years' imprisonment and whipping.

Incest—14 years' imprisonment, and in the case of males, whipping.

Bestiality—14 years' imprisonment.

Indecent assault on a male—10 years' imprisonment and whipping.

Acts of gross indecency—five years' imprisonment.

Peeping Tom—six months' imprisonment or $500 fine or both.

I was rather glad to hear the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Reinke) express the other day, in as masterful a speech as I have heard upon a legal subject by a layman, appreciation for the presence of this provision in the new consolidated code. Members of the committee which considered this will remember that when we were discussing it there were a few who poked fun at the idea of creating any such crime as that.

Persons previously convicted of serious sexual offences found loitering or wandering at or near a school ground—just loitering or wandering—a playground, a public park or a bathing area—six months' imprisonment or $500 fine or both.

Surely no one will argue in the face of these maximum sentences that the court which convicts the accused lacks the power to impose really severe and deterrent punishment.

But that is not all. Yesterday the hon. member for York-Humber stated in her speech that there must be a revision of part of our Criminal Code to provide for the holding of offenders, or even suspects, indefinitely, whether they be held in prison for crimes they have committed or whether they be held for psychiatric treatment. The plain implication there is that that provision is not in the code at the present time. That impression, which unfortunately is also shared, as I have said, by some editors and by the general public, is quite incorrect. If one looks at part 21 of the new code, which deals with preventive detention and which covers both habitual criminals and criminal sexual psychopaths, one will find in section 661:

> "Where an accused is convicted of . . . "

—and then are listed the various sexual offences to which I have referred.

> . . . the court may, upon application, before passing sentence hear evidence as to whether the accused is a criminal sexual psychopath.
> . . . On the hearing of an application under subsection (1)—

—which is, by the way, the subsection I have just read—

> —the court may hear any evidence that it considers necessary, but shall hear the evidence of at least two psychiatrists, one of whom shall be nominated by the Attorney General.

The attorney general there referred to is not the attorney general of Canada but the attorney general of the government which under our constitution has the responsibility for the enforcement of the law and the administration of justice, namely, the provincial government. The attorney general there referred to is the attorney general of the province.

(3) Where the court finds that the accused is a criminal sexual psychopath it shall, notwithstanding anything in this act or any other act of the Parliament of Canada, sentence the accused to a term of imprisonment of not less than two years in respect of the offence of which he was convicted and,—

I bring this specifically to the attention of the hon. member for York-Humber.

—in addition, impose a sentence of preventive detention.

Under subsection (c) of section 659, which is the interpretation section of this part, "preventive detention" means detention in a penitentiary for an indeterminate period. In that context "an indeterminate period" means for all practical purposes a sentence for life, subject to release on parole by the Minister of Justice.

In the face of these provisions, I think it is quite impossible for any one to be under the fear, as so many people in Canada apparently are, that there is no way in which these criminal sexual psychopaths can be permanently put out of circulation. Some may argue that it would be difficult to satisfy the onus which would rest upon the crown in this case of proving that the accused was a criminal sexual psychopath, but the definition of such is also, it seems to me, fairly clear. It says:

. . . "criminal sexual psychopath" means a person who, by a course of misconduct in sexual matters, has shown a lack of power to control his sexual impulses and who as a result is likely to attack or otherwise inflict injury, pain or other evil on any person . . .

I believe the answer as to whether this section is enforceable is to be found in the fact that we have in penitentiaries at the present time at least 20 criminal sexual psychopaths who are there because of the fact that the provincial authorities charged with the administration of justice have invoked these sections and have had these men incarcerated in the penitentiaries for an indeterminate period.

I do not know how many other applications have been made which were refused. Since these are entirely under the control of the provincial authorities, we do not get to know at all about their efforts unless and until a conviction is registered and the criminal sexual psychopath is sent to us with the necessary papers for incarceration in one of our penitentiaries.

When I call attention to this number of 20, which is not a great many over a period of eight years, I want to make it quite clear that I am not in any way implying or stating any criticism whatsoever of the provincial authorities of Canada. I believe any fair-minded person would agree that only those who have the same knowledge of the circumstances of each case that the crown prosecutor has are really in a position to make a just criticism of what he is doing or to have an opinion as to whether he is right or wrong in applying or not applying for committal for an indeterminate period. The fact that these men who are now in the penitentiaries under this legislation are there is, in itself, a rather conclusive answer to the question of whether or not the legislation, if properly invoked, can take these men permanently out of circulation.

The fact is that in this whole matter we are dealing with a subject which all those people who have given it the most study are convinced is an enormously difficult subject upon which to reach final conclusions. The hon. member for Hamilton South, in speaking the other day, quoted a man for whom I have a good deal of respect and admiration, the attorney general of Ontario the Hon. Kelso Roberts, Q.C., in these terms:

"We are concerned about these cases and we are studying the problem but we have got to move slowly. I sympathize with the people who are angry over these recent assaults on children. But we cannot just go around locking up each and every sex deviate. We are not behind the iron curtain. We have got to try and understand each individual problem."

We share his view and the view of others, for example the editor of the Globe and Mail who has also stated that this is a very difficult matter. Even after we had in 1948 set up what we think is an up to date and thoroughly modern code of law with regard to sexual offences; and even after that had been considered for three years by the royal commission that was charged with the consolidation of the Criminal Code, and considered again by both houses of parliament and, in spite of the fact that, during the progress of that legislation enacted in 1948 and re-enacted finally to become part of the consolidated Criminal Code coming into effect on April 1, 1955, no member of this chamber or of the other place criticized in any degree whatever this law with regard to sexual offences. Notwithstanding the fact that since this law became effective in 1948 we have not received any representations from any provincial government anywhere in Canada as to the inadequacy of the law or that it cannot be enforced; notwithstanding all these facts, but having regard to the inherent difficulty of the problem itself, we set up another royal commission under Chief Justice McRuer of the province of Ontario to investigate this whole matter in the hope that we may possibly get more light upon a subject which is one of great difficulty.

This problem is not peculiar only to Canada. It occurs in almost every country in the world, in some countries to a greater extent than others. The picture is not all bad. If one goes back through the history of music and literature and the arts one will find that some of the greatest masterpieces in these fields have been achieved by sex deviates to whom we are in fact greatly indebted for what they have created and handed down to their fellow men.

There is one criticism I should like to make of another excerpt from this same editorial in the Globe and Mail, and perhaps I will not be expected to agree as wholeheartedly with this excerpt as I did with the first selection I read therefrom. The excerpt reads as follows:

> It would appear that indefinite sentences, related on the one hand to the need for prolonged treatment in so far as this is a practicable measure, and on the other to some form of occupational activity in custody, would be a decided help. At present, sentences for these offences are in general of mandatory length.

In other words, they are for a definite period.

> The offender serves all or part of the sentence and is then turned loose on society to commit further offences. This is discouraging to the police, it is alarming to society and it totally fails to meet the problem in any practical fashion.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the impression which these remarks create is quite incorrect. All that the crown attorney or the prosecuting authorities in a province need to do in relation to a given offender is to decide whether upon the evidence available in that case they can establish that in addition to having committed the crime of rape, let us say, with which the offender is charged in that particular matter, they can also prove that he is a criminal sexual psycopath. If with that evidence in their possession they charge him with rape and he is sentenced to five years and then gets out, the excerpt from the editorial will apply to him. But if after his conviction for rape the prosecuting authorities apply to the court for an examination with respect to whether he is a criminal sexual psychopath and are able to adduce evidence, expert and otherwise, to prove that he is, then the results I have already indicated will flow. He will have a determinate sentence of two years and an indeterminate sentence over and above that.

There is one other part of the editorial upon which I should like to comment, and it reads as follows:

> One important reason for the reluctance of the courts to use this power is the failure to establish clinics in the penitentiaries for the treatment of such offenders. Prison sentences alone, while they do prevent the offender from endangering society, are in no degree remedial.

Here again the editor is, I think, wrong in his facts; but may I say that I have quoted from the editorial because I think that upon the whole it is excellent and one of the very best I have read. It is because an editor who will write such an an intelligent, humane and sensible editorial entertains these wrong ideas as to the facts that I think it is important that the real facts should be put upon the record.

What are the facts? The facts are that when these men go into our penitentiaries to serve there these indeterminate sentences—and no parole has been granted to any one of the 20 who have been incarcerated; they are still all in penitentiary—we have available in every one of our penitentiaries with one exception, namely Dorchester, part-time psychiatrists to provide psychiatric diagnosis and treatment for these imprisoned criminal sexual psychopaths. One might say that if these psychiatrists are only giving part-time care not enough time is being spent on treating these criminal sexual psychopaths. However, we only have 20 in the whole penitentiary system and not all of the 20 will accept treatment. The members of our committee will recall that on one occasion we had before us Dr. Gendreau, who is assistant commissioner of penitentiaries, and a distinguished psychiatrist of many years' experience who is largely in charge of this program. He said that one of the characteristics of some of these psychopaths is that they will not admit there is anything unusual about themselves at all. He said that unless they are prepared to make that admission and are prepared to receive treatment and cooperate, then the treatment is bound to be quite ineffective.

Therefore after making allowance for those who will not take treatment we have, not clinics, but ample facilities, for the giving of psychiatric treatment to these psychopaths who are incarcerated.

I give this reassurance to all throughout the country who are labouring under this fear, to which I have referred; and one has only to read the letters we have received to realize how great this fear can be. I reassure them that Canada does have a severe law against these sexual offenders, and it is a law which can be enforced. But, of course, and I think this is the point, and it is a very difficult point to get over in some cases, it does not make any difference how good a criminal law is. The police must first arrest the offender. Then they must secure evidence against him to prove that he has committed the offence and that he is a criminal sexual psychopath before they can secure a preventive detention order which will take him out of circulation for an indefinite period.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two aspects of the speech just delivered by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that call for comment. I shall be dealing with some other statements and activities of that hon. gentleman a little later in the course of my remarks in any event, but I think I should deal immediately with what he has just said. For that reason, if I merely express my very sincere congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I trust they will realize that my sentiments are not the less sincere because I do not further elaborate on them. Perhaps the greatest compliment I can pay them is to proceed immediately to deal with the address which forms the subject matter of their motion.

What I should like to point out first, in connection with the remarks by the Minister of Justice, is that I could not help feeling what I have felt before in listening to him, that once again the hon. gentleman was, perhaps unintentionally, taking refuge in his belief that all this parliament has to do is pass a law, and that then there is no further responsibility here. He feels that if any unsatisfactory situation in connection with the administration or application of that law should arise, then we can wash our hands of it by saying that is the responsibility of the province, since, under our constitution they have to administer the law. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that is shirking the responsibility which this parliament and this government cannot avoid with respect to the field of criminal law generally.

It is not enough to say that we have passed sections 659 and 661, which the minister read. After all, there is always room for the possibility, and I suggest it is more than a possibility in this case, that the provisions of the law itself are not adequate. It is for that reason I regret that so often the minister seems to approach these things in the frame of mind that we have passed a law; we have discharged our responsibility, and now it is up to the provinces. I suggest to him that in connection with this matter of sex deviation, in the light of the remarks he has just made, there are two things which should be borne in mind.

First, incidentally, a correction should be made. The hon. gentleman pointed out in one or two places that the facts mentioned by the speakers and in the editorial to which he referred were not strictly accurate. In passing I should like to say that I believe the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken), and others who have alluded to this matter in the house, have done a great service in bringing it to the attention of the government. The hon. gentleman himself was not strictly accurate when he said that during the course of the passage of the new Criminal Code through the committee and the house there was not a single member who made a reference to the question of sex deviation or criticized the law.

Mr. Garson: If I may correct my hon. friend, I said that not a single member had made any substantial criticism.

Mr. Fulton: I accept the minister's correction, but I think he in turn overlooked the fact, as I am sure he would not have done had he given it more reflection, that the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) dealt with it at some length when these sections were under consideration. That hon. member suggested that because of certain things that were taking place it might be appropriate to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the adequacy of the law and the methods of administering it. As I recall it, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) supported that suggestion. I have not had time to check these things, and I rely upon the statements made by the hon. member for Oxford, who is sitting beside me. As I recall, the minister's attitude was rather to make light of the situation by saying that the law seemed adequate and he did not see what good a royal commission could do.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is not suggesting that the hon. member for Oxford was opposing the legislation, is he?

Mr. Fulton: No; the hon. member for Oxford suggested there should be an immediate inquiry into the adequacy of the legislation. At that time the suggestion was belittled by the minister. Notwithstanding that fact, our recollection is that it was not more than four to six weeks later when the minister accepted the view of the hon. member for Oxford and announced the appointment of a commission.

The other statement which should be made in connection with the minister's remarks is that it may well be suggested that the definition of a criminal sexual psychopath in section 661 does leave something to be desired. It is because of that definition and its implications that there is a great deal of concern as to the adequacy of the law. I am sure the minister will agree with me that, by definition, an application to have a person declared a sex deviate can only be made in court if the accused has, by a course of misconduct in sexual matters, shown a lack of power to control his sexual impulses. I am not qualified, nor do I wish to appear dogmatic in these matters, but I do suggest there is room for the belief that that definition is too narrow. It requires that the person should be guilty of a course of misconduct in sexual matters; in other words, that there should be more than one offence before he can be declared a sex deviate.

I believe there is a substantial body of medical and psychiatric opinion to the effect that one offence of a particular nature may be sufficient, coupled with the necessary medical and psychiatric examination which would take place, to establish that a person is a sex deviate. However, an inquiry cannot be made now under the terms of the definition, unless there has been a course of misconduct, so there is plenty of room to suggest that the law does require amendment. In any event, the matter is under study by a royal commission and one would hope that the commission, as it undoubtedly will, would take that point under consideration.

This is the last day of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker. The government must be glad this debate is drawing to an end and that it is going to be delivered from a further recitation of its long catalogue of sins of omission and commission. Many of these weaknesses and omissions on the part of the government have been referred to already in the course of this debate, so I shall endeavour not to repeat what has been said. There have been other shortcomings on the part of the government affecting the life and welfare of everyone in every part of Canada that have not been touched. I should like to deal with these in the time at my disposal.

We saw one of them exposed yesterday, and that was the oft repeated offence of the government in its disregard of parliament. The subject was dealt with fully and effectively by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). But one point he touched on requires further emphasis; that is, that the speech of explanation made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) left more things unanswered than it answered. The hon. gentleman did not offer to the house any explanation of why it was, if things were decided at cabinet level, he and his colleague denied all knowledge of them for approximately one week. The effect of that denial under those circumstances was to suggest to the house and the country that no such shipments were taking place.

The minister's explanation also left complete dissatisfaction, I am sure, in the minds of all hon. members who are really concerned as to the moral propriety of Canada profiting by the shipment of arms to these two countries in an area where there is grave tension, a tension which involves the whole world in the danger of armed conflict. I am at a loss to understand, and I am quite satisfied the people of Canada will be at a loss to understand, this attitude. In fact, the people of Canada will vigorously condemn the callous attitude of this government that they are justified in profiting by the shipment of arms to these countries under these circumstances.

Then there are other respects in which we see, as we review the situation today, examples of the long history of government weakness, contradiction, and vacillation; a lack of leadership in almost every field. In the field of dominion-provincial relations, the government has shown lack of certainty and a lack of policy which has continued to aggravate and disturb this country. We see the dissatisfaction existing in the majority of the provinces, judged by the statements of their premiers, with the course outlined by the dominion government.

With respect to the administration of justice, there is deep concern on the part of the people of Canada not only over this matter of sex deviates which we have just been discussing, but in connection with the situation of the supreme court generally and relations between that court and the government as exemplified in the Coffin case, which I am confident can be described as one of the most seriously bungled and mishandled cases in the history of the administration of justice in this country.

There is dissatisfaction and concern over the question of the shipment of arms to the Middle East; weakness, vacillation and contradiction in connection with our agricultural policy; denials that there is a butter surplus; confusion, uncertainty and dissatisfaction in connection with the policy on the shipment of feed grain, and freight assistance on those shipments. There is contradiction in the positions taken by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to marketing generally.

In the field of immigration we find that above all the government policy is characterized by lack of certainty and vigour, and its administration is shot through with uncertainties and injustices. The department is led by a minister whose greatest concern is not to remedy the defects that have become obvious but rather to find alibis and scapegoats for his own shortcomings.

That is a short review of the situation which I shall endeavour to show in a few moments is amply substantiated by reference to detail. For all this, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize that the Prime Minister must accept responsibility. He is the head of the government. If there is lack of leadership, if there is confusion, if there is contradiction, if there is division of policy, the Prime Minister must accept the responsibility for that situation.

I suggest to you, sir, the fact that attacks with respect to policy may be directed at individual ministers should not blind either this house or the country to the fact that the ultimate responsibility for the situation rests with the right hon. gentleman who is head of the government. The situation we see today is one in which this house is faced with the spectacle of a government led by a group of older men who have lost their drive, their imagination and their initiative, who are working at cross purposes, who are in fact stultifying the younger men, of whom there are some in the administration. Since the party line is laid down by the hard rock core, a statement which we have on the best authority, these younger men must serve in frustration and silence while they toe that line.

Now I should like to turn to some of the details which support the general criticism which I have made of the administration in office today. I base my case first on certain activities of the Minister of Justice. I have had occasion in the past to point out how that hon. gentleman follows tactics which he hopes will result in profit to his party but which, if successful, can only result in misfortune to the country. These are the old Liberal divisive tactics of seeking to set one section of the country against the other. I refer specifically to the conduct and the statements of the minister in connection with the field of dominion-provincial relations and the tax agreements which have been recently the subject of conferences between the dominion and provincial governments.

It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, to look at statements made by the Minister of Justice in Manitoba at the end of 1954, when he went out to follow this line, which he had laid down himself, of trying to divide the west from the east. He said, as hon. members will recall, that the Conservative party and its leader were seeking to put an end to the tax agreements. Incidentally, he said that was being done in the interests of eastern Canada. He said that only the Liberal party could preserve and perpetuate the tax agreements. He said the Liberal government had put them into effect, and the Liberal party was the only party in the House of Commons at the present time that is able and willing to defend and perpetuate them.

Mr. Garson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: I hear the minister applauding his statement. Of course, all the ministers are so used to contradicting themselves and being at cross purposes that he does not realize they are contradicting the statements made by the Prime Minister. That is, in fact, what the Minister of Justice has done. He repeated himself in another speech made in Manitoba in October of 1954. I will not read a quotation from his remarks on that occasion except to say he said once again that the enemies of the tax agreements were in eastern Canada and it was in the interests of western Canada, therefore, to support a government which would perpetuate them.

The minister decried the efforts and the position of those who were recommending at that time that a dominion-provincial conference be called. The minister is on record as opposing any substitute for the tax agreements, and as opposing a dominion-provincial conference to discuss those tax agreements or to discuss any substitute or alternative to them. He placed himself on record for political purposes in Manitoba last fall. What happened? His leader, the Prime Minister, called a dominion-provincial conference. Then an extraordinary situation arose. The Minister of Justice attended that conference, for the purposes of discussing fiscal relations and finding an alternative to the tax agreements, as a delegate of the dominion government. At that conference, in his opening speech, at page 14 of the record, the Prime Minister said this Liberal government—he did not use those words; he used the words "federal government"—is not wedded to the tax agreements. Here is what he said:

> The federal government has never contended that these agreements were a final, or a perfect, or a permanent answer to the problems in our fiscal relationships. I could quote, but will not take time to do so, Mr. Ilsley, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Harris all to this effect, as well as my predecessor and myself. We are quite prepared to see these agreements modified, improved, or even superseded by something better—if it can be found.

He went on to say:

> We in Ottawa have been exploring various possible modifications in our tax rental agreements, or alternatives to them—

Yet there still sits in the cabinet, the minister who said no alternative could be found, and that anyone who talks of or seeks to find an alternative is an enemy of confederation. That is what the Minister of Justice was saying at that time. The Prime Minister went on:

—and will have some thoughts to exchange with you about them.

Let us contrast that attitude of the Prime Minister with another statement of the Minister of Justice, which was made in Manitoba barely a year earlier. The Minister of Justice was decrying the efforts of those who sought to have dominion-provincial relations brought down to a sensible level and placed on a better basis than the tax rental agreements, as they were then. That is the same Minister of Justice we see here today. In his statement we see another example of the arrogance and complacency of the Liberal government. This is the text of his speech made in Manitoba on October 15, 1954. He pointed out that those tax agreements had been devised by this government and its advisers and had been under consideration since 1941. Then he went on to say:

It seems likely that all the available alternative methods have already been considered for meeting the problem which is being solved by the dominion-provincial tax agreements. One does not need to be a sceptic to doubt that a plan which is being advanced in 1954 has either been considered and rejected in the seventeen years of consideration which this subject has had since 1937, or that it has not been considered, because it was not thought to be worthy of consideration.

That was the Minister of Justice seeking to inflame the country against those who sought a revision of or an alternative to the tax agreements, an alternative which is so timely and necessary. There we find the Minister of Justice seeking to inflame the country against those who side with a revision of or an alternative to the tax agreements which is so timely and necessary. First he says that those who suggest these things are enemies of the country, and that it is nonsense and a waste of time to talk about it because, after all, this government has been in power for 20 years and if they could not think of a better method then nobody else could do so.

Then swallowing his own words and forgetful of principle—he, the champion who had stated that his party was wedded to this principle and would accept no substitute—he sits at the feet of his leader in the conference called to consider the matter and hears the Prime Minister say: "We are not wedded to the principle of tax agreements. We are prepared to consider any alternative anyone may put forward".

That is not the only example of divisive tactics and conflict between the position of ministers, and it is not the only example of shortcomings of administration in the field for which the Minister of Justice is responsible. I want to refer briefly to a case which was the subject of a report in the newspapers yesterday, namely the Coffin murder case. I say deliberately—and I want to choose my words carefully—that I am not aware of any occasion on which there has been a more deliberate or flagrant departure by a government from the principles that should govern the relationship of that government with the supreme court, the highest court in the land. In this case there was a deliberate interference by the government with the exercise by that court of its judicial function. Moreover, it was an interference which has placed in an impossible situation the most recent appointee of this government to the bench of that court. The gentleman to whom I refer was one of their own colleagues until a matter of a few years ago and, I think, is their most recent appointee.

What happened in this case? There was an application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. As is provided by the rules of the court, that application came before a single judge. It was heard by him in his capacity and in the scope of his duties as a judge of that court. In the exercise of his judicial function he made a finding that leave to appeal should not be granted.

Then certain representations were made to the government. Whether or not those representations should have been made is beside the point. The point is that the Minister of Justice allowed himself to be made a vehicle by which the government as a whole interfered with the exercise by the court of its judicial function and said in effect, "we do not like the decision of the court and we are going to refer it back to you for further consideration".

I point out that this matter has nothing to do with the exercise of clemency. If the government had wanted to exercise clemency in the case, or to have it reviewed, other methods are open to them. Proper methods are provided by the law, particularly that under section 596 of the Criminal Code. Under this section the minister may, upon an application for the mercy of the crown by or on behalf of a person who has been convicted in proceedings by indictment, direct by order in writing a new trial before any court he may think proper. That would be a proper exercise of the minister's responsibility, and if it were clemency or review they had in mind that was the proper course to follow. Instead of doing that, the minister and the government interfered with the exercise by the Supreme Court of Canada of its judicial function, saying in effect, "We have no confidence in the judicial capacity of our most recent appointee to that court".

This is a disgraceful interference in the work of the court and one which can only have a damaging effect. I do not wish to say anything which would be prejudicial to the court in the eyes of the public; the minister has done enough to the prejudice of the court already. But I am certain that persistence in such a course could not help but bring the court into disrepute and lower its esteem in the eyes of the people of Canada.

There are some things which I think should be recommended in this connection. Admittedly it was a difficult situation with which they were faced, but there again the minister is responsible for allowing the matter to drift along so that the situation arose. If there are defects in the rules of court in connection with the procedure for dealing with an application for leave to appeal, the rules of court should have been amended. As a matter of fact, I would suggest that earnest and immediate consideration should be given to the question of an amendment which would provide at least that any application for leave to appeal in a capital case would be heard by the full court. Indeed, it might well go so far as to provide that in a murder case leave will automatically be granted if applied for.

As I say, the court was placed in a difficult position in connection with this matter by the existence of the present rule; but the answer to that difficulty is an amendment to the rule, and not an interference with the exercise by the court of its judicial authority as has taken place in this case.

I should like to turn now to one or two other matters where we find repeated the pattern of inadequacy and omission on the part of the government. I shall deal first with the field of agricultural policies. Here, of course, we are dealing with the Minister of Agriculture, and it is rather difficult to extract and tie down any very definite statement of policy because that hon. gentleman is a master of the double statement; the statement he makes first and the correction he makes later after the weaknesses of his original statement have been exposed. But at least he is on record, in a way that he cannot escape, as having denied that there is a butter surplus in Canada. So first I shall refer to the mess they have made of butter. The minister has denied that surplus here in Ottawa, and he denied it in a meeting out in my own country, in Vernon, British Columbia.

Mr. Rowe: And in Winnipeg.

Mr. Fulton: I also understand that he denied it recently in Winnipeg. Yet the figures which were tabled here in the house the other day show that at the 1st of January the dominion government held 81 million pounds of butter. If there is no surplus in butter I would ask the house and the minister why the government is subsidizing communist countries at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers? If there is no surplus of butter, why do you have this disposal program which is an aid and a comfort to our enemies and not to ourselves or our friends?

It appears that the government's whole disposal program, another aspect of which we saw in connection with the arms deal which has been the subject of debate here, is one which will carry the disapproval of the people of Canada as a whole and will be strongly censured by them. I have already suggested that our people will not be happy —indeed they will be far from happy—about the fact that the government has committed this country to profit by arms shipments to both sides; and the situation is not improved by the highly moral but specious arguments put forward by the minister yesterday.

As I followed his words he adopted this attitude. Equality, he said, between those two countries on the verge of flying at each other's throats must rest on a sturdier basis.

Mr. Pearson: I was not referring to arms shipments at all.

Mr. Fulton: He was referring to the suggestion that he visit Israel. He said that equality must rest on a sturdier basis.

Mr. Pearson: I was talking about visits to the two countries.

Mr. Fulton: Apparently in his view equality rests on the sale of arms to both sides for profit.

Mr. Pearson: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Fulton: Then when he was criticizing the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), as reported at page 467 of Hansard, he went on to say this:

> Passion on either side of this issue is not likely to help.

From the minister's attitude one would suppose that he feels that arms shipments to both sides will help. I suggest to you that he will find, as you know and as we know, that the Canadian people disapprove strongly of such a course of action.

This was by way of interjection in my remarks on another surplus disposal program. Coming back to the question of agricultural policy, we find a mess in connection with the marketing of our grain. I am not going to discuss the situation on the prairies, because I am not as well acquainted with that field as are hon. members from that area, but I know the people in my own district are affected by the government's contradictory policy in this connection. Everyone feels that it would be a contribution to the solution of this problem to dispose of low grade grains as feed in order to make space available in the elevators for the higher grade grain now stored on the farms. My leader suggested that in the course of his speech here and he has suggested it frequently elsewhere as well. The Minister of Agriculture is on record as advocating such a policy. I have here the text of his address to the dominion-provincial agricultural conference held in Ottawa on December 7, at which time he advocated the use of feed grains in Ontario and elsewhere. The minister said:

> If they are going to sell western grain through livestock I think the cheapest way for them and the cheapest way for the farmers in the west is to get the grain moved from the farm out west to the farm down here and feed it. If the wheat board has regulations preventing that, well let us get after the wheat board and get the regulations changed.

Those are bold words, but who is in a better position than the Minister of Agriculture to get after the wheat board and make that possible? But he has not done so. Here is the Minister of Agriculture advocating in December, 1955, that farmers elsewhere should use low grade prairie grain to feed their cattle, yet that same minister only a few months previously cut in half the freight rate assistance on the movement of feed grain. As a result farmers in British Columbia, Ontario and the maritimes find it more difficult, indeed find it practically impossible, faced as they are with declining prices for their livestock, to pay the increased cost of feed grain. Yet because of increased competition for quality cattle their need for the feed grain is even greater than it was before. There we have another example of contradiction, weakness and vacillation on the part of the government, on the part of one minister with respect to the policies of his own department.

I shall not have time to review all the shortcomings of the government, as I have too long a catalogue here. But I do want to place on the record this further example of the government's thinking, and of the sort of explanation it offers the farmers and other people in this country for their problems. Incidentally, before I leave the other point, may I say that I advocate the restoration of the full measure of freight assistance on feed grain to the level it was before it was cut last year.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I want to place before the house a sample of the thinking of the Minister of Agriculture in connection with these problems for which he has some responsibility. He was talking to the dominion-provincial conference about the assistance to prairie farmers offered by the government's arrangement for them to get loans from the banks on their wheat, at 5 per cent. "Why", said the Minister of Agriculture, "they can double their money". I quote from pages 21 and 22 of the text of his address to the conference:

> Let us suppose it is a thousand dollar loan he had. By the time he gets through paying off the loan he has had two thousand dollars, not one. He had one thousand which he raised by loan and he has had the other thousand which he received for his grain as he goes along. If it lasts six months and he is able to get grain in the elevator, six months hence he will have had the thousand dollars he borrowed, he will get another thousand dollars out of the grain as he delivered it and he will get through in my opinion till next spring cheaper than he would get through any other way. He knows that too.

I suggest to my hon. friends of the Social Credit party that there they have a ready-made convert, except that his financial thinking is even more difficult to understand than that of my hon. friends.

My time is short and the catalogue of government shortcomings is long, so may I conclude by reminding you and the house that the Prime Minister must be held responsible—and is responsible—for these shortcomings. We have a picture of a government wrong about almost everything. They have been wrong about arms to Egypt and Israel. They have been wrong in their attitude to the house. They have been wrong about the butter surplus, and about farm prices. They have been wrong about wheat generally and in their feed grain policy. They have been wrong in their policy on dominion-provincial relations; they have been wrong on immigration and they have been wrong in connection with the administration of justice.

I suggest to you that indeed they are no longer entitled to the confidence of the house, and more particularly so far as this house is concerned, I suggest to you that because of the repeated neglect of their responsibilities to parliament, for that reason above all others they have forfeited any confidence previously reposed in them.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, a year ago the remarks I made in this debate caused a considerable number of hon. members to rise in their places to make speeches. I have been told that there are members in this house who find it most difficult to find anything worth mentioning in the house, and as a result seldom rise in their places.

I should like to say for the record that in saying what I did last year I at no time made reference to either the language or the religion of the majority of the people in the province of Quebec. I have always held the highest regard for that language and for the religion of most of the people there. In fact members of my immediate family belong to the same faith, so I would be one of the last to cast aspersions upon it. Many of the statements made constituted a complete misinterpretation of the intent of my remarks. I hope it was not intentional, but misinterpretation it was.

It seems odd to me that in Canada we have reached the state of affairs where westerners cannot speak of things that mean much to easterners without the easterners becoming exceedingly excited. I should like to answer a question that was put to me at the time by the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot), and I am sorry he is not in his seat. The hon. member asked me whether a French-Canadian and a Roman Catholic could be elected in the riding which I represent.

In reply to the hon. member may I say that never to my knowledge has anyone there asked a candidate to what faith he belonged or what was his racial origin. One of the finest members in this house who comes from British Columbia is of the Roman Catholic faith. One of the most distinguished premiers we have had in British Columbia was of the Roman Catholic faith. That in itself should be evidence that we do not ask people what their racial origin is or what is their faith when we elect them to public office.

Many references were also made to a rather large settlement in my constituency by the name of Maillardville, where there are thousands of Canadians of French descent who many years ago left the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick because they felt they could enjoy a higher standard of living in British Columbia. They have come to British Columbia and they feel at home and are happy there. They are accepted as, and are, excellent citizens. True enough, we may at times have our little misunderstandings, but I can assure you that we shall solve those misunderstandings around the council table and not by hurling threats at one another. We simply do not do things that way.

Without wishing in any way to create the impression that I did not mean what I said last year, I want to put in a word on behalf of hundreds of thousands of people living in the province of Quebec. It concerns the matter of the new C.N.R. hotel in that province. We in Vancouver would resent it very much if a new hotel were built in Vancouver and what to some of us might be a foreign name were applied to that hotel. The people of the province of Quebec have shown in no unmistakable terms that they feel hurt by the name that has been recommended for the new hotel, and I have yet to hear a satisfactory explanation from this government as to why the obvious wishes of the people there should not be acceded to. I am sure the people of British Columbia, at least, do not care at all what name is applied to the hotel in Montreal. As long as it makes people there happy, we shall be satisfied.

I now turn to other subjects. If it were not so serious I would be inclined to be a little amused by the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday came close to shedding crocodile tears when he said that if we had sold arms to all the countries that have asked us for arms, more Canadians would have had employment. That is too bad. Apparently, according to that version, we shall have to begin manufacturing arms and selling them all over the world in order to rid ourselves of our unemployment problems.

We are concerned with this problem, and vitally so. We all hope that a major world conflict has been avoided and will be avoided for the foreseeable future. However, we all have to reconcile ourselves to seeing many small wars in the world in the years ahead. I hope that through the United Nations we shall be able to hold these down to a minimum where they exist, and they will continue to exist.

We in Canada have the raw materials which are the sinews of war, the wherewithal out of which armaments are made. As a result of world war II, we have developed the industrial capacity to manufacture these raw materials into armaments, and there are many people in Canada who are very much concerned lest this country become the arsenal of the merchants of death all over the world. We are very much concerned. For many years we have heaped abuse—and plenty of it—on armaments manufacturers in other parts of the world, and I believe rightly so. We want to be sure what Canadian policy is. If the government say we have to keep both sides supplied, I hope that does not mean we are going to be supplying both sides of all the little wars and all the little revolutions that may occur.

I have a few words to say in regard to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Here also I find it very hard to determine just what is the policy of the government. In British Columbia we frequently have the honour of having in our midst the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. He must be a keen analyst of the thinking of people in various parts of Canada, because when he comes to our fair province he seems to go out on a limb in some of his announcements. I understand that in a talk he gave there not many months ago he made the statement that in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration such a thing as racial discrimination does not exist.

I do not see how the minister could make that statement when our regulations and orders in council governing immigration themselves provide for racial discrimination. We find it very hard to understand how he can go out there and inform us that racial discrimination does not exist. I would advise him to ask the Canadians of East Indian origin in western Canada whether they would agree with him when he says that racial discrimination does not exist. I would also like to have him ask the officials of the West Indies whether they would agree with him that racial discrimination does not exist.

I also noted the statement he made to the effect that, in the interests of helping world peace, Canada was willing to accept some of the Arab refugees from the troubled areas. However, he did say that they must be able to speak either the English or the French language, and that they must have a trade in which they could be employed once they were here. I do not see how that is helping the situation at all. Surely the minister must be well aware that even those refugees who are able to speak either English or French do not have a trade. If we are to take them into Canada we shall have to be prepared to train them so they can play a useful role in our national life.

I am also a little concerned about the screening process through which we hear these immigrants must go. I have some reasons to believe that the screening process exists only in the imagination of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I have met a goodly number of immigrants to Canada, and I have found their political leanings so widely diversified that I cannot see just of what the screening process consists. In my opinion it is certainly not screening out any communists. I would once again plead that the minister consider—if Canada needs a greater population, and I agree that it does—bringing into Canada orphans on a mass scale. That is something that could be very ably organized by the department of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The other day I read that Great Britain would like to have a population of seven million less than it now has. I do not really appreciate the reasons thus far given as to why more of these seven million people could not be admitted into Canada. I can see one possible reason and that is the known Liberal hatred of anything British. It seems that now they are even replacing our Union Jack with the uncle Louis pyjama flag as our national flag.

I should like to endorse the views expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) when he complained of a lack of national leadership. I was here at the opening of the dominion-provincial conference last October. I thought the Prime Minister would open the conference by giving some leadership to the Canadian nation. Instead he got up and more or less said in effect, "East is east and west is west and Canada is yours. Help yourself to whatever opinions you like; maybe black is grey, although I am not too sure, and maybe white is green". Then he sat down.

I was proud indeed of the ten men who represented the provinces of Canada. I thought each of them did very well. They spoke ably. They had opinions they wished to present, and all of them stated they were quite prepared to listen to other opinions and to arrive at an agreement. Despite the lack of leadership by the Prime Minister at the opening of the conference, I am sure all of us were hopeful that he had acted in that manner by deliberate design in order to allow the premiers to air their views, and we expected he would then supply the leadership necessary in order to arrive at a satisfactory solution.

What happened? There were several days of negotiations and conferences behind closed doors. The premiers went home thinking they would be called back again for the purpose of having presented to them one or more plans that could be the subject of debate and further negotiation. But what happened? Instead, there was no compromise. There was no "Canada is yours" any more but merely a cold-blooded letter saying, "Boys, I have listened to your beefs long enough. This is it. I am old and I am tired, and I want this thing settled." Of what avail are all the great protestations about conciliation, that we must unite Canada, that we must reach an agreement and devise a plan upon which all can agree, if the premiers are to be faced with a letter and told that this is it?

Even this afternoon the Prime Minister said in effect, if not in intent, that this was it and there would be no further negotiations. I am not nearly as proud of the leadership offered to Canada by the Prime Minister as I am of the leadership being offered to each of the ten provinces by their premiers. We also see the lack of leadership in the cabinet vacancies that now exist and the fact that some of the most important cabinet posts are held by men who also hold other cabinet offices. I am somewhat inclined to feel that the Prime Minister is afraid to fill the existing cabinet vacancies. Surely the biggest business in the country operated by the government, the post office, deserves its own cabinet minister.

Is there no Liberal member of parliament with the ability to fill this cabinet post? Is there no cabinet minister who could be promoted to that post and his lesser responsibilities given to one of the Liberal backbenchers? I can see one reason why the Toronto members might not be awarded cabinet posts. The Toronto people have the unique ability to elect C.C.F. people under the Liberal label, people who sit in this house as Liberals.

Mr. Carrick: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am a Toronto member and I assure my hon. friend there is no tinge of the C.C.F. in my make-up.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to refer to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick), but since he has risen on a question of privilege I can assure him he was not one of those I had in mind. I was referring to some members from that city who are slightly his senior. I can also sense that there is a little bit of difficulty, because I noticed the other day that not all the Toronto members have the privilege of preparing their speeches in the anterooms of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The minister was very much concerned the other day when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre interrupted the hon. member for Trinity and asked that he not be permitted to continue reading his speech. Therefore I can understand some of the difficulties the Prime Minister is facing in that part of Canada.

I also am somewhat at a loss to understand many of the Liberal speeches in this debate. You could take at least 12 of them, tie them together and wrap them up, and I think you could use them as fairly good C.C.F. campaign literature. I noticed that one of them devoted his energy to the subject of federal aid to education, something we have consistently offered to the nation and which the Liberals have consistently voted against in the house. Another spoke about the guaranteed annual wage, something perfectly consistent with socialist philosophy and heartily endorsed by us. Yet I am sure if that matter were put to a vote the hon. member would feel obligated to vote against it because of the wishes of the Liberal hierarchy.

I could mention many other subjects that were referred to. The Liberal party seem to be falling apart at the seams. They are groping for the needle and thread with which to sew themselves together. They are unable to find the thread, and the needles are pricking them all over. No leadership is being given by the Liberal party in Canada, and no leadership is being given the Canadian people by the Prime Minister of Canada. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, so that it may be on the record, what is the national interest of Canada? Is there such a thing as a nation, and what is the national interest? Surely it must exist. After all, Mackenzie King's chickens of national unity are coming home to roost, and I sympathize with the Prime Minister that he has to eat the soup cooked for him over so many years.

I have been in southeastern Manitoba this year and the attitude there is, give us the Social Crediters, give us the Conservatives, give us the C.C.F.'ers, give us anything except the Liberals; we are sick and tired of what we have now.

I was very pleased to hear the Minister of Labour make an announcement rectifying the blunder made in the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. This, Mr. Speaker, is how the Liberal party operates. When this problem was put before us back home by labour leaders I mentioned the possibility that any payments might be made retroactive. I said that if the government admitted they had made a blunder then they owed money to a lot of unemployed people by way of unemployment insurance payments.

One of the so-called labour leaders who is a member of the local Liberal hierarchy immediately saw the difficult situation in which the government would be and jumped to the defence of the government. He said, "Oh, that would be completely unrealistic; it would be impossible. Think of all the red tape involved." Yet the Minister of Labour rose on the floor of the house today and announced that the payments will be made retroactive and that the unemployed will receive what they rightfully deserve.

I should like to repeat one plea I have made before. I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to undertake a survey to ascertain how much it would cost to provide all the Canadian people with a comprehensive cradle to the grave social security program, as has been advocated by the C.C.F. party for many years. Today we have family allowances, pensions for the blind, mothers' allowances, relief or, as it is sometimes called, social welfare, pensions for the handicapped, war veterans allowances, annuities, life insurance, fire insurance, hail insurance, crop insurance, car insurance, marine insurance, subsidies paid to this section of the population and that, and a system of unemployment insurance.

Now we are talking in terms of health insurance, and I think the next thing we will need is an insurance policy to save us from the many insurance agents flooding the nation. All this must surely involve terrific overhead costs for administration. From Conservative and Liberal governments we have obtained a piecemeal social security program. I deliberately place Conservative governments first because most social security legislation that has been placed on the statute books of Canada has actually been instigated by the Conservative party and not by the Liberals, as they so often say. The Liberal party program has always consisted of almost implementing something.

An hon. Member: What a socialist joker!

Mr. Regier: I am doing my best to make my remarks as brief as I can.

An hon. Member: That is good.

Mr. Regier: However, Mr. Speaker, I must appeal this year to the members of the house who come from the province of Quebec. I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce is selling short the national interest of Canada. Deliberately or otherwise he has engaged in a terrific selling out of the national interest of Canada to the United States of America and, as my leader said in his opening speech this year, once you lose economic control how long do you expect to keep political control? I feel it is done unconsciously, and is the inevitable result of the policies of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We are exporting our raw resources. We are living on money borrowed, and on our heritage which is rapidly being depleted.

In the city of Seattle, Mr. Speaker, a housewife can buy hydroelectric power manufactured in the province of British Columbia for less money than can the housewife in my constituency. Much could be said about our oil resources and our gas resources. The economic interests south of the border should shoulder much of the blame for the difficulties in our coal industry.

I should like to point out that there are more farmers in Canada who do not grow wheat than there are who do. These other farmers in Canada suffer continuously, and have suffered over a long period of years as the result of our worship of the United States production line. I must conclude now, Mr. Speaker, as I understand there is another member who would like to speak. While I should like to express my condemnation of the attitude of the Liberal party in taking half of the time in this debate, yet I feel that this individual is not at all responsible, so I should not take vengeance on him by using my full time.

I should like to end with one small plea to the Minister of Justice. I understand that the salaries of civil servants are under review at the present time. We have in Canada hundreds of penitentiary guards, and I wonder if the minister is aware that these guards earn less money than the average Canadian civil servant. They receive about the same rate of pay as the postman who delivers mail from door to door. In my estimation their salary plan is most undesirable. The Archambault commission recommended that the special responsibilities of these men be recognized and that they be put in a much higher category. You cannot expect to train penologists and interest men in that work by paying them what amounts to one of the lowest salaries in the Dominion of Canada.

I believe the case of these guards deserves special consideration, and when salary increases are being considered these men should be awarded a greater increase than the others. In addition, the other day there was a fire in one of the little houses along the wall of the Kingston penitentiary. The men in New Westminster complain about conditions there. In a modern city such as New Westminster the men have to stay in these houses which have no washroom facilities. I feel that is a disgrace in a city that has a modern sewage system. There is only a small coal and wood stove for heating purposes. With practically all the facilities and the technical help necessary right within the penitentiary walls, electric heaters could be installed in these houses to make life bearable for these men who have to stand watch for long hours. I hope the minister will consider that and not allow a flat across the board percentage increase for civil servants to be applied to these guards. I trust the minister will look after these men whom he hopes will save Canada a lot of money by reforming the inmates. I hope he will see that a little more incentive is offered to them.

Half these guards have other employment. One of the men who has been working for 12 years as a penitentiary guard spends all his spare time forking manure for a mushroom farmer. I think that is a disgrace. The wages these men receive are entirely inadequate to support a family in decency.

Before I sit down I should like to summarize my main message. I again appeal to the Prime Minister. You have under your leadership a nation immensely wealthy in natural resources and a people second to none in the world. You are of French Canadian origin. Times are as good as they have ever been. No Prime Minister of Canada has ever had the opportunity you have. If you will supply the aggressive leadership needed for nationhood, Canada will become truly great. If you allow Canada to fall apart or her interests to be sold out to our friendly but huge neighbour to the south; if you allow Canada to disintegrate as you are allowing the Liberal party to disintegrate, our happy days may not last long.

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat that by virtue of standing order No. 28 he must address himself to Mr. Speaker. In the last few minutes, he has made me responsible for a good many things.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) left me enough time to pronounce the benediction in this debate. And speaking of benediction, I see that he has applied for absolution, and they say that absolution is better late than never.

I am also glad to see that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), is in his seat. I am sorry to see that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) is not, because I am going to pay a tribute to the lady members on both sides of the house. I noticed by the press that there is a woman in Toronto who thinks there are too many bald-headed men in parliament. As one of the balding-headed men, I thought I might rise on a question of privilege. We do need more women in parliament, but we do not need more women in parliament because of any bald-headed men who sit here. For instance, take the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), who is not too well thatched in the upper storey.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Philpott: I mean outside. Only a year ago hon. members of the opposition were unanimously after his scalp, but see how successfully he has emerged. Not only has he come up with an equal pay for equal work bill, but today he has come up with amendments to the unemployment insurance regulations which have plugged one of the loopholes that have been discovered. I also see the thinly thatched hon. member for York South smiling, which indicates that he is glad because of the changes that have been made.

I want to pay my respects to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I must say that we on this side of the house are proud of our lady member. We are proud of the very valiant work she did, especially in helping those of us on this side who were in favour of equal pay for equal work. I think I would be most ungallant if I did not say that we also pay a real tribute to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), whose consistent advocacy of the equal pay for equal work bill helped to speed it up and get the government to adopt it. I had the great honour to speak in her favour; I had the great honour to vote for her bill each time in the last three years, and I must say, for what it is worth, that I myself fully intend always to support any good idea no matter from what quarter of the house it comes. I fully intend to support every good idea that comes from the opposition. The trouble is that in the three years I have been here there has been only one good idea emanate from the opposition benches, and that is the one that originated with the hon. member for Hamilton West.

If the truth be known, Mr. Speaker, the Tory men—I will exempt the Tory women—and the whole Tory party of Canada have had only one new idea in the entire twentieth century, and that was the Bennett buggy. If we are not careful we shall be back to Bennett buggies again before too many years have passed.

I have listened for many days to the things that are supposed to be wrong with the government. Did you notice, Mr. Speaker, the difference between this year and last year? Last year the rafters of this building literally rang with loud cries of anguish from the Tory benches about how the country was galloping to the dogs because of mass unemployment, and the loudest voice raised was that of the loud-voiced gentleman the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) who this afternoon, if you please, rose and said that Canada is at an all-time peak of prosperity. This is quite an admission from the hon. member for Broadview.

Therefore I say that my hon. friends immediately opposite, who are now crying similar blue ruin with respect to the temporary wheat surplus, may be just as incorrect as they were in the previous two years, and as the Tories were a year ago in regard to unemployment. In any event, I have listened very carefully for ten full days to the speeches made by hon. gentlemen of the opposition, and with one exception I have yet to hear from the Tory benches, the C.C.F. benches, or the Social Credit benches one single suggestion to the government of Canada or the wheat board of Canada as to how they can sell one single extra bushel of wheat, or for that matter how they can even give away a single bushel of wheat, because no practical suggestion has been made except by one hon. gentleman, namely the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) who did make a practical proposition.

We have heard the question from the opposition benches, can the leopard change its spots? I submit that the Tory leopard has not changed its spots, because the only election they really won in this whole century on their own merits was the election of 1911, and they won it on the cry of "no truck or trade with the Yankees".

I sat back in this debate to the very end, hoping that the Tories would repent at last of the atrocious statement of policy which was made in this house two years ago by their official spokesman on international affairs, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who laid down in most explicit terms the proposition that we should not sell a single bushel of wheat or a single pound of butter to any part of the communist world, which is one-third of the world. So far as we have been able to hear, not a single member of the Tory opposition has risen in his place and suggested that this policy should be reversed. If I am wrong I hope they will correct me later on in the debate on international affairs.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when I say there has been no new idea put out by the Tory party in this century except the Bennett buggy, it seems to me I am on solid ground because, whereas in 1911 it was "no truck or trade with the Yankees", in the year 1956, and in the election of 1957 or 1958, obviously the Tory cry is going to be "no truck or trade with the communists"—one-third of the world—"no truck or trade with China, Russia, or the 100 million in the satellite countries who are held in servitude".

I say, Mr. Speaker, nothing has emerged in this debate, or anywhere else I have seen, to suggest that there is to be any change in the next election. Today the hon. member for Broadview talked about the Gallup poll. Well, it seems to me that just as in the last election when they galloped to their doom on the phony issue of horses on the payroll, today they are nosediving to disaster on the equally phony issue of the 15 unarmed Harvard trainers that Egypt is trying to buy.

If this government has and retains the confidence of the people of Canada and the respect of the people of the world, it is due to a very simple fact, namely that the Liberals are a peacemaker party, and our government has respect all over the world as one of the great, practical, peacemaking aggregations in the world today.

Let us look at what happened in the past year. We had no fewer than three cabinet ministers abroad on peacemaking missions. We had the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) in his own way doing a very fine job and, as it turned out, at considerable physical cost to himself. We had our past master peacemaker, the veteran Secretary of State for External Affairs who, for my money, is the most practical peacemaker in the whole world today. If it is true—and it is true—that we won a tremendous success at the United Nations in that so-called package deal, it was not entirely owing to the man to whom I intend to come in a moment. It was owing to the fact that for many, many years the Secretary of State for External Affairs had carefully laid the groundwork for the great success the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was finally able to bring about at Lake Success.

It seems to me that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare was able to obtain that tremendous victory at New York it was for two reasons. The first apparently is because he is also a practical peacemaker well worthy to sit beside the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But it was also because the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his own person represented what is the great opportunity of our time. He is both the man trying to make peace at New York and the man in charge of social welfare in Canada. When he struggled with all his might and with such great skill to get those 16 nations into the United Nations, I believe that what he was really thinking was this. If we can get peace in the world we can have in Canada higher old age pensions, better family allowances and, at the right time, health insurance; we can do all the things that have to be done when we get the full welfare state instead of the warfare state. But you cannot get the welfare state instead of the warfare state until you get real peace. The package deal was a great contribution to that state of peace.

I do not intend to try to keep the house beyond the time limit, but I will say this. I do not know at what time the people of Canada will decide it is time for a change and time once again to try the same old Tory party with the same old Bennett buggies that we had in the thirties. If they so decide, it is all right with me. In the present Leader of the Opposition I think they will get as good a Tory prime minister as there has ever been since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald; but for my money I hope the people of Canada will allow the present prime minister, who is approaching his 74th birthday, to serve quite as long as did that grand old British oak, that great statesman Sir Winston Churchill, who served to the full age of 81.

I remember how well and how often my Tory friends on the other side of the chamber—including, I believe, my good and second oldest personal friend in the house, the Leader of the Opposition—applauded the fact that the great leader of the British Conservative party was able to serve to the grand and ripe age of 81. Perhaps in God's good grace and with the consent of the Canadian people a Liberal prime minister of Canada may serve to the great age attained by Gladstone, that grand old Liberal of Britain who served, I believe, until he was no less than 84.

We talk about the grand old British oak. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is about our hard Canadian maple one thing which makes it well worthy to stand beside that grand old British oak. The Canadian maple is never so glorious as it is in the autumn. Who knows but that in God's good grace the most glorious years of achievement of the present Prime Minister of Canada may be in the future seven years which would give him a service record equal in length to that of the grand old man of British politics.

In conclusion may I say, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Philpott: I am glad to note that the exuberant enthusiasm of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) for my speech has caused him to utter that expression. Perhaps I have the identity wrong; nevertheless I am glad to note that I have caused the Social Credit benches to burst into expressions of ardent enthusiasm, because I am just coming to a Social Credit suggestion.

May I say, Mr. Prime Minister, that I do not share in any way the disrespect which the previous speakers have shown to the idea of a Canadian flag. I believe that you, sir, have done as much as has any prime minister of this century or any prime minister we have ever had to unify us on the idea of the British commonwealth. However, I think you could help to crown your great career by giving to Canada an official Canadian flag that Canadians of every nationality could respect and love.

I said I would deal with a Social Credit suggestion, and I shall do so. I think the best and most practical suggestion that I have yet heard on this question of a Canadian flag was made by the acting leader of the Social Credit opposition. I refer to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). In the debate a couple of years ago he suggested that, in connection with the next election, we should have a plebiscite enabling the people of Canada to choose from among several designs a flag of their own which every Canadian could love.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The house divided on the motion (Mrs. Shipley) which was agreed to on the following division:

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

STARRED QUESTIONS

RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS' PENSIONS

Question No. 1—Mr. Knowles:

1. Has consideration been given, at any time since the end of the 1955 session of this house, to increasing the pensions of retired federal civil servants, particularly those whose pensions are in the lower and middle brackets?

2. If so, what is the result of such consideration?

3. If not, is this matter now under consideration by the government?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first and third questions is no, and that renders an answer to the second one unnecessary.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BASIC PENSION

Question No. 3—Mr. Knowles:

1. Has any provision yet been made for any increase in the pensions of retired employees of the Canadian National Railways who are in receipt of only the basic pension of $25 per month?

2. Has any reconsideration been given by the government, or by the management of the Canadian National Railways, at any time since February 23, 1955, to increasing the amount of the said basic pension? If so, what is the result of such reconsideration?

3. If no decision has yet been taken on this matter, is it now under consideration?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, the answer to each of the three questions is no.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—CANADIANS EMPLOYED BY U.S. GOVERNMENT

Question No. 4—Mr. Barnett:

1. Have steps been taken since the end of the last session to provide unemployment insurance coverage for Canadians employed by the United States government and its agencies on Newfoundland bases?

2. If so, what are they and what coverage is now in effect?

3. If not, what steps are being taken to provide for such coverage?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, the answer I shall give will apply to all three parts of question No. 4.

Negotiations have been initiated with the United States government and are continuing in the matter of providing unemployment insurance coverage for Canadian civilians employed in Canada by the armed forces of the United States. That, of course, includes the area mentioned in the question.

There are indications that a satisfactory solution of this problem will result from these negotiations. I hope to be in a position to make a more positive statement on this subject at a later date during this session.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FOR FISHERMEN

Question No. 5—Mr. Goode:

What progress has been made, since the last session of parliament, to bring into effect unemployment insurance for fishermen in British Columbia?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I was notified on the orders of the day of a question from the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) in almost the same terms as this question. My reply, of course, shall apply not only to British Columbia but to the east and west coasts as well as to inland waters.

Hon. members will recall that this question was discussed at some length in the standing committee on industrial relations last session. Much of this discussion will be found from page 299 to page 326 of the minutes of proceedings of that committee. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and officials of his department appeared before the committee. During those discussions I think most of those participating reluctantly had to agree that it would be difficult to bring under the Unemployment Insurance Act those who are owners or are self-employed or who fish on a straight share basis. In view of this, it was felt that even if the remainder—approximately 7 per cent—who go out to fish, namely the wage earners, could be brought under the act and have their fishing employment count along with other employment toward benefits it would be unfair to the main body of the fishermen.

Consequently there was brought about something of a reorientation of the studies related to the whole fisherman group, whereby the Department of Fisheries undertook to explore every possible means of better stabilization of revenue on behalf of the self-employed and those on a share basis, and co-ordinated with that effort the unemployment insurance commission would make further efforts toward fitting the remainder, namely the wage earners, under the insurance plan.

I should add that during the past summer a senior officer of the commission made a firsthand investigation of the practices followed in the United Kingdom and in several European countries where fishing is an important industry. The commission's report on this investigation has not yet been received, but when it is it will be turned over for study.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GREAT LAKES—ELIMINATION OF LAMPREYS

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

For a copy of all letters, resolutions and representations by municipalities or other organizations in Canada, brought to the attention of the government, and having to do with the lamprey menace in the great lakes, and the rehabilitation of fishing industry in the said lakes, especially trout fishing.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINE

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all memoranda, correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of any of the provinces, since January 1, 1954, regarding proposals for the building of a trans-Canada pipe line.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, obviously the consent of the provinces will be required before communications from them can be tabled. As I should like to discuss the question of documents with the mover of the motion, perhaps it could be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

UNITED STATES WHEAT DISPOSAL PROGRAM

Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all communications exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the United States from January 1, 1955 to December 31, 1955, relating to the United States wheat disposal program.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I hope this motion will also be allowed to stand subject to communication with the United States government, whose consent will have to be obtained before the correspondence can be brought down.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

Mr. Fulton (for Mr. Diefenbaker):

For a copy of all correspondence with the government of Saskatchewan since the 1st day of July, 1955, regarding the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project together with any reports of engineers or other investigations as to the feasibility of this project.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The hon. gentleman will recognize that there will have to be communication with the government of Saskatchewan before we can comply with the motion in this house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the intention that the motion should stand or is it adopted subject to the remarks made by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Fulton: I understood that it would be adopted subject to the remarks made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Perhaps it would be preferable to have it stand, because if it were made an order of the house then it might have to be rescinded. Perhaps it would be better to have it stand until I can inform the mover of the motion that the consent of the government of Saskatchewan has been obtained.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

EXPROPRIATION OF VETERANS' PROPERTY, B.C.

Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the officials of the Veterans Land Act administration, Vancouver, and the province of British Columbia, from January 1, 1955 to date, regarding expropriation of property held by the veterans under the Veterans Land Act, on Patterson road, Richmond, British Columbia, said expropriation for approaches to the Oak street bridge.

Mr. Lapointe: In this case also it would be necessary to obtain the consent of the provincial authorities of British Columbia. However, I agree to the motion.

Mr. Coldwell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; this is something new, I think, that is creeping into our procedure, whereby we require the consent or authority of the provinces, in this case British Columbia. I feel it is merely a courtesy and I believe the remarks of the ministers, in case they create a precedent, should be so worded.

Mr. Goode: Speaking to the point of order, I would say that it would be most embarrassing to the government of British Columbia to allow me to have the production of these papers. If we continue this practice, some members might be refused by the provinces in connection with things that we should have at our disposal.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, WINNIPEG

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any sections or portions of the contract or contracts, respecting the construction of the new post office building in Winnipeg, which relate to any obligations or requirements that the contractors maintain work thereon at a progressive rate during the winter months.

DEER LODGE VETERANS' HOSPITAL, WINNIPEG

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any sections or portions of the contract or contracts, respecting the construction of the addition to the Deer Lodge veterans' hospital at Winnipeg, which relate to any obligations or requirements that the contractors maintain work thereon at a progressive rate during the winter months.

P.F.R.A. AND P.F.A.A. OFFICIALS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a return showing a list of all the P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. officials or field officers with their respective postal or home address, salaries and expenses paid to each of them during the year 1955.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Perhaps this motion might be allowed to stand until the mover and the Minister of Agriculture are in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

CANADA HEALTH AND ACCIDENT CORPORATION

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of any correspondence or communications exchanged between the superintendent of insurance and the Canada Health and Accident Assurance Corporation, Waterloo, Ontario, or its president, Mr. E. E. Putnam, or any director of the said corporation, dated at any time since January 1, 1955.

He said: The documents sought by the terms of this motion, Mr. Speaker, were tabled a few hours after I filed the motion. They were tabled in response to a similar motion that was passed by the house last year, so this motion can be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Motion withdrawn.

BOX CARS

Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, or other communications since August 1, 1955, exchanged between the transport controller and any person, persons, company or companies, relative to increasing the number of box cars available for transporting grain.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Friday, Mr. Speaker, we shall take the resolutions standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to wheat, No. 2 first and No. 3 second. Then if there is time we shall take the one standing in my name with respect to the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It is the intention of the government to set aside Tuesday and Wednesday for the debate on external affairs. We shall follow the device we used on previous occasions of having the Secretary of State for External Affairs move that the house be now adjourned, and by agreement that motion will be debatable and subject to amendment.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MUNICIPAL GRANTS FOR SERVICES TO INDIAN RESERVATIONS

Question No. 3—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. For the four fiscal years ending March 31 last, and for the period since March 31 last, how many municipalities have received grants or payments under the Municipal Grants Act for reimbursements for services to Indian reservations within a given municipality in respect of services, such as roads, sewers, fire, police, etc.?

2. What are the names of such municipalities and how much did each receive?

Answer by: Mr. Harris:

1. Six municipalities.

2. Grants under the Municipal Grants Act in lieu of real estate taxes for services rendered to Indian reserves:

	During fiscal year ending March 31
Name of Municipality	1952	1953	1954	1955	1956	*Total

APPLICATIONS FOR LOANS ON GRAIN

Question No. 12—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bank loans on farm-stored grain subject to government guarantees have been applied for in each province, week by week, since the inception of the plan in November last?

2. Of the said applications, how many have been turned down or refused?

3. What is the total amount loaned in each province to date?

Answer by: Mr. Harris:

1 and 2. As applications are made to chartered banks, the government has no record of the number of loans applied for and the number turned down or refused.

3. To November 30, 1955: Manitoba, $2,511,349.43; Saskatchewan, $1,768,034.50; Alberta, $633,897.50.

AID UNDER COLOMBO PLAN

Question No. 38—Mr. MacInnis:

1. Which countries received aid from Canada under the Colombo plan in the calendar year 1955 or the fiscal year 1954-55?

2. What amount of aid did each country receive and for what projects?

Answer by: Mr. Pearson:

Colombo plan records of allocations and expenditures are established on the basis of the fiscal year. The attached statements relate to the fiscal year 1954-55. The first statement shows the allocations to capital projects in each recipient country. The second statement covers the expenditures for experts, equipment and trainees under the technical assistance program.

INDIAN SCHOOLS—TEACHERS

Question No. 42—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many teachers are there in the Indian schools under the jurisdiction of the Department of Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?
2. What is the initial salary received by such teachers, and what is the amount of the annual increase?
3. Are such increases automatic?

Answer by: Mr. Pickersgill:

1. As of December 31, 1955, there were 646 teachers employed in Indian day schools and 290 teachers employed in government-owned Indian residential schools. During the summer months 38 teachers were employed in seasonal schools.

2. A salary schedule is in effect for teachers employed in Indian schools and the initial salary receivable is dependent on the teachers' academic and professional qualifications and their teaching experience as well as the duties which they perform. Teachers with no teaching experience and no teacher's certificate, receive the minimum salary of $1,300 per annum. Teachers with first class certificates and five or more years of teaching experience receive an initial salary of $2,950 per annum. The amount of the annual increase ranges from $100 to $180 according to the classification and grade of the teacher.

3. Annual increases are not automatic. Increases depend upon satisfactory service and periodic attendance at summer school courses sponsored by a provincial department of education or a recognized university or equivalent courses in academic and professional subjects approved by the department.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 26, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1956-57

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1957, was presented by Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the following members, namely: Messrs. Ashbourne, Bertrand, Blair, Boivin, Bonnier, Brown (Brantford), Bryson, Campbell, Cardiff, Charlton, Dechene, Dickey, Fairclough, Mrs., Fontaine, Gauthier (Nickel Belt), Gingras, Girard, Gour (Russell), Habel, Hansell, Healy, Hodgson, Houck, Howe (Wellington-Huron), Huffman, James, Johnson (Kindersley), Kickham, Langlois (Berthier- Maskinonge-Delanaudiere), Leduc (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle), Lefrançois, MacDougall, MacEachen, Maltais, Mang, McGregor, McIvor, McWilliam, Patterson, Pommer, Rea, Regier, Robinson (Bruce), Rochefort, Schneider, Simmons, Small, Smith (York North), Stanton, Stick, Thibault, Weaver, Wylie and Zaplitny, will act as members on the part of this house on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house has appointed Messrs. Bertrand, Bourque, Brown (Essex West), Carrick, Castleden, Coldwell, Dechene, Dinsdale, Fairey, Fraser (St. John's East), Fraser (Peterborough), Gingues, Gourd (Chapleau), Habel, Hamilton (York West), Hansell, Hellyer, Henderson, Howe (Wellington-Huron), Hunter, Jones, Jutras, Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare), Knight, LaCroix, Leboe, Leduc (Gatineau), Legare, McCulloch (Pictou), McGregor, McWilliam, Philpott, Pickersgill, Ratelle, Reinke, Robinson (Bruce), Small, Smith (York North), Smith (Battle River-Camrose), Thibault, Tucker, Tustin, Weselak and White (Middlesex East), a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ACQUISITION AND LOSS OF CITIZENSHIP

Mr. H. A. MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member explain?

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I assure the house that this amendment I have moved is not at all contentious. It is done with a view to trying to create among new Canadian citizens a little more citizenship consciousness. If hon. members will possess their souls in patience it will be in print in a day or two, and I think all hon. members will probably support it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HEALTH INSURANCE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that the federal-provincial conference in October established a committee of federal and provincial ministers of health and of finance to study health insurance questions. This committee has been meeting here this week in camera, in accordance with the expressed desire of the provincial representatives at the conference.

I made a public statement of the general policy of the government on this subject at the opening of the conference in October. This has been furnished to all hon. members in the proceedings of the conference. The main point of that policy statement was that when a majority of the provincial governments, representing a majority of the people of Canada, are ready to put into effect programs to provide hospital care as a measure of health insurance under provincial jurisdiction and management, the federal government would recommend to parliament legislation to provide financial support and technical assistance to the provinces for such programs.

Constitutional responsibility in this field lies, of course, with the provincial governments, and we have no desire to interfere in their exercise of it, nor to urge any provincial government to take this major step in social policy before it feels prepared to meet the substantial administrative and financial problems which are involved. Provincial spokesmen have made quite clear, however, that they would expect parliament to provide some share of the finances required by a grant in aid, as was done in the case of other major social security and health programs.

Public opinion appears to support the view that it would be proper for the federal government to recommend such assistance. The government has not felt it could recommend assistance for only a few provinces to undertake this great social innovation, but if a majority of provinces, such as I have mentioned, are ready to embark upon it, and wish assistance, we feel it would be justified.

The discussions with the provincial representatives have now reached a stage where it seems desirable that the federal government should state the nature of the financial assistance it would ask parliament to provide under the circumstances I have described. This is desirable in order that provincial governments can estimate the amounts they would have to finance in undertaking a program along these lines.

I think it is appropriate that I inform the house, in general terms, of the nature of the proposed basis of assistance at about the same time that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in an adjoining room, is informing the provincial representatives. He will be reporting in more detail upon these matters to the house at the first appropriate opportunity.

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

When a majority of the provinces, as I have mentioned, are ready to proceed we would recommend to parliament that it enact legislation to provide a grant to each province operating a hospital care insurance program. The amount of the grant would be a fraction of carefully defined shareable operating costs of hospital care, being 25 per cent of the per capita shareable costs in that province, plus 25 per cent of the average per capita shareable costs in Canada as a whole, multiplied by the population covered by the provincial program. The programs in which we would share would provide standard ward care.

This formula will leave a substantial incentive for economy and efficiency with each provincial authority, together with a large measure of federal assistance and equity in its distribution. It will mean that on the whole the federal treasury would bear about one-half of the net shareable operating costs of such programs of hospital insurance.

We would not propose under this legislation to share the costs of care for mental illness and tuberculosis, which provincial governments have traditionally provided and for the improvement of which parliament has already been providing grants under the national health grants program.

We are also prepared to include in our recommendation to parliament the addition to this hospital program of laboratory, radiological and other diagnostic services for patients outside of hospitals as well as in them. Already a start has been made toward these services under the national health grants program, and those who have studied the subject consider the provision of these diagnostic services to be a desirable step to take either before or along with a program of insurance for hospital care.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question in connection with the important announcement he has just made. If the agreement to which he has referred is reached at this conference or shortly thereafter, will the appropriate legislation be presented to parliament at this session?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The question as to when legislation to implement the statement I have just made will be presented is something that will be considered in the light of circumstances as they develop further.

CRIMINAL LAW

CAPITAL AND CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—INQUIRY AS TO RECONSTITUTION OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice, but in the minister's absence perhaps I should direct it to the government house leader. Now that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is completed, may we expect an early reconstitution of the joint committee on capital and corporal punishment in order that this committee may conclude its important work?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): My understanding is that it is the intention of the Minister of Justice to move that the committee be reconstituted.

Mr. Fulton: At an early date?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAELI-ARAB BORDERS—CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR INTERNATIONAL POLICE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it a fact that the Canadian government has expressed its readiness to support the idea of creating an international police force to protect the borders between the Arabs and Israeli, as appeared in a news item in this morning's Gazette?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer is no; the question has not yet arisen.

STATEMENT ON SHIPMENT OF ARMS TO EGYPT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked whether in the shipment of spare parts of world war II type tanks which in his understanding were included in the shipments to Egypt—he was mistaken in this understanding—included any breech blocks. Later on he asked whether in approving the sale of spare parts of world war II type tanks to Egypt the government had taken into consideration the fact that the British tanks which found their way to Egypt via Belgium were complete except for breech blocks.

I assured the house yesterday that in any decisions pertaining to the export of arms from Canada all relevant factors were taken into consideration. With the permission of the house I should now like to amplify that answer, particularly in order to correct the misconception which the hon. member for Eglinton appeared to be labouring under, as reflected in his question.

In the statement I made on January 24 I gave the figures for arms exports to Egypt and to the other states in the Middle East. I explained that the Harvard trainers and spare parts were responsible for practically the whole of the Egyptian figure. I went on to say that the main items covered by the other figures in the report included tracks and spare parts for world war II type tanks. These tank parts were not authorized for shipment to Egypt, as the hon. member assumed. I wish to make clear now that the parts for world war II type tanks to which I referred were not destined for Egypt. I would also wish to add that the lists of such parts as were approved for export included no breech blocks.

STATEMENT ON SHIPMENT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a question asked yesterday of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). The Prime Minister has asked me to answer the question. The question was as follows:

> Have any supplies of military equipment been sent to any South American country in the last two years?

The answer is, no permits were issued for guns, ammunition, or military weapons of any kind, or for military aircraft or military vehicles to South America. A considerable quantity of airframe and aircraft engine spares, and reconditioned engines and parts for military vehicles were export licensed. By no means all of these were necessarily for military use. It should be noted here that since 1954 Canada has become the only source of supply in the western hemisphere for spares for a type of engine in common use in commercial air transport throughout the world, namely the DC-3, and they would be included in those export permits.

The total value of permits issued in 1954 for all South American countries was $119,222, and in 1955 it was $577,231.79. These totals were divided between aircraft spares and vehicle engines and parts as follows: $292,328.29 for aircraft spares; $384,825.50 for vehicle engines and parts.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POWER

SAINT JOHN RIVER DEVELOPMENT—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL CO-OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the government given consideration to the possibility of co-operating in the overall power development of the Saint John river system in New Brunswick?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member did give me notice of his question yesterday, and I have studied the files. I can say that ever since the early plans for further development of power on the upper Saint John river began about ten years ago the federal government has been in close touch with the situation.

The federal government authorized the expenditures that made it possible for the Canadian section of the international joint commission to conduct an exhaustive survey which resulted in 1953 in the comprehensive report "Water Resources of the Saint John River Basin". On the basis of this survey the Tobique development has been completed, and the Beechwood project on the main river is now under way by the province.

All the way along there has been a constant exchange of views among provincial and federal technical and financial officials. These discussions appeared to indicate that the development to the end of the Beechwood phase could be carried out by the province of New Brunswick without jeopardizing its credit. It appears, however, that future developments in the province are likely to require additional power on a substantial scale. This larger future development has been represented to the federal government as likely to be beyond the capacity of the province of New Brunswick to finance on its own.

These matters were discussed at the federal-provincial conference last October. At that time it was made clear that provinces were at liberty to submit proposals with respect to provincial development programs, vital to the growth of the province and beyond the financial capacity of the province to bear. While Premier Flemming was here for the conference, we had a meeting together with some of his officials and officials of my department to discuss the power situation in New Brunswick. Since the conference the premier of New Brunswick has written to the Prime Minister and to me about the subject. In his letter to me Mr. Flemming said:

> New Brunswick would like to submit a suitable memorandum in connection with the matter mentioned at an early date.

The letters were dated October 20, 1955. I replied on November 1 saying:

> Such a supplementary memorandum from you covering the specific matters you have in mind would be of great assistance to me.

I have no doubt that there have been a great many matters engaging the premier's attention, and I have not as yet received the memorandum to which he referred. I am informed that one of his advisers indicated in a telephone call to one of the officers of my department on January 23 that the memorandum was currently under consideration by the premier, and I have no doubt it will be forthcoming shortly.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Am I to understand from that statement that there will be no financial assistance as far as Beechwood is concerned, but that the government would be prepared to give financial assistance for the further development of the Saint John river?

Mr. Lesage: I have said and it has been known for some months that the Beechwood development could be carried out without jeopardizing the credit of the province of New Brunswick. That has been the case and it has been known for some months. As to future developments, I believe the statement I have made is quite clear to the effect that I am waiting for a memorandum from the premier of New Brunswick so we may give consideration in the cabinet to this request.

Mr. Brooks: Was that for financial assistance? I did not understand whether the minister stated it would be financial assistance or just technical assistance as far as his department is concerned.

Mr. Lesage: The words I used were both technical and financial assistance. As a matter of fact I do not know exactly what the request of the premier will be, but I expect it to be for both technical and financial assistance.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question, of which it is obvious I could not give him previous notice. Would the government take exactly the same approach and point of view with regard to the development of the water resources of the Columbia basin in British Columbia?

Mr. Lesage: I have received no request from the premier of British Columbia.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF MATERNITY GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare or, in his absence, to the Prime Minister. Is the federal government prepared to share in the costs of the maternity grants advocated by the Liberal party in the Quebec legislature?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I know of no consideration being given here to maternity grants, and I was not aware that it was advocated in the Quebec legislature.

An hon. Member: Then increase the family allowances.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING ANSWERS TO LETTER OF PRIME MINISTER TO PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has received any answers from the premiers of the provinces to his letter dated January 6, 1956, on fiscal matters. If so, when will these letters be communicated to the house?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There have been five letters from four provincial premiers dealing specifically with the letter of January 6. In addition, the premier of British Columbia acknowledged receipt of it in a letter which also dealt with other matters. There is no objection to the tabling of these letters. I should like to advise the writers of the letters that the request has been made and that we should like to comply with it, and then lay the letters on the table.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF DEPARTMENT TO ADMIT SON OF THEODORE DETMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister any comment to make on today's press report that, first, the department of immigration has refused the request of Theodore Detmers, a Dutch immigrant, to bring his 18-year-old son to Canada to join the rest of the family, the excuse given being that the youth is backward, although he is apparently employed as a bricklayer in Nijmegen, Holland? Second, would he also comment on the report that the department forced Mr. Detmers to sign a document that he would not reapply for the admission of his son to Canada?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should raise a point of order about the hon. gentleman's question. It is not that I do not know the answer nor that I have any desire to withhold the answer from the house, but it does seem to me, inasmuch as we have between 100,000 and 200,000 immigrants coming into the country every year, that if questions about individual cases are to be asked on the orders of the day there will be no time left for the other business of the house.

My second point of order, sir, because I have two, is that this question relates to a case many years old and it does not appear, therefore, to be within the meaning of urgency under the rules for questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I must say that I agree entirely with the point of order raised by the minister. There are many questions which should not be asked at this time. They could be dealt with by correspondence, by telephone calls or by visits to the department such as hon. members do make from time to time. I must point out further that a question must be so worded that it is not composed of three or four different parts. A member should not stand up and say first, second, third and fourth, as has happened on some occasions.

I am not referring particularly to the question asked by the hon. member for Oxford. I am speaking generally. It may be that if I had interposed previously as often as I should have, the hon. member for Oxford would not have followed today the bad example that has been set on earlier occasions.

NUMBER OF IMMIGRANTS IN 1955

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question arising to some extent out of the point of order he raised. Is it not a fact that the number of immigrants who came to Canada last year is a great deal closer to 100,000 than 200,000?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think that question has already been answered in reply to a question the hon. member put on the order paper, and it seems unnecessary to take up the time of the house to answer the same question twice.

TRADE

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Eglinton inquired about trade negotiations with the Soviet union. During the visit to the U.S.S.R. last October of the Secretary of State for External Affairs the possibility of a trade agreement based upon the most favoured nation principle was explored. At that time it was agreed that further talks should take place in Ottawa. On November 1 the Canadian government invited the government of the U.S.S.R. to send a delegation to Ottawa for this purpose.

This delegation will be arriving in Ottawa at the beginning of next week and will be headed by Mr. S. A. Borisov, first deputy minister of foreign trade. The head of the Canadian group of officials in the negotiations will be Mr. Mitchell Sharp, associate deputy minister of trade and commerce.

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—STATEMENT AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) asked me whether I could inform the house of the amount of contribution the federal government will pay under the agreement with the government of Saskatchewan to which I referred yesterday.

No payments have been made and no claims for reimbursement have been submitted up to the present time. I understand that the officials of the Saskatchewan government are now processing the claims resulting from the floods of last spring, and that as soon as they have dealt with them they will no doubt submit a statement which at that time will give us the figure that would have to be recommended to the house in an estimate so the agreement for reimbursement may be carried out.

[Later:]

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question supplementary to the question I asked the Prime Minister yesterday. Can the Prime Minister inform the house why the government has retracted from its policy, as stated by himself, according to the Leader-Post of October 18, 1954, which stated that the government's policy was to treat every part of Canada on the same basis when disaster befell it? Can the Prime Minister explain to the house now why full consideration has not been given to the type of losses suffered by the people in the Saskatchewan floods?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we are retracting from any position previously taken. We have endeavoured to treat the claims that came in from both the Saskatchewan and the Manitoba areas in the same way that other claims have been dealt with in like circumstances.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PRICE OF 25-POUNDER AMMUNITION TO ISRAEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Minister of National Defence a question in connection with the 25-pounder ammunition which was sold to Egypt, the delivery of which is now held up. What was the price per round paid for this ammunition?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I think the hon. member should specify what ammunition he refers to which has been sold to Egypt. I have not heard of any.

Mr. Brooks: Israel.

[Later:]

Mr. Harkness: The 25-pounder ammunition to which I referred in my question a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, was that which it was stated last week had been sold to Israel. As the result of a slip of the tongue I believe I said "Egypt" rather than "Israel".

Mr. Campney: I am not aware that any 25-pounder ammunition has been sold to Israel recently. I cannot take responsibility for all the statements that hon. members choose to make or that newspapers choose to make.

Mr. Harkness: The statement was made by the minister.

Mr. Pearson: No such statement was made by this minister. However, a statement was made that this request for 25-pounder ammunition was now before the cabinet for consideration.

DIVE BOMBER TRAINING—STATEMENT AS TO USE OF CHIPMUNK AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I refer to two questions that were asked recently. On Tuesday last the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) asked two questions, the first of which was as follows:

Has dive bomber training, as was practised during world war II with Harvard aircraft, been discontinued or is it still continued as part of the training program?

The answer to that question is that dive bombing training as conducted during world war II was discontinued in the Royal Canadian Air Force in February, 1954.

The hon. member's second question was:

Has the Chipmunk aircraft not replaced the Harvard aircraft as a primary trainer?

In answer to that question I may say that, under arrangements now being introduced, Royal Canadian Air Force pilot trainees receive their first flying training on Chipmunk aircraft, but they still train later on Harvards in order to complete their basic training, so the Chipmunk cannot be said to have superseded or replaced the Harvard. Rather, it supplements it.

REPORTED USE OF BUTTER IN MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday, on the orders of the day, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) asked whether margarine has been or is being extensively used in military establishments. The answer is no. The tri-service ration scale provides for the use of butter, a two-ounce ration per man per day, and does not provide for the use of margarine at all. Consequently, supply officers do not purchase and supply depots do not maintain any stocks of margarine.

What I have just said applies only to food supplies purchased by public funds. Where non-public funds are used, as in canteens, snack bars, etc., operated on behalf of service personnel, purchases are not subject to service regulations or control, and such funds, being private funds, may be used to make purchases of any commodities which the owner of the funds may desire.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

THEFT AT VERDUN—STATEMENT AS TO AMOUNT STOLEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) inquired as to the amount involved in the theft which had taken place at the post office in Verdun, Quebec, a week previously. I undertook to get the figures. The audit of the post office having been completed, I am informed that the total amount of theft was $19,530.78.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the Postmaster General inform the house whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were called in to investigate the theft from the Verdun post office?

Mr. Lapointe: Well, I think it has been explained in the house previously, and I believe in answer to questions put in previous sessions by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, that thefts from post offices are considered in the same way as any other criminal offences. Provincial and local police authorities are brought in and carry on investigations in co-operation with postal authorities. When it is found desirable to have the R.C.M.P. help and co-operate they are also asked to provide it but, as my hon. friend knows, the administration of justice is under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON LATEST ROBBERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Since the post offices in southern Ontario have been robbed from time to time, will he give the house a report on the latest robbery, which took place yesterday?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to inquire. I am afraid I am not familiar with what took place.

Mr. Hodgson: Five in a row are quite a lot.

Mr. Lapointe: It is possible that my hon. friend knows more about it than I do, and he could inform the house.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR IMPROVED INFORMATION FACILITIES AT BANFF AND JASPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister received a request from Mr. H. R. Chauncey, president of the Canadian automobile association, asking for the co-operation of the federal government in providing more adequate tourist information facilities at Banff and Jasper national parks? If so, can the minister indicate whether or not such facilities can be made available in time—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member could first put his question and then hear what the minister says, and perhaps later come back with a supplementary question. It seems to me it is unfair to put a long question which may require a lengthy answer at this time.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary South, I may say that I received Mr. Chauncey's letter this morning, but I was busy all morning attending the federal-provincial conference on health insurance, and therefore have not yet had time to consider the subject matter.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources? In view of the urgency attached to the question raised by Mr. Chauncey, will the minister assure the house that at the earliest opportunity he will give an answer?

Mr. Lesage: As soon as I can, Mr. Speaker.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS MINIMUM PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? In view of the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway in increasing its minimum pension, effective next week, to $60 a month at least to the age of 70, does the minister not think it is time the Canadian National Railways raised its minimum pension from its present figure of $25 a month?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): My attention has not been drawn to the action taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I shall certainly not express any opinion on it until I find out what that action has been.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is the minister giving consideration to arranging for an increase of pensions of superannuated federal civil servants to bring those pensions more in line with the present cost of living?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): I shall have to take this question as notice. As my hon. friend knows, this also concerns the Minister of Finance, with whom I shall have to talk before an answer is given.

Mr. Knowles: We would rather have your answer.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR A REDUCTION IN RATE OF INTEREST

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Small Loans Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to reduce the maximum rate that may be charged by small loan companies from 24 per cent to 12 per cent per annum. I believe the prevailing rate of 24 per cent per annum is fantastic, exorbitant and unnecessary and that it should be reduced. I moved a similar bill in this house last year and I was amazed at the amount of support the proposition I moved at that time received from one end of the country to the other. I think I can safely say that I have never proposed a bill or any other measure that received such widespread support. The support was not only prevalent throughout the country but I find it has been quite general amongst members of this house. I hope that we shall have a good discussion of this bill this afternoon so that the government will be able to learn the position of various hon. members and the position of the various parties in relation to the bill, and may use that information when it brings down an amendment to the Small Loans Act which I venture to hope will result in a substantial reduction in interest rates.

There are other amendments I might also have suggested to the Small Loans Act. The present ceiling on interest rates applies to loans up to $500. Certainly the purchasing power of a $500 loan in 1955 is very small compared to the purchasing power of a $500 loan in 1939 when the Small Loans Act was last amended. I might have suggested that the ceiling be raised from $500 to $1,500 or $2,000 but I have found previously that when a private member puts more than one idea in a bill very frequently another hon. member, who for some reason or other is desirous of opposing the bill, will latch on to one part of the bill and indicate that if that one point were not there he would support the bill and that as far as the other part of the bill is concerned he is all for it. Therefore I have limited this bill to the simple proposition that an interest rate of 12 per cent should be the limit of interest charged by small loan companies. I have on the order paper another bill which I allowed to stand today which contains the proposition that interest charges throughout the country on all other credit should not exceed 12 per cent per annum.

As I said, I think an interest rate of 24 per cent per year is fantastic. I think it is incredible that in a country as economically strong as Canada a great many people—yes, I would even say millions of working Canadians—have to accept loans and credit bearing an interest rate or charge of 24 per cent. These high rates are not confined to loans advanced by small loan companies alone. Extremely high rates are charged by finance companies when one finances an automobile, a television set or some other item. Finance companies, however, as I have been able to find out, do not necessarily charge the highest rates that are charged on credit advanced in this country. Some of the greatest offenders in so far as the rates they charge are concerned are the big mail order houses. On the smallest purchase on their budget plans, Simpson's and Eaton's levy the fantastic charge of 54 per cent. It is true that as the amount of the instalment purchase increases the rate goes down but it goes down to only 15 or 18 per cent a year, depending on the type of item that is purchased.

From time to time I have read accounts of the interest rates that are charged in other countries. I have heard hon. members in this house refer to the exorbitant interest rates that used to be charged in nationalist China. On one occasion I heard an hon. member say that interest rates in that country having been allowed to go to 50 per cent or more contributed to the cause that resulted in the subsequent revolution in that country. I remember my personal reaction in the past when I read of these high interest rates in other countries. I said to myself, "I am glad I am living in Canada where such interest rates are seldom charged"; but after having seen the practice of small loan companies, finance companies and mail order houses in Canada I discovered that many rates charged here are almost as high. For that reason I am proposing that the house consider imposing a limitation of 12 per cent on such charges.

The Canadian who is financially well off and who has a high income does not have the same need for credit as the ordinary working Canadian. The former can go to a bank and borrow money at 6 per cent or perhaps 5 per cent without much trouble. The ordinary working people of this nation, regardless of whether they live in the city or on farms, are often required to pay fantastic rates when they borrow money or finance purchases. The legislation we now have is in effect class legislation and constitutes class distinction. It means that the people in low income groups who from time to time have the greatest need for credit are forced to pay exorbitant interest rates because of the laws of this country. I believe that any progressive democracy, any civilized nation, should take steps periodically to reduce the general rate of interest and to allow the ordinary working people of the country to obtain credit at reasonable rates.

In certain fields credit has been provided at reasonable rates by government legislation. We have a National Housing Act which enables a great many people to own their own homes, paying an interest charge of 5½ per cent. That is good legislation. We have the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which is another example, under which farmers can obtain credit at a rate of 5 per cent. That, too, is good legislation. There is, however, a vast field in which the people who must obtain credit have to pay the exorbitant interest rates I mentioned.

The amount of credit available in this country is steadily increasing. I have in my hand the latest Bank of Canada statistical summary which lists the amount of outstanding credit as at 30 September, 1955, as follows: Ordinary charge accounts $535 million, instalment credit through retail $300 million, instalment credit through finance companies $578 million, cash personal loans $790 million, a total credit of $2,212 million. If one made the assumption—and this might not be a good assumption—that each outstanding credit item amounted to a rather large sum, let us say $1,000, then these statistics show that 2,212,000 Canadians have obtained credit of one kind or another. The sum of $2,212 million in outstanding credit is just twice as high as it was four years before. I think we will all agree that in the future Canadians are going to use more and more credit; as our nation develops, as our country expands, the need for credit will increase. Therefore the value that will result from the step I am suggesting will be enormous today and will have even greater benefit as years go by.

I believe that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benidickson will be making a statement this afternoon on behalf of the government. I realize that the government is contemplating some amendments to the Small Loans Act. I am hoping that the government will allow this debate to continue, that no member of the government will move the adjournment of the debate and endeavour to use the parliamentary majority of the government to close off the debate.

I believe that this subject is of great importance to the people of Canada and I think whatever steps the government intends to take in the way of amending the Small Loans Act are bound to be important. Since this matter is now before parliament for debate I think the government, before it presents its own legislation to amend the act, should have the benefit of the views of members of parliament, which views would at least to some extent reflect the opinion of Canadians generally. The government would then be in a better position to decide what improvements it is prepared to make in the act. Therefore I am asking the government not to use its parliamentary majority to close off the debate, to throttle the discussion, but rather to allow this debate to continue just as long as any hon. member has a contribution which he wishes to make.

As I have said, the importance of credit in this field has been growing. I have some figures that show how rapidly this field has been expanding. In 1941 the small loans companies reported an interest income of $1,642,000; in 1954 their interest income had increased to $17,205,000, or an increase of almost 1,000 per cent in the relatively short period of 13 years.

The field is expanding and becoming of growing importance and therefore we should be considering whether the rates charged today are exorbitant and could be reduced. The small loans companies have one basic argument on which they hinge their whole case for a high rate of charge. They say that they are in a high risk business, that they are making loans that entail a great deal of risk. I would assume that if the loans entail a great deal of risk they must entail a great deal of loss, but the fact is that the figures produced by the small loans companies in Canada show that the loss inherent in making their loans is very small.

As a matter of fact the reserve for bad debts set up by the small loans companies amounts to just ·26 per cent, or just one-quarter of one per cent. Judging from their collections, judging from the amount of loss, judging by the reserve for bad debts that set up—there are very few bad debts—there would seem to be very little risk in this business.

[Mr. Argue.]

Their profits are large, I would say they are fantastically large. In a country where many corporations and companies make large profits I imagine the small loan companies make greater than average profits. According to the evidence given before the banking and commerce committee in 1954 their average interest charges amount to 23·43 per cent, and out of that they had a profit of 9·35 per cent before income tax. In other words, on their interest income, the income from the charges they make, they had profits of almost 40 per cent. Their profits are high and they act in the business world as though their profits were high.

They spend a good deal of money on advertising, on high-pressure advertising campaigns to attract people into their offices to make loans. The banks generally have not got into the field of small loans as they should, but one bank has done a relatively good job in this field.

The Canadian Bank of Commerce has been in this field, of making small loans, I believe since 1936. Their average interest charge is not 23·42 per cent, it is less than half, or just 10·43 per cent. That is well within the 12 per cent provided for in this bill.

The experience of the Canadian Bank of Commerce in the small loans field is that it has not lost money but has made a good deal of money. Its operating profit before income tax was 2·48 per cent. The small loan companies say that in their field the risk is very high, but the Canadian Bank of Commerce has found that its risk is not too high. It had set up a reserve for bad debts of ·47 per cent.

The Canadian Bank of Commerce has been able to operate in this field with an interest rate of less than half that charged by the small loans companies. Before the amendment to the Bank Act last year by which banks were allowed to take chattel mortgages, before they could get that type of security their reserve for bad debts was only ·47 per cent, and yet they were able to make a most satisfactory profit.

They have been able to do business more efficiently than the small loans companies. Take the item of salaries for example. The Canadian Bank of Commerce needed only 2·81 per cent for this item as compared with 5·68 per cent for the small loan companies. In other words the Canadian Bank of Commerse saved 2·87 per cent in salaries.

In advertising, the small loans companies spent 1·19 per cent as compared with ·03 per cent spent by the Canadian Bank of Commerce, a saving by the Canadian Bank of Commerce of 1·16 per cent. The cost of funds was 2·09 per cent in the case of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, whereas it was 3·07 per cent, which is understandable, in the case of the small loan companies. In that item the Canadian Bank of Commerce showed a saving of ·98 per cent.

Take the item of operating profit before income tax. In the case of the small loan companies it was 9·35 per cent, an exorbitant profit, while the profit of the Canadian Bank of Commerce was 2·48 per cent. They were able to show a saving in that item of 6·87 per cent. Adding up those items we find that the Canadian Bank of Commerce showed a saving of 11·88 per cent over the small loans companies, which would allow an interest charge of 11·55 per cent to give the substantial profit I have referred to already.

As I have said, the small loan companies claim that they have a great risk. I have in my hand a booklet called "Consumer Instalment Loans", which came to my office a few days ago. It is issued by the Niagara Finance Company Limited and seeks to persuade those people who may read it to the Niagara Finance Company's point of view as regards the business of small loans. It contains this statement:

> The non-repayment risk is higher than that on most bank loans.

I have already stated that the reserve for bad debts set up by small loan companies, in this high risk field, is ·26 per cent. The Canadian Bank of Commerce operates in this field and does the same type of business. To substantiate the claim that it is the same type of business and has the same risks in lending to people in the same income group and so on, I read from page 590 of the report of proceedings of the banking and commerce committee of 11th May 1954 a statement by Mr. Neil J. McKinnon, general manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. He said:

> I believe we are satisfied that we are in the field in the same sense that the small loan companies are. We believe that we are doing a similar type of business for which we are endeavouring to offer facilities at one-half their rates.

The Canadian Bank of Commerce has had excellent experience in this field. On this point, the following statement is made on page 816 of the report of proceedings of the banking and commerce committee, alluding to the amount of risk entailed in making loans in this field:

> The reserve for bad debts should be considered in relation to the actual loss experienced. From the inception of the plan until October 31, 1953, the total of loans written off was $380,378, of which $157,058 was subsequently collected leaving a net loss of $223,320. This is approximately ·10 per cent of the total loans made—$248,461,909.

In other words, over a period of 16 years, the Canadian Bank of Commerce has been able to operate in the small loans field with losses of ·10 per cent doing precisely the same kind of business as is done by the small loan companies, and for which the small loans companies make charges of 24 per cent. Is it a risky business? The figures show that it is not a risky business and that the losses are indeed small. The Canadian Bank of Commerce went on to say this:

> The reserve charged against earnings for bad debts has been reduced at intervals in accordance with experience gained and has been established at ¼ per cent of funds employed for the current fiscal year.

In other words, the reserve for bad debts now set up by the Canadian Bank of Commerce is ·25 per cent, almost identical with the reserve for bad debts set up by the small loan companies of ·26 per cent. Therefore I say that banks in Canada, if encouraged by the government or perhaps even if they would undertake this kind of business without such encouragement, could go a long way to occupying this field at rates that are reasonable.

When the argument is advanced that, if the rates that may be charged by small loans companies are limited to 12 per cent, you are going to drive them out of the field, I do not believe it. I do not believe the statistics show that they would suffer a loss or that they could not trim their business practices so that they could still make a profit. However, if the charges were limited to 12 per cent and if the small loan companies then said they had to vacate that field, we should be prepared to let them vacate that field and forever cease fleecing the Canadian public with these high interest charges.

We could not as a responsible parliament merely limit the interest rates that could be charged by the small loan companies if that put them out of business and there was no one else in the business that could provide this service and the credit that is necessary. I am suggesting to the government it should take one further step. We already have a good precedent for that step. I refer to the very happy experience of banks, farmers, fishermen and the government in connection with the Farm Improvement Loans Act and, more recently, the loans act with regard to fishermen. Since the Farm Improvement Loans Act began operating in 1945—that is for a period of 10 years from 1945 to 1955—$541 million was loaned under that act. The government's aggregate guarantee is 10 per cent. Therefore the aggregate guarantee is over $50 million. Were the losses $50 million or anywhere near it? No. The losses have amounted to only $149,814. In other words, the federal government has had to pay out of the amount of its guarantee under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1/350 of the total guarantee. In other words, the amount that has been paid up to date is almost negligible. I wish to point out, of course, that all outstanding loans have not yet been paid, but nevertheless I do not think any hon. member of this house will say that when the present loans have been finalized the cost to the government will be anywhere near its total guarantee or, for that matter, will be many more times the very small guarantee that has already been paid.

I believe that 12 per cent is still too high. I know of no reason why ordinary Canadians who want small loans, who want to buy articles of furniture, who want to buy automobiles, who need money to pay doctors' bills or hospital bills, and so on should be charged even the high rate of 12 per cent when statistics and records show that the risk in this field is very small. I would like to see the interest rate at not 12 per cent but six per cent or five percent, the rate that has already been established under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I am suggesting that if necessary the government should be prepared to pass an act parallel to the Farm Improvement Loans Act—it might be called a family welfare loans act—under which the federal government might make a 10 per cent guarantee to the banks as it does now under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, with the measure of risk so small that the Canadian Bank of Commerce has set up a reserve for bad debts of just ·25 per cent. The government, by such action and by the payment over the years of a very tiny sum of money, would save working Canadians in the future hundreds of millions of dollars and would remove millions of Canadians from the necessity of paying exorbitant charges of 24 per cent to loan companies which themselves are now acting as sharks in the small loan field.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, this bill in similar form was introduced late in the last session. At that time, it was indicated that it was unlikely that we could have through utilization of a parliamentary committee the type of public discussion that has in the past usually attended any amendment or legislative action with respect to this subject. But it was indicated it would be likely that during the present session of parliament this legislation would receive attention and possibly amendment. Hon. members will recognize that the speech from the throne has confirmed the fact that during the present session of parliament certain amendments to the Small Loans Act will be introduced by the government.

I do not intend any discourtesy to the hon. member, to any opposition members or to private members generally when I suggest that there might be a more appropriate time to debate this subject as a government measure. I am going to propose that the debate be adjourned. I think there are many advantages in so doing.

Certainly it is obvious to all private members of all parties in the house that the order paper already contains something in excess of 40 items sponsored by private members. Under the rules the time for discussing these items is rather limited. On the other hand, if we are to have soon a bill sponsored by the government which will receive consideration in a parliamentary committee, I think hon. members will recognize that adjournment and postponement of the debate at this time would avoid repetition and in my opinion assure a more orderly discussion of the subject. Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Argue: Shame! The guillotine!

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FARM-STORED GRAIN—ADVANCES

Motion No. 4—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams, from August 1 to December 31, 1955, exchanged between any department of the government and any person or persons with respect to advance payments on farm-stored grain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There are thousands of pieces of paper reflecting on this question. It would save a great deal of work if my hon. friend would examine them in the office, or if he would select the ones he wants tabled. I do not think he wants all of them tabled; it would be very expensive for the government.

Mr. Speaker: The motion will stand in the meantime?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps it could be passed with that understanding.

Mr. Argue: That is agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Motion agreed to.

EXPORT OF WAR MATERIALS TO MIDDLE EAST

Motion No. 11—Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

For a copy of all export permits for aircraft, trucks, and other equipment, armaments and munitions of war of any type, to the Middle East, from January 1, 1955 to date.

He said: In view of the fact I have received the information I wanted, I will ask that this motion be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

POWER—FRASER AND COLUMBIA POTENTIALS

Motion No. 14—Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda, contracts, communications or instructions exchanged between the dominion government or any department or agency thereof and any other person or body, since the 1st January, 1955, concerning an investigation of the power potential of the Fraser river and/or the Columbia river and/or the feasibility and effects of the Columbia river diversion.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the hon. member whether he would allow this motion to stand? I would like to have some information about the documents referred to in the motion, which I have not been able to get yet. I hope to be in a position to have all of the information that I need next week. I will appreciate it if the hon. member would allow the motion to stand.

Mr. Fulton: Apparently the notice I have given of this motion has not been quite as effective as the notice given yesterday by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). Therefore I will allow it to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

Education

EDUCATION

PROVISION OF NATIONAL SCHOLARSHIPS AND BURSARIES

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level who are in financial need, in so far as the subject matter of this resolution is within the competence of parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I move this resolution. I would hope for support worthy of the motion from all sections of the house. One can observe in this House of Commons hon. members who have played and are still playing a distinguished role in the field of education in Canada. One might mention the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who is chancellor of Victoria College at the University of Toronto, or the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), who has been president of the University of New Brunswick, or the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who is chairman of the board of trustees of that noble seat of learning, my own Queen's University. This house is studded with Rhodes scholars and with other scholarship winners and gold medalists. The list is indeed impressive. We have former school teachers and university professors sitting in all sections of the house. I shall therefore assume at the outset that I shall receive a sympathetic hearing.

The purposes of this resolution are twofold; first, to provide financial assistance for students who have embarked, perhaps hazardously and with uncertainty, on a university career, and who might otherwise have to quit their studies for lack of money; second, to enable school graduates to attend university by providing financial assistance.

I should like at the outset to pay tribute to those private members who have in the past spoken on this or allied proposals, and I refer particularly to the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) and the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey), both of whom are distinguished educators. I think all hon. members will attest to the desirability of some form of specific federal assistance, provided that such assistance does not impinge upon the provincial jurisdiction in the field of education.

That, of course, has been the great difficulty with federal aid. It would mean assistance in the general field of education, which is proscribed by our constitution, the British North America Act. It would be unconstitutional, since general education comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, as set out in the said act. That is the reason the federal government cannot provide grants holus-bolus to the provinces for education. For example, the federal government cannot say to the province of Ontario, here is a grant to hard-pressed North York township for its schools.

It follows, therefore, that any aid must not infringe upon or violate or interfere with provincial jurisdiction and control. It would appear that the answer may be found in the fact that although the federal government will not come into the general field of education, nevertheless it is willing and is receptive to assisting in specialized fields as for example, vocational training, D.V.A. student assistance and student aid. The purpose of this resolution today is to discuss a plan for more student aid. That is why I say my resolution is constitutionally unimpeachable, and hence should be acceptable unreservedly even to those who are the most zealous custodians of provincial autonomy.

I will point out to hon. members shortly how legislation in existence at the present time and jointly administered provincially and federally may well be the method of carrying out the request I am raising.

I should like to advance several reasons, Mr. Speaker, why my resolution would be not only desirable but obligatory if this country is to go on to its destiny. It might be desirable, however, at this point to mention briefly why the university is so important to our Canadian way of living.

It is almost unnecessary for one to extol the role of the university in our lives. The university is a force of incalculable good in a technological age. It has played a powerful and important role in shaping the destiny of Canada. The university is one of the founts of freedom. As I see it, the function of the university is to teach its students to think, to probe, to inquire, to elucidate, to inspire. It should be a forum for dissent, if need be, and not a stronghold of uniformity and orthodoxy, for the latter may inexorably snuff out the smouldering coals of creative ideas and thought and endeavour.

Let us be clear at the outset that these bursaries are not for the brilliant students of independent means. Such bursaries and scholarships as I propose would be all-embracing for the students who need financial assistance. One readily knows the importance of engineers, scientists and technicians to this great nation, whose mineral potential has scarcely been scratched; whose power resources are limitless both with regard to water and atomic energy and whose manufacturing potential is as yet in its early stages.

I am one who believes that the humanities and the arts are just as important as the sciences. Canadian universities have not neglected the humanities; in fact, I believe our Canadian educational system, of which the universities are an integral part, accounts in part for the maturity of the Canadian people and possibly indicates also why the virulent seeds of McCarthyism with its attendant hysteria and obscurantism have never managed to take root in the Canadian soil.

Many reasons could be cited for the desirability of my resolution. On a large canvas it may be affirmed that greater assistance to needy university students is a priceless investment in young Canadians and in Canada. As the Prime Minister said at McMaster University on October 20, 1955, when he received the honorary degree of doctorate of laws:

> The object of higher education and especially education in the arts and humanities is to teach us to think clearly. At no time in history has it been so important to think clearly when man's ability to destroy himself seems at times to have outstripped his ability to solve the problems which arise between him and his fellow men.

The whole concept was tried out on a large scale with D.V.A. students after the war. It worked magnificently. Many went into universities and the professions who would not have otherwise been able to do so. I dare say there are quite a number of such graduates in this house today.

The economic and financial barrier of education restraining many who were financially embarrassed was swept away. An interesting study at the University of Toronto revealed that the servicemen who passed through Varsity cut across all social and economic groups; and education, which ordinarily was for the families of wealth and for those from the professional and mercantile groups, was extended to those from the families of skilled, semi-skilled and even unskilled workers. Truly this was democracy in action.

The D.V.A. program was expensive, very expensive; from 1942 to 1955 somewhere in the neighbourhood of $220 millions were spent for vocational and university training, or an average of over $16,900,000 per year. I do not know how much of this sum was expended in assisting students through university. What I do know, however, is that it did not take the Department of National Revenue too long to collect this sum in income taxes from D.V.A. graduates. It certainly follows that revenue from personal income taxes will be greatly increased as more university graduates go out into Canadian life. University graduates become the architects, the engineers, the doctors, the dentists, the lawyers and are now sought for executive positions in industry. This scheme therefore makes admirable sense from a national investment point of view. The federal government is vitally interested in the training of university personnel. Hon. members will note the number of top notch civil servants employed in government service and in important research bodies like the national research council, for example, who are university graduates.

It would appear that university education is practically necessary for almost any form of personal advancement and indeed, as I say, must be freely available if the best qualified are to hold key positions in Canadian society. At the present time stringent financial barriers do exist. Principal James of McGill University pointed out that in 1952 only 3 per cent of Canadian youth attended universities in Canada whereas 15 per cent attended universities in the United States. An editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of January 23, 1956, states that the Canadian university population has now increased to 7·2 per cent. In Australia students registered in degree granting courses in 1952 numbered 21,005 and of this number 7,000, or 33 per cent, received government aid. When one compares the Canadian average with the average in these other countries our position really is shocking. Canada is, I believe, the fourth largest trading nation in the world; we are proud, and justly so, of our national development. Our voice, our opinions, are respected in the councils of the world. And yet it appears that the Canadian university student is certainly the underprivileged legatee of our nation's most cherished traditions. Mr. Speaker, this imbalance must and will be corrected. A large number of those students who do attend Canadian universities live in the town or city where the university is located.

I had an interesting experience recently in this connection. I attended commencement exercises at one of the collegiate institutes in my riding and found that a majority of the graduates were attending university. On making further inquiries of one of the teachers I found out that these young men and women were able to attend university because they lived at home. This surely points out the need for assistance to those who do not live in a university city or town. Dr. Sidney Smith, president of the University of Toronto, put it very succinctly on January 21, 1955, when he said "It will be increasingly difficult for the boy in Swastika and Sioux Lookout to enroll, as a result of the latest fee increase. It will be a tragedy if universities become places where only the students who live near them are able to attend."

It has been pointed out that other students who attend university subsequently leave for reasons that are basically financial, and here you might include those who fail because of the strain of doing full-time work at the same time as studying.

Without doubt there has recently been a substantial increase in the number of students who are attending university. The national federation of Canadian university students, whose efforts have been tireless and even magnificent in promoting bursaries, represents over 50,000 students at more than 20 Canadian universities. Officials of this body informed me that a sum averaging from $1,000 to $1,200 is required to pay for fees and board and room for a year's attendance at a Canadian university or graduate school. As a student is unlikely to earn more than $600 in the summer season, it would seem imperative that the bursaries range in amount from $300 to $500. At the present time most bursary aid is rarely available in amounts of more than $250, and even this is high.

I stated earlier that the federal government is willing to assist in specialized and special fields. I should like to point out to hon. members that vocational training is now consolidated under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which is broken down into four agreements with the provinces for sharing costs under this act. The act, of course, is administered by the federal Department of Labour. The agreements are as follows: (1) vocational correspondence course agreements, (2) the apprenticeship training agreement, (3) the vocational schools assistance agreement, and (4) the vocational training agreement. The latter is broken down into training for the disabled, for the armed services, for the unemployed employables, and student aid. In this resolution I am concerned with the latter. The vocational training agreements were allocated $1,342,000 in 1954, out of which student aid received only $309,000. The allocation is still frozen at this amount. The total training program which I have cited above received an appropriation of $4,300,000 in 1954 and the percentage student aid received therefore is only about 7 per cent. My submission would be of course that this student aid should be increased substantially.

I mentioned that conceivably the present system could be enlarged upon. I think it is indeed unfortunate that it was not generally known that there is a system already in existence which is producing splendid results within its limitations. How does the present system then work with regard to student aid? Briefly, the federal government gives direct aid to students through a federal-provincial board called a selection committee. Students are selected by this committee made up of representatives of the provincial department of education with one member representing the federal Department of Labour. The provincial department of education would of course have a majority control of this board.

For example, I have ascertained that in the province of Ontario the provincial representatives number seven whereas there is but one member representing the federal government. At the discretion of the province help may be given in the form of either a loan or a grant. For example, the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Saskatchewan give loans only, while Ontario and Newfoundland give outright grants with Alberta, British Columbia and Quebec giving both.

The amount of assistance given to an individual may vary from province to province, but in most cases it ranges from $100 to $300. I have some interesting figures from my own province of Ontario. I understand that for the academic year 1954-55 the sum of $316,000 has been spent on bursaries, of which $216,000 came from the provincial government and $100,000 from the federal government through the Department of Labour.

The number of students receiving bursaries was 1,791 out of 2,860 applicants, or 62 per cent. Many of the 1,069 applicants who did not receive bursaries I am informed did not have the requisite 66 per cent academic standing. I have no information available as to the amounts of individual grants, but I understand that for the year 1955-56 the amount of $420,000 will be available, with $100,000 of this amount coming from the federal government.

This joint effort is to be highly commended and it is my plea today that the federal government substantially increase its share so that the joint effort may be considerably extended. This method also shows clearly how federal and provincial governments can work together amicably for the good of Canada. I repeat that the controlling interest here is with the provinces. I would go further and say that this system is forging a great weapon of national unity.

This would seem to me to be the most effective way of handling this whole problem. I am purposely not stating arbitrarily how much money is needed. I am informed that 20,000 university students need assistance and I would think that the student aid allocation would have to be at least doubled to $600,000 for a start. But I ask, when one thinks of the incalculable value accruing from this enormously successful venture in education, in what other way can Canadians get such a good return on their national investment? The answer is obviously nowhere else.

I want to raise the question of assistance by industry and by privately-endowed organizations and foundations. We have noted that in the United States the national merit scholarships corporation has contributed over $20 million for scholarships and bursaries. Of course we have not anything comparable to that in Canada, but I think one should note the splendid work the Atkinson foundation fund has done in this regard.

An editorial in the Toronto Star dated Friday, November 11, 1955, pointed out that the foundation, which has done such magnificent work in the humanities, has helped more than 1,500 Ontario students obtain a university education which otherwise might have been denied to them by a lack of funds. At the end of 1955 contributions were to have reached $393,500. The bursaries, called entrance bursaries, ranged from $200 to $400. This is most commendable, but we must face the fact that there are no other Atkinson foundations.

Of course we should be thankful to such organizations as the I.O.D.E. Mrs. R. C. Bennett of Hamilton, educational convener for the I.O.D.E., stated on October 20, 1955, that for 1955 the I.O.D.E. awarded bursaries totalling $3,700 to college students, and interest free loans totalling $1,100. This fine organization is to be congratulated upon the splendid work it has done in this regard.

Business is becoming aware of the problem but, as President Sidney Smith of the university of Toronto pointed out last week, industry has not been fully cognizant of its responsibility in this regard. Perhaps in all fairness it should be pointed out that the income tax provisions are not conducive to assistance by industry in connection with this matter. No, I think that at the present time this problem can be handled only by the government.

It will be argued that we should not distribute more scholarships until we have more facilities available, and that brings up the related topic of federal assistance to universities generally. It may be asked, why cannot the federal government assist universities in financing of capital assets such as new buildings, laboratories, halls, libraries and so on. As a matter of fact the estimates of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) indicate that unconditional grants to Canadian universities will be approximately $7·8 million for 1955-56. I say with respect that this would appear to be woefully inadequate even for the immediate future.

At the present time there are between 55,000 and 65,000 attending universities, and it is estimated that in ten years there will be from 100,000 to 135,000 university students. To confirm these figures one does not have to look any further than the township of North York in which my riding is located. I am informed that in 1960 there will be approximately 81 public schools in the township of North York. Now this is the shocker. In 1960 the township of North York, with an estimated population of 250,000, will have approximately as many schools as are now located in the city of Toronto proper with a static population of 750,000 people.

Let us look at the high school situation in North York. It is estimated that in 1960 there will be approximately 13,000 pupils. Is it any wonder, on the basis of this isolated example, that an estimate of 135,000 university students in 1966 seems to this observer at least to be conservative.

Therefore it appears to me that the federal government should now consider the setting up of a royal commission to study how much money should and could be allocated and dispersed to universities over a long-term period without of course there being any infringement upon provincial autonomy. If the money were allocated directly to the university this surely would not violate provincial sensibilities.

I should like to conclude my remarks in French as I am most anxious to have the support of my French-Canadian colleagues on both sides of the house.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to miss this opportunity of saying a few words in French to my French-speaking fellow citizens and more particularly to those of my colleagues who represent Quebec constituencies.

I would ask them to support this resolution of mine. I sincerely think that it is one of the best means of promoting national unity in Canada.

Before introducing and explaining my resolution, I want to make it clear that I am among those who recognize that the provinces have competent jurisdiction in the field of education. That is the case in the province of Ontario as well as in all the provinces which stand guard jealously over their rights in the field of education.

I know that French Canadians are proud of their language, their customs and their traditions. They are right in feeling as they do, and I congratulate them on that score. In order to maintain this character, French Canadians mean to keep control of education in so far as it concerns them. I recognize that fact, as indeed my resolution shows. I am also convinced that most Canadians

French and English-speaking, recognize it too.

Of course, my resolution agrees with that principle. There now exists grounds for agreement, a way to get the federal and provincial governments to co-operate in this field of assistance to education. This federal provincial co-operation has already been successful and I believe that more liberal subsidies could now be distributed if the same method were used, that is to say by appointing a selection committee whose task would be to select the students who are in need of money to undertake, continue or complete their studies. This committee would include representatives of the provincial department of education, a representative of the federal government and a representative of the university concerned. Subsidies would be paid directly to the student who would have previously satisfied the said committee as to his genuine financial need. Hon. members will note, Mr. Speaker, that the province would exercise supervision over all the proceedings and maintain its authority. Then, that being the case, there could be no question of federal intervention into provincial affairs.

I say that such a policy is a major factor, not only for needy students, but for Canada as a whole. It is a policy of good understanding, a further step to national unity. We must encourage and multiply contacts and exchanges between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians. I contemplate a brighter future for the time when there are more exchanges of students, students who will think, first and foremost, as Canadians.

I can assure French Canadians that the people of Ontario want to be their friends. Let me recall, in evidence, that many of the hon. members for Toronto, including the members for Trinity (Mr. Carrick), for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), for Broadview (Mr. Hees), have made French speeches in this house.

Canada, our beloved Canada, is a bilingual country; a country with two cultures, one French, the other English. Are we not going to march forward hand in hand in order to make Canada the home of tolerance and of liberalism in its art as well as in its humanity? My resolution is an appeal to national unity, along with the respect of the rights and privileges of everyone.

(Text):

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as on earlier occasions, it will be our intention to support the purpose of this resolution.

We have had many opportunities to express our belief that the plan of scholarships, which has already worked very satisfactorily through the co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, should be widely extended. We are not dealing with something that is in the realm of vague experiment. Actually there have been scholarships for a great many years, as has been pointed by the mover of this motion. The arrangements have been such that the provincial authorities have had a wide measure of responsibility for the details in this matter. For some time I had some administrative responsibility in connection with the operation of these scholarship arrangements. I know from my own experience that they work satisfactorily. I can recall no single occasion where any serious difficulty presented itself in carrying out those arrangements for scholarships and grants.

The purpose of this motion, undoubtedly, is to emphasize the need for an extension, a very substantial extension, of the award of scholarships to those who seek the opportunity to take advantage of the educational facilities that our universities afford. This can be done without in any way interfering with the exclusive jurisdiction over education which rests with the provincial governments under our constitution. This can undoubtedly be worked out on a satisfactory basis of effective co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

I am not going to examine in detail the wording of this resolution. The purpose is clear. The purpose is to extend a system of scholarships which will widen the opportunity for young Canadians in every part of Canada, whatever their financial position may be, to avail themselves of the higher educational opportunities that our universities afford.

There are added reasons at this time why all of us should encourage the extension of opportunity at the universities. It is not only the advantage of the young people that is involved—and that is fundamental and vital. What is also involved in the consideration of this subject is the advancement and the strength of the future character of Canada itself. In a large measure, the kind of life that will be lived in our country will be shaped and guided by those who have the advantage of university education and from the pulpit and elsewhere convey those ethical and religious standards which have been the foundation of our life and which we trust will be the foundation of the life of this country in the years ahead.

We must never overlook the fact that, while it is not from university graduates alone that we must seek advancement of the general welfare of our country, one of the fundamental purposes of our universities is to train people how to live and in turn to pass on the advantage of that training to others. A great part of our university instruction is devoted to the education of teachers themselves. Certainly in that field every encouragement should be offered.

Then there is the field of engineering and scientific skill that is so important at a time when it is so much a part of the great effort that we are making throughout the free world to maintain the strength of our free system. It surely must be a matter of concern to all Canadians and all people of the western world when we find a man, as careful in his statements as Sir Winston Churchill, telling us only within the past few weeks that from the information it has been possible to obtain Soviet Russia is outstripping us in the training of engineers and others with technical knowledge who are so necessary in this period when the great issue between these two different ways of life is being resolved.

Therefore, while it is vitally important that we remember the needs of the young people, while it is vitally important that we bear in mind that every young Canadian who is capable of using the opportunity to have higher education should have that opportunity if possible, we are also dealing with the building of our national strength at a time when national strength is part of the great struggle in which we are engaged. Having regard to the enormous sums of money that are spent on the common effort to build our military strength, it would take a relatively small portion thereof to extend on a very broad basis the kind of technical education, the kind of education in the specialized skills that is needed today. I think we would be serving the dual purpose of widening the opportunities for our youth and building the strength of our nation at the same time.

What happens in the United Kingdom, the United States or in any other free country will be the decision of the governments and elected bodies of those countries. Here our responsibility is for what takes place in Canada. To the extent that this resolution presents the proposition that we should seek a system of scholarships that will encourage young people to go to university, and widens their opportunity to have university courses, we certainly support this effort. To the extent also that this can be done in a way that will guide young people into those special branches of training where graduates are particularly needed at this time, we certainly should encourage the purpose embodied in the resolution.

I have stated before that I believe this can be done without in any way interfering with provincial authority under our constitution. I have seen it work satisfactorily. I have participated in the actual administration of funds of a similar nature. I know it can be done and therefore I am very happy to support the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B. C.) Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to lend my support to the resolution. In fact I rise with some eagerness because on other occasions I have had the pleasure of putting forward the same idea in this chamber. Let me say at once that it is my purpose to form the core of my remarks around what has been so well said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). The resolution suggests that emphasis be placed upon the need for larger funds to be made available for higher education through the schedule of the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which has been in effect for 17 years. In those seventeen years the federal government has spent approximately $3 million in co-operation with all the provinces of Canada to provide scholarships and bursaries to young people of high intellect whose economic situation will not allow them to proceed to a school of higher learning.

The subject has been very well covered by my colleague, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth). He emphasized particularly the need for university training, and I should like to add one or two reasons to those he gave by way of support for a continuation of the schedule but with greatly enhanced facilities both material and financial. In those 17 years the province of British Columbia has sent to various faculties of universities of one kind and another some 7,000 students. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, his province, my province and every other province have added funds of their own to those supplied by the federal government. For some years now the federal government has provided about $30,000 in British Columbia. The British Columbia government has matched this amount and added another $100,000 to it for additional loans. The other provinces have done the same thing.

I mention that only to show that there is a realization of the need. What has always appalled me is the waste of intellect and ability of our young people that goes on in our schools. I say that because there are so many people who think that all those who have the ability to proceed to schools of higher learning have the opportunity to do so. I think we all know that financial ability is not always paralleled by intellectual ability. There are thousands of young people with intellectual ability who have no opportunity whatever to go forward. I have felt for many years that we should do more about it and I hope before I sit down to propose a plan which has some reasonable prospect of success.

I was intrigued by a remark made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) before he left on his trip to Russia. He, of course, comes from my province and, if I may say so, I once had the pleasure of teaching him. He said he was hoping to see the universities in Russia because rumour had it that they were crowded with students. He said he had heard—and he believed it—that the method of selection was as one would expect in a totalitarian society, where they had young people, young men particularly, in the armed services. They had a wonderful opportunity to select those with ability and without any question about it they would simply say to one individual, "You go to university"; to another, "You go to technical school", and to another to go somewhere else. In other words, they had the opportunity to pick out those who could profit by further training and contribute particularly to the technical advancement of their own country.

In Canada today we claim great prosperity, particularly in the industrial field. During the last session of parliament I made a plea for a realization of the shortage we have in this country and I asked this question. If Canada is to progress in the industrial field and in the scientific field, where are we going to get our engineers? What are we doing about training them? Where are we going to get our technicians and what are we doing about training them?

Only the other day during the recess a personnel man of a large industry told me that he had gone to the University of British Columbia—as had others to all universities—recruiting graduates of the faculty of applied science. He said, "I hoped to get ten for my firm and I obtained only two". Only the other day in Ottawa an official of the federal government—I should not mention the particular department because I do not think he expected to be quoted—told me that they were going around to universities recruiting. Recruiting what? Recruiting the bright young men now in the universities and offering them jobs. There is a tremendous shortage of engineers and of technicians, particularly in the field of electronics.

How many schools are there in Canada capable of training technicians, particularly in that field which I have mentioned, namely electronics? There is one. It is the Ryerson Institute of Technology in Toronto. There are good technical schools but they are mostly trade schools. We have one in Vancouver, one in Calgary, one in Winnipeg and there are one or two others. However, they are chiefly trade schools.

Here in my hand I have a letter from the principal of the Ryerson Institute of Technology who is a personal friend of mine. He wrote to me after my address of last session. In his letter he said this:

> As you know, the original aim of the Ryerson Institute was to prepare its students to become engineering technicians and over two-thirds of our enrolment is in such courses.

This letter was written in April of last year. He said:

> We have now an enrolment of 1,600 in our day classes and 5,200 in the evening school.

Farther on in his letter he said this:

> The programs of study for the engineering technicians are based on the assumption that upon graduation their general and theoretical education should reasonably approximate that of a second year university student.

What I want to point out is this, Mr. Speaker. Despite the fact that we have a shortage of professional engineers and of those who design and of those who formulate plans, they are useless unless we have those who have in their hands and in their minds the skill to put those plans into effect. The technician is the important cog in the wheel; and the technician must be guided by those whom we call, for want of a better term, superintendents or foremen or lead hands. Here we have one institution in Canada that is fitted to do that job. Yet at the same time we claim to be growing by leaps and bounds as an engineering and industrial nation.

I said that I was going to suggest a scheme. It may not have any merit, but I think it has. For some years now we have had what is called the vocational training advisory council. I was a member of it. That body meets from time to time. It is supposed to survey the situation throughout the country in the vocational and technical field. It is composed of educators, representatives of industry, of unions—that is of labour—and of the business field. That council is supposed to present recommendations to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), whose department is responsible in this field, in the hope that they may be accepted and be put into effect. I know that for years all we did was to ask for more money. That is a rather common practice of commissions. I am not too happy about the suggestion for a royal commission made by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth). We have had too many of them suggested, and they take too long. We have a body which, in my opinion, is capable of doing this job.

If we are going to tap the resources which we know are in this country, we could enlist the support of the educational administrators across this country. By that I mean the high school principals, the superintendents of education. We could ask them to do just one simple thing, namely to keep their eyes and their ears open for bright students in their schools and to earmark them. If—and I know it could be done—these youngsters could be discovered, watched and then guided in the proper channel, as their abilities would indicate, with the assurance that the federal government, in co-operation with their own educational authorities, would see to it that they had the opportunity to proceed and to develop those abilities which they have displayed, in that way I think we could ensure to every child in Canada with intellectual ability or special skill that he could be of use to himself, be happy in his own work and be of value to his community.

I would suggest to the minister that this problem be thrown into the lap of this vocational training advisory council, with the instruction that they should study this problem of the utilization of the wastage in the intellectual elite of this country and that they should formulate plans to use that valuable commodity which so far has been going to waste. But there would be no use in asking them to do this kind of thing unless they could be assured that they could follow it up. They should therefore be assured of adequate finances to put into effect a plan of increased bursaries. I like the word "bursaries" rather than the word "scholarships". A person who himself, through the generosity of his own people, can afford to proceed to university should be allowed to do so. It is those who have not that opportunity whom I think this government and all governments should assist. If a plan could be formulated and approved by the government, then I think we would be doing something to fill a need in the industrial potential of this country.

Lastly, I want to return for a moment to what I said about technicians. I said, with some heat, perhaps, that we have one school. Through the forceful effort of the Ontario department of education and the persistence of its present principal and others they established a school to do a particular job, namely, the training of tradesmen, if you like, mechanics and technicians, who are found in that large industrial centre. They have done a splendid work, but it is not enough. When I think that it was my pleasure to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) lay the foundation stone of a post office in Vancouver that cost something over $10 million or $15 million—and there are lots of them in the country—and we have one technical school worthy of its name, I just think that it is out of proportion. I know that the federal government is besieged with requests for all kinds of things. There are many desirable things that cost a lot of money that we cannot have, but I do feel that since we are growing in industrial stature we should do something drastic to man our industries.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate very heartily the mover of this private member's resolution. I am tempted to divert for a moment to express an opinion as to the value of private members' resolutions. I suppose this particular resolution about a subject which I think is vital may well do one or two things. It will air that important question before the country through the medium of this house. It will give us here an opportunity of discussing the matter and expounding our opinions in regard to it, and I think it will have some result in the creation of public opinion in favour of the particular proposition it advances.

This, of course, is not a new subject for myself; so much so, that I got tired of debating it, and did not think it was my duty to keep on. If the hon. member may be said to have in a way adopted a child that was at least partly my baby, I suppose that is all right because when one adopts some other person's baby he at least pays some tribute to the respectability of the family. This is not, of course, my particular cause; it is a cause that has been shared by many hon. members.

Before getting into the main debate, I should like to say I am interested to see my own people back at home taking an interest in this matter. I fancy the letter I hold in my hand, which was sent to me by the president of the student council of the University of Saskatchewan, or one something like it, has been received by many hon. members, because I am given to understand that a campaign is being put on by the students themselves to try to hasten the coming into effect of this resolution by way of legislation.

As I say, the letter was sent by the student council of the University of Saskatchewan. May I say briefly what they have in mind? They point out that many of the students in attendance at the university at the present time are in need of financial assistance; that many others who are not there have been prevented from attending owing to financial need. They point out that the cost of education generally has increased and is increasing much faster than their power to earn during those periods of the year when they are not engaged in their studies, and they throw out this information, which I have known for some time, that Canada is behind other nations in her assistance to her universities. Perhaps I should be careful in that statement now, since we have new grants, but it is true in the matter of aid to education in general. That last assertion interests me, namely, that Canada is somewhat behind. I think it is certainly true in so far as the matter of grants is concerned, in relation to Great Britain.

I hold in my hand an extract from an article that appeared about a year ago in an issue of Saturday Night. The gentleman who made this statement is a Mr. Kenneth Lindsay, parliamentary secretary to the board of education in Britain from 1937 to 1940, a man with a career, I believe, both in government and in education. He stated in Saturday Night of January 22, I presume of last year, as follows:

> At the university level we have got a system of grants so extensive that there is nothing like it anywhere else.

He was referring, of course, to his own country of Britain. He said that:

> Seventy-five per cent of these students will be receiving assistance from the state. Basis of entrance is entirely on merit.

This keeps down wastage. He proceeds:

> About 60 per cent of all a British university's money comes from the state through the university grants committee . . . and gives something like £20 million a year, with no questions asked.

So much for Great Britain; I should like to make a plea for the humanities. I notice that it has always been less difficult to get grants from this government for scientific research. Whether that has to do with the state of emergency that we seem to be in almost continually I do not know. I refer to research scholarships in connection with atomic energy and the like. I should like to make a plea for the humanities. I noticed the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey) said that it was the technician who had his hand on the wheel. I should like to suggest to him something that I am sure he would be the first to acknowledge. If we have not in addition something complimentary to our scientific invention, then we are well on the way to self-destruction. If we have not along with scientific invention some moral force and some stability and some moral judgment, then we will ultimately destroy ourselves.

I should like to see the humanities given a somewhat better deal in the granting of those bursaries, if indeed they are to be granted. I am thinking of potential employees of the government in the civil service, and I think particularly of the Department of External Affairs. I would suggest to the government that instead of waiting until they need a man for a certain specific office, whether it be for an administrative or an executive position, or a position in a foreign country in the Department of External Affairs, they should get from the universities of this country lists of bright young men, bright in the opinion of their teachers. That list should be available. I am talking now of men who have been specifically, shall I say, steeped in the humanities. These men will be all the better administrators, all the better executives, all the better representatives of this country in external affairs if they had some contact with the humanities. In the granting of bursaries and scholarships the government should use that list of young men of known scholarship, making of them specialists in the particular field in which the government requires them through such bursaries. I would suggest that as one way in which scholarships could very well be given with advantage.

I know something, although admittedly not a great deal, about the British system of selecting people for the diplomatic service and the consular service. As I understand it, if there is an opening in the consular service, let us say, the first step is to hold a competition. The competitive examination is open to anyone who thinks he might be eligible and is not restricted to university graduates. Naturally languages are of importance. Anyone between the ages of 18 and 24 may enter the competition. I have known cases where two or three hundred people have assembled, gone through the tests and the examinations and from their number two appointments have been made. I suggest that you are going to get really competent people under that scheme unless there is something wrong with the system of examining. Perhaps something like that is already being done here, I do not know. I am speaking now in relation to the humanities.

In filling a position in the scientific field I do not think we should insist that the applicant should be such and such a kind of scientist. I am a believer in the humanities and a believer in the value of the humanities in the moulding of human minds, and so I make some claim for them. Actually, I do not see a great deal of connection between education and the making of a living. I do not think the primary object of education is to enable a youth to make a living. It is true that if a person has an education his opportunities for securing positions are naturally better, but I am very sick of the idea that a young man does not need to know the history of his country and of his forefathers if he is going to be a farmer; and of the idea that because little Mary is going to be a seamstress she does not need to know anything of our rich literary heritage.

I would not mind if my son were a farmer—indeed, I would be glad and I would want him to plow a straight furrow—but I would like him to be an educated man regardless of the way in which he makes a living. The same thing applies in relation to the so-called—and I use that word emphatically—humble occupations in life. If my daughter is to be a dressmaker I want her to be an educated one. There is no reason why she should be denied the love of literature, the expression of the thinking of the great men of the ages simply because she will be sitting at the sewing machine. I did not intend to say this at all when I rose to speak, but there it is for what it is worth.

In this country we constantly say that education is a matter for provincial jurisdiction. I have heard that frequently enough to know that it must be a fact—or is it? Of course, I believe that the administration of education must fall within provincial jurisdiction. This appears reasonable under the British North America Act. However, while the administration of education and its detail should fall under provincial jurisdiction, the general and collective effect of education is, I believe, national.

I do not wish to compare too much our system of education with the systems of education which exist in other countries. Comparisons are odious. I have used the argument—I am loath to use it but I use it because some of my hon. friends are impressed by it—that in the competitive struggle, if you like to call it that, Canada is falling behind certain other countries. I believe I made the statement in a speech the other day that we were losing the cold war in the matter of education. Some of my hon. friends, one of them at least, was very indignant. He thought that I should not have disparaged our country by admitting that our educational system does not compare well with that of a country with whose political philosophy we do not agree. However, I suggest to my hon. friend that there are better channels for his patriotism, if indeed that is patriotism, than sticking his head in the sand and ignoring what is happening elsewhere.

Some reference to the progress in education in the Soviet union has been made; I think by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Fairey) and perhaps also by the hon. member who proposed the resolution. Anyone who is interested in education cannot already have forgotten, although it is a year old, the remarkable article by Burke Stannard entitled "Here is Race We Can't Let Russia Win" published in the Financial Post December 18, 1954, in which he gave figures, and I presume they are correct, in regard to Russian facilities for university students. I want to emphasize I am not arguing on that basis at all. What the Russians or the British are doing in regard to education is their own business. I am only interested in our system of education and in its effect upon our youth and consequently upon our nation. I have already made the statement that while the administration and detail of education is provincial its collective effect is national.

Mr. Stannard's article contains some startling statements which I should like to quote:

> In 1918, Russia had one university for every 1·5 million population; Canada had one for every 315,000. Today, Russia has one university student for every 150 population; Canada has one for every 250.

As I said, this article is from the Financial Post, a rather unusual publication in which to find an article on the subject of education; nevertheless, there it is. The article continues:

> At the present rate, by 1960 Russia will be training more scientists and engineers than all the NATO countries (U.S., U.K., Canada, etc.) combined.

That at least should answer my hon. friend's question as to why I put forward that particular argument.

I have here another article I picked up just today which was published in the Ottawa Citizen of January 5, 1956, entitled "The Russian Challenge in Education". This article says in part:

> In the United States, alarm at Russian competition is an increasingly influential factor in the demand for greater aid to education.

It is not my intention to read the entire article but I think the concluding paragraph is of importance:

> Competitive co-existence means, among other things, that western nations will have to provide more and better education.

As I see it, that is what we are talking about here today. We are in a period of tremendous prosperity. My friends on the government side keep reiterating that fact and I do not deny it. We have lots of money to spend on cars—cars which are far too big and powerful, in my estimation—and this is another invention which I think will have to be controlled. Nevertheless we have a tremendous capital investment, and are ploughing back into industry quite a percentage of that investment. I suggest that we are ploughing back too much of it into more capital investment to produce more gadgets, faster cars, bigger refrigerators and the rest of it. I suggest that there may be something wrong with our sense of value. Perhaps we are growing materialistic and acquisitive. In that we are aided and abetted continually by commercial advertising, and the worst of it is that it tries to increase our desire to surpass our neighbours in what are actually tinsel propositions. We are urged to buy what they call swanky cars and are told that we will be able to look out of the back windows and see our neighbour left behind. What an inducement that is!

I am going to suggest that perhaps we should hasten slowly in these things. We should not be in a hurry to exploit all our natural resources, to get our hands upon all the money at once, and improve our standard of luxurious living. Perhaps we should plough back some of that capital investment, some proportion of our gross national product, and invest more of it in the creation of the good life. By good life I mean things like health and education and those things which rightly or wrongly we are inclined to talk about as being the fine arts.

We have passed the pioneer stage. We have dug the stones and cut the stumps. We are very comfortably off, and it becomes a question of how we are spending our money. Are we squandering it or are we spending it on things which will build our country into a great nation?

I am reminded of a dear old friend of mine at home in the old country. Perhaps I should not refer to it in that way because my home has been here for 50 years or so and my children have been born here. But one does think of the land of his birth. I went back for a visit and was still a young man at that time. I went to see this dear old friend as she sat in her little cottage in the green fields of Northern Ireland. It was only a thatched-roof cottage but it was clean, the walls were white and the roses were growing around the door. This little old lady in the evening of her years was sitting there among her flowers, her pictures and her books, particularly her books. Being impetuous and young I began boasting about the good things we had in Canada, the inventions and other modern things. She sat and listened to me with patience and then she said, "Yes son, perhaps you have a better standard of living, but perhaps we have a better life." It was something to think about. Perhaps she was quite wrong, but that is something that has lingered in my memory from that day to this.

One of these items of the better life I have been talking about is covered by the resolution proposed by my hon. friend. He is suggesting more university scholarships. We have to give these young people a chance if we are going to bring them up to be the kind of young people we want them to be, the kind of young people we need in our social and economic environment. A comprehensive scholarship plan involves increased accommodation. If the number of individual scholarships is increased it means increased attendance at the universities. I welcome that. These people will be running to our doors just as the people in Saskatchewan have been running to the doors of the hospitals under the hospital scheme. They need to run to those doors. God bless them, let them run, the more the better, so far as universities are concerned. I would not suggest that about hospitals.

This is going to impose a burden upon our universities and they can carry no more now because their burden is already too great. They are in a state of continuing and developing financial crisis. So assistance to universities paralleling grants to individuals will be needed. These things have been expressed much better than I can express them by university men of this country. The president of McGill University has been referred to today, also the late well-beloved Dr. R. C. Wallace of Queens, and also Dr. Sidney Smith who wrote a most interesting article in the University of Toronto Quarterly.

Someone has suggested that more should be done by business interests. I am not quite sure about that. I have not thought my way through to the end on that. To me education is a public responsibility and I do not want to rely on the profits of some candy firm or brewery or something else for the education of my children and my children's children. I think it is a public and therefore governmental responsibility. Nor do I want to be dependent upon distilleries to provide opportunity for my grandchildren's participation in sports or for awards that might come to them in that respect.

That reminds me that we already receive some foreign aid for education in this country, and I am referring now to what are known as foundations. I like to see money being given for education, but the people who run these foundations are beginning to think that this country is not carrying out its share of responsibility in regard to education. I am not able to quote this as a fact, but I have heard and read that some of these people are threatening to withdraw their support because the public of this country apparently do not sufficiently appreciate the gifts that are being made at least not sufficiently to match the outside assistance. Perhaps some of my hon. friends will be able to state whether that statement is true or not. I see some affirmative nods.

Our young people are clamouring for admittance to the halls of learning. I understand that between 7 and 8 per cent are now in attendance, but this percentage will increase, certainly under the scheme we are proposing today. The actual numbers will increase in any event. I think Dr. Smith estimated a total of 130,000 will be in attendance at the universities in ten years, or he may have been quoting an estimate by the bureau of statistics.

The logical question is, what does the government propose when faced with that particular situation? Is this proposed investment worth while or is it not? Is this the best way in which we can spend our money or is it not? Are we going to keep on putting our capital investment towards the manufacture of more gadgets and increasing our present luxurious state of living? It is quite true that luxury is enjoyed by everybody, and we would like to see it more generally shared, perhaps. But are we also going to look toward the future needs of this nation?

I think it is fair to say that the government has shied away from certain propositions in regard to education, certainly one that I have often advocated. What have they done about UNESCO? Have we as a country assumed our responsibilities? Have we from the early beginnings developed something worth while? We just shied away from it. In this connection I should like to quote the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I do not know whether he realises it or not, but one of his favourite expressions is "at this time": at this time we are not prepared to do anything. But that statement does hold out some hope for the future and hope is always a good thing. I am suggesting that we have shied away from these things, perhaps unnecessarily.

I think it is time that Canada grew up educationally. It is true that we have got rid of some of our inferiority complexes and are beginning to develop some of our native arts and literature, but we should be developing something for our children to read. When you give your child or grandchild 25 cents or 35 cents to go out and buy something to read, what does he come back with? What is available to him at that price. I say no more. Of all the countries I have ever been in there is in this country the greatest dearth of good reading for children.

The comparison simply leaves us astonished and ashamed. As far as my observation goes in this matter of a demand for education and for equality of opportunity in education, the government should be taking the lead in promoting higher learning by assisting those provinces which administer the systems of education. We should have a scheme of national university scholarships and we should have it now. I am glad to hear members on the Liberal side advocating it. When one of the gentlemen on the other side advocates some progressive measure such as this, we begin to think that they are getting some encouragement or that at least no prohibition is being placed on them against mentioning the nasty word "education" in this sacred house devoted to federal matters.

To go back to the scheme of my hon. friend, this scheme would be of inestimable value to the young people of this country, to the provinces of this country and to the nation as a whole. The welfare of the nation as a whole, as well as that of the provinces and the municipalities, is, in my opinion, directly dependent on the quality of the education of its citizens. Canada did something more than help many returned soldiers when it instigated the D.V.A. education grants. She contributed to the efficiency of the whole nation. Let us not forget that the scheme was operated with individuals who on the average would certainly not have attained the same standard of education as the people to whom we are proposing that these bursaries or scholarships should now be given. If we made a success of that, if we made our country better or stronger because of that plan, what are we now waiting for? Not money—I have dealt with that. We have money for other things.

I say I am glad that a member who supports the government brought in the resolution. I honour him for it and I wish him luck with it. It may be a good sign. Let us hope it is of some significance. Let us hope that something will be done.

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) on his interest in the education of the young people of Canada as exemplified in the resolution now under discussion. This resolution calls for consideration of the need to provide national scholarships and bursaries for university students in financial need. In supporting this resolution, I am responding to an invitation from the students of St. Francis Xavier University, who were kind enough to forward me a resolution outlining their views on this problem of such importance to the university population.

Until my election to the House of Commons, I spent all of my adult life in university, either as a student or as a teacher, and it is upon that experience I wish to draw in giving voice briefly to my views on this subject.

Education

In drawing attention to the need of financial assistance for university students, the hon. member for York Centre has singled out one of several problems involved in the task of making Canadian universities more effective instruments in the progress of Canada and in the intellectual and moral formation of its people.

Equally important is the question of direct financial assistance to the universities and expanded aid to programs of research, especially in the field of the social and economic sciences. This resolution, however, is not intended to provide a basis for the analysis of the total financial problem of the university and is therefore confined to the aspect of providing greater opportunities to the youth of Canada for securing a university education.

I do not share the attitude which regards a university education as solely useful in rising to a higher income status or as replenishing the groups in the community who have exercised, in a traditional sense, social and cultural power. University education in a growing country must always have in mind the equipping of persons with skills for useful public service. It must be directed to the object of reducing social and geographical differences and divisions through its availability to all groups in a community. Finally, it must assist citizens to reach understanding by allowing them to share in the intellectual and spiritual heritage which it is the universities' duty to transmit.

I believe it is proper that each person should be allowed to choose freely his occupation. If the selected occupation requires university training, then a life ambition should not be thwarted and a contribution to society lost because the aspiring student has not the financial means. It may be that as society evolves, the notion of a university education will not be so closely bound with a gainful occupation but will be cherished as a desirable possession in its contribution to personal enrichment; and fortunate indeed is the community in which such persons abound.

If the case for assistance to university students is sound or appealing on theoretical grounds, it is more than justified by the needs of the present stage of Canada's development and is supported by the experience already gained in the launching of such assistance programs on a national scale.

Such favourable views exist on the success and efficacy of the education program of veterans under the D.V.A. plan that it is really unnecessary to provide further proof. Let me say, however, that I had the opportunity of associating with veterans at one of our Canadian universities during the post-war years. These veterans were supported in their university education by government funds and they were in part composed of students who would not have had a chance to pursue their education otherwise. This group made up a serious and competent element in the campus community. They were, of course, more mature than the average student group, but not the least of the reasons for their success as students was the removal of a great part of their financial concern. Today we have a program by which financial support is offered students who will enter the services upon graduation. Both these systems of aid are more than noble experiments. They are useful precedents. Their success nourishes the hope that, as the state supports university students in reward, and to provide an inducement, for service in the armed forces, it will also make generous provision for students who are ready to serve in peaceful pursuits.

I do not intend to retrace the ground covered by other speakers who have stressed the demand for trained persons in many professions in our present expanding economy; of the need to provide assistance in Canada to university students on a basis at least comparable to that provided in the United States and the United Kingdom; of the need to supplement the summer earnings of students through the provision of financial assistance; of the desire to increase the proportion of our population in university or with university experience.

These arguments appeal to Canadians who wish to pursue the development of their country and Canada's capacity to make a wider contribution in the cause of peace. The Canadian public will support the purpose of this debate. In the province of Nova Scotia there still lives with undiminished strength a love for learning and I am sure that a similar feeling exists in all other parts of Canada.

I want to touch for a moment on the view sometimes expressed that paying one's way sifts out those students who really want university education and who will really benefit from it. This process of paying one's way is regarded as a great builder of character. I prefer to think that a university builds character in a different sense, in the true sense of graduating men whose lives and conduct are patterned on immutable principles of religion and philosophy. But we are today also bent on building a country, and it is my belief that it will be built more solidly and more quickly if a greater share of people graduate from our universities.

The process of university education is not a financial process. It is rather a moral and intellectual process. Education extending into the professional and graduate fields requires discipline and hard work that make it so essential to remove at least in part the financial worries.

I have said nothing, Mr. Speaker, about the amount of such assistance, what standards of scholarship should be set as qualification, or how it could be administered. These are decisions that may provoke a type of discussion which at this time might frustrate the purpose of the resolution, namely, to establish the need for assistance to university students as a compelling national concern.

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the mover of the resolution. It is my opinion that in presenting this resolution to the house he has brought before the members a problem that needs to be given great concern. As a former teacher, I should also like to pay tribute at this time to the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) for his efforts throughout the years in trying to secure federal aid for education. For many years the hon. member for Saskatoon has seen fit to place resolutions on the order paper requesting aid for education. He is well known throughout western Canada as a champion of aid for education.

We in this group intend to support the resolution primarily because we believe that the advantages derived from university training should be made available to all young men and women who would like to take advantage of such training. We do not feel that the young person who lacks the financial means to attend university should be deprived of that privilege. Again, Mr. Speaker, as a group we believe that the acceptance of the resolution would be good, sound business on the part of all hon. members.

If it can be said that any good at all comes out of war, perhaps the policy of giving aid to the young men and women who were fortunate enough to return to their native land as veterans of world war II and the Korean war would be at the top of the list. The young men and women who availed themselves at that time of this opportunity are now serving their country more effectively and are proving themselves to be of great value to their communities. Without going too far back in history, it is possible to find instances where other nations have recognized the value of education, particularly university training. I am thinking in terms now of the Japanese empire. Within the span of a few short years Japan was able to build itself into a power that threatened our western civilization. How did she do that? She selected the very best of the Japanese young people. Where were they sent? They were sent to such countries as Great Britain, the United States, Germany and France. For what purpose? To pick up ideas and bring them back to Japan in order to make that nation powerful and strong.

I should also like to point out that Hitler in his early days took over control of the schools and universities of his country and that with this control he was able to build up in Germany that terrible war machine which threatened us for years. What is Russia doing today? In the course of the debate it has already been pointed out that as far as the communist government of Russia is concerned university training is a must. On the other hand, what are we doing? Are we looking to the future? Are we saying to our young people: We want you to go to the universities of our land?

In this country we have some of the finest universities to be found in the world. Are we saying to our young people: We want you to go there and equip yourselves so that you can take your place in our democracy and assist us in the cold war now being waged? Surely, Mr. Speaker, it must be recognized that we need something other than guns, bombers and so on to counteract the evil forces surrounding us today. We need educated young men and women who are firmly conviced that our way of life is the true and only way of life.

As a former teacher I have all too often watched young boys and girls come up through the school system and graduate from grade 12 with good marks only to go no further with their training. Why? It was not because they did not want to do so but because they did not have the financial means to carry on. In my opinion this is a sad situation. Education should and must be made available to all young people throughout Canada who desire and are capable of taking it. We are very pleased to support the resolution.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I was asked some time ago by the students of Dalhousie University to support the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) when he presented his resolution, and I am very pleased to do so. A good case has been made for the desirability of more scholarships for university students by hon. members who have already spoken. Coming from a province where the need is great, may I say that we find there is a wide gap between what students can earn in their holiday periods and the cost of a year at university. The figures quoted by the national federation of Canadian university students show average earnings of $600 for men and $300 for women compared with an outlay of somewhere around $1,200. The figure of $1,200 for a year may be conservative. The difference has to be made up in some way. The result is that the decision whether or not to go to university hinges very often on the immediate financial circumstances of a student's family.

If the parents are able to take care of the cost of higher education it is all to the good. If not, the student who gets his or her training the hard way does so with considerable sacrifice and hardship. This in itself is not a bad thing, provided it does not interfere with a proper use of their time at college and thus prevent them from getting a well-rounded education.

A survey in 1950 showed that over half of those who drop out of school or college do so for financial reasons. But there are those who, willing though they be to make the necessary sacrifices, are still not able to go further than high school. This seems to be the breaking point for many students. In order to confirm this view, one has only to look at the number of college students in Canada in comparison with the total population in the college-age group. In 1952 four per cent of those between the ages of 15 and 24 were attending university in Canada.

Attention has been drawn to the position in Canada as compared with that in other countries. In the United Kingdom and in France a large proportion of the students receive government scholarships and assistance. In Canada only about 15 per cent of our student population—whether the figure is correct or not I do not know—is assisted through scholarships and bursaries. These are not government scholarships, for the most part.

Hardly anyone would quarrel with the objective of the national federation of Canadian university students in asking for a national scholarship program. When a potential student is turned away from our colleges or professional schools not because of lack of ability but because he or she cannot afford to attend, we are all losers. The individual himself loses the opportunity for his broadest development and our society is that much the poorer. I am thinking not only in terms of technical training but in terms of those other qualities of breadth of vision and tolerance which are just as essential to our way of life.

The experience of Canadian universities with student veterans under the D.V.A. scheme clearly showed that there is represented in the youth of Canada a great deal of ability that ordinarily does not have the opportunity to make its full contribution to the development of this country. Because of economic difficulties many gifted young people are unable to attend university even though they have the necessary talent to become doctors, teachers, clergymen, scientists or engineers. Although they have the ability necessary to give outstanding service to Canada they are deprived of the opportunity to contribute their full potential because of the lack of university education.

Reports from universities throughout Canada have shown that the record of the student veterans was exceptionally good and that it in fact helped to set a new standard. This record was partly due to the fact that the student veterans were somewhat more mature than their classmates but it stands also as a clear reminder that we are not taking full advantage of the potential we have.

Canada is still a young and expanding country. If it is to make the progress which all true Canadians hope for, it must make the maximum use of its most valuable asset, namely the ability and skill of its youth.

Today industries and businesses all over the country are literally clamouring for men with university education to fill positions in the technical fields and in management. The same thing is true of government services. Dozens of recruiting teams are visiting the universities in search of such talent and many times they are obliged to go away with empty hands.

The universities of my own province of Nova Scotia have a special interest in this problem for two reasons. First of all, Nova Scotia has been traditionally the source of a disproportionately large number of professional men and of leaders in business and finance. Second, the average income in Nova Scotia is only about half that in Ontario. It is therefore correspondingly more difficult for our young people to find the money required to fulfil their ambition for a university education. At this point I might say that in Nova Scotia we have more students per capita than has any other province in Canada.

However, I am not sure that a national scholarship scheme is the first step that should be taken. Certainly such a program launched by itself to increase the student body substantially at this time, by whatever means, would impose on some of our colleges an impossible burden; for, in most cases, the tuition fees of the students cover only a portion of the cost of their courses. This is especially true of the medical and dental faculties where roughly only one-quarter of the costs are covered by their fees. However, there is a substantial difference in all faculties. An influx of new students, whatever the source of their tuition, would only increase the demand for services already overtaxed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Balcom: Mr. Speaker, to continue the discussion of national scholarships where we left off at six o'clock, already during this session I have emphasized the need for a more generous policy of assistance by the federal government to our universities. Further financial aid is needed to enable the universities to make proper provision for salaries, for library research facilities and for all the other demands of modern education. We must emphasize quality and standards at this level. The institutions must have the best to offer or the students will turn away with dust and ashes instead of with capacities developed and attitudes that are healthy for responsible citizens.

Incidentally, I reiterate what I have said many times in this house namely, that the present method of distributing federal grants for education, resulting in a per capita rate per student so much lower than in most other provinces and so much less than that granted to provinces whose universities, being state supported, receive large benefits from the public purse, is a continuing source of dissatisfaction to the people whom I am proud to represent.

I am not suggesting that the government should bear the whole burden of cost. The Lord forbid that it should ever happen in Canada that the government should contribute so much money that they might possibly think that they should step in and have something to say in the operation of the universities. Individual graduates, business and industry, professional organizations and labour unions all have a stake and should make a voluntary contribution.

In no case that I know of do students' fees cover the cost of training. A graduate should take some responsibility for the continuance, the growth and improvement of the institution to which he owes a great deal. This sense of loyalty and responsibility is very important, not only in this connection, but throughout our whole society.

Under this resolution we are discussing and recommending scholarships and bursaries, but I believe the brief of the students should be broadened so as to make loans to students one of its main objectives. I believe the bright, ambitious students coming out of high school need loans which, with their summer work, would carry them through their full course, these loans to be eventually paid back; for today we realize that graduates in medicine, engineering, geology and other faculties have no difficulty in making a repayment.

I would be inclined to broaden the intent of this resolution with the suggestion, too, that hospital schools for nurses' training, provided that they meet the requirements of the various nursing associations' regulations, be included. We have a youth training program which was mentioned today, and which last year expended over $514,000 in Canada, of which only $46,000 went to Nova Scotia.

Then, in 1954 I think it was, the Department of Veterans Affairs, in its progressive legislation, brought in the education assistance act, under which the sons and daughters of deceased veterans are enabled to receive an educational course extending over four years. During that time their tuition fees are paid and they also receive an allowance of $25 a month. This assistance extends over the whole four years. I note from the booklet issued by the Department of Veterans Affairs that this course is extended to approved teaching hospitals which lead to registered nurses' degrees.

Then again we have one of the programs that were instituted by the Department of National Defence. I am not certain of the army and air force, but I know of the Royal Canadian Navy. Under this program university students join the reserve force and go into training. Over a period of their college course they receive something like $185 a month while they are on active service during the summer months, and during the study period in the winter months they receive half that amount. That seems to me to be very generous, and it has been taken advantage of by students all over Canada. In addition to all these benefits, a great many of these men go on tours and receive training in other points of interest all over the world.

The federal authority also contributes to the building and operation of provincial vocational schools. Any financial help that would educate and broaden our Canadian citizens should be assisted. I have in mind scholarships and bursaries to encourage all Canadians to learn the French and English languages. Let us do more to develop our bilingualism and consider it fitting, as obviously some help is needed, to do everything possible to make our two languages truly national.

By all means I would support this resolution and I would add that the government should consider the advisability of further aid to universities generally.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the important matters which I think confront the country today. It is a very complex problem and one on which one could speak at considerable length if one had the opportunity so to do. But I do know that many hon. members wish to discuss this matter tonight, and I propose to speak very briefly indeed.

In the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne the other day I referred to the problem of university education, but I am not going to develop that further tonight. It is an anomalous situation in which we find ourselves in this country today, and which this resolution actually envisages. Practically every university in Canada is being taxed to the limit today to provide accommodation and service for the student body that is attending those universities at the present time. This resolution envisages the fact that still more students will be attending the universities. I think that is true, but it certainly does emphasize the fact that it is a complicated problem and not a simple one. The time has come when the government of Canada, the people of Canada generally, in co-operation with and through the provinces as well, will have to give more attention to the university's problem than has been given heretofore.

We have had many interesting debates on the matter contained in the resolution which is now before us. The atmosphere has been fairly well cleared with respect to it. Very little action has been taken. As I said, the time is rapidly approaching when some concrete action must be taken.

As I pointed out the other day, we are expecting an increase in our population. We look to world leadership, and we speak about the heritage which is ours and the challenge which is ours. The business leaders throughout this country are all saying we have to produce much more leadership material than is being produced at the moment. That must be done to a substantial extent through the universities. I realize it is only one phase of an over-all educational system. It is the one which is perhaps the most important and the most critical.

This resolution deals with only one phase of the problem, namely, the scholarship problem and the matter of financial support to students, and it is on that that I am going to speak for a moment.

Perhaps I can speak with a little feeling on this subject, coming as I do from a small university town where I have lived all my life. I have watched boys and girls come there seeking employment and seeking to put themselves through university. I know what small scholarships or bursaries mean to these people. I was thrilled to read the other day in the Globe and Mail—and the statement also appeared in newspapers all across Canada—that a contribution had been made to medical science by a research man in a certain Canadian university. I shall not mention his name. I happen to remember that fellow when he came to Acadia 20 years ago. I know that through a little influence he was able to obtain a job as a waiter in the university dining hall and thereby put himself through college. When I read of his contribution in the paper the other day I thought to myself, that is a substantial contribution that is being made to the public welfare of this country and to the world arising from the fact that this fellow happened to be able to get a job.

I have known, as has, I am sure, every hon. member in this house, scores and hundreds of young people who have not been able to obtain jobs at all. Some have been able to work and put themselves through, some have had relatives who sacrificed and put them through, some have won scholarships, but some have had to fall by the wayside. This resolution, as I see it, envisages this responsibility and suggests that something more must be done to assist the Canadian students who want to make a real contribution to their country if they are given an opportunity to do so.

In giving assistance to the veterans we have not established a pattern but we have established a precedent which was a notable one carried out by this government or by this parliament—I do not care how you put it. In doing so we have made a great contribution to this country, one from which we are only now beginning to reap the benefits. National research scholarships are of tremendous importance and I know that the Minister of National Defence and his department have provided for the education of many young men and possibly of some young women provided they will undertake to enter the armed forces and stay there for a certain length of time. To date, however, our contributions have been haphazard and I feel that the time has come when we should try to put them into better focus. I am not complaining about what we have done in this direction but I would suggest that it has been inadequate. I say this because the national research scholarships and others in large part deal with graduate students. We must not overlook the fact that we also have the problem of the undergraduate student.

According to figures released by the bureau of statistics we are able to estimate that by 1960 the secondary school population of this country will have doubled, a 100 per cent increase over 1950. In a few years' time the students represented by that 100 per cent increase will be moving on towards university. Many of them need assistance in order to reach that goal. Universities also need assistance in increasing their facilities for dealing with the students. As I say, there is the undergraduate problem as well as the graduate problem.

My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Fairey) in speaking this afternoon mentioned the need for further technical study in Canada. I realize that this is important but I do not think our country is going to develop solely along material lines. I think the emphasis on the sciences and on technical studies can be overdone. You, sir, will remember that in the old days in your province the emphasis was on the classical studies, generally speaking. I think there should also be an emphasis on the humanities or social sciences. History, economics, et cetera, must not be overlooked in the days that lie ahead, as they might very easily be. There are no scholarships for studies such as these and generally speaking there are no scholarships for graduate students. For these reasons I welcome this resolution. I think it is bringing the problem—and I think it is a national problem—into focus. I must emphasize again, however, that it is only one phase of the problem because the problem of education is much more complex than this. However, I think the time has come when the nation as a whole must assume responsibility for this matter and must set up a system perhaps privately supported in part, or supported by the provinces in part and supported only in part by the dominion of Canada as a nation.

I hope we can inaugurate national scholarships whereby young men such as the one I mentioned a few moments ago and the thousands like him who will be coming along will be given the opportunity of obtaining a college education and will thus be able to make a contribution to this country and to the world.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily support the resolution.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief as usual. Many teachers have asked me at this time to support a resolution of this kind and although I shall support the resolution I have certain ideas of my own on the subject of education which I should like to express.

I think that if a young man—or woman—has a purpose in life he will eke his way through college. Canadian students do not want a handout from anyone—not even from the government of Canada—because if they have a strong purpose in life they will find a way to graduate from college. I could name men in this house, including the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Fairey) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who worked their own way through college because they had a purpose in life. We do not want to graduate a lot of sissies. If a man has a purpose in life he will achieve what he sets out to do and will serve God and his country and there will be no strings attached to it. If a student receives aid from the government of Canada or from any province he should, after he has graduated and is earning his living in law or some other field, be man enough to pay back the taxpayers' money. I realize that those who were overseas are in a different position and those veterans who have graduated from college are a credit to Canada. I could name a good many of them, including some who came from the city of Fort William.

I think this resolution deserves consideration but we do not want to jump on the band wagon simply because it is a popular attitude.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, it is very encouraging indeed to many of us to find the Liberals vying with the opposition in an effort to get the floor in order to speak on the subject now before us. It is extremely interesting and also gratifying to find this resolution coming from the Liberal benches.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), who has just taken his seat, for whom everybody in the house has a great deal of respect, has made the point that students today are not seeking government aid. He seemed to imply that in his day and in mine students were made of sterner stuff and were able to earn their own way through university. I was unfortunate enough to be one of those who had to earn their own way in order to go to university at all. When I attended the University of Toronto my freshman year, 1912, cost me less than $200. My room, board and university fees together amounted to $150. Some of us have attended, or have had our children attending, university in more recent years and we realize that what kept me at university for a year would not today keep a young person for a month at a university. It is true that it is possible for young people to earn more during their summer vacations than it was in my time, but the spread between the cost and what can be earned is much greater now than it was years ago. Most of us know from experience that today it is practically impossible for young people to work their own way through university and pay all their expenses.

One cannot help noting the interest in education which is shown in this chamber today as compared with the attitude when I came to the house in 1942. At that time we considered education so exclusively a provincial matter that we scarcely dared mention the word in this chamber. During my first session here I was ruled out of order on three different occasions when I attempted to bring before the house a subject matter similar to that which we are discussing today.

Debates on education have been welcomed in this chamber now for some years and in every party in the house we find supporters for some form of federal government assistance. I have often maintained here that, notwithstanding the British North America Act, education is a matter of great concern to Canada as a nation. No provincial department of education educates a child to become a citizen of that province alone. Those who are educated in the province of Quebec move into every other province of Canada, and many of those who are educated in Ontario do likewise. Whether the cost of education is borne by the municipality, by the provincial government or with assistance from the federal government, we are educating young people today as Canadian citizens and not as citizens of any one province.

The level of culture and education to which we can bring our young people, regardless of the province in which they live, is a matter of interest and concern to Canada as a whole. We recognize that fact in time of war when we spend federal money in order to educate men and women to play their part in the war effort in order to equip them to be better soldiers, sailors, airmen and workers in munitions factories. There was no quarrel with the provincial governments over the expenditure of federal money for education in time of war. Why should we consider war so much more important in the life of the nation than peace, or education in time of war so much more important than education for peaceful living?

We are inclined to measure our progress today in terms of economics. We are hearing constantly of the great development of our natural resources and the ever-expanding production of our factories. We estimate our total national product solely in material terms. We forget that there are other values in life than those material things which can be estimated in dollars and cents.

A very learned economist, Dr. Galbraith, a Canadian who is now professor of economics at Harvard University, appeared before the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects a few days ago and he had this to say regarding the value we set on progress:

> More urgent than resource development is the problem of human development, and Canada, like the United States, has suffered an enormous wastage of talent by making higher education dependent not on ability, but on ability to pay.

I do not think there is anyone in this chamber who does not recognize the truthfulness of that statement. Today our universities are crowded but the people who are selected or who find it possible to attend are not necessarily the young people with the greatest ability or those who can profit best by a university education. By and large they are those who have the ability to pay for a university education. Dr. Galbraith made another significant statement when he said:

> But far more important than resource development is the problem of human development. The most serious current failure in both Canada and the United States is the failure to keep abreast of the technical and scientific requirements of growth. The present scramble for highly qualified people is a measure of our failure. We must plan to spend generously to correct our mistakes in this area.

If Canadians are to keep abreast of the times, if Canadian industry is to be supplied with specialists who are Canadians, then we must find the means of permitting many of our ablest young people who cannot now attend university to be able to do so. Even at that, we have fallen behind in providing specialists in the fields of natural science and engineering. But we have fallen much farther behind the times in the provision of graduates in the humanities, the arts and the social sciences. If we are to make this nation the best nation possible, if we are to produce a race of Canadians who can hold their own with the peoples of other countries, then we must be prepared to spend more money and to give more attention to those things which cannot be measured in terms of dollars and cents, those things which will eventually add to human happiness and development.

This is a matter which today has very broad support throughout the country. Even as conservative a group as the Canadian chamber of commerce in its December newsletter commented on the fact that we in Canada are not training our young people of the greatest ability for the positions they will be needed to fill.

This afternoon we heard that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), who have returned from their trips behind the iron curtain, were greatly impressed by the urge to learn in those countries and by the opportunities for learning provided there. True, we may think that much of what is learnt there may be communist doctrine. We may not approve of the tactics that are used. But we dare not ignore the fact that behind the iron curtain the communists are providing for their young people every possible opportunity to gain an education, such as it is.

If we are to maintain our position in the battle for men's minds that is now going on throughout the world, then it behooves us to see that provision is made whereby more of our most capable young people will be provided with an opportunity of attending university. I sincerely hope that some way can be found, within the limitations of the British North America Act and without overriding provincial authorities, to make those opportunities available from federal funds.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, as one whose attendance at a university would have been impossible without the assistance provided by scholarships and bursaries, it gives me very great pleasure to support this resolution.

So much has already been said by previous speakers that the subject has now been rather well covered, but I believe the organization whose scholarships made it possible for me to attain a college education would have every reason to consider me lacking in appreciation and gratitude did I not take advantage of this opportunity to support this resolution.

In the light of the opening remarks by the hon. member for York South perhaps I should explain also that, in addition to the scholarships and bursaries, it was necessary for me to earn upward of $1,000 during my college term, and the financial worry and physical effort which that involved was a very serious handicap all through my college life. I therefore commend the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) for bringing this resolution before us today. In so doing, he has performed a service to our country by focussing our attention on a matter of vital national importance.

Canada is a country that is blessed with fabulous natural resources, and we are rightly concerned with their conservation and development. How much more, therefore, should we be concerned with the development of our human resources, which are the most important and most precious resources of all?

We hear a good deal about the wonders of the electronic brain. How much more wonderful is the human intellect, which has produced not only the electronic brain and automation but all the other wonders of science which have contributed so much to our material comforts and conveniences. Up till now, every minute of man's life has been occupied in trying to survive. It is only now, with the perfection of the machine and the coming of the machine age, that man is beginning to find time to live. The very vastness of Canada's natural resources makes it all the more imperative that we develop our human resources, because the efficiency with which these natural resources are conserved for future generations, or developed and distributed among the living generations, will depend directly upon the development of our human resources.

The emphasis that Soviet Russia is placing upon education generally and upon university education in particular shows that they are very much aware of this fact. As the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) pointed out this afternoon, the Russian output of scientists and engineers will soon exceed that of all the countries of the free world combined. The very shortage of scientists, engineers, physicists, chemists, doctors, teachers and those of other professions in Canada shows that either we are not alive to the problem or that existing facilities are not adequate. In any case we are not meeting the need.

I was very glad to hear the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) emphasize the importance of the humanities. One of the causes of the troubles in the world today is that scientific training has far outstripped our moral and mental training. Material progress has outstripped our spiritual progress. Our greatest problems today are not scientific or economic. They are social and political. We need minds trained in the humanities to come to grips with these problems and find a way out. We need minds trained in science and the humanities to grapple with what is perhaps the greatest problem of our age—to find a way so that the wealth produced by the machine can be distributed, so that the machine can be employed with maximum benefit and all the blessings that can flow from the machine may be fully enjoyed by all mankind.

Another reason why I support the resolution is that it will help in some degree to offset one of the defects in our present system of education. Today our educational system is such that we try to educate our children en masse and because we do that the only selection of students that is made is that performed by the universities themselves. It sometimes happens that a person attends university who perhaps should not be there. He is there because his parents have money and ambition, and because they have money and ambition they decide that their son must be a doctor, lawyer or engineer. Although he turns out to be only a very average student, because his parents have the means he is able to take one or even two years longer than necessary to secure a degree. On the other hand, there are many brilliant students who would be a great credit to a university, who would render great service to their country and their fellow men but who cannot get the necessary training because of lack of means.

The hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey) drew attention to the waste of intellect and ability that is a product of our present educational system. As an ex-teacher and one who spent a number of years supervising schools I can testify to the accuracy of his statement. Time after time I saw tremendous talent, a tremendous brain, buried in some little outport village, a young person whose parents were barely existing on a subsistence level and who perhaps had no hope whatever of even being able to go to high school. Time after time I saw children with great talent for art, sculpture or music who were without the opportunity or even the hope of being able to develop these God-given talents.

The mover of the resolution has not given us very much information as to the methods by which the resolution might be implemented. As it stands now, it calls for grants to be furnished by the government. I believe there are greater possibilities than those implied in the terms of the resolution. I have become intrigued with the idea that it might be possible to tie in such scholarships with the idea of a national memorial to veterans of both wars. In the course of his remarks the hon. member for York Centre stressed the idea that such scholarships would serve to build unity in our nation, and if we can kill two or three birds with one stone I think we should endeavour to do so. It has occurred to me that if a student in Newfoundland received a scholarship given in memory of some deceased veteran from Quebec what a bond of unity would result. What an opportunity there would be for better understanding! Two different families from two different provinces and with two different backgrounds would have a mutual or common interest in each other and an incentive to learn more and more about the family, the background and the life of the person who was being commemorated by that scholarship. I do not know whether or not that idea is feasible. It just occurred to me as I was listening to the speeches this afternoon. I mention it because I think it deserves some consideration.

Perhaps it would be better not to set up any arbitrary rules as to how these scholarships might be implemented. Perhaps it would be wiser to set up a committee that might consider all the aspects of the situation and make recommendations. I heartily agree with my friend the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) in what he said about providing scholarships for nurses and for students who wish to become bilingual in the two official languages of our nation. I should like to go even further than he has gone. I should like to see scholarships provided for people who have talent for art and painting, music, singing and literary pursuits. All of these things are needed in Canada. All of them will enrich our culture and our nation.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer just one more idea. I think it would be a fine thing if we could also extend some national scholarships to students of other countries, particularly to students from Asia, India and Africa. In November, 1954, it was my privilege to attend the conference of UNESCO at Montevideo in South America. While there I had occasion to meet a number of students who were proud to tell me that they had been educated in Canada, having been enabled to come to Canada by means of a scholarship. It was, of course, a scholarship that was provided by the university which they attended. In the interests of mutual understanding and in an effort to show our interest in our friends in other countries who are clamouring for education but who do not have the facilities we have, and who are trying to build up their own country and their own economy, I think it would be a great thing if we had something like a Colombo plan in education. I am sure that money spent in this way would come back repaid a thousandfold.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, last December by request of President Eisenhower some 2,000 United States educators met in Washington to discuss a national emergency. That national emergency was the United States school system which, according to this group, was rocking dangerously on its foundations and also on its premises. We in Canada would not approach the problem of education from that dramatic standpoint. However, from the interest displayed in this debate today, it is obvious that we are becoming more and more concerned about the problem of education in Canada.

As I look at the resolution before the house, it seems to me to be a nice, middle-of-the-way course between two other educational problems that have been discussed from time to time in this chamber. In the first instance there is the perennial resolution put forward by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). It suggests that consideration might be given to general federal aid for education. On the other hand we have the resolution of the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) who draws attention to the fact that our research facilities in this country are far from adequate and that some action should be taken by the federal government to increase our activity in that regard.

To come to the resolution recommending a more extensive use of scholarships and bursaries in order to deal with this growing problem, it seems to me that it gets around the difficulty with which this parliament is always confronted when we discuss federal aid for education. I refer to the constitutional problem involving the exclusive right of the provinces to deal with any matters relating to education. I am happy to support the resolution that we have before us this evening. I say that it is encouraging to note the increased interest displayed by hon. members on all sides of the house and from all parts of Canada. However, if we look outside this chamber, Mr. Speaker, I think we shall find that there is an even more intense and wider interest in the matter of education—particularly on the university level—in Canada today.

When the royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences was meeting in the various parts of Canada no less than 143 briefs presented to that commission made a suggestion to the effect that some form of bursary assistance should be made available to our brighter young people. As you scan through the recommendations of that report you find that two basic principles emerge relating to this matter. First of all, a democratic educational system must ensure that capable students shall not be prevented by financial need from completing their education. That is the first general theme that runs through all the recommendations that were presented to the royal commission. The second general theme is that Canada's future development depends upon an adequate supply of intelligent and well-trained research scientists and scholars.

To deal with the first general principle, Mr. Speaker, it is of course obvious that we are not making the most of our potential human resources on the university level. We are not ensuring that capable students shall have the opportunity to proceed to advanced education. Unfortunately, the main deterrent to the realization of this end is the economic and financial factor. That of course is not the only deterrent. We are still a young nation. Some parts of the country are still in the frontier period of development, and on the frontier in the outlying areas of the country there are neither the traditions that would encourage our younger people to continue their education on the higher level nor the personal incentive. Therefore, in addition to the financial and economic factor, we must also keep in mind that there are other problems producing Canada's relatively poor record on the level of higher education.

However, this resolution deals mainly with the economic and financial factor. From a personal contact with the problem in one of the western provinces, I can say there is a close relationship between the amount of schooling a child receives and the economic status of the parents. That conclusion has been arrived at by statistical analyses. You find that by far the larger percentage of your students at the university level come from relatively more well-to-do families in Canada.

It is true, as several hon. members have mentioned in this discussion, there was a time in the earlier stages of development that anybody who so desired could receive a university education by means of working his way through college, and a good many hon. members have already given testimony of their own experience in this regard. Unfortunately, today costs have risen to such an extent in our universities; board, room and the costs of books and so forth, have risen so excessively that it is almost impossible for a student to go through college, and particularly to take some professional training, unless he has some form of financial assistance, or unless his family happens to be in the higher income brackets. Therefore it seems obvious to me, Mr. Speaker, that we need to broaden quite extensively the scholarship and bursary basis behind our system of higher education.

If we were to take the time to examine the bursary situation already prevailing in Canada we would find it to be totally inadequate. Most universities make a very noble gesture in this regard. Some commercial firms, and private corporations have provided very generous scholarships, scholarships of sufficient size to make it possible for an exceptional student to carry right through to the end of his professional training. But if you examine the catalogue of any of our universities you will find that most of the bursaries and scholarships are in the $200, $300, $400 or $500 category, and that is far from adequate to meet the average costs of a year at university today, which amount to something like $1,200. When only a small part of that necessary money is available, it becomes more of a headache than an asset in helping the student to pursue his chosen course. I know that at the college in our own city, which is a liberal arts and sciences college, we get very generous support from the local merchants who give memorial scholarships of various kinds, but again they are within the smaller limits that I have already mentioned.

I want to make this observation. At the level of graduate studies, Canada is in a much better position than she is at the level of undergraduate studies. One of the reasons for this relatively better position in the graduate studies is the generous encouragement that Canada's national research council gives to graduate students pursuing advanced work in the field of the physical sciences. Of course, the national research council is sponsored by the federal government.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has also given some encouragement to graduate students. I should like to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that good as this is, it is rather looking at the problem from the wrong end. In order to get to graduate level, you must proceed through four or five years of strenuous and expensive undergraduate activity, with the result that many of those who would be qualified to proceed to the rarefied atmosphere of graduate studies and become the leading scientists and scholars in this country are prevented from ever embarking on that worthy goal because they are stymied at the level of university entrance.

We should also note that a good many of our graduate students working in Canada have their eyes on the United States rather than on Canada when they have finally finished their courses of studies. One of the reasons is that the United States has a much more comprehensive program for graduates. They are quite happy to invite and to induce our brighter Canadian students across the border by means of their very generous scholarships program. We are constantly reminded that migration across the border has been taking place at rather alarming proportions for many years in Canada and unfortunately among the migrants are many of Canada's brightest young people, who go south to seek higher learning and pursue the wider opportunities available there. Therefore, I think we can conclude, without enlarging on the subject further, by saying that we are hardly providing a sufficient financial inducement to make it possible for bright young Canadians to pursue a course of study.

What about this other matter of the adequate supply of intelligent and well-trained research scientists? I will agree with those who have suggested tonight that not everybody is capable of making the most of a university education. I think that is implicit in the resolution here before us because the program of scholarships and bursaries operates to a certain extent as a screening procedure. It encourages only the brightest and the most capable young people. I include in that phrase "most capable" not only those with the highest intellectual capacity but also those with that more intangible quality of character and moral stamina. In the very nature of a bursary program there is a tendency to encourage those who are qualified from that broader perspective. In fact, the royal commission has laid down specific recommendations as to the type of scholarship program which might be sponsored by the government of Canada. For instance, it suggests that 100 annual scholarships of $1,000 each might be made available to students of outstanding ability; only 100 annual scholarships mind you. It suggests further that 250 scholarships of $500 might be available and 2,000 bursaries of $500 for diligent students on the basis of need. That is not a particularly broad or comprehensive program but if we were to actually look at the picture presented by the normal curve of the distribution of intelligence the number of people in any population grouping who possess the higher intelligence quotient making it possible for them to take the best advantage of advance training is a relatively small percentage, 15 or 20 per cent of the total population at most. The rare category among the human species, those of unusual brilliance who are potential geniuses represents only 5 per cent of the total population. The tragedy is that many of our students who are possessed of this high degree of intelligence are denied the opportunity of advanced training to prepare themselves to serve in the various fields that are waiting for people of exceptional talent, because of economic factors, because of isolation from centres of university training and because of lack of incentive. The scheme proposed by the royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences and supported by many hon. members here today would, I am sure, go a long way to deal with the very urgent problem that is confronting Canada at this time.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have listened most attentively to this debate which has been held on a very high level. Most of the hon. members who have taken part in the discussion have been those gentlemen who have received university education and they knew something about the subject which they were discussing. I have not had a university education. I wonder what contribution to this debate would be made by the hon. member from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) if he were in his seat tonight? Many of us remember his telling us of the time that he drove a milk wagon through the streets of Vancouver. He also did not have the opportunity of a university education. I think my hon. friend from Medicine Hat who had such a distinguished career with the government of Alberta could make a valuable contribution. He could speak of the people whom he knew who had had university education whereas he and I did not have such an opportunity. I think, therefore, it would be of value if someone who has not had a university education should rise and contribute to the discussion on this resolution.

I had to leave school at grade 7; I did not complete grade 7. At that time I was 12 years of age. I had to go to work because of sickness in my family and I kept my small family on my wages which amounted to $15 a month. I frequently wonder how much a university education would have done for me. I had not completed grade 7 and I was one-half of 1 per cent away from the Governor General's medal in Saskatchewan. Two people in the school I attended could have been awarded the Governor General's medal. I was one-half of 1 per cent away from receiving it and the young man who did receive it had a father who could afford a university education. That young man's name is now a household word in Canada. I do not know what the future might have held for me if I had had the same advantages. However, that is an example of what can be accomplished with higher learning when one has financial resources behind one as compared to not having sufficient money to obtain university training.

As I said, I wonder what my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway would have said in this debate if he was not busy in his office at the moment. I can well imagine what he would have said about the advantages of having an education in his own inimitable way in regard to his associates. I also wonder what my friend the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) would have said in this debate. Without a university education he has done a magnificent job in the labour field, as we all know. Whether a university education would have assisted him is a matter of question but there is no doubt in my mind that it would not have hampered him in his career.

I wonder about the value of education in relation to the problem of juvenile delinquency which confronts us. Some time ago I was fortunate enough to be the chairman of the school board in Burnaby, and because I held that position I suppose I know a little about what young people think. I remember that one young boy who was attending Burnaby South high school wanted to become a chemical engineer. His father was killed in a traffic accident and six months later he left high school and took a job delivering groceries in a truck. That young man was a potential scientist. I wonder what his contribution to our society would have been if this government or all governments had joined together to assist this young man who had attained wonderful marks in high school. I know of another young man who was working as a truck driver. He wanted to become a physician. His parents were killed in a train wreck just outside of Saskatoon some years ago. I wonder what this country is missing by not having the contribution of a young man with that type of mentality.

We have listened to several splendid speeches concerning the problem of juvenile delinquency. I wonder about the relationship between juvenile delinquency and the frustration of young people who get themselves into trouble partly because they envy other young people whose parents' financial position enables them to attend high schools and universities. I wonder if that frustration has anything to do with the juvenile delinquency problem in Canada? Perhaps not, but I suggest we give it some thought; it is a thought on the level of a man who never went to university. Perhaps those people who went to university could judge it in a different way. I envy the hon. member from Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) because he seems to know exactly of what he speaks in this matter. He puts it so well. I appreciate the experience behind the remarks of the distinguished hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Fairey) when he spoke in the debate this afternoon. By ability alone he became the deputy minister of education in his province. These men speak from experience.

I do not know whether someone like me, getting up in a debate like this and asking the government to spend more money for the greatest asset we can have, is making any contribution, but I have made what little contribution I could. I believe that with this government's help and the help of other governments every young person in Canada should have the opportunity to have his own future in his own hands.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted by reason of the last speech to digress for a moment, because while we are talking about university education tonight, and while those of us who have been at university would like to think that we have not wasted our time, nevertheless I think we all recognize that education is not confined to university people. It so happens that when I was in business I was associated closely with two men neither of whom had ever been near a university. They were two of the best educated men I have ever known. Incidentally one of them could use the English language better than 90 per cent of university graduates, for the very simple reason that he had been saturated with the King James version of the Bible which had given him a beautiful English style.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): He would not be a Presbyterian?

Mr. Macdonnell: He was not a Presbyterian, no, and that was one of his few defects. I think we all ought to be grateful for this debate. We ought to be grateful to the mover of this motion, and we ought not to forget those to my left who have brought this matter up year after year and who have also made a notable contribution today.

It is interesting to be told by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) that when he came to this house 14 years ago they just did not talk about education. We have moved since that time and it is no longer so exclusively provincial. Those of us who have been associated with universities have every reason to be grateful for the substantial assistance which we have had from the dominion. As has been recalled tonight, we are also most grateful for what has been done, particularly in the realm of the national research council and in connection with war veterans.

One of the things that has interested me today is to realize that apparently university graduates are much more appreciated than they used to be. There was a time when people did not flaunt too much the fact that they were university graduates. It was considered that you had better get into business and try to make your way and win confidence and then let people discover gradually that you were a university graduate. There was a feeling in those days that a university graduate was apt to be high-hat and superior.

I would infer from what has been said during this debate that those days are pretty well past. It is clear that the need is great and the problem is going to press hard. It is not only a problem of technicians, but happily it seems clear that those in business who have to make selections from young people are appreciating much more than they did years ago that a broader education, which has been in danger of being shoved into the corner, particularly in wartime when we had to stress the technical side so much, should now take a more important place in our educational program.

It seems to me that there are two or three questions which arise with regard to these scholarships. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) pointed out that there had been a tendency to regard scholarships as being confined to graduates and he stressed the fact that these scholarships should go to undergraduates as well. I find myself in sympathy with the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) when he suggests that there should be a lot of self-help in these matters. I was made rather dizzy when the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) said he had earned $1,000 toward his university course. I never got within sight of $1,000; if I earned $100 during the summer I thought I was doing pretty well. I am assured by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings that he was also under the dire necessity of earning his way through university.

The universities are going to be faced with tremendous problems. I am reading now from the Toronto University Quarterly in which they make the calculation that in 10 years from now there will be from 110,000 to 135,000 in Canadian universities as compared with the present total of 65,000. I read to the house the other day a formidable series of comments by the British press reflecting the great burden which is being put on us in the matter of competition with Russian education.

A suggestion has been made that a royal commission should be appointed. One is inclined to be afraid of royal commissions, but on the other hand it does seem to me that here is a problem every bit as important as the economic problem which is being studied by a royal commission. Indeed you could argue that to try to look forward into the course of our education is more important because if we do not have education, no matter what the royal commission may find as to our future, we will not be able to satisfactorily carry it out.

It seems clear to me after listening to the discussion that there are two sanctions, so to speak, for these scholarships. One is what you might term a scholarship given on an economic basis, by reason of need, and the other is a scholarship given on the basis of talent. That seems to me to involve very difficult questions. All universities are seeking scholarships which are usually scholarships for talent—I think I can say that almost universally they are scholarships for talent.

Of course the universities would be glad to get any assistance they can from governments. The Massey report made many recommendations as to scholarships, only a few of which I believe have been carried out. As I understand it, they are on the talent basis, what you would call the professional basis. They are to be given as assistance to all kinds of people whose talents we desire to cultivate and nurture.

It seems to me that the problem is a difficult one and I am wondering whether there is not some way in which the government and the university authorities could consult with each other. I am sure that the university authorities are constantly giving their best attention to this. I believe there is an association of university presidents. Even a believer in private initiative like myself would hope that in some way there could be a common plan, there could be co-operation among the universities and we would not be left just with the rugged individualism of each university doing what it could. I would hope that in some way there would be a plan.

It seems to me that the one thing that arises immediately is how far are we going to allow the problem which is being so much discussed, the tremendous technical progress of Russia, to twist or even to distort our education. How far are we going to maintain the balance between the humanities and technical subjects? I do not think I need take up the time of the house any longer. I feel that this is just as important as the economy of Canada, and somehow or other as a result of this discussion I would hope that progress could be made to this end.

Before I resume my seat I should like to say that I would not want university presidents to be faced suddenly with some cut and dried plan. I should think that the university presidents would be the best people to offer information as to how the matter might be studied, how progress might be made, because there are many aspects of this and it will require all the wisdom we can summon to solve them satisfactorily.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question. He stated that when the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) came into the house education was practically never discussed, or that the hon. member had said so. I am sure the hon. member did not want to be unfair, and I imagine he had forgotten that my hon. friend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), started talking about scholarships in the first session he was here, in 1936, and that he got some results.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am ready to make whatever apology I should to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In those days I was merely one of the underworld, working away in business, and perhaps I was not as familiar with those great things as I should have been.

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this resolution reverses the flight of time for me some 18 years or so back to 1937, when I had occasion to speak on a similar resolution. As the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has just stated, the resolution for national scholarships had at that time been introduced by the then member for Essex East, who still has the honour to represent—and ably represent—this same constituency in the person of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

The resolution of 18 years ago was very well presented, and the exposé that the sponsor made at the time fully outlined the needs as well as the possible consequences of putting the resolution into effect. Since that time similar resolutions have been introduced into this house, predicated always on the beneficial results which would be derived nationally by the implementation of its subject matter. Although 18 years have passed since the first resolution was introduced by the hon. member for Essex East in 1937, we have had this afternoon positive and tangible evidence of another very able presentation of the subject matter of the present debate, by the hon. member for York Centre, who introduced the resolution. I wish to congratulate him on his speech this afternoon on national scholarships, and his invitation, especially to the members from Quebec, to take part in this discussion is the reason why I am only too glad to support the resolution presented to us by him.

It is patent to us all that the purpose of the resolution is to supplement, if possible, the educational efforts not only of the federal and provincial governments but of all existing organizations interested in the subject of education.

Education is a heritage that we ourselves in this generation must assist in every possible way so that, as we pass from the field of activity, we shall leave behind us those who are probably better educated than we have had an opportunity of being. The resolution also means a greater use of our educational system and making of that system a greater national asset and a greater national benefit.

That there is often financial embarrassment to many of our students cannot be gainsaid.

If we take into consideration the fact that 44 per cent of the children of the country issue from 14 per cent only of Canadian families, the assistance which can be given to needy students is recognized by all of us as one of the best investments a country can make.

In 1948-49, when university enrolment in the country had reached the total of 80,000, 30 per cent were ex-servicemen holding bursaries from the federal government. Apart from ex-servicemen, only one out of six or seven students in Canada, or less than 14 per cent of the total enrolment in Canadian universities, were holders of scholarships, even when participants in vocational training schemes were included.

In 1938, 14 per cent of Canadian students were scholarship holders. It must therefore be admitted that we have not made very much permanent advance in the 10 years from 1938 to 1948.

On the other hand, in Great Britain, in 1947, 25 per cent of the students, apart from ex-servicemen, held bursaries. Present government plans in Great Britain will result in the increase of this proportion to 70 per cent of the total number of university students. In the United States, 20 per cent of university students are on scholarships.

The report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences mentions that 143 briefs had been presented to it up to 1950, and among these were those presented by the National Conference of Canadian Universities, the Trades and Labour Congress, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and the Professional Institute of the Civil Service of Canada.

All of this goes to show the very high importance of the matter of education in the view of Canadians.

It is admitted by almost each and every one of us that, in accordance with the confederation act, education is under provincial jurisdiction. In no way must this requisite be interfered with, and at all times must this precept be adhered to.

I have been impressed this afternoon by the declaration of the hon. member for York Centre of the very small percentage of financial grants affecting students directly, out of the total grants made. I am wondering whether the matter could not be gone into with a view to increasing that percentage of only 6 or 7 per cent—if I recall correctly—that directly affects the students.

I know that it behooves each and every one of us to do all we can to increase, whenever it is possible to do so, the assistance for needy and worthy students. I am wondering also whether some of our industries could not do a little more than they have done in the past in the establishment of scholarships particularly for worthy needy students. Corporation profits in 1954, for example, totalled $1,800 million. The figure for 1955 is estimated to be over $2¼ billion, an increase in profits of over $400 million in the last year. Surely here is a splendid opportunity for the corporations of Canada to lend their assistance to the establishment of national scholarships. In doing so they will not only assist needy students but will also assist themselves at the same time to secure the scientists and technical men they will need in the future.

The great need is for first-class men to give leadership and inspiration through their own brilliant, original discoveries. The future depends not only on the continued liberality of government agencies but on the number and quality of the men induced to do research work. The greatest need is to discover and train these men, and surely the resolution of the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) will, if implemented, assist us to attain the aim envisaged.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to enter this debate and with the assistance of one of the cabinet ministers to have on record the very important fact that this matter has been before parliament for about 18 years. My plea this evening is simply that we have a change from words to cabinet action. I regret, and I am sure we all do, that the resolution does not come from a cabinet minister as it would then be the prelude to a bill which would do something about the matter. In the time I have been in the house I have read a number of copious commission reports. I could refer to the Massey commission which was set up to find out what should be done in Canada to assist in the development of the intellectual resources of our country having in mind the keeping in Canada of young men trained in our universities instead of watching them migrate in their thousands to the big country to the south of us.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) on adopting this great cause. I wish him well, and I can guarantee him support similar to what he has had from all the opposition. I hope he can convince the cabinet that something should be done about the matter.

I could not speak tonight without paying tribute to the member from the university city of my own province, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), who spoke so ably this afternoon and who for years has sponsored the cause of education of Canadian youth and university training. I want also to congratulate the Canadian university students association on the work they have done in contacting members of the house and asking them to support the resolution by letting the government know that by and large the Canadian people are solidly behind something being done at this time.

I do not suppose any teacher in Canada could fail to be moved by the shocking waste of some of the finest intellects that enter our public schools, a waste brought about because of poverty, with the result that these young people are not able to take higher education and some of the brightest minds of our country are lost to the nation. This has been a matter of concern to me ever since I was a student in high school. I will never forget the plea expressed in Thomas Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" where, referring to the graves of the people from that rural area, he said:

> But knowledge to their eyes her ample page
> Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll;
> Chill penury repress'd their noble rage,
> And froze the genial current of the soul.
> Full many a gem of purest ray serene
> The dark unfathom'd caves of ocean bear:
> Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
> And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

The time has come for Canada to stop wasting these gems of intellect, these flowers of beauty. Today the world is changing very rapidly. It is more evident than ever that no nation can hope to rise in the scale of peoples unless it maintains the highest possible training of the greatest number of its people who are capable of taking university training and benefiting from it. Scientific and cultural advances are made in the world today at breathtaking speed, and the very existence of our nation depends more and more on our ability to train the intellect of our youth.

A few years ago, when more opportunities were available, young people could earn enough to put themselves through universities much more easily than they can today. The resolution of the Canadian university students association, forwarded by the students' representative council of the University of Saskatchewan, draws this fact to the attention of hon. members in these words:

> Whereas there are many university students in real need of financial assistance;
> And whereas still more persons anxious to attend university are prevented from doing so by financial necessity;
> And whereas the cost of attending university has been rising more rapidly than the earning power of students;
> And whereas assistance available to Canadian students compares unfavourably with that available in other countries;
> And whereas it is a loss to our Canadian social, cultural and professional life as well as to the individual concerned whenever anyone abandons or does not enter university for financial reasons;
> Be it resolved that the students' representative council of the University of Saskatchewan:
> 1. Supports the current national student campaign for increased and more numerous government scholarships and bursaries.

They also go on to say:

> In view of the urgency of this situation, specific and immediate governmental action should be taken to provide such scholarships.

They do not need to urge the members of this group to support such a resolution. Every year we lose thousands of university students and many university graduates to the United States. Surely that is a sign that we in Canada are not providing opportunities for them within our own country. The development of the natural resources of this country should be the job of the young people whose minds have been trained in Canada. Can we not provide that opportunity here? The time is long past when effective action should have been taken by the government with regard to this matter.

I support the idea put forward this evening by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) with respect to the provision of a revolving fund. Many students would welcome the opportunity to take advantage of a revolving fund program under which they could borrow money to attend university. After they had graduated they could then make use of their higher earning power to repay the money to the fund in order to assist other students in the same way.

There is one thing, however, that we must all face and that is the question of educational facilities in Canada today. If we are going to have more students in our universities then it is quite evident to anyone who has surveyed the situation at all, that Canada needs additional university facilities most urgently. Dr. Sidney E. Smith points out that we are very inadequately equipped even for the 65,000 students who are attending our universities today. The problems facing our universities are most serious; they are inescapable and imminent. The trouble is that the basis of support of our universities is entirely inadequate. It is a matter of serious national dimensions which cannot be overcome and remedied without government assistance on the national level. As a nation we dare not neglect this matter. As a parliament, we are each and all responsible for immediate action in Canada on this matter.

Modern society is making greatly increased demands on the universities. Obviously those demands can be fulfilled only if society is willing to meet the demands of the universities. The universities just cannot exist, let alone expand, on "good will and fair words".

This problem is bigger than this government appears to realize. It is the present government that is responsible. Action is urgently needed. Surely the word of the greatest experts in education in the dominion should be taken when they put forward such reports as we find in the Toronto University monthly of January 1956. Every recent report on higher education throughout the country stresses this point—indicating that a matter that previously was sponsored just as a good cause today has become one of national necessity. From a federal government point of view, our record in this field is pitiable. In view of the national importance of the matter, I think the record is just one of complete neglect. I regret exceedingly that there has been no evidence of federal action at the cabinet level before this time.

I take great pleasure in supporting this resolution. I only hope that what has been said here today will be a step forward in convincing the cabinet of Canada that the Canadian people are aware of this extremely important and imminent problem. It is their responsibility to act on it now.

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: At this moment I think I should call on the hon. member for Davenport if we are to follow the pattern that has been followed since the beginning of this debate.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for me to support this resolution sponsored by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth). He is to be commended for his initiative and for the considerable research which was necessary in the preparation of his opening address.

In November, 1954, the students administrative council of the University of Toronto invited all members of parliament for the Toronto metropolitan area to attend a meeting sponsored by that council for the purpose of seeking support for increased and more numerous government scholarships and bursaries for Canadian students. The meeting was well attended. The hon. member for York Centre was there, as were the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) and many others. It was ably presided over by Mr. William Angus, who occupied the chair. Mr. Angus at that time was president of the students administrative council.

I should like to mention a few of the points that were contained in their brief. The first point they mentioned was that there are a substantial number of Canadians who are qualified to obtain higher education and who do not obtain it because they lack the necessary means. From my own personal experience, Mr. Speaker, I know of a number of people in my year at school who were unable to proceed beyond the high school level and to take university training simply because their parents did not have the financial means necessary to support them.

Canada lags far behind other countries, particularly the United Kingdom, in the amount of assistance provided students. If the twentieth century is truly to belong to Canada we must overtake other countries in this field. As was mentioned earlier, the Russian government is sponsoring many scholarships, particularly in the sciences, in the hope of graduating a sufficient number of engineers to overtake us in technology. We must do everything possible to make sure that we keep up to, and indeed ahead of them in every field.

A university education is increasingly necessary to any sort of personal advancement. It therefore must be freely available if the best qualified are to hold the key position in Canadian society.

A bursary scheme of this kind would aid in recruiting older students with work experience who add greatly to a university, as was shown by the D.V.A. experience. I was one of those people who were fortunate enough to receive government assistance after the war. I feel that it is my responsibility and duty to do anything I can to obtain the same assistance for others. The benefits conferred on this country by this program are so great as to be difficult to calculate.

Such a program would be broad enough to assist the valuable "good" all-round student as well as the merely brilliant one.

Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Hellyer the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

AMOUNTS SPENT BY TOURISTS

Question No. 1—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. For each of the calendar years, 1952 to 1955 inclusive, (a) How much money in Canadian dollars was spent abroad by Canadian tourists? (b) In what countries was such money spent and how much was spent by Canadian tourists in each of such countries?

2. For each of the calendar years, 1952 to 1955 inclusive, (a) How much money in Canadian dollars was spent in Canada by tourists from other countries? (b) What are the countries whose nationals spent such money and what were the respective total amounts spent by tourists from each of the said countries?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

FINGAL AIRPORT—PAINTING

Question No. 35—Mr. McBain:

1. Has any painting been done at Fingal airport within the last six months?
2. If so, were tenders called for such painting?
3. If tenders were called, in what publications were such tenders advertised?
4. What were the dates of such publications?
5. What were the names of the contractors tendering?
6. What was the name of the successful tenderer and what was the amount of his tender?

Answered by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. No.

2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. Answered by No. 1.

RESCUE OPERATIONS, B.C.—USE OF HELICOPTERS

Question No. 37—Mr. Pearkes:

In how many instances, during 1955, were helicopters of (a) United States coastguard; (b) Royal Canadian Air Force; (c) Canadian companies, employed in rescue operations in British Columbia and waters adjacent to that province?

Answer by: Mr. Campney:

(a) 5.

(b) 1.

(c) 2.

Record is kept only of those instances in which helicopters were used in rescue operations co-ordinated by the R.C.A.F.

OSHAWA, ONTARIO, PUBLIC BUILDING

Question No. 46—Mr. Starr:

1. Has the government made any further attempts to dispose of the old post office and customs building in Oshawa, Ontario?
2. If so, have they been successful?
3. If not, what are the plans for the use of these two buildings?

Answer by: Mr. Winters:

1. No; matter under consideration.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—PURCHASE OF LAND

Question No. 48—Mr. Matheson:

1. Did the Department of Public Works purchase a piece of land at Charlottetown for the fisheries department?
2. If so, from whom was the land purchased, and what was the price paid?
3. For what purpose was the land purchased for the Department of Fisheries?

Answer by: Mr. Winters:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Mr. S. P. Paoli. (b) $5,500.

3. To replace rented accommodation for the winter storage of departmental patrol boats, motors and equipment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 27, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

INCOME TAX

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND DENMARK FOR THE AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (for the Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Kingdom of Denmark with respect to income tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMMUNICATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Income Tax Act (communication of information).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to lift the iron curtain of secrecy with respect to corporation income tax returns.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR HEARING OF CORPORATION APPEALS IN PUBLIC

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Income Tax Act (corporation appeals).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that appeals by corporations before the income tax appeal board be heard in public.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL PERMITTING ARMS SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that it has been announced that there will be a debate on external affairs starting on Tuesday next, could the Prime Minister arrange to have the order in council of July 7, 1955, tabled? This order in council was referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in his remarks a few days ago.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall see just what the order in council is and endeavour to have it available before the debate on external affairs.

Mr. Drew: So there may be no uncertainty, I would explain that the order in council is the one which the Minister of Trade and Commerce said referred to permission to export 15 Harvard trainers to Egypt.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would enlarge upon the assurance he has just given the Leader of the Opposition and table in the house all orders in council which have been made with respect to permission to ship arms and war materials abroad, say within the last year.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That would have to be considered in the light of our obligations toward the countries with respect to which such orders were made and their security claims, as against the disclosure of the character of such commodities as might be obtained for military purposes from Canadian sources.

I shall consider the hon. gentleman's request. We would have no objections of our own and in so far as we can comply with the request, without departing from the ordinary amenities between governments, I shall endeavour to see that that is done.

Mr. Fleming: If the Prime Minister should find himself in a position where he does not wish to disclose the specific provisions of the orders approved, would he still be in a position to disclose the dates of the orders in council and the countries concerned?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I shall take note of the hon. gentleman's representations and endeavour to remain in a position where it would not be possible for anyone to say we are trying to withhold information that it would be proper to communicate.

Inquiries of the Ministry

RUSSIA—SUGGESTED EXCHANGE OF PARLIAMENTARIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could the minister indicate whether any progress is being made with a view to exchanging parliamentary visitors between Canada and the U.S.S.R., as has been done between several western European countries and Russia?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The matter is now before the Speakers of the two houses.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENTS

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO ACT TO APPLY TO ALL DEBTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if the government has given consideration to amending the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to make it apply to all debts of farmers whenever incurred and to give effect to it at once, to prevent the repossession of farm implements during the current year. The minister will understand the background of this; that is why I preceded it with no explanation.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. This has to do with government policy which will be announced in due course.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Now that the estimates are down, can the minister give us an indication, even a general indication, as to when he expects to bring down his budget, whether it will be early or late or normal, if there is a norm?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be curious to know what my hon. friend means by normal. If he means some time between now and May 1 I would agree with him.

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

GRAIN

WHEAT—REPORTED SALE BY U.S.S.R. TO UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister been informed that the U.S.S.R. has sold between 25,000 and 30,000 tons of wheat to British millers within the last few months and, if so, why was Canada unable to secure this business?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not been informed that the U.S.S.R. has sold wheat to Britain, but I am not surprised. They often sell wheat to Britain. Our share of the British market probably will be higher this year than in previous years. We never believe that we are privileged to sell all the wheat that Britain uses. They may prefer to buy other wheat from time to time.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—INQUIRY RESPECTING MEETING OF JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the proposed trip to Washington of the Canadian Exporters' Association to have an interview with President Eisenhower on the subject of the $750 million annual trading deficit, is the government planning on asking for an immediate meeting of the joint Canada-United States economic committee to discuss the problems?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Exporters' Association is a private enterprise, and what it does is not the concern of the government. With regard to our trade with the United States, we are not unhappy about it. It is at a very high level. I know of no reason to call a meeting of the joint committee on account of anything that is taking place in that direction.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DISCIPLINARY ACTION FOLLOWING BEATING OF PRISONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice if he would make a statement informing the house of the exact situation with respect to two members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who were recently dismissed in British Columbia for having, according to press reports, beaten a prisoner and obtained a confession from him by that method. Would the minister particularly say what was the full extent of the disciplinary action taken? If the minister is not in a position to do so now, perhaps he would be kind enough to take this as notice and make a statement at an early date.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's question as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESERVE ARMY—REPORTED REDUCTION IN TRAINING DAYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): On January 18 the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) asked if there had been a change in policy with regard to the number of days' training for which members of the militia are paid.

There has been no change in policy in this matter.

The authorization from headquarters provides for all ranks a maximum of 60 days' pay for training. This authorization covers not only training at local headquarters but also training at summer camps, special training and administrative duties connected with training. Allocation of time and of pay among the various categories above-mentioned, up to the prescribed 60 days, is left to the discretion of officers commanding the commands.

I have been informed that the order issued by western command to which the hon. member referred in his question did not, in fact, reduce the number of training days for reserve army personnel in that command but rather broke down the 45 days' normal local training into 30 days' armoury training and 15 days' week-end training. The total number of training days, therefore, remains the same.

HEALTH INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILED STATEMENT OF FEDERAL OFFER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? May I ask him if there is a more detailed statement, the general terms of which the Prime Minister gave us yesterday, of the offer made by the federal government to the provinces in connection with a health insurance program? If so, could that more detailed statement be given to the house in some way?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Finance and leader of the house, tells me that in a few days or so an opportunity will be given when it is proposed to consider certain aspects of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I do not think the house would consider that I would be justified on the orders of the day in taking the time required to make as adequate and as complete a report as the situation and the importance of the subject matter warrant. I think my hon. friend will appreciate that this is so.

The conference which concluded last night was a most constructive and helpful one. Without exception, all governments participating in that conference are deserving of credit and, I am sure, the expression of thanks of this house and the people of Canada for the way in which they approached our deliberations on this important matter. The provincial officials have gone home and are now considering the proposal put forward by the federal government in the matter of health insurance.

GRAIN

PROVISION FOR GUARANTEE OF BANK LOANS TO PRODUCERS IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, by way of a guarantee for bank loans made on or after the 15th day of November, 1955, and before the 1st day of June, 1956, for short-term credit to grain producers in the prairie provinces to meet temporary financial difficulties arising from inability to deliver their grain; to provide also that the governor in council may extend the application of the act to cover loans made before the 1st day of June, 1957; and to provide further that any amount paid to a bank under the act be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Drew: Is there going to be an explanation of the resolution before we proceed with the discussion?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The purpose of this bill is to provide a partial guarantee of loans made by the chartered banks to producers against grain on farms, and to reinforce the security that would ordinarily be available under the Bank Act.

Grain

In many respects this bill is similar to the Prairie Grain Producers' Interim Financing Act approved by parliament in 1951. There are, however, some significant differences which are necessary because of changed circumstances.

Hon. members will recall that in 1951 much of the prairie grain crop was covered by snow before it could be harvested. Farmers had no carryover on farms from previous crops which could be delivered to maintain their incomes pending the harvesting of the 1951 crop. Some means had to be found to enable the banks to make loans on the security of standing crops, and to encourage them to do so. In any event, very little use was made of the legislation, in spite of the protests from some opposition members that the limit placed on the overall total of loans of $20 million was grossly inadequate.

The present legislation is designed to deal with a different problem, a problem which arises from the superabundant production of grain on the prairies during recent years. I can illustrate the problem by referring again to the situation faced by the prairie farmer in the fall of 1951. A great deal of his crop was under the snow and he did not know whether it could be taken off. In the previous four years he had grown average wheat crops. Here is the record:

1947	320	million bushels
1948	356	" "
1949	341	" "
1950	427	" "
An average of	361	" "

He had no difficulty, of course, in marketing those crops, because they were of average size.

If in the five years prior to 1955 the prairie farmers had experienced average crops, just as they did prior to 1951, there would be no problem whatever at the present time. In fact, the world would now be clamouring for supplies of 1955 Canadian wheat. As hon. members know, however, 1955 was just another in a series of extraordinary harvests. Let me put forward the record of prairie crops from 1951 to 1954 by way of contrast with the earlier period:

1951	529	million bushels
1952	664	" "
1953	584	" "
1954	282	" "

I repeat, if the prairies had, in the past four years, produced the kind of crops produced between 1947 and 1950, which were generally regarded as fair, average crops, there would be no need for the legislation which is now proposed. This legislation is needed simply and solely because of the extraordinary quantities of grain produced and marketed on the prairies since 1951. There is no other reason.

Some hon. members may be tempted to suggest that the problem is due to the failure to sell wheat. Again let us look at the record. Let me compare the two periods 1947 to 1950 and 1951 to 1954. Exports of wheat and flour in the earlier period, when there were no complaints whatever of failure to sell wheat, were as follows:

Crop Year
1947-48	195	million bushels
1948-49	232	" "
1949-50	225	" "
1950-51	241	" "
An average export during these four crop years of	223	" "

Now look at the past four crop years:

Crop Year
1951-52	355	million bushels
1952-53	385	" "
1953-54	255	" "
1954-55	252	" "
An average export during these four crop years of	312	" "

I would ask hon. members to note the comparison. In the four years prior to 1951 average exports were 223 million bushels; in the four years prior to the present crop year they were 312 million bushels. And even in the worst export year of the past four years, exports of wheat and flour were higher than in the best year of the preceding period.

These figures speak for themselves. But in case anyone thinks I have selected the statistics just to prove my point, let me go on to say that at no time in the history of grain growing on the prairies has as much wheat and flour been exported as in the four years prior to the present crop year.

What about farmers' marketings? Here the record is even more spectacular. As I have already said, the prairies have produced exceptionally good crops in recent years. The 1952 crop was the largest ever grown on the prairies, and the 1953 crop was the second largest. There has been only one below average crop in six years. The rest were all very large, by any standard. Yet farmers were able to make delivery of all the wheat they raised, prior to the present crop year, with the exception of about 100 million bushels. In the five crop years prior to the present, prairie farmers marketed 2,076 million bushels of wheat plus 1,203 million bushels of other grains. There is no other period of five years which comes within hundreds of millions of bushels of this record.

The reason, of course, that these vast quantities could be accepted and paid for was the high level of export and domestic sales, and the availability of space in elevators throughout Canada at the beginning of the period of big crops. At the opening of the present crop year, however, elevator space was filled to working capacity.

That is why the present legislation is necessary. Prairie producers are only able to market their grain this year as space becomes available in elevators, through export clearances and domestic consumption. This will take place gradually throughout the year, and some farmers are in need of temporary assistance pending delivery of their grain.

It is now evident, however, that sufficient sales will be made by the Canadian wheat board this crop year to enable farmers to deliver the equivalent of a better than average crop. Or to put it more specifically, I believe that sufficient sales will be made to enable prairie producers to deliver as much wheat as they did in the crop year 1954-55 which was, by any standard, a good average year. In that crop year deliveries of wheat by producers were 320 million bushels. This is 73 million bushels more wheat than was delivered in 1947-48, 26 million more than in 1948-49 and the same as in 1949-50.

When I spoke in the debate on the speech from the throne on January 16, I referred to the recent good level of wheat sales. Sales have continued at an even higher level during the past ten days or so. Indeed, so much grain has been sold that some grades in forward positions have now been completely sold out and we are going to have record clearances of grain from Atlantic ports and Churchill. Pacific coast ports will be strained to capacity for the next few months, and there will be an excellent program of shipping out of the St. Lawrence at opening of navigation.

Our big problem now is not selling, but transportation. If deliveries of wheat by producers this crop year do happen to fall behind last year, it will be because rail transportation is not adequate to move grain forward quickly enough and thus clear space in country elevators. I am hoping, however, that this will not happen. I believe the railways are determined to do a good job.

The background of the present legislation, then, is this: First, a series of enormous crops in the past few years, which could not all be moved to market in spite of record export sales, and which resulted in congested elevators at the opening of the present crop year; second, a current level of sales which indicates that producers will be able to market better than the equivalent of a good average crop before the end of the current crop year, but only gradually, as country elevator space becomes available.

When we were considering how best to provide temporary financial assistance to producers pending delivery, we looked at several alternatives and came to the conclusion that bank loans similar to those made available in 1951 was the preferable method.

We looked at the possibility of advances to producers by elevator agents on behalf of the Canadian wheat board. At first glance this seemed to be a logical procedure, but the more we looked at it the less we liked it.

What did this proposal really mean? It meant putting the Canadian wheat board into the lending business, because advances are simply loans on the security of farm-stored grain. We had then to ask ourselves who was best equipped to make such loans, the wheat board or the banks. The answer seemed to be obvious. The banks were already making loans to farmers and the security under the Bank Act could be reinforced by appropriate legislation as had been done in 1951, whereas the wheat board was not a bank and would have to be made into a bank in order to be able to take advantage of special security rights conferred by the Bank Act. Otherwise, in making advances the wheat board would be in no better position than an oil company or an implement dealer in taking security under provincial laws.

Apart altogether from these considerations, the government also recognized that nothing was more likely to interfere with the effectiveness of the wheat board as a marketing organization than to turn it into a collection agency. When I hear opposition members urging wheat board advances, I wonder sometimes whether they are not seeking an indirect means of undermining the board.

Finally, the government was reluctant to put elevator agents into competition in making wheat board advances. The board, as hon. members know, has a very limited number of employees and virtually none outside of head office. Advances would have to be made by elevator agents. They are men of integrity but I do not think they would welcome having producers shopping around among them for advances.

What some proponents of wheat board advances may think is that wheat board advances would be cheaper than loans from the banks. So far as I can determine this would not be so. The wheat board borrows money at 3 per cent. To this would have to be added the expenses of administration and collection which, as nearly as I can judge, would not be less than an additional 2 per cent. These interest and administration costs would be paid either by the borrower directly when he obtained an advance, or indirectly as a deduction from his participation payment if the interest and administration costs were to be absorbed by the wheat board.

Advances by the wheat board mean that the board would use money realized from the sale of grain delivered by all producers to lend to certain producers. Inevitably there would be costs and losses. Costs which were not paid by the borrower and losses would be deducted from the proceeds of the sale of grain, and would ultimately come out of the pockets of those producers who either had not obtained advances or had repaid them. I do not believe that this should be done and I challenge any member from the wheat-growing areas of the prairies to defend such a proposal.

Mr. Argue: We will debate that matter this morning.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Good; I love to debate with my hon. friend.

Our conclusion, therefore, was that the wheat board was not as well equipped as the banks to make loans, the costs to the borrower would not be less if the board made the loans, such lending would be a misuse of board funds, and the board itself would be permanently damaged if it were turned into a lending and collection agency.

If the wheat board, on the other hand, is not to use producers' money for the making of advances, then I see no argument at all why the board should get involved in the business. The banks have the resources and the lending experience, and they have the legal and constitutional right to take adequate security, which the wheat board does not have.

Some proposals have been made that the board should make interest-free advances. For the board to make interest-free advances and absorb the cost and the losses as a charge against producers' participation certificates would, as I have already said, be a gross misuse of board funds. For the board to advance moneys on behalf of the treasury and bear none of the costs or the losses is a different proposition. This means that the treasury would be asked to make loans without interest to all western producers against farm-stored grain whether or not they needed the advance. No other producer in Canada obtains such interest-free advances. Moreover, I do not think the taxpayer should be asked to make interest-free advances to producers which they could invest immediately, for example, in government bonds and earn a return of 3 per cent or so.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

I shall not say much at this stage about the provisions of the bill itself. The limit on loans is $1,500 to an individual borrower, which is $500 more than in 1951. The interest rate is 5 per cent, down ½ per cent from 1951. This rate was negotiated between the banks and the Department of Finance. It is the same as under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The bank guarantee is a smaller proportion of total loans than in 1951, partly because of the limited loss experience under the previous legislation and partly because these loans are secured by farm stored grain, rather than standing crops. The guarantee will apply to loans made under the conditions laid down in the bill since November 15, 1955. The over-all limit on guaranteed loans is raised from $20 million to $50 million.

Security must be taken under section 88 of the Bank Act, and the bill provides that such security takes priority over other liens. The borrower is also required to assign one-half of the proceeds of future deliveries of grain to repayment of the loan. In the 1951 legislation the assignment covered the proceeds of all deliveries until full repayment.

In the event that elevator congestion prevails at the opening of next crop year, which is quite likely because of the big crop harvested in 1955, the bill provides that the guarantee can be extended to loans made under the same conditions between October 1, 1956 and June 1, 1957.

As hon. members are aware, the order paper contains notice of another bill by which it is proposed to relieve the wheat board of the cost of carrying excessive stocks of wheat accumulated as a result of nature's bounty during these past years. These two proposals, if accepted, will enable the board to follow an aggressive yet orderly marketing policy without fear that carrying charges will eat up the producers' equity in existing wheat board stocks, and will enable those producers who are short of cash to obtain temporary advances pending normal deliveries within the crop year.

They do not in any way alter the fundamental grain marketing policy of the government, which is to sell as much grain as possible at the best possible prices. That policy has been a remarkable success. It has moved enormous quantities of grain at reasonably good prices. In this period of temporary surpluses it has given a degree of stability to world markets that might otherwise have collapsed, as they did in the 1930's.

There are heavy stocks of wheat in Canada for one and only one reason—good rainfall on the prairies for several years. There has been no increase in acreage. There have been no subsidies. Sales have been good, more than enough to clear out average crops. They continue to be good.

In the rest of the world stocks are also heavy, but for different reasons. In nearly all other parts of the world wheat production has been stimulated by price supports or by protective measures of one kind or another. We should all recognize, however, that the United States, which increased its acreage so sharply a few years ago, is now taking measures to bring its acreage back to more normal levels.

In these circumstances of heavy stocks throughout the world, the government and the wheat board face a difficult task in marketing Canadian wheat to best advantage. You will expect me to say that we are doing a good job. But I suggest to hon. members on the other side of the house that before they criticize the government's wheat policy, they take a good look at the facts, and consider the effect of their remarks upon the position of the Canadian wheat board as a marketing agency.

The great danger in the present situation is that sellers may be panicked into dumping stocks on to world markets that cannot absorb them. This is what happened in the early 1930's. It is in no one's interest to see this happen again.

In due course, if sensible policies are followed and uneconomic supports and barriers are removed, present excessive stocks will be absorbed. In the meantime it is encumbent upon all of us to have steady nerves and cool heads.

It seems to me that there should not be a prolonged debate on this legislation. The provisions of the bill have been in effect since November 15. We may as well face the fact that wheat board selling is no longer a dominant factor in the movement of this crop; the amount of grain that will be exported depends upon the ability of our railroads and our seaports to deliver that grain to ships.

The board has succeeded in its selling efforts in spite of the advice of opposition members. It has not reduced the price, as almost every Conservative newspaper in the country has demanded it should; it has not bartered its wheat for old bottles or anything of that sort; it has not exchanged its wheat for foreign currencies; it has not given wheat away. It has consistently followed wheat board policy which has been successful for many years and which has been successful recently; that is, to exchange Canadian wheat for Canadian dollars.

Therefore I think it should be no particular part of this debate to belabour the wheat board. The wheat board has done its job. True, it had to wait until opposition members expounded their theories in the fall, since foreign buyers were afraid the board would believe some of the opposition members. Well, we did not; we just waited until normal trading conditions would return. We are now back in the wheat business, and this bill is needed to meet an immediate situation. I hope this bill will receive your favourable consideration.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has carried forward the unfinished part of the speech he was making a week ago Wednesday night to the Liberal meeting here in Ottawa. Having admonished the members of his own party that they must all follow the party line, we are now being admonished that we must follow the line of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or fearful consequences will result in the markets of the world. With his customary disregard for any basis for what he says, the minister followed his carefully read typewritten statement with closing remarks in the rather freewheeling style for which he is better known when he speaks without a text prepared in his department.

In those closing remarks there was concern and warning as to the danger that was inherent in the members of the opposition discussing this vitally important subject.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You will pay no attention to my warning.

Mr. Rowe: I would not expect that he would.

Mr. Drew: I can assure the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that in so far as those closing remarks are concerned, I certainly shall pay no attention to them. But I would point out that he has completely ignored the people who have been speaking very loudly and vigorously on this subject, that is the farmers themselves. They have been waiting to hear some constructive proposals from this government.

Certainly optimism is a good thing; certainly it is wise for people to have faith in their ability to tackle problems, but it is also wise to have some regard for statistics issued by the very department for which the minister is responsible. When the minister gives us the bland assurance that all is well, that hardly agrees with the statement issued only the day before yesterday by the dominion bureau of statistics. These are the exact words of that statement:

> Marketings from prairie farms during the week ending July 11 were approximately half at 4,770,000 bushels versus 8,656,000 bushels.

That is not a statement by members of the opposition; that is not a statement by those whom the minister seeks to chastise for any attempt to place these facts before the public. That is a statement by a bureau which was set up by the minister's own department to give the public the facts.

When we are told about sales for export and the fact that all is well, that the only concern now is in regard to the ability of the railway companies to deal with this problem, again we have the statement of the bureau of statistics which shows that for the last four weeks there has been a substantial reduction in export clearances. That statement of the dominion bureau of statistics shows that for the past four weeks up to and including the day before yesterday, when the statement was issued, export clearances have been issued for 10,863,000 bushels as against 12,561,000 bushels for the corresponding period last year, a drop of 1,698,000 bushels.

Mr. Rowe: How many weeks?

Mr. Drew: That is for the four-week period. There was actually an improvement in the last of those four weeks, but the total for the four-week period shows a substantial reduction in export clearances, and certainly there is nothing to justify the optimistic statement that only the ability of the railways to handle the wheat can cause any concern about this situation.

Then we had the peculiarly reminiscent statement by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that they had to wait until the members of the opposition expounded their theories last fall before this subject actually came forward for consideration. We were told also that this was likely to cause alarm, that this was likely to cause panic, that this was likely to disturb possible purchasers of our wheat. It is not within the rules of this house that I should use appropriate terms to describe a statement such as that made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this respect.

After all, this subject has been under discussion before. It has been pointed out in this house on a number of occasions that for several years the request has been made that legislation be placed on the statute books so that when the situation required it, cash advances could be made in respect of farm-stored grain. This is not something new. I pointed out in the debate on the speech from the throne only two weeks ago that in December, 1952, I had urged that we have legislation on the statute books to deal with cash payments in respect of farm-stored grain where that became necessary.

This is not something new; this is not something which has emerged during the last few months. It is something, however, which has emerged in an acute form, not because of anything said by the opposition, not because of the bountiful crop alone, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce implies, but because wheat is piled on the farms of western Canada in unprecedented quantities and the farmers do not know where to get money for their immediate needs.

We come to the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the government looked into the various methods which might be employed, and having decided that this must be dealt with by way of loan, it then decided that it should be done through the banks. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said this is not something that would be appropriate for the wheat board. I would point out that we have emphasized since long before this house sat, and have emphasized on every possible occasion since this became an acute problem, that we believed there were special circumstances to support the proposition that the only effective way in which this situation could be met would be to make cash advances through the wheat board on farm-stored grain in relation to an established quota, as has been done in regard to grain delivered in the past; and that this payment should be made in the ordinary way on the basis of the initial price fixed by the board, as an ordinary cash advance, as though the grain to that amount had already become the property of the board.

That would avoid any question about loans by the banks, the involved procedure which has been set up and the difficulties encountered by many farmers in actually even making arrangements to attend at the bank for this purpose.

The question is not one as between loans by the banks and loans by the wheat board. The question is between cash advances on farm-stored grain and a method of loan which does not satisfactorily meet the situation. That is the real issue. That has been the clear issue at all times; it is the issue now, and it is the issue which I would hope the government would still consider in its proper light.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has made a peculiarly interesting observation which I hope will not be overlooked in its implications. In explaining why he did not think the wheat board should be put in the position of being responsible for dealing with this problem, he said, and I believe I quote his words with accuracy, "I do not think that it"—that is, the wheat board—"would welcome producers shopping around amongst them for advances."

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend is mistaken. That statement did not refer to the wheat board. It referred to the grain elevator operators.

Mr. Drew: If that is the case the Minister of Trade and Commerce is simply saying that if the wheat board, through its agencies, were to make arrangements of this kind, the agencies, which the minister has now defined as the wheat elevator operators, would not welcome producers shopping around among them for advances. What does he mean by that? Either there would be a clear basis for advances or there would not. Is the minister implying that this would involve some improper procedure?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You just do not understand the country elevator business.

Mr. Drew: One thing that is perfectly certain is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not understand the problem he is dealing with, to judge from what he has said here this morning. He has directed all his remarks with a paternal sense of pain for the ignorance of the members of the opposition, without any regard to the fact that what has been asked and what we are asking is what the farmers of western Canada have been asking vigorously and in no uncertain terms for some considerable time.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce warns us of the dire consequences that might come from the discussion of this subject in this house, does he suggest for one moment that the people he thinks might become alarmed do not read our newspapers and do not read the statements made by our farmers? Or when he singles out what he describes as the Conservative press, I wonder if he now includes in that expression the Winnipeg Free Press, which has given no uncertain expression to its demands that some alternative method be employed. Certainly the Winnipeg Free Press is not hesitant in criticizing the government's handling of its wheat policy. Certainly the Winnipeg Free Press has not been reluctant to point out that there is a crisis. I would point out also that there are other newspapers in western Canada which have been equally vocal and equally vigorous and which, with the optimistic approach to the general subject which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has injected into his remarks, I would not previously have described as Conservative newspapers.

No; this subject is one that has been placed before the people of this country and before any possible purchasers of our wheat by the farmers themselves, by their representative organizations and by the general discussions which have taken place. As a matter of fact the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is quite aware that he did not have to wait until he came into the House of Commons to learn that there are certain strong views expressed on this subject. I feel sure that is true also of other hon. members. The Minister of Justice has indicated that he welcomed the frank discussion of this subject and the way it came forward. We all have occasions when discussions of a similarly frank nature take place, but most certainly the Minister of Justice is under no illusion that this is the only place where this subject has been brought forward for consideration, and where the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the operations of the government in this matter have been subjected to some substantial measure of criticism.

The figures from the dominion bureau of statistics, to which I have just referred, show that during the past four weeks farm sales are down and export clearances are down. As I quite clearly stated, one out of those four weeks, the last one, did show an improvement; nevertheless the total for the four weeks is down. There is certainly nothing in those statistics issued by the bureau, which is in the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that justifies in any way the broad and optimistic statements he has made.

There are other reasons why this problem should be discussed and should be tackled. This loan system is not one which the Minister of Trade and Commerce expects to be employed to any considerable extent. Once again, having regard to the context of his remarks, may I point out that he implies that the government was considering some arrangements to meet the situation which responsible newspapers in western Canada described as a crisis, and which farm organizations have definitely asked everyone in Canada to recognize as a crisis.

If that is so, then let us consider the attitude of the responsible minister, as stated in his own words. In Calgary on November 28, in referring to this loan plan, the Minister of Trade and Commerce used these words:

> It is my hope and belief that comparatively little use will be made of the lending facilities, that most farmers are either in a position to carry on without borrowing or are in a position to finance in the ordinary way.

Those words are clear. The Minister of Trade and Commerce simply does not regard this as legislation designed to meet any real emergency. He is looking on it as something that will not be used extensively. The farmers of western Canada have made it clear through statements they have made within their organizations and individually that they do regard it as a crisis and that they do regard some solution of the problem as urgent and immediate. For that reason the proposal before us is not adequate.

I wish to make it clear at this point, Mr. Chairman, that we will not vote against the resolution. Inadequate though it may be, unsatisfactory though it may be, with interest rates on the basis they are to be charged under this plan, we are not going to seek to deny whatever relief may be afforded by this method. We believe it is appropriate, however, to point out that this does not meet the situation. We do point out the situation to the government once again, and we urge them to reconsider their position. We believe that whether or not this legislation is passed the government should reconsider the justification for making cash advances on farm-stored grain.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce made the statement that no other producers in Canada would receive similar consideration. One thing, Mr. Chairman, perhaps not recognized fully by many people in other parts of Canada who live outside the prairie provinces is that no other producers in Canada are in exactly the same position. We are fully aware of the fact that other agricultural producers have problems that they think are just as critical, in some cases more critical. I would point out that the potato grower on his farm in northern New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island faces an even more urgent problem. He has a crop that cannot be kept. It is a perishable crop. The same is true of the fruit growers in the Annapolis valley and elsewhere. They have perishable crops that cannot be stored. The problem they face on their own farms is even more critical because, with all the difficulties facing the wheat growers, the growers of potatoes, apples and other products of that kind cannot keep those products against the day when there may be some return.

Nevertheless there is a difference in this problem and one that I think the potato grower, the apple grower and other agricultural producers in other parts of Canada will recognize. By law the wheat producers of western Canada are unable to sell to anyone but the government agency. That is the key to the whole nature of this special problem. We also must recognize the scale of the problem from the point of view of Canada as a whole. Nearly one billion bushels of wheat are involved in the consideration of this problem. That involves an enormous amount of money for all Canadians, and it is not only a problem of the individual wheat producer, critical though his problem may be. This is a problem affecting the whole of Canada.

We are also confronted with the fact that the wheat producers, who under legal restrictions are not permitted to sell to any but the government agency, have on their farms at this time nearly 500 million bushels of wheat. An enormous percentage of the world's available wheat supply is lying on the farms of western Canada at this time, or is contained in some sort of temporary shelter. That is the problem. One of the things which should be borne in mind, without in any way debating all the questions that may arise as to details of operation and otherwise, is the fact that the government says by law "this is our grain", which makes them in effect the owners of that grain the moment it is harvested.

Mr. Rowe: They cannot sell it to anybody else.

Mr. Drew: I emphasize that point. In effect the moment the wheat is harvested the government becomes the owner of the grain. There is no other purchaser. The wheat farmer has been permitted to assume, and with reason, that the wheat would be taken up appropriately year by year so that from this grain, which must be delivered to the government agency, he would get an adequate return on the basis of a quota per acre at the initial price fixed by the board, and that this amount would then be handed to him as a cash advance on his quota book.

Our argument, and we have put it forward for some considerable time, not just in the last few months, is that the government alone can take the wheat and the government is already in fact the ultimate owner and by law can be the only owner in the end when it is sold. Therefore where the wheat cannot be taken into the elevators and the farmers need this money for their immediate requirements, then on that wheat, which in effect belongs to the government, the farmers should be able to go in the usual way and get a cash advance on a proper quota basis at the regular initial price, such advance to be marked on their quota book, with the understanding and the undertaking that that amount of grain will be delivered to the elevator on demand the moment they receive notice that the space is available.

Surely there is nothing complicated about that. The ordinary machinery now existing would carry this out without any problem of any kind. There would be none of this ominous shopping around that the Minister of Trade and Commerce implies. Perhaps his mind is accustomed to shopping around for a consideration. The fact remains, however, that this system is one which involves no shopping around. This system is one which would be on a clear and understandable basis, with the cash payment entered in the quota book in the ordinary way and paid to the farmer.

That, Mr. Chairman, is what we ask. We certainly will support the resolution, inadequate though it may be to meet the problems facing the farmers; and though we are told that it will contain provisions which in themselves we think are onerous and unfair certainly it is better than nothing. We do urge, however, that with the adoption of legislation of this kind the government does not make the mistake of thinking it has dealt with the problem. I hope it will look at the statements that are appearing in the press of western Canada and those coming from farm organizations before the childish threat is issued to this house that we are in some danger of creating a panic if we even dare to discuss problems for which we are responsible. May I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just talk to the chairman.

Mr. Drew: —that even if his Liberal supporters are prepared to applaud that kind of dictatorial statement, he is not going to find any acceptance of warnings of that kind here in the House of Commons. This is still a free House of Commons, and we are going to carry out our obligations in the house. Certainly there is no greater obligation than to point out to the government that along with any arrangement of this kind there should go further consideration of a simple and practical method by which the farmers can receive some cash immediately without any involved procedure in return for wheat which in effect already belongs to the government and to no one else. Since it does belong to the government and since the farmer himself certainly can exercise no control over the availability of freight cars and elevator space, there should be no interest on payments made in respect of advances on the wheat which the government has already in effect taken under its control.

That is a proposition which emerges naturally and logically from the position the government has taken. I hope all our friends in every part of the house who have had reason to give this subject consideration will let us have the advantage of their opinions, because we are not merely dealing with the motion concerning this resolution now before us. In this discussion we have an opportunity once again to urge the government to give consideration to the only practical proposition that has been put forward to give the farmer some relief in the critical situation in which he now finds himself. We know perfectly well that there have been bountiful crops. Of course there have been such crops. By that statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce would seem to imply that our only hope is to have a disastrous crop failure. That is what in effect is implicit in that statement. The only suggestion they have to offer is a disaster of another kind.

Mr. Studer: Balderdash.

Mr. Drew: I am glad to know there is at least one Liberal member who is willing to have his voice heard. All I hope is that, instead of the kind of comment that has just been made, some Liberal members opposite will show that they are prepared to discuss this subject during the debate in spite of the admonition which has been given to them by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Rowe: They will not say anything.

Mr. Drew: There is always reason for hope. We might hope that some of the things which are now being said privately will be said publicly by hon. members opposite with regard to this subject.

Mr. Rowe: They will not even deny what you are saying.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is true that there have been wonderful crops. Surely, however, this government is not going to just leave the impression that all it intends to do is wait for bad crops to solve this problem. If this situation were as simple, as easy and as good as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has implied by his recent remarks, may I ask this question: Why was he complaining about the action of the United States government? If there is no reason for concern about what has been done, why did he make a public statement about the action of the United States government with regard to sales which he thought might conceivably disturb these operations?

The fact is that he was concerned about it, in spite of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture apparently thought surpluses were a good thing. He was disturbed about it and he said so. I only wish that in this discussion this morning something of that concern had found its way into his remarks, so there might have been some real relationship between what he said and the situation as it actually exists.

Whatever the situation is, Mr. Chairman, there is one other consideration that has not been met by the government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made the statement that we would find in the speech from the throne the whole wheat policy of the government. This morning we had been left with the clear impression that the government has no other thought with regard to this matter except what is found in this resolution.

Let us remember what the minister said. He told us that there have been good crops; that this is the only reason there has been any serious problem; and that there have been, of course, some difficulties with regard to the availability of cars. We know that within recent weeks ships have been lying at anchor in the harbour at Vancouver, unable to pick up the grain which they were ready to move. It is explained that this situation might be the result of the failure to get wheat there because of the shortage of box cars. There is also the statement—and it has not been satisfactorily challenged in any way—that there is over 100 million bushels of storage space not being used in the elevators of this country at the present time.

The farmers of Canada are not responsible for that situation. The farmers of Canada have in their hands no power to deal with the problem of the availability of freight cars and other means of transportation. That matter is in the hands of the government alone. The farmers of western Canada, who are in a unique position because of what I have already pointed out, should be told at this time what the plan of the government is for the current year. In addition to anything that is said in relation to this resolution, surely this is the time for the farmers of western Canada, who are in that special position, to be told what the policies of the government are in relation to the crop for the coming year; that is, for this present year. If they do not know, how can they possibly make their plans for the seeding which will take place in the not too distant future? The farmers have a right to know what is going to happen next fall. They have a right to know what this government intends to do if we have another bumper crop, as might reasonably be expected with the amount of precipitation there has been during this winter. No matter how inadequate this legislation may be, and even though they have not yet agreed to provide for cash advances on farm-stored grain, certainly the government should come forward with a clear statement of policy so the farmers may be able to make their plans for this year with some knowledge of what they may reasonably expect. Otherwise the only hope that is offered to them is disaster of another kind. No solution of the problem is offered to them by this government except the possibility that there will be a disastrous crop failure. Surely they are entitled to more than that.

I therefore close these remarks, Mr. Chairman, with the statement that in supporting this resolution we do so simply because we would not wish to urge that any relief, however limited or unsatisfactory it may be, should be denied to any farmer who wishes to avail himself of it. At the same time, however, we urge that the government reconsider its position and decide to make cash advances on farm-stored grain by the method and for the reasons I have outlined. We also urge that before these discussions are closed, the government make an announcement to this house and, through this house and the press gallery in the house as well as through Hansard, to the country, inform the farmers in the three prairie provinces what they may expect next fall in relation to the crop that will be grown this year.

Mr. Argue: The resolution the Minister of Trade and Commerce has presented to parliament at this time to meet the severe shortage of cash on the prairies is probably the most unpopular move this government has made in the realm of agricultural policy since October, 1947, when the ceilings were taken off oats and barley and then were placed back on the grain exchange.

This morning we have been read a lecture by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has suggested to us that we should curtail the debate, that we should not speak in this debate, that we should not discuss the serious position of the western farmers. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is again up to his old tricks. He is trying to muzzle parliament and prevent free discussion. This government is a past master at muzzling parliament. Yesterday we had a fine example of the way in which this government treats parliament and the members of the House of Commons. Yesterday I had before the house a bill proposing a reduction in interest rates on small loans.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member will agree that neither a reflection on a vote of the house nor the discussion of an alternative measure is in order under this resolution, on which we are allowing wide discussion of the farmers' problems.

Mr. Argue: I am not commenting on a vote of the house at all. I am commenting on the attitude of this government. When a member of the opposition has a proposal before this house, not necessarily yesterday but any time in the past, that might embarrass the government, what does the government do? It has somebody stand up and move the adjournment of the debate, using its parliamentary majority to cut off debate and kill the discussion. Then when the adjournment cannot be moved because it is a piece of government legislation that is highly unpopular, as this legislation before us now is, of course the minister uses veiled threats to attempt to accomplish the same result.

The minister and the Liberal party stand alone in saying to the people of western Canada that the legislation now before this house will solve the problem. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is smarting under the treatment he received within the last few months in western Canada. He went to speak to one farm convention after another to try to ram down the throats of the farmers this same kind of garbage he is attempting to ram down our throats this morning. At these conventions the farmers repudiated the minister and said, "We are not supporting bank loans; we are, in fact, opposing bank loans." Then this morning the minister makes the utterly ridiculous statement that anyone who is against this legislation; anyone who says that bank loans are not good; anyone who says that the wheat board should be instrumental in making advances to the farmer, is against the wheat board.

That is a fine statement to make regarding the Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates, who on November 1 last at the opening of their annual meeting passed an emergency motion asking for cash advances through elevator companies on farm-stored grain. No organization has promoted the wheat board method of marketing more than the Saskatchewan wheat pool. I am sure the delegates at that meeting proposed something they thought would help the wheat board and would not, in fact, hinder it in any way.

When the minister threatens parliament and tries to choke off discussion, he does not stop with threatening the opposition, as the Leader of the Opposition said, he manhandles the Liberal party back benchers and says, "Fellows, toe the line". He says there are people in this country opposed to the wheat board. Yes, there are. Every time you hear anybody say there is widespread opposition in Canada to the wheat board, you can bet your bottom dollar it is a member of the Liberal party who is sowing the seeds of opposition to the wheat board.

That is not all that is wrong with this legislation. The minister has contempt for the opposition, he has contempt for his own party, and he has contempt for parliament. I was surprised that the Leader of the Opposition should overlook the very important point that this legislation in fact came into effect on November 15. Now, months later, parliament is being asked to rubber stamp something the government put into effect months ago. You know how it was put into effect? The Minister of Trade and Commerce is quite agile at a lot of things. He was in Regina addressing the wheat pool convention on November 5, I believe. It was there he made the big announcement of this bank loan legislation. Parliament was not in session; parliament in the minister's opinion did not have to be called into session. All the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to do was to stage a radio-T.V. show and announce the policy. He did not need parliament. The announcement was made in that way, and months later parliament is called and we are asked to rubber stamp this legislation the government is proposing.

As I have said, not since 1947 has this government done anything in connection with prairie farm matters that was so thoroughly and so unanimously unpopular as is this measure. The prairie producers resent having this bitter pill of bank loans rammed down their throats. It is no alternative to a system of cash advances. It is not working, and was not supposed to work. The minister said it is not going to be used very much, and it is not. Not many farmers can get a loan. This method was not used much in 1951.

The Leader of the Opposition said the position of his party has been clear since 1952. The position of the C.C.F. was clear for many years prior to that. In 1942-43 the members of this group were advocating cash advances. On December 3, 1951, we presented a motion requesting cash advances. The situation then was not nearly as critical as it is now. At that time the government put through parliament somewhat similar legislation guaranteeing bank loans up to $20 million. As the minister well knows, just a little over $600,000 of the $20 million was actually used.

I have in my hands figures showing the bank loans that have been obtained in the first two weeks of the operation of this act. Some hon. members may think that if the act is going to remain in effect for some months, it would be used very little in the first two weeks. The fact of the matter is that many farmers who felt they were in such a desperate financial position that they were forced, because of circumstances, to go to the bank to ask for a loan would do so in the early part of the operation of the act. I have the figures for the first two weeks of the operation of this act. In that time there was loaned to less than 3,000 farmers, out of 200,000 producers on the prairies, just over $2·5 million. That is an indication not only that the legislation is faulty, not only that the banks are exceedingly careful in making these loans and are endeavouring to make as few loans as possible, but that the producers themselves are not anxious to have this kind of loan.

The producer believes that he is forced to go to the bank to ask for loan on his summer's work, a loan on his wheat, a loan on something which is his cash asset, and worse still is forced to pay interest on it. He is, in fact, paying interest on his own income. How many times have I heard farmers say, "We would like to get the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this position, where at the end of each month instead of getting his regular cheque he would be told that legislation was being provided whereby he could go to the bank and borrow his month's wages, go into debt and pay interest on his own money." That is the basic reason that wheat producers are opposed to this legislation.

It will not work for a great many reasons. It will not work because it is probably correct to say that a very large percentage of western farmers do not go to banks, do not do ordinary banking business. As a matter of fact there are more credit unions in Saskatchewan than there are branches of chartered banks in that province. Most of these credit unions are doing business in the rural areas, so that a great proportion of the prairie farmers never darken a bank door. In many instances they do not know the bank managers, and they may have to travel 40 or 50 miles to find a branch of a chartered bank. They go into a bank to see the manager, and the farmer is a total stranger. The banker cannot tell if he is a farmer; cannot tell if he has a quarter section or six quarter sections. The bank manager cannot tell whether he has 1,000 bushels of wheat, 10,000 bushels or none. The bank manager is placed in an untenable position. The bank manager is just as much opposed to this legislation as the producer who is forced to go to the bank and ask for a loan.

The principle of forcing farmers to pay interest on their own money would have been just as bad if the government had included the credit unions in this proposal. I do not know why the government would not allow the credit unions to have the same privileges and the same guarantee as the banks. The farmers who do business with the credit unions would certainly be a lot happier to go to the credit union manager, who knows their circumstances, to ask for a loan under this legislation. The government, of course, are friendly with the banks. They know the heads of the banks. The government and the banks are very close. However, the government will not tolerate guarantees for the credit unions to allow them to compete with the banks for banking business on equal terms.

Mr. Cannon: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Surely.

Mr. Cannon: Does the hon. member know that in the case of fishermen the banks and credit unions are on the same footing as far as loans are concerned?

Mr. Argue: Yes, that is the toe in the door. It has taken a long time to correct that situation, and I am glad the government made the change, though it still has a long way to go. It took private members to suggest it; it was not a government idea. I am suggesting now that the credit unions be given precisely the same guarantee as was given to the banks, and I am willing at this time to stake my reputation on the statement that on loans the credit unions make to purchasers they will come to the government for a smaller guarantee and a smaller recompense than in the case of the banks, because the records of credit unions show that they have sustained very few, almost negligible losses in the business they do.

This legislation is wholly inadequate because of the total amount of money farmers can obtain under it. It is bad enough for the farmers to have no money and to have a lot of wheat in their yards they cannot sell. It is bad enough that the farmers owe money all around town; but it is even more serious for the local merchants, the storekeepers, garage men, implement dealers and oil dealers who have not just one set of accounts but have the accounts of perhaps 50 or 100 farmers to worry about. It is the local merchants in the prairie provinces who are carrying the load. They have carried it in the past and they are carrying it today. That is why the resolutions which came to the government were so unanimously in favour of cash advances; the storekeepers and merchants wanted some measure which would enable the farmers to pay their accounts.

The minister informed us yesterday that he has thousands of pieces of paper in his possession respecting a return I asked for in relation to the production of papers in regard to cash advances. I am positive that fewer than 1 per cent, if indeed any, of the resolutions or letters from wheat producers in the minister's possession state that they are in favour of the policy that is now being presented to parliament. The producers are almost unanimously opposed to this method of handling the situation at this time.

The government is proposing this kind of legislation as a means of dealing with the problem. It is proposing other legislation which asks parliament to approve the payment of storage on excess carryover. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the people of Canada, the taxpayers, would resent having to provide the money necessary to pay interest-free cash advances. I do not believe that statement. I do not think it is true because I believe, although I could be wrong, that the four parties in this house will give unanimous approval to the government's proposition that parliament and the national treasury should meet the cost of storage and carrying charges on wheat.

I am just as convinced that had the government had the foresight, courage and imagination to bring in a proposal for cash advances, there would be the same unanimous support in this house as is now likely to be given to the storage provision.

I suggest that the government should do one more thing and should do it now. The government should not make an interim payment on the 1954 wheat crop and then a final payment some months later. I do not think that is the best method of handling the situation at this time, when a severe shortage of cash exists. I believe that the government through the governor in council should now close out the wheat board account for 1954-55. The inventory should be valued at present sale prices, and the farmers at this time should ge given the largest payment that can be made out of the funds that happen to be in that account after it is closed out. They should not receive a small payment now and a small payment some months later, with all the extra cost that is involved in the wheat board making a separate payment.

I would hope that under the legislation now before the house the payment could be more than the 15 cents a bushel which was paid last year in the form of an interim and final payment. I would hope that legislation before the house would make it possible for the government to make a payment of 20 cents or even 25 cents a bushel. Certainly the account should be closed out and the farmers should be paid that money as soon as possible.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that the only danger which threatened wheat markets in the last few months has been speeches by members of parliament. I presume he means speeches by hon. members who have been talking about cash advances. I also presume he means that the wheat pool officials are damaging the grain business when they go about and ask for cash advances. The minister rose and said the other day the United States is to blame. It is the United States policy which is to blame, he says. He says that bartering and accepting legal currency and gifts will not be sufficient to increase our sales, but the United States is following that policy and is increasing its sales and distribution to a large extent.

I was pleased at the announcement that a trade delegation from the U.S.S.R. is coming to Ottawa. It would be my hope that the minister himself would handle the deliberations of that conference, and that the government would face the export situation with an open mind. I hope the government will be prepared to undertake any financial steps that may be necessary to enable the export of Canadian wheat, and to enable sales to be made.

The minister does not like the word barter. I would suggest that the minister make contract sales, if he does not want to use the term barter and in attempting to sell wheat, be prepared to sell it to nations behind the iron curtain or to any other nation. The government should be prepared to make those sales where necessary on a contract basis over a number of years; and where credit extension may be necessary, the government should not stop at one year but extend credits over two, three or four years if necessary and if such credits will result in an expansion of our wheat trade.

Some announcements concerning export sales that have been made in the past month have given some encouragement to the farmers. These announcements relate almost entirely to sales of Canadian wheat to countries behind the iron curtain. It is not an accident that these sales are to communist countries. The reason that sales of wheat to countries behind the iron curtain are the main hope for increased sales of Canadian wheat at this time is the fact that public law No. 480, under which the United States congress is supporting and promoting the disposal of United States wheat, confines the disposal of such wheat to countries other than those behind the iron curtain.

I think that Canada should be in the position of promoting sales to any country in the world and by whatever method might be necessary, including the methods that are being used in the United States. We should not have lagged behind the United States and have reached the position where today apparently our only substantial hope for increased sales appears to be countries behind the iron curtain.

We have this legislation before the house, and it is most unpopular. As I have said, no one is in favour of it except the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his supporters. They are endeavouring to drag in the farm organizations and show that they are in support of this policy. The provincial leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan made a similar statement early in November, and an official reply had to be issued by the Saskatchewan wheat pool denying that they were in favour of bank loans. In part that statement had this to say:

> The policy of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, as approved by its delegates in annual meeting, is clear-cut. It does not favour the government's proposal for bank loans. It firmly believes that the conditions are such that extraordinary measures are called for, and that these should include advances against farm-stored grain, and that such advances should be made to individual farmers through elevator companies in accordance with an agreement between the companies and the wheat board.

The minister attempts to show that when we support having the wheat board make these arrangements, we want the wheat board itself to go out and make the loans. Nothing could be further from the truth. All we are asking is that the wheat board make the arrangements whereby the grain elevator companies can make the advances. The elevator company agents are in a much better position to make advances than are the banks. I have said that we have more credit unions in Saskatchewan than branches of the chartered banks, and I would say that there are 12 elevator agents in Saskatchewan for every branch of a chartered bank.

The elevator agent is personally acquainted with the farmer. He knows the farmer's business, because he is a close friend of the farmer who brings grain to his elevator. Most likely he knows the amount of grain the farmer has on his farm. He is in position to make the advance. Why does the minister say the government will not do it through the elevator companies? His claim and he is wrong again is that the elevator company or the wheat board cannot be given the power to place a lien against the grain of the type which a chartered bank could obtain under the Bank Act.

The minister made another amazing statement the other day. He said it would be very risky for loans to be made by the elevator companies to farmers. Why? Because he said the farmer might feed the grain, the farmer might sell it to his neighbour or the farmer might not repay the loan. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was saying in effect that he could not support advances to farmers through the wheat board and the elevator system because the farmers are dishonest, because they are likely to feed their own grain or because they are likely to sell it to their neighbours. I think that was a shameful statement, and it is a statement which the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Liberal party will not be allowed to forget.

I do not think the farmers of western Canada as a group are any more dishonest than any other group in Canada. I believe the western wheat producers are honest. The experience of the government under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, whereby the government has had to pay just 1/35 of 1 per cent of the money advanced under the act, shows that an overwhelming majority of prairie producers are wholly and completely honest. I believe that cash advances are practical and would be repaid almost without exception, and would give the government a cheaper method of making money available to the producers than the method now used.

If the farmers were given cash advances and the interest paid by the government it would cost the treasury 4 per cent on an advance of 90 cents per bushel, which is the most that has been asked and which is the amount the CCF is asking for. That would cost the federal treasury less than 4 cents per year to finance a bushel of wheat in the farmer's possession. The minister says we should not ask the taxpayer to do that, but according to the other resolution on the order paper—I want to say I am pleased it is there, and I am going to support it—the government and the taxpayer will assume carrying charges and storage charges on grain held by the wheat board in excess of 178 million bushels. What does that mean? It means 4 per cent on the whole initial price.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What bill is the hon. member discussing now?

Mr. Argue: The storage payment resolution. I am pointing out to the minister that what he is doing in this instance—and I am glad he is doing it—is more expensive and costly for the taxpayers per bushel of grain than the proposal we have been advocating for many years. It is more expensive for this reason. Not only will the national treasury be paying 4 per cent of the average initial price for the wheat; the national treasury will also be paying storage charges at the rate of 10½ cents per bushel per year. The policy which the government is now following will cost the taxpayers of this country almost four times as much per bushel of grain as the policy which we in this group have been advocating for many years.

I suggest to the government that even at this late date it should withdraw this legislation and provide for cash advances, which would give the farmer in Canada at least part of that which is given to the producer in the United States. The farmer in the country immediately to the south is able to get $2.08 per bushel on 95 per cent of all the wheat he has harvested, with the advance being interest-free on delivery of the grain. If the United States government can provide a cash advance of $2.08 per bushel, surely this government should do more for the Canadian wheat producer than is being provided by this legislation, which attempts to shackle him with further interest charges.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I think the question of bank loans against grain stored on the farm must be viewed in the light of present conditions, as well as in the light of the situation that existed at the time this policy was first put into effect by the government.

The minister stresses the fact that sales of wheat are picking up, that there is really no great marketing problem today, that the problem is rather a question of transportation and the lack of box cars. It is interesting to note that, because last year the farmers were told that it was not a problem of transportation but rather a lack of orders, that the elevators could not get orders. Now the farmers are told that there are plenty of orders but they cannot get box cars. Many farmers are beginning to wonder whether or not the railways are putting on a sit-down strike as a protest against the Crowsnest pass rates.

Be that as it may, the important point to note is that we are now approaching the end of the sixth month of the present crop year. It is ten months since the first costs were incurred in the production of this wheat, and it is over three months since harvesting operations were completed. In spite of that fact, there are many points in western Canada where farmers today are not able to deliver one single bushel of wheat against even a one-bushel quota. That is the situation that exists today, and that is why it is still very critical in so far as many points in western Canada are concerned.

In addition to that situation, there are amounts of wheat from previous crop years that are still being stored. Costs were incurred in the production of that wheat, and farmers are most desirous of being able to liquidate some of those costs. Those costs can be liquidated only by the sale of the wheat. Apparently the minister keeps forgetting that the production of wheat is not a costless thing. He seems to think that if the farmer has some wheat on his farm he can sell it and invest the proceeds in government bonds. Unfortunately that is not the case at all. In a majority of cases the larger percentage of the wheat on the farm is already pledged, and the minister should keep that fact in mind.

The answer given by the government last fall that there would be bank loans against wheat stored on the farm caused a wave of protest meetings throughout western Canada. I know that the minister has stated that those meetings were largely at the instigation either of the grain exchange or of certain interests in the large cities.

That may be true in certain parts of western Canada. I am not in a position to say whether it is or not. I can say that there is not one word of truth in that charge as far as my constituency is concerned. The protest meetings originated among the farmers themselves. You might say it was a spontaneous action on the part of the farmers, and generally a member of a local farmers' union would take the responsibility for first trying to arrange a meeting.

I was not in my constituency at the time the question came up, but I very soon received a long distance telephone call asking me to come down and attend some of the meetings. I would like to say that those meetings were not political in any shape or form. I did not go on the platform, but merely sat with the rest of the farmers. As a matter of fact there was no platform speaker. The meeting was called to order and the chairman was appointed, and then there was a free for all discussion. The discussion first of all took place on the government's proposal, because at that time it was merely a proposal, to make bank loans available to farmers against wheat in storage. I can say that there was very bitter protest against that suggestion.

I remember the first meeting. A resolution was moved that the farmers were unalterably opposed to such a suggestion. A good deal of discussion took place on that motion, but finally some farmers pointed out that whilst the majority were very much opposed to that proposal, nevertheless there were some farmers in such dire straits that they would have to take advantage of some form of loan. If they could not get what they wanted through advances they had better have the loans as suggested by the government, but they were prepared to take them against their better judgment.

The reason they opposed loans was largely that there are very large stocks of wheat on the farms and a very large percentage of those stocks are already pledged. That is something the minister does not appear to be able to get into his head. He has an idea that so long as the farmers can sell a small amount of their wheat, what might be regarded as a normal amount in a low crop year, then any wheat that is left on the farms may be regarded as velvet, and they can use that for the purpose of purchasing bonds or for any other purpose. But unfortunately that is not the situation. As I say, a very large percentage of wheat is already pledged. Take the Morrin district, probably one of the best wheat districts to be found in western Canada. It is on the gumbo plains. I was told at that meeting that in that district 60 per cent of the wheat on the farm is already pledged.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask the hon. member a question? If the wheat is already pledged, is he suggesting that the government should make an advance on it just the same?

Mr. Quelch: No, not on the 60 per cent of the wheat that is pledged. The government could certainly make an advance on the remaining 40 per cent at least, or it could make an advance on 50 per cent with the stipulation that a certain amount be used to pay off the obligations that have already been incurred. The reason such a large percentage of that wheat has already been pledged is that heavy costs were incurred in the production of the wheat. Farmers were obliged to get bank loans to meet those costs, and they were obliged to charge bills with machine companies, stores and oil companies, and those bills exist at the present time. Therefore they are not interested in a proposal that would put them further into debt. What they want is a chance to sell some of their wheat today in order to pay off those debts. They are not interested in going further into debt, especially at an interest rate of 5 per cent.

These meetings gave very careful consideration to the proposal of the western wheat conference and the resolution that was submitted to the government by the wheat conference and by the western provinces. It was a proposal that the government should advance to the farmers up to 50 per cent of the normal wheat delivery. There was strong support for the principle of that proposal.

The only thing the meeting did not like was the rather vague definition of "normal delivery expected". They said that might mean 8, 6, or perhaps only 4 bushels. So they suggested that, instead of using that form, they should say "up to 50 per cent of at least 8 bushels per cultivated acre." That is the basis upon which delivery was made last year and judging from what the minister said we have reason to hope that there will be a similar delivery this year.

The fact that we may have a similar delivery this year does not help the situation today. Today the farmers are in the very difficult position of having debts piled up. Every time they go to town they have to meet their creditors. Though they have wheat on the farms by means of which they should be able to liquidate those debts, they are not able to sell it. They also stress the fact that the government is largely in control of the wheat market. It took only 8 bushels in 1954-55, but there is no chance for farmers to deliver even a one-bushel quota at many points today. Therefore they feel the government should be prepared to make advances up to 50 per cent of at least 8 bushels per acre.

The minister argued that the only safe way to make loans would be through the banks, and that there would be little security by any other means. I am not going to debate that point, because the farmers are not asking for loans. They are asking for advances. The minister keeps making the alternative between bank loans and loans through the wheat board, but that is not what the farmers are asking for. They are asking that advances be made, and they would be quite prepared to give title to the wheat on their farms in return for these advances. Therefore the question of security does not arise. That is actually what is done in the United States under the sealed storage program.

Before I begin on another phase, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has made it quite plain that he believes it is to the advantage of Canada to maintain a surplus of wheat. He has also emphasized the fact that he believes the government should be prepared to relieve the farmers of some of the burden created by storage charges on the wheat held by the elevators, but on the other hand he does not feel that the surplus position creates any burden upon the farmer.

I would agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce wholeheartedly that it is in the national interest to maintain a substantial reserve of wheat. We feel that a reserve of wheat should be maintained as a national responsibility so that in the event of a series of crop failures we would have enough wheat on hand to meet domestic requirements as well as to fill the demand from foreign markets. But we do not believe that the farmers should be required to finance the cost of maintaining that reserve.

I should like to quote what the minister said on this point, as found at page 129 of Hansard of January 16:

> As far as the long-term situation is concerned, it seemed to me it was a hardship on the western farmer that he should be required to pay the carrying charges at the level required when grain storage is filled for practically twelve months in the year.

This is the point I want to draw to the attention of the house.

> Apart from that, it did not seem to me that there was any particular burden on the farmer through this condition of plenty.

Toward the bottom of the same page he said:

> We shall endeavour to see that hardship is not permitted to fall on the producer, but we are glad to have surpluses, particularly at a time when, in so many areas, we have acute shortages that hold within themselves the seeds of inflation.

As I say, we agree wholeheartedly with the minister on the desirability of maintaining a substantial reserve, but we do not agree with the minister that by merely paying the storage charges on a certain portion of the wheat held in storage in the elevators the burden is being lifted from the farmers. The minister apparently feels that it does not cost any more to produce and harvest a big crop than it does a medium one.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I have never said that and I do not agree with the suggestion. I do know that the size of the crop makes a difference.

Mr. Quelch: If the minister does not agree with that, I cannot understand why he should suggest that there is no burden on the farmers in carrying surpluses, because when they have been able to sell only a certain amount of wheat under a quota, the amount they have sold is only equivalent to quite a small crop.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, 8 bushels per specified acre is about 16 bushels per seeded acre, and 16 bushels per seeded acre is not a small crop on an average across the prairies.

Mr. Quelch: The average in Alberta for the last year or two has been around 27 bushels, and the average in the area that I represent runs around 25. Right now in the good crop gumbo areas it runs around 35.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Over how many years? Is that just during the wet period?

Mr. Quelch: On the gumbo plains it is over a long period of time. I would say the average yield now is probably around 35, but over a long period I should imagine that on the gumbo plains it would be about 25.

We are faced with this situation. When a large crop is in sight the farmer has to consider whether he can harvest that crop with his existing machinery. In some cases he may feel he will have to buy additional machinery. In some cases he may feel that his machinery is worn out and that new machinery should be bought. On the other hand, if he decides to try to harvest a heavy crop with machinery that he knows is in poor condition he is very liable to be faced with heavy costs resulting from breakdowns and loss of time, and heavy costs resulting from repair bills. He will have additional costs for fuel and labour and the additional cost of providing storage for that heavy crop. Therefore until the surplus wheat now on the farms is sold, the farmers are faced with the debts which were accumulated as a result of raising that heavy crop.

Of course it is not only the farmer who is suffering in the rural areas. Another person who is suffering just as much as the farmer, and in some cases even more, is the small, local businessman who in many cases has acted as the farmer's banker, advanced him credit and allowed him to obtain supplies without even signing a note. Many of these small businessmen have their backs to the wall today. They are in a position where the wholesalers will not allow them to have any more goods unless they pay cash. If any goods are shipped to them they are shipped c.o.d., and they cannot even lift them from the station without paying for them. I know many good businessmen, though perhaps they have been a little bit too generous, who are having a lot of difficulty in carrying on at the present time.

I find that in most cases the old established farmer is able to meet these costs from his savings. He is in that fortunate position. Many of the older farmers who are hoping to retire shortly are having to use a lot of the money upon which they intended to retire to meet current costs of operation which cannot be met by the sale of wheat. The minister will undoubtedly argue that this situation will soon be remedied, and that as soon as they can sell their wheat they can replace their savings. That is true, but unfortunately many farmers are not in that fortunate position. I have in mind particularly the younger farmers, and it is these new farmers who are really caught in the squeeze today.

Take the position of the young farmer buying a farm on time. Many of the older farmers who started farming in the west between 1910 and 1920 are now retiring, and there are many new farmers buying farms that were formerly owned by these original settlers. We find that the better the farm is, the greater the burden is for the young farmer because he is not able to deliver enough wheat to meet the costs of operation and his payments. Therefore the interest charges on the principal accumulate, and the provision of bank loans as brought down by the government is not going to help that situation very much. If he borrows money from the bank to pay some of what he owes on the farm he will still have to pay interest charges. Interest charges will still accumulate. It is a very unhappy situation for the young farmer who is trying to make his way, who owes a certain amount of money on the farm, who has wheat on the farm to sell but is not able to meet his payments, and who sees the interest charges on the farm piling up.

Coming to the question of the loan proposal itself, I think the rate of interest is unnecessarily high. I believe that where the government is substantially guaranteeing the banks against loss the banks should be sufficiently public spirited in a crisis or national emergency of this kind, whatever you may wish to call it, to make these loans available at a lower rate of interest. The minister said he had never been able to borrow money at less than 5 per cent. I do not think he wants us to take that statement too literally. If he has ever used dominion bonds as collateral, he has been able to borrow money for less than 5 per cent; he has been able to borrow money for 3½ per cent. I think most of us who have at one time or another borrowed money from the banks have used dominion bonds as collateral, and have borrowed for only 3½ per cent. The banks lend money at 3½ per cent because they have the security; they have the dominion bonds.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Would my hon. friend tell me what bank lends money at 3½ per cent? I might like to change banks.

Mr. Quelch: All the chartered banks in Canada. They will lend money on the security of dominion bonds. I might mention the Bank of Montreal.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They loaned money at 3½ per cent for the purpose of buying victory bonds, but for no other purpose.

Mr. Quelch: They had a government guarantee. Apparently they wanted the customer to borrow money on the bonds he had in order to buy more bonds. They certainly loaned money at 3½ per cent on bonds. Even if you were not buying victory bonds you could borrow on bonds at 4 per cent. That has been quite common practice. I have done it time and again. Therefore I know what I am talking about. The minister may shake his head, but I am speaking from personal experience in the matter. Hence in a case of this kind, when the guarantee is by the federal government, it seems to me that the banks should have been able to lend money at a lower rate of interest.

I am satisfied that a large percentage of the farmers will feel that this legislation is of little benefit to them, and therefore will not make application for assistance under it. However, no doubt some farmers who are in the unfortunate position of having to obtain money in some way or another will make application under it. Perhaps before the resolution is passed the minister could give us figures showing the number of applications that have already been made in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the number of loan applications that were granted and the number that were refused. I think that information would be interesting at this time.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall be glad to do so. I have the approximate total up to the end of the year, but I have not the figures broken down as between provinces.

Mr. Quelch: I saw some mention of the approximate number in the papers the other day. I thought perhaps the minister would be able to give us the approximate number.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I will try to get that information.

Mr. Quelch: In closing I will say this. In view of the fact that there are some farmers who will be obliged to seek help under this legislation, we intend to support it. Nevertheless we feel that it falls far short of meeting the needs of this situation.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment briefly on this specific resolution. As I understand it, the main purpose of the legislation is to ease the critical cash shortage among prairie farmers. As a westerner I certainly sympathize with that objective.

As hon. members know, out in western Canada our wheat surplus recently reached the almost fantastic figure of one billion bushels. Our farmers are literally buried in wheat. Unfortunately, however, deliveries are so small that the farmers can get hardly enough cash to pay current living expenses. There is a very real cash shortage. That shortage is being reflected in reduced retail sales; and through lower retail sales I think harm is being done to the manufacturing industries of the east, such as the farm implement industry, the automobile industry and so on. I therefore suggest that today there is real reason for parliament to consider giving the western farmer a helping hand.

This afternoon I have no particular political axe to grind, but I must say that I agree with those who have already participated in this debate and said that this resolution is unsatisfactory and inadequate. I am convinced that the desired objective, namely that of helping to ease the cash shortage in the west, could be achieved more effectively by cash advances on farm-stored grain. What is more, Mr. Chairman, if the truth were known I think many Liberal members from the prairies and even one or two cabinet ministers may think likewise.

What is the weakness of the proposal we are now discussing? I think the main weakness is simply that there will not be many farmers who will use it. Today most farmers who live on the prairies can borrow money from the banks on the security of wheat, without this legislation. I admit that there will be the odd one whose credit is perhaps not too good, who will need it. But by and large that is not the case. The majority of our western farmers today are reluctant to go further into debt to the banks than they are at the present time. That is why I say I do not think they will use this legislation.

We had the same kind of act on the statute books back in 1951. It was virtually useless then. I think it is going to be virtually useless today. As a matter of fact I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce must agree with that statement because out in Calgary, I think it was on November 28, he made this statement:

> It is my hope and belief that comparatively limited use will be made of the lending facilities.

As I see it, all this legislation is going to do in the west is create more dissatisfaction, more resentment and more discontent. Almost without exception I think it is fair to say that our farm leaders, co-operatives, farm unions, wheat pools and the like have asked for cash advances on farm-stored grain.

The mechanics of such a scheme would be simple. Elevator agents would make cash advances against the quota book, on a basis decided by this parliament. Perhaps the advance would be 50 cents a bushel; maybe it would be 60 cents a bushel. That would be a matter for hon. members to decide.

The advantages to the farmer of such a scheme are obvious. In the first place there are many more elevators than there are banks, and it would be much more convenient for him to go to those agents. In the second place, I think the interest rate would be lower if the matter were handled through the board. Despite what the minister said this morning, I am convinced that the Canadian wheat board could borrow money at a lesser rate than 5 per cent. The collection of the advance would be automatic, because the amount of the advance would be repaid as the grain was delivered. Above all, as far as the farmer is concerned, when he obtained an advance he would be getting his own money. He would be getting money that he would not have to worry about paying back. It would not be money that was simply another loan.

Why has the government rejected cash advances? It cannot be because of cost to the taxpayer. In asking for cash advances the western farmer is not just asking for another government subsidy. The amount of the advance would be deducted from his payment when he delivered his grain. The interest could be deducted from his last participation certificate when the final settlement was made. I do not think cash advances would need to cost the taxpayer a single, solitary cent.

Why does the Minister of Trade and Commerce appear to oppose cash advances? In his speech last week he suggested that those who are asking for cash advances are out to destroy the Canadian wheat board. I do not think the minister would expect that statement to be taken seriously by this house or by people in the west. He knows, as well as do most hon. members, that the very people who have been asking for cash advances, such as the farm unions, co-operatives, wheat pools and the like, are those who support the wheat board most vigorously. If they thought this action would in any way endanger the Canadian wheat board, I do not think they would be making the request for cash advances.

In the second place the minister intimated that this program of cash advances would be beyond the capacity of the wheat board to administer. I find it rather difficult to accept such reasoning also. To say that the wheat board is not able to handle cash advances is a reflection on the ability and competence of the staff of the board. I do not think such an intimation has much justification.

As we deal with this problem, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we should bear in mind the fact that neither guaranteed bank loans nor cash advances are going to do much to solve the over-all wheat surplus problem. Neither proposal will sell one extra bushel of wheat. But in my judgment cash advances would be infinitely more effective as an emergency measure than the legislation now before us, for getting cash into the hands of the farmers. I shall, if a vote comes, reluctantly support the resolution which is now before us.

Mr. Jutras: When the speech from the throne was being discussed, I did not participate in the debate though there was a great deal of interest amongst members in that particular debate. I knew that all these measures of particular importance to us would reappear later in the form of resolutions and bills and that I would have an opportunity of expressing my views on them. This is the first such resolution, and probably the most contentious of the lot, that is before us for discussion today.

The resolution refers to a situation which developed last fall in western Canada. As the house is fully aware, a shortage of cash developed as the result of inability to deliver grain to the elevators, particularly at harvest time. Of course this created a serious problem. There were meetings and discussions all over the three western provinces in an attempt to solve the problem. The idea of cash advances appeared to be the easiest solution, and certainly was the one that had the most appeal throughout the three western provinces. As a matter of fact it spread over the west like a prairie fire. Of course our friends in the opposition from Saskatchewan, Manitoba, the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Prince Albert were right there to fan the fire.

However, I think we can all agree that producers and everybody have a great deal of regard for cash advances as such. I believe we can say that everybody agrees with cash advances, but when you try to translate the idea of those cash advances into a practical scheme that would be acceptable to everybody then indeed there are many opinions. Many and varied schemes evolved out of the discussion. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, no matter what you term it, if you make an advance on a certain commodity, in this case wheat, it is still a loan. Inevitably there will be interest charges and administrative costs. There will be losses in any scheme of this nature.

If the person who receives the loan or the advance is unable, for one reason or another, to deliver the grain he still has an obligation to make good with money. In effect, a cash advance is just another term for a loan. At this point I should like to refer to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris who, in his speech early in the debate, made the ridiculous and I think childish assertion that the government were accusing the western farmer of dishonesty because they required guarantees in making loans. I believe this suggestion was also taken up today by the hon. member for Assiniboia. Of course we all know that any institution that lends money, particularly other people's money, has an obligation to ensure that this money is repaid. They must get a guarantee in one form or another. I feel it is ridiculous to suggest that just because we are asking for a guarantee we are questioning the honesty of the farmers.

After all, even if a man cannot meet his financial obligations on a certain day it is certainly no indication that he is dishonest. It does happen, as we all know, that farmers, like everybody else, miscalculate and things do not work out exactly as planned. I believe the farmers themselves, as well as the farm organizations, would insist that an organization such as the wheat board operate in an efficient manner. I can understand our socialist friends being very free with other people's money, but I am a little surprised at hearing the suggestion from the hon. member, for Brandon-Souris, who is conservative in more than one sense.

Then we come to the hon. member for Prince Albert, to whom I referred previously. In the discussions in this house and outside, more recently outside, he has tried to make much of the statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce made in the course of an earlier speech. The hon. member tried to ridicule the suggestion by the minister that the members of the board would have presented their resignations if they had been called upon to administer such a scheme. The inference was that the minister was being run by the board. I think the people of Canada know the Minister of Trade and Commerce well enough to know that if he were convinced a measure was sound he would have found ways of implementing it.

It may be true that the hon. member for Prince Albert, or even the opposition, is not interested in knowing the feeling of the members of the Canadian wheat board but I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that every producer was very much interested in finding out exactly how the members of the wheat board felt about this question. I am sure the producers gave full weight to the advice of the board on such an important question. After all, the board would be charged with the responsibility of administering the scheme, and if they have such strong feelings on the matter there must be sound reasons for it. When statements like that are made throughout the country, invariably the impression is created that the members of the Canadian wheat board have other interests at heart than the primary interest of the Canadian producer. There is no other way the suggestion can be interpreted.

I believe either we have trust and faith in the members of the board or we have not. But it does not mean we have to blindly follow their advice. When they take such a strong view, you cannot just dismiss it. According to the hon. member for Prince Albert, he would fire the whole board overnight without batting an eye. Apparently that is what the producers could expect from the Conservative party if they were responsible for administering the board.

While I am on this subject, may I protest against the charges that are repeatedly made, and were made recently in this house, against a civil servant who in my opinion is doing his best for the producer in spite of the very great difficulties. I refer to our transport controller. Surely even if you do not agree with his results or methods you will at least give him credit for discharging his duties honestly and looking after the interests of the producer. I know for a fact that is how he discharges his duties and I know that he is very conscientious and anyone who suggests that as controller of the board he is catering to interests other than those of the producer is being extremely unfair to this man. That charge has been reiterated again and again in this house. I feel it is unfair for the controller—

Mr. Argue: Where are the box cars?

Mr. Jutras: As I said before, Mr. Chairman, even if you are the controller you do not manufacture box cars—

Mr. Argue: But you are supposed to control them.

Mr. Jutras: —and the hon. member for Assiniboia should know that as well as anyone else.

Mr. Argue: He lost them in the United States.

Mr. Jutras: If he cannot, is that an indication that his integrity should be challenged? It is perhaps a matter of opinion as to whether or not his efficiency can be challenged but surely it does not give us the right to challenge his integrity, and that is an entirely different matter.

Mr. Argue: I see that you agree he is no good; that is fair enough.

Mr. Jutras: The point I am making at this time is that we have no right to challenge his integrity. I can assure the hon. member that we will discuss the other point relating to the transport controller at another time in this house; I shall be very glad to discuss it with him in this house.

A statement has been made by another hon. member from the west to which I should like to refer briefly. I refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor). I am sorry to observe that he is not in his seat; possibly I should have sent him a note but I assumed that he would be here when I spoke. However, the hon. member took it upon himself to moralize earlier in this house on this question. I must confess I believe he got a bit mixed up in his morals. Nevertheless, he in turn issued a challenge to hon. members to appear on a platform in a farming community. I observe that the hon. member is coming into the chamber now and I want at this time to give him a little kindly advice. I think he should revise his thinking in relation to the wheat board before appearing on a platform before an audience of farmers or grain producers. In the course of his remarks he referred to the wheat board's operation and termed it the charity of the Canadian taxpayer. There is nothing the farmers resent more than to have the operation of the board referred to as operating on the public charity because, as we all know and as has been explained time and time again—although apparently it has not penetrated my hon. friend's mind as yet —the board is an entirely separate operation from the government. It does not operate with public money but borrows money for the operation of the board and operates for the benefit of the producer and finally redistributes the money back to the producer. There is nothing which farmers generally resent more than to be told that the board operates as a charity from the Canadian taxpayers. I think it would be nice if the hon. member could bear that in mind before leaving the chamber.

There is, however, another misconception in the hon. member's mind which I do not intend to deal with at too great length because it is an involved question and I observed that it reappeared in the speech given by the Leader of the Opposition earlier this morning. I am referring to the nonsensical view that the government buys wheat from the farmers and that the whole procedure operates out of public money, confusing the two and trying to lay the blame there.

This point was taken up by the Leader of the Opposition this morning and was used as the basis of his argument. This is an old argument which we have heard for years, ever since the inception of the wheat board. The most staunch opponent of the Canadian wheat board has used this argument in and out of the house incessantly since the inception of the board. The Leader of the Opposition laboured the point this morning that the government was "forcing" the farmer. Let me say if there has ever been a case of voluntary compulsion the wheat board is a good example. The Leader of the Opposition said in effect that the farmer has been forced into an impossible position. That is the effect of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg South which was taken again by the Leader of the Opposition. I can assure both the hon. members that the farmers of western Canada and certainly all of the farm organizations can see through that argument and they have long since seen through it. As a matter of fact, it is the very argument which is causing the farmers great concern, in asking the government to share the cost of operation of any cash advance. Early last month in Winnipeg a western conference was held attended by nine farm organizations and others who met to discuss the question of cash advances. I think the discussion was more on a scheme of a permanent nature and most of the discussion was along that line, but it was based on the assumption that the government would take the responsibility for the interest and administration of the scheme. When the argument to which I have just referred was brought forward the delegates at the convention took a second look at it before asking the government to implement such a scheme, and the resolution instead of being passed was referred back to a special committee for further consideration before being presented. I am simply saying this in passing to indicate that this is an old argument and that the farm organizations in particular can see through it.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre took the position this afternoon, if I understood him correctly, that the farmers and the farm organizations were unanimous in asking for cash advances through the wheat board as the responsibility of the wheat board. I submit that this is not what the Leader of the Opposition on the one hand and the Conservative party on the other have been advocating. I followed the speech of the Leader of the Opposition very closely this morning in an endeavour to ascertain what his position was in relation to this matter and I must admit that I am still not too clear on the subject. He referred to the loans being made through the ordinary channel of the wheat board as an ordinary payment. That would be exactly what the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre advocated. However, in his concluding remarks the Leader of the Opposition added that the government should pay the interest. Did he mean that the government should pay the administrative costs and the losses? No one speaks of losses, although there are bound to be some losses, and it remains to be seen exactly what his position is on that point because it makes all the difference in the world.

I agree that in all likelihood the farm organizations will support—not without reluctance, concern and perhaps with some modifications—a scheme of cash advances if the government assumes all the responsibility. However, when you examine the basis on which it has been put by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, that the board should take full responsibility, I doubt at this moment if you could get any farm organization to endorse the proposition. Certainly it is the scheme advocated by the farmers' union because in their resolution they ask the government to assume the administrative and interest charges and I have yet to see a farm organization which has come out clearly for a cash advance through the ordinary channel of the wheat board with the board assuming all responsibility. This is the very scheme to which the wheat board itself took very great exception.

I am convinced that any fair-minded man will realize there are grave dangers in such a proposition. Of course, it depends—

Mr. Trainor: What is the difference between the wheat board and the government?

An hon. Member: Do you not know the difference?

Mr. Jutras: I am glad that the hon. member for Winnipeg South has placed that remark on the record and I shall repeat it to make sure that it is on the record. The hon. member has asked what the difference is between the wheat board and the government. I would suggest that he attend several farmers' meetings and become informed on the subject, because I do not intend to take the few minutes at my disposal to explain it to him.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, the crux of the whole problem is: who will assume the responsibility in connection with any such loans and losses incurred through their operation? I would think that, at least in our part of the country and I believe generally, a great many producers would raise serious objections. You run into a great many difficulties. The farmers who do not ask for loans would have to help pay for the cost of the loans made to others. In all the discussion that has taken place since last fall on that particular point there has been no unanimity. I repeat that I doubt very much if you could get any farm organization to pass such a resolution.

When you ask the government to assume all the cost then you remove one of the main difficulties in connection with cash advances. But if we are to do that let us be fair and admit it is an entirely different proposition when you ask the treasury to provide outright assistance. Speaking for myself and my district and Manitoba as a whole, I think the first question that would be asked, even by the farm organizations, would be, "What about the farmer who has had no crop?" There are many parts where they have had no crops for a few years, and certainly where they had no crop last year. Would they not expect to receive assistance on the same basis as those who have had a big crop? That raises another serious question to be resolved.

I am just mentioning these things in passing to indicate that the problem is by no means as simple as the opposition would like us to believe. When you talk of cash advances in general there is no difficulty, but before they can be put into operation the government must translate them into one specific scheme or another. Let us remember that when the emergency occurred three months ago a solution had to be found or a temporary expedient adopted in as short a time as possible.

At the present time throughout the western provinces the emphasis is being placed on a permanent scheme, call it cash advances or loans, in connection with farm-stored grain. I submit that this is another proposition entirely. This is a loan with the grain as security. Reference has been made to the United States scheme, but that is an entirely different proposition. This is not something new as it has been debated fully on at least two occasions in the past year. There are advantages and there are disadvantages.

So far the farm organizations throughout the country have not yet found a solution or a scheme that would be generally acceptable. It depends a great deal on how it is operated and on world conditions. If there were a need for it, that would be a good reason to institute such a system; but, as I say, it is a different system.

That is why, at the western conference held in Winnipeg last December, after due consideration they referred it back to a committee for further study. There may be merit in it, but the point is that cash advances in general do not mean very much. There must be something specific. There is no point in saying that farmers as a whole or farm organizations will support the idea of the wheat board being fully responsible for all administrative costs and so on that would be entailed. It all depends on how it is worked out.

As I say, this occurred three months ago and these bank loans were not popular and are not popular. But they have helped some people, particularly smaller operators, to a degree. The only real solution is to get the grain moving. We are fortunate that the grain is moving at the moment. I do not want to anticipate the other debate, as two of the previous speakers have, but I think it can be shown clearly that the policy pursued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with grain has been fully vindicated and will be fully vindicated in the months to come.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a minute to comment on one or two statements made by the hon. member for Provencher, who has just resumed his seat. It seems to me that the hon. member devoted all of his speech to an attempt to becloud the issue. In other words he was following the technique of setting up a straw man, setting up something that nobody has really asked for, and then proceeding to knock it down.

One statement in particular to which I take objection is the statement by the hon. member for Provencher that the Conservatives would fire all the members of the wheat board. No one has ever said any such thing. One or two people in our party have said, and I think all of us would be prepared to say the same, that they doubted very much the minister's statement that the members of the wheat board would all resign if cash advances were brought in. That is a very different thing entirely.

I am not going to bother going into the other matters which the hon. member for Provencher mentioned, because I think in the course of my remarks I will be replying to him in more detail.

The measure before the house was brought forward to validate action already taken by the government in an effort to relieve the shortage of cash in the hands of the farmers due to their inability to market grain over the past several months. Everyone in western Canada realizes the seriousness of that situation of shortage of cash. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has attempted throughout to minimize the seriousness of the situation and as has been indicated by several speakers—I will not repeat this—it seems quite evident that he expects that very little use will be made of this measure, that not many farmers will take advantage of it. I think the measure is being brought in deliberately to ensure that as few farmers as possible will take advantage of it, only those who are absolutely desperate; and of those, only the ones whom the bank considers good risks will get any benefit from it.

I think there are two considerations which we should keep particularly in mind as far as this legislation is concerned. The first is the adequacy of the measure to meet the situation which prevails and the second is whether there is an alternative measure which could be put into force to meet the situation more satisfactorily in place of the measure put forward by the government. I think on both counts there is no question that this is a pitifully inadequate piece of legislation for the situation it is designed to meet. I will be going into that in more detail.

This morning the minister said that this legislation was required solely—he stressed the word "solely"—because of the large crops of the past five years, and later on in his speech he said it was due to an abundant rainfall, that that was the only reason the legislation was necessary. Apparently in his thinking the minister leaves out of consideration altogether the effect of a large surplus of wheat in the United States and the fact that that is being disposed of—he has complained of this frequently—under give-away plans and things of that sort. He leaves out of consideration entirely the fact that there is a great deal more wheat being grown in Europe and in other parts of the world. In other words, apparently he fails completely to recognize that this is anything but a temporary situation which one or two poor crops will correct. It would appear at the present time that it is not a temporary situation. We must all admit that this particular measure is purely a temporary solution, one that will have no long-range effects whatever, and that we should not be thinking in these terms at all. What we should really be considering here is some means to meet what looks as though it would be a serious long-term situation as regards the disposal of the western wheat crop.

The minister went on to say in his usual optimistic manner that sales will be made in sufficient quantities so that farmers will be able to deliver approximately the same amount of wheat as was the case from the 1953-54 crop. What did they deliver from that crop? Under the stress of circumstances they delivered an eight-bushel per acre quota. In some cases they were not able to deliver the eight bushels per cultivated acre. If a farmer had a half-section farm with 300 acres under cultivation, he would be able to deliver 2,400 bushels of grain, which would net him, considering grades and so forth, not a great deal more than $2,400—maybe $200 or $300 more than that at the most—in most parts of western Canada. Considering his expenses, that is not sufficient to enable him to carry on operations, to meet the living expenses of himself and his family, to feed and clothe them and so forth, to pay his taxes and continue in business. Even if we are able to take from the farmers as much grain as was taken from them in the previous year, they are still going to be in a very serious situation in most cases.

The minister then went on to say that cash advances meant putting the wheat board into the lending business, and the member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) repeated that in the usual parrot-like fashion that the members of the Liberal party follow as far as the pronouncements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are concerned. It has been pointed out by several other people, and I pointed it out myself only a few days ago, in the throne speech debate, that cash advances being made through the agency of the wheat board do not turn the wheat board into a loaning institution. A very great distinction must be made here between a loan made by a chartered bank or any other loaning institution, on the basis of a lien against wheat held by a farmer, and an advance made by one of the agents of the wheat board to a farmer for grain he has on his farm and is ready to deliver to the wheat board. As a matter of fact, the agents of the wheat board would be doing exactly the same thing as they are doing all the time and have been doing for many years past.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask the hon. member a question? Would there not be a difference? In the first case the bank has security for the advance and in the second case there is no security in the hand.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I think that the wheat board has more complete security than any bank would have, for this reason, that no farmer can deliver any grain and sell any grain except through the wheat board.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is not true.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says it is not true. The only other place he can sell any grain is to a neighbour or to another farmer. Of course, that brings up another point. There is a great deal of what, strictly speaking, under the Wheat Board Act, is illegal trade going on, that is what the minister is referring to. In other words, what has happened as a result of the extremely tight cash situation is the development of a black market or a free market, or whatever you want to call it, underneath the regular wheat board market for grain. Farmers are selling grain in that market at prices as much as 50 per cent below the regular prices quoted by the wheat board, and in many cases even less than 50 per cent. That is what the minister is referring to. But, as far as the ordinary legal sale of grain is concerned, and except for a very limited quantity which can be disposed of to farmers in the feeding business, the only market a farmer has is the wheat board. I do not think the minister will dispute that.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I know of considerable quantities—and so does my hon. friend—being sold to feeders, and that is quite a legitimate transaction, as far as I know.

Mr. Harkness: I have just said that there is a certain amount being sold, and most of it is being sold at very low prices.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If advances had been made on that wheat by the wheat board, what would have happened then?

Mr. Harkness: If advances had been made on that by the wheat board, the farmer would not be in the position of having to sell it at these ridiculously low prices. He would have the money in his pocket. He would get twice the price he is getting at the present time. The only reason why anybody is selling grain at 60 cents and 70 cents a bushel, when the quoted price of the wheat board for it is $1.70 for No. 1 at Fort William, is that he is desperately in need of cash. As somebody remarked to me not very long ago, you cannot starve a farmer. You can introduce all kinds of regulations that might conceivably have that effect, but he will beat them. He will not starve. He will find some means of living.

An hon. Member: He can live on wheat.

Mr. Harkness: Nobody wants to live on a pure diet of wheat, but farmers are finding a means of getting cash in spite of the situation they are in and they will probably continue to do so. However, that is getting away from the main point I was following, which is that the elevator agents of the wheat board have been taking in grain from the farmers, making out cheques to them to cover the initial payment, and to have them make out similar cheques to cover grain on the farm—grain that they know is on the farm—is essentially the same thing. It does not involve any new administrative machinery. It does not involve anything that is going to cost a great deal of money. It can be done extremely simply and without any real risk because the farmer who has had a cash advance, unless he dies or goes out of the farming business, cannot deliver any grain without repaying that cash advance. In other words, he is in a strait-jacket as far as trying to get out of repaying that cash advance is concerned.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not like to keep interrupting, but reference is made to the farmer who has liens on his grain. The liens would take precedence over those cash advances, I suppose, would they not?

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, I do not think they would.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, they would. I assure you they would.

Mr. Studer: The municipal lien does.

Mr. Harkness: The municipal lien does, but the other liens do not. As a matter of fact, what does the farmer want the money for except to pay off these liens, these taxes and so forth? That is why he is trying to get the cash advances. The various points the minister is trying to make are further efforts to becloud the real issue. In that connection the minister said this morning that the farmer would be shopping around and trying to get someone to give him cash advances. That statement is ridiculous.

Mr. Studer: That is not what he said at all.

Mr. Harkness: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. Studer: It is not.

Mr. Harkness: He said it would be an undesirable thing. As a matter of fact, every farmer deals with one or two elevator men at the most and in most cases he leaves his permit book with the elevator agent. It stays there right at the elevator. He brings in grain when he is able to deliver it and it is marked off against his permit book. If the amount of the cash advance were entered in the permit book there would be no difficulty in collecting the money save in very exceptional circumstances. I admit there is no operation of any kind in which there is not some slight risk, but I would submit that the amount of loss which would occur under a scheme of that sort would be infinitesimal.

The minister also tried to maintain this morning that cash advances would not be cheaper as far as the farmers are concerned. He went on to say that the board borrows money at 3 per cent but that if the board were making cash advances the administrative costs would be at least 2 per cent more. I do not know on what basis he says they would be 2 per cent more. As I have just indicated, I cannot see where the administrative costs would amount to anything. The elevator agents, who are acting as agents of the board, are there carrying on their operations and as part of their ordinary activities and without any more remuneration, because they would be issuing cheques anyway, they could make these cash advances. In other words, there is no need to have a big administrative set-up in order to administer such a scheme, and rather than the cost of it being 2 per cent I would think it would much more likely be one-tenth of 1 per cent or perhaps less than that.

There was one point touched on by the hon. member for Provencher which was not touched on by the minister. In none of his statements does the minister seem to acknowledge the responsibility of the board and the government, because the board is an agency of the government. There has been no admission of the responsibility of the board and the government to take this wheat off the farmers' hands because of the fact that the wheat board is the only market the farmer has. When you put into operation a legal monopoly system of any kind—there are plenty of legal monopolies, as the Minister of Justice knows—then whatever the purpose of the monopoly there are certain responsibilities that go with the granting of the monopoly. The person or persons having the monopoly are required to give certain services.

Take the case of a railway serving a certain area. They have a monopoly on that form of business in that area, and whether or not it is profitable for them to do so they are required to run trains on that line. There are many branch lines throughout the country on which the railways lose a lot of money but they are still required to run trains on those lines. When they apply for the discontinuance of service on such branch lines in most cases they are turned down. As I say, any monopoly position carries the responsibility of giving service. The government and the wheat board, having a monopoly on the marketing of grain, consequently have the responsibility of taking the grain off the farmers' hands. The farmers have no place else to sell it, and if the government and the board do not take it off their hands they should at least put cash in the farmers' hands in the form of cash advances so that they will be able to finance their operations, eat, clothe themselves and their families and carry on in a normal manner.

I do not think the government can escape from that position. They have a monopoly position in the marketing of grain through their agency, the wheat board, and therefore they have the responsibility of handling the grain. The minister also went on, as several other speakers have indicated, to give us a little lecture and say that we must be careful what we say in criticism of the government and our general wheat position because there is great danger that what we say here may have the result of causing people to refuse to buy our grain, of knocking down the price and so on. I would say the minister cannot have it both ways. Quite frequently he tells members of the opposition in the house that it does not matter what we say anyway, that we are not going to have any influence and are not going to change matters by a lot of talk. However, that having been his position with respect to a considerable number of matters, I do not think he can now turn around and say: "You must not say a word about wheat because you may ruin a sale or two." In addition, it is a ridiculous position for the minister to take because he knows just as well as I do that the people acting as buyers for other countries know the general wheat and grain situation in the world just as well as we do. Nothing we say here is going to give away any secrets or make any difference in the attitude of people buying grain.

The minister made another statement which I thought was very questionable. He said that the board has not reduced prices and it is still selling wheat. As a matter of fact, the board has reduced prices considerably on the lower grades of wheat. They had large amounts of No. 5, No. 6 and feed wheat which were not selling. As far back as three or four years ago they were urged to reduce the price to some extent so as to place this wheat in a competitive position with barley and oats as a feed grain and they refused to do so. But finally in the last year they did reduce the prices of these low grades of wheat and as a result considerable amounts have been sold. In other words, this is an indication of the fact that, in spite of what the minister says, low grade wheat in any event is still susceptible to the law of supply and demand and that if you reduce prices you can make sales.

That, as I say, has been done, and I am glad it has been done. This move has not yet succeeded in getting a good deal of this low grade grain out of the elevators and thus making room for the better grade crop we grew last year.

Mr. Trainor: It took them a long time to do it.

Mr. Harkness: As the hon. member for Winnipeg South says, it took them a long time to take this really sensible step and start to get rid of the low grade grain which was clogging the entire marketing set-up.

To sum up the situation briefly, as I see it the loan scheme is completely inadequate to meet the existing situation. The government has admitted its inadequacy by bringing forward another resolution which will be considered shortly, to pay part of the storage costs on grain. In other words, what they have done is to make two stabs at the problem, both very ineffective, instead of looking at the situation, realizing how serious it was and taking some really useful step in order to solve it.

The next point is that the maximum amount of $1,500 by way of a loan is too small. It is not sufficient to meet the farmer's harvesting expenses and carry him through the winter. Let us take as an example the half-section farmer, not the big farmer but the half-section farmer who had 200 acres in crop last year. It was a good year and we will say he got 30 bushels to the acre. He has 6,000 bushels of grain. In most cases the half-section farmer cannot afford to have his own combine because his operation is not big enough. Quite a number of such people have combines but they do custom work for other people. We will take the more ordinary case where the man does not own a combine. He has to have his grain custom-combined. In my part of the country at any rate it would cost $5 an acre to have the grain swathed and combined. In other words, the half-section farmer had an expenditure of $1,000 simply to have his grain cut and put in his granaries, which would leave him if he got the maximum loan—he probably would not get the maximum with a half-section farm—with $500 for all the rest of his expenses, $500 on which he and his family have to live and with which to put in a crop next spring. The thing is ridiculous. It just does not meet the situation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is ridiculous to say the loan was intended to carry a farmer for a year.

Mr. Harkness: I am not saying it was intended to carry him for a year, but certainly it must have been intended to carry him through the winter—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Harkness: —and to let him eat during that period and get enough money or enough credit to buy oil and so forth to put in his crop next spring. In other words, surely it must be designed to carry him six months because he is not going to get any other income before that time.

Mr. Studer: Wheat is not the only thing he grows.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He is selling wheat every month.

Mr. Harkness: In a number of cases it is the only thing. If it were not for the fact that the majority of farmers have some livestock the situation would really be disastrous. They would be in a starving situation at the present time. As the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, they would be reduced to eating nothing but their own wheat. Fortunately the majority of them have some livestock. There are quite a few who are without any livestock and they are entirely dependent on grain which they produce. As I say, I think there is no question that the amount of the loan is completely inadequate. It is far too small and it will not serve the purpose for which it was intended.

Mr. Studer: Where do the farmers live who have no livestock?

Mr. Harkness: There are many of them living not far from where the hon. member is situated, right around Maple Creek.

Mr. Studer: Without livestock?

Mr. Harkness: Yes. The next point is the interest rate. I am not going to dwell on this matter. However, I do not think there is any doubt that interest rates are dependent on the risks involved. You have a government guaranteed loan to begin with. The chances of the wheat not being delivered to offset the loan are remote. If by any chance that happens the government is taking up the slack. In these circumstances a 5 per cent rate of interest is not justified.

The minister himself said that the wheat board borrows money at 3 per cent. In cases like this, if the matter is going to be handled in this way, the interest rate should be down to the same amount, in my opinion, namely 3 per cent. The other great difficulty is that many farmers have not been able to get this loan. That is the information I received. I should be interested in getting from the minister before this debate closes how many farmers have applied for a loan and how many have been given a loan; in other words, what percentage of farmers have been turned down as far as this loan is concerned? I think those figures would be extremely illuminating.

The complete inadequacy of this measure to meet the desperate shortage of cash which exists in western Canada has been quite adequately shown, in my opinion, by the speeches made on this side of the house so far today and during the speech from the throne. I would hope that the government would pay sufficient attention to those speeches to lead them to try to devise something better, or in other words, really to put into effect a system of cash advances such as that which has been urged on them by all the farm organizations in western Canada.

Mr. Tucker: There are a few points with which I should like to deal in regard to this matter. The first point that I wish to make is in connection with the attempt to indicate that a cash advance on farm-stored grain, though it must be repaid, is not a loan. The fact that the opposition parties, by trying to make out that advances against farm-stored grain which must be repaid are not a loan and are equivalent to selling the grain, indicates what a dangerous thing it is that they are advocating. The hon. member for Acadia indicated that in his area there were charges against the grain to the extent of in some cases perhaps 60 per cent of the value. If what is advocated by the opposition were done, and if advances were made against that farm-stored grain by the elevator company on behalf of the wheat board, what you would have would be this situation. When the time came to deliver the grain, the charges would have to be paid to the extent of 60 per cent and those loans would have to be paid to the extent of 50 per cent. There would not be enough to pay actually what was owing on the grain. Who would go short? Obviously the person who would go short would be the wheat board. As no statutory priority could be given to the wheat board, before any cheque could be issued to the wheat board all these prior liens would have to be met. So the farmer would be hauling wheat in to the elevator. He would get nothing for it for himself and there would not be enough to meet the wheat board requirements.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member for Acadia never said there were liens on it.

Mr. Tucker: I want to develop this point.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Get it right.

Mr. Harkness: Is this the eastern Tucker or the western Tucker?

Mr. Tucker: I notice it is unpalatable for members of the opposition to look at the facts.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member for Acadia never said there were liens on it.

Mr. Tucker: I heard what he said.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): He never said there were liens on the grain and you know that could not have been possible.

Mr. Tucker: I know what he said.

Mr. Harkness: Are you speaking as the eastern Tucker or the western Tucker?

Mr. Tucker: It is the same thing as a lien, if my hon. friend wants to make any distinction. Provincial law in this matter would apply as against the wheat board. It would not apply as against the bank. There is no use of members of the opposition trying to raise a whole lot of prejudice because the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that if the matter were handled through the wheat board these prior liens and pledges would have priority over repayment to the wheat board, and that would mean that there would be severe losses. That statement was seized on in a characteristic way by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce saying that if the loans were made by the wheat board we could not give statutory priority to these advances or loans, and that there would be losses. That statement was distorted by the hon. member for Assiniboia to his saying that the Liberal party were accusing the farmers of being dishonest.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is practically what the minister said.

Mr. Tucker: Why do you not listen to what I am saying instead of being so anxious to say something different? Why do you not listen for a little while?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): You are mixed up.

Mr. Harkness: Two-tongued Tucker toeing the line.

Mr. Tucker: The minister pointed out these facts which I think anybody who was ready to recognize the facts must recognize to be the truth.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): He did not state the facts.

Mr. Tucker: Then we are told by the hon. member for Assiniboia something that I was not surprised to hear. First of all, he laid down a false statement that the minister in effect accused the farmers of being dishonest. Then he went on to add, "We will certainly not let the people of Saskatchewan forget that statement".

Mr. Zaplitny: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tucker: My friend the hon. member for Dauphin says, "hear, hear". Those are the accepted tactics of the C.C.F. in western Canada.

As a matter of fact I think the people are getting dissatisfied with these tactics. First of all, there is a smear which has no basis in fact and then they say, "Now just watch out how we are going to make it stick to you". That is exactly what the hon. member for Assiniboia said this morning.

Mr. Studer: The tactics of Karl Marx.

Mr. Tucker: As my hon. friend has just said, they are the accepted tactics of Karl Marx and I am not surprised at the members of the C.C.F. party following them.

Here is another example hinted at by an interruption. My hon. friends are glad to find that there is a Liberal newspaper which has put something on their editorial page about which they are already licking their lips in anticipation of how they are going to spread it all over Saskatchewan with regard to myself. Whether it is well founded or not does not worry the members of the C.C.F. party. Of course consistent with the attitude of Karl Marx which is, arouse hatred; that is the way to get into office. It does not much matter whether it is the right thing to arouse hatred as long as you get into office.

My hon. friends across the way have repeatedly taunted me with regard to the Free Press two-Tucker editorial. I shall therefore deal with it for a moment. Here is an extract from the editorial:

> On the afternoon of October 17 the executive of the Liberal association met, 50 strong, in Rosthern. That evening the western Mr. Tucker wired Prime Minister St. Laurent and Trade Minister Howe and, on behalf of the meeting, pressed for cash advances on farm-stored grain.
> But the air of Ottawa has caused a strange metamorphosis; . . .

Mr. Nicholson: True.

An hon. Member: Read it all.

Mr. Tucker: You can read it all if you want, but I believe it has already all been read in the house. I am pointing out that our executive asked for cash advances on farm stored grain. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if that is not what this bill provides?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Tucker: Let us see what we are actually providing. The banks are authorized to make advances against the grain on the farm, on which there is given a statutory security. When that grain is delivered to the elevator, the agent to whom it is delivered must deduct half of the payment on the grain to repay that advance.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friends say no. I am stating exactly what I understand is provided. This is to be an advance against grain on the farm on which there is a statutory priority, and which is to be repaid out of the proceeds from that grain.

Mr. Trainor: At 5 per cent.

Mr. Tucker: We are not dealing with the interest rate at the moment, if my hon. friend will just keep his mind on one thing at a time. I am dealing with this question that it is alleged our executive asked for cash advances and when I said here in the house that what the government was proposing to do was to make cash advances, then I am accused of taking a different stand from what my executive took. My point is that when you say the banks have a right to make an advance against grain on the farm, and if they make an advance they have security on the grain, and when the grain is delivered the debt must be repaid, then you are providing for cash advances against that grain.

Mr. Harkness: You will never make that stick.

Mr. Tucker: I may not be able to make it stick, but my hon. friend is rejoicing in the fact, whether or not it is true, that I will not be able to make it stick.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Are you differentiating between advances and loans?

Mr. Tucker: Advances are exactly the same as loans.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The minister does not agree with that. He says everybody who asks for advances is a saboteur of the wheat board.

Mr. Tucker: I am dealing with the question as I see it. The minister makes his own speeches. If my hon. friend thinks I have always got to agree with the minister, he is mistaken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: Start to show some of that disagreement.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friends opposite say I will not be able to make it stick. They do not want me to get the truth before this house for fear I might make it stick. So far as I am concerned, I was elected to this house 20 years ago. In the meantime, I have been elected twice to the legislature. My hon. friends may taunt me that I cannot make things stick, but my experience with the people of western Canada is this. If you are honest with them, they will give you their support. My hon. friends may laugh all they want, and they have tried very hard to beat me, but I still have faith that the people do support honesty in public life rather than dishonesty. If all my hon. friends can say when I am laying the facts before this house is that whether or not they are facts I cannot make them stick, then is not that coming down to a pretty low point in political life?

Mr. Harkness: We say you cannot make them stick because they are not facts.

Mr. Tucker: It is very interesting to me. I can listen to my hon. friends opposite without getting so uneasy that I have to keep yelling at them, because it is my attitude that we are reasonable men and I can wait until I make my arguments and leave it to the good sense of the house. I am not afraid to have the opposition present their arguments, but it would look to me as if the opposition were afraid that some advantage they think they are going to be able to reap from this editorial may be taken away from them if I explain it. I wonder if that is their attitude? They jeer that I will not be able to make it stick, even although it is true.

I repeat that an advance against farm-stored grain, on which security is given and which must be repaid with interest, is a loan. Nobody can say anything different.

Mr. Harkness: I do.

Mr. Tucker: You can it if you want to, but you will be saying something that is incorrect and it would not be the first time.

Mr. Harkness: We will let the farmers judge that.

Mr. Tucker: There again we have the idea that you think you can make the farmers believe almost anything. I do not think you are going to make them believe that the Tory party—

Mr. Harkness: You are judging me by yourself.

Mr. Tucker: I do not think you are going to make the farmers believe the Tory party is more to be trusted to maintain the wheat board as the exclusive agency for the marketing of wheat than is the present government.

Talk about making things stick. You just try to make that stick out in western Canada. The people of western Canada remember how under a Tory government wheat on the open market was permitted to go down to a point where the farmers were getting 19 cents a bushel for No. 1 wheat. Those are the people who talk to us, those are the people—

Mr. Harkness: Who established the wheat board?

Mr. Tucker: Those are the people who say the wheat board should sell more wheat; that it should reduce the price. Yes, those are the people. They do not need to tell the farmers that is a Tory policy because the farmers know it.

Mr. Harkness: Who established the wheat board?

Mr. Tucker: If my hon. friend would just keep quiet I would not have referred to the unfortunate record of the Tory party in western Canada because it was not my intention to do so.

[Mr. Tucker.]

An hon. Member: Is there a Tory party in western Canada?

Mr. Tucker: Well, the remnants of it. As a matter of fact, I realize that all the time there is a definite attack upon the wheat board. They are attacked for not selling wheat fast enough. They say the board should reduce the price to get rid of it.

Now then, what would be the effect of that? We have had several years of good crops, but there will be periods again, and history shows it, when we will have short crops. What happened in the past before we had the wheat board was this. The farmer had to market his grain. It was sold on the open market and went into the hands of the speculators. The time came ultimately when the wheat was sold, and when it was sold in years of short crops the speculator got the better price. The farmer who had no wheat to sell did not benefit. It is for that reason I have believed in the wheat board for over 30 years. It is because year after year I saw periods of good crops in western Canada when the price would fall. Then, when we had short crops and the price went up, that did not benefit the farmer but it benefited those who bought the wheat. When there was any danger of oversupply such as there is today, they let the price go down to levels such as were experienced in 1932 when good No. 1 northern wheat was sold by the farmer for 19 cents a bushel.

Now then, so far as the Winnipeg Free Press is concerned, they are entitled to their opinion. They do not like the wheat board as a compulsory marketing agency for Canadian wheat. I do not mind the Free Press disagreeing with me. In fact, Liberals disagree amongst themselves all the time, and that is the view of that newspaper. I hold a belief that the wheat board is a good thing for the western farmer, and a good thing for the Canadian economy. It is one of the things in which I believe with all my heart and soul. If it means my motives are to be questioned, if it means I may be driven out of public life, I will stick to the thing in which I believe. I do not care that much about my fate. Many of my hon. friends rejoice, thinking they have something there which indicates that I was dishonest and they hope to use it against me all over Saskatchewan and particularly in my own seat.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tucker: I know that the hon. member for Assiniboia would dearly love to use that against me but I want to say this: so far as I am concerned I have taken a stand which I think is right in this matter. I know they will use that against me but it is not the first time I have been slandered by members of the C.C.F. party and I suppose it will not be the last. I do not propose to be deterred from saying what I think is in the best interests of the farmers of western Canada by any threats that have been made against me to the effect that I will be smeared up and that I will not be able to successfully answer their accusations.

An hon. Member: It was not the C.C.F.

Mr. Tucker: I say to every one of you, do the worst in your smear campaign; I rely on the good sense of my people.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tucker: Now, then, let me just deal with the facts of this matter—

An hon. Member: Yes, let us get to the facts.

An hon. Member: It's about time.

Mr. Tucker: I was one of those who attended the marketing conference in Saskatoon from start to finish. I believe that the hon. member for Saskatoon was there for some of the time.

Mr. Knight: I was there all the time.

Mr. Tucker: Well, I was one of those who attended all sessions and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was another. I think the three of us were the only ones who were there at all times.

An hon. Member: You are wrong again.

Mr. Tucker: I think the hon. member for Prince Albert looked in two or three times.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the marketing conference was called by the interprovincial farm union council and they invited to that meeting the members of the farm unions, representatives of the pools and of the United Grain Growers, representatives of labour, chambers of commerce and so on.

I have in my hand a report of that meeting which was sent to me by the secretary of the meeting and so that there may be no doubt about it, I am going to read the first two resolutions passed at that conference. The first resolution that was laid down was to the effect that the wheat board had the confidence of the people present. The resolution was passed unanimously without a single dissenting voice and it read as follows:

> That this conference express its confidence in the Canadian wheat board as a sound method of marketing Canadian grain.

That resolution was carried.

The next resolution concerned advances to farmers and reads as follows:

> Motion as amended—

Observe that it was the motion as amended—

> Be it resolved that the organizations participating in this conference urge the government of Canada to make immediate provision for advances to farmers on grain in store on the farm, and further that these advances should be up to one half the value of the normal delivery expected and should be repayable on the basis of one half of the value of each delivery made by the farmer.

This was the resolution finally passed by the conference but it was passed—as the hon. member for Saskatoon knows—only after a great deal of discussion and only after a resolution was brought forward representing what many of the farmers would like to have seen done; namely, have advances made through the wheat board. When this was brought forward, I think, by the representatives of the farm unions, it met with opposition. Various objections were raised by some of the people who were present, who said in effect that this procedure would involve the wheat board in the matter and put them in the position of trying to collect back money loaned from the farmers.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The whole thing was a phony issue.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friend says it was a phony issue, but it was raised at that conference and in all sincerity. My hon. friend seems inclined to take the attitude that no one else but himself is sincere. I find that a most distasteful attitude. I think there were many people at that conference who were as sincerely concerned about the best interests of the farmer as my hon. friend from Moose Mountain. Of course, my hon. friend labours under the impression that only he and his group are honestly and sincerely concerned about the best interests of the farmer. I think that is a most despicable attitude. Among the people who took that attitude were leaders of the pool and they would not raise a phony issue.

An hon. Member: Now let us talk about the pool annual convention.

Mr. Tucker: I will come to that if you will just contain yourself in patience.

An hon. Member: It will soon be time to quit.

Mr. Tucker: I know that you are looking forward to the end of this discussion and I do not blame you. In any event the idea was brought forward that a very strong attack was being made upon the wheat board and that if something was laid upon it whereby it had to absorb losses and had to engage in contests in the courts as to what should be done with the money from the wheat delivered to it and had to engage in collection of loans or advances it would involve the wheat board in something it was not set up to do. They said we would prefer that the wheat board be kept as a marketing agency and not be dragged into this field and they said further they did not want their elevator agents dragged into this field. They said they would not want the wheat board engaged in the business of trying to collect debts. This represented the attitude of some of the pool leaders. Finally it was decided to appoint a committee to draw up a resolution which would urge that the government provide for advances and leave it up to the government to decide how it should be done, after hearing any representations which might be made by organizations there represented. That was the considered opinion of this conference called by the farm unions and attended by representatives from all over western Canada including representatives of the provincial governments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The provincial minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan supported this resolution.

An hon. Member: That was a mistake, was it not?

Mr. Tucker: Let my hon. friend tell the Hon. Mr. Nollet that.

I would like to refer again to the resolution that was passed. They wanted action from the government—

An hon. Member: They sure did.

Mr. Tucker: They decided it should be left to the government to decide what action should be taken to get money into the hands of the farmers and that it should be repaid. It surprises me to learn that some people think this was not asking for loans to be provided for; how could it not be a loan when it was going to have to be repaid? Who ever heard of the idea that if you sell something, you have to pay back the money which you received when you sold it? My hon. friends are obviously trying to distort the meaning of this resolution.

An hon. Member: Another phony explanation!

Mr. Tucker: You may say that it is a phony explanation but I am, after all, giving an explanation which you cannot answer. You can only try your usual smear tactics.

I am now coming to the editorial. I have described what had happened at this meeting representing the people of western Canada, that they were ready to leave it to the government after hearing from their representatives at the meeting of the various organizations to decide how it should make provision for the advances—

An hon. Member: What about the Rosthern resolution?

Mr. Tucker: I am coming to that if you will just contain yourself in patience. I met the Rosthern executive about three weeks later. Many present felt they would like to have advances made by the wheat board through the elevator agents. I pointed out to them what had happened at this marketing conference. I had with me the very sheet I hold in my hand and I read them the resolution passed by the marketing conference. I said the reason this conference did not ask for advances to be made through the wheat board was because they received advice from pool leaders and others to the effect that it would not be a good thing for the wheat board to become involved in this matter. I suggested to our executive that as the marketing conference was not ready to ask that the wheat board become involved for fear that it might damage it and as they believed in the wheat board as much as anyone, if this was the considered opinion of some pool leaders I was inclined to pay a lot of attention to it even though at the outset I had thought it would be simpler and easier to have these advances made through the elevator agents from the wheat board. But when I heard pool leaders tell me that this might adversely affect the wheat board I did not think we should go against their advice. I said, what is the government going to do? The government will know what has happened at the conference in Saskatoon. In view of the fact that this marketing conference did not pass a resolution asking for it to be done through the wheat board, in view of the advice given by some pool leaders, I said that I was satisfied that the pool leaders before giving that advice would have been in consultation with the members of the wheat board. I said that I expected the wheat board would be giving the same advice, that they should not be involved in this matter. So I said that as far as our executive was concerned I would suggest that we ask the government to take action as quickly as possible to provide advances being made to the farmer in a way that they thought would be best for the farmer and best for the wheat board.

I explained the thing just as carefully as I am explaining it to this committee. On the strength of my explanation the executive said that they thought I was right in my attitude and that I should draw up a resolution asking the government to provide for advances in such a way as they saw fit, but that I should emphasize the necessity of those advances being made as quickly as possible because it had been suggested that the government could not provide for advances through the banks or in any other way unless they called parliament together. They said that I should ask the government to act as quickly as possible without waiting to call parliament. That was their attitude.

So I drew up this resolution asking the government to make advances against grain stored on the farm. Because I knew of the advice the government was likely to get from the pool leaders from what they had said at this conference I thought the best thing for me to do was to stress the need for early action and to ask the government to make advances without telling them how to provide for advances. The resolution reads:

> Recognizing the urgent pressing need of the farmers for cash to pay outstanding bills for harvesting and other expenses and for food, clothing and fuel before the onset of winter the Rosthern federal constituency Liberal executive ask the federal government to make provision at an early date for cash advances to be made to farmers on grain stored on farms to the extent of up to one-half the value of grain deliveries expected to be made during the current crop year.

That telegram was drafted to ask the government to make advances in such a way as it saw fit. It did not ask that those advances be made through the wheat board.

Mr. Zaplitny: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Tucker: The hon. member can ask it after I am through. That is the resolution which was passed after a full explanation to the executive. Naturally when I am accused of taking one stand in the west and another stand—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear", but he knows that what I say now is true, that I did not take another stand. I have proved that to him.

An hon. Member: Prove it to the newspapers.

Mr. Tucker: It may be hard to prove to them, but I think I can prove it to them if I have proved it to you. Fifty people attended and heard my explanation. They heard me say that the government was almost sure to act on the advice of the pool leaders and the wheat board because I said the fundamental policy of the Liberal government was not to interfere in any way with the successful functioning of the wheat board. I said that I was satisfied that if they were getting that advice they would set up some system of advances to be made through the banks.

I explained in the speech I made in this house that that was what had happened at the farm marketing conference.

I want to say to the members of this committee that I am not one who pretends that everything the government of this country does is in accord with what I might like to see done. We are a large country and no one part of the country can dictate the whole national policy. We have to have a national program and the majority must rule. An attempt must be made to take care fairly of all parts of the country. When the government lays down a policy which I think is the best policy for the country as a whole, I will support that. I know that some eastern members will support this particular measure although they may get into trouble with their constituents for doing so. It is a national policy and I must support the government that puts into effect policies with which I agree.

I am not ashamed to say that in that connection I follow the party lead. This government has set up the wheat board and it is standing solidly behind it in the midst of this crisis and that policy should have the support of every person in western Canada who believes in the wheat board.

My hon. friends say that these attacks do not have any effect on the situation. I grant that if we had an open market and wheat was always available speeches would not affect prices, but when you have over 800 million bushels of wheat under the control of the wheat board, a government body, and then there is a concerted attack being made upon the government that that board is not doing a good job in selling wheat, that it should reduce prices to get rid of the wheat, possible buyers know that the only thing necessary to be done in order to get cheaper wheat is to have the wheat board waver in its policy, for the government to tell the wheat board that they had better bow to the attacks of the opposition and drop their prices.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired. For his information, may I say that I have allowed him some 90 seconds for interruptions.

An hon. Member: I knew you would never get to the wheat board resolutions.

Mr. Tucker: If you will allow me to go on I will.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I would be the first to admit that we do not grow wheat in Broadview, but last summer I had the opportunity to travel through the western part of this country and I talked to a number of elevator operators and wheat farmers. I found that they had quite a problem before them. Listening to the minister this morning I could hardly believe my ears because according to him there does not seem to be a problem. According to the minister, the government is selling our wheat, the farmers are absolutely satisfied and everything is perfectly satisfactory.

So I phoned up the bureau of statistics at noon just to see what our selling efforts had been as compared with those of our competitors. I got figures from the dominion bureau of statistics for the last two crop years and for the first quarter of the present crop year as compared with the first quarter of the last crop year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Is the hon. member referring to sales or exports?

Mr. Hees: I am referring to export sales; that is what they gave me.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The bureau of statistics have no record of sales; they have a record of exports.

Mr. Hees: It is the actual sales that we made expressed in millions of bushels.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It must be exports.

Mr. Hees: We will call them exports, but I understood they were export sales. They were sales that were made. We shipped the wheat out of the country.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think my hon. friend should be sure of what he is talking about. Sales are recorded only by the wheat board but exports are a matter of record with the bureau of statistics.

Mr. Hees: All right, I will accept the minister's correction. These are exports of wheat, and wheat flour in terms of wheat, expressed in millions of bushels. Now, I know that the minister will claim that it is not fair to compare our performance with that of the United States and Argentina because United States exports to a certain extent are give-away exports. I know that the Argentine enters into barter deals with other countries. The minister would claim that we do not want to enter into barter deals of that kind.

Even though the United States has exported 30·8 per cent more in the last crop year than the year before, and the Argentine 21·9 per cent more, we shall not hold that against the government because that is on a different basis from that on which we deal. However, I checked with the officials of his department who are in charge of our sales, with respect to exports made by Australia and France. They have assured me that both Australia and France sell under the same kind of competitive conditions as Canada, and that it is fair to compare our performance to the performances of those two countries. I am glad the minister agrees.

The figures I got for Canada were that in the crop year 1953-54 we exported 255·1 million bushels, and in the last crop year, 1954-55, we exported 251·8 million bushels, or a decrease of 3·3 million bushels, which is a percentage decrease of 1·3 per cent. Australia in the crop year 1953-54 exported 63·4 million bushels, and in the crop year 1954-55 exported 94·2 million bushels, or an increase of 30·8 million bushels, which is a percentage increase of 48·6 per cent. France in the crop year 1953-54 exported 34 million bushels, and in the crop year 1954-55 exported 83·8 million bushels, or an increase of 50 million bushels over the previous crop year, which is a percentage increase of 250 per cent.

Now let us look at the comparison between the first quarter of the present crop year and the first quarter of the previous crop year. In the first quarter of the previous crop year, 1954-55, Canada exported 73·8 million bushels, and in the first quarter of the present crop year, 1955-56, we exported 59·6 million bushels, or a decrease of 14·2 million bushels, which is a percentage decrease of 19 per cent. Australia exported in the first quarter of the 1954-55 crop year 21·5 million bushels, and in the first quarter of the 1955-56 crop year 23·2 million bushels, or an increase of 1·7 million bushels, which is a percentage increase of approximately eight per cent. France exported in the first quarter of the 1954-55 crop year 10·2 million bushels, and in the first quarter of the present crop year 16·1 million bushels, or an increase of 5·9 million bushels, which is a percentage increase of 58 per cent.

As I have said, I believe the minister will agree it is perfectly fair to compare the performances of France and Australia with that of Canada, as all three of us are selling under the same competitive conditions. Yet in the past crop year we exported 3·3 million bushels less than in the previous crop year, whilst the other two countries between them exported 80·8 million bushels more than they did in the previous crop year.

The same performance took place in the first quarter of this crop year. Canada dropped by 14·2 million bushels, and the other two between them have increased by approximately 7·6 million bushels.

That shows that our selling effort is not what should be expected of this government. Other countries working under the same competitive conditions as Canada have sold considerably more wheat during the past crop year than in the previous crop year, and that increase has been maintained into the first quarter of the present crop year. This shows that somewhere Canada is falling down. We are not as aggressive or for some other reason we are not making the sales. We are selling less wheat, whilst other countries working under the same conditions are selling more wheat.

Therefore the government is very much to be condemned for allowing competitors to beat us right across the board while our sales are dropping off. That is the kind of performance that would cause a sales manager to require a very good explanation from a salesman; if it was not forthcoming, the salesman would be out of a job. The Canadian people, especially the wheat farmers of Canada, have a right to demand an explanation for that very poor showing from this government.

The other thing that impressed me when I listened to the minister this morning was that it seemed, according to him, that the western wheat farmers are perfectly satisfied, first of all, with the selling efforts of the government and, secondly, with the bank loans which have been arranged by the government for them at 5 per cent. The best way to find out what the people think about something is first of all to go out and talk to them, which I did this fall, and secondly to have a report of a meeting where a representative group gathers and expresses its opinions. That I have here in my hand.

This is a report given of a meeting held in Minnedosa, Manitoba, in the middle of November, attended by no less a person than the genial Minister of Justice. According to this report, it was quite a meeting. As the Minister of Justice will assure the Minister of Trade and Commerce, you would not find anywhere a finer group of people than you find in Minnedosa. I had the privilege of being there last summer and the year before and I talked to many of these people. I am sure the Minister of Justice will back me up when I say that these people are good wheat farmers. This is an average wheat farming community in western Canada, and the people who live in that community and who attended this meeting—I am sure the Minister of Justice will correct me if he does not agree completely with what I say—the people who attended this particular meeting in large numbers were some of the finest people you would find. They are fair-minded, they are calm, collected, reasonable people, wanting only a square deal and asking nothing special from anybody. All that they ask is fair treatment.

Mr. Argue: They used to vote for the government.

Mr. Hees: This report I have here which appears in the Minnedosa Tribune of Thursday, November 17, is headed "Garson Gets 'Hot Potato'; Western Farmers Hostile." It states:

> The honourable Stewart Garson (Minister of Justice, Lib. M.P. Marquette) had hold of a hot one on Thursday night when he stood on the stage of the Legion hall in Minnedosa following the presentation of the brief and his talk to the audience.
> For a period of three hours Mr. Garson parried questions hurled at him from the floor. Although, to the casual observer, these questions may have appeared to be merely a means to trip up the cabinet minister, they were questions of vital concern to the farmers of Minnedosa area as well as the farmers across western Canada.
> One of the questions that came up continually was that Canada seems to be so critical of U.S. grain selling program, but what has the Canadian government to offer in its place?
> Mr. Garson said that Canada hasn't any program that she can lay her finger on at the present time.

Then I go on to a little later in the meeting and the report has this to say:

> Mr. Rudolph Usick took the floor again and reiterated that as yet Mr. Garson hadn't answered the question of what was going to happen. He read from various news clippings indicating that there was a solution to the problem if the government wished to look for it.
> Mr. Garson remarked that Mr. Usick should be on the wheat board at an attractive salary if he knew the answers. He asked Mr. Usick if he thought the wheat board hadn't studied all these proposed solutions. The wheat board has proven in the past that it can get rid of the grain. Unfortunately it is bucking the American give-away program. But if the farmers will only have patience and not make the situation worse then something will turn up. Mr. Garson again admitted that there was no solution at the present time but feels that with Mr. Howe at the head things will turn out all right.

That is the kind of answer that was provided to the questions which these people were very rightly asking. A little later in the meeting the newspaper report has this to say:

> Spokesmen for the farmers ridiculed the farm loan which got great approval from the audience. Mr. Garson was asked how he would like to go to the bank and borrow his salary at 5 per cent interest.

That is a very good question and I should like to hear the answer.

Mr. Argue: He would certainly have a lot of interest to pay.

Mr. Hees: I continue:

> In the eyes of the farmer that is what it amounts to. He has to pay interest on his year's labour. Herbie Schulz said that there was no criticism of the wheat board but that the present crisis was the direct result of government bungling. The government has tied the wheat board up in a straightjacket as far as invoking any system that will move grain. He said that the Canadian government is going all out at every turn—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): On a point of order, is it in order for an hon. member to read the expressions of people outside the house and, more than that, is it in order to read pages of a newspaper in a debate of this kind?

Mr. Argue: The cabinet does it all the time.

The Deputy Chairman: On the point of order raised by the minister, I do not think there is any question that the editorial does not conflict with the rules of the house in that it does not comment on the proceedings of the house. But there is, as I think the hon. member for Broadview will agreee, if not a provision at least a series of Speakers' rulings against the reading of lengthy editorials so that the speech becomes the speech of the writer of the newspaper article rather than that of the member who has the floor. I think the hon. member is quite capable of expressing his views in his own words without too much assistance from newspapers.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. This is not an editorial. This is simply a straight news report, and I am almost through. The reason I am reading it is that I think it expresses very clearly to the house the feelings of the average wheat farmer about what the government is doing and not doing. It is for that reason and that reason alone that I am reading it, and I will be through very shortly. The report goes on to say:

> With regard to the cash loans he said it was an insult to the integrity and industry of the Canadian farmer. Another young farmer wanted to know what he was supposed to do come spring. The cash loan is based on the amount of bushels of grain one has. He figures he could borrow $1,300. When he sells his grain, one-half of this goes back to the bank, leaving him a surplus of $650 which is debt. How does the government expect him to live and put in a crop on that?

That again is a very good question, and again it remained unanswered by the minister. The report continues:

> These types of questions carried on until 1.00 a.m. before the 600 audience that packed the hall.

I read that, Mr. Chairman, simply to show how good, sensible, reasonable Canadian western wheat farmers feel about what the government is doing and is not doing. They are incensed about what the government is doing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What is your opinion? You are talking about sensible people but we would like to hear your view as well.

Mr. Hees: They consider it an insult. They do not consider what the government is doing to be in any way satisfactory, and for that reason members of this house have a perfect right to stand up and demand that the government not only sell our wheat but also that until they have sold it they make available cash advances without interest to the farmers who are being victimized by the government's complete failure to sell our wheat at the present time. There is no excuse for the government not selling it. Other countries working under exactly the same competitive conditions have been able to go out and make very important increases in sales in the past year. The reason the government has not done so is that they seem to have lost their knack of selling, if they ever had it, and it is about time they took some lessons in how to sell, got out and sold and helped the farmers instead of sitting back and doing nothing about it. I certainly hope the minister will do just that.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, I think we all witnessed a very amazing performance a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Rosthern. It seems a very strange thing to me that all of a sudden the hon. member has blossomed out as the great champion of the government so far as this legislation is concerned. I do not know how to account for this thawing-out process, but I can assure the house that when this issue was being debated throughout western Canada last fall the hon. member for Rosthern and his colleagues in the Liberal party in Saskatchewan were in a deep freeze out there and we did not hear very much from them. I am not too sure whether or not it is the warm weather down there that has been a contributing factor in that thawing-out process.

Mr. Tucker: On a question of privilege, the hon. member for Assiniboia can tell my hon. friend that there was no concealment of my views because the hon. member for Assiniboia and I had a debate on the matter before the students of the University of Saskatchewan and there was no attempt to conceal my position at that time.

Mr. Argue: It was as transparent then as it is now.

Mr. Bryson: I heard the speech and I did not think it was even worth considering at this point. I suppose I should rise with some temerity to take part in this debate in view of the pointed threat made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this morning to the effect that debate on this legislation should not be carried on by the opposition for any length of time. I should like to say at the outset that I am not only taking part in the debate to express my own objections to the legislation but I am also taking part at the express request of the many thousands of farmers who reside in my constituency and who have made it known to me in no uncertain terms that I am to put forward their objections to the legislation at every opportunity.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Are you going to vote against it?

Mr. Bryson: The resolution before the house, which will of course ultimately become government legislation, is the answer the government has given to the very real and critical problem which the farmers of western Canada are grappling with today. That problem is the shortage of cash brought about because of their inability to market grain and grain products. There are a good many reasons for this shortage of cash, not the least of which is their inability to market their grain products.

I am not going to take the time of the house to place on the record once again all the reasons which have already been placed there so ably by opposition members during the throne speech debate why farmers find themselves in their present position, but may I say I think there is something very sinister in this piece of legislation, something we do not see on the surface of it. This legislation confirms a suspicion widely held on the prairies that a very peculiar situation is arising in this country. That suspicion is that the government has lost touch and has lost interest in what is happening to that section of Canada. If this situation is going to continue it will in the end spell disaster for the future economy of this country. Apparently this government—and this is the view widely held in western Canada—has become obsessed with the idea that almost overnight we have blossomed into an industrial nation and that our economic prosperity in this country is no longer dependent on our agricultural industry. As a matter of fact, in so far as western agriculture is concerned, they view it as a sort of necessary evil, an embarrassment, and one for which this government is obliged continually to apologize to the rest of Canada. This resolution goes a long way towards confirming that suspicion which is held by so many people in western Canada, and I think it is disastrous.

Prior to the introduction of this legislation meetings were held in virtually every schoolhouse and community hall in western Canada in an effort to bring to the attention of this government the fact that a serious situation had developed and that something must be done to restore to farmers in western Canada the purchasing power which they had lost. They asked for cash advances as the only reasonable and feasible method by which that purchasing power could be restored. While I admit—as do most people out there—that the government has lost touch, I should like to take a few moments to review some of the events—and only briefly—that finally led this government to acknowledge that there was a problem in western Canada. Certainly I am not going to burden the house with an account of the dramatic part that was played by the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. The part he played had all the ingredients of a mystery thriller. I refer to his safari to Ottawa—and the cloud of mystery that surrounded that trip—with his little black bag under his arm in which was deposited his secret formula.

Mr. Studer: Like the socialists' trip to Washington.

Mr. Bryson: I am glad to note that the hon. member also has become quite vocal on this question. We are going to look forward to a speech by the hon. member for Maple Creek, knowing before he makes it that it is going to be extremely hard to listen to. I am not going to say anything about the profound pronouncement that was made by that same gentleman when he returned from Ottawa. These are things which all of us would like to forget, including the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. The Americans have their ballad of Davy Crockett. We in Saskatchewan have the drama of Hammy McDonald. What is more important are the visits—and the statements that arose out of those visits—by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture. They were like Caesar. They went; I do not know what they saw; and they made speeches. Reluctantly they admitted that there was something wrong. As an example, the Minister of Agriculture, speaking in Edmonton, had this to say. He admitted there was something wrong but he said, "I have the answer but it is not cash advances. We need a million more people". He said that we need a greater population because we need industry but he said that we cannot get industry until we get a dam on the south Saskatchewan river. I hope the farmers of western Canada are not obliged to wait that long before some further purchasing power is returned to them.

Then we had the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he spoke to the Alberta wheat pool convention in Calgary. After making a prolonged speech he said in effect at the very end: "Farmers of western Canada, take courage. Next year you might have a crop failure." The upshot of it all was simply this. In spite of all the representations that had been made by the business and farm leaders in western Canada after they had considered every angle of this situation and had come out in favour of cash advances, this is what happened. Instead of listening to them and taking their considered advice, this government took the advice of a sprinkling of Liberal stooges within these organizations rather than the considered opinion of these people who truly represent the farmers and the business men of western Canada.

Then when this legislation was being proposed; when we knew that this was what we were going to get; when we knew that the government as going to reintroduce the 1951 legislation which is sometimes referred to as the agricultural interim financing act, we had once again another series of meetings, this time protesting the so-called bank legislation which was being introduced. I was greatly surprised and not a little shocked the other day when I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce say to the members of the House of Commons that the business men in western Canada were carrying on some kind of conspiracy against the farmers. He said, "My, how they would like to get their hands on this money!" In other words, he was casting doubt as to the motives of business men. That is a typical Liberal trick. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce is obliged to defend this legislation by using tactics of this kind—tactics that we would expect to come from a Liberal back bencher —it is fairly evident to me that this resolution, in so far as any merit it may have, is as barren as a mule.

After all, why should not the business men in western Canada be concerned that the purchasing power of the farmers should be restored? We know that the future prosperity and the future existence of business people scattered throughout the towns of western Canada are dependent on the prosperity of the farmer. By the same token, the farmer is just as dependent on the business man. In western Canada today—as has been stated here in this chamber today—we find the business man carrying a terrific burden of debt and carrying a great many farmers because he knows that their interests are mutual. Hence when we have statements made in this chamber that a conspiracy is going on and that the end result in all probability will be the end of the wheat board, I think that is ridiculous. I think there is a conspiracy all right, but the Minister of Trade and Commerce has named the wrong people. I would make this statement. I believe that there is going on in this country a conspiracy to wreck the wheat board and that it is being spearheaded by this Liberal government in co-operation with the Winnipeg grain exchange. I am convinced—as are a great many other people—that the marketing policies being advocated and carried out by this government have done more to undermine the farmers' confidence in the wheat board than have all these other things to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred. We are now confronted with this same legislation which proved to be so ineffective in 1951. Certainly assistance was needed then as the minister pointed out today in his speech. But in spite of the fact that it was needed only $626,000 out of $20 million that was guaranteed to the banks was used not because people did not need it, but for the very simple reason that they could not get it.

What is the condition of affairs today? We are in much greater need of money today than we were in 1951. In my province the cash farm income in the first 10 months of 1951 amounted to $631 million. What is it today? In the first 10 months of 1955, the cash farm income in the province of Saskatchewan was only $283 million. Of course, if you add the $21 million that was paid out in P.F.A.A. benefits, which should have been paid out the year before, then it brings it up to about $305 million, which is only half of what it was in 1951.

Let us take a look at the principle of this bill. Let us take a look at the mechanics provided for implementing the principle of this bill. Well, it is wrong on both counts. Mechanically, it is impossible to implement the provisions of this bill, and in principle it is wrong because it has no morality in it. If a comprehensive statement were to be made incorporating all the views protesting bank loans, I am sure such a statement would clearly indicate that it is a disgrace and an insult to ask farmers to pay interest on loans against their production when they have no responsibility whatever for the inadequacy of marketing policies which apparently make it impossible to sell our grain in the markets of the world. What I have said is, in substance, the preamble of a resolution presented by the federated co-operatives to this government, an organization that speaks for 150,000 farmers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. They came out flatfooted and asked for interest-free cash advances on farm stored grain.

I have often wondered, Mr. Chairman, what would happen if at the end of a week a worker in any other industry went to the boss and said, "I want my week's pay". The man at the wicket saying "I am sorry but we did not sell as much of the products you produced last week and we cannot pay you, but I tell you what we have done. We have made arrangements with the banker on the corner and if you can answer the questions he is going to ask you about your business and provide the necessary security he might consider giving you part of your wages but you will have to pay 5 per cent." I leave it to the imagination of members in this house as to what would happen. The worst feature of all is the fact that the farmers, after working all year and after producing what is after all the basic wealth of this country, have now to go cap in hand to the bank and ask for a loan. After expending their labour, after expending their capital, they now have to go cap in hand and ask for a loan.

Those are the arguments, Mr. Chairman, against bank loans. Those are the arguments in favour of cash advances. What about the practicability of implementing this measure? As was said this morning, there are only 350 chartered banks in the whole province of Saskatchewan. I imagine the same condition prevails in other provinces as well. There are just as many farmers who never bother with a bank as there are who do business with the bank. The banker is in an impossible position. I should like to point this out, Mr. Chairman. I have talked to a good many bankers in my constituency and I have yet to have one of them tell me that he has made a single loan with grain and nothing more as security. The form the farmer is asked to fill out is not the only form he is asked to sign. The banker is in an untenable position.

What is he going to do? I will tell you what he is going to do. He is going to go to the elevator agent, as many bankers are doing, and hold a conference with the elevator agent concerning the circumstances surrounding a man's farming operations before he can honestly make a loan. That is what is happening. What then is the bank doing for the 5 per cent interest? I am not even sure they are providing the form which the farmer is asked to fill out. They do not even have to collect the money. That is the argument that was used against cash advances, and why the government said cash advances were not feasible. The elevator agent should not be loaded with the responsibility of carrying out the provisions that would be necessary, yet today we find the elevator agent is doing the very thing the government said he could no do.

I should like to read into the record the provisions for repayment. I will only read part of it. Two tickets have to be made out. The first ticket, that is to the producer, should show the details of delivery and the deduction of one-half of the net proceeds payable to the bank. The second ticket, for the remaining half of the net proceeds, should be made payable to the lending bank and should be forwarded to the bank. The elevator agents in effect are now being used as the collecting agency for the chartered banks, and at no remuneration from the bank.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock?

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWE (PORT ARTHUR)—HARVARD TRAINING AIRCRAFT FOR EGYPT—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a misstatement I made through carelessness. I am reminded by a question addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this morning that on January 4 I referred to an order in council which conveyed approval of the shipment of Harvard training aircraft to the Middle East. I had in mind that orders in council were required for every export shipment, but that is not the case. They are required only in case government property is concerned. In the case of an export permit relating to private property, if it has anything to do with military affairs or if it is going to a sensitive area, ministerial concurrence is required by the ministers of external affairs, defence and trade and commerce.

The sale of the Harvard aircraft was a private transaction. No government property was involved. There are minutes of the concurrence by the three ministers but there was no order in council. I wish to make that clear because I not only misled the members of the house but I misled the Prime Minister. My officers have since pointed out the incorrectness of the statement that I made to the house.

Mr. Green: Could the minister say on what dates the approvals were given by the respective ministers?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): On the 7th July, 1955.

Mr. Green: By all three ministers?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister would also wish to correct his statement as to the date on which he made the misstatement? We were not sitting on January 4.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): January 24.

Mr. Rowe: You are only 20 days out; that is not too bad.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My memory is not as good as it was when I was 20 years younger.

Small Loans Act

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR A REDUCTION IN RATE OF INTEREST

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Small Loans Act.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Bill No. 3 dealing with the proposed amendment to the Small Loans Act and to express first of all my disappointment that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance saw fit to adjourn the debate yesterday. One of the reasons given for doing so was the fact that the government is bringing forth some legislation along similar lines during the present session. However, I would remind the house that this bill was placed on the order paper last year by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I feel that a great deal of worthwhile discussion can result in a clarification of the issues before this house with respect to this legislation. The fact that the government has announced its intention to bring in legislation on this subject is in no way a guarantee that we are going to have the type of legislation which we want at this time.

I think there is no need to stress the importance of this matter in Canada today. The hon. member for Assiniboia reminded us yesterday that the amount of credit in this country has more than doubled in the past four years and that according to recent figures the amount of debt in Canada is well in excess of $2 billion.

The high interest rates charged by the small loan companies, of course, bear most heavily on the low income groups in Canada. It is quite obvious that wealthy individuals can pay cash for their purchases and if they find themselves short of cash at any given time they are able to go to the banks and borrow money at one-quarter the amount of interest charged by the small loan companies. Therefore, when we discuss this bill we are discussing a matter that comes very close to the small wage earner in this country.

I think we should for a moment examine briefly the various factors entering into the establishing of interest rates in Canada. Quite apart from the ordinary costs of doing business the profits of the loan companies play a very large part in this matter. Figures were placed on the record yesterday which showed that there had been an increase of over 1,000 per cent in the profits of companies doing business during recent years and certainly the small loan companies cannot argue that a reduction in the interest rate is going to force them out of business.

The small loan field is a most lucrative one and we need only listen to the commercials which they sponsor on the radio encouraging people to borrow money from "a friendly finance company" to find an indication of the great amount of effort the small loan companies exert in order to attract business. In other words, it is not a case of their doing an individual a personal favour. They spend lots of money in advertising designed to persuade people to take out loans for the obvious reason that lending money is a profitable business. Any suggestion that there might be a curtailment of credit owing to the revision of the interest act is certainly not valid.

The question of risk is another matter which we should examine closely. The inference is left that the excessive or exorbitant rates charged by small loan companies compensate for the vast amount of risk they undertake in lending money. The very fact that the small loan companies have set aside only ·26 of 1 per cent to cover losses on their operations indicates that the amount of risk involved is not as great as they would have us believe. We know, moreover, that the experience of the Canadian Bank of Commerce in this field leads us to a similar conclusion since they feel that ·25 per cent is quite adequate to cover any losses which they might sustain. As a matter of fact, if one looks more closely at the personal loan plan of the Canadian Bank of Commerce one finds that since the inception of the plan in 1936 until October 31, 1953, the Canadian Bank of Commerce loaned a total of $248,461,909. These figures are contained in the report of the banking and commerce committee of 1954 at page 186. The total loans written off during that period amounted to $380,378 but there was an amount subsequently collected of $157,058 which left a net loss incurred by the personal loan plan of the Canadian Bank of Commerce of $223,320 in the period 1936 to October 31, 1953.

This amounts to less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of all the money loaned during that period by the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Under those circumstances it is difficult to understand why exorbitant interest rates should be charged by the small loan companies in Canada because if one examines the risk element incurred by the Canadian Bank of Commerce and compares it with the risks involved in the small loan company field we find there is very little difference. As a matter of fact, one will recall that prior to 1954 the banks were not permitted by law to back loans by chattel mortgages. We know that on the basis of guarantees and endorsements—and we must consider the fact that a great deal of this money was loaned during the late 1930's, during the time of the depression—the banks suffered an almost negligible loss.

Once again I am going to refer to the 1954 report of the banking and commerce committee. The committee was informed at that time that the total secured loans of the small loan companies as of December 31, 1952, comprised 70·92 per cent of the total loans made and that the unsecured loans totalled 29.08 per cent. Comparable figures for the Canadian Bank of Commerce indicate that the bank had total secured loans of 60·35 per cent and a total of 39·65 per cent unsecured loans. It is quite easy to see that the small loan companies are taking no greater risks than those taken by this chartered bank.

Under these circumstances it is extremely difficult to understand why the small loan companies in this country should be permitted to charge such excessive rates of interest. I am concerned with the effect that the lowering of interest rates for small loan companies would have on consumer finance generally throughout the country. Perhaps more goods are financed or purchased on instalments, the purchases being financed by the firms involved; but as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) pointed out yesterday, these rates are even more excessive.

We are told of 54 per cent being charged by a large mail order house. When I heard that figure given I found it difficult to believe that that much interest could be charged, but I turned to the catalogue of a leading mail order house—whether it is Simpsons-Sears or Eaton's does not matter—and according to the table published there I find that if you buy a $20 item to be paid for at the rate of $5 per month for four months there will be a carrying charge of $2.25.

The only way to arrive at the proper rate of interest in that case is to consider the transaction as a series of $5 loans to be repaid at monthly intervals. Thus we find that at the end of the first month the purchaser pays $5; in other words, he has had the use of $5 for one month. At the end of the second month he pays another $5 and in that instance he has had the use of that $5 for two months; at the end of the third month he pays another $5 and he has had the use of that $5 for three months. When he repays the loan with the fourth $5 payment at the end of the fourth month he has had the use of that last $5 for four months. In reality he has borrowed $5 for ten months, and that figures out at 54 per cent interest being charged by the large mail order houses in this country.

Under those circumstances I think it is quite evident that any general reduction in interest rates in any field will have a beneficial effect upon the rates throughout the whole field of consumer finance. In other words, a reduction in the rates of interest charged by small loan companies will force other consumer credit organizations to make a downward revision in their rates.

But the vicious part of the whole set-up is the fact that the people who can least afford the burden of excessive interest charges are the people who are forced to bear them. Under this iniquitous system it is the small purchaser buying the $20 item who must pay the 54 per cent interest. If he buys a $30 item the interest rate goes down. In other words, the bigger the amount of the purchase the lower the rate of interest.

While I realize that we are not concerned in this bill with the carrying charges of large retail organizations I do suggest that the passage of the bill with the consequent reduction in the interest rates allowed to be charged in the small loans field would of necessity bring a downward revision in the whole field of consumer finance. We have to recognize the fact that credit plays and will play an important part in our economy. There are those who may argue that people should save sufficient money to make these purchases, but I invite hon. members to consider the economic consequences of pursuing that line of reasoning.

I am quite certain that the average merchant in Canada depends to a large extent upon time sales in order to sell his goods. A great many people in the low-income brackets in Canada would never be able to afford what we have come to regard as the amenities of life if they could not buy on time, or else borrow money from small loan companies in order to buy the article outright.

We have no idea of the nature of the legislation the government proposes to bring down, but I think this debate will serve a most useful purpose if hon. members are able to impress upon the government the necessity of bringing about a reduction as outlined in the bill we are now discussing. If we are going to permit the charging of excessive interest rates we must justify our action in the light of the facts. I think I have said enough this afternoon to indicate that neither the profits made by the small loan companies nor the risks involved are justification for charging a rate of 2 per cent per month on the unpaid balance.

I have not heard a cogent argument as yet as to why we should persist in forcing that rate of interest on the people of this country. In the small loans field it is the small wage earner, the little fellow, who borrows, and I think this is one way in which we as a parliament can give some measure of relief to the people who are in greatest need.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this bill is similar to one introduced last session by the same hon. member. I am not going to comment upon it at length as I intend to wait until the government's legislation is before the house. However, I do want to take this opportunity to make certain comments in connection with a meeting called by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in my constituency shortly before the last session of parliament ended, and at which he mentioned the Small Loans Act. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar came to Moose Jaw and held a meeting in our technical school auditorium. He made a number of charges against me, in which I know the house would not be particularly interested. Perhaps I am biased, but I felt that most of them were incorrect. There was one in particular which I should like to mention now. I should like to quote from a report of the meeting which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post as follows:

> Mr. Coldwell cited Thatcher's differences of opinion and said that when the C.C.F. party attempted to introduce measures to reduce the 24 per cent interest charges of small loan companies, to 12 per cent, Mr. Thatcher was directly and emphatically opposed to such a move. He contended, according to Mr. Coldwell, that the loan companies could not operate, and people would not be able to borrow money to buy washing machines and other articles on time.

People who were at the meeting told me that the hon. member went on to intimate that I was vigorously opposing this legislation, because I knew that if it passed I would not be able to sell merchandise from my hardware store.

What are the facts? I wish to say most emphatically—I have Hansard of the debate which took place—that I never commented on this particular bill at any time since I came to parliament. Page 3535 of Hansard of May 6, 1955, shows that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) introduced the bill. It was then spoken to by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and a few days later, by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and a member from British Columbia. There was no vote taken. I say that either the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had a research assistant who did not do his homework thoroughly, and who passed on information which was not correct, or he deliberately misrepresented the facts. If he was guilty of an error, then I would ask him publicly to apologize. If he was not, I say again that he very unfairly misrepresented the facts. This was only one of a number of charges which the hon. member made on that occasion. Later in the session I hope to refute some of the others. I say again that I think the hon. member, in coming to my constituency and taking a meeting when I was not there, should at least have stuck to the facts.

Mr. Speaker: The house will realize that, when the hon. member referred to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and said that he had deliberately misrepresented certain facts or had unfairly made certain statements, I did not intervene, although some hon. members looked in my direction, because he was referring to words that were pronounced outside this house. I wish to state that if the statements referred to had been made in this house and if the hon. member were to use the same language, I would have immediately asked him to withdraw.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sorry if I did not make myself clear. I said that either one of two things must have happened. Either he must have been labouring under a misapprehension, in which case I would ask him publicly to apologize, or he was misrepresenting the facts. It must be one or the other. This is the newspaper clipping. If he has made an error, I would be glad to accept an apology and then the matter can be ended.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): There is an aspect to this proposed legislation that has not yet been touched upon, one which came to light two years ago before the banking and commerce committee. I refer now to the proceedings of that committee as set out on page 1071 of the report of those proceedings on Thursday, April 8, 1954. On that occasion the committee had been discussing the operations of the personal loan department of one of the chartered banks. The general manager of that bank was before the committee as a witness. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked him this question:

> Q. May I ask you if the Canadian Bank of Commerce has been asked to extend loans to small loan companies since going into this operation?

That referred to the personal loan operation. The answer was:

> A. We have small loan companies who borrow from us. On our books we have a number of customers.
> Q. Has this operation affected the business you have done with those small loan companies who were your customers?
> A. Yes.

There was a further question:

The next question was:

Q. Favourably or otherwise?

The general manager made this reply:

A. We have lost some accounts.

That particular exchange at that time brought to my attention—though I suppose it should not have been necessary—one aspect of the operations of these small loan companies that had not occurred to me, and that is that they are in effect retailers of a commodity that is wholesaled to them by the chartered banks: the commodity of credit. If we are to assume, as I think we have the right to assume, that these companies in all probability obtain their funds from the chartered banks at between five and six per cent or possibly at a much smaller percentage, and in return retail them at rates approaching 24 per cent, we see that the mark-up on this commodity is in the neighbourhood of 400 per cent.

I suggest that we should look very carefully into this situation. The chartered banking system of Canada holds a position in our economy that is perhaps unrivalled by the banking system of any other country. It has complete control of the operations of our commercial banking system. It has explicit and implicit protection and support from the government, and the experience of one of the chartered banks in entering into this very necessary field would seem to me to indicate that it is a field in which the chartered banks should be encouraged to enter more readily than they have done in the past.

I was particularly interested two years ago when Mr. Neil J. McKinnon of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, in making his presentation in support of the request for an amendment to permit the taking of chattel mortgages, said that at the outset of their operations in the personal loan department they had required the signatures of two guarantors for every loan. Later this was reduced to one endorser, and in recent years 40 per cent of their loans had been made without any endorsation or guarantee whatever. This would indicate that this business is a comparatively safe one for the banks to engage in. I believe we should give encouragement to the banks already officially and openly in the business and also encourage the other chartered banks to follow suit. I know of no better way to do that than to reduce the enormous mark-up, as I have described it, now charged by the private loan companies on the funds they receive from the chartered banks for their business purposes.

Admittedly, the operations of this particular bank in the personal loan field have not been as extensive as one might have wished and have not been as extensive, I rather gather, as the general manager himself would have wished. During the hearings of the banking and commerce committee, I had a suspicion in my mind that there had been, if not opposition, at least rather lukewarm support for this program on the part of the bank directors, because the general manager informed us he was not at all satisfied with the extent to which they had advertised this particular service. I myself remarked that I was surprised to hear of it, as I had been a customer of that bank for a number of years and I myself had never come across any advertising or any literature on the subject of their personal loan department. It was in reply to that comment Mr. McKinnon admitted that they had been in his opinion far too conservative in their program of advertising.

I think we have in this country a banking system of sufficient size, sufficient diversity and sufficient flexibility to enable it to undertake this very necessary function for the Canadian people. I would feel much happier if I knew that those who are in need of immediate short-term financial help on a small scale were able to go to the chartered banks rather than to these organizations, which presumably are quite financially sound, but which, on the other hand, are springing up all over the country and by means of their exorbitant interest rates are putting shackles around the necks of too many of our people today. So it is with great emphasis that I voice my support for this long overdue piece of legislation.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, there is one idea I should like to advance, and I think only one. My hon. friend from Assiniboia has already covered the purpose of the bill. He has stated that the object of this bill is to reduce the maximum rate that may be charged by small loan companies from 24 per cent to 12 per cent.

My idea relates to the methods of advertising. In some cases they are nothing short of dishonest and vicious—and those are two words that for me are rather strong. I would point out that in the case of the wrapping of bacon we made it illegal—the Minister of Justice will probably correct me here, but at any rate there was an understanding that those people would no longer wrap their bacon, fat or otherwise, in red tinted wrapping paper. That restriction has become effective. It is a case of what I call dishonest advertising. If that was one then certainly here is another. As a matter of fact, I do not think I would characterize the sample I have in my hand in that way. This one is pretty decent compared with most. In fact it is rather pleasant and at the same time pathetic. It takes the form of a nice little Christmas wrapper, and everything is sweetness and light. There is the picture of a little girl cuddling her doll in front of a brightly lit Christmas tree, and they say in the advertisement:

> The holiday season brings added happiness to young and old alike, but at the same time it is the season when many of us find ourselves short of cash because of extra expenses.

To state it briefly, if I had been introducing this private bill or if I were to introduce another one I would say that anyone whose business is the lending of money should be compelled to state the rate of interest per annum in his advertisement and I emphasize the words "per annum." That is the crux of the whole matter because the people who use these small loan companies, the people who get into these little financial jams, the people to whom this sort of pleasant thing appeals, are people who are not customarily very adroit in the matter of calculating the amount of interest per annum. Very often they have their backs to the wall. To use a colloquialism, they are in a jam and they have to do something about it immediately.

Perhaps if they knew what the rate of interest was they would take the money anyway in some cases, but I think the rate of interest per annum should be clearly stated. I have taken one example from this comparatively harmless table. For instance, they say that you can get $1,000 in cash by agreeing to repay $93.11 per month over a period of 12 months. That is all it says. You get $1,000 in cash and you repay $93.11 per month for 12 months. If I am correct in my calculations, at the end of the year you have paid back $1,117.32. That means that for the use of the $1,000 over the period—there is the catch, of course; what is the period—you pay $117.32. If you divide by 10 you are paying $11.73 for the use of $100.

I am quite sure that many people who have used such loans would say when approached that they had paid 11.73 per cent for the use of the money. But how does it work out? First of all you have to repay something every month. You have to pay back one-twelfth of the loan every month and so you actually only have the whole $1,000 for one month. Then over the next 11 months the amount of the loan diminishes by something less than $90 each month until you come to the final month when you have scarcely any of the company's money at all. Nevertheless in the final month you are still paying the same amount, not rate, of interest as you paid in the first month.

Therefore when I said that the matter of the period is all-important I meant just that. The situation can be put in two ways. You can say that you have the use of $1,000 for six months or you can say that you have the use of half of the money, $500, for the 12 month period. I just made a rough calculation when the debate started, but I think I am perfectly safe in saying that the interest rate is well over 20 per cent and probably approaches the legal limit of 24 per cent.

Mr. Michener: It is 22·3.

Mr. Knight: Thank you very much. We have a mathematician in the house. At any rate, I think I have made my point. I believe that most of this advertising—whether this particular one is included I do not know—is, I say advisedly, a deliberate misrepresentation of the actual facts. I hope that something will be included in the government legislation along the lines I have indicated. Let us face it that many of these people are ignorant and in a particular financial crisis they will turn to anyone who will provide them with some money. I say that the government or somebody should protect them against themselves. I do not say that anyone in the business of lending money should be compelled to advertise, but if he wants to advertise setting forth the amount to be paid back over a certain period and so on, then I say that he should be compelled by law to state the amount of interest per annum, and I put the emphasis on the last two words, "per annum."

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the government very much for proposing to take some action in this very difficult matter. Those who were members of the banking and commerce committee will recall that this matter came before the committee when we met at the last session to amend the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act. Of course the members of the banking and commerce committee were very interested in the subject because of various reasons with which they are as familiar as the members who have spoken. They were particularly interested in what the Canadian Bank of Commerce was doing in the matter.

However, there was a feeling in the committee revising the Bank Act that it might be unwise, when they were dealing with the revision of that act, to pass any legislation which would in any way interfere with the maximum limit the banks can charge under the Bank Act, namely, 6 per cent per annum. There was the thought that the Canadian Bank of Commerce was doing a real public service in supplying money to borrowers of small loans at a cheaper rate than the small loan companies. There was some question as to why the other banks were not entering the field more and what could be done to assist them to enter the field in a bigger way.

As I remember it, it was finally decided that it would be unwise for us to change the maximum limit in the Bank Act from 6 per cent in order to encourage the making of these small loans by other banks because it was so hard to define a small loan, and if we lifted the maximum amount of 6 per cent the question would then arise as to how you would prevent loans now being made by the banks at 6 per cent at a higher rate than 6 per cent under any new provision that might be included in the legislation. In other words unless you could define a small loan so that a whole lot of loans made today at 6 per cent would not be made at the higher rate, then in trying to solve the problem you might bring about the result that more people would have to pay more interest than they were paying before.

I do not think anybody in the banking and commerce committee felt that any really satisfactory conclusion had been reached. It was realized that the Canadian Bank of Commerce in receiving an effective rate of interest of 10·46 per cent was, in the opinion of some lawyers, infringing on the Bank Act which sets the maximum rate a bank can collect at 6 per cent. The Canadian Bank of Commerce had received a legal opinion which indicated they had the right to operate as they were doing and they were going ahead with that business, but apparently the other banks would not enter the field unless there was some change in the Bank Act to put it beyond doubt that they had a right to charge more than the 6 per cent set out in that act.

As I have stated, the banking and commerce committee were a little bit nervous about tampering with the maximum rate and I do not think anybody really suggested that the maximum rate in the Bank Act should be changed. The Canadian Bank of Commerce was asked if they could suggest an amendment that would prevent loans being made—loans that today are being made at 6 per cent—at a higher rate of interest than 6 per cent and restricted to strictly personal loans. I think they brought in a suggested amendment but one which I believe did not satisfy any member of the banking and commerce committee. I should say I think most of the members of the committee felt really appreciative of the attitude of the Canadian Bank of Commerce because they were persisting in staying in this field which they had entered about 18 years ago and were providing money to borrowers at less than 12 per cent a year. I expect that it is the attitude of the government to ask some committee either here or in the Senate to go into this matter. It is such a complicated matter that I would not want to express any definite opinion on it in case it is referred to our banking and commerce committee of which I am a member.

When the first small loan bills came before this house—I think it was in 1937—to authorize a rate of 2 per cent per month being charged, I opposed those bills strongly. Then evidence was brought in indicating that if you do not provide a legal way by which borrowers of small amounts can get money at 2 per cent interest, you will find that they are resorting to lenders who are not under any control whatever and who will charge more. That is the argument that was used. Finally it was accepted by the banking and commerce committee and these bills finally went through after they had been before the banking and commerce committee for two sessions.

As I say, this question again came before the banking and commerce committee last year. I think it would perhaps be useful to read the comment or the summing up of the Canadian Bank of Commerce in the matter because it is something in which I think all hon. members are greatly interested and are much concerned about, namely that persons having to borrow small sums of money should not be obliged to pay exorbitant rates for it. This comment by the Canadian Bank of Commerce in their brief indicates some of the difficulties involved in the matter. As I say, I want to commend the government for introducing legislation so that something can be done about it if it is at all possible.

I am reading from page 822 of the proceedings of the standing committee of the House of Commons on banking and commerce. This is from the brief of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Before I read that comment I might say that the members of the committee were greatly interested in the brief because it made an examination of the small loan companies' operations and compared them with their own. An examination of their earnings and costs—that is of the personal loan plan of the Canadian Bank of Commerce—shows, as I have said, that total earnings were at the rate of 10·46 per cent upon loans outstanding; that their salaries amounted to 2·77 per cent on loans outstanding; that their advertising amounted to 0·15 per cent on loans outstanding, an extremely small amount; and that other expense, including salary costs and other expenses at branches, amounted to 3·25 per cent on loans outstanding; and that the cost of funds was 2·05 per cent. In other words, the Canadian Bank of Commerce was providing funds for the small loans branch of their activities for 2·05 per cent. This fact indicates that they were not charging a large amount of interest for the use of those funds. In commenting on this matter here is what they said at page 819. They say:

These comparisons—

That is with the small loan companies.

—are made not to offer any commentary on the operations of the small loan companies, which have obviously filled a public need in a high-cost field. The comparisons do indicate, however, that extreme economy in operations has been necessary under the personal loan plan.

That is the bank plan.

During the past 18 years the annual operating results of the personal loan plan showed a loss in each of five years and a net profit of less than $50,000 in each of six years.

That is the situation although the bank was charging an effective rate of 10·46 per cent and was getting its money for 2·05 per cent. The brief goes on to say this:

It is apparent that if expenses in the personal loan department had not been restricted to a low level compared with the small loan companies the department would have operated at a heavy loss throughout the period.

In other words the bank suggests that if they had not held down expenses to the very minimum in that branch of the bank's operations, they would have had a heavy loss throughout. They sum the whole situation up in this way, and I put it before hon. members because I think all hon. members are greatly interested in this matter and that they might well consider the opinion of this expert in the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Here is what he said:

As the personal loan plan offers facilities to the public similar to the small loan companies, but at much lower cost, it is natural to seek reasons for its failure to show greater growth. There is no single answer but the following observations suggest an explanation:

1. The small loan companies by taking chattel mortgage security do not need to require endorsers or guarantors. This enables borrowers to preserve greater privacy about their affairs.

We provided for chattel mortgages being taken, so that observation should not apply any more, as I understand the amendment we made to the Bank Act. The second reason was this:

2. The relatively low level of earnings under the personal loan plan has not permitted or warranted adequate advertising. For example, advertising costs of the personal loan plan in 1951 and 1952 totalled $10,679 while the outlays of the small loan companies totalled $1,360,775.

[Mr. Tucker.]

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note that the Canadian Bank of Commerce apparently found that, although they were advancing money at less than half the cost to the borrower compared with what was charged by the small loan company, they did not get any great amount or proportion of the business and they attribute one of the reasons to the power of advertising. They said that their charges were so low that they were able to spend in two years only slightly over $10,000 while during the same time the small loan companies spent $1,360,000. It shows the power of advertising. Even although the small loan companies were charging twice what the bank was charging, that was the situation. I think there is a great deal in what was said by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) with regard to these people doing the kind of advertising they do at the cost of the borrower. Their third observation is as follows:

3. Part of the reason for the low level of advertising expenditure, however, derives from policy. During the period of voluntary credit restriction of 1951/1952 and in earlier years of full employment the bank did not seek to expand personal loan volume, believing that this was not, at that time, in the public interest. It is doubtful, however, whether this had much effect other than to permit a larger volume of loans to go to the small loan companies.

In other words, as I understand it, the bank is saying there that they did not think it was in the public interest to try to press these small loans at that time. But they seemed to think that because they did not do so it meant that more went to the small loan companies.

4. The element of cost is probably not a significant consideration in the minds of the majority of small loan borrowers.

Here is the opinion of the Canadian Bank of Commerce after being 18 years in this business. In their opinion, the element of cost is probably not a significant consideration in the minds of the majority of small loan borrowers. I must admit that that to me was a most surprising thing because surely most people do not like to pay an effective rate of 24 per cent if they could get the money for 10 per cent or less. However, this is the opinion of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Apparently good advertising can overcome the desire of people to get a good bargain.

The Canadian Bank of Commerce then winds up its statement like this:

The personal loan plan of the Canadian Bank of Commerce was created to provide a necessary service to the public at the lowest cost consistent with an economic operation; its methods of operation must, of course, conform with legal opinions upon which the scale of charges is based.

I would point out to the members that the actual situation in regard to the Canadian Bank of Commerce is that it had a net profit, after income tax, on loans outstanding of ·77 per cent. In other words, they did not earn a profit of even 1 per cent on loans outstanding.

Then, they said: they could not afford to advertise. They said they could not charge any more than they were because the base of the charge was regulated by the Bank Act. They took it that act permitted them to take a discount of 6 per cent ahead of time, but they could not go beyond that. They were definitely limited by the Bank Act as to what they could do. They said:

> —its methods of operation must, of course, conform with legal opinions upon which the scale of charges is based. As previously mentioned, the present basis is not sufficient to permit the necessary publicity and development in rendering service of greatest breadth, but it is not suggested that a scale of charges approaching the level sanctioned under the Small Loans Act should be considered. Experience has shown that the personal loan plan of the Canadian Bank of Commerce can provide an effective service at lower rates and it has also shown that authority to take security in the form of chattel mortgages is a necessary condition to the providing of comprehensive personal loan facilities.

The bank suggested, as I understood them, that the personal loan plan should apply to loans up to $3,000 or $3,500. If I may summarize in my own words what I understood this brief to say, it was that if there were some change in the law to enable them to charge something more than this 10·6 per cent, then they could extend these services to a greater extent than they had heretofore. But they made it very plain that they were not asking for a rate of charges similar to those in the Small Loans Act. The banking and commerce committee found this brief of the Canadian Bank of Commerce very intriguing, and I think believed it to be the basis upon which a further investigation should be carried out as to the way in which the banks of this country could be asked, as a public service, to enter this field. After all, the banks do get very valuable rights from this parliament. At the same time, in opening this field today, they felt we should not in any way change the limit of 6 per cent on ordinary loans.

I believe all members of the house, and particularly the members of the banking and commerce committee, will agree with me that this is a very difficult problem and one upon which we were justified in not embarking in connection with our study and revision of the Bank Act. At the time I felt this brief did lay down a foundation upon which an investigation could be made to ascertain what use could be made of the bank facilities in this country to ensure that borrowers of small amounts of money would not have to pay 24 per cent interest. I believe all members will agree that all the banks should be expected to render this service to small borrowers as part of the public service they should render in connection with the grant of their charters. At the same time, nothing should be done to interfere with the maximum amount of interest that can be charged on ordinary loans.

This is not an easy problem to solve. Certainly it is one which I think the members of this house will be glad to have an opportunity to study. My own feeling when the motion was made yesterday to adjourn this debate was that it was the thought of the parliamentary assistant (Mr. Benidickson) to the Minister of Finance that it might be a good thing if a careful study of what had happened in the past were made before various members committed themselves too definitely; that if we obtained advice from experts in this field we would not appear to be pre-judging the matter before it did come before us. It was for that reason I supported the parliamentary assistant. I believe everybody will agree this is a difficult and complicated matter. When the government has promised to introduce a bill covering the matter, I think most members of the house will want to be sure they give it the fullest possible study and get the best possible advice, in order to make sure that the course embarked upon is in the best interests of the small borrowers in this country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise only for the purpose of making a few comments on the remarks made earlier by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher). I am grateful to my hon. friend for staying in the house because I indicated to him that I would be making these comments and that I would rather make them in his presence.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre quoted from a dispatch, I believe it was in an issue of the Regina Leader-Post, in which it was stated, and I quote:

> Mr. Coldwell cited Thatcher's differences of opinion and said that when the C.C.F. party attempted to introduce measures to reduce the 24 per cent interest charges of small loan companies to 12 per cent, Mr. Thatcher was directly and emphatically opposed to such a move.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre then went on to cite Hansard as proof of the fact he did not oppose such a proposition on the floor of this house.

I think hon. members will readily see the error into which the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has fallen. My leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), whose integrity needs no defence in this house or in this country, did not say that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre opposed this proposition on the floor of the house. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre was opposed to our introducing a measure such as this. Obviously, the opposition to which my leader had referred was not expressed in the house but was expressed somewhere else.

On motion of Mr. Regier the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following questions, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

APPLICATIONS FOR LOANS ON GRAIN

Question No. 12—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bank loans on farm-stored grain subject to government guarantees have been applied for in each province, week by week, since the inception of the plan in November last?
2. Of the said applications, how many have been turned down or refused?
3. What is the total amount loaned in each province to date?

WHEAT—TRADE COMMISSIONERS

Question No. 44—Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. How many trade commissioners or other personnel has Canada in foreign countries whose exclusive duty it is to sell wheat?
2. What are the names of these people and in what countries do they work?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. Canada has 85 trade commissioners stationed at 54 posts abroad. While none of these is exclusively concerned with the sale of wheat, all devote a considerable portion of their time to this subject. Trade commissioners with special training in Canadian agriculture are located at centres where the marketing of our agricultural products is of major importance. Every wheat and flour market throughout the world is served by a Canadian trade commissioner.

In addition, the Canadian wheat board maintains its own offices in London and Washington. Canadian wheat board representatives regularly visit all of Canada's major markets for grain.

2. Attached is a list of the Canadian foreign trade service containing the names and addresses of Canadian trade commissioners located in foreign countries. The Canadian wheat board representative in London is Mr. J. B. Lawrie, 1 North Court, Great Peter street, London, England, and in Washington is Mr. C. C. Boxer, Canadian Embassy, Washington, D.C.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 30, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

Motion No. 5—Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence with the government of Saskatchewan since the 1st day of July, 1955, regarding the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project together with any reports of engineers or other investigations as to the feasibility of this project.

Motion agreed to.

P.F.R.A. AND P.F.A.A. OFFICIALS

Motion No. 10—Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a return showing a list of all the P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A. officials or field officers with their respective postal or home address, salaries and expenses paid to each of them during the year 1955.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to this being brought down but I should like to point out that the inclusion of the word "salaries" would limit the number of items to be brought down. I imagine that the hon. member wants particulars in all cases, including those who are on day rates.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed to, subject to the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

CASH ADVANCES ON FARM-STORED GRAIN

Motion No. 12—Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all resolutions supporting the demand for cash advances on farm-stored wheat which have been received from western farm organizations and other public bodies, by the Prime Minister and any of the ministers of the government, or officials of the government, since the 15th day of August, 1955.

Mr. Dickey: This motion is in almost exactly the same terms as the motion which was passed last week in the name of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I wonder if the hon. member could let it stand? I should like to have a word with him about it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Subject to an alteration in part, to cover additional information.

Mr. Dickey: That is what I would like to discuss with the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

PENSION ACT—TABLE OF DISABILITIES

Motion No. 16—Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of the table of disabilities used as a basis for assessing war disabilities in connection with the awarding of war disability pensions under the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Motion No. 17—Mr. Robichaud:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick, since January 1, 1953, with respect to trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works, I would ask that this motion be accepted subject to the reservation that the government of New Brunswick be informed.

Mr. Speaker: Motion agreed to, subject to the reservation made by the Secretary of State.

Motion agreed to.

BRISTOL AIRCRAFT, LTD.—LAY-OFFS

Motion No. 18—Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all communications received by any federal cabinet minister, dated at any time since December 1, 1955, with reference to lay-offs at Bristol Aircraft, Limited, at Winnipeg, and for a copy of all replies thereto.

Mr. Dickey: In the absence of the Minister of Defence Production, I would ask the hon. member to permit this to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

RESEARCH

PROPOSED COMMITTEE TO PROMOTE AND ACCELERATE ACTIVITY

On the order:

Notice of motion: Mr. Murphy (Lambton West)—The following proposed resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of setting up a special committee representative of all parties, with power to call witnesses and send for documents and papers for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the advisability of providing inducements to promote and accelerate activities in the field of research.

Mr. Speaker: I may have to set aside this motion, pursuant to the provisions of the rule of anticipation.

Proposed Committee on Research

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Before Your Honour makes a ruling, I wonder if I might mention that my motion was on Votes and Proceedings the first day the house was in session this year and appeared on the orders of the day, as is the usual custom, on the second day. I anticipate what Your Honour is going to say. I should like to point out that my motion was made in two previous years. In consequence of the assurance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce last year that a committee would be set up, I withdrew my motion from the order paper. In the previous year, 1954, I had the same motion on the order paper, and it just so happened—as these things so happen—that when my motion was supposed to have been called, another motion which we expected was not going to be called was called, and the government supporters took good care that the last day for private members' motions was taken up completely. I was sabotaged in 1954 and scuttled in 1955. This time I want some assurance that that committee is going to be set up, and I feel justified in asking that we proceed.

Mr. Speaker: I sympathize very much with the position that the hon. member is taking and I would like to point out to him that by invoking the rule of anticipation I refer him to Campion's book of introduction to the procedure of the House of Commons. It is said, at the end of the first paragraph on page 178:

> The abuse of blocking motions is obviated by the direction given to the Speaker to have regard to the probability of the matter anticipated being brought before the house within a reasonable time.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, will you permit—

Mr. Speaker: Yes, as soon as I am through. If there would be a chance that the government order be not called for debate at all during the present session or within a reasonable time, I would certainly allow the hon. member to proceed, but I would imagine that if a notice of motion by the government has been made a government order as recently, I believe, as the last sitting day, it has been placed there with the intention of having it proceeded with and again I say that if I were sure it would not be proceeded with within a reasonable time—I would imagine within a month or so—I would certainly let the hon. member proceed. Is there any assurance given that the government order regarding the setting up of this committee will be proceeded with?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this notice of motion was put on the order paper with the intention of disposing of it as expeditiously as the business of the house will permit. It is intended to have the committee provided for by this item, No. 35, constituted at as early a date as the business of the house will permit so that it can get on and proceed with the matters that are provided for in the notice of motion.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) goes some way, I think, to substantiate or support a ruling along the lines of that which I understand Your Honour has in mind. I think, however, there are one or two other observations which should be made. The citation which I think is applicable in this case is citation 182 of Beauchesne's third edition dealing with the question of anticipation.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be good enough to repeat the number of the citation? I did not hear it.

Mr. Fulton: It is citation No. 182 found at page 79 of Beauchesne's third edition which I think reproduces the paragraph from Campion which Your Honour has just referred us to.

As I said, I think there are a couple of points which should be decided before that citation is applied to its full extent. Obviously the rule against anticipation should not be invoked with respect to two motions which are different in substance, and I suggest to Your Honour that there are sufficient differences between these two motions to raise a doubt as to whether in fact the one anticipates the other. That is, the motion of the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) calls for the setting up of a committee to inquire into the field of research generally and it would also give that committee specific powers, the most important power being that of calling for witnesses and sending for documents and papers. That provision is conspicuously omitted from the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Furthermore, the motion of the minister is confined to the field of non-military research. I do not find any such restriction in the motion of the hon. member for Lambton West, so there are, I submit, very substantial and important differences between the two motions sufficient to raise a real question as to whether the one does anticipate the other.

The other point that I think it is important to have settled quite conclusively is this, Mr. Speaker. I am quite sure that you and all hon. members would agree with me when I say that the rule against anticipation was not intended to be used—and should not be so used—to give the government, whatever government it might be, the opportunity to block discussion of a private member's motion which chronologically anticipated the government's notice of motion simply by placing on the order paper a motion in similar terms and then not proceeding with it. That is what happened last year.

I looked up the record, and I would refer Your Honour to page 1353 of Hansard of last year where the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) withdrew his motion on the basis of a previous assurance from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that the government intended to set up and proceed with a committee on research. The government did not proceed with its motion that year.

As I say, I think some regard must be had for the chronological order in which these motions appear on the order paper. Otherwise the broad application of the principle we are now discussing would enable the government effectively to block discussion by the simple device of placing a motion on the order paper and then not proceeding with it.

I recognize that to a considerable extent we have had an assurance from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today, but with all deference to yourself and to the right hon. gentleman I suggest that we should have the most absolute assurance that the government will in fact proceed at this session with the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, not merely that it is the present intention of the government to do so. For my part I would hope that Your Honour would give effect to the first point I made, namely that these motions are different in substance and that therefore one does not anticipate the other. But should Your Honour disagree with me on that point I think it is proper to ask that Your Honour should obtain from the Prime Minister the most specific assurance on the other point, namely that the government will proceed with this other motion at this session before you apply the rule against anticipation.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I supplement the submission made to you by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I point out that the resolution moved by the hon. member for Lambton West sets out as the purpose of this committee the "examining and reporting upon the advisability of providing inducements to promote and accelerate activities in the field of research." For example, that resolution is worded broadly enough to cover inducements in the way of reduction of taxation or allowances of one kind or another for money spent in research activity. The motion has to do primarily with research by industrial concerns. On the other hand, the notice of motion given by the government deals with research in so far as the national research council is concerned. The wording is: "operations of the national research council". That was what was done by a committee which was set up some years ago. They dealt with the work of the national research council. Obviously the intention of the government's motion is to deal primarily with the atomic energy field, and that matter is referred to in rather wide terms, and then to deal with the national research council; whereas what the hon. member for Lambton West is proposing is something entirely different. He is referring not so much to the national research council as to research in industry. Under those conditions I submit that it would be unfair to rule out his motion.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): There is one further matter, Mr. Speaker, to which I should like to refer and it is this. In the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the essential words are:

> . . . to examine into the role of government—

Those are the essential words.

> —in the field of non-military research in Canada, including:
> (a) operations in the field of atomic energy,
> (b) operations of the national research council.

The motion of the hon. member for Lambton West in no way covers the role of government except indirectly. The motion of the hon. member for Lambton West has to do with private industry and research in general. One deals with the role of government, and the other with research in general. I point out, as the hon. member for Kamloops has already mentioned merely for the purpose of re-emphasizing it, that under these circumstances if a motion such as the one moved by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) were ruled out by reason of the government's placing on the order paper, some 17 days later, a motion in different terms, then the government would indeed be able to control private members' days by placing on the order paper a general resolution and thereby defeating the special resolution of a private member.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The resolution of the hon. member for Lambton West is:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of setting up a special committee . . .

It is not a resolution to set up the committee but it is a resolution calling upon the government to consider the advisability of setting up the committee. The government has considered the advisability of setting up a committee and has put a notice on the order paper for the setting up of that committee.

Now, it may be that some gentlemen will feel that the provisions of the notice of motion are not sufficient to authorize the committee to do everything that might be done if the government considered favourably the matter contained in the motion of the hon. member for Lambton West. If that is the feeling, at the time the motion to set up the committee was before the house an amendment could be moved and whatever decision was arrived at would be a decision that would be operative. Here, we merely have a suggestion to the government to consider the advisability of setting up a committee. It is not a motion to set up the committee with these powers. The government having given notice and having, as a government order at the present time, a motion to set up the committee, it would seem that the only logical further step would be to have hon. members decide whether the committee should be set up with the powers indicated in the notice or whether there would be added by amendment something more than is provided in the notice.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Prime Minister if we have an absolute commitment from the government that they are going ahead with the motion standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I think I have given that commitment to the extent to which it can be given. Events which are not foreseen at this time can occur, but it is the firm intention of the government to proceed with this government order as soon as that can conveniently be arranged in disposing of the other business before the house.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): May I have another word? We all appreciate the fact that we do not want a duplication of debate. In view of the Prime Minister's assurance that the committee will be set up, I am wondering whether, instead of ruling it out of order, we could have your permission, Mr. Speaker, to let the motion stand? Probably it would be called in a month or five weeks' time on a private member's day. I hope by that time we would know whether the other committee is set up, if or when it is set up I shall be glad to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Well, if we allow the motion to stand the hon. member will not be able to let it stand more than twice because after that it will be dropped from the order paper. I have no personal objection to that except that if he wants to call it the next time we shall have the same problem as we have now.

Hon. members should consider that in examining the anticipation rule regard should be given to the steps which lead to the most effective results. We are not looking only for academic debates. We want to have decisions taken by the house if we feel that something should be done, and since there is a government order which has been appointed by the house and appears on page 81 of the Votes and Proceedings of Friday, January 27, we shall not have to give consideration to the advisability of establishing a committee, but we shall definitely have the establishment of a committee whenever the order comes up. As I said, the only point that worried me, and it did worry the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and others, was whether or not a motion appearing under government orders would be called within a reasonable time.

It does not appear to me that I have to deal with any other point that has been made because there seems to be general agreement that hon. members do not want duplication of debate. They realize they have their responsibilities for protraction of debate and they want to avoid duplication, if possible. If it meets with the wishes of the house I will go along with the suggestion of the hon. member for Lambton West to let the motion stand. As I say, we shall have the same problem perhaps later on when it comes up again. However, I will say that on both sides there is good faith.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is a way in which the request of the hon. member for Lambton West can be met, even if only somewhat academically. He could let it stand today. The next day when it is called, if he says "stand" it will be dropped; but he could then put it on the order paper again. It is true it would be at the bottom of the list, but at least he would have it on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROPOSED REQUIREMENT OF DEVICE TO RENDER HARMLESS POISONOUS GASES EMITTED BY ENGINES

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of taking steps to further protect the health of the nation by requiring all trucks, tractors, buses, or any other diesel-powered vehicles, including engines on railway lines, and all stationary type of engines, be equipped with a device to render harmless, poisonous gases emitted from the exhaust of such vehicles or engines.

He said: I move this resolution, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that diesel and gasoline fumes are a very definite menace to the health of the nation, and especially so in districts of concentrated population. I make no apology for bringing it to the attention of hon. members, even though I realize that control measures may more properly be a matter to come under provincial jurisdiction.

It is my sincere hope that through the discussion of this resolution we may bring about a general awareness of the dangers we encounter in the air we breathe.

Canadians have fought hard for the pure food laws that guarantee that our food is uncontaminated. We have organized and paid for expensive water systems that assure us of a plentiful supply for pure water. There have been many debates on the question of whether our drinking water should be fluorinated to prevent tooth decay. But until quite recently practically nothing has been done about the air we breathe. The acute effects of unrestricted air pollution upon public health have been demonstrated unpleasantly but successfully in three air pollution disasters, namely, the Meuse valley in Belgium in 1930; Donora, Pennsylvania, in 1948; and Poza Rica, Mexico, in 1950.

The chronic effects of air pollution are not so clearly defined, but nevertheless the frequent occurrence of eye irritation during periods of smog in Los Angeles and statistics on the increase in the death rate from respiratory diseases during fogs in industrial communities in England represent evidence which cannot be ignored. Although this resolution deals specifically with diesel fumes I should like to discuss for a few minutes the possible effects of high concentrations of exhaust fumes from gasoline-burning engines.

In the case of Los Angeles, California, of which we have heard so much recently in the press, the smog condition is to a large degree caused by the exhaust fumes of motor vehicles. Dr. Haagen-Smit, a biochemist, in trying to solve the problem in Los Angeles proved that nitrogen dioxide, a product of all combustion, serves as a catalyst converting the atmospheric oxygen into its unstable form of ozone in the presence of sunshine, and proved further that smog was a result of the reaction of ozone with gasoline vapour. In the Los Angeles area there are some 2·3 million motor vehicles circulating almost daily. The quantity of unburned gasoline or gasoline vapour emitted from those vehicles is estimated to be 1,200 tons daily.

It is a well known fact that the mileage per gallon of gasoline decreases considerably in stop and go city traffic. At cruising speed about 250 parts per million of the total exhaust is unburned gasoline vapour. When a motor is idling it is two or three times that figure, but when you lift your foot off the accelerator and decelerate, the output is 5,000 parts per million. It is generally conceded that about 7 per cent of gasoline is unburned, and that figure could be increased to 8 or 9 per cent through evaporation from the carburetor or fuel tank.

This problem is one which we must face in the near future as the number of motor vehicles increases in Canada. Far more important is the fact that deadly gases are emitted with these exhaust fumes. One of these gases is known as carbon monoxide, with which the average motorist is only vaguely familiar. We may attribute this lack of familiarity to the fact that he can neither smell it, taste it, feel it nor hear it; yet in a very short space of time it can be the means of reducing the mental functions of a driver to the point where co-ordination of muscles and the ability to react properly in the operation of a vehicle to below even minimum requirements for safety.

A concentration of ·02 to ·03 per cent of carbon monoxide will cause a headache; a concentration of ·04 to ·07 per cent, unconsciousness; and a concentration of ·08 to ·10 per cent, death. Unlike some poisons it does not permit a human being to build up immunity over a period of time. Repeated exposures, particularly attacks of acute poisoning, result in a progressive increasing susceptibility to the gas and can cause acute cumulative tissue damage.

It might be well to pursue the theory that carbon monoxide is the cause of a great many accidents on our highways due to the inefficiency of drivers. At some time all of us have experienced a condition of sleepiness while driving our motor vehicles. We have also perceived odors from our own car and cars in front of us. We have experienced headaches, dizziness and sometimes car sickness. Whenever any of these occur while you are driving, consider carbon monoxide and bear in mind that death by carbon monoxide is not restricted to tightly-closed garages with the motor running and that a state of collapse has occurred when cars are parked with their motors running in some instances even while they are travelling along the highway. It is safe to assume that carbon monoxide has contributed a great deal to many accidents heretofore classed as unexplained.

To substantiate this the California highway patrol tested 1,007 automobiles on the open highway and found that 30 cars contained concentrations of this gas in excess of the maximum safe limit. The conclusion arrived at from the survey showed that 3 per cent of the cars tested were found to have concentrations of carbon monoxide in such quantity as would affect the driver with headache, sleepiness, weakness, impaired judgment, and decrease his driving ability for a period of several hours. Another conclusion was that no automobile, regardless of design, age or type, is free from the possibility of carbon monoxide entering the driver or passenger compartment. It behooves every motorist to have his car tested for complete exhaust system tightness and to observe the rules of safety at all time in order to rule out as much as possible the dangers of this lethal gas which is an inherent part of our present-day motor vehicle.

If this condition exists on the open highway, what is the situation in areas of highly concentrated traffic. Tests have been taken in these areas and on busy streets and concentrations of ·09 per cent have been found during periods of high temperature and humidity. I have just indicated that a concentration of ·09 per cent will cause death. Here we have concentrations of ·09 per cent on busy streets during heavy traffic hours with high temperature and humidity.

Is it any wonder that the busy housewife often comes home from a shopping trip with a splitting headache? Then consider a busy street with high buildings on either side, with many of the offices equipped with air conditioners in their windows. These fumes rise and infiltrate into the offices and that is probably the reason why many secretaries have bottles of headache tablets on their desks.

Unlike the gasoline engine the diesel engine operates normally with excess air. The fuel is injected into the cylinder and is ignited by virtue of the pressure and temperature in the cylinder rather than by a spark. The fuel used is heavier than gasoline and has a higher boiling range. Because of the excess air used, very little of the fuel is normally exhausted unburned. Under certain conditions of operation, however, both smoke and aldehydes are evolved. The latter are quite noticeable when in high concentrations because of their pungent odour and eye-irritation characteristics.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on record in Hansard in the form of a table a summary of the reported variation in diesel exhaust gas composition.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman the consent of the house to put this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Charlton: The table is a follows:

Composition of Exhaust Gas from Diesel Engines

Constituent	Maximum per cent	Minimum per cent	Typical per cent
Carbon dioxide	13·8	0·7	9·0
Carbon monoxide	6·4	nil	0·05
Oxygen	20·0	0·5	9·0
Hydrogen	2·6	nil	0·03
Methane	0·5	0	0·02
Nitrogen	84·2	79·3	81·9
Oxides of nitrogen	0·112	nil	·036
Aldehydes	0·0031	nil	·0007

The figures are reported by the air pollution control district of Los Angeles on the determination of air pollutants emitted by a 210 horsepower, two-stroke cycle diesel bus. Cruising conditions were simulated on a dynamometer by operating at 30 m.p.h. and 15 brake horsepower. Based on this study, losses of various pollutants to the atmosphere per barrel of fuel burned were: non-ether soluble aerosols, 3·2 lb.; hydrocarbons, trace; total aldehydes (calculated as formaldehyde) 0·46 lb.; oxides of nitrogen (calculated as nitrogen peroxide), 9·4 lb; organic acids (calculated as acetic acid), 1·3 lb.

It is concluded that the contribution of the various pollutants (except hydrocarbons) per barrel of fuel burned is two to ten times greater from diesel fuel than from gasoline.

The odour and irritating effects of the exhaust gas of diesel engines are caused mainly by aldehydes, which occur in varying amounts depending on several factors, such as the fuel, the air ratio at which the engine is operating, the design of the engine, engine temperature, and the condition of the fuel injection equipment or mechanism. If the exhaust gas contains a high concentration of aldehydes, it is definitely irritating to the eyes and nasal passages; in fact, the irritating effect may be more noticeable than the odour if one is exposed to a high concentration of the exhaust gas.

But the most dangerous gas in diesel fumes, both with regard to injury to health and amount produced, is oxides of nitrogen, which when inhaled form nitric and nitrous acids in the respiratory organs. Let us compare oxides of nitrogen with carbon monoxide, as far as toxicity is concerned. An atmosphere containing ·5 to 1·0 per cent of carbon monoxide is likely to be fatal to human beings in less than 30 minutes of exposure, whereas as little as ·07 per cent of oxides of nitrogen may cause fatalities in the same length of time. This is an indication of the danger from the exhaust gas of diesel engines as compared with gasoline engines.

There is still another danger from these exhaust fumes which science is presently dealing with.

Dr. W. C. Hueper of the cancer control branch, national cancer institute of the United States public health service, addressed the first Canadian cancer conference which took place in June 1954, under the sponsorship of the National Cancer Institute of Canada. I quote from certain comments of his which I feel will be of interest to you:

Comments on respiratory aromatic hydrocarbons. At the present time, exposure to tar, pitch, asphalt, heavy fuel oils, lubricating and cutting oils, soot from domestic furnaces, incinerators, industrial power plants, oil refineries, steel plants, metal smelters, carbon black factories, oil dumps, and smudge pots, as well as to the effluents of diesel and gasoline engines represents the most widespread occupational environment contact with carcinogenic material.

Since our civilization and economical life has been built around the production and use of the basic carbonaceous substances and their derivatives, it does not seem feasible to attain complete protection against exposure to these carcinogenic chemicals with the preventive and prophylatic engineering and sanitary measures practical and economical at the present time.

There is, however, no doubt that a great deal remains to be done in this respect and that we are still rather far removed from having the maximal amount of possible reduction in exposure to the respiratory cancer producing hydrocarbons contained in the various carbonaceous substances mentioned.

I also have here an article entitled "Aromatic Hydrocarbons" which appeared in "Industrial Hygiene and Occupational Medicine", 11th volume, on pages 113 to 120, in February 1955. This article was written by Paul Kotin, M.D., Hans L. Falk, Ph.D., and Marilyn Thomas, B.A. I should like to deal with the comments and the summary and conclusions of this article. I might say that it is an article having to do with the testing of mice with aromatic hydrocarbon from diesel engine exhaust. It states:

Demonstration of carcinogenic hydrocarbons in the exhaust products of diesel engines and the successful production of skin tumours by the painting of diesel-engine exhaust extracts is self-explanatory in so far as satisfying the criteria for proof of experimental carcinogenicity. The emission of carcinogenic hydrocarbons into the atmosphere from diesel engines is of particular interest from a preventive medicine and public health point of view. The as yet unaccomplished task of relating proved experimental carcinogenic hydrocarbons to human lung cancer in no way militates against regarding their atmospheric presence as anything but a potential hazard. While it is apparent that diesel engine exhaust does not differ markedly from gasoline engine exhaust and incinerator soots, its possible control presents a brighter picture. The present inability to eliminate cacinogenic hydrocarbon emissions into the atmosphere from the latter two sources is not duplicated in the case of diesel-engine exhausts. Efficient and innocuous operation of a diesel engine from an atmospheric pollution viewpoint is possible without costly engine redesign or the development of catalytic or combustion completing devices for inclusion in the exhaust systems, a situation not applicable to incinerator or gasoline engine pollution sources.

The qualitative presence of chrysene and Compound Y in the exhaust products of a diesel engine was unanticipated in view of their absence from gasoline engine exhausts. The knowledge that these two compounds can be emitted into the atmosphere incidental to rubber tire wear and tear precludes the conclusion that the diesel engine is alone responsible for their presence.

As noted in our previous publications, the qualitative studies reported herein are in the process of repetition by means of injection in contrast to painting techniques, with quantitation of both individual components of the exhaust samples and combinations of emitted hydrocarbons serving as the basis for the experiments.

Here are the summary and conclusions:

The particulate phase of diesel-engine exhaust products has been analysed. Carcinogenic hydrocarbons have been demonstrated as being present among these products. Their production under varying conditions of engine operation has been determined.

Extracts of the particulate phase of the exhaust products have been successfully used in painting experiments to produce skin papillomas in C57 black mice and cancers in A strain mice. The demonstration of carcinogenic hydrocarbons in a source of atmospheric pollution and their successful use for the production of skin tumors in mice require their careful assessment relative to a possible role in the observed increasing frequency of human lung cancer. Two observations are worthy of special comment: first, the high yield of aromatic polycyclic hydrocarbons, including benzpyrene from the exhaust of an inefficiently operating diesel engine; second, the increase in these emissions as the load and engine speed are increased. This is in marked contrast to a gasoline engine where load and speed increase reduce the amount of aromatic polycyclic hydrocarbons, emitted into the air.

I have here a statement made in London by Sir Clement Price Thomas, a distinguished British surgeon who took part in the lung operation performed on King George VI in 1951. The press release states that Sir Thomas declared that smoking does not cause cancer of the lung:

He said the fact that lung cancer is predominantly a disease of the city dweller lends "very serious support" to the theory that atmospheric pollution plays a predominant role.

"But I myself do not believe that cigarette smoking or atmospheric pollution as such cause cancer of the lung. My own feeling is that they probably determine the site at which the patient gets his cancer."

The Globe and Mail of January 17, 1955, carries a statement attributed to the noted German specialist and Nobel medicine prize winner, Dr. Otto Warburg:

Warburg, who won the Nobel prize for medicine in 1931, said he has established that lack of oxygen respiration of the body cells is a major cause of chronic damage to normal cells and their conversion into cancerous cells.

Health—Poisonous Gases

Warburg admits that lack of oxygen can by no means be regarded as the sole cause, "but intermittent lack of oxygen will be a frequent cause as, for instance, pressure on the blood vessels frequently results in the intermittent lack of oxygen in the body."

He suggests the following preventive measures: Do not inhale cigaret smoke; ban diesel oil fumes from the streets; forbid curing of foodstuffs with certain cures; ban the dyeing of foodstuffs with aniline dyes; forbid the preservation of foodstuffs with antiseptic substances.

The London Free Press of April 30, 1955, carried a report of an interview with Dr. William Franks. Dr. Franks was being questioned by Jacqueline Moore and in reply to the question, "What has our environment got to do with lung cancer?" he said:

The world is full of cancer-producing agents, or carcinogens, as we call them. Tar on asphalt highways, for instance, Nickel-carbonyl. Chromates. Fuel oil. Radioactive compounds. Even sunshine. An idling automobile engine. Rubber tires. A faulty oil furnace. Commercial soot. Even printers' ink. All these things are known to contain substances which can cause cancer experimentally. Inject the dust of any one of these products into a mouse and you'll be liable to get a tumor. Do you know that extracts of dust from the air of eight large American cities have been injected into mice and they developed cancer? Why put all the blame on cigarettes? The association between lung cancer and smoking is real enough, but it's not the sole cause; it's probably only the straw that broke the camel's back. It's our whole noxious environment. And that's why I say we can do something about lung cancer because we can clean up the air we breathe. We are at the stage now where we must pay as much attention to the air as we pay to our water supply.

And finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote extracts from an article which appeared in the September 21, 1955, edition of the Ottawa Journal. This article concerns a report prepared by Dr. A. H. Sellers, a medical statistician of the Ontario department of health who appeared before the Ontario legislature select committee on air pollution and smoke control. The article says in part:

"There is seen to be some correlation between the respiratory cancer mortality for males and the proportion of the population residing in urban areas", the report said. "This correlation is not shown for females."

Deaths from cancer of the trachea, lungs and bronchus; from cancer of all forms and from pneumonia and bronchitis were unexpectedly low in the rural areas and municipalities with populations under 15,000.

The report said studies made elsewhere have shown that mortality from lung cancer in England, Wales and Denmark is higher in urban areas than in rural.

In England it appeared to be related to the density of buildings rather than that of population. Atmospheric pollution was increasing in England while lung cancer was rising.

There is much more evidence I could give, Mr. Speaker, but I hesitate to take more time of the house when I believe all hon. members will agree that the problem is serious enough to deserve action. The question is, "what can we do?"

For several years now diesel engines have been used underground in mining operations of various kinds. It would not have been possible, had they not devised an economical method of rendering these diesel fumes practically harmless, to miners working underground in contact with these fumes. The equipment used is known to the trade as a "scrubber". Briefly, it is an arrangement whereby the exhaust fumes are passed through an aqueous solution of sodium sulphite, with a percentage of hydroquinone added. The cost of chemicals for operating this device is in the neighbourhood of 10 cents per working hour. The cost of the equipment is not unreasonable, and I understand it is presently available.

How many hon. members have followed behind a diesel truck or bus on the highway for any distance? I'll wager that you either passed it as soon as possible or slowed up to let it get ahead far enough that the fumes did not bother you. True diesel trucks have an upright exhaust pipe, but it is useless on the highway travelling at the ordinary speed. The vacuum behind the truck sucks the exhaust fumes down to highway level and these fumes are taken into newer model cars via the front air vents. You can see proof of that from the fact that the tarpaulins on these diesel trucks are blackened right from the front to the back and down the back of the truck. Most motorists realize that these air vents should be closed when overtaking a diesel truck or bus on the highway or in heavy traffic, but how many bother to do so, until the odour becomes noticeable.

That may be good enough for diesel fumes but remember you cannot smell carbon monoxide. It is not only motorists who are subjected to these fumes. Pedestrians on city streets where diesel buses are used get a substantial amount every time a bus passes them. These fumes are quite noticeable also to passengers in buses, especially at stops when doors are opened. Most passengers on diesel powered trains have noticed the fumes when the air conditioning is turned on in their sleeping quarters. Almost everyone has noticed the irritating qualities of diesel exhaust fumes, but what do we do about it? Grumble, but accept it as part of present-day living until public opinion is aroused to the point where governments are forced into action.

I consider we have sufficient proof to suggest that diesel fumes are a contributing factor in the cause of lung cancer. Do we have any proof that carbon monoxide poisoning is not the cause of many heart conditions? The finger of suspicion could definitely be pointed in that direction at least.

It is only fair for me to state at this time that the government is doing a limited amount of work on air pollution in the Department of National Health and Welfare under the directorship of Dr. Morris Katz. I sincerely suggest that much more could be done and that the government could set a good example by looking into the possibility of installing "scrubbers" on all the diesel locomotives on the Canadian National Railways system.

The danger is obvious. Action should be taken without further delay, and I hope hon. members from both sides of the house will support this resolution.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in moral support at least of the importance of the question raised by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton). It has often seemed to me to be remarkable that while a man can live for three weeks without food, for three days without water, and only three minutes without pure air, nevertheless I suppose we spend less time in passing laws and making regulations to make sure that the human species has his supply of pure air than we do on any other subject along a similar line. It therefore seems to me that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand has raised an important question in connection with this matter of pure air. I certainly go along with him to the extent of waiting to hear what the minister has to say about what is being done now.

It seems to me that a few general observations will make clear the importance of the question he has raised. A good many of us are old enough to remember what the old city of Pittsburgh was like when the black, ugly smoke hung like a perpetual fog over that city. When we go back to that city now we find that the air is clearer than it is even in my home city of Vancouver and a good deal clearer than it is in Ottawa; I am not now talking about the vicinity of the parliament buildings, either. When you look at what has been done in Pittsburgh, it is quite clear that public action can make an improvement with regard to this all-important question.

When you go to the great city of Los Angeles, which I suppose is one of the richest cities on earth, and you find that people are literally being driven out of that city, are being forced to move away from it, for the simple reason that there is no pure air in the city—that their noses and their eyes smart because of this perpetual smog that hangs over the city—again you realize that we are dealing with an important question indeed.

That when you go over to London—the "big smoke" as they used to call it—and find that the old black fog and smog of earlier days has now given way to this poison variety, I think it will be realized that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand certainly has raised an important question.

I do not know that I can go along with him altogether in absolving the cigarette from responsibility for the sharp increase in lung cancer. I happen to have been a director of the Canadian Cancer Society for many years. While I am, of course, just a layman, for a good many years I have listened to experts present increasingly ominous evidence which suggests that there is a real relationship between the increase in cigarette smoking and the increase in lung cancer. However, as a layman I must put in this qualification. I still have my fingers crossed with regard to this evidence. From my own observation women are smoking far more cigarettes than men are smoking and at least the increase among women smokers is sharper than the increase among the men smokers.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to interrupt for a moment to say to the hon. member that I did not exclude cigarettes. That was Dr. Franks. I was quoting from Dr. Franks. I said not to blame cigarettes entirely.

Mr. Philpott: I do not blame them entirely but, as I say, I still have my fingers crossed about the relative amount of blame to be attached to cigarettes and to the diesel engine. However, I am certainly quite willing to be shown. Far be it from me to ascribe more blame to cigarettes as opposed to diesel engine fumes or ordinary automobile fumes. All I am trying to point out is that, in my opinion, an extremely important question has been raised, and one about which we should know a great deal more than we now know. The more that governments can reasonably do to make sure that we get pure air, the better for all concerned. To that extent at least I certainly go along with my hon. friend. I think he cannot do too much to encourage even this good government to be an even better government by getting an improvement in this direction.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): In a general way, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in support of this resolution. However, as it is now drafted, it is not particularly clear in all respects. I am therefore going to propose an amendment in a minute or two. In the resolution there are several words which leave the question rather vague as to whose responsibility it would be if the intent of the resolution were to be carried out. For example, the resolution states that:

—the government should consider the advisability of taking steps to further protect the health of the nation by requiring all trucks, tractors, buses, or any other diesel powered vehicles, including engines on railway lines, and all stationary type of engines, be equipped with a device to render harmless, poisonous gases emitted from the exhaust of such vehicles or engines.

The resolution does not make it clear who shall be responsible for this device. If it is the intent of the resolution that the owners of such vehicles themselves—the individual owners—shall be responsible, I would foresee a great deal of difficulty from two points of view. First of all, there would be difficulty with regard to the question of having any kind of a check or control on the device which is envisioned in this resolution and second, with having a standard device which would be effective if it were left to the individual owners of such vehicles.

Then in the second last line of the resolution we find these words: "to render harmless, poisonous gases emitted" and so on. The word "harmless" takes in a lot of territory. I would assume it to mean harmless to human beings but it could be read as harmless in a wider sense, namely harmless to vegetation and to life in general. I would imagine that the hon. member was taking the narrower meaning, namely harmless to the health of persons. However, in order to make the resolution more explicit—at least in my opinion—I am going to suggest an amendment. I do so particularly because the wording of the resolution includes the word "tractors". As the hon. member will be aware, in western Canada particularly a great number of farmers use diesel tractors. If they were to be harnessed with the responsibility of providing a device—each for his own tractor—which would render harmless poisonous gases, I am afraid we would be asking for something which it would be practically impossible to get. Therefore, in order to make the matter clearer, for my own satisfaction at least I should like to propose the following amendment with which I am sure the hon. member would be in agreement. It is in these words:

That the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "all" in the second line thereof the following words: "manufacturers of", and by substituting for the words "be equipped" in the fourth line thereof the words "to equip same".

Mr. Martin: Have you a copy of the amendment?

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes, I have a copy. Unfortunately I have just one copy because I jotted it down while the hon. member was speaking. But it is a very simple amendment. If it means that the government should favourably consider the intent of this resolution and make some provision for such a device to be used, then I think it should be at the manufacturers' level. It should be standard equipment which could be checked for its effectiveness and it would be provided at the time the vehicle is manufactured.

Obviously, we could not place the responsibility upon individual owners of trucks, buses and particularly tractors, because any kind of device that is sold to be attached by the owner may prove ineffective. The person involved may not even know where or how to obtain such a device.

Mr. Trainor: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes.

Mr. Trainor: Would he also suggest that this device be provided without added cost to the purchaser?

Mr. Zaplitny: I would be most happy to provide for that if I were in a position to so provide. Unfortunately, we are operating under the so-called private enterprise system and this parliament no longer has any control over prices. I am afraid, therefore, it is beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament to so provide. I would hope that if such devices were used they could be provided at nominal cost, because certainly the manufacturers of that type of equipment would realize that by equipping their trucks, buses and so on with such devices the vehicles would be made safer and more attractive, and the manufacturers would be enhancing the sale of their product. In that sense, they might find it would be in their own interests to provide the device at a nominal cost. Assuming the government favourably considers the intent of the resolution, I would strongly suggest that implementation would have to be at the manufacturers' level rather than at the individual owner's level.

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): I must say this discussion has been most enlightening and most interesting. There is one point we might perhaps be forgetting and that is that no matter how much we may all be concerned with the health of the people, the various governments in Canada still have their proper legislative spheres with regard to the health of the nation. In Ontario most matters of this kind fall within the jurisdiction of the highway traffic act, which is a piece of legislation enacted by the provincial government.

I gained the impression from the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton), who introduced the resolution, that he was mainly concerned with the results of exhaust gases emitted by vehicles of all kinds on the public highways. Of course, there are some other types of vehicles that enter into it, but in his view the great danger came from the vast amount of gases emitted by motor vehicles. He mentioned particularly the number of vehicles in Los Angeles. A select committee appointed by the Ontario legislature, to which the hon. member also referred, has recently returned from Los Angeles and other parts of California after studying this question of the pollution of the air by smoke and other gases. This committee is, therefore, presently engaged in looking into some of the things this resolution contemplates.

Although we are having a pleasant discussion on this matter, and although it may be very pleasant for us to discuss it, I really do not believe the subject lies completely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. If we did vote for this resolution, certainly we would create a great furore if we tried to step in. I know that is true so far as Ontario is concerned. I do not feel we should fall into the trap of saying, "Well, anything that concerns the health of our people is our concern." That may be true, but you simply cannot take any activity in which Canadians might engage where their health is affected and, by relating it to the field of health, say you have jurisdiction to legislate.

Normally, one would go along with the idea because there are many borderline cases in which the jurisdiction is not clear, but certainly I would guarantee that were we to try to introduce a measure in this house in the terms of the resolution and say that all vehicles had to be equipped with a device to render harmless these gases, our position would be completely untenable from the legal point of view. I submit that view very respectfully for the consideration of the house.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), who moved the amendment, is I believe treading on particularly dangerous ground. He suggests that the type of device be standardized and you would therefore have to lay down exactly the type of accessory that would be attached to the vehicle. I feel that would certainly be well beyond any legislative field with which this house is concerned. While I am sympathetic to the view expressed by the member in putting this resolution before us, I certainly do not believe we have any jurisdiction to act upon it.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton) on the presentation he made this afternoon. It is quite apparent that he has put a tremendous amount of work into studying this problem. He came forward with a lot of information that was a complete surprise to me. I am not going to speak very long, but I should like to say that I agree with the resolution.

It is quite apparent from the statement made by the hon. member in introducing this subject that some serious consideration has to be given to this problem. If the facts are as dangerous as he sets forth, not only in his own view of the subject but the views of various scientists, then it is high time something was done. He did say, too, that the means of offsetting the dangers of these diesel fumes was available and was being used on the diesel engines in various mines. I believe he said the cost was something like 10 cents an hour, which is probably reasonable enough for any sort of industrial development. I know, however, I would hate to have to instal machinery that would cost me an extra 10 cents an hour in running my car.

While mentioning automobiles, I should like to tell the hon. member that I regret his resolution deals only with diesel engines. He did deal extensively with the dangers of gasoline engines during his remarks, but I regret that he did not include gasoline engines in the terms of the resolution. It is apparent that many public health authorities feel the fumes from gasoline engines are more dangerous than those from diesel or any other type of combustion engine.

I should also like to have seen him include not only vehicles but all types of industrial machinery, manufacturing plants, and so on. I would urge the government to take into consideration the advisability of helping to bring about a complete investigation into that realm of public health, since it is endangered by industrial fuel fumes of all kinds.

I can agree to some extent with the hon. member who spoke last that this is probably not primarily a federal matter; it does come under provincial jurisdiction. I can also agree that we would run into a great deal of difficulty in trying to legislate on the matter. However, I do think that the investigations branch of the department of health and welfare would do very well to insist on an immediate investigation into the harm that can be done by these industrial fumes, and probably make representations and recommendations to the provincial governments as to what action should be taken. I think the provincial governments would go along with the suggestion. I do not think any of them would argue about it. However, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I would think they would kick a great deal if the federal government tried to take over this field of legislation.

As far as the amendment is concerned, I cannot see too much in it to quarrel with. Of course, it does leave the problem as to who is to be responsible for vehicles and engines that are now in operation. However, the lives of those are reasonably short. Probably it would not be too long until the danger from them would be overcome.

As I said, we agree with the resolution and support it. I see no objection whatsoever to the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny.)

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak on this resolution for two reasons. The first is that I should like to correct some of the damage that might be done in the minds of people who might be thinking of coming to Canada. This is the one country that has the least smog and such troubles of any country in the world, and it would be a very bad thing if people were to think that it was an unhealthy country.

Let me come a little closer to home. I should like to suggest that we do not have the problem of fog and smog that they might have in the maritime provinces. Certainly the hon. member for Vancouver South (M. Philpott) may suggest that he has that problem in his part of the country. But in Wellington South we have the best air to be found anywhere in the world and very little fog; therefore, we have no problem whatsoever.

After listening to the very able lawyer from York-Scarborough, I would agree that it is a provincial matter. If it is a provincial matter, then we should not be wasting our time discussing it in this house.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I wish to say only a few words. I support the resolution moved by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton). The hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member who preceded me brought out a point. Owing to the fact that on more than one occasion I have mentioned the government heating plant in Ottawa—and I shall speak on it again—I feel I should mention it now. The heating plant throws out more smog every day than all the diesel engines in the country. In the summer time when the windows are open, one can find the evidence of it on the tables in the restaurant, in the offices and elsewhere. One can take a towel or a handkerchief and by wiping his forehead get evidence of it. I have mentioned this on more than one occasion to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), but nothing has been done. They state they are experimenting with some smoke eliminators but it has not been eliminated yet. A few years ago when Mr. Alphonse Fournier was minister of public works the Daly building was throwing out clouds and clouds of smoke, as does the transport building on a cold morning. These public buildings should not do that. There are ways and means of getting rid of that smoke. Ottawa has a by-law against smoke of that kind, but the government certainly has not done anything about it.

Mr. Macdonnell: They are above by-laws.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The hon. member for Greenwood says, "They are above by-laws". I often think they try to get away with murder at times.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Greenwood does not really mean that.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the hon. member for Greenwood always says what he means. He always tells the truth.

Mr. Macdonnell: We will not get into an argument on that.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): In regard to exhausts on tractors, I had an experience last fall that proves the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand is right. One of my men complained that every time he got into the tractor and used it all morning and all afternoon he had a headache. He said, "I do not know whether it is the jiggling up and down, or what it is". I climbed aboard the tractor myself and examined it. I ran the tractor and I said, "The trouble is in the exhaust; it has to be extended". There was a cabin on the tractor and I felt that the fumes were coming from the exhaust into the cabin. We extended the exhaust line away from the cabin entirely, and now there are no headaches. You can operate a tractor all day long without a headache. There is something in those fumes that certainly is not good for one's health. What can be done I do not know but I really believe something should be done.

Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare going to speak?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house is grateful to the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand for raising a matter that admittedly is not within our competence constitutionally, but a matter that is of considerable interest and one which has occasioned concern to those persons in the country and elsewhere, such as the hon. gentleman himself, who have given it careful attention.

The amendment offered by the hon. member for Dauphin was intended, I am sure, to be helpful, but it indicates how incompetent constitutionally this parliament is to deal with this particular problem. To require that the manufacturer shall be obliged to place on the vehicles concerned the necessary equipment, of course, clearly places the matter under the caption of property and civil rights and clearly indicates that it is not a matter that we have power to deal with under the British North America Act.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a question? How is the federal government able to say something about the kind of wrapping that is to be used in packaging bacon?

Mr. Martin: That comes under the Food and Drugs Act. That act has the element of criminal law. The matter is constitutional, because it is under the guise of criminal law. That is not true in the particular resolution before us. You may under the guise of criminal law in a particular context seek to deal with a matter that has the aspects of property and civil rights, but you do it under the guise of criminal law. That is not the situation confronting us at the moment.

The resolution presented by my hon. friend is likewise outside the jurisdiction of the federal government, but I did not rise to oppose the resolution on that ground. My hon. friend and I have talked about the matter and I think he will agree that having raised it and having focussed it on our minds and brought it to the attention of the public at large he has rendered a service. I accord him that distinction at once, and I would add that he has rendered the country a service in presenting the motion in the way he has today.

The resolution serves to underline the increased attention now being given this matter by health authorities who are active in environmental health, not only at the federal but as well at the provincial level. I may say that the researches and experiments being carried on in the United States, to a lesser extent in Great Britain and I understand also in Belgium and France, and before the war in Germany, have produced results which are familiar to the officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

As a matter of fact, for many years the Department of National Health and Welfare and provincial and local authorities in Canada have carried out measures to safeguard human health by ensuring the safety and purity of drinking water, food and drugs and insecticides, and more particularly the air which we breathe has come under surveillance. The problem is one, not only of scientific interest but of the health of the people and it is well that from time to time when we spend so much time on other matters of a political character that we should accord an opportunity in this house for the discussion of matters as constructive as is this particular question.

Air pollution has been of course the inevitable accompaniment of industrialization and growth of our large cities. I may take as an example of what we have attempted in our department as the result of suggestions made by provincial governments and officials in the United States the researches that have been carried on in the Detroit-Windsor area. That area was chosen because that is the largest Canadian city on the Canadian side of the border close to a large United States community. This is an example of international co-operative effort to try to determine the extent of air pollution and the dire results that come from that kind of pollution.

In that area the Department of National Health and Welfare, in co-operation with the department of health of Ontario, the department of health of Detroit and the board of health of Windsor, have been carrying on for some time one of the most extensive investigations of the result of air pollution on human health which I think has ever been undertaken. That has been under way now for two years on both sides of the river involving a careful examination of family groups and individuals in an effort to ascertain the effect of air pollution conditions emanating particularly from the large industrial centre of Detroit and the large industrial centre of Canada's first city, the city of Windsor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: I appreciate that the house has recognized the high priority I have placed on the community which is mine. This pioneering effort and the results of this study undoubtedly will yield much information of value to health departments all over the world. An assessment of the study is now under way but it will be some time before all of the statistical data are finally determined. Undoubtedly it will play its part, as studies to which my hon. friend referred have played their part, in enabling him and others to formulate opinions on various aspects of this problem. It may be that with the information which this extensive air pollution study in the Detroit-Windsor area will yield it may be possible to provide for considerable improvement and amelioration.

The subject matter of the resolution of course relates to one aspect only of the overall problem of air pollution. Our officers have carefully studied all the implications of the resolution and I am bound to say that there is no doubt in their judgment that the operation of diesel vehicles in certain situations, especially in mining operations, in tunnels, and in more or less confined spaces, does represent a potential danger to health. We have placed the skill of the people in our occupational health division at the service of provincial departments who admittedly accept this as their primary constitutional responsibility. However, that does not deter us in any way from seeking to assist them in a matter which is of concern.

The control of this hazard in such cases is usually achieved, I am told, by the installation of adequate ventilation facilities. In the stationary type of engine the exhaust gases must be removed by piping into proper exhaust gas ventilators or ducts for disposal of the fumes. I am further advised that the operation of such vehicles or engines in the open atmosphere may constitute a hazard to health in areas of dense traffic and population. It may be that when the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking) was speaking of Guelph he was not speaking of an area of dense traffic and population.

This phase of the problem is now under intensive investigation, as my hon. friend has noted, in the area of Los Angeles, California, and a special study is under way by the automotive industry primarily in the city of Detroit. Waste products of internal combustion engines include unburned fuel or hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide, aldehydes, oxides of nitrogen, as well as carbon, soot, tarry material and other products, including water vapour. After listening to my dissertation—my hon. friend is smiling. I am sure that after listening to my dissertation he appreciates that he and I at least have one thing in common, that is the technical knowledge that each of us possesses in this important matter.

I am told that the theory has been postulated in the Los Angeles area that smog is formed to a major degree by the interaction of such hydrocarbon waste products with oxides of nitrogen in the presence of oxygen and sunlight. Such chemical interactions of pollutants may be related to eye irritation and other health effects that have been observed and to some of the crop damage sustained in the Los Angeles area. Perhaps it was this circumstance that brought my hon. friend to take an interest in this matter. In any event, that seems to be one of the implications involved. It is stated that, in the immediate vicinity of diesel engine exhaust, the concentrations of aldehydes and oxides of nitrogen may be sufficient to produce considerable eye, nose and throat irritation. I may say in this connection that Dr. Grove of our blindness control division has done considerable work in this particular field. I am sure the hon. gentleman would profit greatly if at his convenience some time he allowed me to arrange for him to discuss this matter with this outstanding public servant.

Various control methods have been suggested for reducing the toxicity of waste gases from internal combustion engines. These include systems for treating exhaust gases such as catalytic exhaust converters, after-burners, absorbers, condensers and filters.

Other proposals concern systems which modify engine operating conditions, such as manifold vacuum control, deceleration fuel cut-off, ignition timing control, recycling of exhaust gases and fuel injection. I simply add this rider, that objectionable visible smoke and fumes may be reduced greatly, my officers tell me, by improved maintenance practices. It may be that if greater care on the part of those who have the legal power to require enforcement were taken to see that this enforcement took place, many of the abuses to which my hon. friend has directed our attention could be avoided.

I can point out that there are now under investigation by the automobile industry such proposals as the change in the design of cylinder combustion chambers, carburetors and intake manifolds.

It has been shown in field and laboratory tests by the Los Angeles air pollution control authority that approximately seven per cent of all fuels used by automobiles is discharged unburned into the atmosphere, and this constitutes the greatest single source of hydrocarbon loss in the Los Angeles area. However, I am advised by my technical officers that no success has yet beeen achieved in securing the development of a control device suitable for controlling the emissions of exhaust gases from automobiles.

In the case of diesel engines, a limited amount of control has been achieved with the installation of exhaust gas absorbers which contain alkaline and other types of solutions for removal of aldehydes and oxides of nitrogen.

Several companies in the United States, including the Houdry Corporation and the Catalytic Combustion Corporation, are experimenting with catalytic systems for more complete combustion of exhaust gases and also with various types of after-burners. This work, however, is still, I am advised, in the development stage.

Much more study and research is needed before adequate means are available for the control of emissions from trucks, tractors, buses and other types of vehicles on highways and railways, apart from the abatement of smoke and visible exhaust fumes by proper maintenance practices.

I would tell my hon. friend and the house that the development of effective controls for exhaust gas waste products is contingent upon the successful completion of studies that are now in progress, some in this country but a great many in the United States. As I have already noted in respect of one aspect of the problem, we have undertaken in Canada in co-operation with the city of Detroit a most extensive study.

At the end of his speech the hon. gentleman mentioned that for a very small amount of money a device could be used which would avoid the dangers feared. I was not aware of that device and I asked my parliamentary assistant to contact the officers of our department. They advise me that, with regard to scrubbers for diesel engines, these scrubbers contain water to which are added alkalis, ferrous sulphate or other ingredients which remove the aldehydes and to a certain extent the oxides of nitrogen. Our officers tell us that these are not very effective for carbon monoxide, and that therefore adequate ventilation is still required. Their value has not been proven for railways or diesel transport trucks on highways, but there are three places where these particular devices are now being subjected to strict study and scrutiny, and it may be that we shall have more information on which to pass a final judgment.

Before taking my seat, I should like to mention that the hon. gentleman referred to cancer and the studies which I announced in this house, regarding one alleged form of cancer. Those studies are now under way, as a result of the financial contributions made by one company in addition to the grants that have been accorded by the federal government.

As the hon. gentleman mentioned, Dr. Warwick, the director of the institute, has made mention of some of these researches. I forget whether my hon. friend did go on to say, but Dr. Warwick could have gone on to say, that, as a result of funds which this parliament had voted, researches are now under way in at least two different universities in Canada in the matter of analysing the possible potential relation between some of the factors of causation of cancer mentioned by my hon. friend. In any event, I hope I have indicated to my hon. friend that these matters are the subject of research by those who are qualified to engage in this kind of examination.

My hon. friend may well feel he has served a useful purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the public. He may be assured that, to the extent that this is a matter within our competence, it will continue to have our sustained interest and, to the extent that we can assist the provincial governments in the prosecution of this matter, this will be done. With that in view, I am sure my hon. friend would agree that this would possibly be the appropriate moment to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to take the opportunity, as there is an amendment to the resolution, to say a very few words. First I should like to point out to the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Enfield) that at the outset of my speech I did say it would probably be unconstitutional and would more properly be taken up under provincial jurisdiction. I admitted that at the outset of my speech. I said that, if it did accomplish nothing else, it would bring it to the attention of the public and make them aware of the dangers facing us in the matter of pollution.

I rather think the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking) will regret having stated that this matter was a waste of time this afternoon, after having heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: I do not think he said that.

Mr. Charlton: He said it was wasting the time of the house, and I think he will later regret that statement.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) raised the question of combatting fumes from gasoline engines as well as diesel engines. The Minister of National Health and Welfare himself has answered that very well in stating that there is a solution now for diesel engines. It is being used in mines all over the country and is proving very satisfactory. I did not say that a very small amount of money was needed. I said they could be procured for a reasonable amount of money. The reason I did not bring in gasoline engines is, as I said before, because it would be most difficult. It has not yet been proved that a contrivance or a mechanism of any kind can be put on automobiles with gasoline engines to render these fumes harmless. For this reason I did not include gasoline engines in the resolution. I did say, however, and I shall repeat it, that there is a device known as a scrubber. I think if the minister looks into the matter further he will find that a great deal of good can come from the use of scrubbers. They are obtainable for a reasonable price and it costs only about 10 cents per working hour for the chemicals to operate them. I feel that the matter should be investigated.

As I said at the conclusion of my speech, I think the dominion government could set a pattern in putting them on the diesel locomotives of the C.N.R. over which they have control. I do not wish to deal with it particularly but I would ask the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) what he would do with the existing diesel engines that are now in operation and which, as far as I can tell, may be in operation for another 15 or 20 years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member wishes to withdraw his resolution?

Mr. Charlton: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member for Dauphin wish to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. Zaplitny: That would be quite satisfactory.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member have leave to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree to the withdrawal of the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

INCOME TAX ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO MEDICAL EXPENSES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to remove therefrom the 3 per cent floor in relation to the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion makes a request, the subject matter of which is well known to hon. members of this house and is well known throughout the country. It asks that what is known as the 3 per cent floor in relation to the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes be removed and that medical expenses be allowed deductibility right from the first dollar.

Last year when I moved a motion in terms identical with this one the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benidickson) was gracious enough to say some kind words about the fact that I had added some new arguments and some new material to my speech of the previous year. I am sorry to disappoint him but so far as this year is concerned it is not I who will be introducing the new material. I hope that the "something new" will come from the government side of the house.

I think it is time the government took this matter seriously. I think it is time the government realized the feeling of the Canadian people that this request is a just one. I think it is time the government took the action proposed in this motion and removed the 3 per cent floor.

Hon. members are aware that this matter has been discussed in the house for quite a number of years. It was discussed generally in the debate on the speech from the throne, in the budget debate, and so on, in the late forties and early fifties. In 1951 it was the subject of a motion which I presented to the house but it was defeated. Again in 1952 it was the subject of a motion in my name and on that occasion the motion carried. It was passed unanimously by the house and the house thereby called upon the government to consider the advisability of removing what was then the 4 per cent floor. The house, and I think I can say the country as a whole, was disappointed when the consideration which we can only assume was given by the government to this matter resulted in no action at that session of parliament.

The next year, 1953, I again brought in the motion. On that occasion only two speeches were made; mine and that of the then minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, who at the conclusion of his speech moved that the debate be adjourned so that there was no further discussion on the motion at that point. However, when Mr. Abbott brought down his budget of 1953—which, of course, we cannot but remember was in an election year—he at least took the action of reducing the 4 per cent floor to the present level of 3 per cent. Well, that was a step in the right direction which was appreciated. One remembers that when medical expense deductibility was first provided for in 1942 and 1943 the floor was at 5 per cent, so we are glad to note that the floor is gradually being lowered, first from 5 to 4 per cent in 1944 and then in 1953 from 4 to 3 per cent.

But as one who feels it should be abolished altogether I did not allow the matter to rest on the basis of the action taken in 1953 but I again brought in the motion in 1954, asking at that time that the then 3 per cent floor be wiped out. That motion was again defeated. Last year I brought in the motion again, and again it was defeated. But last year the margin of defeat was not very great considering the tremendous superiority of the government strength in this house. The vote last year was only 86 to 60 against my motion.

Well, it is now before the house again. In the meantime hon. members have had an opportunity to think more about it and to sense the feelings of their constituents back home in relation to the subject and I hope on this occasion there will be a more favourable result than in the past few years.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I had dared to hope that other developments might make unnecessary a motion of this kind at this time. I shall refer very briefly to these other developments which I hoped might take place. We knew there was to be a meeting of the federal government with the provincial governments on health insurance and I dared to hope that the results of that meeting might be sufficiently far-reaching that individual medical expenses might be cut down to the point where a matter of this kind would not be of such importance as it has been in the past.

However, despite the fact that one welcomes the steps that have been taken in the right direction by the conference which met last week, it still remains clear that even if the proposals of the federal government are accepted by a sufficient number of provinces and come into effect, there still remains a great area of medical expenses, particularly doctors' bills and dental bills, as well as many other kinds of medical expenses, which will have to be met by individual Canadians. Therefore the problem of the impact of individual medical expenses, although it will be ameliorated slightly if the government's proposals with regard to hospitalization and other services come into effect, will still remain for the great bulk of our Canadian citizens. Hence I once again present this motion, Mr. Speaker, so the government might have this opportunity to show that it is really concerned for the health of the Canadian people, and might show that concern in this small way by permitting the deductibility of medical expenses right from the first dollar.

As hon. members are aware, the right to deduct one's medical expenses is surrounded by certain limitations. For example, there is an absolute ceiling as to the amount one can claim as a deduction. That ceiling is at the figure of $1,500 for a single taxpayer and $2,000 for a married taxpayer plus $500 for each dependent up to a limit of $2,000 for dependents. That is one of the limitations on the deduction of medical expenses. You cannot deduct them all. You can deduct them only up to a certain point. Another of the limitations is that only certain prescribed kinds of expense can be deducted. You can deduct what you pay to a hospital; you can deduct doctors' bills, dentists' bills, nurses' bills and so on. You can deduct the costs of a few drugs which have been put on the list, and certain other specified expenses.

The fact is, however, that there are a great many expenses which are really medical or which relate to illness but which you are not permitted to deduct. There is, of course, the question of spectacles and devices of that kind. Most drugs and medicines are still not on the list of expenses that you can deduct for income tax purposes. Then, of course, there is the whole problem of help in the home that may be required at the time of illness, and all sorts of other expenses with which one is faced when illness strikes.

The other day I drew to the attention of the house that strange case—something that seems to be most unfair—in which a taxpayer was denied the right to charge as a medical expense the sum of over $700 which he had had to pay for oxygen in order to keep alive his wife who was suffering from tuberculosis. The reason given by the income tax branch and accepted by the income tax appeal board for refusing to allow that expense was that it was not paid directly to a hospital or a medical institution as defined in the act.

I mention that matter in passing, expressing the hope that the situation will be corrected in the budget this year. I mention it also to indicate that there are many items which are not allowed as medical expenses. Therefore the words which appear in the income tax form, and which make it clear to the taxpayer that he cannot deduct all his medical expenses, are indeed quite correct.

Those are two of the limitations, namely the ceiling and the limited list of things that you can deduct. The third limitation is this 3 per cent floor which is the subject matter of my resolution. I have made it clear before, and I do so again, that I have no quarrel with the ceiling. The figures which set the ceiling are reasonably ample, it seems to me. However, I do have a quarrel with the limited nature of the list of items that can be charged as medical expenses. I feel that that list should be extended. At any rate, I have not confused the issue by putting that question into my resolution. I have confined my resolution to the one question, namely that the 3 per cent floor should be abolished.

Even at the expense of repeating what has been said just about every time this matter has come before the house, let me take a moment to remind hon. members that when you set about to deduct medical expenses from your income tax, you first of all must strike a figure that is 3 per cent of your net income. For all practical purposes your net income is just about your total income; at least it is closer to your total income than it is to your taxable income. Net income is the gross income you receive less one or two specific deductions, such as pension fund deductions, deductions for trade union dues and so on. That figure to which you must apply the 3 per cent is the figure you have before you deduct the $1,000 or $2,000 statutory exemption, or whatever your exemption may be. Hence if you are a person with an income of $3,000 a year, the first $90 of your medical expenses are not allowed as deductible. If your medical expenses in a year are $75 or $80, you get no credit for them. If your medical expenses are $100, you get credit for $10, namely the amount over the $90 figure which represents the application of the 3 per cent floor.

I have repeated that again despite the fact that it is well known to all of us and to most people in this country. My reason for doing so is to make clear what it is that we are asking for. In the example I gave of a taxpayer with a $3,000 income and having $100 medical expenses in a year, we are asking that he should be allowed to deduct from his taxable income not just the $10 that he is allowed at the present time but the full $100 of those medical expenses.

As I have pointed out on six or eight occasions now, it is a fact that if one makes contributions to approved charities he is allowed to deduct those contributions from his taxable income; and although there is a ceiling, as there is with respect to medical expenses, still there is no floor. You are allowed to deduct charitable donations right from the first dollar. If a person is allowed to deduct charitable donations, which are voluntary, right from the first dollar, we feel strongly that the same privilege should be accorded to taxpayers with regard to medical expenses, which are certainly involuntary.

In the past I have given various examples, and I think perhaps I should give them again if for no other reason than to put the matter in terms of the income tax rates that apply for the present year. I take in the first place the example of a married taxpayer with no children, and having an income of $2,400 a year. That taxpayer's income tax, including his old age security tax, would amount to $60. If that person had medical expenses of $200 in a year his tax would be reduced to $40.80, or he would get a tax rebate or tax credit of $19.20. But if that same person, instead of having to spend $200 on medical expenses, were to give $200 to an approved charity, his tax would be reduced to $30. In other words his saving would be $30. It is that discrepancy, that difference, that we think is unfair. We think the person who is allowed $30 in tax rebate for giving away $200 to charity should be allowed the same amount if he has to spend that much on medical expenses.

I come to the example of a married couple having two children of family allowance age. Let us assume that their income is $3,600 a year. Under this year's rates their total income tax before any other adjustments would be $201. If this family had medical expenses of $300 in a year their income tax would be reduced to $168.36, leaving a tax saving of $32.64. But if that same family, instead of spending $300 involuntarily on medical expenses, were to give away $300 to approved charities their income tax would be reduced to $150, making a saving of $51. Putting the two side by side, their income tax saving for $300 given to charity is $51, but their income tax saving for $300 medical expenses is only $32.64. We think the two should be put on the same footing.

My next example is that of a married taxpayer having two children of family allowance age where the total income is $5,000 a year. Their income tax before any adjustment would be $453. If this family has medical expenses of $500 their income tax will be reduced to $386.50, representing a saving of $66.50. If this family gives the same amount, namely $500, to an approved charity, their tax is reduced to $358, so that the saving is $95. The tax saving for $500 of medical expenses is $66.50, but the tax saving for $500 given to charity is $95.

I move back again into the lower income brackets. I cite the case of a married taxpayer with two children of family allowance age trying to get by in this day and age on $2,400 a year. Their tax before any adjustments would be only $15 for 1956, according to the law as it now stands. If they have medical expenses of $100 their tax will be $10.80, representing a saving of $4.20. But if they give away $100—don't ask me how anybody earning $2,400 and supporting a wife and two children could give away $100—the entire $15 income tax would be wiped out.

There would be a saving of $15 that way, but there would be a saving of only $4.20 if the family has $100 of medical expenses.

Let me take just one more of these examples. As the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will probably notice, these are the same examples I used last year, except that I have worked them out in terms of the income tax rates that are now provided in the Income Tax Act. My last case, therefore, is that of a married taxpayer with two children of family allowance age where the income is $3,000 a year. The tax before any adjustment would be $105. If this family had $100 of medical expenses, their tax would be reduced to $103.50, a reduction of $1.50. But if the same family gave away $100 their tax would be reduced to $90, or a saving of $15.

I have given a great many figures in the last few minutes. Let me put these last two alongside each other. In that last example, the income tax saving for $100 of medical expenses is $1.50, but the income tax saving for $100 given to charity is $15 or ten times as much. We feel this year, as we felt last year, the year before that and the year before that back until we first started this campaign, that it is not fair to continue that discrepancy. We feel that the same treatment should be accorded to those two types of expenses or contributions.

There have been times when it has been suggested to me that this would be a great boon to the wealthy, more of a boon to the wealthy than it would be to those in the lower brackets. The fact of the matter is that our concern is for the little people, for those who just do not get into this bracket because their expenses are not over the 3 per cent level. Actually, if you want to talk about the very wealthy, the ceiling which the government has imposed would prevent any great bonanza coming to them as a result of the removal of the floor. For example, if a person had an income of $20,000, at the present time he would get only the portion of those expenses in excess of $600, which is 3 per cent of the $20,000, and even that would be limited by the ceiling. If such a person were married and had $3,000 of medical expenses he would not be allowed the whole $3,000. He would not even get the $2,400 which is over the $600 floor. He would have only $2,000 allowed as deductible because of the ceiling which is there. That is one of the reasons I do not object to the ceiling, because if you take away the floor you find in the example I have just given that $2,000 is the maximum the wealthy person can claim. In an outlandish case such as that—or go higher if you will, to persons with incomes up to $50,000 or $100,000—in most cases you are not going to get any tax relief from the removal of the floor, because of the ceiling. Indeed, the government raised the ceiling a bit in 1952, the year in which we thought we had won the battle for the abolition of what was then the 4 per cent floor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware I am rather full of this subject, having spoken on it so often. But as I indicated in my opening remarks the new thing that is needed, the something new that should be added, is not additional argument from this side of the house. The something new that should be added is an awareness on the part of the government that the time has come for favourable action on this matter. I am grateful for the support we have received in the past from members of the opposition in whatever part of the house they sit. They have supported this matter every time I have raised it. I am grateful for the unanimous support given to my motion in 1952. I am grateful also for the support that was given by a few Liberals, even in years when the measure was not looked upon with too much favour from the government side of the house.

I recall the supporting remarks of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Henry) and the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). I recall also the approval of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais). I recall the interest in this matter of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) and his implied support of the proposal. I remember, too, that long ago there were requests for the extension of this principle by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and even by the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) when he was the more humble private member for Renfrew South. I am grateful also for the support that has been given in the past by one who is no longer with us, one who has gone to his reward in the other place, the former member for Spadina.

It is perhaps unfair to single out only half a dozen Liberals when there have been 60 or more on the opposition side of the house who have stood up for this proposition every time it has been raised. And yet perhaps it is significant that there were six or eight on the other side of the house who felt that a few words might be spoken in favour of this principle of extending the coverage of income deductibility, no matter what stand the government was taking.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I want to see the list of allowable expenses extended.

I am also interested in a resolution on the order paper in the name of an hon. member from my own city. I may not agree with all its details, but I am interested in the proposal that premiums and taxes paid for hospitalization plans and health insurance schemes might be included as well. There is a whole range of things that might be discussed, but it seems to me the most important thing is to get rid of this floor and permit taxpayers to deduct their medical expenses right from the first dollar.

There is wide public interest in this. No one contributed more to the widening of that interest than did the former minister of finance in 1952 by taking a negative view on the matter, after the decision of the house that the government should consider the advisability of removing the floor. I thank him for the attention he drew to it in that way. I call on the present government and the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) to look on this matter favourably, to consider the justice of our appeal and to take action at this session to remove this floor. Toward that end I hope the house will support the motion which I now have the honour to present.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Those who were in the house in 1952 will well recall what happened when a similar motion dealing with a 4 per cent figure was introduced by the hon. member who has introduced this motion today. Everyone in the house appeared to give approval to the resolution at that time and undoubtedly all, with the exception apparently of those who sat on the treasury benches, expected the government to give some regard or effect to the resolution on which the house had so strongly declared itself. But we had assumed that there was more responsible government in the chamber than proved to be the fact; for the Minister of Finance did not choose to be bound by the firm and unanimous declaration of the opinion of the house.

However, before the last election the Minister of Finance did bring in a budget proposal which, so far as it went, did receive the unanimous approval of the house, contemplating a reduction from 4 per cent to 3 per cent of that portion of taxable income which must be first subtracted before medical expenses can be deducted in determining taxable income.

The Conservatives in the house, Mr. Speaker, have supported this resolution in the past and will, I am sure, continue to do so. It seems to me there is every reason why, in looking for means of introducing more equity into our taxation laws, as well as seeking needed reductions in taxation, this particular proposal should be favoured as one entitled to high priority.

It is not to be overlooked that the cost of hospitalization and medical expense is rising substantially all the time. On some other occasion we shall no doubt hear a good deal about the very heavy burden that is borne by the Canadian people in respect of their outlays on hospital, medical and nursing expenditures. It seems to me that this type of expenditure is a very proper one to be favoured from the point of view of deductions that ought to be allowed to taxpayers in calculating their taxable income.

Sir, I do not propose to discuss this matter at length. There is a question of principle involved here. I suppose we can expect to hear from the government the familiar refrain that it is estimated, based upon statistical reviews, that an average of 4 per cent of the income of the people goes to pay medical, hospital and nursing expenses, and therefore it is fair enough that that percentage should be subtracted, or a similar proportion should be subtracted, in reckoning what should be allowed by way of deduction on this account from income.

Well, sir, these statistics can be used to deal with average expenditure, but in my view average expenditure is not sufficient to justify any further withholding by the government of this benefit from the taxpayers. There are very good reasons why we should go the whole way and eliminate the 3 per cent which is now subtracted. The burden is never equally distributed; the outlays on medical and hospital expenses fall disproportionately heavily on those of modest income, but it affects all and here is a good place to bring a general benefit to bear for all taxpayers.

Hon. members who have followed debates on this subject in the past will not be surprised if I advert to a subject on which I have addressed the house on many occasions, namely the altogether too narrow definition that is placed by the act and by the government in its administration of the act on medical expenses. We have had many debates on this subject. Attention has been drawn repeatedly to the fact that some extraordinary anomalies exist under the present act, and those anomalies have not been improved by the way in which the act has been administered by the government.

Why some appliances prescribed, for example, by physicians should be regarded as proper medical expenses and others disallowed is something I have never been able to justify on any basis of logic. We have the familiar example of spectacles. They are not permitted to be included in the medical expenses of the taxpayer. Why they should not I have never been able to understand. The act permits certain forms of hearing aids to be included in the category, but aids to vision are rejected. One could go down through the category of appliances as defined in the act or in the light of the interpretations put upon the provisions of the act in the administration thereof.

Then there is the matter of drugs. This is a subject again that has engaged the attention of the house frequently, and where some remedial legislation is badly needed. The act has been amended on a couple of occasions in recent years specifically to permit about four drugs to be treated as deductible, in other words entitled to be included in the list of medical expenses. But why some should be included and others rejected again defies any sense of logic, and in many respects a sense of fair play. Sir, if drugs are prescribed by physicians as required for the health of a patient, why should they not be regarded as medical expenses?

Then we have a further anomaly, sir, in the case of physicians doing their own dispensing. Apart from four named drugs in the act, no status whatever is given to expenditures on drugs, even though prescribed by physicians, so far as the definition of medical expenses is concerned. We know that physicians in the cities and towns normally do not do their own dispensing. The country physician almost of necessity must do his own dispensing, and when he includes drugs or medicines in an all-inclusive account to the patient those items are allowed by the government. This anomaly has been known to exist for years, but the government has taken no remedial action as yet.

I am glad this motion offers an opportunity to reaffirm the support which has been given on previous occasions to the purport and principle of this resolution, and to point out that anomalies continue to exist and that the government has failed repeatedly to bring forward proposals at budget time designed to cope with these existing anomalies. Surely the time has come when this matter can no longer escape the attention of the government.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said, many of us have expressed our approval in the past. As has been stated this afternoon, the resolution moved by the hon. member has had our support on other occasions, and in fact on one occasion it had the support of the whole house.

I never could understand why the government has not taken more action than they have on this resolution. It has met with unusual unanimity, because we all agree that the fear of medical expenses is one of the greatest fears that a family man and his wife can have; especially those, such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned, who find difficulty in getting along on the wages they are earning.

That has been recognized no doubt by the whole house, in fact even by the government and the cabinet which refused to accept the unanimous recommendation of the house. Recently this government has been discussing health insurance policies with the provinces. That matter has been recognized by the party supporting the government for well over a quarter of a century because they have played with the idea at every election they have held for almost a third of a century.

It seems to me that principle has not been followed in practice. In fact one might take advantage of this opportunity to suggest to the government that before the budget is brought down they give consideration to going beyond this 3 per cent exemption and allowing contributions made by those who assist in the payment of medical expenses incurred by patients who cannot afford to pay them. I know of some hon. members who have been in near financial embarrassment for many years because they have taken care of members of their families over long periods of illness.

Those who contribute to the building of a hospital or who make substantial gifts to a hospital are allowed to deduct those contributions from income for income tax purposes under the present regulations. On the other hand, if a person contributes toward the care of a patient in hospital I think he should be entitled to a similar exemption.

I am not going to burden the house by repeating what has been said in other years or what has been said so well by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, except to say that it seems to me the government somewhat accepted the principle when they reduced the floor from 4 per cent to 3 per cent just before the last election. I would certainly be sorry to see this government remain in power long enough for them to have a sufficient number of elections to get the other 3 per cent off, because it would appear that it would take quite a long time even if they accepted the principle since apparently they take off only 1 per cent at a time. I do not know why they did not take off the 3 per cent because, as has been mentioned by the mover of the resolution, it means that the man with a small income does not receive much benefit while the man with a larger income, who usually does not find medical expenses too great a burden, is allowed to deduct what he pays out for medical expenses, what he pays to the hospital or for other charitable services.

I would urge the government to take cognizance of the motion before the house. Before the budget is brought down I hope the government and the cabinet will consider the approval that has been given to this matter, especially the complete unanimity which was shown in 1952. I expect that it will all disappear if we should have an election in 1956, or at least a portion of it; but even if we do not have an election until 1957 I would urge the government to adopt the principle and not wait to remove 1 per cent at election time, but remove the 3 per cent even a year before the election.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am completely in support of the resolution. It must be borne in mind that what is paid out for medical expenses is a dead loss. Usually a person faced with the payment of medical expenses also has his earning capacity decreased to a considerable degree. Frequently the total cost of a sickness cannot appear in any record which a person might present to show that he has been faced with medical expenses. For example, different kinds of food may have to be provided in nursing an individual back to health. There are many other ways in which the account presented by a doctor or hospital would not show the total cost. I think the time has come for us to give people with ordinary incomes at least something like a break. Let us just permit them to deduct all medical expenses.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of this resolution has said, we have had a discussion on this matter during each of the past several years. The records of Hansard are available to indicate the general principles which the government has advanced in debating this question from year to year.

I would remind hon. members that this particular exemption is of rather short-term duration in our income tax law. It was introduced as an exception to the general principles in 1942, and I think for a good reason. At that time, because of the war, the tax rates were at a very high level indeed. I could illustrate by simply pointing out that in the case of a married man without dependents with an income of $2,500, the tax and compulsory savings amounted to $651. At that time it was recognized, fortunately that a taxpayer who had extraordinarily high medical expenses would be in a very difficult position indeed, in view of the portion of his income that was required to finance the conflict in which we were then engaged. In the case of a married man without dependents with an income of $3,000, the tax and compulsory savings taken from him for the requirements of the government in 1942 amounted to $884.

In consequence there was a departure from the basic principle that there is one over-all personal exemption applying to the normal cost of living of all citizens. I may say that under our Canadian taxation provisions, that basic personal allowance and deduction from gross income before taxes are imposed is a larger sum than in either the United States or Great Britain, or indeed in any comparable country that we could consider in connection witht modern tax provisions.

I should like to point out that in recent years there has been a very substantial decrease in the general income tax that applies to people in the income groups I have already mentioned. As I have said, we have had debates on this subject in each of the past several years. I have indicated in debates in former years that the actual cost to the treasury of acceding to this form of tax relief would be in the neighbourhood of $50 million or $60 million. When tax reductions are possible, one must consider what form of tax relief would provide the widest possible benefit and would have the best possible economic results.

We had a very substantial tax reduction in 1953 as compared with 1952. I want to point out that an individual, married and with two dependents, respecting 1952 income was paying an income tax of $88. That was reduced in 1953, and it was reduced again last year. The same is true of the other person I used as an illustration, namely a married man earning $3,000, who in 1952 was paying a tax of $175 and in 1956 will pay a tax of $130. I point out to hon. members that this means broadly a reduction of 25 per cent in those years. That tax reduction applies to all taxpayers, whether or not they have had the particular misfortune of having medical bills to pay.

I also say that this form of utilization of tax deduction possibilities has considerable merit, because a great proportion of the working force of this country are not in the income tax paying group at all. To use approximate figures, we could say that the working force of this country is probably of the size of about five and a half million people. Some two million in that group do not at the present time have to pay income tax, because of the general exemptions that are provided in our law. It would be obvious to members that the form of tax relief suggested by the sponsor of this motion would apply only to persons who are in the smaller income taxpaying group.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he hoped there would be some new note in the annual debate on this subject. It must be obvious to him that one of the outstanding new notes that could be referred to would be the very important events of last week when the federal government, in the health field, made propositions to the provinces for sharing costs of hospital and diagnostic health services to a very impressive, and indeed gigantic, extent. The implications of that offer, if the majority of the provinces see fit to accept it, are at the present time, in dollar value, probably of the order of four or five times what is involved in this particular form of approach to the health question.

I would point out in connection with my other remarks that this form of federal government participation in the health field would be of general application, contrary to a scheme such as is proposed, which would assist with respect to health problems only those citizens who are in the income taxpaying group.

I would also remind hon. members, as we are inclined to forget, that actual individual tax rates have dropped radically from 1942, when I indicated the very great proportion of the income of one in the lower brackets—or in any bracket—that was required for governmental purposes. Indeed, I pointed out that the reduction in the tax rate for a person earning $3,000 is from $884 in 1942 to $130 in 1956.

In connection with the opportunities for tax deductions in this particular field for health expenses, the law has been very radically liberalized since 1942. In 1942 the ceiling of the total medical expenses that would be considered for exemption for tax purposes was only a fraction of what is provided for at the present time. In most of the years since 1945 there have been added other provisions that are greatly to the advantage of the taxpayer. The types of drugs, types of appliances and the calendar period for consideration have all been changed very greatly to the advantage of the taxpayer.

These details have all been set out in past debates but I would not want hon. members to overlook them. In addition there have been two changes in the rate of percentage for medical expense deduction that is considered as the norm, or the rate which must be exceeded if one is to get consideration for tax relief in this field. Originally it was 5 per cent. It was reduced in 1944 to 4 per cent. The hon. members who have spoken thus far have overlooked what was announced as the reason for that reduction from 5 per cent to 4 per cent.

The main reason for that reduction was a recognition of the fact, as was pointed out at that time, that the administrative cost of examining the number of small drug accounts that might be submitted by a taxpayer would be exceedingly expensive to the crown in the matter of administration. So in a general way the rate was reduced from 4 per cent to 3 per cent, taking that into account. Certain exceptionally expensive drugs were in themselves given qualification for exemption under the income tax statute as well.

Some reference has been made to a recent appeal under the Income Tax Act with respect to the expense of purchasing oxygen. As a matter of fact, although every year individuals, members of parliament, sometimes officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare and other people prior to the consideration of the annual budget present recommendations to the finance minister concerning things which they think should be subject to consideration in this section of the Income Tax Act. It happens the matter of oxygen is not one of those items which has been directed particularly to the attention of the department for tax consideration.

This section of the Income Tax Act receives very careful attention each year from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and all the officials of his department as well as the Department of National Revenue. All the recommendations that have been received in the preceding year from hon. members of this house and from outside the house are most carefully studied. It is a practice to seek the advice of the Department of National Health and Welfare in regard to the relative costliness, the apparent worth and necessity, and some other factors relating to a particular drug. I assure hon. members, several of whom have made some representation urging the addition of certain specific drugs beyond those which have been considered for exemption, that this aspect will be reviewed again in the weeks that are to ensue prior to the bringing down of the new budget.

I should like to point out that under present tax law a person married, without dependents, with an income of $3,000 whose medical expenses would be totally exempt under this motion, would receive a tax benefit of $13.50. I have no doubt whatever that most of the people across the country who read the newspapers and learn that this parliament is considering the question of deducting all medical expenses without any limitations such as we now have, at the 3 per cent level, will think that what is being considered is a deduction of the medical expenses from the amount of the tax cheque which they would otherwise be obliged to pay.

As I have pointed out, if the income of a married person were $3,000 the benefit under this resolution would be $13.50. This benefit would apply in a rather scattered form only to taxpayers who had to meet a particular medical situation. It would not have the merit of universality. In connection with the figure of $13.50 I would also like to point out that the tax reductions announced by the finance minister last year took no account of the previous tax reductions and provided tax relief for the person, married without dependents, earning $3,000 a year—comparing 1956 with 1954—to the extent of $20, compared with $13.50. That tax relief was available to everybody, and was available without the expense to the crown of examining every particular item of medical expense in the vouchers that would naturally end up with the examining officials in tremendous volume.

I think hon. members are fully aware, Mr. Speaker, of the basic principle that guides anyone when considering most carefully introducing into the Income Tax Act a very special feature that would exempt each and every form of medical expenditure. I mentioned that alternatively we have always placed general reliance on the basic personal exemption. What is allowed in this particular exemption is something that is considered unusual.

If every dollar of medical expense, dental expense and expenditures for drugs is to be allowed to the fullest extent as an exemption from gross income, and if those expenditures are of a normal nature and not of an unusual or hardship nature, I would ask hon. members what is the difference between allowing those and the suggestion that everyone should be entitled to put forward in detail the personal expenditure for clothes to keep one's family warm, the analogous expenditures on clothing or milk, food and the other necessities which constitute the normal expenditures of the average taxpayer.

In addition to that, although I deny that there is any failure to recognize in the health field the other difficulties which are encountered by taxpayers, I would point out there are also other hazards which sometimes provide unusual hardship. I could mention losses by taxpayers from fires, floods, tornadoes and things of that kind. Contrary to what is done in the health field, there is no income tax recognition of these forms of personal catastrophe and unusual personal expense.

I repeat that we generally consider that it is a simplification and it is orderly to concentrate for tax purposes on a basic exemption. I repeat that in this country that basic exemption is more generous to the taxpayer than is available in almost any country with which I am familiar, and certainly in any that could be compared with Canada in its economic life.

As has been said in past years, apart from the decision the house may take on this motion this particular question is bound to be considered by all those who are giving attention to the budget in the ensuing weeks. Hon. members have made reference to a development in 1952 in this house when there was a concentration of attention on the word "consideration" contained in a similar resolution and when the former parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance said that as it was customary to consider each and every representation from all over the country prior to the presentation of the budget, he felt it was difficult to say that a House of Commons resolution stating that the house would like consideration to be given to a matter of this kind would be turned down by a majority vote.

Hon. members know it was made perfectly clear at that time that consideration would be given to the problem. Consideration was given to it. The then minister of finance and the parliamentary assistant, in subsequent speeches in this house, made that perfectly clear. But at the time the resolution was being considered those sponsoring it were emphasizing the word "consider" and the word "favourably" was not in the resolution. I remind hon. members that on many occasions subsequently opposition members have made reference to that result.

Despite the fact that consideration had been given as the minister assured the house it would be given, just because it was not consideration that resulted in a decision which the sponsor hoped for, I recall that the leader of the sponsor's party felt that he was justified in moving a vote of want of confidence in the government. As I say, on many occasions this matter has been referred to.

There is a difficulty in which hon. members are placed at the moment, particularly those who support the government. This resolution in its broad terms and representations concerns individual items of drugs and other liberalizations of the section which will be receiving attention. If hon. members were to review the history of resolutions of this kind I think they will agree with me in this statement. I have no doubt that if the final result as announced in the budget was not completely to their satisfaction, they would have a great deal to say about the lack of consideration shown by the government, and what they might even think was some form of indifference to or lack of consideration for this house. I point out that fact to all hon. members.

I think it has been traditional that British parliaments do not consider that collectively they are in a position to move resolutions that affect the balance of ways and means. If hon. members, in advancing a motion of this kind, feel that it is obligatory for the government to accept the resolution fully, may I say this. I have indicated that it involves a revenue loss of $50 million. If this form of tax relief is given in this field, hon. members will realize the simplicity of the statement that it might deny relief in another field. Last year and in previous years I indicated what I thought were better forms of tax relief, provided on a better basis.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall make my remarks as brief as I can, so that if your decision on the yeas and the nays is not in the affirmative and a vote must be taken, we shall not have to take up too much of the supper hour.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has once again given us a review of the government's position with respect to this matter, and he has tried once again to set out the government's defence for not yet having removed the floor with regard to medical expenses. He started off by reminding us that this form of tax relief was first introduced in 1942, becoming fully effective in 1943, because of the abnormally high taxes which were in effect at that time. He makes a great deal out of the fact that income taxes have gone down considerably since then. He is correct in that statement. However, what he overlooks is the fact that medical expenses have gone up considerably since that time. A new situation has arisen with regard to medical expenses. Although it may have been a novelty to introduce this kind of tax relief in 1942 or 1943, we feel that it is a necessity today.

The parliamentary assistant makes a great deal out of the use of the word "normal" and contends that there are certain medical expenses that should be regarded as normal, even as food and clothing, and therefore should not be given special consideration in the matter of income tax deductibility. Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because not one of us would contend that every last article that some people might regard as medical expense—every last aspirin tablet, if you like—should be included; it is precisely for that reason that we feel that those medical expenses which the department does allow should be accorded deductibility right from the very first dollar. That is one way of dealing with the problem. If you cannot cover every last kind of expense, surely the kinds that are allowable should be allowed right from the first dollar.

I am interested in the extent to which the parliamentary assistant has raised the figure of what this proposal would cost. For the last year or two it has been said it would cost $35 million to $40 million to remove this floor. Today he said it would cost $50 million or $60 million. Of course prices are going up and medical costs are going up, and it may be that it would cost a bit more.

Mr. Benidickson: And wages are going up.

Mr. Knowles: But the parliamentary assistant also, having given those figures, goes on to say that if that much money is to be given to the Canadian people by way of tax relief, the government is obliged to consider what is the best way in which to give that relief.

Well, the fact of the matter is that $30 million or $40 million or $50 million given as general tax relief spread over the whole population is such a small amount per week to the average taxpayer, such a few cents, it is not worth nearly as much as it would be to have the knowledge that in the case of medical expenses there would be more substantial relief. I submit that those who would not get 3 or 4 cents a week off their general tax because the money was not used for a general reduction would feel it was worth more to have the knowledge that in the event of high medical expenses the full amount of those expenses could be deducted for income tax purposes.

The parliamentary assistant to the minister gave the example of an income taxpayer at the $3,000 level for whom taxes had been reduced, if I took down his figures correctly, by $45 from 1952 to 1956. The parliamentary assistant gave $175 as the income tax in 1952 and $130 as the income tax in 1956, or a reduction of $45. This only underlines my point. At the $3,000 level that is a total tax reduction in four years of only 86 cents per week, or a little over 20 cents per week per year. At the lower levels the reduction is even less than that.

The parliamentary assistant makes a great deal out of the fact that there are two million people in the working force who do not pay income taxes and therefore would not get any relief from the proposal I make. I do not know why he brings up the fact that in this country, which the Liberals boast is rolling in high gear, there are two million people in the working force whose incomes are so low they do not pay income taxes. This means that if they are single they are earning less than $1,000; if they are married without children they are earning less than $2,000; if they are married and have two children, they are earning less than $2,300 a year. I suggest it is a blot on the government of the day that it should allow, in this so-called fast rolling economy, so many people to be living on incomes as low as that.

The parliamentary assistant raised again the question of the way in which the resolution is worded, and the way in which a resolution such as this has to be treated by the government. He knows as well as anyone that a private member cannot word a resolution in such a way as to require the expenditure of money. All a private member can do is present a resolution that states the advisability of considering such a proposal. Most of us still feel that if the house as a whole approves of a resolution in those terms there is at least a moral obligation on the government to consider the matter, and to consider what very clearly must have been the views of the members when they passed such a resolution. I think it is well that once again we have an opportunity for the government to ascertain how members generally feel on this question.

The parliamentary assistant said there was one new item in the picture this year. I have already referred to it. It is the proposal made last week by the federal government at the conference with the provinces on the question of health insurance. As I have already indicated, I welcome the steps that have been taken. Naturally I do not believe the government's proposal goes far enough in this important field, but it goes a little farther than I thought this slow government might move by 1956.

The fact of the matter is that if the federal government's proposals come into effect in full there is still left for the individual Canadian the whole range of his doctor's and dentist's bills, a whole gamut of medical expenses that he will still have to pay on an individual basis. Helpful though this proposed and welcome hospitalization scheme will be, there is still a wide range of medical expenses that will fall upon the individual, which still makes necessary the kind of consideration in respect of income tax that this resolution calls upon the government to give.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the house to support this resolution asking for the removal of the 3 per cent floor with regard to the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes.

ACCIDENT PREVENTION

SUGGESTED SETTING ASIDE OF SAFETY WEEK FOR CHILDREN

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of setting aside a week to be known as the little people's safety measure week.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to introduce this resolution. I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will take it into consideration in his usual way, and I am not in the least concerned whether it goes to a vote or not so long as the Minister of National Health and Welfare considers it favourably.

I think this resolution is long overdue. When one looks at what has been happening to the children of Canada in the last few years —even the last few weeks—one will say it is high time that publicity be given to the need for the protection of our children.

We now have weeks for different things. We have a week for wild life, and in passing I should like to pay my tribute to men like Jack Miner who did so much to protect wild life in Canada, which work is being carried on by his family at the present time. But wild life, important as it is, fades into insignificance when compared with the lives of the boys and girls. Their lives are deathless and eternal.

I know we have many great things in Canada of which we are very proud. We have the greatest wheat growing fields in the world. We have the greatest wheat handling elevators in the world. We have the longest railroad in the world. We have the greatest fresh water lake in the world. We have the greatest mines in the world. But these fade into insignificance when compared with the lives of our boys and girls.

I have a chart here from which I obtained some vital statistics. It has a good deal to say about the death of children of various ages. For the whole of Canada in 1954 there were 124,520 deaths. Of this total there were 20,000 between the ages of 10 and 14, more than all older folk. I would like you to note that according to this chart almost twice as many boys as girls died or were killed in accidents at a young age. Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if you would allow this chart to be placed on Hansard. It has to do with the deaths of males and females under 14 years of age.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Did the hon. member indicate the source of the table?

Mr. McIvor: I obtained it from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman leave to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIvor: The chart is as follows:

There are many different causes of accidents. One is drowning. There are not many members in this house who do not know of a danger spot for little boys and girls. I can remember that one of the first things I had to do in Fort William was help Dr. Cook to give respiration to a little fellow who was drowned in the Neeking river. At the rear of the houses on the river there was nothing but a few willows to protect the boys and girls from drowning. On another occasion I saw a man sitting on the bank of Mosquito creek as I was coming in from the country on a Sunday afternoon. I asked, "What is the matter with you?" He said, "My boy went in swimming there," and you could not see a ripple of water. There was nobody to protect him or take him out. We got him out some time after.

Another cause of a good many accidents is cars and trucks. A little fellow will run out where you do not expect him to run. Sometimes accidents are caused by boys hitch-hiking on the rear of a car, or in the wintertime sliding behind the car. Many accidents occur when children are crossing the street. I can remember, not a great while ago, when a four-year old boy in Fort William ran out in front of a street car at a corner and lost his life.

Another outstanding cause of death of children is negligence and ill treatment by parents. When a father or mother indulges in drinking you might say they are not responsible, but they are responsible when the children suffer. Sometimes they leave them in an automobile while they go to a picture show or to a beer parlour. I must express my appreciation to the police of Fort William, because whenever they find a car with little children locked inside they take care of that car. Another thing children should be advised to do, especially little girls, is to be very careful in speaking to strange men. The tragic result of this has been seen in the past few days.

Another cause of accidents is fire. Sometimes this is the result of using matches; sometimes there are other causes. It is very difficult to save little children when a house is on fire. Another cause of accidents is the use of bicycles. When you are driving a car it is difficult to avoid a boy who swings out on a bicycle. Sometimes he will have another boy or perhaps two boys on the handlebar.

It is very difficult to protect the lives of those children. We know something of the importance of advertising. If the proper authorities in Canada would advertise a week for the protection of little folks it would go a long way to help. Fort William showed its appreciation of the importance of advertising. Our chief of police and city council kept advertising the prevention of accidental death in Fort William for 629 days; now it has started again, and we hope the period will be longer this time.

A week for the protection of little folks should be advertised through our teachers, through our school boards, through our city councils, through our police forces, through our service clubs, through our churches and by means of women's auxiliaries.

I know the government showed its interest in the protection of little folks when it passed the Family Allowances Act. That is one of the greatest things that has ever been done to help the children of Canada. Some people think the allowances should be increased. I believe the minister would like to increase it, too, if he could get the means to do so. Another thing that is going to very much help the health and protection of little children is a new plan for health insurance. This health insurance will be of more benefit to children under 14 years of age than it will be to those over 14 years of age, because the death rate is so much higher.

Children's patrols and police patrols are doing good work in helping to protect the children at crossings. I noticed in the press today that the birth rate in Canada reached a new high in 1955; 442,000 in 1955 as compared with 435,000 in 1954.

I am not going to labour this very much longer, but I will say this. We can protect the lives of our boys and girls. We can protect their health, but we have to do something else. It is not sufficient to teach them how to earn a living; we must teach them how to live and how to honour their fathers and mothers, how to respect their Queen and country and to worship their God and serve Him daily. We must instil these ideas into their hearts and minds.

I place this resolution before you, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will ensure that we have in Canada a week devoted to the protection of our little folks, because nothing in this country in the way of wealth or potential compares with our little boys and girls. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking to this resolution, or any idea that it would come to debate tonight. However, I do not think we should allow a motion of this kind to be discussed without the house expressing to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) its sincere appreciation for his efforts in relation to this resolution.

I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat has won a place in the heart of each of us, as has his very lovely wife who listened tonight from the gallery as he spoke. As all hon. members know this resolution is just the culmination of the principles by which the hon. member has lived in both his private and public lives. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that any one of us has to speak in favour of this resolution which has been brought forward with such sincerity by the hon. member for Fort William.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat has indicated, the resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Fort William is one that understandably makes a strong appeal to all sections of the house. The hon. gentleman has on several occasions directed our attention to matters of consequence, and he has used the vehicle of private member's day to bring to our attention some of the things he feels have importance, notwithstanding the fact that sometimes the practicality of the suggestion may be open to question.

I well remember the hon. member for Fort William anticipating many matters that later were adopted in other jurisdictions of government in this country, although the subject matter was discussed in this house long before it became law in these other areas of government.

The hon. member tonight directs our attention to a resolution which suggests that in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisability of setting aside a week to be known as the little people's safety measure week. In doing so the hon. gentleman directs our attention to the fact that one of the greatest causes of death in this country is the negligence of many drivers of motor vehicles.

The hon. gentleman, of course, is aware of the interest which now exists in trying to curb fatal accidents in Canada. This interest is the result of the initiative taken by a former colleague in the government, the former minister of national defence, Hon. Brooke Claxton, whose well known qualities of leadership caused a national organization with provincial branches to be set up to determine whether or not the heavy fatal accident toll in Canada could be somewhat abridged and arrested. I am sure that the hon. member, having directed our attention to this problem tonight, will find that whatever support can be given to this national safety movement formerly headed by the ex-minister of national defence is one of the effective ways of meeting the objective which he himself has in mind.

I may tell my hon. friend that the government of Canada is giving consideration to some measure of financial assistance along with the provinces to a safety campaign. Whether or not the government's policy will be finalized along the lines indicated remains to be seen, but I merely mention this interim consideration to indicate to the hon. gentleman the government's interest in this problem. I should also point out that the question involved is one which, under our constitution, properly resides with the provinces, and the provinces would be very jealous of any action on our part that would interfere with their constitutional rights.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: Well, my hon. friends on the other side of the house are laughing—

Mr. Coldwell: No. no.

Mr. Martin: I am sure if we were to interfere with the rights of the government of Saskatchewan my hon. friends would be the first to bitterly and vigorously complain.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Not if it is a progressive step.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says not if it is a progressive step, but my hon. friend knows there have been many occasions when interference with provincial sovereignty has caused my hon. friend to rise with great alacrity and offer opposition.

Mr. Argue: Bring in health insurance.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says bring in health insurance. My hon. friend does not like the fact that the government has already taken the initiative in this regard.

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister knows that the opposite is the case.

Mr. Martin: I was not directing my remarks to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I am referring to my smiling friend who is sitting behind the leader of the C.C.F.—

Mr. Coldwell: Oh; Mr. Knowles?

Mr. Martin: —the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), the young member who sits behind him and who on occasions finds it extremely difficult to restrain himself.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: Is it not a fact that this government passed an act which provided for a national wild life week? Does that not interfere with the constitutional rights and jurisdiction of the provinces?

Mr. Martin: I was about to come to that. My hon. friend is quite right in saying what he did but there is a vast difference between wild life in the woods and the kind of wild life we have on our highways. The point my hon. friend makes is indeed an important one and brings me back to the real subject at issue—

Mr. Argue: Take a bow.

Mr. Martin: —and that is whether or not we should set aside a week to be known as the little people's week.

I think the point we really want to emphasize is that not only one week should be devoted to this worthy purpose, but that every day every Canadian should think of the safety of our young people.

I commend my hon. friend for this resolution. I would ask him to join with me in recognizing that we want every day to be observed in the way he suggests. Having brought this matter to the attention of the house so forcefully and with such vigour, I am sure he will feel that his purpose will have been well served.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word or two on this resolution. I feel that this objective is something that is worth while. May I say that I think the Ontario government has gone about the matter in the right way. In connection with the school safety patrol they now have an officer who goes from one municipality to another. That officer was a traffic officer who was trained in Peterborough. His name is Don MacKay. He is an excellent man for the job. He is a good talker, and he can speak to the children. He loves children. That safety patrol, such as we have here in Ottawa and in various municipalities around the province, composed of children trained by officer Don MacKay and the police in the various cities, has saved thousands and thousands of lives.

There is, however, one thought that came to me today when I was driving here from Peterborough. While I was coming through the outskirts of Ottawa a youngster was crossing the road. He never saw to the right or to the left because of the fact that he had on a high collar which was like blinkers on a horse. He could see only in front of him. I think it is wrong for a child to be bundled up so he cannot see to the right or to the left. In some of the states to the south of us they are extremely strict about these highway school signs, and they keep them on the road all day long and all night long. When you come to one of these signs and it says, "Ten miles an hour", if you go 11 miles an hour you get a ticket; or if you approach one of those signs faster than, say 20 or 25 miles an hour the person on patrol will wave you down and tell you that you must not pass that sign and go through that section at a speed greater than 10 miles an hour.

Mention has been made of the health plan. The Minister of National Health and Welfare mentioned it tonight. The dominion government—this government here—have been forced into the health plan by the Ontario government, as they have been forced into the disability pension plan and other plans of that kind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Yes; the premier of Ontario was the one who brought forward the subject of health insurance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Yes; he was the one who brought it up for consideration. Now this government is trying to make hay while the sun shines.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I must rise on a point of order. If the hon. gentleman is going to discuss this matter in the vein he has now indicated, I would suggest to you that he is clearly out of order. It is true that I mentioned the subject, but I did so only because there had been a chirp from under the gangway.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I chirped only because the minister chirped, and I did not want him to get in the last chirp.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Before the hon. member for Fort William withdraws his motion, Mr. Speaker, may I say how happy I am to give moral support to my old friend. With regard to the means of applying his resolution, I think he cannot go far wrong if he consults privately with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, because there is no man in this whole country who knows how to put over a good idea better than does that minister.

May I say how happy I am from my seat here in the House of Commons to give what support I can to my old friend the hon. member for Fort William. When I first met him 20 years ago, when I helped to elect him first to this House of Commons, I found that he and his wife were just as much beloved and respected in the city of Fort William then as they are now in the halls of this parliament building, not only in this chamber but in the other place. When the hon. member picks a cause like the safety of the young children of Canada, it seems to me it is typical of his whole career.

I was trying to think tonight of other people who had done good work in this regard. I remember that in 1928, when I first went as a young editorial writer to what was then the Globe—that was before it fell into a gold mine and became the Globe and Mail—we had in our circulation department a bright young man whose name was C. George McCullagh. I refer to the late C. George McCullagh, who later became publisher of the combined paper. Of the many good things C. George McCullagh did when he became a rich and powerful publisher, I do not think in his lifetime he ever did anything finer than what he did on the old Globe back in the twenties, when he went all over central Canada promoting what was called the Just Kids safety club. The whole purpose of that club was to teach children to look both ways before they crossed the street.

I should just like to say that in bringing forward this resolution in such a fine way, it seems to me the hon. member for Fort William has done again the same kind of service that he has been doing all his life. Perhaps with the indulgence of the house, Mr. Speaker, you will forgive me if I tell a little story about the hon. member for Fort William, which I heard for the first time when he was elected in Fort William in 1935. Mr. Speaker, another government was in power at that particular time. Of course those were days when we had scores of thousands of unemployed people traipsing across this country because, as you will recall, those people had to go through Fort William.

They told the story of a modest clergyman who had worn his old black coat so long that it had turned green with age. Finally one day one of his congregation took him in and bought him a magnificent new black coat. About 10 days later the gentleman who had made the purchase saw the same clergyman on the street wearing the same old coat which had turned green with age. When he asked the clergyman the reason he received this reply: "You see, I met one of those boys off the train who had no job and no coat, so I gave him mine".

That clergyman, Mr. Speaker, was the same gentleman who tonight introduced this resolution designed to help save the lives of the children of Canada, namely the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I do not want to take up any time, Mr. Speaker, except to join with those who have spoken in favour of the general principle of a safety week in the interests of saving the lives of boys and girls. When I first read the resolution on the order paper some week or so ago and saw that it contained the proposal to set up a week known as little people's safety measure week I said to myself, "I think I will have to get in on this, because I am a little man, and it is about time somebody paid some attention to us little people." The group of Social Crediters here thought likewise.

I believe we are all in favour of the principle involved. I do think, however, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was not up to his usual form in speaking extemporaneously on this matter and introducing the constitutional angle on it. He may have a point there, but I feel he was straining a little to make any sort of—

Mr. Martin: May I just point out that when this was mentioned two years ago, two different provinces took exception.

Mr. Hansell: What I was going to say was this. If it were desired to have anything of this nature on a national scale, I doubt very much whether it would be practical to refer it to the provinces. There is another way. I think the hon. member who introduced the resolution had in mind bringing the subject to the attention of the public and those organizations that may be concerned. I feel that is an admirable thing. There are organizations throughout Canada, national in scope, that could very well bring about a further consciousness of the need for a safety week for boys and girls.

We have our Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A. and various organizations interested in young people's work. We have our churches. We have our service clubs. I have noticed when listening to the radio that many of these organizations, and I believe many radio stations by courtesy, have announced over the air the necessity for being careful when one is driving. I do not know that the radio stations pay particular attention to the boys and girls, but they have rendered a service in that respect. I see no reason why some of these organizations could not do work along that line. It may cost a little money, but I am quite certain that this house would be willing to vote them some sort of grant. We make grants to other organizations. The amount of money would not be great, but we could support them in this way.

We have our health week. We have fire prevention week. We have brotherhood week. I believe we have crippled children's week, and as has been announced tonight, national wild life week. Soon we are going to run out of weeks. I feel we are all in agreement with the principle here, and I would urge that organizations who are interested in young people's work take a cue from the discussion tonight and project themselves a little further to bring about the desirable objective set out in this resolution.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): I believe the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) gave the reason I sat down so quickly, Mr. Speaker, when he rose. Since he is the little fellow in our group, I thought he should be the one to speak for the little people. As the hon. member for Macleod pointed out, we certainly agree that some sort of educational program should be put forward to educate the younger children of the country about the dangers they have to face every day.

I want to make one observation to the minister, one which came to me while he was speaking about the constitutional aspect of the resolution. I thought possibly his department could print a pamphlet of some description, written in a manner that would be understood by the younger children and perhaps printed in the style of a comic book, which the pre-school children could have read to them by their parents.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend has not seen the pamphlet we have distributed?

Mr. Thomas: No.

Mr. Martin: I will be glad to send it to him.

Mr. Thomas: I would urge a pamphlet of that nature that could be read by the younger children. I would appreciate it if the minister could advertise that, to let the different organizations know and have them made available to the children.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to say a few words in support of the general principle of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Fort William. As the hon. member for Macleod said a few moments ago, it is to be hoped that some of the safety organizations in the country may obtain guidance from some of the remarks made this evening.

I do not want to take more than a moment or two, but I should like to refer to one aspect of safety for children. The particular aspect to which I am referring is a safety measure for children under 16 years of age who ride bicycles on our streets. As hon. members know the number of automobiles, particularly in urban areas, has greatly increased since the end of world war II. In fact they have increased at a far greater rate than road facilities. In addition, because of the increased standard of living in this country and the increased amount of money available, far more children ride bicycles than formerly. I believe all hon. members have had experience at one time or another with children around 10 or 12 years of age who ride bicycles and who pay little attention to the rules of the road. They duck in and out of traffic; they pass cars on the right and they come out without warning. It is not their fault, they just do not know any better.

If these children are going to drive vehicles on the street, they should have some instruction in the school or in the home. It is to be hoped that these organizations who are interested in this sort of thing will consider this aspect of the matter, because children on bicycles on busy streets of our cities at noon hour and after four o'clock are a great danger, not only to themselves but to motorists. I think this problem could be overcome by a program of education, explaining to the children what they should and should not do when they ride bicycles.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): I should like to say a few words on this important subject of saving the lives of the children of Canada. Every day in the newspapers we read that fires and highway accidents have taken a toll of our children. I commend the mover of this resolution for having introduced this important subject here.

I suggest that the best method of instituting a week such as that envisaged by this resolution would be through the school teachers. Then the children could be told of the dangers of crossing streets, riding their bicycles when it is dark, or walking along roads. I would think that if during one week the teachers of this country told the children what to do and what not to do to protect their own lives, we should benefit a great deal from such a campaign.

I congratulate the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for having given us this opportunity of expressing our views on this subject tonight.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have paid close attention to the remarks of the various members who have taken part in the debate on that very important question of the safety of our young children, and I add my congratulations to those they have offered the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor).

In general, the discussion has been mainly on the highway or street safety for children who are riding their bicycles or walking along the road. But I believe we should lay more stress on the safety measures that could be taken to save the lives of our young children at home. As a matter of fact, the appalling number of young children who have perished in recent fires should prompt us to ask the authorities and the different parish or city organizations to undertake an education campaign wherever possible but first of all among parents. For, according to the papers, many of those tragedies occur while parents are away from home, having left their children in the care of some other child of 12 or 14, and even quite often, of a 10 year old baby sitter. An educational campaign should therefore be launched by public bodies and various organizations for the benefit of parents.

The national week suggested by the hon. member for Fort William should be favourably received by all. It should, of course, be a voluntary and country-wide campaign, in order to stop this plague which, for the past few years, has taken far too many lives.

Again, I congratulate the hon. member and hope his resolution will arouse the people of Canada. This campaign should, moreover, be carefully prepared for its purpose will consist in educating not only the children but, first and foremost, the parents themselves. That, to my mind, is where we should start.

(Text):

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the sentiments expressed by hon. members. The outstanding need of course, is the advertising of the dangers that confront our boys and girls. I am not going to ask for a vote because I do not think it would do a bit of good. It would not help us get any further, because the minister has already promised to consider it. I want him to consider it favourably without a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. gentleman is asking to withdraw his motion. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEASURE TO ENSURE FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to the taking of whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following heading and sections:

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

"XII Human Rights

148. Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws:

(a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

(b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.

(c) Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.

(d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.

(e) Subjecting any person to arbitrary arrest or detention or denying to any person the right after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against such person and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

(f) Suspending the right to habeas corpus or depriving any person of a fair trial or the right to be represented by counsel.

149. The rights provided in section 148 shall be enjoyed without distinction of race, sex, religion or language and the right to vote in any election of members of parliament of Canada or the legislative assembly of any province shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, religion, language or sex.

150. The rights conferred by sections 148 and 149 hereof of this act shall not be deemed to abridge any existing right of any person."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I did not rise to take part in the debate on the resolution which the hon. member for Fort William has just withdrawn because I told the whip that I would proceed with this resolution tonight, and I regard it as somewhat in line with the resolution moved by the hon. member for Fort William, because both of us have in mind certain freedoms. One of those freedoms which the hon. member for Fort William has in mind is the freedom of children to walk and ride safely along our streets and public highways. That indeed, of course, is a freedom not covered by the resolution I am moving, but nonetheless it is a very real one for the children of our country. Consequently, while I was very much in favour of the resolution, I did not want to prolong the debate by participating in it.

About a year ago, Mr. Speaker, I moved this resolution in the house. It is in precisely the same terms as the resolution I moved on that occasion. At that time we had what I thought was a very worth-while debate, but we came to no conclusion. On this occasion I am hoping that those who participate in the debate will keep the purpose of this resolution in mind. That purpose is that sooner or later we may write into the constitution of our country, the British North America Act, a new section, or new sections, worded as I have them here. Therefore at this stage I should like to read them into the record. They are as follows:

"XII Human Rights

148. Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws:

(a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.

(b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.

(c) Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.

(d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.

(e) Subjecting any person to arbitrary arrest or detention or denying to any person the right after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against such person and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

(f) Suspending the right to habeas corpus or depriving any person of a fair trial or the right to be represented by counsel.

149. The rights provided in section 148 shall be enjoyed without distinction of race, sex, religion or language and the right to vote in any election of members of parliament of Canada or the legislative assembly of any province shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, religion, language or sex.

150. The rights conferred by sections 148 and 149 hereof of this act shall not be deemed to abridge any existing right of any person.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that section 150 is placed in the resolution so that beyond peradventure it would not be considered that the sections that precede it in any way limit the rights that have been established by law, by custom or by precedent to the citizens of Canada generally over the years.

Throughout the long history of the fight for human rights and freedom we have found from time to time the necessity of putting into writing the rights or the privileges that had been obtained or attained in former years by means of precedent. If we look through the pages of our Canadian history, as well as the history of the country from which we derive so many of our freedoms, Britain, I think we shall find that this is so. Often certain rights were established by custom; then later on it was thought wise by the people of the country and by the representatives whom they elected to their representative institutions, whether they were the parliaments of medieval times, the parliaments which followed the overthrow of the Stuart kings at the end of the 17th century, or more recently, to confer certain rights of representation and of voting upon various groups of people in our own country and in the country from which we derive so much of our inspiration and so many of our institutions.

I might remark to the house that from time to time in this country over the years the right to vote has been limited by the action of legislatures because of race or religion. I only refer to measures that have been adopted by this parliament since I have been a member of this house in order sometimes to restore rights that had been abrogated, or to ensure rights that had been taken away by other legislatures.

It was not so long ago that persons professing a religion which caused some of the wilder men and women in that religious group to do things which were not in conformity with the manner in which we expect our citizens to behave—I refer of course to the Doukhobors—found that the right to vote for members of the parliament of Canada was based upon an enactment of the legislature of British Columbia. Because the province of British Columbia denied that group of people that right, they were denied the right to vote for representation in this parliament. I know of cases where the people on one side of the family were of Doukhobor descent and those on the other side were descendants of United Empire Loyalists; yet they were all denied the right to vote because they were said to be, and legally were, the descendants of Doukhobors.

I think it is wrong that this kind of thing should be done in connection with persons professing a certain religion, even though some disobey the law, provided the majority are law-abiding as is the case with the group I have just mentioned. In my own province of Saskatchewan we have large populations in some areas of people of Doukhobor origin, Doukhobor religion and Doukhobor descent. I venture to say that there are no more law-abiding citizens, there are no citizens who are becoming better integrated into our society in Saskatchewan than some of the descendants of those Doukhobor settlers who came to this country just before the dawn of the present century.

Consequently when any group of people are denied the right to exercise what we regard as the fundamental and basic rights of citizens, not only their rights but the rights of all citizens are to some degree endangered, because we never know when the denial of those rights may be extended to other groups within the community. Only a few days ago I was reading in the new issue of what is perhaps now the national magazine, Maclean's magazine, an editorial dealing with another religious group in one of our provinces which may be denied the right to hold property as we understand that right. The editorial remarked that recently a group of municipal representatives in the province of Manitoba had approached the Manitoba government with the request that legislation be enacted similar to that which had been enacted in the province of Alberta several years ago to prevent people who professed a strange religion, who were considered to be a strange people, the Hutterites, from extending their holdings of land and establishing colonies I think within 40 miles of any existing colony.

The writer of that editorial pointed out very properly that if that kind of request were granted by the government of Manitoba —I say at once that the writer of the editorial was of the opinion that it would not be granted by the present government of Manitoba—it would constitute an infringement of a right which is implicit when we as a national parliament invite people to come to this country. When we allow people to come to Canada under our immigration regulations, if they are law-abiding people we should permit them the same basic rights as the rest of us possess. No one will deny that the people to whom I have just referred are law-abiding.

In moving a resolution of this description, I have these recent matters and examples in mind. Then, too, I have noticed legislation recently introduced in one of the provinces in connection with the newsprint industry that might—I do not say it will—be used to limit the freedom of the press, that might be used indeed to stop the publication of a newspaper or a magazine which the authorities in that province did not like, which was violently opposed to the provincial regime. I say at once that I do not know that the legislation would be used for that purpose, but the obvious inference on reading the legislation is that it might be so used.

Then some years ago we had legislation, which was denied by the courts and the federal government, for the limitation of the freedom of the press in the province of Alberta; I refer to the provincial act of 1937.

Consequently it seems to me that we should have such rights of citizenship clearly set forth in our constitution. This resolution if accepted would write into our constitution some of these basic rights which are not written in at the present time. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) may say that the preamble of the British North America Act provides these rights, or perhaps by inference, custom or precedent there is an enjoyment of them; but I think I have already indicated several examples which would show that these rights which are surely national in scope are not always respected by provinces and legislatures.

I am happy, of course, that from time to time our courts do interpret the constitution in such a manner as to safeguard some of our basic rights. The recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in connection with the violation of a home by the police in a neighbouring province is a case in point. In that instance the final legal authority in this country, the Supreme Court of Canada, ruled that provincial police had acted in violation of the constitutional rights of a man who was holding a religious service in his home. They ruled also that in confiscating the literature and the Bible and deporting the man across the boundary they were infringing one of the basic rights of Canadian citizenship. So I say that from time to time our courts protect us by the interpretation of the law and the constitution.

Then, of course, there is undoubtedly discrimination as between individuals, sometimes on account of racial origin. It is very deplorable that in this province of Ontario, while the provincial legislature did pass an act making it an offence to discriminate against an individual because of his colour, that law has still been defied in one or two of the smaller places in Ontario and once or twice, indeed, I believe even in the city of Toronto. Racial discrimination does occur from time to time.

The Minister of Justice may say again, like the Minister of National Health and Welfare in another connection, that this might be considered as under provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, of course, some colour is given to that argument by the fact that several provinces have on the statute books legislation forbidding such discrimination. But it seems to me that we should have that protection as an inalienable right of our Canadian citizenship as such; not a right because we are residents of the province of Ontario, through a provincial act; or of the province of Saskatchewan, because of a provincial act; or of any other province because of a provincial act. We should have it as a constitutional right written into the constitution within a bill of rights.

That, as I have said, is one of the purposes of this resolution. Sometimes I have felt that even under our federal authority our immigration department has from time to time discriminated against persons who have come here, sometimes indeed ostensibly to do one thing when they may wish, having been here for some time, to remain to do another. I have felt that simply because they were of a different race or a different colour, they have been deported. Of course I may be wrong in my judgment; I may be erring in that opinion; none the less that is my opinion, and I think it has been shared by a good many people who have looked into some of these cases in our country.

When we look around the world we see how from time to time in various other countries the rights of individuals have been abrogated or limited by the rise to power of persons who have no sympathy with human rights and fundamental freedoms. I know it will be said—perhaps the Minister of Justice will say it when he takes part in this discussion—that if you look across the sea, to the United Kingdom for example, you will find that the rights enjoyed by the people there are not embedded in a bill of rights, that they stem from a number of acts and a number of precedents.

Some of the precedents have been created by the courts. I have in mind at the moment the right to liberty of the individual, which was not originally set forth in any law but was expressed by Lord Mansfield. When it was brought to his attention that a negro—I have forgotten his name, but I think he was called James Somersett—was in slavery in England and was to be taken away again into slavery by his owner, the judge said something to this effect, "The air of this country is free, and he who breathes the air of this country must enjoy freedom." He ordered that slave to be set free. There was no bill of rights in the sense that I am discussing a bill of rights. There was no act of the British parliament which ensured to that individual the right to life and liberty, but he had that right by the judgment of a court. Subsequently the freedom of slaves was decreed by parliament.

It may be said, of course, that in the great country to the south they have written into their constitution a bill of rights; but you have only to look at what has happened there, particularly in the southern states recently, to realize it has not meant all that the persons who wrote that bill of rights intended it to mean when they wrote it into the constitution. However, I do not think that alters by one jot or tittle the fact that the writing into our constitution of a bill of rights of the description I have had the honour to place before the house tonight would imbed in our constitution, in the minds of our people, those basic rights of citizenship that are set forth, and give protection.

From time to time, of course, within recent years we have had the denial of the very first freedom I mention here; freedom of speech and expression. Under all sorts of local enactments, sometimes municipal laws, persons who wished, shall we say, to conduct a religious service in the street were stopped from doing so; not only ordered to move on, but sometimes even arrested for causing obstruction.

Freedom of speech is a very precious thing which we enjoy under the constitution, and it should be specifically written in. Some of us have had the pleasure of strolling on an evening up to Hyde park corner and hearing the freedom of speech there under the protection of the law, in the person of a policeman. I remember when I was there in 1944 and the buzz bombs were coming over London, three Canadian friends and I walked one evening up to Hyde park corner, and we heard an agitator denouncing the war, denouncing the prime minister and the various political parties supporting the war, and calling the young men and women standing around fools for believing that the war was being fought for human freedom and human rights. Yet the policeman saw to it that the speaker was not interfered with.

That seemed to me, at least, to be going a very long way in freedom. None the less, because that freedom exists I believe that the rights of individuals in the United Kingdom and the institutions of that country are probably safer from violent overthrow than the institutions of almost any country in the world—not that I think that our own institutions are now in any danger in that respect. Freedom of speech and of expression are among the basic rights of the individual as is, of course, freedom of religion. Canadians belonging to one religious denomination regard people who attend religious services of other denominations not only with equanimity but with esteem and understanding, and that is a precious quality in the society in which we live.

I have already mentioned freedom of the press and of means of communication. I should also mention, of course, that right that has been secured after many years of struggle, the right to organize, the right to associate, and the right to express oneself with one's fellows through an organization and in association with people of like mind.

I have outlined other liberties in this resolution including freedom from cruel or unusual punishment. I do not think punishment of this kind is inflicted by any of the courts in this country. I do not know of a case in recent times which has brought a sentence of cruel or unusual punishment. I have sometimes thought, however, that the sentences meted out might have been more severe than was perhaps warranted by the crime; but even those punishments could not be characterized as cruel or unusual.

Within our own lifetime we have had instances of arbitrary arrest and detention, and within my experience in this house there have been instances of the denial of the right of the individual after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against him and to be given a trial or released within a reasonable time. I am not going to go back and discuss in any detail the arrests that followed the Gouzenko episode, but I have always regarded what happened then as something of a blot on our Canadian jurisprudence, because some of the people who were picked up for questioning were held incommunicado, were not given access to legal counsel and were not charged with any crime. Although some of them were subsequently brought before the courts, found guilty and sentenced, others who had been treated in the same manner were found innocent. In that case, at least, there was a denial of justice of which most of us feel ashamed when we look back upon it.

Another right is that of habeas corpus. How often we have heard habeas corpus mentioned; yet I suppose there is no right we enjoy to which we are not heirs because of the descent of our constitution from that of Britain. The right of habeas corpus is the right of an individual to demand the production of someone who is under arrest, so that he may be brought before a proper court and given an opportunity to plead.

These are some of the rights I should like to see written into our constitution. It may be said, of course, that those rights are not in danger. However, tonight I have mentioned some of our rights which have been in danger or have actually been denied from time to time. It might be argued that the inclusion of these rights in the constitution of our country is wholly unnecessary, but I do not think so. Who knows what conditions may exist in this country at a future date? We have seen strange movements arise in some of the most progressive countries of the world. I know that 20 years ago I would not have thought it likely—indeed, I was going to put it more strongly and say I would not have thought it possible—that that democratic country in central Europe which was established after the first great war under President Masaryk would fall under dictatorship and become a totalitarian country. I would neither have thought that likely nor, as I said, possible; but that has happened. We do not know but that a group of individuals who would abrogate some of our basic freedoms—freedom of speech, of association, of the press, of religion and the freedom to vote without regard to race, creed or colour—might obtain a sufficiently large following in the country to deny us the rights that go with Canadian citizenship.

It may be said, of course, that even if we write these freedoms into our constitution, such a group would set it aside. That may be true; none the less the very fact that these rights were written into our constitution and were regarded as basic rights would make it more difficult for them to dispense with those rights. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am again moving this resolution, not because I expect the Minister of Justice to accept it tonight in view of what he said last year, and not because I expect the house to adopt it if the minister opposes it tonight, but because I hope it will continue to be moved either by myself or by someone who may come after me until such time as a section somewhat like this is written into our constitution and becomes part of the permanent written constitution of this land.

I have sometimes been twitted because of the fact that I have given lectures in the past in which I said that I preferred an unwritten constitution to a written constitution. However, this is a country consisting of provinces, and it has a national, federal parliament. Consequently we had to have a written constitution. I would have been very happy indeed if the fathers of confederation had followed the inclination, shall I put it that way, of Sir John A. Macdonald and been able to establish a unitary form of government in this country. That was impossible, of course, because we had provinces that differed in their civil law, their conception of property rights and their desire to control—and quite properly—their educational facilities. Hence we could not have that. But I am quite sure that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the members of the government would have found the country much more easily governed had this been a unitary state instead of a federal state.

Because we are a federal state, I think it is more important that we should have written into our constitution a bill of rights of this description, so that we might not only limit our own power to abrogate the rights of citizenship within the provinces, but so the provinces should not have the right to abrogate the basic rights of national Canadian citizenship within their jurisdictions. So this resolution, if it became a bill which was introduced and passed, would limit the power of this parliament to deny any citizen any basic right, and by the same token it would also deny to legislative assemblies the right to abrogate any such right.

Incidentally, may I say this. I note that some legislative assemblies are now calling themselves provincial parliaments, and that certain premiers of provinces are now calling themselves prime ministers. According to my reading of the British North America Act, I thought there was to be one parliament of Canada; and by the same token I should think there would be but one Prime Minister of Canada. I make that comment incidentally, because this innovation has struck me as another one of those attempts to lower the prestige of the Prime Minister and of the parliament of Canada by placing the legislative assemblies and their premiers on the same level as that of the parliament of Canada and the office of the first or principal adviser of Her Majesty the Queen within Canada.

I want to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by thanking the house for giving me its attention again. I may say that I did not come down here tonight expecting to move this resolution. However, I discovered that there were some who expected me to move it. Their resolutions coming next, I found that I would have gravely embarrassed them if I had failed to move this resolution. I am therefore commending it to the Minister of Justice and the house. If not tonight or if not at this session, I hope that on some future occasion, even in some future session, such a bill of rights will be adopted and become part of the accepted constitution of this great, free land which we want to maintain in freedom and in peace.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who has just taken his seat said that when he came down to the chamber tonight he did not expect to be moving this resolution. I did not expect either that he would be moving it or that I would be replying to it. I listened, as I always do, with great interest to what the hon. gentleman had to say. After listening to him and agreeing with 90 per cent of the letter of his speech and with 100 per cent of its spirit, I have come to the conclusion that we think remarkably alike on this subject.

Mr. Coldwell: I think so, too.

Mr. Garson: Those points upon which we differ could perhaps be resolved more quickly if, instead of confining our discussion on this matter to debate in the house, we were to get together for an hour some time. Either he would convince me that I was wrong on those points on which I differ with him, or vice versa I might hope to convince him that he was wrong.

Mr. Coldwell: Let us have a try some time.

Mr. Garson: Yes; I should be happy indeed to do so. My hon. friend says he is a great admirer of the institutions of Great Britain and of its constitution, using that word in the large sense. He has instanced some cases which exemplify the way in which the British constitution protects the life and liberty of the British citizens.

With great respect may I say this—and this is one of the points whereon we differ—that I do not think the basis for his admiration is in all respects precisely correct. It is not because, in the case having to do with freeing of the slave, the judge reached the decision he did; it is not because of the existence of Magna Carta or of the bill of rights of 1688 which my hon. friend—I am sure unintentionally—rather left with us, or attempted to do so, the impression that it was the same kind of bill of rights which he is now asking us to accept.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, no; I would not leave that impression.

Mr. Garson: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that.

Mr. Coldwell: Quite the contrary.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend whether, for the purposes of our present discussion, the essential characteristic of the British constitution is not that all these hard-won liberties which the British people have acquired over the centuries can be changed overnight by an act of parliament if parliament, in its wisdom or unwisdom, sees fit to do so. My hon. friend has spoken in terms of great praise of this political and constitutional system of Great Britain. There is not a syllable of the praise he enunciated which I would not endorse with all my heart.

It is because of the fact that I endorse his sentiments that I deprecate that he of all people in this house should seek to change an essential characteristic of the Canadian constitution which we have inherited from Great Britain, namely the principle of the sovereignty of parliament, and in its stead to adopt the type of bill of rights which they have in the United States constitution and which, if I understood him correctly this evening, he himself does not admire in all its parts.

Mr. Coldwell: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Does he consider the analogy between the constitution of the United States and the constitution of Britain—the one a written constitution and the other an unwritten constitution—to be a sound analogy? We have a written constitution.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, I think he misses the real point entirely. It is not a question of whether the United States constitution is a written one and the British largely unwritten so much as it is a question of whether, in a British democracy, we the people have sufficient confidence in our own judgment as democrats and sufficient confidence in our own legislative assemblies that we are not afraid to trust ourselves and our children, and our representatives in parliament to reach wise decisions. If we do not trust them, and if we do not trust the processes of democracy in our country, then we shall seek to restrict and hedge in the powers of the elected representatives of the people, as is done in the United States constitution.

On the occasion on which this matter has been discussed previously I attempted to make the point that if we could look around us in the world and see any written constitution such as that which as my hon. friend advocates restricts the powers of its legislative assembly, and if we could see that in practice it really protected the liberties of the subject, then I would say by all means adopt it. But I suggest to my hon. friend that he will look around the world in vain for any country whose constitution is restricted by a bill of rights which provides even a fraction of the protection of human rights and liberties that we are very proud to possess in the British countries, and specifically in Canada.

Now, my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar has referred to the British North America Act, and correctly, because that written statute is the main part of our Canadian constitution. He will see that in the very first paragraph of the preamble to that statute it says:

> Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion under the crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom:

I say, Mr. Speaker, that following the passage of that imperial act it is a matter of history that in this country we have enjoyed all the traditional freedoms of British people. We have enjoyed them, if the comparison is not an invidious one—and certainly my hon. friend will not say it is invidious—to a far greater extent than those same freedoms have been enjoyed by any country anywhere in the world under the type of written constitution with a bill of rights which he would like to foist upon us.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says that the difference between our country and Great Britain in this respect is that Great Britain—he is quite right in this—has a unitary government, while in this country we have a federal system in which the total powers of government are divided between those which have to do with the national or federal government at Ottawa, and which are under the authority of this parliament, and those which have to do with the provinces, and which are properly under the control of the various provincial legislatures.

He said it is because of this division of authority that we should have in our constitution the same principles which they have in the United States constitution, whereby the successfully rebelling citizens of the United States colonies withheld from their national congress and state legislatures certain rights which they, the people, hold unto themselves and have not seen fit to bestow upon the national congress and government or the state legislatures and governments. If we are going to follow my hon. friend's advice in this matter, our problem is that of transforming the British principle of the sovereignty of parliament and provincial legislatures in the federal state of Canada in the form in which it was created by grafting upon our Canadian constitution, with its divided authority between Canada and the provinces, a bill of rights characteristic of the United States system. I say to my hon. friend with great respect that far from the fact that our constitution is a federal constitution being a good reason why we should adopt this suggestion of his, the very opposite is the case.

He says in his resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to the taking of whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following heading and sections:

Let me point out to my hon. friend what we should have to do in order to take the necessary steps referred to in the language I have just quoted. As we all know, under the British North America Act the entire powers of government in Canada have been divided up between those matters which are specifically assigned to the provinces as being of more provincial and local character, and those specific powers which are assigned to the dominion parliament. In addition, there is a general power assigned to this parliament to make laws relating to all those matters which are not specifically assigned to the provinces.

The very first power which was assigned to the provinces when the British North America Act was passed was:

> 1. The amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this act, of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of lieutenant governor.

My hon. friend, who is anxious to see that there should be included in the British North America Act some restraint upon the scope of the powers of the provinces in order to make it impossible for the provincial legislatures and governments to do some of the things which have been done and which he deprecates, might be well advised to address his arguments to the provincial legislatures in question themselves. They have the power to change their constitutions as long as they confine it to matters which are of purely provincial concern, and do not attempt to deal with the office of lieutenant governor.

The hon. member will recall that back in 1949 this parliament took the power, which we had not previously had, to pass laws dealing with all those matters which were of purely federal concern. But after we had done so, the British North America Act still dealt with a third class of matters, namely matters of joint concern to the federal parliament and the provincial legislature. In respect of that third group I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while it is true the parliament at Westminster throughout the years has seen fit to pass amendments to the British North America Act upon the receipt of a joint address of the Senate and the House of Commons, it would be politically difficult, if not unthinkable, that a responsible federal government should introduce such a joint address into the Senate and the House of Commons as would abrogate in any way the powers of the provincial governments over matters of joint concern unless the provinces concurred in that action.

I should think that, having regard to the fact that over the years the courts have unanimously held that the provinces acting within the sphere of their authority are just as sovereign as this parliament, it would not contribute very greatly to the political or constitutional harmony of this country if we in this parliament were to take it upon ourselves to follow the advice which I am sure my hon. friend either urges or implies by his resolution and by the speech with which he has supported it.

Mr. Coldwell: Before the minister leaves that point, will he permit a question? If he argues, as he does, that the preamble to the British North America Act gives certain rights that British citizens enjoy and that we in common with British citizens enjoy, then is it true to say that the provinces have no right to deny any of those rights to Canadian citizens? Since they have done so, is that not one reason why we should write into our constitution the protection that by inference is in the preamble of the British North America Act?

Mr. Garson: No, Mr. Speaker. With great deference to my hon. friend, if he will forgive me for saying so, I say it is a misunderstanding of some of these points, such as the one he just made, that causes him to have the desire to move the resolution he has moved tonight.

If I understand his question correctly, I should say this. The principle of the sovereignty of parliament, which is one of the cardinal principles of the British constitution, became the right and privilege of this house in respect of matters under its jurisdiction, and of the provincial legislatures in matters under their jurisdiction. Hence, much as we may regret it when cases arise such as my hon. friend mentioned, they fall within the principle of sovereignty of parliament of the British constitution and of our own constitution. It is within these principles that these acts that my hon. friend mentioned are passed. The only way in which this can be prevented—and he is perfectly right on this point—is by attaching to our constitution, both for the provinces and for this parliament, the same type of restrictions that he himself says are unsatisfactory in their operation as part of the bill of rights of the United States constitution.

My contention is, as it has been on previous occasions, that with all our Canadian constitution's faults, and they are not many; with every fault that my hon. friend can name, the provisions we have in the British North America Act are so superior to any of the types of bills of rights that my hon. friend can bring forward that I do not think we should compare them as being in the same class.

I grant you that on paper it sounds very impressive to say that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law; but I am sure my hon. friend's idealism would get a great shock if he were to look at the law reports and find in them many public utility cases in which the citizens invoking this provision of the bill of rights were large power corporations which said that they could not be brought under the type of act that my hon. friend himself might think was a very good act to pass, upon the argument that it was not within the power of that legislature to pass a law that took away from that power corporation the least part of its property or rights unless the matter were put before some court, and there disposed of by what they argued was due process of law.

My hon. friend has made reference to certain cases that he thinks are regrettable. I am now expressing solely my own views. Perhaps it is desirable, if we are engaged in a life and death struggle with people who are bitterly opposed in every respect to every political concept that we hold dear, we should not shackle our own legislative powers to deal with any emergency that might arise in such time of war. For all of the abuses that may have arisen in that respect in countries like Great Britain, Australia and Canada, that have this principle of sovereignty of parliament, I am sure there are dozens of abuses that could be cited in other countries with bills of rights; where for example the right to vote is guaranteed to millions of citizens who have never received it. It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I find it rather hard to understand why my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar should be urging what, in my view, is so foreign to those views which I have always understood him to possess.

I am sure he and I share together a very deep-seated admiration and respect for all the political institutions of the United Kingdom which we have inherited in the British North America Act, and which today are one of our greatest treasures. It would be a matter of the very greatest regret to introduce anything into our constitution which would make it less like that of the great country from which we inherited it, and more like those with constitutions containing bills of rights with whose operation in real life we are all so familiar.

On the last occasion on which this was discussed the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will recall that I read into the record what I think without question, as those constitutions go, was perhaps on paper the most admirable extant. It is one of the most recent. The scholars who drew it up could examine those that existed before and bring down a really perfect protection for the liberties of the citizens.

As he will recall, on that occasion it sounded so good that one hon. member thought it was something prepared under the auspices of the United Nations. Actually it was the constitution of the Byelorussian republic. The hon. gentleman can see from this that it is all very well to draw up those constitutions on paper, but so far as the actual protection they give to citizen John Doe when his liberties are invaded, if we reflect for one moment we shall realize at once that that protection has to come from the invocation of the law by the law enforcement authorities that may result in an action before perhaps not a high court judge but merely a police magistrate. And so far as John Doe is concerned at that particular juncture, the protection of his liberty will not be one bit better than the interpretation by that magistrate of the law that is applicable to his case. If the law enforcement authorities are strongly opposed to the law that they are being asked to invoke, they will invoke it with something less than enthusiasm. The results for John Doe may be as if that law had never existed. If my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar thinks this is an exercise of my imagination I say, look at thousands of cases that have arisen under these bills of rights such as he advocates, and see if that is not the case in actual fact.

Where are the franchises which millions of citizens should have had and which for decades they have not enjoyed? Why is that, if it is not because there is no machinery or no organization to which they can go to have their rights under these bills of rights enforced? Therefore when my hon. friend brings along his motion and says we need this bill of rights because we are a federal state, that we should embark upon an application to the imperial parliament at Westminster to amend the British North America Act, in order to take away or abridge those powers of the provinces that I have mentioned here of amending their own constitutions, and to take away or abridge or limit in many ways their present powers over the administration of justice and the enforcement of the law, to interfere with their jurisdiction over property and civil rights, are we to be so naïve that we should think that after we have done that, we can go back to those same provincial governments and legislatures which cherish their powers and jurisdiction just as much as we do ours in this parliament; these powers over which we shall have run roughshod and we can then go back to them and ask if they will enforce those new laws that we have passed?

Therefore when my hon. friend says that because we have a federal state, that is the reason we should seek this change, I say to him that if we have any practical political sense whatever we will know that where there is this division of authority between Canada and the provinces it is of supreme importance that any change we make in our constitution will carry the judgment not only of this parliament and this government but of all the provincial authorities who have to enforce any changes that we may seek or get.

As regards the ideals that my hon. friend has set up, we are not in disagreement. I do not think a safety razor blade could be put between his views and mine as to the importance of the civil liberties of the individual. I think the difference between us is that I personally do not think there is any use trying to bring about a new heaven on earth unless we pay some attention to the methods by which we are going to do that. All I have ever attempted to reply to a proposal such as that of my hon. friend in this same sort of context in which we are debating tonight, is this. You wish these principles protected. They are protected now by the British method. But you say we should protect them by the United States method. Let us then look at what we have to do in order to import this United States method into our Canadian constitution.

When we come to that point it has seemed to me—I have stated this on previous occasions—that it would be an act of very great unwisdom indeed if we should attempt in this parliament or under any federal auspices to take away any of the rights of the provinces, even if we thought they should be taken away.

For I put this to my hon. friend. Once you have this division of authority between the central government and the provincial governments in a free federal state—this does not apply to the U.S.S.R.; it applies to Australia, where they have these problems to just as great or a greater degree than we have them here—if we are going to seek for any practical solution to this matter of a bill of rights, the only way in which we can find it is if we seek it in co-operation with the provincial authorities. For as long as they retain under our constitution, which my hon. friend admires so much, the exclusive authority over the administration of justice and the enforcement of the law, we are going to be dependent upon their actions for the effectiveness of any changes in the law we make by securing a bill of rights.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question? Is he not aware of the fact that the resolution as worded leaves entirely open the question as to how the amendment to the constitution may be brought about. If he will read the resolution he will note that it differs from other resolutions which usually ask that the government give consideration to something. This is put in general terms "that consideration should be given to the taking of whatever steps are necessary."

Mr. Garson: I had noticed that.

Mr. Knowles: Is not the minister introducing an extraneous consideration?

Mr. Garson: It is not extraneous at all. If I have a few minutes to finish my remarks, I would refer again to what I have said on previous occasions. While these are variations on the theme—I try to keep my theme exactly the same—the theme is that there is no objection at all to examining my hon. friend's suggestions in this country, but the only effective way in which they can be examined is by the federal authorities in concern with all the provincial authorities examining them. No other way is effective. That is what I ventured to suggest on previous occasions and that is what I suggest on the present occasion.

I admit that the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is well taken, but in order to fill in this gap in the resolution, and perhaps in my own remarks, I say that we must act together if we are going to accomplish any proper or satisfactory results.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister permit a question? Has the government given consideration to the resumption of the federal-provincial conference on constitutional questions?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the government has not given consideration to a resumption of the federal-provincial conference on constitutional amendments. That had to do entirely with the method or means by which we might bring into existence in Canada, without resorting to the imperial parliament at Westminster, the means of amending our Canadian constitution entirely in Canada in a way that was approved by the federal parliament and certain suggested alternative numbers of provinces.

Whether it might be difficult to arrive at a method of amending the constitution in Canada, it might still be possible to deal with the distinct problem or point which has been raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and reach agreement with the provincial authorities concerning the insertion of a bill of rights in our constitution. If the provinces approved this it could take the form of a request to the imperial parliament to pass an amendment to the British North America Act under our present method. It was in that sense that I was saying in reply to the interjection made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and to the mover of this resolution, that this is a matter that could be given consideration, but only satisfactorily by joint action of the federal and provincial authorities.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock, the house will stand adjourned until 2.30 p.m. tomorrow afternoon. I take it that the Minister of Justice has concluded his remarks.

Mr. Rowe: May I call it ten o'clock?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 31, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 58—
DEBATE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in order to regularize the proceedings for today, I should like to move:

That, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 58, the order for the house to go into committee of ways and means shall be the first government order read this day to permit a debate on external affairs; provided that the proceedings on this order shall not exceed two sitting days and that, unless the debate thereon be previously concluded, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings at 5.55 o'clock p.m. on Wednesday next and forthwith put the question on any sub-amendment and amendment then before the house; and provided further that when the said debate is concluded the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair shall be withdrawn and the order for the house to go into committee of ways and means shall stand as appointed for the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ANSWERS OF CERTAIN PROVINCIAL PREMIERS
TO LETTER OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table copies of correspondence between some of the provincial premiers and myself since my letter of January 6 last, concerning fiscal arrangements. I should like to point out that since my reply to the hon. member for Three Rivers on Thursday last I have received letters from the premier of Quebec and the premier of New Brunswick. Copies of those letters are included with the other communications I am laying on the table. Perhaps hon. members would wish, for the sake of convenience, to have these communications printed as an appendix to today's Hansard, as was done with the previous correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable to hon. members that these letters should be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of letters see appendix, pages 746-752.)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT RESPECTING ORDERS IN COUNCIL PERMITTING ARMS SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Eglinton asked me questions with respect to orders in council relating to the shipment of arms and war materials exported within the past year. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, on a question of privilege late Friday afternoon, explained that he had incorrectly referred to an order in council when what he really meant was a ministerial decision with respect to the issue of an export permit for the shipment of Harvard trainers to Egypt.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce also explained that orders in council were required only in cases where a transfer or sale of government property is involved, other than property that has been declared surplus and transferred to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. These sales, when approved by the governor in council, are specifically authorized by section 11 of the National Defence Act if the materiel in question is not immediately required for the use of the Canadian forces, and the proceeds of such sale may be used to replace such materiel.

I have had all the orders in council since January 1, 1955, relating to such transfers checked, and I wish now to comply with the request of the hon. member for Eglinton to give the dates of the orders in council and the countries concerned. There were 18 orders in council authorizing the transfer of mutual aid supplies to NATO countries, apart from amendments to previous orders that do not increase the quantities thereof; I assume the hon. member was not concerned with these and I have therefore not listed them. The others are as follows:

Date—1955	Country to which Sold	Price
January 13	India	$ 79.80
January 13	Bermuda	500.00
March 12	United States	350,000.00
April 27	Israel	632,191.00

These commodities shipped to Israel were part of those mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs the other day in reporting upon shipments to the Middle East.

May 5	Israel	$ 492.00
May 19	Belgium	12.72
June 8	Israel	30,240.00
July 14	United States	no charge

This shipment to the United States was property for test purposes valued at approximately $500.

September 1	United Kingdom	$ 61,650.00
October 7	Israel	91,000.00
October 19	Israel	10.00
November 3	Denmark	505.85
December 2	United States	no charge

This was property that had been on loan to the United States forces and which was valued when new at approximately $1,000.

December 14	Pakistan	$7,147.05

In fairness to the other countries involved in these transactions I feel it would not be proper to make these orders public, but I would be quite prepared to arrange to have them inspected in confidence by any hon. member.

I should add that other exports of arms and defence materiel, in addition to those covered by these orders, require export permits granted in accordance with the procedure outlined by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the explanation given by the Prime Minister I should like to ask if he will indicate to us why orders so small in amount as $10 for the transmission of arms or equipment in particular cases require orders in council, and why the sale of 15 aircraft to Egypt in this case required no such formal order. There seems to be some need for a differentiation between the two cases.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, all transfers of military property require orders in council under the express terms of the National Defence Act. It is to comply with the express terms of the National Defence Act that there must be an order in council and there must be a decision that those items, whatever the amount may be, are not immediately required. The statute provides that they can then be transferred to another department for sale and that the proceeds of the sale can go into a special account under the consolidated revenue fund and may be used on requisition from the Minister of National Defence for replacement of what has thus been taken out of the stores of the Department of National Defence.

With respect to commercial transactions involving property that is not that of the government, the matter is governed by the Export and Import Permits Act, which authorizes the Minister of Trade and Commerce to issue export permits, and those matters are dealt with in conformity with the terms of those two statutes in question.

Mr. Drew: Simply to clarify the matter, Mr. Speaker, may I ask this question. In view of his explanation, when he states that this was not an order in council—which of course would be the decision of the government—but was a ministerial decision, may we take it that it was the decision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The final act was performed, as required by the statute, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The procedure preceding the final act performed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was described by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his speech a week ago in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a supplementary question arising from the interesting statement he made regarding the issuing of ministerial orders. I want to ask about the order on July 7 touching upon the matter of the export of the Harvard planes. Is the order after approval by the cabinet on that date sealed by the governor general or merely signed by the clerk of the privy council?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, it was not an order signed by His Excellency the Governor General, and it was not an order of the cabinet. It was a ministerial decision taken in the manner described by the Secretary of State for External Affairs after consultations between the departments of external affairs, trade and commerce and national defence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the cabinet approve of it after the ministerial recommendation?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No. The cabinet is responsible for all these matters, but there was no express approval given by the cabinet as a whole.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then is this clear? This matter—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this clear, then, that the order permitting the export of these Harvard planes did not come before the cabinet on July 7 or in the latter part of June?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, it did not come before the cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then we have a revised version.

VIET NAM ARMISTICE AGREEMENT—REFERENCE TO REPORTED INVITATION TO EXPRESS VIEWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister, either now or in his address later this afternoon, comment on the report that Britain and Russia have invited the views of ten other countries, including Canada, on ways of ensuring the fulfilment of the Viet Nam armistice agreement?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question and I think probably it would be better if I dealt with it now. The reply is as follows.

In its fourth interim report the international supervisory commission in Viet Nam pointed out that the co-operation being extended by the parties to the commission was unsatisfactory. The commission asked the co-chairmen to consider this problem and the United Kingdom and Soviet foreign ministers, the two co-chairmen under the Geneva conference arrangement, have requested the views of the members of the Geneva conference and the commission powers on this somewhat difficult problem. So far as I know the Chinese reply is the first one to be made to the co-chairmen. I would expect that the co-chairmen would wish to wait until they had received replies from other governments before trying to decide what would be the right course of action to take in the circumstances.

Canada, of course, is not a member of the Geneva conference on Indo-China, but was invited at the end of it to serve on the international supervisory commissions together with India and Poland. Our position is therefore somewhat different from that of the members of the Geneva conference, but we are at the moment considering the views that we should send on this matter in reply to the letter from the co-chairmen. There may be an opportunity later in the session or before the committee on external affairs to make those views public.

SHIPMENT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SENSITIVE AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has an answer ready to my question of six days ago concerning a shipment of military equipment to 34 sensitive areas.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I have been waiting for some time to answer this question—

Mr. Fulton: Not as long as we have been waiting for the answer.

Mr. Pearson: —and will now do so after the intervention of the week end and a day. Some military equipment has been supplied to a number of politically sensitive areas during the last two years, but only after very careful examination in every case, and in accordance with the control procedures I outlined in my statement last Tuesday.

The total value of permits issued during those two years for the export of military equipment to all of the 34 areas, exclusive of the Middle East for which I have already given the figures, is about $2,249,000. More than half this amount represents defence equipment for commonwealth countries and colonial territories of the British Empire with which we have close and friendly relationships but which, because of threats to their security from outside their borders, we consider to be sensitive areas and therefore requiring careful consideration in respect of arms shipments. It would not be proper for me, Mr. Speaker, to disclose the names of the countries on this list because of the repercussions it might have on the position of friendly countries and their relations with us, and because it would reveal our confidential appraisal of the political and military situation in various parts of the world.

I shall, of course, be glad to disclose the list privately to any member of parliament and to give all details concerning it. Public disclosure, however, would be contrary to the public interest, as I am sure all hon. members will agree.

CANADIAN BREWERY ADVERTISING OVER UNITED STATES RADIO AND TELEVISION STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister aware of the fact that Canadian brewery advertising beamed at Canadians is permitted over United States radio and television stations in some border cities? Will he consider drawing the attention of the United States authorities to the fact that this is contrary to our own C.B.C. code and in violation of some of our provincial statutes?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be glad to look into the matter.

THE VICTORIA CROSS

INVITATION TO CANADIAN HOLDERS TO PARTICIPATE IN ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is the government considering sending Canadian war heroes who have been awarded the Victoria Cross to England so they might accept the invitation of Her Majesty the Queen to be present at ceremonies in London next June to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the awarding of the Victoria Cross?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the intention of Her Majesty the Queen was made known to invite Canadian V.C. winners for the one hundredth anniversary celebration in England in June of this year, I instructed that a committee should be set up composed of personnel of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Veterans Affairs for the purpose of gathering all the information concerning these ceremonies. This committee is now sitting and obtaining this information. As soon as it is available the matter will be submitted to the cabinet.

FISHERIES

SALMON—REPORTED RECOMMENDATION TO CLOSE STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant of the Minister of Fisheries, of which I have given him notice. Has any report been received from the international salmon commission meeting at Seattle a week ago which, according to the press, has recommended the closing of the strait of Juan de Fuca?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I made inquiries this morning, Mr. Speaker, and I was advised that the official report of the secretary of the last meeting of the commission held in Seattle has not yet been received.

Mr. Pearkes: As a supplementary question, may I ask the parliamentary assistant to report to the house as soon as he does receive the report from the commission, in order to obviate the necessity of my repeating the question daily?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. MacNaught: I assure the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that as soon as the report has been received and digested a report will be made to the house.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED SALE TO POLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister comment on the week-end Canadian Press dispatch in connection with the sale of wheat to Poland? Would the minister indicate the number of bushels involved in this deal and how the amount compares with what was sold in 1955?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It has been a well known rule of the department not to answer questions on current wheat transactions. My hon. friend could ask me today how many bushels we have sold to Poland, and tomorrow how many bushels we have sold to the United Kingdom, and following that how much to Germany, thus telling our competitors our exact position in every market, which obviously would destroy our ability to sell wheat.

However, there is a particular point in the sale to Poland. Although it was a cash sale so far as the board was concerned, it was insured for 85 per cent of its value by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation. The deal to which the hon. member refers is only one of several. It was for 100,000 tons of wheat and was completed yesterday.

There was a deal last summer in which 250,000 tons of wheat were sold to Poland, and that sale was also insured. There were several sales made for cash which I would not care to report to the House of Commons, in accordance with our usual custom. Each individual transaction is only one transaction. The relation between two transactions means nothing. Poland may come along and buy some more wheat for cash next month, and very likely will do so. I think I have given my hon. friend the information he is seeking.

WHEAT—REPORTED SALE BY UNITED STATES TO IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): As a supplementary question, is the Minister of Trade and Commerce aware that President Eisenhower has recommended that United States wheat be made available to communist countries, and has the President's proposal had any effect at all on sales of Canadian wheat?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not aware of the fact that there is any news in the report that President Eisenhower plans to sell wheat to iron curtain countries. We are selling wheat to iron curtain countries. What is the significance of my hon. friend's question?

SIZE AND DISTRIBUTION OF DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, regarding the size and distribution of grain delivery quotas. Could the minister inform the house as to what progress is being made in raising the delivery quotas for grain? Also, when will sufficient box cars be available so that all points still on the initial quota can be given a quota of at least one bushel per specified acre?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department has prepared a detailed answer to that question.

Good progress is being made in increasing delivery quotas following the tight situation that existed last fall. This progress can be judged by comparing the delivery quota position as at December 1 and the position today. On December 1, the position was as follows:

Initial unit quota	1,412	delivery points
One bushel per specified acre .	427	" "
Two bushels per specified acre	185	" "
Three bushels per specified acre	47	" "

Today the over-all position is as follows:

Initial unit quota	252	delivery points
One bushel per specified acre .	991	" "
Two bushels per specified acre	640	" "
Three bushels per specified acre	184	" "

Hon. members will note that since the winter set in, exactly 1,160 delivery points have been moved from the initial unit quota basis to higher delivery quotas. On December 1 less than 32 per cent of delivery points in the prairie provinces were on a basis of general quotas of one, two, or three bushels per specified acre. Today close to 90 per cent of delivery points have a general quota of one, two, or three bushels per specified acre.

The general easing of delivery quotas since December 1 has enabled producers to deliver about 50 million bushels of grain. This has been accomplished without very much change in the space situation at either Fort William-Port Arthur or Vancouver. There is still a moderate amount of space at Pacific coast ports and a substantial amount of space at the lakehead available for country elevator shipments. This is the problem with which the railways are grappling. They not only want to fill available storage space at the Pacific coast and the lakehead, but also to supply the quantities of grain needed in these positions to look after current shipments.

During the last week carloadings by the two railways have averaged 867 cars per day. This is a distinct improvement, and I hope this improvement will continue. It must continue if we are going to meet our export commitments and fill space currently available at the lakehead and Vancouver by shipments from country points. It goes without saying that if the railways are successful in their present program of increasing grain shipments, no time will be lost in increasing delivery quotas at country points.

The board is continuously reviewing the quota position at the 252 points still on the initial unit basis. The board expects to get these points on a general quota basis at a very early date.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED NEW CONSTITUTIONAL STATUS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister, of which I gave him verbal notice yesterday. Is there an indication of a new constitutional status for parliament contained in the legend on the outside of a publication of the Department of Labour called Labour Publications, which describes itself as follows:

> A price list of the publications of the Department of Labour and publications relating to labour issued by parliament and other agencies of the government of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They might as well be frank about it.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not a constitutionalist, Mr. Speaker. I have understood the government has sometimes been called an agency of parliament, but this is the first time that I have ever seen the reverse suggestion.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is an unfortunate error that was made in the title of the publication. It is a publication which contains the orders in council which were made under acts of parliament, and those are the papers referred to.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can we be assured, then, that we are at least as high as the other agencies?

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO RE-EMPLOYMENT OF EMPLOYEES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, or in his absence to the parliamentary assistant. Can the minister give any assurance that the 168 employees of the Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland who have received notice of termination of employment will be re-employed in some other capacity; and what rights have they regarding pension? I did not give notice, but the hon. member may take this as notice.

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): May I take this question as notice?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER ORDERS FOR CF-100 AIRPLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether it is the government's intention to continue placing orders for the construction of CF-100 airplanes?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question. His question deals with the intentions of the government. I am sure my hon. friend is aware of the fact that the intentions of the government are not made known until policy based thereon is formulated and effect is given to those intentions. That is a time-honoured practice.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): May I ask a supplementary question? Can the minister inform the house whether it is true that the Royal Canadian Air Force is now fully equipped with those airplanes, and that any further production will have to be stockpiled?

Mr. Campney: The answer is no.

LONG BRANCH—INQUIRY RESPECTING DEMOLITION OF SHACKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, here is another question, also on behalf of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), notice of which I think he had sent to the Minister of National Defence. The question was asked on January 25, and the answer was to be given on Friday or today.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on January 25 the hon. member for York South, whose absence because of illness I am sure we all regret, asked the following questions:

> Has the Department of National Defence ever ordered the demolition of the shacks on its property at Long Branch, Toronto? If so, have these orders been carried out? If not, why not, and what use is now being made of these shacks?

I take it that the hon. member was referring to certain wartime buildings on the Long Branch rifle range property still being used as civilian emergency housing by the city of Toronto.

According to our records, the Department of National Defence has had no jurisdiction over these buildings since they were declared surplus in 1946-47, at which time the crown assets allocation committee allocated them to the department of reconstruction and supply to be made available to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for emergency shelter.

I am informed that shortly after that date the city of Toronto by arrangement with Central Mortgage and Housing took over the buildings, and I am further informed that the city of Toronto still holds them. In any event these buildings have not been under the jurisdiction or control of the Department of National Defence for almost 10 years; consequently the department has not ordered their demolition, nor has it in fact any right to do so.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF CARTER COMMITTEE ON SALES TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? May I ask whether the report of the Carter committee on the sales tax has been received? If so, when will it be available?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have received the report. We are studying it now, and it may be that I shall table it on the occasion of the budget presentation.

HOUSING

ST. CATHARINES—REPOSSESSION OF HOMES OF MEN ON STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, my friend the hon. member for York South asked me if I could obtain today an answer from the Acting Minister of Public Works to a question of which my hon. friend had sent the minister notice.

Is it the policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to repossess the homes of men on strike at St. Catharines who, because of the strike, have been unable to meet their payments? If so, how many orders for repossession have already been issued?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works may I say that I already have some information, but I prefer to delay the answer until tomorrow in order to make it more complete. I will take this question as notice and try to get complete information for tomorrow.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REGINA—PROTEST RESPECTING LIQUIDATION OF CHRISTMAS OVERTIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Did the Postmaster General receive during the past month a resolution passed by the association of Canadian postal employees, Regina branch, protesting the liquidation of overtime accumulated during the Christmas rush? If so, what consideration has the department given to these representations?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, a number of representations have been received during the course of the last month. I might point out to my hon. friend that a similar question was put to me on January 20 and the answer appears in Hansard of that date.

At that time I pointed out that the method of compensating for overtime work in the Post Office Department was determined by an order in council which is applicable to employees in all departments, so it is not solely a question of post office regulations.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DISCIPLINARY ACTION FOLLOWING BEATING OF PRISONER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): On Friday last the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked if I would inform the house of the exact situation with respect to two members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police whom he identified in his question. I think perhaps the most satisfactory way for me to do this is to remit to the Clerk of the house, pursuant to standing order 40, a full report which I received from the commissioner of the mounted police on August 25, 1955, concerning this matter.

MEAT

BEEF—INQUIRY RESPECTING PRICE SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house what steps are being taken to bring beef prices under the Agricultural Prices Support Act in order to establish fair prices to the producers?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having notified me of his question.

The fact is that the best prices that can be obtained for beef cattle, as far as we know, are to be obtained in the United States. There is no great difficulty in shipping cattle there, and we have always considered that price as being a suitable floor price for cattle from Canada. They can be shipped there at any time. We discussed that matter fully, a year ago, with the federation of agriculture, and when the federation made its requests at Edmonton in January of last year it omitted beef cattle from the list of products that should have support prices.

HOGS—ALLEGED PURCHASE BELOW FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister account for the fact that grade A hogs have been purchased recently at stockyards in Saskatchewan at less than the government guaranteed floor price of $19 per hundred pounds?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of this question. I must say that I cannot agree that it is a fact. He asks:

> Can the minister account for the fact that grade A hogs have been purchased recently at stockyards in Saskatchewan at less than the government guaranteed floor price of $19 per hundred pounds?

In the first place, there would be great difficulty in determining whether or not a hog purchased at the stockyard was a grade A hog. The grading is done when the hogs are hung up after having been slaughtered. So an individual might question whether he received the right price at the stockyard for a hog, but if he does question it all that involves is that the hog is purchased subject to grade when the hog is hung up. Under those circumstances he would be paid for grade A, no matter what price he was offered at the stockyards.

There is, of course, a possibility of one individual selling a hog to another. It might be sold to a butcher, or to someone else. There might be some question in the mind of the person selling it as to whether he had obtained the price for the hog at the grade he thought it might reach if it went to some plant, but if it can be established that a hog is grade A the floor price is there for him to obtain any time he wishes. Provision is made at all the markets in Saskatchewan for the purchase to be made at the floor.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the minister that these hogs were purchased at less—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bryson: I have a receipt here that I should be glad to show the minister to prove it.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a supplementary question. When, as the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort indicates, the producer does get a lesser price than the floor price established at the yards—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member be good enough to put his question.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): My question is, what procedure does the farmer follow to recover his loss when he has received less than the floor price for his hogs?

Mr. Gardiner: When the hogs are graded at the packing plant the government pays a premium on grade B hogs, and it pays a higher premium on grade A hogs. Therefore all these certificates eventually pass government graders or the individual does not receive his premium. In any case where the matter is brought to the attention of the Department of Agriculture the officials see to it that the proper price is paid and, of course, the farmer will not settle until he gets his premium and all the rest of it. That is all checked. The proper procedure is for the farmer or anyone receiving the certificate from the farmer to immediately send it to the prices board.

[Later:]

Mr. Bryson: Now that the Minister of Agriculture has had an opportunity to look at the document to which I referred, has he any explanation to offer?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, it would appear from this slip—I am not too sure that I can read the figures on it after the handling it has had—that there is a possibility the figure for the A grade is $18.75 and for the B1 grade $17.75. If those are the actual prices that were received I think they would be 25 cents under the floor, in both cases. The fact remains, however, that there must have been some difference of opinion between the individual who shipped the hogs and the buyer at the stockyard as to grade, and all my hon. friend or any other person in that position need do is send the slip to the Department of Agriculture and it will be dealt with at once.

An hon. Member: You have it now.

Mr. Gardiner: It could have been done much quicker and the man could have had his money much sooner if it had been properly done. This matter is simply brought here for the purpose of trying to make political capital out of it. If my hon. friend or any other member of the C.C.F. party wishes to get a settlement for a farmer in connection with any such matter, all he need do is to send the slip to the department and the matter will be settled in short order.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED INCREASE IN SALARIES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Are the reports correct that shortly there will be a general increase in civil servants' salaries? Will the government at the same time increase the pensions of retired civil servants, particularly those in the lower and middle brackets?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): As usual, the Minister of Finance and his department are considering the wage scales of the civil service. We have been doing so for some time and will continue to do so until we reach a decision, which will be announced in the house if the house is sitting.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister answer my second question?

Mr. Harris: I answered it last week, but if the hon. member wants another answer the answer is the same this week.

TRADE

CANVAS SHOES—REPORTED CLOSING OF FACTORY BECAUSE OF DUMPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of National Revenue. It has reference to an article in last night's paper indicating that a firm in Kitchener is closing down and going out of business on account of the dumping of canvas shoes in Canada. In view of the fact that the government is acquainted with what the situation was last year, and the increased dumping this year is 126 per cent over last year; in view of the fact that these shoes are made by cheap labour in Hong Kong—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hodgson:—what is the government going to do about it?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTIONS TO BE ASKED ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. Speaker: Now that the house is in a very good mood, may I be permitted to point out that the rules regarding the asking of oral questions on the orders of the day are exactly the same as those which apply to questions asked on the order paper after notice. May I ask hon. members to look periodically—in fact, I would say every day—at citation 295 of Beauchesne, third edition, which gives a list of the type of questions which my predecessors have ruled out of order from time to time over the years. Many interesting examples are given which are very much to the point. I would ask hon. members, and members of the cabinet as well, to look at the list; and I would urge hon. members not to ask this type of question, and I would ask the ministers not to answer this type of question.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Mr. Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this motion will give the house an opportunity to discuss international affairs, and it gives me the privilege of introducing that discussion. I realize that in the time I can appropriately take in a debate of this kind there will be many important questions in international affairs with which I will not be able to deal. I hope, however, that when the time comes for me to close the discussion I will be able to answer questions that may be raised subsequently and which I have not dealt with in my opening statement.

One subject I will not touch on in this speech, because I attempted to deal with it last week in the debate on the address, is Middle East policy. If any questions are raised in this debate dealing with the policy that should be followed in that area in the preservation of peace—and, after all, that is the thing that matters—or in respect of the administration of that policy, I would hope to deal with them again when I wind up the debate.

I will also not be able, in this discussion, to touch on the work of the United Nations or more particularly the work of the recent United Nations assembly. I hope there will be an opportunity before long for my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), to deal with the work of that assembly to which, if I may say so, he made such a distinguished and constructive contribution.

I would also have liked to report in some detail, and I hope to do so as soon as possible when the opportunity presents itself, either here or in the committee on external affairs, on the recent ministerial meeting of the Colombo plan countries at Singapore. It was a most successful and inspiring meeting, a meeting of especial significance because it was held in a colony now on the threshold of self-government, a secure freedom and a self-government achieved by evolution which would have been impossible under a communist form of government, which makes some of the allegations of recent communist travellers in that part of the world sound pretty ridiculous.

After that conference in Singapore I had the privilege of seeing the Colombo plan in action in India and in Pakistan, where my colleagues and myself were received by the governments of those two countries with very great kindness and were given a very sincere welcome.

After this opportunity of seeing it in action I returned more convinced than ever of the value of the Colombo plan based on friendly co-operation without political pressure and justified now by performance. Promises are no longer needed for that purpose. It will have been noticed by the house that the government intends to recommend to parliament a substantial increase this year in our contribution to the Colombo plan, namely an increase of almost 33⅓ per cent. That increase will not quite meet the figure advocated last year by my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who had urged us to double our contribution, but it is a substantial increase and I hope it will be voted by parliament.

I should also, Mr. Speaker, say at least a word about the work of the armistice commissions in Indo-China, which was referred to earlier in the sitting this afternoon. In that area of the world Canadians continue to make an important contribution to peace through their work with these commissions. Our men—there are some 170 of them in that area, mostly from the Department of National Defence, members of the armed forces—have discharged their extremely difficult and trying duties with great credit to themselves and to their country. In one of the countries there, namely Cambodia, we have reached the winding-up stage of the commission, and we have been able to reduce the strength of that commission. Elections have been held in that country, and as a result the commission and its members can leave Cambodia with the satisfaction which they must feel at the stability which has been achieved in a country so recently a victim of war.

In Laos, one of the other countries, the situation is not so good. Elections have also been held there, but the communist Pathet Lao forces, which are grouped in the northern provinces of that country, have refused to accept the Laotian government or the authority of that government and to take part in the election. Hence no reduction there has been found possible either in the numbers of the commission or in its activities up to the present time.

So far as Viet Nam is concerned—and that is probably the most important of the three countries—the military phases of the armistice work have been completed and with little disturbance. I think the commission deserves a good deal of credit for that result. The political aspects, however, present a less satisfactory picture. Little progress has been made in that country toward the national elections visualized by the Geneva conference, and which are scheduled to take place in July of this year. If they do not take place it is hard to say what effect that failure will have on our obligations in the commission.

This work in Indo-China is arduous and difficult, as I have said, and it imposes a heavy burden on the armed forces of our country and upon the Department of External Affairs. We are most anxious to complete it at the earliest possible date. Nevertheless we shall not abandon that work so long as we are convinced that it is making an important contribution to peace.

I should also, Mr. Speaker, say a word about a problem which is very much in our mind these days, namely that of the legal recognition of the communist Chinese government in Peking. One of the most difficult questions which face this country and many other countries is that of determining our relations with the two rival and bitterly hostile governments of China. It is not as simple an issue to decide as some seem to think. There is more than one factor to take into account before any decisions can wisely be taken. Such a decision requires a careful balancing of many national and international factors, moral, political and economic.

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker—indeed, last summer—I expressed the view that we should have another look at this question in the light of the cessation of hostilities in Korea and in Indo-China, in the light of the situation in and around the Formosa straits and in the light of the recent policy of the Peking government in so far as it is possible to determine it. We have made this re-examination and we feel that the careful policy we have been following, and are still following, has been the right one; rejecting on the one hand immediate diplomatic recognition but rejecting on the other hand the view that a communist regime in Peking can never be recognized as the government of China.

The arguments for and against recognition of this government have more than once been discussed, and in detail, in this house, and I do not intend to repeat them at this time. I wish merely to state as briefly as possible the considerations which determine our policy as a government in this matter.

The first consideration is the interest of our country, remembering that the paramount interest of us all is international peace and security. In addition, we are obliged to give consideration to the interests and views of our friends and allies, some of whom are even more directly involved than are we in the consequences of diplomatic recognition. It is also important, Mr. Speaker, not to confuse recognition with approval. There are, of course, moral considerations involved and, in the case of a ruthless communist regime, these considerations inevitably must have a bearing on our attitude. But the decision remains predominantly a political one to be taken on the basis of enlightened self-interest, as in many other cases where we have recognized totalitarian regimes.

It should not, however, be assumed that Canadian recognition of the Peking government—even if it were to be granted at some time in the future—would extend to the island of Formosa. As we see it, the legal status of Formosa is still undecided and no step taken vis-à-vis the communist regime should prejudice that issue. In particular, we would not be a party to any action which handed over the people or the government on Formosa, against their will, to any mainland government, let alone to a communist Chinese government.

We condemn the cruelties and tyrannies of the Peking regime, and we continue to hope that the Chinese people will one day be governed by a more enlightened government of their own choice.

But, Mr. Speaker, we must accept the fact of communist control of mainland China. That is one thing we cannot fail to recognize, with the corollary that in certain circumstances and in our own interests we may be obliged to deal—as we already have been obliged to do—at Geneva and elsewhere with that government in respect of certain problems which cannot be solved without it. Nor should we, I suggest, base our policy on the likelihood of the nationalist government of Chiang Kai-shek returning to power on the mainland. Furthermore, the anomaly of that government representing China at the United Nations, with a veto that can block any action desired by 52 other members, is becoming increasingly apparent. I believe also that we should accept no commitment to intervene on behalf of the nationalist government in the struggle for the Chinese offshore islands. Our view on this matter has already been made clear in this house, outside this house and in the United States.

As for Formosa, the only commitment—and this also has been stated in the house—we have is that which might arise out of our obligations under the charter of the United Nations. So far as diplomatic recognition is concerned, we should from time to time review the position in the light of conditions; of our own interests and of the views of our friends and allies. However, I believe we should not get ourselves into such an inflexible position that a change in policy, if it were considered to be wise and necessary, could be brought about only with maximum difficulty.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to express one further thought on this subject. We are all concerned, and rightly so, that the utmost in good judgment be applied to this complicated and controversial problem of legal recognition. As I see it, however, we must not let it distract us so much that we ignore the longer term issues which are raised by communist China's emergence as a new and powerful force in the world. The consolidation and growth of Chinese power under communist rule which is now taking place may be historically as important an event as the Russian revolution of 1917. The implications for us in China's determined drive to achieve military and industrial might and a position as a world power may be as far reaching as similar developments which have taken place in Russia. Indeed, one day in the future these two revolutionary forces may clash. It may now seem to us to be of great importance to recognize or not to recognize the communist regime in Peking. It is of far greater importance to recognize that a revolution of cataclysmic force has taken place in China as a fateful part of the emergence of a modern awakened Asia.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like for a few moments to make a report, if I may call it that—and I am afraid it will not be a very adequate one because of considerations of time—on my recent visit to the Soviet union. You will remember that this visit, and it was an encouraging thought for me, was made with the approval of all parties in this House of Commons. I am quite aware of the fact, as I have said before, that one can acquire in a brief official visit only impressions. Those impressions can be misleading, but they can be valuable as a check on studies that have already been made, and as a check on the experiences of others. They can also be valuable if your visit brings you into contact, as mine did, with the top rulers of the country. Therefore it may be that the impressions I brought back, though I give them without any feeling of certainty or dogmatism, may be of some value.

So far as the people of this powerful country are concerned, they showed us a hospitality, a kindness and courtesy which I have great pleasure in acknowledging. This, of course, reflected the traditional hospitality and kindness of the Russian people, and it has little, if anything, to do with their form of government. They seemed, in so far as we were able to determine it, to have a pride in the achievements of their state. They seemed to have a fear of war, and there is no reason why the people of that country should not have a fear of war. No other people in the world have suffered more from war than they have. But they also seem to have an ignorance of the world outside which is frightening indeed.

One gets the impression also that there has been a relaxation of tension inside the country. The long-range importance of that may be considerable. It is true that that kind of relaxation can be turned on and off easily by the governing group, even by an editorial in Pravda. It would be unwise, therefore, to draw any far-reaching conclusions from such a development. I had an abiding impression when I left of great strength, great power, great richness, a state of collective power and collective riches alongside individual deprivations. But I think it is correct to say that the latter is decreasing, and bread and circuses are increasing. I think it is also right to say that the former, the collective power, is also increasing. We would be making a great mistake if we underrated that development.

That country, Mr. Speaker, is harnessing education and science, propaganda and power to communist imperialism.

The Russian regime, which embodies this communist imperialism, is achieving a strength, a solidity, a dynamism that is impressive—indeed, it is frightening. Their plans to increase this are even more impressive. Let us not deceive ourselves, if anyone still does, by thinking that they are a beaten, lifeless people in an ox-cart civilization. It is true that many of the comforts to which we are accustomed are missing, but this does not seem to either weaken or worry them. To them plumbing is not as important as plutonium; ease is not as important as engineering; man is only material for management. There is no obvious sign, Mr. Speaker, that they resent these things. Those who do, no doubt, are in jail or in concentration camps.

So far as the government of the country is concerned, as the house knows, one man has now been succeeded by a group. Of that group, two men seem to be in the ascendancy, two men who are in startling contrast to each other in so many ways but who seem to work very closely together indeed. These two men in the conversations I had with them profess, and I underline the word "profess" because it has sometimes been left out of the reports which have been previously ascribed to me on this matter, to have no other desire than peace and further relaxation of tension.

Indeed on this trip, Mr. Speaker, we heard much talk about peace. It was the first Russian word I learned, and it was the last one I heard as we took off from the Crimean airport. This peace talk, this peace cry, may well be genuine when it is uttered by the people, but that is not important unless it can influence the policies of the leaders of the people and there is not so much evidence of that. Mr. Khrushchev's idea of peace, and he made no secret about it when he talked with me, is illustrated by his determination to break up NATO as an aggressive organization, so he claimed, aimed at Russia and therefore a threat to peace. I, of course, argued with him long and loudly on this matter, but I have some doubt whether I made very much impression.

I feel, however, that he wishes to break up NATO primarily because, in his professed view, it is an agency of aggressive United States policy. The United States is the culprit. Similarly with Germany; he fears it I believe chiefly as a member of NATO and as such, in his view, an agent of the United States. He was not interested in my argument that a Germany armed and outside NATO might be a far greater danger to the Soviet union than a Germany that was one of 15 countries, with limited arms and under collective control inside NATO. Mr. Khrushchev also seemed worried that the Russian initiative, as he would put it, in relaxing tension might be interpreted in the west as a sign of weakness or even of crisis at home. He frankly admitted they were having difficulties, especially in agricultural production, but he became almost violent in denying any weakness or any crisis.

He went on to assure me that the Soviet union was never stronger, and if anyone dared to begin a war with them the Russians would finish it. He talks with an easy assurance on these matters that amounts almost to arrogance. My own view for what it is worth is that the leaders of the Soviet union do want what I call a peaceful interlude, and for a variety of reasons. Among others, as Mr. Khrushchev has candidly admitted, in a more peaceful atmosphere the democracies—he thinks their people are soft and undisciplined, that freedom is licence and will be their undoing—will not accept the sacrifices that prolonged defence preparations involve and will fall apart in their coalitions, especially in NATO.

Communists, he assured me, could stand up to effort and sacrifice far better than we could. They were tougher and more patient, and therefore communism would be superior to capitalism in peaceful but competitive coexistence. He was supremely confident, and expressed that confidence on a good many occasions, that communism will conquer in this kind of competition.

Our hosts, Mr. Speaker, expressed a very high regard for Canada. Those expressions may have been more calculated than spontaneous; nevertheless I think they have a real respect for our country, not only because of our efforts and sacrifices in war, but also because we have tried to be objective and internationally useful in peace and are nobody's tool. They are, of course, pretty obvious in their efforts to distinguish us and ultimately detach us from our southern neighbour, and their insistence that we have a northern neighbour as well was not as reassuring, at least to me, as they tried to make it sound. But when I emphasized, as I did, the bonds of friendship between the United States and Canada, or tried to say a good word for the United States, they at least listened politely. Similarly when we opposed certain of their suggestions, as we had to do, that the trade treaty which we were discussing should be concluded at once in Moscow, or that certain phrases or ideas should be included in the communiqué which we thought might be misinterpreted in Canada—when we took that position of opposition they took it in good part and did not press us too hard.

I think the visit was worth while for us who were privileged to undertake it. Apart from any concrete advantages that may possibly arise out of it in the way of trade, or in the way of scientific and technical exchanges, or in getting information out of Russia in regard to relatives of Canadians, in addition to those concrete advantages if they should come about I think as the result of a visit of this kind one is in a better position to appreciate and understand the sources of soviet power and the nature of soviet policy.

Whatever was gained in this respect was accomplished, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, without misleading them as to the views and policies of Canada and her friends. Indeed, having heard from Mr. Khrushchev soviet views stated with great force and with great frankness, I was encouraged to reply in kind. They may not, as I have said, have made much of an impression on him or on his colleagues; but at least they know, I hope, a little more about our views; that the west, in the United Nations or in NATO, is not and will not become aggressive or warmongering and is as vitally concerned, as they told me they were, with peace, security and the removal of causes of war. I hope they realize also that I was right when I said we were not going to throw away NATO merely because of doses, large or small, of the Geneva spirit.

Mention of the Geneva spirit brings me to the question, where are we today in respect of the relaxation of tension which we hoped had been initiated at the Geneva conference last July, and which we hoped would continue and indeed would show concrete results in policy. Hon. members will recall the feeling of optimism that was developed at the summit meeting, as it is now called, at Geneva last summer. It may well be that hopes at that time were too high and that thinking was too wishful. I remember, along with others, taking that view in this house in the discussion we had on July 23 last year. At that time I, along with a good many others, felt that the real test of the reality and importance of the Geneva spirit was to be the foreign ministers' meeting which was called for November in an effort to achieve some of the objectives of the summit meeting.

We now know that the result of that November meeting was almost 100 per cent negative. We learned at that time that soviet words differed from soviet deeds, and that soviet tactics were not the same as soviet policy. As hon. members will recall, as a result of that foreign ministers' meeting in Geneva in November, not a single basic objective of soviet policy was changed.

What are those objectives? I believe myself, Mr. Speaker, that the fundamental objective of soviet policy, the long-range one, is security for the Soviet union and the triumph of communist ideology in a world of communist states controlled and dominated by Moscow, I believe this objective remains unaffected either by relaxation or by increases of tension. The cold war in that sense goes on, and I suggest it is misleading to think of the cold war in any other terms.

This was very well put in an editorial in The Economist magazine last November, which reads:

> "Cold war" is an even more misleading phrase than most of the monosyllabic slogans that headline writers love. It is commonly identified with such rudeness and crudeness as the Russians practised until lately. For those who make this over-simple identification, the "cold war" presumably ended when Vishinsky's diatribes gave place to Mr. Khrushchev's waggery, . . . "Cold war" in that sense need not now return, and it probably will not . . . But the phrase "cold war" was originally coined with reference not to a form of etiquette but to a policy—the policy of "struggle", to borrow a communist keyword. This "struggle" is basically a contest for power over men's minds, a political contest in which economic and military pressures are auxiliary. The "cold war" in this deeper sense never ended, and can never end while the communist rulers cling to their aim of worldwide victory. All that can change is the tactics employed, both by them and by the nations that are ready to defend their liberty.

These, Mr. Speaker, are very wise words indeed. But tactics, even on this interpretation of soviet policy, have changed, and in one sense at least I think the change of tactics has effected a change of strategy, and in a sense that is very important indeed.

I believe myself, and I share that belief, of course, with many others, that the deterrent effect of the hydrogen bomb is now recognized in Moscow. It is now admitted there as in other places that hydrogen warfare means universal destruction, and it is now accepted in Moscow, as in other places, that a balance of terror has been achieved. No one, however, can take much comfort out of it as a solid foundation of peace.

I think, as I said a few moments ago, that the soviet leaders do want peace in the sense that they do not want atomic warfare, and that they will not deliberately provoke or risk that kind of war with the certainty of mutual destruction. Yet I add that in my view their policy is still conflict short of war that is what they mean, surely, by competitive coexistence; not friendly cooperation.

It is always wise, Mr. Speaker, to go to the soviet leaders' own words to get inside their minds, especially the words they are aiming, not at their potential enemies outside but the words which they use for their own friends, their own people. In that connection, Mr. Stalin himself expressed what he meant by coexistence, and it is a definition that has never been disavowed by his followers, when he said:

> The limits of coexistence are set by the opposite characters of the two systems between which there is opposition and conflict. Within the limits allowed by these two systems, but only within these limits, agreement is quite possible.

Then, more recently Stalin's successor, Mr. Khrushchev, on September 17 last, in addressing an East German delegation in Moscow, said this, and these words are now pretty well known:

> We always tell the truth to our friends as well as to our enemies. We are in favour of a detente; but if anyone thinks that for this reason we shall forget about Marx, Engels and Lenin he is mistaken. This will happen when shrimps learn to whistle.

He went on:

> We are for coexistence because there is in the world a capitalist and a socialist system, but we shall always adhere to the building of socialism. We do not believe that war is necessary to that end. Peaceful competition will be sufficient.

That should be reassuring, Mr. Speaker, but it is not so reassuring when you try to analyse what is meant by the kind of competition which is referred to; competition under their rules, or under no rules. I suggest we must face the fact of their kind of competition.

Another objective which has not changed because of any Geneva spirit is to win over, subvert and eventually engulf the uncommitted millions of Asia and Africa. The recent visit of Soviet leaders to India is just one example of their determination to pursue their objective—a visit which I am sure did not deceive our Indian friends. Another example is the Soviet policy in backing Arab states militarily and politically.

This objective, I think, is fixed but here again their tactics are flexible. They are willing to either take the peace approach to the achievement of their objective or the force approach. Mr. Khrushchev is an outstanding example of the ability to use either tactic. In India he could pay pious if unconvincing tributes to Gandhi, the great apostle of pacificism, on one day and the next day boast that one of their hydrogen bombs could destroy an Indian city. The most important tactic of all in the achievement of this objective is, of course, to exploit and lead, if possible through local communist parties, the insistent demand for political freedom, racial equality and social betterment which exists in that part of the world today. They are having too much success in the achievement of that objective.

The third objective which I suggest has not changed, Mr. Speaker, is to weaken, divide and eventually destroy the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and drive the United States out of western Europe. How do they expect to achieve that? Well, there is the tactic of smiling away our fears so we will throw away our arms and our unity, to convince us that the Soviet union is merely a country of footballers, fiddlers and flowers.

There is another tactic, and that is the Soviet attitude concerning Germany and its relationship to NATO. This is specifically shown in the Soviet attitude toward the unification of Germany, where it is now quite clear that they will refuse to consent to that unification except on their own terms. And what are those terms, at least at the present time? Mr. Khrushchev said it was withdrawal from NATO. He told me that on more than one occasion, but I suspect that he told me only half the story and that Mr. Molotov told the other half at the Geneva conference. It became clear as a result of the statements he made at that meeting that even a Germany out of NATO, even a Germany neutralized and disarmed, would not be enough as the price for unification. The present Russian position goes further than that, and I think we can take Mr. Molotov's words at face value when he said there will be no unification unless the social and economic benefits of the Germans of the east are preserved.

That means there will be no unification unless all of Germany goes communist, and that means there will be no free election. Surely that has now become clear, and I suggest we should keep it clear, so there will be no difficulty in understanding what the position is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this policy of the Soviet union in regard to Germany involves difficulties for the government and people of the Federal Republic of Germany. It is for that reason we all welcomed the searching examination which was given to that problem at the recent NATO council meeting. So we welcomed the assurance that was given last December by the foreign minister of the federal republic that the present policy of that government had the overwhelming support of the German people; that notwithstanding—indeed, in a sense because of—the failure of the Geneva conference; that German opinion was steady and undeceived, that they now knew the Russian price for unification, and they would not have it on those terms.

It seems to me there is an awareness of this development even in the east itself—that is, Eastern Germany itself. That may be one reason why last year 271,000 refugees from what is called by the communists the workers' paradise fled to Western Germany. It is true, of course, that the Soviet government does try to misrepresent the situation.

It was misrepresented in our visit to Moscow, too, in the sense that we were told that the policy of the west was to insist that Germany shall remain in NATO as a price for unification. That, of course, is not the case. All we ask is that the Germans be allowed to make their own choice as a result of free elections. That choice might be membership in NATO or withdrawal from NATO, or any other course they may desire to follow; and it should be made perfectly clear that that is the position of the west. We should do our best to correct misrepresentations of that position from communist sources.

I have mentioned the NATO conference meeting, Mr. Speaker. I do not have time today to give any detailed report of it, but I can say this. We agreed at that meeting, as you would have expected us to agree, that nothing happened to justify any relaxation in our defence or in our diplomacy. We felt that those who were opposed to NATO were counting on relaxation of the tension bringing about a relaxation of effort and a weakening in our unity. We agreed that we must do our best to remain strong and united and keep our diplomacy flexible and active. I hope there will be another opportunity when I can report in greater detail about the NATO developments, and especially the council meeting last December.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I just say a word on the general situation. The great combined effort to maintain peace and freedom goes on. The leadership in that effort continues to rest with the United States of America, and that is why every other free nation, especially a neighbour and friend like Canada, must be intensely preoccupied with every aspect of American policy. That is why we must make our views clearly known to the people of that country on the issues which affect us both but in which their position is vital.

The two greatest factors today bearing on the danger of aggression in all parts of the world are, I think, first the nature and conduct of United States policy because of its position of power and leadership, and second the strength of United States arms. As the predominant element of power in the NATO alliance—where would we be today without it? United States strength, military and economic, has been of decisive importance during the past decade in maintaining peace in Europe, and hence in the world. It will be so, I believe, in the years ahead.

Similarly, the determination of the United States to give leadership in resisting aggression in Korea in 1950 saved collective security and probably the United Nations itself. We would be wise not to forget this when we dwell on present differences of viewpoint within the coalition—and we have them—particularly in connection with Far Eastern policy.

While our policy should, of course, be designed and carried out to make the use of force unnecessary; while tactics should be followed that are neither provocative nor rash, nevertheless, the maintenance of force in this unhappy world of today and the clear resolve to use it as a final necessity against aggression is an indisputable obligation on us all at the present time. The deterrent value of such force, as I see it, should neither be squandered by bluff nor made impotent by loss of nerve in a genuine crisis.

Our purpose and our policy must be to avoid crises and to solve international problems. But crises, in spite of all our efforts, may occur, and dangerous and unresolved problems may persist. It is important, therefore, that the communist bloc, which we fear and which we still have cause to fear, should not get the impression that free peoples in their passion for peace and their desire to secure it by negotiation and the resolving of differences would, under no circumstances, make use of the deterrent strength they have built up for security and defence in accordance with the principles of the United Nations.

This strength, though centred in the United States, is the sum total of that of many free countries, all of whom are devoted and will continue to be devoted to the ideal of peace and will strive with all their power to find means of securing that peace. That strength, then, being collective, should be used collectively if it is to be effective. This requires that every member of the coalition should know about and, if possible, should agree with the policies of the leaders as to when and how the threat of aggression, as well as its actuality, must be faced and countered. On no other basis can there be solid unity, and unity is as much a part of our strength as bombs.

We are moving, I think, into a much more fluid period of relations with the communist world than those which characterized the hard and brutal rigidity and the tense isolation of the late Stalinist period. It must be quite clear now that the new tactic of Russia is one of manoeuvre and contact, of trying everything that may help their cause; of smiles and scowls, of kicks and carrots. These tactics may be more dangerous and difficult to deal with than any ever employed by Stalin. They are certainly more complex. But at any rate, in the long run, they may offer some possibilities for negotiation and settlement. To meet them and to bring about that negotiation and settlement to which we would all give first place in our efforts, requires flexibility and imagination on our part. As "our" refers to a coalition of free states, with a cherished freedom even to differ, this is going to be difficult to combine with unity of purpose and co-ordination of methods.

We must, then, develop an imaginative yet realistic diplomacy, one based on a clear and unclouded understanding of the intentions and methods of the Soviet union and its satellites and of their strengths and weaknesses; one based also on a staunch adherence to our own policies and principles.

There is now less reason for complacency on our part than ever, for the threat to the institutions and the society of the free world remains as strong as ever. There is, however, no reason for despair merely because Mr. Molotov said "Nyet" at Geneva and because Mr. Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev continue to level harsh and unfounded accusations at the western powers, mixed with honeyed words and offers of peace pacts. The latest of these offers was made the other day to the government of the United States through a message from Mr. Bulganin to President Eisenhower. I feel that I am voicing the impressions of most members of this house, though I know I should speak only for myself, when I say that I have read with admiration and respect the reply of the President of the United States to that offer. It was constructive, not negative, and it was the sort of attitude that in a matter of this kind I am sure this government would be happy to support.

I have already mentioned the feeling of confidence and self-assurance of the Soviet leaders. If on our part we can show strength, steadiness and unity—a strength which is more than military, a steadiness which is not indifference and a unity which is based on common ideals and which requires careful and continuous fostering—we shall prove the communists wrong in their assurance that the future belongs to them.

If we do not, we shall have only ourselves to blame.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the minister, with the background of the experience gained in consequence of his visit to the Soviet union and other parts of the world, has given us today the psychological reaction to the reception he received and the interviews he had with the leaders of those countries. He seems, however, to have departed somewhat from the unusually warm words that he expressed on the conclusion of his tour, in the remarks he made today. It was reported in the press at the time that he said:

I view these men as a group of strong, able men—

That is referring to the leaders in the Soviet union.

—with no other desire than to be left in peace to build their country and solve their domestic problems, of which they admit they have many—

Mr. Pearson: I hate to interrupt the hon. member, but at the time that statement appeared in the press I denied I had said that. I also mentioned the matter this afternoon. The radio recording of the interview will show quite conclusively that the word "professed", which is a very important one, was put in that statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can understand the applause with which that statement is received. As a matter of fact, if my hon. friend says he denied the statement the publicity given to the denial never caught up with the publicity given to the words that he allegedly said.

An hon. Member: It never does.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We listened with a good deal of composure when my hon. friend was speaking. Surely we are not going to depart from the attitude adopted in the past of endeavouring to discuss these issues in a manner befitting their seriousness. Today, sir, we have the minister again facing reality, if at any time the red carpet of welcome caused any distortion in objectivity during the course of his visit. The big problem the free nations of the world have to face is this: Is the change since the Geneva conference a new look? Is it reality or is it a mirage? Is it a change in manner or a change in matter? That to me represents in summary the problem that faces us today.

The minister referred particularly to the words of Khrushchev in connection with the shrimp whistling, and in listening to the minister I thought of history itself. A reading of recent history shows that on every occasion that the U.S.S.R. has ceased to be openly aggressive time was being bought for a purpose favourable to the U.S.S.R. I go back to 1921 to a book by Mikkail Frunske which is still standard in all military academies. In it he said that the general purpose and aim of the policies of the U.S.S.R. are that a death struggle with the western democracies is inevitable. In 1917, after the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, the foreign minister of the U.S.S.R. said: "We entered into that agreement. We never intended to keep it. We were simply buying time for a breathing spell."

The minister mentioned one of the latest actions on the part of the U.S.S.R., the offer of a 20-year treaty of friendship pact with the United States, a simple scheme designed to drive a wedge between the United Kingdom and the commonwealth on the one hand and the United States on the other. The friendly letter received by President Eisenhower from the communist leader is not in keeping with the unfriendly and provocative actions of the U.S.S.R. during recent weeks. In particular I refer to the speeches delivered by the communist leaders during their recent trip to India and eastern Asia.

The minister has stated that what is needed today is a realization of the unity of the free nations and an intensification of that unity. He mentioned the United States. I intended to quote an editorial from Sunday's New York Times, I believe, where, dealing with the present visit of Sir Anthony Eden to the President of the United States the New York Times makes it perfectly clear that there will be no freedom, no security, no salvation from the onrush of communism if at any time the United Kingdom and the commonwealth and the United States follow different courses of action or cease to be united in their common crusade.

This is not the first time that the U.S.S.R. has offered a non-aggression pact such as it offers the United States. It did the same in the Balkan states. It did the same with Finland. One thing I thought the minister might mention was the visit to Ottawa next Monday of Sir Anthony Eden who will be given a reception in our country, as he is receiving today in the United States, a reception in keeping with the magnificent contribution he and those associated with him are making to the preservation of world peace today.

The minister revealed some of his impressions, and I think that we in the various parties in the house who suggested that he should visit the U.S.S.R. have reason to be pleased that he did and that he has brought back to us that reaction which only the intimacy of personal intercourse can bring about. I am going to suggest, having regard to the experience some of us had last summer in visiting the NATO representatives of other countries and also having regard to the experience of the minister himself, that we in Canada should follow somewhat the same system followed by the congress of the United States, to make opportunities available for members of the Canadian Senate and House of Commons to visit the U.S.S.R. and there learn something at first hand of the situation in that country and of the attitude taken by the U.S.S.R.

To bring together representatives produces results. The agriculturists from the U.S.S.R., who recently visited North America and on occasion received a welcome not in keeping with our democratic way of life, had nothing adverse to say about our countries in their report on their return to Russia. Indeed, there is the highest commendation of the manner in which we discharge our responsibilities to our agricultural economy. While the U.S.S.R. originally made the offer suggesting exchanges in a manner that is not in keeping with our parliamentary way of invitation, I think that in the interests of all the government of this country through you, Your Honour, should make available in clear-cut terms an invitation to the U.S.S.R. to send representatives to our country.

I know that there has been ridicule of such visits. There were some who said: What are we going to do when we go to visit the NATO parliamentary association? I can say that those who were there came back with a new realization of the need of maintaining and expanding NATO. They came back with a new appreciation of world events in general. They sat in conference with representatives of 14 other NATO nations, and we saw there on two occasions an answer to those who say that there is a finality in history. One of the most impressive was at the NATO parliamentary conference. France demanded that the nations represented at that conference should be listed on the basis of the French names of their countries, thereby placing Germany or Allemagne in the position of being No. 1. Here I wish to pay tribute to the president of that organization, Senator Robertson of our own country, whose contribution in bringing the parliamentarians together is worthy of commendation from all of us. Imagine this. After two world wars, after all the antipathies and animosities of a thousand years, in a few short months after the inclusion of West Germany in the NATO organization, the representatives from France, in compassion and in a desire to bind the wounds of war and abate the hatreds of generations, made that request. Who would have believed that possible five years ago or even three years ago?

I saw something else. It was something that recalled to memory where we were in West Germany, in that area of Alsace-Lorraine which for generations has been the way of marching armies. The representative forces of the Canadian army put on that magnificent drama, as I call it, the retreat ceremony. Taking part were representatives of the Royal 22nd regiment and two other Canadian regiments. Their respective bands performed at the ceremony. At the conclusion of that retreat ceremony "God save the Queen" was played, then "The Marseillaise," and the officers came to the salute. Then the German national anthem was played and the Canadian officers followed suit. They came to the salute in an area where there are graves that will be unforgotten for all generations. They came to the salute, thus indicating that history is not finality and that as the pages turn, changes take place.

I went into East Germany. I visited West Germany. I saw West Berlin and I am going to make just passing reference to what I saw because the minister stated that the mass of propaganda of the U.S.S.R. is designed to control the hearts and the minds of men. As you go into Berlin—that island of freedom, to use the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on one occasion —you find that West Berlin is lit up. East Berlin is dark with the exception of one street, the show street, Stalin Allee, where live in fear the dictators of communism. You met the mayor and the people. They stood there as the bulwarks of freedom. They could be overrun at any time but they have stood their ground. Then you go to East Berlin. I had no idea of the propaganda that goes on. Wherever a person goes he is facing a propaganda message. The walls of all the buildings have on them messages such as these: We demand the outlawing of all atomic weapons; fight in resistance to the Paris treaties; protect the accomplishments of the people; fight for the rebuilding of Germany as a peace-loving democratic state; workers in city and country be prepared to arm for the defence of our homeland; all Germans with their feet under the same table. These slogans are the kind that have been designed to influence the thinking of the people. They ask for unification. The mayor of West Berlin, Herr Otto Suhr, stated that unless there is unification under a system of free elections there can never be peace in Europe. The U.S.S.R. promises hopefully that there will be unification and goes its way raising East Germany to a position of equality under the Warsaw pact, demanding at all times that Canada, Great Britain, the United States and the other nations that have representatives in West Berlin shall recognize the authority of that government by allowing that government to sign the necessary authority for them to go into East Germany.

I want to say this, Mr. Speaker, before I come to controversial things. One of the most impressive things that faces a Canadian as he goes through Europe and visits the Canadian embassies is the high quality of the Canadian representatives there. Without separating him from the rest, I mention particularly Mr. Keith, the head of the military mission in West Germany. It was obvious that he was a man who enjoyed the right of entry at any time to any of the representatives of the other countries, not only because of his official position but also because of his unusual ability and his unusual insight into external affairs.

Having said that, I come to something else. When you speak to people in East Berlin, you find that they would like to be joined together. You see the difference in economic conditions. I say through you, sir, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that butter prices there are interesting. In West Berlin butter is 72 cents a pound and in East Berlin it is $4.80 a pound. One reason for that situation is the different standard with regard to currency. But more particularly the reason is this. Under communism agriculture has been destroyed. My hon. friend stated that the U.S.S.R. wants to pick off the cream, in effect, under any system of reorganization or system of unification. That is obvious in East Germany. There the U.S.S.R. picks off the top of everything that the farmer grows. The result is a failure in agriculture that is apparent on every hand. That is one of the reasons that during the next five years the U.S.S.R., under its new agricultural policy, intends to put into crop some 75 million acres more than have previously been planted.

What is the attitude of the U.S.S.R.? Is it desirous of peace? The events of the past give no such indication. The minister stated that those high in authority in the U.S.S.R. know the danger today of the hydrogen bomb. I believe that is so. As a matter of fact, the hydrogen bomb has created equality in military preparedness today and, in my opinion, in large measure accounts for the tremendous change in objective on the part of the U.S.S.R. since the summit conference in the summer of 1955. They realize today that they are not going to overrun the world by force and they now resort to this new plan of economic infiltration, the handing out of promises, the dangling of promises before the eyes of peoples less highly developed economically than are we. They offer to India several hundreds of millions of dollars for dams, steel mills and the like; to Egypt one-half a billion dollars for the building of a dam. To other countries there have been promises of a similar nature.

My hon. friend says that Canada has increased her contribution to the Colombo plan. It is true that she has increased her contribution but it is a small increase having regard to the change in strategy on the part of the U.S.S.R. I refer to this change from reliance on the force of arms to reliance on the power of economic infiltration and the dangling of promises. As a matter of fact, having regard to the five-year plan that was recently enunciated by the U.S.S.R., I think that a form of economic blackmail is to be the policy of the U.S.S.R. during the next five years. They will make promises. They are buying surplus products from Burma. They are extending economic assistance to various countries. They do not intend to go to war, that is to hot war. They realize the fabulous dangers that they face. Now, they are proceeding on what they call a five-year plan designed, to use the words of Molotov, to change over as painlessly as possible to communism in the world. In other words, as Khrushchev once said, the danger is capitalism, and that sums up the plan today.

There is this economic change. Steel production and coal production are being expanded; hydro power is being doubled and heavy industry is being expanded as never before. They have nothing to worry about so far as the costs of production are concerned because they have a police state. They can maintain whatever level of wages they choose. This new policy has all the appearance of a vast economic war which we in the industrial nations still face as a potential danger. We in the agricultural nations, faced with this expansion in agricultural development, will find that the competition we have today will be regarded as nothing beside that which we will face in the future.

As a result of this economic plan on a large scale the western world today meets a challenge from the U.S.S.R. in this new policy of maintaining peace. Russia is putting the western nations in a challenging position by failing to go to war, by fomenting trouble, by extending economic aid, by forcing them to compete with the promises of economic aid given by the U.S.S.R., thereby endangering ourselves if we endeavour to equal in reality the promises of the U.S.S.R. Each of these countries, Poland, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Hungary, Rumania and Bulgaria, united the other day under the Warsaw pact agreement, is building vast economic developments so they will be in a position to challenge the economic magnitude of the United States, Britain and the other countries of the commonwealth and the free nations. In other words, today the free nations are going through a form of international brainwashing.

Some time ago a Pole was describing the brainwashing through which he had gone. He said it consisted of sweet talk accompanied by promises of concessions. Day after day different concessions are promised until finally the individual becomes a neurotic wreck. Postponing a performance always ends in uncertainties, and the dangling of hope destroys the power of the individual to resist. Is that what the U.S.S.R. is trying to do today by promises to Asia and to Africa, as well as to the other parts of the world? Is she trying, by handing out hopeless promises, to destroy the resistance of these nations who today find themselves economically in a position of semi-destitution, in some cases of almost complete destitution?

It is for that reason that more than ever I should like to see the NATO nations give greater attention to article 2 of the NATO agreement. In this way the free nations might join in multilateral trade and remove many of those tariffs that are unjust, unfair and unjustifiable in the world in which we live, to the end that the NATO nations and other free nations will be able to take their stand against this economic new look which endeavours to do what the military fierce look was not able to achieve. Indeed, in East Germany I noticed that seven or eight months of smiling had achieved more for the U.S.S.R. than seven or eight years of snarling. In other words, this new scheme shows a flexibility of policy under the present leaders that Stalin never achieved or never tried to achieve.

Now, having dealt with these generalities, I come to various more specific issues. I was interested in what the minister had to say about the recognition of communist China. A few months ago, on August 25, he made a speech in Vancouver in which he dealt with the question of recognition. He said:

> I mention these matters not to indicate that we are rushing into—or should rush into—any change of policy in this matter of diplomatic recognition, in a way that would cause bitter controversy at home and with certain friendly nations. I am suggesting, however, that the time is coming—and soon—when we should have another and searching look at the problem; that we should consider it also with those friendly governments with whom we like to act—and whenever possible should act together on matters of international importance.

Well, sir, out of this searching look has come the general statement on the part of the minister today. Strangely enough only recently he was giving advice to the United States in an article in Look magazine. Apparently on January 10 he advised the United States somewhat differently, at least that is he way the people of the United States read t. Paragraph 4 of his advice reads:

We should recognize the fact that the Peiping government and not Chiang Kai-shek is in control of continental China and likely to remain so; that here are basic problems to be settled in the Far East which cannot be settled without the participation and agreement of that government. We can negotiate with Peiping when necessary and desirable without implying approval of that regime or without weakening our opposition to communism.

This advice, 18 or 19 days old, given to the United States, is certainly far from the viewpoint expressed today by the minister in this regard. What he says today represents the attitude taken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and this party. We do not say we will never consent to recognition of communist China. We say so long as communist China remains an undischarged bankrupt in the field of diplomacy and in the field of aggression, so long can there be no justification for the legal recognition of that country. In the old days when the theories of Grotius had application, recognition was a simple legal expedient. Today, recognition would be accepted throughout Asia amongst those nations that still stand against communism as the greatest approval measure of communism and communist China that could possibly be achieved by that country.

Certainly, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) was not so sure about recognition. He did not have the same views in November that the minister had when he spoke in Vancouver and flew that kite to the women's association out there.

The Minister of Fisheries had his experience when he was actually channelled into places to which he did not want to go. He was channelled into China. In his interview on November 11 he finally ended up in this way:

Mr. Sinclair said the United Nations had laid down certain standards for peace-loving nations and it might be questioned if communist China met these standards. It had played a "cat-and-mouse game" in the release of 47 missionaries recently, failing to let them go in a group and leaving those waiting to receive them at Hong Kong uncertain of time of arrival.

Such acts made it difficult for some to see they were quite ready for admission to the United Nations.

As far as recognition is concerned, while some may say it is different from admission to the United Nations, it indeed has very much the same results. The minister said there is one thing in the recognition of China that we should take into consideration, and that is, what is best for Canada? I am asking him, to use his own words, the words he used to the Women's Canadian Club in Vancouver: Was our own national advantage one of those things that were to be considered, and if there were recognition would we get paid for the Ming Sung shipping deal? Was that one of the things? In the minister's enunciation of policy today with respect to recognition he adopted the point of view which we expressed on more than one occasion, and on one occasion in particular, paraphrasing those immortal words of the late Mackenzie King: "not necessarily recognition, but recognition if necessary".

We now come to one problem that I am surprised the minister stayed away from. While he did give a casual examination to the Middle East situation the other day, I believe, Mr. Speaker, the events of the last few days and the bungling answers of the government in regard to the shipment of Harvard aircraft to Egypt have resulted in an understandable predilection against discussing this matter any further. I can quite understand that. What are those events? Well, Mr. Speaker, read Hansard if you would like to see the greatest collection of jarring, irreconcilable answers made by different ministers at different times or by the same minister at different times. It is one of the most peculiar incidents that have happened in this parliament. It is very unusual. I hold in my hand copies of Hansard and I intend to refer to them in a general way. I start first with the inexcusable attitude of this government toward parliament. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—he is not in his seat at the moment—spoke at a dinner given in his honour and in honour of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and both were entitled to all honour. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce decided to give the people assembled there a lesson in parliamentary procedure. He prefaced his remarks by saying: "I am a House of Commons man". Well, Mr. Speaker, that indeed will arouse tremendous interest in the mind of Sir Winston Churchill who described himself in that way on one occasion.

I ask the Prime Minister, through you, sir, what is the reason for all this evasive bungling that has been going on since this matter was first brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) on January 11? I am not going to read the record in detail, but it is a record that I doubt whether the Prime Minister, with all his masterful legal skill, could bring into anything but disorder. I ask this question because if they did not have anything to hide, one wonders, why all the hiding. If there was not something they did not want to reveal, why all the explanation?

On January 11 the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) the following question, as reported at page 9 of Hansard:

Have any aircraft been shipped from Canada to Egypt recently or are there any orders on hand for the export of such aircraft?

After a few preliminary words, the minister said:

I would have to make inquiries of the Department of Trade and Commerce as well as my own department. However, I believe I can say at once that I know of no shipments of Canadian aircraft to Egypt or of any orders for such shipments.

It is strange. Today the Prime Minister said that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was consulted. First they said they did not know anything, and I am not blaming him. The subject of the question sat there. Beside him sat the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney), who also had to be consulted, and a little further along the row sat the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I sometimes wonder whether he did the whole thing on his own, and that is the reason they did not know, but certainly they did not know.

Well, what happened next? On January 12 again the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question and the minister brushed him off with a frivolity when he said he should have been satisfied with his own answer. Then the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) asked a question, but he did not get very much information either. Then we come to January 17 and the minister proceeded to give an explanation, which appears on page 183 of Hansard. And, Mr. Speaker, imagine what misled him. It was the word "recent". The question was whether there had been any shipments recently. "Recent" is a hard word, subject to a number of definitions. That is what misled the minister. He said, of course, that it was not recently, it was back in June or July that those orders were given. Then, January 18, the Prime Minister was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North whether he would cancel the export permits, and the Prime Minister said that no consideration had been given to that. Well, that was another step, and still we did not find out anything about those Harvards, except in a general way.

Then came Friday, January 20, and a lengthy explanation was given. It is an interesting one because one of the ministers who did not know anything about this, namely, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), said in part, as reported at page 344 of Hansard:

We are quite proud of our record and we are prepared to defend it at any time.

After the Prime Minister had given his explanation I asked him a very simple question, which appears at the bottom of page 345 of Hansard as follows:

Reverting to earlier discussion between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, would the Prime Minister tell the house whether the issue of export permits covering aircraft, explosives or other war material is decided at the cabinet level or on the basis of certain principles and, if so, what are those principles and when were they first communicated to the Department of Trade and Commerce?

The Prime Minister said:

Matters concerning the acceptance or otherwise of orders for any of that type of material are discussed at the cabinet level. But to my knowledge no orders are accepted before information has been communicated to those with whom it is sought to place the orders . . .

Then I asked this question:

When was the decision made regarding the export permit for aircraft for Egypt? At approximately what date did the cabinet determine that question?

And in reply to the inquiry when did the cabinet determine that question, the Prime Minister said:

It was some time in June of last year.

I then asked this question, which is unanswered today, as it was on January 20:

How is it that when the question was asked at the beginning of the session none of the ministers seemed to know anything about it? How is it they knew nothing about it?

At this point Mr. Fleming interjected:

I guess they were not at the cabinet meeting.

Then we come to the next step. Just picture this record of fumbling and bungling, if not evasion. The next step was that an order in council was passed. That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said. This statement was made after 13 days of searching. And when the Minister of Trade and Commerce announced that an order in council had been passed, the other ministers sat and remained silent. When we asked for production of the order in council the Minister of Trade and Commerce informed us that he had made a mistake. He said, we do not pass orders in council on things like that.

What is this? Is this the manner in which we are to be treated in respect of information for which we ask on matters less serious than this? Today, however, the Prime Minister brings forward the final and revised version as of this date, and the possibility exists that in the days ahead there will be additional versions. The Prime Minister said it was by a ministerial order by the minister who thought he had an order in council passed. How often, Mr. Speaker, we have said that the cabinet enjoys the kind of solidarity that it has exhibited today. What did they do? Who knows? If ever the loose practices of this cabinet have been revealed it has been in connection with this matter—everybody on board and nobody knowing where he is going; everyone with a different explanation. That is the parliamentary end of this matter. I say to the government in relation to external affairs and other matters that we in the opposition have our responsibilities to discharge. We expect—and have a right to expect—to be treated with candour. We were not treated with candour or frankness in this regard. There has been throughout this whole sorry spectacle an illustration of cabinet irresponsibility which cannot do anything else but shake the faith of those who like to believe that the information they receive, although it may not be all the information, does cover the actual facts.

The minister said on January 27 that, when aircraft were going to sensitive areas, ministerial concurrence was required of the ministers of external affairs, defence, and trade and commerce. The country in question was a sensitive area. The minister of external affairs so described it in the article published in Look magazine when he said:

> In the Middle East, war could flare up any day between Israel and the Arab states. The Soviets are fanning the embers with arms shipments to Egypt (and incidentally with other communist governments, capturing about half of Egypt's foreign trade).

This statement indicates that the minister of external affairs regarded as dangerous the action of the U.S.S.R. in delivering munitions to the Middle East. He said that such shipments were "fanning the embers". I now ask the Prime Minister the question: Are you not doing the same thing when under such circumstances as have existed in the past six months you are employing this under-the-table method of delivering Harvards and thus doing your part to fan those embers? I do not think it will always be that way. If conditions worsen there we can change our policy, but as long as the situation remains as it is today I say there can be no justification for condemning the U.S.S.R. for doing on a larger scale what we ourselves are doing.

As a result of the outstanding contribution made by its representatives in external affairs in every part of the world Canada has established a reputation as an objective nation whose interests are above the monetary considerations which actuate some nations. But as a result of the course taken by the government Canada's position of objectivity and moderation has been jeopardized. Having granted permits to export arms, the government has removed the most potent weapon in Canada's arsenal of democracy, the moral weapon. Canada is no longer in the position where it can be a conciliator. It is no longer in the position where it can look on the other nations and say, "We are disinterested". Surely those things were thought of beforehand. Can the minister continue to rise in his seat and express Canada's moral indignation concerning the conduct of the U.S.S.R. in doing on a larger scale what Canada is doing? Surely the minister in his speech the other day did not intend to take virtually the same position as the U.S.S.R. when he said that, if we do not ship munitions to this country, the Russians will.

The things which have happened in the last few days indicate that the government knows that it has done wrong; surely it knows that. It is a piece of cynicism to say, "If we did not do so, the U.S.S.R. would have done it".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is five o'clock and the house will proceed to a consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are a number of divorce bills on the order paper, Nos. 25 to 36. I do not see the sponsors; shall these bills stand?

Mr. Coldwell: Stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The items under private and public bills having been disposed of, the house will resume consideration of the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that by this conduct Canada's potentialities as conciliator and mediator have received a setback, as has Canada's reputation for selflessness, in the international world of today. I do not say that this condition should continue if world conditions change for the worse; then this matter can be reappraised. Having regard to the events of the past few weeks and what has been revealed here, I say—and I dislike to say it—that I think the conduct of this government deserves the condemnation of Canada for having, at a time like this, added its share of fuel to the embers which today are burning in the Middle East. I believe that this whole matter should be fully considered—and I know there have been alternative suggestions—by a parliamentary committee. Let us look into this. Let us find out the reasons for all the things that have taken place, these bumbling, mumbling explanations, these detours and deviations.

It is unbelievable that out of something that is above board, as the government says, it should have been necessary for the government to build alibi after alibi. As one alibi was punctured, another found its place. Let me say this, too. This is something that is beyond partisanship; it is a matter affecting all Canadians; and we have always adopted that attitude. I should like to see some of the Liberal members speaking on this subject. I noticed that when the minister was in Moscow he made a very interesting statement there. He said, "When I return to Canada, I will discuss with other Canadian government members the question of forming a puppet theatre there". I do not know whether that is what this government has been trying to do since he got back but, if he could sit over there, he would not have to go to Moscow to see a puppet show.

I should like to mention one other thing. I believe with all my heart that the state of Israel must be preserved. As one walks through that state, one sees the foundations of civilization and one sees the landmarks of the conquerors, Persian, Assyrian, Roman, Crusader and Turk. One sees places holy to the three monotheistic religions. One sees a state in which a profound social revolution is taking place, vital and living, based on the imagination and inspiration of a dedicated people.

Mr. Martin: Would my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question? He has said that the state of Israel must, of course, be preserved at all costs. With that, everyone is in agreement. Will he agree, and does he say now, that arms should be sent to Israel to guarantee that preservation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall return to that in a moment.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have never run away from any questions in the way the government runs away from questions from this side. Perhaps I may finish this, because I know my hon. friend, with his capacity for language, would expect me to complete the sentence. From the humblest to the greatest, this country, Israel, is engaged in the great adventure of creating a new democracy and achieving economic independence.

What should be done? What is this government doing about bringing into effect an international force to protect and assure the boundaries? What has it done? The other day there was a suggestion for the maintenance in their integrity of the boundaries under an international arrangement very much in the same fashion as was dreamed of by Castlereagh over 130 years ago. What have they done about it? If conditions got worse and war broke out, then conditions as to the shipment of munitions would change, and all of us would change the views we have now; but until that time, on the basis of the words of the minister, remember that the sending of munitions is adding fire to the embers.

I suggest to my hon. friend who interrupted that one of the things he can do, with his influence in the United Nations, is to see to it that something in the nature of an international force is established to the end that this dangerous situation shall be obliterated. If it is not, and war breaks out there, we shall have war all over the world, for in every generation that area has seen the march of conquerors. It is almost like a beaten road for war.

What should we do? I say that we must face this problem courageously and manfully and not in the manner that we have seen here—a government hiding behind one explanation and then another, then throwing both overboard and finding refuge in still another. If the cabinet operates in other major matters in the same way that the Prime Minister revealed today and in the past few days, then indeed the question might well be asked, who leads, and whither?

My hon. friend mentioned NATO. The cement that has held NATO together has been fear. As I see it, the great danger today is this: that the removal of fear from the hearts of men will at the same time also remove that determination among nations to stand together. That is why I believe that article 2 deserves more intensive consideration now than ever in the past, in view of the new policy of the Soviet union. My hon. friend says we need today something of the spirit of faith, as I understood him, and I believe that. But what we need today is courage as well as faith, rather than challenging or truculent exhibitions of bravado such as "dancing to the brink of disaster." That type of expression is not conducive to peace. The minister has told us of his trip through the U.S.S.R. and to Moscow. The U.S.S.R. is using a new system. It is a kind of circus parade. Khrushchev and Bulganin go through India and they catch the imagination of the people. If only President Eisenhower had the health he had prior to last August! Would it not have been a great thing for him to go there and carry to those people something of his sincerity and the faith that he has in democracy, enjoying as he does the respect and admiration of peoples all over the world?

NATO may weaken. France has withdrawn three divisions to North Africa. German rearmament is slow. I have the figures here and rearmament is slower than was anticipated. Free nations cannot, as Eden said, negotiate from weakness. What is the new NATO policy? Three ministers went over there, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney). What policy was determined there? It was determined that a warning line was going to be built throughout Europe to which all of us would contribute. Has not the time come to reconsider the whole NATO set-up to the end that, since we are in a position in northern Canada of being in a potential front line, the general contribution of NATO should also be used within this country so that expenditures in northern Canada for defence will be part and parcel of the NATO defence for all the world?

Other matters will be dealt with by those who follow. We face, as the minister says, a new Soviet with a flexible, resourceful, ruthless policy. In the military field atomic energy seems to have resulted in a draw, but there remains one field that we have never yet explored to the extent that we should, the field of the hearts of men. We need a message to be given to the peoples in other parts of the world of what freedom means and the power that comes to men as they draw strength from the wells of freedom. We need the ability to explain that power. We need to mobilize their hearts by showing that our system is better than theirs.

The momentous task of the free world is not to falter in continuing to make the maximum effort for peace by negotiation, by the kind of thing the minister did when he talked face to face with Bulganin and Khrushchev. Negotiation might well have prevented the first world war. Sir Edward Grey said in his memoirs that if only the nations had continued to negotiate, the first world war would not have taken place. We must continue that negotiation. We must continue to provide mutual opportunities to meet those who are parliamentarians in other countries, particularly in the U.S.S.R. We must negotiate, but always with prudence and caution, and above all we must be on guard against unwarranted optimism, against becoming the manipulated victims of falsely created hopes on the part of the U.S.S.R. as that country wages its international war for the hearts of men.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I therefore move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew):

That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"in view of the present critical situation in the Middle East, this house expresses its strong disapproval of the government's policy of authorizing the shipment of munitions of war to countries in that area not within the NATO alliance; and also condemns the government for the lack of candour with which the matter has been dealt with in this house.

Mr. Speaker: Earlier in his remarks the hon. member for Prince Albert dealt with a declaration approved by the Supreme Soviet, dated February 9, 1955, in which are included three paragraphs at the end referring to what is presumably an invitation to exchange parliamentarians between the parliaments of the world. Certainly the hon. member was not aware that as recently as last Friday a meeting was held in my office of the whips of the four parties at which it was decided to study the matter. I think I should say in fairness to the whips that at that meeting an undertaking was given to the effect that the whips would report the subject matter to their various caucuses which, I understand, are to be held tomorrow morning. Another meeting is then to be held to deal further with the matter.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the debate this afternoon is, of course, to some degree supplementary to the address which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made in the house last Tuesday, and a little later on in my speech I intend to take the opportunity to comment on the minister's remarks regarding the situation in the Middle East and to say something about the policy that I think Canada should support and forward both with the great powers and with the United Nations. But before I do that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I am very happy this afternoon to be able to compliment the Canadian delegation at the United Nations last autumn. I think that delegation, under the leadership of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), placed Canada in an excellent position and in a good light before the other nations of the world. I am very happy indeed that the membership of the United Nations was expanded because I believe that sooner or later, if the United Nations is to become the kind of organization that we originally hoped it would be, it must become universal in character. Any step taken in that direction is, in my opinion, a right and proper move.

This afternoon we have heard a great deal about the disturbed situation of the world, about the determination of the Soviet union to expand its influence across the world in various ways. I believe the minister is quite right when he tells the house that owing to the terror of the new weapons of war, particularly the hydrogen bomb, we are not likely to see the Soviet union embark on a shooting war—and of course we are not likely to see any nation outside of the Soviet union do so—which, with the modern weapons of war, would bring the world into ruins around us all. But I am inclined to think that the minister this afternoon rather underrated the potential influence of the Soviet union and the nations associated with the Soviet union in the competition which is developing in the field of economic aid. I think that what we are witnessing today is perhaps a diminution of the dangers of a military contest and that that military contest has been replaced by a new contest, namely a contest to win the world by means of economic and technical aid.

It may be said—as was said by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) —that the Soviet union has been unable to feed its people properly because of the failure of its agricultural plan. But the Russian people for centuries back, I was going to say—and I think that is probably the right thing to say—have been accustomed to an extremely low standard of living. From all the reports that we get, from what we heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) here and elsewhere and from what we heard from the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) when he returned to Canada, undoubtedly those extremely low standards of living have been improved. The Russian people, seeing some slight improvement in the standards of living, are willing to forgo the great improvements that people in our countries would expect by great industrial expansion, so the Soviet union may be able to do more than make promises in the field of economic aid to the underprivileged nations of the world.

That brings me to the point that I really wish to make this afternoon, namely that the western nations—and among them Canada—must do very much more than we have been doing in assisting the under-privileged nations of the world to improve their standards of life and to go forward and therefore to resist those who would foment revolution and the institution of dictatorships. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that I used the plural "dictatorships". I did so because it is not so long ago that a great country, in its distress, turned to a dictatorship of a different sort from that of the dictatorship of the communist party. I refer, of course, to the dictatorships that arose in the early 1930's in Europe, particularly that in Germany. To my mind there is always a real danger of the emergence not only of communist dictatorships but of fascist dictatorships. I think they flourish on the same kind of fertile ground, namely the ground of misery and of want. When we look over the problem faced by the United Nations organizations in this field of economic aid, we find that it is a stupendous one. When we look at the resources that have been granted to the organizations that have been set up, we find that those resources are pitifully small.

Some time ago I jotted down some statements made by the United Nations secretary general of the technical aid organization. He is a gentleman whom many of us know well in Canada. I refer, of course, to Dr. Keenleyside. In Weekend magazine published by several newspapers in this country as a supplement on Saturdays, in the issue of July 9, 1955, he had some striking things to say. He said:

> Grim figures illustrate the conditions under which a great part of the earth's population lives:
> Over half the world's people are illiterate.
>
> Most of the earth's inhabitants suffer from hunger most of the time.
> Almost two-thirds of the people of the world have an average income of less than $100 a year compared with more than $1,500 in the United States.

The amount is only slightly less in Canada. In fact if we take the inflated figures of last year of the gross national product and divide it by our population last year, I think it will be found that we exceed that $1,500 figure. I know that when I was at the United Nations organization meeting in 1945 one of the statements that startled me—

Mr. Martin: In 1946.

Mr. Coldwell: —when I was on the committee that set up the economic and social council at San Francisco, was the statement that two-thirds of the people of the world—two out of every three persons—went to bed hungry every night. It was not necessarily the same two out of three but always two out of three. Generally speaking, that condition is no better today than it was in 1945.

Mr. Martin: That was in 1946; the fall of 1946.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; in 1946 as well. Dr. Keenleyside went on to say this:

> More than half are ill (500 million suffer from malaria; almost the entire land mass between the tropics is afflicted with yaws—

That is a dreadful tropical disease which a small amount of penicillin will suffice to cure.

> —400 million have venereal diseases; between 3 million and 5 million a year die from tuberculosis—and that is just the beginning of the list.

Much has been said about what is being done already through various schemes of assistance to under-developed areas. There is the United Nations technical assistance program, the Colombo plan, the Point Four program in the United States and the like. But the discussion of these organizations at the United Nations and the numbers of words used far exceed the amount of money appropriated to do the kind of jobs that these organizations are endeavouring to do.

Then he went on to say this:

> We could go on for 200 years at the present rate without producing the effects that are wanted.

Then he remarks on the United Nations technical assistance program. He said:

> It originally envisaged the spending of $25 million to $35 million in the first 18-month period during 1950-51, and an expansion to above $50 million to $100 million annually within a few years.

How near are we to that target? Because of the reluctance of some governments—and may I add because of the reluctance of governments like Canada's government—to give a greater lead in appropriations for this cause our contribution is to some extent minimized. We are all inclined to say that on a per capita basis we should contribute this much if somebody else contributes that much. I am glad that a year ago we increased our contribution from $1 million to $1,500,000 a year. But how petty that amount really is, as I shall show in a moment, I hope, in comparison with other expenditures that we make.

The article goes on to say:

> Because of the reluctance of some governments to contribute on a sufficient scale, the sum of $25 million was achieved for the first time in 1954. But the amount of money available has not increased at all in proportion to the requests from the various governments for assistance.
> Some western nations are spending $100 on military defence for every $1 spent on aid to the underdeveloped areas. While military preparation is a first requirement under today's conditions, this proportion of spending strikes many observers as being badly out of balance.

What is our own record in that same field? Let us look at our expenditures, and I take them from the public accounts for 1954-55 tabled in this house. Our total economic aid of every sort, according to the public accounts, was $29,016,824.86. What did we spend for national defence? We spent $1,665,968,960.31. This amount does not include the defence production expenditures which were made in addition to the figure I have just placed on the record. What would economic aid be as a percentage of the military defence figure which I have just noted? It is 1·74 per cent. Our population on July 31, 1955, was estimated by the dominion bureau of statistics to be 15,637,000. Our economic aid amounted to $1.86 per capita. On the other hand, for military expenditures, not counting defence production, we spent $106.54 per capita.

Now I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we are not going to be successful in winning the world for the kind of democracy and freedom in which we believe and which we enjoy in our western countries. We may urge different steps in democratic development, and all the rest of it: we may visualize different stages in our evolution from one form of economic structure to another; but in our western countries we all value personal freedom and human liberty. We want to see that extended across the world. My belief is that we are not going to win this struggle unless we are prepared to do far more than we have been doing by way of economic aid. I am very glad to note that the Colombo plan aid is to be increased this year. However, it is not particularly substantial when compared with our wealth and compared with our expenditures in other fields. But it is a step in the right direction, and I am very glad indeed to see it undertaken.

I noted the articles that were written by that brilliant young journalist who travels and reports from time to time for the Ottawa Journal, Mr. I. Norman Smith. I read his articles when he was sending them from the Soviet union and the Far East. I read the speech which he delivered before the Canadian Club in this city some two or three weeks ago. In that address he had this to say:

> Yet the Colombo plan is virtually all Canada is doing about Asia, the area Mr. Pearson says may be history's most important crucible at this time.
> I do not relish saying what I am about to say, but I must say it. I have found that many Canadians seem almost to resent the poverty of Asian people. It embarrasses us, we look the other way if they beg and say to ourselves that we cannot stand beggars. But if they do not beg, and instead seem to keep company with arrant nationalists or even communists, then we call them fellow travellers and shut up our doors.

Well, that is one man's opinion and it may not be entirely correct. But undoubtedly we are complacent. There is no room for complacency in the kind of world in which we live today, a world in which millions of people are hungry, sick and illiterate; millions of people who may very easily be enticed into the communist orbit. I am thinking particularly of India, because I feel India is the key country in Asia from our point of view. If India should fall behind China in improving the standards of living, if the Chinese under their dictatorship, no matter how harsh it may be, are able over the next 10, 15 or 25 years, to outpace India in improving the standards of life in that part of Asia, then the communist orbit will be extended over a vast majority of the human race.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, we have every facility for assisting in improving conditions in these countries. The other afternoon I mentioned the necessity of our building up our educational system so that we might not be outpaced in the field of science. May I just say in passing that when I speak of science and technical education I do not believe, of course, that we should endeavour only to make men scientists or technicians. I think the basis of even a scientific and technical education is a good, what we call a liberal, education. I think the humanities are as essential to the scientists or technicians as they are to any other calling or profession. We have to develop technicians and scientists, not only for ourselves, but we have to be able to provide them in greater numbers to the backward countries of the world.

I am not saying how much we should appropriate. I am not saying we can appropriate a billion dollars out of the defence budget or something of that sort. But I am saying we can do many times what we are doing now in order to preserve ourselves, our safety and the future welfare of the land in which we live. I am very happy indeed to see that we are making a slight improvement in our contribution to the Colombo plan. A year and a half ago I would have liked to have seen Canada support the proposal for the special United Nations fund. A proposition was put forward that, in addition to all the other agencies, we should set up a new organization with a capitalization, if my memory serves me correctly, of about $250 million—not Canada alone but the nations together—to assist in the development of the underdeveloped countries. This was not necessarily an organization which would have within it only publicly appropriated funds by parliaments. Private capital was to be invited to assist in the establishment of the fund and the working out of its details. I was with the delegation at New York when that came up, and I was sorry to know that our government could not see its way clear at that time to support the proposal. I know it will come before the United Nations from time to time and I hope that sooner or later the government may see its way clear not only to take part but perhaps to give some leadership in that field.

We have heard a great deal about these matters from time to time and I wanted to emphasize them again this afternoon because as I have said—and I want to repeat it—the struggle that is going on in the world is not going to be won on the battlefields of the world; it is going to be won to the extent that we can win over to the democratic ideals that we hold in common with those associated with us and to our side those countless people of Asia and of Africa who today need our help and our aid.

I now want to say something about the situation in the Middle East. I thought the minister made a very excellent windup to his speech last Tuesday. I thought he was rather unnecessarily harsh in his criticism of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) because the hon. gentleman had brought something before the house that he considered to be of importance at that time. We all realize that what he did was done in good faith. Because of the situation with which the world is faced in the Middle East that area has become the danger spot of the world. We had Korea; we had Formosa. Now we have the Middle East. I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that it would be indeed a great world tragedy, a great loss to the world, if the newly emerging democratic state of Israel were to be destroyed. It is the only state in that area of the world with institutions like our own; it is the only state in that part of the world with leadership of a democratic sort; it is the only state in that part of the world with an institution like the institution in which we are assembled today. A parliamentary institution modelled very largely along our lines; and indeed, as I know from talking to the clerk of the Knesset, with procedures that are very similar to the procedures that we use in this parliament.

We look back over the years and we find that the Israel-Arab armistice of 1949 has been followed ever since by hostility from the surrounding countries. They resent the establishment of the new state of Israel in that area. So great was the danger that in 1950 the three powers issued the tripartite agreement or declaration, Britain, the United States and France. They attempted at that time to check the drift to actual war. Their declaration, of course, was designed at that time to stabilize conditions there. How? Well, first of all, of course, by a warning that if Israel were attacked there would be immediate intervention; that no party, neither Israel nor the Arab states, should try to alter the boundaries as they had then been drawn. In addition, they tried to maintain a balance there by restricting the inflow of arms into the whole area. But since 1950 various events have happened. First of all, we had the evacuation of the Suez canal area by the United Kingdom, which gave to the Arab nations, and primarily to Egypt, access to many modern weapons and arms. Since then, of course, other weapons of war have been shipped to Egypt; but the most alarming thing that has happened to upset the balance in that area is the recent agreement between the Egyptians and the Czechs under which, with the assistance of the Soviet union, vast supplies of modern arms are going into Egypt, and the threat becomes ever greater, not only of an outbreak of war in that area, but if war should come and no assistance be forthcoming, the state of Israel might conceivably be eliminated.

Those of us who have been to Israel are well aware of the fact that in some places the distance between Israel's boundary and the sea is less than twelve miles. If my memory serves me rightly, in one place it is around six miles. How easy it would be for an enemy to cut across, divide the country and destroy it. They have, as those of us who have been there have seen, a very intelligent and well-trained armed force.

I am not suggesting that we should foment an arms race in that area. Indeed, I find it very difficult to think how an arms race could be fomented in that area under the conditions that exist there, where arms are being poured into Egypt from Czechoslovakia and from communist countries and similar arms denied to Israel. We could not conceivably pour in arms at the same rate, nor could Israel arrange to purchase them. And yet, of course, when you look back over the last twenty or thirty years, you wonder how a nation can exist unless it has firm guarantees from the great powers that are interested in its survival. I hope that when Sir Anthony Eden is here next week—and for certain this problem will be discussed; it may not be discussed publicly but it will be discussed privately—the minister will use his very best endeavour to get him and, as far as the minister can influence the United States, the state department of that country, to make a declaration saying that if war is started in that area by either side immediately the great powers will intervene on the side opposite to the aggressor nation to stop the conflict and to prevent war.

I should like to see the United States and Great Britain do that. France, of course is so involved in North Africa that I am not even suggesting it participate, I quite agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that what we need is a security force under the United Nations but we do not have it. We cannot rely on a force that does not exist to preserve peace. That, of course, is not logical nor sound and it certainly could not be effective if not in being.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I do not know whether or not the great powers would see to it that the state of Israel were not left defenceless. I would not send into Israel offensive equipment in the nature of bombers or something of that sort, but I doubt very much if the nations of the world can afford to see Israel threatened and inadequately armed, bearing in mind the relative proportions of population in Israel and the surrounding Arab states. There is one person in Israel for every 30 Arabs in the Arab states and the latter are well armed and well equipped now. I do not think the second suggestion I implied would be necessary if the great powers said, "We are going to see to it that no war starts in that area and we are going to stop aggression immediately, no matter from which side it comes".

I cannot conceive of Israel being imbued with a warlike spirit to try to drive back the 30 million Arab people from its borders. If Israel should attempt it they should be stopped from doing it. If, on the other hand, Egypt and the Arab states move against Israel, then I think that the great powers might make it abundantly clear that they would intervene immediately and stop the conflict. I think all of us in this house agree that it is essential that the state of Israel shall continue to exist and prosper.

I am going to move an amendment to the amendment because I think the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Prince Albert does not take into consideration conditions that might arise from time to time. I feel his amendment is too binding on this nation and that we should have some latitude, that our hands should not be tied too tightly in connection with the situation that exists there.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the word "alliance" the following words:

"without at the same time making sure that peace in that area would be guaranteed either by the United Nations or by the powers that signed the tripartite agreement of 1950, namely the United States, the United Kingdom and France."

It seems to me in that way we safeguard ourselves against possible misunderstanding. We do not say that under all circumstances we would be averse to supplying means of defence to a nation which we assisted in establishing. One of the things which pleased me when I was in Jerusalem and various other parts of Israel was to discover the high regard in which Canada is held by that country because of the work our minister of external affairs did on the commission some years ago, because of the work done by Mr. Justice Rand, whose name stands high in the regard of the people of that country, and because of the work that is being done today—or was being done when I was there—by General Burns. Those three names, if not universally known, are known among the people who lead that nation and among others who take an interest in affairs. They hold Canada in high esteem. We should leave ourselves room in which to move so that if the existence of a country which we helped to establish were threatened we would not be so bound that our government could not take effective steps to give immediate aid in the situation.

My time has just about run out, Mr. Speaker. I should like to have said something about the European situation and NATO. I am glad to know that those who went overseas last year to meet with other parliamentary delegations to discuss and examine NATO came back feeling pleased that they were afforded the opportunity of visiting there and brought back much useful information. I believe these inter-parliamentary meetings, whether they are commonwealth meetings, united nations meetings or other parliamentary gatherings, serve a useful purpose. I am glad to know that the parliamentarians from Canada who visited NATO last year feel that the expedition was worth while and that they were able to advance the interests of our country and of the NATO cause by their attendance at the meeting.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the opportunity, presented at this early date in the session, of discussing some of the very important aspects of the present international situation.

With reference to the international scene, the speech from the throne intimated that some developments have been welcome as releasing tensions in certain parts of the world while other unfortunately have had the contrary effect. Also in the speech this afternoon of the Secretary of State for External Affairs we had presented to us in a very clear manner the conditions that exist in various parts of our world. This helped to clarify some matters and to answer some questions that have been of concern to us.

We, of course, are in the position where we are not able to look at these things at first hand but we must glean our information concerning world affairs from various sources, and we are quite ready to admit some of them may not be reliable in every respect. However, after considerable study of the various situations and after comparing reports and making inquiries in various fields, there are a number of conclusions at which we are justified in arriving.

After we analyse the whole picture, it would appear that the prospects for stability and peace in the world are no brighter than they were some months ago. The cold war, apparently, is still on. Tensions in various sectors continue to hamper the efforts of men of good will in their quest for grounds for mutual confidence and understanding. The leaders of the nation have so far failed to find that common ground which, I believe, is essential to international peace and harmony.

I am not saying that the situation is hopeless. I would not want to think that that were so. We are not saying that it is hopeless and that therefore further efforts are more or less in vain. But the very fact that dangers still obtain, the very fact that tensions still exist, the very fact that efforts up to the present time have not yielded the results we had hoped for, those very facts must urge us on to even greater efforts towards peace and security. There must be a greater concentration and dedication of our resources, intellectual, moral, spiritual, economic, and in every other sense, to the task of establishing and maintaining a society in which justice, equity, peace, mutual understanding and freedom may be preserved for all the peoples of the world.

It would be impossible to deal with all the many matters of urgent concern. A number of them have already been dealt with in the debate today. It would seem that the numbers of important matters are increasing rather than diminishing. As has been pointed out, in some areas of our world these problems are of such a nature that they could, it seems, at any moment result in limited, if not widespread, conflict.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs dealt at length with the continued threat and the fact of communist aggression and expansion. I do not think it is necessary to review the stages by which a large portion of the world's population has been brought under the tyranny of this despotic and diabolical system. Suffice it at the moment to say that its spread has been rapid and far too extensive. We find our world divided into two camps: the east and the west. It has been referred to as a conflict for the minds and for the very souls of men. Certainly, when we look at it from that viewpoint, we can understand the magnitude, and the importance, of the task that confronts the statesmen of the world.

Last summer the world looked forward with a great deal of expectation to the conference that was called to meet in Geneva. The leaders of the four nations met there together to try to solve, or to get a deeper understanding of, the problems that confronted these four nations. It was suggested that the purpose of that meeting was to explore the extent of the change in the Soviet policy and also to deal with a number of other matters of great concern.

The Toronto Star in an article outlined the proposed eight topics for that discussion as set forth by President Eisenhower. German reunification was the first one. The second was an east-west security system in which a united Germany would have the right to choose its own allies. The third was the right of the Soviet satellites to choose their own form of government. The fourth was the tearing down of "communication and human" barriers between the Soviet union and the west. The fifth was an end to subversion by international communism. The sixth was limitation of armaments. The seventh was a higher standard of living for underdeveloped nations. The eighth was the development for peaceful uses of atomic energy.

When we look at those items which had been placed on the proposed agenda, we realize some of the problems that were confronting those four leaders as they met on that occasion. Those various matters that were broached were, of course, of a very controversial nature, as we can all readily understand. As I say, the world had looked forward with some expectation to that meeting, hoping that some good would be brought out of seeming chaos. But, sad to say, that was not the case.

Much was said about a change in the attitude of the Soviet leaders, about their smiles and their friendly attitude. Some of the newspapers of our country went out of their way to stress the happy and congenial spirit with which the Soviet leaders had approached that gathering, cavorting like tourists, appearing almost unaccompanied when compared with some of the western leaders who had their bodyguards, and so on. Yet we find that the result was negligible. Some have said that great things were accomplished; some have said that some good things were accomplished; but in the over-all picture it would not seem that the results had been too worth while.

[Mr. Patterson.]

The Soviet leaders are ever declaring their determination to work for peace. They constantly proclaim themselves as the champions of peace, the champions of freedom and of liberty. But certainly, as has been stated today, their actions do not prove that that is necessarily so. We think of the recent trip that premier Bulganin and party boss Khrushchev made to India and Burma. They seemed to go out of their way to make statements which tended to stir up animosity. It seemed as though they deliberately set themselves to make charges that would cause the western powers to react in a very unfavourable way. I am going to refer to several of them a little later, but I would suggest that the words of Mr. Khrushchev especially were far from words of peace. Their actions on these occasions were not the actions of men who were sincerely and honestly striving to ease world tensions. They certainly were not designed or calculated in any way to foster friendship and good will on the part of the western democracies at least.

There are hopes expressed at times that the communist tactics or their over-all plan and objective may change, but I think their plan and objective still remain the same. Communism plans world domination. Their program has been announced, progress is being made, and their plans seem almost so fantastic that it is hard to believe they are really setting out on that course. But I think the very fact we find it difficult to believe that the program is as outlined adds to the danger in which we find ourselves. And so we think of the progress of communism. We think of the nations that have been brought under the control of the Russian regime, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, the Ukraine, Poland, Czechoslovakia, yes, China and others. We think of their endeavours in Korea and Indo-China and it would seem that the fact is proven that communism has set its course and that its objective is still the domination of all the peoples of the world.

It has been stated that communism in its attempts to enslave the world takes one step backward and two steps forward. I am inclined to believe that, although we are opposed to communist aggression and expansion, we take one step forward and two steps backwards. I like to look back through the records of the recent past and find what some have said with reference to our attitude or what our attitude should be towards communism. In the Vancouver Province of November 30, 1955, there is a Canadian Press report from the United Nations, New York, reading as follows:

> Canada's external affairs minister Pearson has warned that the so-called "soft" Russian approach to world affairs may prove more dangerous to the west than Stalin hostility. In an address to the U.N. correspondent association, Pearson cautioned against any tendency to relax western defences and urged the people to gird for a long grind of "competitive coexistence." . . . He said "competitive coexistence" may prove more hazardous for the west than the cold war tactics of Stalin's regime. "We must make sure that relaxation of tension does not mean relaxation of effort."

I may say I was pleased to note in the speech the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made today that he still holds that same view. There were times when I almost thought he was going to back track, but I felt a little reassured today to know that he is still facing in the same direction and taking the same attitude with respect to this very serious situation. I should like to refer to an article by George Meany, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., found in the issue of the Ensign of January 14. The article reads:

Too many in the free world fail to see the real nature of communism as the mortal foe of everything that we hold dear, of every moral and spiritual value. Too many in the free world are still prisoners of the illusion that communism is, historically speaking, a progressive system—extreme liberalism temporarily making bad mistakes. Actually communism represents darkest reaction. It is an anti-social system in which there are imbedded some of the worst features of savagery, slavery, feudalism and life-sapping exploitation manifested in the industrial revolution of early day capitalism.

He goes on to make some other very striking statements with regard to communism and what our attitude should be in response to its challenge. I should like to refer again to an article entitled, "This is Our Foreign Policy" by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Weekend magazine of January 28, 1956, and I like to think that this is the policy of the present government. Speaking of the Soviet rulers and their assaults on NATO and so on, he has this to say:

Their hope is our challenge, and it is going to be a hard one to meet and defeat. Adequate military defence alone will not do it, though it is essential. Close political co-operation between the free nations; flexible and imaginative diplomacy; economic health; social progress; sympathy for and assistance to the underdeveloped free countries, especially in Asia; all these are a part of the answer to this aggressive challenge of international communism. As such they reinforce Canada's security.

I want to refer to the recent trip of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) to the Soviet union. We are glad to have the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs today of his trip to that country, and I would be inclined to say that he is not quite as optimistic about affairs in the U.S.S.R. as the Minister of Fisheries seemingly was. But there are two questions that I should like to ask concerning this visit to the Soviet union. I refer again to an editorial in the Ensign in which two charges or two statements are made, and I just wonder if they are right. About half-way through this editorial headed "Voyage of Discovery" we read these words:

In his press conference, on his return to Canada Mr. Sinclair divulged that the soviets agreed to satisfy his curiosity, his thirst for first-hand knowledge, at a price which seems exhorbitant both diplomatically as well as in personal sufferings.

First, he was to be their guest on their own conditions.

And this is the part to which I should like to call special attention:

That is why his lips are sealed on much that he saw.

Mr. Coldwell: Who wrote that? Where is it from?

Mr. Patterson: It is from an editorial in the Ensign of November 26, 1955. I continue reading from it:

Second, he could only travel to Siberia and visit the Siberian coast, if he made a visit also to Red China to greet members of the puppet regime in Peking . . .

He told the press in Ottawa, however, that in view of his acceptance of soviet hospitality he is not at liberty to speak freely about what he did observe in soviet Siberia.

Then I want to skip a paragraph and read the following one:

Plans were readied, as Mr. Sinclair told the press, to fly him to his native Vancouver in a few hours by special plane of the Canadian Pacific Airways. But no—the Soviets insisted on their price: Sinclair, on stretcher or wheelchair, had to be delivered to Peking for the proverbial diplomatic bow, the modern Red Chinese version of a kowtow to the Red puppets.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I say at once that there is no possible shadow of truth in that statement.

Mr. Patterson: I appreciate that clarification, Mr. Speaker. I was just going to ask these questions. Is it right that Mr. Sinclair's lips are sealed with respect to these things that he saw and heard?

Mr. McIvor: No.

An hon. Member: Let the minister answer.

Mr. Pearson: May I assure my hon. friend that Mr. Sinclair's lips are not sealed.

Mr. Patterson: Thank you. There is one other question that I should like to have clarified. It may be that it is out of order to ask questions and to expect answers, but we are glad to have the answers anyway. Is it true that in spite of his painful injuries he was required to travel to Peking and then to carry on these talks with the Chinese communists? Perhaps the minister would answer that question at a later time. However, those are just two questions that came to my mind as I read that article.

Mr. Pearson: It might save time, Mr. Speaker, if I also answered that last question. The answer is no.

Mr. Patterson: Then this newspaper has apparently misunderstood the facts.

An hon. Member: And so have you.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And they should be censured for it.

Mr. Patterson: There has been some discussion relative to the Middle East situation. In his statement this afternoon the minister did not touch on that matter because he had already made a statement in this regard just a short time ago. I would consider that this is the most sensitive of all the areas at the present time. It is an area in which reside two peoples between whom a feud has been carried on for generations. It was my privilege to be at the United Nations general assembly in 1954. There I heard the representatives of some of the Arab countries and also the delegate from Israel speak in the plenary sessions. Charges and countercharges were made. Yet it was not difficult to sense the feeling of animosity and, on the part of some, of hatred toward the other side on this particular question at that particular time. I would therefore just make my remarks in this respect very brief.

We recall that some time ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) stopped in and had a visit with the leader of Egypt. At that time it was regretted that it was not possible for him to stop in and visit the leaders of the state of Israel at the same time because at that time matters were in an extremely delicate position. However, he has already made the statement that in the near future a visit will be paid to Israel as well. We certainly appreciate that statement because, human nature being what it is and international moves being subject to political interpretations at all times, even these smallest matters must be given due consideration.

As to the Middle East problem, we have had called to our attention a number of things that constitute matters of friction. There is the refugee problem. We are not going into an explanation of the situation with regard to the refugees. I believe that every hon. member in the house is aware of the conditions. There we find a great many refugees herded together in camps and kept in idleness. That is a situation that constitutes a festering sore in that particular part of the world. I should like to suggest that the time has come when some definite decision should be taken relative to this particular situation.

These people are being sustained by funds from the United Nations Organization. Canada is making her contribution to those funds and is assisting in the maintenance of those people in the camps. But in view of the fact that so much money is being spent and that apparently no endeavour is being made to rehabilitate these people, at least to any extent, it would seem to me that the time has come when a decision ought to be made that the moneys that are given from here on, or after a certain date, must be used for the rehabilitation of these people and not just to maintain them in these camps where they are deteriorating and where they are kept in idleness. There may be reasons why they are being kept there. But certainly I think I am expressing the feelings of this group, at any rate, when I say that our government ought to make some statement to the effect that money that is given from now on must be used for the rehabilitation of these people.

We understand that a considerable number have been accepted back and have been integrated into the economy of the state of Israel. I do not think it is too much to suggest that those who remain should now become the responsibility of the Arab countries, that they should be willing to extend the hand of help and welcome and be willing to integrate the remainder of these people into the economies of the respective Arab nations. I think that this would do a great deal to assist in the solution of the problem that we find in that area.

There is the problem of the boundary. There is the problem of the use of the various water resources of the country. All of these things have their particular point of emphasis. But I think there is something that is behind all of these things. There is the major problem. I should like to call attention to an article in the January 30, 1956, issue of Time magazine. There may be one or two of the words in this article that I do not pronounce correctly, but I shall give the English version of them. The article is in the foreign affairs section under the heading "The Middle East". It is entitled "Holy War".

"Egypt does not want a war." So says Egypt's Premier Abdel Nasser, leading statesman of the Arab world. But the supreme spiritual voice of all Islam in effect denies that protestation. From Cairo's 1,000-year-old Al Azhar university, the committee of senior Ulema—

The footnote refers to the "Ulema" as:

A body of scholars trained in Islamic law and religion that has long been recognized as the highest Moslem authority in matters of faith.

Let me read that sentence again:

From Cairo's 1,000-year-old Al Azhar university, the committee of senior Ulema solemly confirmed a jihad (holy war) against Israel.

The fatwa (ruling), a pronouncement having almost the same force for Moslems as a papal encylical for Roman Catholics, decrees that for a moslem to recognize the state of Israel would be to condone an act of robbery.

Then farther down it says:

. . . any peace with Israel that includes recognition of its existence as a state in Palestine "is against faith".

So you see, Mr. Speaker, it goes back beyond some of these problems that appear on the surface, and it is based upon the fact that the Arab world is not prepared, under any circumstances, to recognize the right of Israel to exist as a nation. There, we see the problem all the statesmen of the world are facing in their endeavour to stabilize the situation. I say it is a delicate situation. Any action that is taken by the United Nations or by individual nations, and especially by Canada, must be based upon sound principles, be absolutely fair and must not in any way tend to upset the present balance, if there is a balance. Nor must it tend to add to the tensions already so evident in that troubled area.

I wanted to make a few remarks about the technical assistance program and the Colombo plan. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) placed on the record this afternoon some of the figures relative to the need of the peoples of the world. Their economic conditions were outlined very clearly and they impressed upon us the fact that if we are going to discharge our moral obligations in this world then we must recognize the needs of our fellow men, regardless of where they may be found. We do appreciate the contributions that have been made and are being made by Canada through these various funds, but certainly we feel that they can be extended, they can be increased, for in that way we would assist tremendously in the solution of those problems that are so real to a great portion of our world.

I think we must help those people in the underdeveloped nations to help themselves. We must be willing to share with them the good things that we enjoy. We must increase our contribution and above all it seems to me that the assistance we give must be governed not by political or economic considerations only but by a sincere concern for the welfare of our fellow men.

I was very pleased that in the meeting at Geneva the President of the United States made a clear declaration regarding the satellite nations of Europe. He reminded the Soviet rulers that in order to fulfil their obligations and fulfil their promises they would be required to grant to those people the freedom to choose their own form of government and to enjoy political freedom and liberty.

I did want to refer to several statements by Mr. Khrushchev while he was in India and Burma. I have a copy of the Soviet bulletin in which those speeches are recorded. When the minister is winding up this debate, I should like him to state whether or not the Canadian embassy in the U.S.S.R. is free to publish and circulate material to the same extent that the Soviet embassy does in this country. These bulletins are very enlightening. I just want to read one or two.

But, continued N. S. Khrushchev, we have condemned and we condemn the colonial system, and hold that the sooner it is done away with the better as it is a profoundly unjust, man-hating system. The sooner the peoples of colonial countries are freed from it, the better. We are the most sincere friends of those who fight against colonial enslavement and colonial dependence.

I should like Mr. Khrushchev to turn around and have a look at some of the countries that are now under communist domination. We think of the satellite countries. We think perhaps of the subjugated nations, those that now have lost their political identity and been swallowed up by communist imperialism. I should like Mr. Khrushchev to answer the question whether he believes in freedom for the European nations as well as for the Asian nations. Certainly, I think that thought should be brought to his attention. If they are going to talk about freedom and liberty for nations, then they are going to be expected to loosen the shackles, break down the iron curtain and give these people an opportunity to make their own choice. Only then can we understand and believe in the sincerity of their proclamation that they are in favour of freedom and liberty around the world.

Today we reaffirm our faith in the principle of self-determination of people. We say the true government of a people is that which they have voluntarily chosen and to which they have pledged allegiance. God grant that such liberty and freedom may be the possession of every nation and every people in the world.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): There are manifestations in the life of each nation, Mr. Speaker, which generally indicate its aspirations and tendencies. As for our own country, the most recent efforts for world peace by our statesmen clearly evoke for Canada a renewed testimonial. Our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) circled the globe; two of our ministers flew to Russia, and our Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) fathered the admission of 16 new countries into the family of nations, all in the hope that the cause of peace in the world would be advanced.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the wholesomest manifestations of a people's genuine desire to live in the spirit of those who, throughout the ages, proclaimed peace on earth and good will toward mankind. A similar spirit prevailed and manifested itself at the first Geneva conference. The peace tempo was increasing, but shortly afterward we were stunned by the realization that the Russians were again merely appeasing our peace hunger while secretly continuing to press their diabolic plans. They lulled us into believing that the Russian bear had dulled its claws, and now brazenly attempt to do so by their peace-manoeuvring in Washington last week, while scheming, no doubt, some other nefarious plans.

This scheming, Mr. Speaker, is now directed by the two enigmatic personalities of Khrushchev and Bulganin, as was so very eloquently stated by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson), who spoke a few moments ago. The one, Khrushchev is a blind zealot and a ruthless communist. His appearance, strangely enough, spells out to the eye the reflection of his personality. The other is a benign-looking gentleman, but together, they are the mailed fist in the velvet glove, and in biblical language, they combine the voice of Jacob with the hands of Esau.

This is confirmed, Mr. Speaker, by the fact that during the wining and dining, the smiling and the hand-shaking at the Geneva conferences, plans were secretly being made for the invasion of the Middle East and Africa by communist ideology.

It is historic knowledge that since the eighteenth century Russia has been aspiring to secure a passage through the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles to the Mediterranean. They have now virtually pole-vaulted over Asia Minor and secured reasonable access to the Mediterranean, the Suez canal and the continent of Africa.

The Russians plan cunningly years in advance. Shortly after the second world war, for example, they laid claims to ports in Italian Libya and Eritrea. In this way they served notice on the world that they seek an opportunity of entering this virgin territory. Since this plan could best be achieved through the Middle East, she eagerly sought an ally in this area. The scheme became more obvious, Mr. Speaker, from the Soviet support given to Arab claims at the Bandung conference and the subsequent invitation to Colonel Nasser to visit Russia. If we add to this the recent stepped-up vigour of the Russian espousal, without qualification, of all Arab claims in the United Nations we have a clear-cut indication of her eagerness for an alliance with Egypt.

She then proceeds through the back-door use of Czechoslovakia, and provides arms to Egypt as well as personnel to train Egyptians in the use of aircraft, armaments and even submarines. These agents flock into Egypt, which is the front-door entrance to Africa, and from there they have easy access to the rest of that continent.

I have personally, Mr. Speaker, seen this infiltration at work in the heart of Africa while on a visit to Ethiopia last year. Communist literature was openly and brazenly displayed in Ethiopian ministerial offices. Embassies and compounds of legations close to Russian influence are amongst the largest in the country, and I wondered why. I heard more Russian spoken in Addis Ababa than any other European language. I was both astonished and fearful.

The menace, Mr. Speaker, is very great. Mr. John Gunther, noted author, has the following to say on the subject in his recently published book, "Inside Africa", and I quote briefly:

> This fabulous continent is democracy's last frontier. It is the richest prize on earth and is defenceless in a period of cold war. Already there are areas where the communists are almost in a position to take over the nationalist movement. If communism is ever let loose on the intolerably poor and crushed in the submerged regions of the continent, a development might arise like that in China. And we will have lost Africa, as China and Asia have been lost.

To continue to be unrealistic in the face of this admonition, Mr. Speaker, is being ostrich-like in our need to recognize the studied determination and procedures of communism, not only to invade but to capture the whole of Africa. There is, for example, amongst many other manœuvres the vigorous propaganda assault now actually in process seriously threatening the security of East Africa.

Cairo radio, in line with Egypt's new offensive, opened this assault dramatically about the middle of last October with these words spoken in Swahili, which is the language that reaches 20 million Africans, and I quote:

> "The Mau Mau revolt, in which white arms defeated black courage, must be revived, not only in Kenya, but in the entire continent, and must go on until Africa belongs to the Africans."

Political observers, Mr. Speaker, familiar with communist tactics, openly declare that no subversive material aimed at Africa in the past has ever reached this blatant and dangerous level. That, Mr. Speaker, is a very distressing fact, but unfortunately that is not all. Tanganyika and Uganda are also extremely jittery, and the white communities are exerting efforts to provide powerful antidotes over their radio stations at Dar-es-Salaam and Kampala.

If antidotes are necessary, it is a sign that the poison is already penetrating. But what is more disturbing, Mr. Speaker, than even that is that these deliberate and inflammatory appeals are also delivered in Arabic. It is no accidental coincidence that both the appeal in Swahali and in Arabic was launched immediately after Egypt concluded her arms deal with the Soviet.

It is abundantly clear that this is part of a bargain that Egypt entered into with the Soviet, and it becomes apparent that her campaign against the white man is the price she has to pay for the military aid she receives from Russia and her satellites.

It is my conviction, Mr. Speaker, that Egypt wants this military aid because Mr. Nasser, in his dream of becoming the Moslem Bismarck, has some aggressive ideas of his own, and Israel is being used only as a decoy for the purpose of securing armed power.

I foresee, for example, that apart from Egypt's desire to dominate the entire Arab world, as Nasser proclaimed the other day, one of the things she no doubt expects from her alliance with Russia is the immediate realization of her aim to acquire the Sudan, which is now in no position to resist Egypt's so-called protective invasion, especially in the face of her newly-acquired desert tanks and armaments. This would bring Russian influence to the borders of Ethiopia. With the pressure from both Egypt and Russia, Haile Selassie, in his desire to preserve his throne, would then be an easy victim for a deal. All this would place Russia strategically in a good position to advance her plan for a cold war invasion of Africa.

This program, Mr. Speaker, could never be realized by Russia without her finding a base on the African coast of the eastern Mediterranean, and this explains her anxiety for the alliance with Egypt. This also reveals to some degree the real dimensions of what appears to be an innocuous arms deal with Czechoslovakia. Newsweek of November 28, 1955, reports most disquieting information pointing a red arrow at the very heart of the Middle East itself all of which developed on the heels of this new alliance. And what do we find in the Middle East? Syria is on the verge of a red arms agreement. In Cairo, Egyptian and Soviet spokesmen declared that Saudi Arabia had already signed for the acquisition of communist arms and is now in the midst of a Soviet-inspired bribery scandal causing disturbances in the country itself. Yemen, which is in a dispute with Great Britain over Aden, also seeks Soviet arms. Egypt offers Soviet arms to Jordan, one of Great Britain's hopes in the Middle East, and Jordan shows signs of succumbing to Egyptian pressures. There you see, Mr. Speaker, that the supply of arms to Egypt involves not just the supply of arms to Egypt but the supply of arms to every Arab country in the Middle East. I urge most cautious, profound and courageous consideration of all these facts. They are not trivial and show manifestations of being very foreboding and very dangerous.

I admit my inadequacies, Mr. Speaker, in not being as knowledgeable about these events as either Washington, London or Paris, but the pattern seems so clear that one does not have to be an expert to be frightened by these developments. In fact, the New York Times of October 15, 1955, very poignantly and frankly declared that when Mr. Dulles received the news that Russia was unloading Soviet bloc arms in the Middle East he himself had a conniption fit. The rest of the civilized world should certainly feel no better about it.

Our alarm is even more startling when we are told that near Alexandria on the Mediterranean, a vast area, consisting of tens of square miles, has been reserved for the gathering and conditioning of incalculable quantities of armaments including tanks, jet fighters, jet bombers and submarines. The section is cautiously guarded and looms as a jumping off point. In addition, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of Russians in greatly increasing numbers swarming into Arab countries under various guises. The combination of these arms and agents in the Middle East is ominous and I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that this procedure is painfully reminiscent of Russian tactics in North Korea and China. First she armed them and then sent in thousands of so-called experts and technicians and when they were good and ready catapulted them into a war.

It is puerile to believe that the Russians are providing such vast quantities of arms to the Egyptians solely for their defence against an assault by the tiny state of Israel. Let us not be duped by the Egyptian cry of "wolf". Israel, with a population of one and a half million and an area of a mere 8,000 square miles, by comparison with 50 million Arabs and an area of 2,600,000 square miles, does not merit the dubious compliment of having to provide against them the vast armaments, aircraft and submarines presently being gathered in Egypt.

Much larger game is the objective. The western world must recognize this quickly and promptly challenge it not merely by talk nor by appeasement and certainly not by sacrificing important human values and principles which form the cornerstone of our civilization.

The Arab fear of invasion by the tiny state of Israel and its handful of people is universally recognized as being ludicrous. The reverse is more likely and more threatening.

Israel lives under a sword of Damocles in the form of the constant Arab threat of annihilation. On January 9, 1954, King Saud called upon the Arab world to wage a holy war against Israel, and to sacrifice 10 million Arabs if necessary, in order to destroy it completely.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) a few moments ago also referred to the students in Cairo who attend the oldest university in Cairo and the Moslem brotherhood who urge the Arabs to wage a holy war against Israel.

The Christian Century, in its editorial of January 20, 1954, challenged this inhuman exhortation in these terms:

> This outburst sounded like the war cry of a savage, not the utterance of a responsible head of state. It should be rebuked and rebuked so effectively, that no more such wild counsel is heard from this, or similar sources.

In addition to this royal outburst the howl of a second round has not been permitted by Egypt and other Arab states to subside for an instant.

Having only recently escaped from the greatest atrocities in history, the Israelis are horrified by the thought of further assaults. They are grateful to the United Nations for providing them a home after 2,000 years, and pray for the elementary human right to live in peace and security.

They cherish this little land, and it is only natural for them to resist to the last man, woman and child, any attempts to dislodge them from a single inch of it.

If they have to—and we pray to God that they will not have to—the Israelis will, as they did in 1948 and alone if necessary, again repel the war-crazed fanatics, fired by the cry of a holy war and nudged forward by a prowling and cunning bear.

The Israelis are not belligerent. They do not live by the sword and are religiously mindful of the remaining half of this prophetic admonition. They want to live in peace and they constantly proclaim their anxiety and willingness to negotiate a peace with the Arabs any time and anywhere. It is the Arabs, on the other hand, who are intransigent, and even refuse to talk of peace.

The Israelis therefore are constantly kept on the defensive to preserve their little niche in the world, and, if they seek arms, they do so only to defensively meet the threats proclaimed daily by their surrounding neighbours. They are not in an arms race. If there is an arms race, let us recognize the mirage, since it is not between the Arabs and Israel, but is actually between communism and the democracies. That is far more menacing. Recognizing this danger quickly may preserve our Middle East position, hold intact the northern tier under the Baghdad pact, and prevent the whole continent of Africa from becoming communistic.

Can you therefore imagine, Mr. Speaker, my astonishment this afternoon when the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) introduced an amendment in which he asked that all shipments of arms to the Middle East be arrested or stopped? I think that the hon. member for Prince Albert has placed himself in a most disturbing paradoxical position. At one moment he pleads in terms that the state of Israel must be kept secure and in the next moment introduces an amendment asking that the means of preserving the state should be removed from them. He asks that the state be preserved and promptly proceeds to tie their hands behind their backs by allowing arms to go to only one destination in the Middle East, and that is to Egypt. I did not think that was very noble or very brave of the hon. gentleman. I was shocked at the amendment and at the position now taken by the party to which the hon. member belongs. He states clearly to me, and I am sure to all my co-religionists, not only in this country but everywhere, that the little state of Israel should be left helpless and without arms to defend itself if it should be necessary.

Actually I was more surprised by his amendment when he dodged a reply to the question put to him by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do not know why he refused to make a reply, but he turned around and asked, "What has the government done?" I would like to tell the hon. member what this government has done. This government has done more for the establishment and preservation of the state of Israel than any other country in the whole world.

We see the Soviet union's plans: its plans for Africa, its plans for the Middle East. We recognize them. All we have been doing in the past—we western nations—is to resort to a process of wooing, appeasing and perhaps praying. We are now obviously wooing the Arab nations by offering them arms and money, all in the hope that we may be able to win them away from their crafty Soviet suitor. The armaments we pour into Egypt—when I say "we", I am talking now of all the western nations—all these armaments, peculiarly enough, appear to be going into a common arms pool with the communists. The great question, of course, is: Will the arms out of this common pool be used for us or against us? The Soviets can take the risk. They have nothing to lose. But can we take the risk? To find the answer to this sphinx-like question, we have merely to glance at contemporary history.

Do we forget that when Rommel was at El Alamein on his way to Alexandria, the Arabs were already rolling out the red carpet of welcome for him? Is our memory so short that we forget the Mufti's sojourn with Hitler? Do we forget so quickly that, in gratitude for Great Britain's help in building and maintaining the Suez canal, Egypt, at the very first opportunity, pressed for her dismissal? Do we forget the pro-Nazi revolt in Iraq led by Raschid-Ali during the early part of the second world war, which was greatly distressing to the allies? Do we forget that the Arab countries, all of them, remained comfortably neutral during two world wars when the democratic way of life was threatened? And have the Arabs throughout history earned the reputation that they can be trusted? Their record in that regard is not a creditable one. In fact, it dates back thousands of years to when the prophet Isaiah proclaimed an admonition against trust in Egypt, in the following words, and I quote chapter 36, verse six:

> Lo, thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt, whereupon if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it; so is Pharaoh King of Egypt to all that trust in him.

This is further supported by the fact that the Egyptians have now nudged Great Britain completely out of Egypt, notwithstanding the treaty condition that she will be readmitted in the event of apprehensive warfare, whatever that may mean. In my opinion, the United Kingdom will never voluntarily be readmitted to Egypt. Her departure was a cardinal blunder.

Disraeli foresaw the importance of the Suez canal and a strong British position in the Middle East. He gave that to the empire. He would now be writhing in anguish in his grave if he could see what has happened. From wherever Britain moved out, communism moved in. One shudders at the futility of a policy in the Middle East which lost for us links of empire and bastions of democracy, and reduced the stature of the United Kingdom in countries like India, Pakistan, the Suez, the Sudan, Cyprus and now Jordan. I am therefore astonished to find, even today, such an unrealistic approach to such painfully realistic problems.

Until the Egyptians disclosed Russia's tie-up with some Arab countries, the United Kingdom and the United States strained everything to hold Arab favour. This manoeuvring apparently called for the suppression of the real values in an alliance with Israel. These tactics may have been necessary, although I do not admit it, but now that the masks are off and we see the position and see where the Arabs are going, it is my respectful submission that to fail to make a show of strength and determination by including Israel in the western family would be a greater blunder than it was previously to suppress it. To proceed further by appeasement at this critical time is again unrealistic and a deplorable show of western weakness. It could well prove to be the blunder supreme that the west can make, and the appeasers may never be able to answer to destiny for their urging of it.

During the course of previous debates in this house, we have agreed that the most effective way to meet a Soviet challenge was by a show of strength and not by a show of weakness. Every time the west appeased—to use a colloquialism—we were taken for a ride, and we should by this time have learned our lesson.

If appeasement now is to take the form of attempting to throw the tiny state of Israel, or part of it, to the marauding Arabs, then I say it will not be as simple as some would have it, because the heroic people of Israel will not permit themselves to be Muniched into a Czechoslovakia. The irony of the situation is that appeasement will again have been resorted to in vain.

Let us recognize, even shamefacedly, that we are at this point, apart from a rebellious Cyprus, virtually left with the Baghdad pact alone and a prayer—if you will—that, despite the pressure exerted on some of its components, it will hold intact. If that, too, should not stand up—and it might not stand up—what remains? Virtually nothing, except Israel. This conclusion is being recognized more and more every day by western strategists.

Would it therefore not be most imprudent to miss the opportunity of availing ourselves of this additional safeguard? It is the only country in the Middle East that admittedly is western in every possible way and, because of that and its alliances with millions of brethren residing in western countries, Israel can be fully, completely and reliably depended upon. It has the best trained and most disciplined army in the area and can yet prove to be our most reliable, trustworthy and able ally.

Let the west fearlessly recognize this fact and declare to its allies of the Baghdad pact that it becomes urgent for the west to avail itself of Israel's position and strength, and emphasize that to do otherwise would definitely be shortsighted and dangerous, not only for the position of the west but also for the parties to the pact itself. Such a statement, Mr. Speaker, would tell the Arabs in no uncertain terms that we do not pussyfoot any longer in our determination to have peace in the Middle East. We must speak boldly and with firmness because until belligerent Arabs hear such a forthright declaration, made with grim determination, they are encouraged to gambit with stealthy and intriguing manoeuvres, including their threat to annihilate a million and a half people and, in their frenzy, launch a massacre that twentieth century civilization is anxious to live down. The western world must not remain silent any longer to this menacing talk lest it be considered an accessory to the fact resulting from its silence.

I would be loath Mr. Speaker to link this silence to the statement attributed to someone in Washington that Israel be written off as a noble experiment that failed. This is the sadistic utterance of an inhuman maniac, whoever he may be. No diplomatic manœuvre, regardless of how great or important it may appear to be, could justify such premeditated and wholesale murder. It may suit the period of a Genghis Khan or an Attila but certainly not the enlightened and civilized twentieth century.

If Israel is an experiment that failed, then I say, Mr. Speaker, with horror and with shame, that the whole of our civilization is doomed to utter failure because I believe, that in the assessment by the Almighty of the actions and behaviour of men He recognizes values that are far more sacred and important than ruthless diplomatic expediencies.

I often wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether somewhere down the line the policy which the western powers have been following could not have been more skilful if it had been only a little more courageous and a little less influenced by vested interests.

The United Kingdom, the United States and France all have vested interests in the Middle East which they are anxious to preserve, and I believe that, in the very best of faith, their assessment of the situation over the years may have been largely influenced by these interests, which could have coloured their considerations as to the future and interfered with their sober appreciation of wider horizons and the real human values.

Canada, on the other hand, which the world recognizes as the great arbiter and peace-seeking nation, has no direct or vested interests in that part of the world. Our diplomats enjoy the full confidence, respect and esteem of all the nations concerned and are therefore in the happy position of being able to see the situation objectively with open eyes and not through spectacles coloured or influenced by any vested or national interests. General Burns is already making a noble and valiant effort and would, no doubt, welcome support in his extremely difficult task.

It is, therefore, my submission, Mr. Speaker, that our country should, through its Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and his experts, promptly assess this complex mid-eastern situation and dauntlessly interject its good offices to help return to sanity those countries who stand on the brink of war and jeopardize the security of the entire world.

Careful study should be given to the fact that the vast majority of 50 million Arabs, because of their lack of education and miserable living conditions, are fertile for communist indoctrination. In all haste, therefore, the United Nations should provide substantial annual funds, either through a Marshall plan arrangement, through the Colombo plan or through any other international device, so that the standards of living of nomad Arab millions can be brought to some parallel with modern civilization. This will enable them to understand that the days of slavery are past, feudalism is archaic and that peace is the greatest gift human beings possess.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this might be a long process, whilst prompt action is necessary to arrest an impending conflagration. This, no doubt, partly explains the urgent conference between Sir Anthony Eden and President Eisenhower, as well as the hectic activities in Washington and London to woo Nasser away from communist enticements and thereby retain Arab support for the west. While I realize the importance of this, I also realize that it is even more important to Nasser himself. In the family of free nations he can retain for the Arabs their freedom and their independence but, as allies of Russia, they will become quickly submerged as satellites. Their leaders will become Russian puppets and their people, by an ironic quirk of history, may be exposed to the danger of possibly building twentieth century pyramids under the lash of communist taskmasters. I hope Colonel Nasser and his advisers can see that far ahead and realize that the Arab nations are now themselves seriously at the crossroads.

We should, therefore, sincerely urge them to take a new look at their position and reconsider their relationship with their neighbours and the state of Israel in the light of the new dangers they themselves now face. They have, because of their persistent intransigence, already slipped into the communist quagmire from which they can, only with the co-operation of the west, still extricate themselves.

I am convinced that they are fully alert to their dangerous position but are crafty enough to still attempt to trade on our fears and our policy to appease. They must be made to know that this no longer exists. Consequently, now is the opportune time for the west to take an honourable and unwavering position.

We should tell Nasser bluntly: We want you on our side. We will help you retain your independence and guarantee your borders. We will help you financially in your program for economic and social reforms to raise the standard of living of your people. But we insist on having peace in the Middle East and you must stop this nonsense of threatening the annihilation of a state set up by the United Nations whose authority you must respect. We want you to know that we will never permit the action you threaten against Israel nor the creation of a second Egyptian bondage.

I would, Mr. Speaker, oppose with every ounce of my strength any form of approach that would say one word less. Under no circumstances must the free nations enter into a settlement based on fear, immoral diplomatic expediency, vested interests or appeasement of any type. That is the kind of quicksand on which our relations with the Arabs have unfortunately existed in the past. It has not only been weak and uncertain but it was historically and morally wrong. It has, moreover, proven to be a poor diplomatic assessment and has exploded in the faces of those who fostered it. Our so-called Middle East experts in London and Washington are now bewildered and running for cover. They should, therefore, alter their approach and completely abandon any form of appeasement or sacrifice if they seek a durable peace in the Middle East.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that in a sober assessment of the communist danger facing the Arab countries Colonel Nasser will realize that the advice of the free nations is honestly and sincerely given and is in the very best interests of all the Arab peoples. Contemporary history gives him good reason to appreciate the seriousness which motivates western statements because he no doubt remembers that, within the memory of this generation, the Arab people enjoyed great munificence, not from communism but from the free nations of the world. They liberated the Arabs from Turkish domination. They restored their kingdoms after the first world war. They provided them with western "know-how". They welcomed them into the family of nations and poured vast fortunes into their countries.

Moreover, it should also be emphasized that most of the Arab nations were established and recognized by international law and councils similar to the United Nations. If their own status as free and independent nations is to be respected, they must likewise respect the status of any other country established by the same authority.

The safeguarding of mutual rights and the maintenance of mutual respects are basic between free and democratic nations. With this guiding beacon in the hands of the United Nations, I am hopeful that it can prevail upon Arab nations and the state of Israel, as urged last week by our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), to sit together at a round table to discuss a modus vivendi.

I emphasize most solemnly and fervently, Mr. Speaker, that those who enter into peace negotiations with truth, good will and righteousness, will surely emerge from such a conference with justice, glory and dignity.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, during the time at my disposal this evening I intend to direct my remarks to the amendment and the subamendment which have been moved. As you will recall, the amendment was moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and it reads as follows:

> That all the words after "That" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> in view of the present critical situation in the Middle East, this house expresses its strong disapproval of the government's policy of authorizing the shipment of munitions of war to countries in that area not within the NATO alliance; and also condemns the government for the lack of candour with which the matter has been dealt with in this house.

Once again the opposition has to take the initiative. As reported at page 522 of Hansard the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated:

> . . . I do not think it would be fair for me to consider that the debate in the house on that matter—

He was referring to the debate on the shipment of arms to the Middle East.

—has ended.

Despite that statement by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) skilfully avoided touching upon the subject during his speech this afternoon. Had it not been originally for the questions which were asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) and by other members on this side of the house, I very much doubt whether the country would ever have heard of the shipment of these arms to Egypt and to Israel. The questions were raised by the opposition and I think that the members on this side of the house deserve credit for having brought this despicable dealing before the public eye at this time.

Reporters who first carried the story, after the question had been raised in this house, carried out their investigations and saw equipment being loaded at the Pugsley docks in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, in the Egyptian freighter, Star of Assuan. They reported that aircraft and military vehicles were being loaded. In spite of the reported statements of government officials at the port of Saint John that this was only general cargo, the investigation was proceeded with. When questions were directly asked by myself in this house as to whether any equipment had been shipped over the weekend, the ministers had no knowledge of any equipment being sent. It was not until several days afterwards that the Secretary of State for External Affairs corroborated the reports. He corroborated those on January 24. Immediately following that speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) analysed it and described it as serving principally to expose the fumbling and floundering way in which the government has handled this issue since it arose in this house. Then he went on to say that the issue had been characterized by evasion, want of candour, ineptitude and incompetence or a mixture of all four.

Then again this afternoon the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) castigated the government for the way in which it had dealt with this situation. The question still remains: Why did it take the government so long to come clean and to make a clean breast of this extremely ugly situation? In fact, anything which has been said on the government side has only underlined the confusion and the incompetence of this ill-timed action. As has already been stated this afternoon, on January 10 an article appeared in the magazine Look over the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In it is found this sentence:

> In the Middle East war could flare up any day between Israel and the Arab states. The soviets are fanning the embers with arms shipments to Egypt.

I suggest that the ministers and the government have already added their little blow to fanning the embers of that possible conflagration which might break out there. It is against this background that we must analyse this shipment of arms to the Middle East. Against this background, when war might flare up at any moment, this government permitted the export of arms. It was certainly at a most ill-timed period. In fact, it was permitted at an extraordinarily dangerous time.

The shipments were first authorized last July. Ministerial approval was granted. During the last two or three weeks it has been extremely difficult to ascertain whether that approval was given by the cabinet, by three members of the cabinet or by one member of the cabinet himself. The description of the proceedings that was given this afternoon would make one think that perhaps only one member of the cabinet had any knowledge of the fact, although the Prime Minister stated that the cabinet accepted full responsibility for it. However, when this authorization was granted last July, although the conditions in the Middle East were extraordinarily unsettled, there was little indication that any war might be considered to be imminent. But this year, in this month when the shipments were allowed to leave this country, you can only say that conditions in the Middle East were inflamed and, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already said, that war might flare up at any time.

During this period since July until now, the government did nothing about these shipments of arms. They realized that the situation in the Middle East was deteriorating. Did they tighten up their administration? Did they make inquiries into whether or not it was wise to send arms to this sensitive area, with the situation rapidly deteriorating? No, they just forgot that they had authorized the shipment of any arms at all. If it had not been for the questions which we on this side of the house asked I think that their forgetfulness would have been heartily welcomed by the government as a whole. There had been no check made. There had been no attempt to revise the export permits on equipment which was being sent from this country to the Middle East.

On January 25, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) gave a list of the equipment which had been sent. There were three Harvard training aircraft to Egypt, the first of a consignment of 15 planes which had been authorized. These Harvard training planes were used and recognized as the best type of plane in which to train pilots for service aircraft. There were some spare parts as well as those three planes which were sent.

Then, Israel had been sent anti-tank equipment; 75 millimeter shells; tracks and spare parts for tanks. Let us remember that private traders were sending Valentine and Sherman tanks from England through France and Belgium to the Middle East. There were also 25-pounder field pieces such as the type we used during the second world war, and still a very effective weapon. There were machine guns, always convenient and handy for certain types of raiders and guerillas to carry. There were 3·7 anti-aircraft guns as well as some other items. The total came to over $2,800,000 during the last two years. You might say that those figures would not indicate there were any very large quantities of these weapons and ammunition sent. While the quantities sent have not been made available, it should be remembered that this equipment was considered by us to be obsolescent service equipment. One can well imagine, therefore, that this equipment was sold at bargain prices.

This equipment is considered by us to be obsolescent, that is not the type of equipment that our Canadian troops will require either for the defence of this country or to fulfil their NATO commitments in western Europe. We are thinking in terms of large numbers of troops equipped with modern arms, and what may be obsolescent to us may be considered a most effective weapon by other people who are not planning to have a force which would act as a deterrent to another world war. These machine guns, tanks and field artillery may be very effective weapons when used against tribesmen in the desert. Tracks and spare parts for tanks may be very useful in repairing tanks which have been shipped from elsewhere and which were demilitarized before the private traders sent them. It is bad enough for private traders to be trafficking in arms, but it is humiliating when we realize that our Canadian government has been trafficking in arms.

Some years ago this country was shocked by a series of articles which dealt with the arms trade as carried on by private manufacturers. They were entitled, "merchants of death". Is our government going to accept that title from now on if they are going to continue shipping arms? These articles on the merchants of death showed quite clearly that there was plenty of evidence to prove that wars, particularly what may be described as minor wars, were fomented in order to increase the sale of arms. It would be far-fetched to suggest that the government has any such thought, but we must remember that this government is selling our surplus equipment and taking money in return for lethal weapons which could be used against human beings. What is more despicable than anything else is that this government has stooped to sell to both sides in the dispute.

Of course the quantities have been limited and to date there is no question that the quantities which have been sent could upset the balance of arms in the Middle East. It is the principle of the government selling lethal weapons in a highly sensitive area and at a very critical time which is repugnant to me and I think repugnant to the majority of the people of Canada. The minister said it was not the policy to put a complete embargo on arms shipments except to the Sino-Soviet bloc and other countries, if any, where there was a threat to our own security. Well, from what point is that threat going to come? If war breaks out in the Middle East it is hardly likely that we, as a member of the United Nations, will be able to keep out of such a conflict. Why not put an embargo at this time on the shipment of arms to these sensitive areas? I have no quarrel about the shipment of arms to our allies in NATO or the other commonwealth countries. But why should we be shipping arms to every small country in sensitive areas?

We were told today that there were 34 such sensitive areas in the world today. It is all very well to utter pious statements that the shipments are not permitted to sensitive areas if they are of such a character that they might increase any temptation to commit aggression. But we are supplying machine guns, perhaps to trigger-happy tribesmen or nervous men on outpost duty who may very easily be tempted to commit an overt act.

It was only last December that a raid was carried out in Galilee. According to the United Nations report, no fewer than 41 Syrians were killed. Is it really necessary for us to inflame or fan these smouldering embers? When nations are facing each other and there is a possibility of war breaking out, it is not much use blaming them for getting arms from wherever they can. No; it is with the suppliers of those arms that the main responsibility rests.

At the present time we have no particular commitments with Israel any more than we have commitments with other Middle Eastern powers. We have heard about the defensive grouping in the Middle East, which I believe was created by the United States, and that grouping includes Turkey, Iran, Pakistan and Iraq. Iraq, close to the borders of Israel, is regarded by Israel as being allied with the other Arab powers. One is not blaming Israel, and I do not blame Egypt. Egypt has become a leader of the Arab countries. And while Israel sees Egypt as the mainspring of the Arab efforts to prevent her survival, Egypt sees Israel as an intruder and potential aggressor brought into the area by the western powers. Egypt contends that it is Israel, with its large number of new settlers brought in from Europe, brought into a small and constricted area, that is responsible for the plight of 900,000 Arab refugees who have been forced to cross the border and who are today living in refugee camps in a degrading condition, both physically and morally. Israel is regarded not only as an intruder but also as a potential aggressor. As Israel's population grows, Egypt fears the new state will need more land, and where can Israel find it except just across her borders in Arab countries. She can find it only by expanding into her neighbour's territory, and so the argument runs.

If there is no war today, the Arab states must be ready to resist Israeli aggression tomorrow. And while Egypt talks of potential aggression by Israel, Egypt is suspected of aggressive motives by the Israelis. It is a tense and difficult situation, a situation which we should refuse to aggravate and, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has said, we should be most anxious to find a peaceful solution to this problem. Peaceful solutions have been offered. Did Mr. Dulles, in his address before the council of foreign relations last August, not offer a guarantee, to be sponsored by the United Nations, to both Israel and the Arab states against aggression, and did Sir Anthony Eden, in his speech before the Lord Mayor's banquet at the Guildhall, as reported in the magazine, Current History not do the same thing? These words are given as the exact text of his address:

> Her Majesty's government and, I believe, the United States government and perhaps other powers too, would be prepared to give a formal guarantee to both sides; and that might bring real confidence and security at last. And our countries would also offer substantial help, financial and other, over this tragic problem of the refugees.
> All this we will do.

Surely, that is a greater deterrent against the possibility of war breaking out between those two countries than supplying of arms to both of them, which can only be considered as creating a possibility of some sudden and overt act.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

I should like to know what this government has done by way of offering a guarantee similar to that offered by the United States and by Great Britain. Are we prepared to play our part, not only by sending troops should war break out, but by letting it be known beforehand that if war does break out we will send troops? That is where the deterrent comes, having it clearly said beforehand what we will do. Has this government come out and stated what it will do? No. It forgets; it fumbles and it goes on shipping arms to both sides. I hope that this will not be considered as concluding the debate on the shipment of arms. I hope that before this debate is over the Secretary of State for External Affairs will renew the pledge which the Prime Minister gave, that for the time being no more arms will be shipped to either country, or to any area which is described as a sensitive area, unless that shipment takes place definitely to NATO, or commonwealth countries. Let us put an end to this trafficking in arms to countries which are non-NATO countries and countries which do not belong to our commonwealth. I repeat, I hope that before this debate is over the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or some other member of the government, will renew the pledge which was given the other day.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the hon. member a question before he finishes? I am very anxious to be clear about the last remark he addressed to the government? Did I understand him to advocate that there should be an embargo against all arms shipments by Canada to members, say, of the Baghdad pact, Iran, Iraq?

Mr. Pearkes: I said, to non-NATO and to non-commonwealth countries, and I will add any other country with which we have not a definite alliance.

Mr. Donald D. Carrick (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, it is nearly ten o'clock; do you wish me to continue?

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

An hon. Member: Hurry up.

Some hon. Members: Proceed.

Mr. Carrick: I rise to take part in this debate because this is an occasion when the life of a nation is at stake. Hon. members on the other side, members of the C.C.F. party, scoff at this suggestion. It is very easy for us to sit in this chamber where we are safe and secure and to be unaware of the danger in which a small country of a million and a half people are living under the shadow of the sword.

I want to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) upon the excellent statement of the government's policy in relation to the Middle East which he gave last Tuesday. Today we had the benefit of his statement of government policy in relation to other parts of the world. The clarity, comprehensiveness and balance of the statement indicates why the hon. member is held in such high esteem by people in all parts of the world.

I was shocked, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved an amendment in this manner. I want to read that amendment to the house:

> That . . . in view of the present critical situation in the Middle East, this house expresses its strong disapproval of the government's policy of authorizing the shipment of munitions of war to countries in that area not within the NATO alliance—

That is the part I want to deal with. I say I was shocked because it constituted a refusal of help to Israel in her hour of need. I never believed that the erstwhile great Conservative party would ever adopt a policy of that kind.

I was equally shocked by the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) because in principle his amendment affirmed the amendment made by the spokesman for the Conservative party. I say it did this in principle because the amendment was prospective and following the portion I read it added these words:

> "without at the same time making sure that peace in that area would be guaranteed either by the United Nations or by the powers that signed the tripartite agreement of 1950, namely the United States, the United Kingdom and France."

It was obvious from the remarks of the hon. gentleman that what he was contemplating was the future shipment of arms because he did not want to bind the government's hands. He affirmed the amendment of the hon. member for Prince Albert that this house disapproved the shipment of arms to Israel.

Now what do the amendments mean in substance? The Secretary of State for External Affairs in his statement of a few days ago stated that in 1954 and in 1955 the total shipment of arms of this government to Israel amounted to $2,067,685.19 and to Egypt $771,121. That is the amount of arms shipped that is being disapproved of by the amendments laid before this house.

It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that while the amendment is limited to that small sum the whole question that is raised in this house at the present time is the shipment of arms to the Middle East and it is on that basis that I want to deal with the question.

It might be useful if I were to say a few words about the history of Israel. Hon. members will recall that the Balfour declaration was made December 2, 1917. It provided for the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people. Subsequently, after the termination of the first world war, a British mandate was set up on July 22, 1922, under the auspices of the league of nations and it was under the British mandate that Palestine carried on. In November 1947—I am not sure of these dates although I believe they are fairly accurate—the British government reached the decision that it would no longer carry on the mandate of Palestine and the United Nations resolved to set up the state of Israel under the partition agreement. I believe the partition was to take effect in the summer of 1948. It was in December 1947 that the incursion of the Arab bands began into Israel, the part that is occupied by the people who now constitute the Israeli people, and in the course of 1948 six Arab states took up arms against the people of Israel. There were Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Syria, Iraq and Lebanon. That was a fight to the death for the people of Israel. They defended themselves in a way that won the admiration of all men in the free world. The result was that they forced Egypt and her allies to seek a truce and it was, I believe, in August 1949 that the armistice agreement was concluded. The result of what I have recounted to this point was that the state of Israel was established.

What has happened since 1949? Egypt has consistently refused to recognize Israel as a sovereign state. She would have no direct negotiations with Israel and any negotiations which occurred were conducted through a third party unless she was placed in circumstances such as the United Nations council when it was absolutely necessary for her to face Israel when she would have no other alternative.

The second major development to note during that period was that Egypt, through her ally Jordan, has consistently made attacks on the Israelis across the border into Israel. One need only take a look at the map to see what this means. It is a very easy matter for the Arabs, through Jordan, which crosses into Palestine and leaves a very narrow corridor, to make border attacks upon Israel, and since 1949 Egypt with her accomplices has continually made attacks upon the Israelis.

Some hon. Members: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: For some time now, as a matter of fact ever since the conclusion of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I have wanted to present to the house a statement on the rule regarding the reading of speeches. I have not yet delivered that statement because the day following the conclusion of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne was the first private members' day. Friday was the first government day and I hesitated again on Monday to take any time from private members. We have now reached Tuesday and an important debate on external affairs is proceeding which is to be resumed tomorrow. I do not wish to delay the possibility of having hon. members look at the document and if it meets with the approval of hon. members I would ask their consent to have this text printed in the Votes and Proceedings. If I obtain the consent of hon. members to do this I will not read it tonight and hon. members will have an opportunity to look at it as soon as it is published. If they later wish to make comments upon the statement I would imagine that arrangements could be made to that end through the usual channels.

May I point out that this statement recites the rule as established by the authorities on procedure and also the practice of this house under it. Suggestions are made. I do not contend for one moment that the suggestions that are herein contained will produce a cure-all as far as the reading of speeches is concerned, but I hope that these suggestions will be received in the spirit in which they have been prepared, namely, with the object of the improvement of our debate and thus for the good of parliament.

If it meets with the approval of hon. members, I would suggest that the text be printed in Votes and Proceedings. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.G.S. "WALTER E. FOSTER"

Question No. 18—Mr. Bell:

1. Has the C.G.S. Walter E. Foster been damaged since its construction?
2. If so, where and under what circumstances?
3. What repairs have been necessary and where have they been effected?
4. Where is the C.G.S. Walter E. Foster now?
5. What arrangements have been made to replace this vessel in its duties?

Answer by: Mr. Marler:

1. Yes.

2. In carrying aids to navigation and supplies to light stations the Walter E. Foster sustained underwater damage when the ship grounded on an uncharted shoal in the vicinity of Flower island in Belle Isle strait and in waters outside of the established steamer track.

3. Repairs to the ship's bottom were carried out in Saint John, New Brunswick.

4. The Walter E. Foster is at present engaged in ice-breaking operations in the St. Lawrence river.

Questions

5. The C.G.S. Dollard is working in the Saint John area and the C.G.S. Bernier is also being assigned to these duties. Unlike the Walter E. Foster, neither of these vessels is suitable for ice-breaking operations.

OSHAWA, ONTARIO, ARMOURIES

Question No. 47—Mr. Starr:

1. Was any work performed on the armouries at Oshawa, Ontario, during the year 1955?
2. If so, of what nature?
3. What was the cost of this work?

Answer by: Mr. Campney:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Cleaning, repairing and waterproofing exterior brick and masonry; (b) Repainting the interior of the building; (c) Routine maintenance and minor repairs and improvements.

3. $16,471.78.

INDIAN BANDS—TRUST FUNDS

Question No. 56—Mr. Barnett:

1. How much money is held in trust for each of the following Indian bands; Kitimaat, Kitwancool, Kitwanga, Kitsegeucla, Hagwilget, Kispiox, Glen Vowell and Hazelton?
2. What was the source of the money in each case?

Answer by: Mr. Pickersgill:

Name of Band	Capital	Revenue	Source of Funds
Kitimaat	$20,321.07	$36,631.15	In capital account, land sales, gravel and timber dues. In revenue account rentals.
Kitwancool	166.18	90.46	Partly timber dues and partly shares of Indians transferred from other bands.
Kitwanga	1,162.21	646.96	Land sales, timber dues and shares of Indians transferred from other bands.
Kitsegeucla	1,254.44	1,112.15	Mainly land sales.
Hagwilget	No funds	No funds	No funds.
Kispiox	2,540.64	328.81	Timber dues.
Glen Vowell	424.64	31.88	Timber dues.
Hazelton	1,965.62	145.01	Almost entirely land sales.

APPENDIX

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN CERTAIN PROVINCIAL PREMIERS AND THE PRIME MINISTER

THE PREMIER

FREDERICTON

'he Government of the province
f New Brunswick

JANUARY 27, 1956

ight Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
'rime Minister of Canada,
)ttawa, Canada.

)ear Mr. Prime Minister:

My colleagues and I have given careful onsideration to the proposals of your Governent in respect to its fiscal arrangements with he provinces, as set forth in your letter to me f January 6th last.

It seems to us that these proposals differ rom the older tax-rental formulas only in he method of calculating transfer payments. 'hey go very little further in remedial action r in the development of broader principle. 'hey may be somewhat more sensitive and olatile than the formulas based upon Gross Tational Product, but their ultimate impact pon Federal-Provincial fiscal relations in eneral must necessarily leave the same prob-ems unsolved—the same inequities per-etuated.

The new federal proposals offer compensa-ion for the lack of taxable capacity in only hree tax fields. Other fields, which remain or provincial exploitation and which, in the ase of New Brunswick, account for roughly wo-thirds of current revenue, are precisely hose which reflect and embody the results of nsatisfactory economic conditions over a long eriod.

Thus, the proposals of your Government hake only a very limited attack upon the roblem of how best to overcome the serious nd, indeed, tragic inability of certain prov-nces to raise, in tax fields open to them, ufficient revenue to carry out their constitu-ional responsibilities and to provide a reason-ble level of provincial services.

You will remember, Sir, that in my sub-nission to the Conference in October, I ressed the auspicious circumstances which xist, in the Canadian economy, at the present me. It was the earnest contention of our overnment in October that full advantage hould be taken of what I termed "a magnifi-ent opportunity to achieve long sought ational objectives".

Acting on this conviction, our Government ubmitted a formula which was designed to provide supplementary national adjustment grants for provinces where per capita income fell far below the Canadian average.

In this connection, I wrote you on December 30th, 1955 as follows:

> We are still convinced that a formula similar to the present tax-rental agreement or one based on tax yields should be supplemented by a National Adjustment Grant to those provinces whose per capita personal income is well below the national average, and feel strongly that the suggestion made in our submission to the October meeting was sound and equitable. Our formula would not impose a serious burden on the Federal Treasury. For a comparatively modest outlay the Federal Government would really be enabling the poorer provinces to meet their minimum essential responsibilities without imposing on their people an intolerable burden of taxation. Your proposals of January 6th contain no recognition of the foregoing contentions, and, therefore, the Government of New Brunswick must regard them as disappointing and falling far below the national objectives which should be sought and might well be achieved under the present favourable conditions of Canadian development.

It is my opinion that this feeling is shared by all New Brunswick municipalities, who have to carry an ever increasing burden of taxation. Indeed, in our province, I am very much concerned lest municipal taxation may have reached the abnormal proportions, which you so properly view with alarm.

It has seemed to our Government in approaching the whole question of fiscal arrangements, that the language of the Rowell-Sirois Report admirably expressed the objectives with reference to their recommendation concerning adjustment grants. The quotation is taken from Chapter V, Book II, of that report and reads as follows:

> They (adjustment grants) are designed to make it possible for every province to provide for its people services of average Canadian standards and they will thus alleviate distress and shameful conditions which now weaken national unity and handicap many Canadians. They are the concrete expressions of the Commission's conception of a federal system which will both preserve a healthy local autonomy and build a stronger and more united nation.

I was much encouraged by your letter of January 14th, 1955, previous to the convening of the preliminary meeting, to learn that substantially the same goal remained the settled policy of the Government of Canada. Your letter included the following admirable declaration!

> The present government has no intention of abandoning the objective of the tax rental agreements which is to make it financially possible for all the provinces whatever their tax base to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation.

We would respectfully submit that the result of the new proposal will be to increase the differences in economic and fiscal capacity among provinces. These differences actually constitute a grave problem in achieving national unity. A majority of provinces will receive slightly more in transfer payments—those which have neglected to impose adequate taxation and have inferior services as a result—those which enjoy rich and broad tax bases with derivative benefit to their services—those which are receiving almost more revenue than they know how to spend —those, like New Brunswick, which suffer from a relatively heavy burden of provincial taxation already and yet are unable to provide an adequate level of services—all will derive revenues from these three taxes and equalization payments on the same basis, (substantially equal amounts per capita), irrespective of their needs.

Our Government is now asked to accept a situation which does practically nothing to relieve the special disabilities under which we have laboured for so long. The formula which we presented to the Conference envisaged transfer payments to our treasury of some ten millions of dollars more than we were receiving annually under the 1952 tax agreements. This amount is based on a realistic appraisal of our minimum requirements, if we are to be able to carry out our constitutional responsibilities. The proposal of your Government will increase payments to New Brunswick by about one million dollars annually, ten per cent of our indicated requirements.

This small percentage of the $10,000,000 special adjustment grant envisaged by our formula will not enable us to provide the health and social needs, the educational facilities and services, the public works, the material benefits and cultural advantages—all of which are the birthright of an industrious and enlightened people.

The situation is further complicated for New Brunswick by the fact that we have had to undertake an extensive program of hydroelectric development in order to meet the requirements of an expanding economy. The new mineral resources which have been discovered present opportunities which, wisely and vigorously exploited, could transform our economy, our provincial standard of living and our whole way of life. As you know, officials of your Government have expressed approval of the action taken by New Brunswick in proceeding with the construction of a large hydroelectric plant at Beechwood on the St. John River. In addition the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission must undertake very substantial expenditures on thermal generating plants, transmission lines, storages, and other capital expenditures.

Consideration of New Brunswick's position at the present time will reveal very special circumstances—some of them historic in their implications—others novel and demanding almost immediate solution. We believe that no other province outside the Maritimes can be held to be so drastically effected by the results of your Government's decisions during the next few months. The things which need to be done cannot be carried out with our own unaided resources. Yet if they are not done, opportunities for which generations of our people have patiently waited will be lost forever.

To us, Sir, your letter has come as the disappointing culmination of a now long series of meetings and submissions of various kinds, rising eventually to the level of a Federal-Provincial Conference. During this process, the almost tragic suspense of our present provincial situation has been exhaustively explained and documented. Yet, we must infer from your proposals that no consideration is being given to our special needs and responsibilities at this time in our history.

As your letter induces careful thought upon the broadest aspects of Federal-Provincial relations, my colleagues and I once more request that consideration be given to the special awards which were made as a result of the Duncan and White Commissions in 1927 and 1935 respectively. One of the basic reasons for the adjustments made by these bodies was the recognition that the Maritime provinces had never received—nor had any prospect of receiving—any accessions to their areas at Confederation. No other provinces were partners in federal union under similar conditions—hence, special awards of compensation were provided under the Royal Commissions referred to. In the language of the White Commission report, page 17:

We feel we can only deal with the claim as to public lands added to other provinces in enlargement of their original boundaries in a broad general way giving it equitable consideration as a factor of importance to be taken into account in reaching conclusions on the whole question of a just revision of subsidies as between the Maritime Provinces and the Dominion.

As stated at the Conference in October, it is our contention that the Duncan and White awards demand revision in the light of changes in the value of money and in the Canadian economy, and in recognition of our interest in the fabulous wealth which has been discovered in the Northlands. These now form a part of various provinces but were originally a portion of, or were acquired by, the Canada of Confederation into which New Brunswick came as a partner in 1867.

In view of all the foregoing facts and with the seriousness of our New Brunswick situation very much in mind, we respectfully request that the Dominion-Provincial Conference be reconvened in order that we may again present our case for special consideration.

Yours sincerely,
HUGH JOHN FLEMMING

Dear Mr. St-Laurent:

I have noted this afternoon the contents of your letter of January 20 in reply to mine of the 18th of the same month.

Accordingly, Mr. Georges Shink, Q.C., our Comptroller of Provincial Revenue, has been informed of the change in the date of the meeting in question.

Dear Mr. Duplessis:

I wish to thank you for your letter of January 18th which I received this morning. I am informing the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Taylor, that a representative of the Province of Quebec will attend the meeting of the committee of officials.

I understand that those concerned were informed yesterday that the meeting will take place February 2nd rather than February 6th.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. St-Laurent,

Your letter of January 6th was delivered to my office on the 9th of the same month. The considerable increase in work resulting from the Session of Parliament at Quebec and an absence of a few days have prevented me from answering before today.

You state in your letter: "It would, I think, be useful to have our committee of officials meet as early in February as possible to clarify the technical details of these proposals."

I gather that this meeting will be held in Ottawa on February 6th next, and the representative of the Province of Quebec will be pleased to attend. It seems to me very definitely that it is absolutely necessary for us to know details of the proposals which are to be clarified and defined in order to thoroughly appreciate these proposals.

May I assure you, Mr. Prime Minister, that it is our earnest desire to co-operate amicably with the federal authorities towards the settlement of federal-provincial fiscal relations within the framework of the full respect of the rights and privileges of the federal and provincial governments.

Yours sincerely,
M. L. DUPLESSIS.

My dear Premier:

While we did have an opportunity to discuss in my office last week your letter of January 12, which dealt with the subject of fiscal relations, nevertheless, I am confident that you would wish to have a formal acknowledgment of your communication for your records.

Mr. Harris, of course, is considering the matters raised in your letter and, as you suggested, some of the subjects will be discussed by the officials of our two governments.

I should like to express once more my pleasure at having had the opportunity of a personal meeting with you.

Yours sincerely,

JANUARY 12th, 1956.

My dear Prime Minister:

I and my colleagues have considered the proposal of the Federal Government with respect to Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements as set out in your letter of January 6th, and I should like to state briefly a few observations relating to:

(a) the objectives to be attained by such arrangements;
(b) the extent to which the tax rental agreements attained these objectives; and
(c) the extent to which the present Federal proposal may be expected to attain these objectives.

Perhaps it would not be unfair to say that the stated objectives of the Federal Government, relative to Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements, are:

(a) to establish a more equitable system of taxation throughout Canada by reducing duplication of direct taxation and of machinery for the collection of direct taxes;
(b) to give a greater measure of stability to revenues of the provinces in order to enable them more adequately to carry out their responsibilities;
(c) to enable Canada, with the co-operation of provincial governments, to carry out fiscal and other national policies intended to maintain high levels of employment and production, and
(d) to make it financially possible for all provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation.

I can certainly agree, without reservation, with these statements of the objectives of the Federal Government. For this reason, therefore, I suggest that we must examine any fiscal arrangements which relate to provincial revenues with a view to ascertaining the degree to which such arrangements will attain these stated objectives, and particularly those contained in clauses (b) and (d) above.

As I stated on October 3rd of last year, the tax rental agreements, partially achieved the objectives of the Federal Government, but failed to fully achieve the objectives because of the fact that some provinces were and are able to raise from within their provinces revenues greatly in excess of the amount which can be raised in some of the less favoured provinces. I do not wish to repeat my argument, so I shall simply state that in my view a lasting solution to the problems of the provinces of Canada will only be found in an arrangement which will approach, in greater measure than at present, the provision of more equal per capita revenues from all sources, thus enabling a given province to discharge its constitutional responsibilities and furnish to its people what has been called a Canadian level of essential Government services.

The present proposal in essence does not approach this objective any more nearly than do the existing tax rental agreements. Indeed, one might observe that it differs from the tax rental agreements only in that:

(a) it substitutes the per capita yield in the two highest provinces from three fields of taxation for the gross national product; and
(b) it provides for an "equalization payment" to each province which falls below the average, whether or not that province chooses to vacate the three tax fields.

In principle it gives no greater recognition to the fiscal needs of the provinces than did the tax rental agreements. I wish to impress upon you that the Federal proposal compensates for lack of tax potential in only three fields of taxation and leaves the less favoured provinces (as do the tax rental agreements) with a per capita rate from local sources of taxation far below the national average. Unless some greater recognition is given to the inability of some provinces to raise something approaching the national average per capita yield from sources other than the three broad fields, the avowed Federal objective of making it financially possible for all the provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional function themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services will not be attained.

In my opinion, it may even be that the Federal proposal will not result in a more equitable system of taxation throughout Canada, and it may not even reduce duplication of direct taxation or the machinery for the collection of direct taxes to as great an extent as do the present tax rental agreements. Duplication of direct taxation will be completely eliminated only if all the provinces undertake to vacate all three tax fields. It could very well be that one province would wish to retain personal income tax, another corporation tax, another succession duties and another all three fields. In those provinces which retain one or more of the tax fields, there may well be a variety of rates either above or below the rates which the Federal Government will allow as a deduction from the Federal tax.

If, therefore, your letter of January 6th finally sets forth the position of the Federal Government with respect to Federal-Provincial arrangements relating to these three tax fields, it would be my hope that in some other way consideration might still be given to the position of this and some other provinces, as urged by myself and several other provincial Premiers during the October meeting.

I am somewhat disappointed that no way was found to give a guarantee of the continuation of Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements beyond a five-year period for, whether the arrangements finally adopted are ideally suited to a given province or not, it is still important that the Government of any province can rely on the continuation of an existing arrangement for a period greater than five years, at least insofar as minimum benefits are concerned. I do note, however, that the numbered paragraph 2 of your proposal provides for a minimum payment during the continuance of the arrangement. Insofar as it is possible for me to judge summarily, this would seem to be an improvement over the provisions in the existing agreements for guaranteed minimum payments.

There are a number of minor points relating to these arrangements which will require clarification and further discussion, and officials of the Government of Nova Scotia will be ready to go to Ottawa as early in February as your officials may wish in order to consider these details. Perhaps even before that time, however, it would be helpful to have some clarification of the significance of the numbered paragraph 5 in your letter. I confess I am unable to determine the intentions of the Federal authorities from a reading of this paragraph.

Further to all the foregoing, I find that I shall be in Ottawa on Thursday and Friday, January 19th and 20th, and if convenient to you I would apprecite very much the opportunity of calling on you during that time. Some time on Friday the 20th would be most convenient with my other commitments, but I shall take the liberty of contacting your office when I arrive in Ottawa and will be glad to accommodate my schedule to your convenience if it is possible for you to see me.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

I wish to thank you for your letter of January 6, 1956, outlining the proposal of the Government of Canada for a Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangement for the five years from April 1, 1957 to March 31, 1962.

Please be assured that this proposal will be given our most careful consideration, and I shall be in communication with you later.

Concerning the proposed meeting of the Committee of Technical Officers to clarify details, I feel confident that the early part of February will be satisfactory.

Sincerely yours,

The Honourable T. C. Douglas,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
REGINA, Sask.

My dear Premier,

I wish to acknowledge your letter of January 11th, 1956, regarding federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

I have carefully noted your comments on the proposal put forward by the Federal government and I will discuss them with my colleagues at the first opportunity. It seems to me too early at this stage to decide whether or not it would be desirable and useful to reconvene the Federal-Provincial Conference. Our next step should be for our Committee of officials to meet in the near future and I have noted with satisfaction that you agree with this suggestion. Mr. K. W. Taylor has already communicated with your representative on the Committee to fix a date for that meeting.

Yours sincerely,
L. S. St. LAURENT.

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Saskatchewan REGINA, January 11th, 1956.

The Rt. Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, Q.C., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Further to my letter of January 9th, my colleagues and I have had an opportunity to examine the proposal regarding Federal-Provincial fiscal arrangements contained in your letter of January 6th.

While there are technical questions which may require clarification before we can measure their full implication, it seems to us that the proposal contained in your letter is similar in almost every respect to that which you placed before the Federal-Provincial Conference on October 3rd. You will recall that your Government emphasized that it was advancing a new approach to Dominion-Provincial fiscal arrangements, and that the terms and statistical data provided at the Conference were to be regarded merely as illustrative of this new approach. It was indicated that the final arrangements would be worked out in consultation with the provinces, and to that end you invited the provincial Premiers to express their views both as to the principles and the terms which you had outlined Your letter of January 6th indicates that your Government is now advancing a concrete plan, from which it is apparent that the representations put forward by the various provinces at the Conference and in subsequent correspondence have been rejected.

I would like to draw your attention to two points in particular to which a number of provinces have made reference. First, the standard rates put forward at the Conference for illustrative purposes would not result in the urgently needed improvement of the financial position of the provinces. The offer of an additional one-half percentage point of taxable corporation income represents no perceptible step toward this necessary objective. This is particularly so in view of the fact that no fiscal need grants are to be made available. Second the illustrative rates did not place sufficient emphasis on the imputed yields from personal income taxes relative to those from corporation income taxes, and it was very strongly urged that steps should be taken to correct this situation. Instead, your Government has increased the emphasis on taxes from corporation profits.

I feel that the objection which I voiced against your illustrative proposals applies also to your present proposal, namely the weakening of the Federal Government's control over fiscal policy by providing incentives for certain provinces to remain aloof from the tax rental agreements I find that the same guaranteed minimum is available to all provinces whether or not they enter into a tax rental agreement. Also I find that insufficient weight is being given to the principle of fiscal need which we have always considered basic to any tax rental agreement designed to give equal treatment and opportunity to all Canadians.

The Saskatchewan Government believes that the effects of this proposal are so far reaching that the Federal-Provincial Conference should be reconvened to discuss this important matter. Most of the provincial legislatures will in all probability have completed their sessions by the first week in April. I would therefore like to urge that you give consideration to the advisability of reconvening the Conference some time during the month of April. It would, of course, be useful if our technical officials could meet prior to such a conference but I am doubtful of the value of a meeting held early in February since it is unlikely that the Federal budget will have been brought down by that date. You will appreciate the fact that your 1956 budget could have an effect upon the tax structure which might seriously alter any omputations which have been made regard-ng the tax potential on which the tax rental greements would be based.

I would like to suggest that the Premiers f the various provinces be approached to ee if they are desirous of having the Federal-Provincial Conference reconvened in April. nsofar as the Saskatchewan Government is oncerned, we would welcome such a meet-ng especially if it could be preceded by a neeting of our officials in order to discuss ny points in your proposal which might equire clarification.

Yours sincerely,
T. C. DOUGLAS.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THE PRIME MINISTER—CONGRATULATIONS ON BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that all hon. members will wish me to address our best wishes to the Prime Minister on his birthday anniversary.

(Translation):

We wish you a happy birthday, Mr. Prime Minister. All your colleagues, I am sure, are asking Providence to grant your fondest wishes.

(Text):

In our wishes we of course include the Prime Minister's distinguished wife, Madame St. Laurent, who joins us today in the celebration of this happy event. We do wish you, sir, many happy returns of the day.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, while possibly no words are needed in addition to what you have already said, perhaps on one of those happy occasions when we can all speak with complete unanimity it might be appropriate that as Leader of the Opposition I express with certainty the thoughts of all members when I say we wish the Prime Minister many happy returns of the day and joy and happiness with his family on these occasions.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since you have expressed these wishes on behalf of the house, and the Leader of the Opposition has risen to join with you, may I say that, as I did on my own behalf this morning, I now do on behalf of my colleagues and I know all members of the house. We join in wishing the Prime Minister many happy returns, long life and good health.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, for us to remain silent in this corner of the house might be interpreted entirely adversely. Since you have extended the wishes of the house, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we concur in those best wishes. Not only do we wish the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) many happy returns of the day but we wish him long life, good health and happiness. I do not know whether some of us wish that he remain in his present office. We should like to see him take it easy for a while and enjoy life. But so long as he is here, or wherever he may be, we wish him the very best for his future days.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you as Speaker of the house and, through you, to thank all hon. members for the kind good wishes they have expressed to me on this occasion. I rejoice in the fact that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leaders of the other groups join in saying that there are happy occasions when we can be unanimous. It is a great gratification to receive these good wishes from all my colleagues in this house. I thank them for associating with me in their good wishes the members of my family, because that is something which each one of us appreciates deeply. I can assure you that I am conscious of the honour and tribute that I am receiving from all my colleagues on this occasion.

STARRED QUESTIONS

LIVES LOST IN DWELLING FIRES

Question No. 2—Mr. Knowles:

1. How many persons have lost their lives in Canada during the past year in fires in dwellings?
2. How many of these were children?

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, this question requests information with regard to the number of persons who have lost their lives by fires in dwellings in Canada in the past year and, as a second question, the number of such persons who were children.

The past year is 1955 and statistics for 1955 will not be available until June of this year. However, in answer to the question, I may give the house the following information for the calendar year 1954:

1 and 2.

Number of deaths from accidents caused by fire and explosion of combustible material, Canada, 1954*

		Place of Accident

Questions

DEER LODGE HOSPITAL AND VETERANS' HOME—LAY-OFFS

Question No. 6—Mr. Knowles

1. How many employees at Deer Lodge hospital and at the veterans' home on Academy road, Winnipeg, have been laid off or given lay-off notices since October 1, 1955?
2. What is the reason for such lay-offs?
3. In view of the years of service of such employees, and in view of the needs of these institutions, is consideration being given to cancelling such lay-offs and retaining these employees on the staffs of these institutions?

1, 2 and 3.

Mr. Lapointe: This question, Mr. Speaker, refers to the number of employees at Deer Lodge hospital and at the veterans' home on Academy road, Winnipeg, who may have been laid off since October 1, 1955, the reasons for these lay-offs and whether consideration has been given to cancelling such lay-offs.

The answer is that no employee has been laid off. Nineteen classified employees have received notice and three more will receive notice which will be effective March 31, 1956. In addition, three prevailing rate employees will be given notice unless normal staff turnover between now and March 31, 1956, permits their retention. The reason for these notices is that as a result of demolition of the old portion of the hospital there will be a reduction of 226 beds in the operating capacity for a period of some two years, and a corresponding decrease in the personnel required.

The department's establishment for 1956-57 for this institution has been adjusted accordingly and provision for salaries in the department's 1956-57 estimates has been made on the adjusted basis. The department, in cooperation with the civil service commission, is endeavouring to find alternative employment for all employees affected and has been successful so far in arranging for the placement of 12 people. Every endeavour will be made to secure employment for the other employees who will be laid off before March 31.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT—CONTINUANCE OF PENSION

Question No. 7—Mr. Knowles:

1. Is consideration being given by the government to amend the Old Age Security Act to permit persons who have qualified for the pension paid thereunder to continue to receive the said pension even if they subsequently move to another country?
2. If the answer to question (1) is not yet in the affirmative, is consideration being given to amending the said act to provide for continued receipt of the old age security pension by persons who are required to move to another country for health or other specified reasons?
3. If the answers to both question (1) and question (2) are not yet in the affirmative, will this whole matter now be studied by the government?

[Mr. Dickey.]

1, 2 and 3.

Mr. Martin: The government is constantly giving consideration to any amendments to the Old Age Security Act which seem, in the light of experience, advisable.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Question No. 2—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. What was the amount spent for advertising by each department of government during the calendar year 1955?
2. What firms were employed?
3. What amount was paid each advertising firm?

DEPUTY MINISTERS

Question No. 20—Mr. Gagnon:

On January 1, 1956, (a) who were the deputy ministers and other persons having the rank of deputy minister, and with what departments were they respectively connected; (b) what remuneration is paid to each one?

NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 22—Mr. Bryson:

1. How many national parks are there in Canada?
2. What is the name and location of each?
3. On what date was each of these parks established or opened?
4. What amount has been spent in each park to date on (a) capital construction; (b) maintenance and repairs?
5. How many miles of passable roads in each, (a) hard surface; (b) gravel; (c) earth surface?
6. What are the names and locations of national parks through which trans-Canada highway passes, and the number of miles of this highway in each park?
7. What annual revenue has been received from each park during the past five fiscal years?

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FIRES

Question No. 31— Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. Did the Department of National Defence have any fires during the year 1955?
2. If so, what was the total (a) number of fires; (b) fire loss?
3. In all cases where the loss exceeded $5,000, what was (a) the location; (b) the service; (c) the cause; (d) the extent of fire loss?
4. Was an official inquiry held in each case?
5. If so, what were the findings?

CROWN COMPANIES

Question No. 36—Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. What crown companies, corporations or subsidiary companies are owned by the dominion government?
2. What are the names of the directors in each case?

SALE OF OIL RIGHTS

Question No. 45—Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What was the number of land sales of oil rights during 1954 and 1955, (a) by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources; (b) by the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?
2. What constituted the basic terms of the agreement in each case?

POST OFFICE THEFTS

Question No. 60—Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace):

1. Have any thefts of money, postage stamps or anything of value occurred in Canadian post offices, since April 1, 1955?
2. If so, for each such theft, (a) where did it take place; (b) what was the amount involved; (c) what was the date of the theft; (d) has court action been instituted against specific individuals; (e) what was the result of such action, if any?

AUTOMATION

Question No. 70—Mr. Knowles:

1. Are any departments of the federal government making studies of automation, so that plans might be formulated (a) to cope with the various problems created thereby; (b) to make sure that its advantages will be shared by all the people of Canada?
2. If so, what departments are making such studies, and what aspects of automation and its consequences is each such department studying? Are the results, to date, of such studies available?
3. If such studies are not already being made, will immediate consideration be given thereto?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINE

Motion No. 2—Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all memoranda, correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and the governments of any of the provinces, since January 1, 1954, regarding proposals for the building of a trans-Canada pipe line.

UNITED STATES WHEAT DISPOSAL PROGRAM

Motion No. 3—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all communications exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the United States from January 1, 1955 to December 31, 1955, relating to the United States wheat disposal program.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, I must declare that it is not in the public interest to bring down the correspondence referred to. I believe hon. members will agree that if there cannot be private correspondence between the government of the United States and the government of Canada on matters affecting wheat, the disposal program of both countries will be prejudiced.

I think that is self-evident.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the minister to point out that since the member who is the mover of this motion is not in the house at the moment it is customary to allow the motion to stand. I suggest the minister might conclude his statement now and the hon. member may govern himself accordingly whenever he is back in the house.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps my reply could stand as well.

EXPROPRIATION OF VETERANS' PROPERTY, B.C.

Motion No. 6—Mr. Goode:

Motions for Papers

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the officials of the Veterans Land Act administration, Vancouver, and the province of British Columbia, from January 1, 1955 to date, regarding expropriation of property held by the veterans under the Veterans Land Act, on Patterson road, Richmond, British Columbia, said expropriation for approaches to the Oak street bridge.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the motion being passed with the usual reservation that the government of British Columbia be advised.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is carried, subject to the reservation made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

CASH ADVANCES ON FARM-STORED GRAIN

Motion No. 12—Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all resolutions supporting the demand for cash advances on farm-stored wheat which have been received from western farm organizations and other public bodies by the Prime Minister and any of the ministers of the government, or officials of the government, since the 15th day of August, 1955.

Mr. Dickey: I understood from the hon. member that this was to stand, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: May I request that whenever it is understood a motion is to be allowed to stand, hon. members should not let me put it, but to say so the minute I call it. If hon. members would co-operate in that sense I would appreciate it.

Motion stands.

POWER—FRASER AND COLUMBIA POTENTIALS

Motion No. 14—Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda, contracts, communications or instructions exchanged between the dominion government or any department or agency thereof and any other person or body, since the 1st January, 1955, concerning an investigation of the power potential of the Fraser river and/or the Columbia river and/or the feasibility and effects of the Columbia river diversion.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, the motion requests the production of a great number of documents. I have discussed the matter with the hon. member for Kamloops, and we have both agreed on the nature of the documents to be tabled if the motion carries.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is carried, subject to the agreement entered into by the two hon. members.

HONEY MARKETING

Motion No. 21—Mr. White (Middlesex East):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between the dominion Department of Agriculture and any persons and companies, from January 1, 1955 to date, regarding the marketing of honey in Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INVITATION TO EXCHANGE PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a statement that was made yesterday in connection with what may be regarded as an invitation by the Soviet government to Canada to send a parliamentary delegation to their country and, I would assume also, to give consideration to the sending of a delegation from that country to Canada.

Your Honour stated that a meeting had been held between yourself and the whips of the parties in regard to this matter. The whips of the parties received a statement that had been issued on February 12 of last year by the supreme soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and also a translation of a message to the Canadian embassy on the same day, which may be regarded as conveying something in the nature of an invitation.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter that requires to be dealt with first of all by the government. I am not suggesting for a moment that the full responsibility rests with the government. I would emphasize, on the contrary, that the ultimate decision should rest with parliament. However, it is not within the knowledge of any of the hon. members, and presumably not within the knowledge of anyone outside the government itself, as to what has taken place between the two governments. There may have been invitations. In fact, I understand from the press reports that a further invitation was extended to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) while he was in Moscow. The consideration of any proposal of this kind also calls for certain government decisions as to the manner in which such a delegation could be arranged, the time at which it should be done and, what is of great importance, the means of transportation that would be provided to carry such a delegation to Russia or to any other country. I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. Leader of the Opposition. I do this with great regret, but I am sure he is not aware of the nature of the discussions which took place last Friday in my chamber when the chief whips of the four parties represented in this house attended.

The declaration referred to by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, the one which he says is dated February 9, 1955—

Mr. Rowe: February 12.

Mr. Speaker: —was referred to in this house on a few occasions during the last session and also before the standing committee on external affairs. During the recess the matter was left in abeyance and at the beginning of this session the matter was renewed in the form of a question which was addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) which appears in Hansard of Friday last at page 600 and to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs replied:

> The matter is now before the Speakers of the two houses.

At three o'clock in the afternoon of the very same day a meeting of the whips was called and held in my office and the hon. member who is the chief whip of the party which the hon. Leader of the Opposition leads was present and all the others as well. I think that in fairness to them and in fairness to the hon. Leader of the Opposition I should point out that at that meeting it was agreed that the matter would be studied, that the whips would place the subject matter of that declaration before their caucuses which were expected to be held the following Wednesday, namely today, and that in the meantime nothing other than an insignificant comment was to be given to the press and no other word was to be mentioned about it until the report of another meeting which was to be held after the caucuses in my office was released.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition now refers to the matter in the house and I thought I would interrupt him to inform him of this, because I am sure that if it had been known that the matter would come up in this way, and not in the way suggested at the meeting of the whips last Friday, the other leaders might have been prepared to deal with the matter. But as it is now there is no question before the house to bring up this matter without any notice while the other party leaders and other hon. members may expect it to be brought up, if at all, in a much different way. I thought I would point that out to the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was quite aware of the circumstances and, as has been indicated, the matter was referred to me and was dealt with in the way that has been customary in regard to matters of major policy decisions and particularly in regard to matters where knowledge is peculiarly in the possession of the government. I would be very happy to meet with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to discuss this matter at any time, as I am sure would be the leaders of the other parties.

TRADE

REFERENCE TO UNITED STATES INVESTMENTS IN CANADA OFFSETTING TRADE DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer I recently received from the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the effect that the government is not unhappy about our growing trade deficit with the United States, may I ask what assurance the minister can give to the Canadian people that United States investments in Canada will continue to offset our growing trade deficit with the United States?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in asking his question my hon. friend has stated an allegation which I doubt is correct. I am not sure that United States investments presently are offsetting the current trade deficit. I would point out that the Canadian dollar is still at a premium, which indicates no lack of confidence in financial circles about the present situation. I am aware also that when Canada has a booming economy we have a large trade deficit with the United States and when we are in a depression we have a favourable trade position with the United States. No one seems to be very happy about the latter situation. I suggest that the question should properly be answered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), but I will say that my answer expresses my own opinion.

NATIONAL PARKS

PRINCE ALBERT—CHANGE OF SUPERINTENDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, notice of which I have given. Has any change been made in the superintendency of the Prince Albert national park and, if so, what was the reason?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the department to transfer the present superintendent at Jasper to Prince Albert national park. This is according to the policy announced last year of periodically rotating park superintendents across Canada.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO PRICES OF GRADES 4, 5 AND 6

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the reported sale of wheat to Poland, would the minister tell the house how much the prices of grades 4, 5 and 6 wheat have been reduced during the last six months?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Surely that is a question for the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Rowe: In view of the unusually conspicuous caution of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in replying to my first question I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce say what prospect there is of making a considerable sale of wheat to Russia at the present time, in view of the visit to our country of the Russian trade officials?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not able to answer that question. The Russian trade delegation arrived here yesterday. I understand they are meeting with officials of the department at three o'clock this afternoon. I suppose that the results of their discussions will emerge in due course, and at that time I will be very pleased to make a statement.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BEER—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO BE TAKEN CONCERNING ALLEGED COMBINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has a decision yet been reached as to what action, if any, will be taken with respect to the report concerning an alleged combine in the manufacture, sale and distribution of beer in Canada? I refer to the report tabled by the minister last June.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question in these terms:

> You have probably seen the article that begins on page 7 herein, which is continued on page 28. I am prompted thereby to ask you on orders of the day if you have yet decided what steps to take in connection with the beer combine report.

The reference there is to an article in the February, 1956, issue of the United Church Observer written by Rev. Dr. James R. Mutchmor.

I do not think I can answer the hon. member's question better than to say that I wrote to Rev. Dr. Mutchmor, the author of this article, on December 28, 1955, advising him that the beer report was receiving the most careful study, both within the department and by outside counsel who had been retained in the usual manner to consider it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Having received a further inquiry from Rev. Dr. James R. Mutchmor, I wrote to him again on January 26, 1956, stating that I could add very little to my letter of December 28 except to mention that some delay had been occasioned by the serious illness of the outside counsel whom we had consulted, who had had to undergo a serious operation before he had completed his opinion, and who will be unable to return to the matter for several weeks.

While I am on my feet I think perhaps I should take advantage of this opportunity to correct a statement in this aforesaid magazine article which has been marked by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, I presume. I do not know who else would have marked it. On page 28 of this magazine which was sent to me the following statement, referring to Hon. John Bracken, appears:

> He had read the federal government report on the alleged beer combine. He probably consulted with his old friend, ex-premier and now federal justice minister Stuart Garson. The result is the sting in the tail of the Bracken report, namely, the proposal that the Manitoba government, not the Manitoba brewers, fix the wholesale or buying, as well as the selling price of beer.

The reference is to Mr. Bracken. I should like to say that since my old and continuing friend Mr. Bracken was appointed as a royal commissioner by the Manitoba government it just happened that I have not had occasion to speak to him either upon the subject referred to in this magazine or upon any subject whatever.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EXERCISE "CRACKERJACK"—EFFECTIVENESS OF NORTHERN AIR DEFENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister made any assessment of the effectiveness of our northern air defences as disclosed by exercise "Crackerjack", and is he in a position to inform the house of his conclusions?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I hardly think this is a question for the orders of the day. I should think it would be a question to be dealt with on the estimates. I am not prepared to give a full report on a matter of that kind on short notice.

Mr. Speaker: I think that the minister is quite right. He cannot answer this question in two or three sentences. He will have to make a statement on the matter later after he has given it study. It is a matter that will have to come up in debate later, not at this stage in the form of a question seeking information.

[Mr. Garson.]

AIR TRANSPORT

STATEMENT AS TO CHANGES IN SAFETY REGULATIONS, FLIGHT HOURS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport if he is yet in a position to answer my question of last Wednesday with respect to whether there have been any representations asking for any change in the matter of flight hours and hours between flights for air-line pilots. Possibly he may also have an answer to the other question that was asked at the same time.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question just asked by the hon. member will perhaps enable me to deal with his question and another question asked by the hon. member for York West.

Last week the hon. member for York West asked whether, as the result of the reports made available some time ago with respect to airplane crashes at Moose Jaw and Brampton, I had made a decision as to any changes which might be made in the air regulations to provide greater safety in the air. At the hon. member's request I have delayed answering his question.

In reply to the hon. member I wish to state that no changes in the air regulations have been made since the accidents to which the hon. member referred, but at the same time I should point out that the subject of safety in the air is not one to be dealt with by changes in the air regulations but rather by other action.

It seems to me that in replying to the hon. member's question it would not be suitable for me to take on the orders of the day the time required to deal with the whole subject of safety in the air, but so as to prevent any misconception arising upon this important matter I think I should say that the officials of my department, after the above mentioned accidents, made a thorough and comprehensive review of all aspects of safety in the air and that this matter is constantly under consideration.

Following that review action was taken on a number of matters. It would take too long at this time to relate all that has been done, but I might instance as examples the decision of my department to place orders for a number of surveillance radar sets to be installed at major airports, changes in air navigation orders to provide for vertical spacing between aircraft in flight and to increase the minimum visibility limits for visual flying, the provision of a substantial increase in the number of personnel for air traffic control and the opening of two schools for the training of this personnel, the completion of the first section of the new visual omni range airway installations and the placing of orders for the remainder of this new airway program, the actual relocation of a section of an airway, the investigation of airborne radar, and the experimental installation of airborne collision lights.

I should perhaps point out to the hon. member that air regulations are not the main medium through which my department acts in these matters, and that if he was referring to regulatory action his reference should have been to air navigation orders. Certain matters connected with the air navigation orders and air traffic controls are still under discussion with the industry.

May I suggest to the hon. member that the whole subject of safety in the air might more appropriately be dealt with when the estimates of my department are under discussion when I shall, if so requested, acquaint all hon. members with the very real efforts that my departmental officials have made to assure safety in the air.

Now, if I may come to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with respect to whether representations had been received by myself or by the air transport board asking for any change in the matter of flight hours and hours between flights for aeroplane pilots, I should first tell the hon. member that this is not a matter falling within the jurisdiction of the air transport board and that no representations on this matter have been received by myself, although the whole subject of hours of flight, rest periods, etc., has been reviewed by my departmental officials with individual operators and is under discussion in the international civil aviation organization.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

STATEMENT AS TO RE-EMPLOYMENT OF EMPLOYEES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I should like to answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception. The hon. member inquired if assurance could be given that employees of the Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland who have received notice of termination of employment, the number of whom he gave as 168, will be re-employed in some other capacity.

The management of the Canadian National inform me that notices of termination of employment have not been sent to 168 employees in Newfoundland. If the inquiry arises from the completion of the dieselization program previously announced by the railway, the management state that as delivery of diesel equipment commences, possibly next summer, there will be adjustments and reductions in motive power staff over a 9 to 12 month period, but that every effort will be made to place in other railway work the employees affected.

HOUSING

ST. CATHARINES—REPOSSESSION OF HOMES OF MEN ON STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Roch Pinard (Acting Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Saskatoon asked me, as Acting Minister of Public Works, a question regarding Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I had received notice of this question previously from the hon. member for York South who is now confined at home owing to illness, which we all deplore and regret. The question reads as follows:

> Is it the policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to repossess the homes of men on strike at St. Catharines who, because of the strike, have been unable to meet their payments? If so, how many orders for repossession have already been issued?

In answer to the first part of the question concerning policy, the policy of the government, as followed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in relation to purchasers of houses from the corporation who are temporarily unemployed was outlined by the Minister of Public Works on March 30, 1954. The same policy is now being followed in St. Catharines. As indicated in the statement by the minister at that time, the corporation does not follow a policy of waiving or postponing monthly instalments on a wholesale basis. Each case is dealt with on its merits.

With relation to the second part of the question, I may inform the hon. member that since the strike at the McKinnon Industries plant commenced there has been one cancellation of an agreement for sale, followed by repossession of the property, in the St. Catharines area out of 1,682 agreements. Arrears in this case had accumulated prior to the commencement of the strike. In addition, there has also been one house repossessed from an occupant who could not be reinstated because he did not qualify as a tenant under the corporation's regulations.

At the present time there are 13 orders for repossession in the hands of the sheriff, but action is being withheld on these pending negotiations now going on between representatives of the union and officials of the corporation. It is hoped that as a result of these negotiations the 13 purchasers will be reinstated and a procedure worked out for the handling of other cases involving union personnel that may arise during the continuance of the strike.

PENSIONS

STATEMENT ON REQUESTED INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): I should like to answer a question asked of me by the hon. member for Peel on January 26. The hon. member asked me whether consideration was being given to increasing the pensions of the superannuated civil servants. As I indicated then to the hon. member, this matter concerns the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and questions relating to the pensions of retired civil servants are more appropriately directed to him since implementation of changes in this respect rests with the superannuation branch of the Department of Finance. In fact, as my hon. friend knows, two similar questions were asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) of the Minister of Finance. One was a written question and the other was an oral question. To those two questions answers were given in the negative by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Knowles: That is all the Minister of Finance ever says. He just says no.

FINANCE

UNITED STATES INVESTMENT IN CANADA—LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Arising out of the answer given a moment ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the minister. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us to what levels the Canadian dollar might fall if United States investment in Canada should decline, or even cease?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Might I ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I should not attempt, even on my birthday, to be a prophet.

MEAT

HOGS—REFUNDS IN PURCHASES BELOW FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In his absence I trust he will take it as notice. Are producers who receive less than the floor price for hogs required to apply directly to the Department of Agriculture for settlement of the difference in price?

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the question will be taken as notice.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 31, consideration of the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Donald D. Carrick (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the sitting last night I was enjoying the privilege of addressing this house on the amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The effect of the amendments is to express disapproval of this government's policy in authorizing the shipment of arms to the Near East and, in precise terms, its policy in authorizing the shipment of arms to Israel and to Egypt, amounting in 1954 and 1955 to $2,067,685.19 to Israel and $771,121 to Egypt. I pointed out that while the amendments were limited to that precise issue, the issue in fact before the house was a good deal wider and that the issue raised the whole question of the policy of this government in shipping arms to the Middle East and its future policy. I propose to deal with the motions on that basis.

I thought it useful to inform the house in a brief way of the events which transpired resulting in the establishment of Israel as a nation and I recalled the fact that there was the resolution of the United Nations in 1947 authorizing the partition of Palestine, and I mentioned the attacks by the Arab nations in order to prevent the partition from taking place in 1948. The Arabs were unsuccessful in that war against the Israelis who eventually compelled them to sign a truce in 1948; and in August 1949 armistice agreements were signed between Israel and the Arab states. It was out of the crucible of war that Israel was formed. At the time of adjournment I was about to tell the house of the events which have transpired since 1949 between Israel and Egypt. I have mentioned that Egypt has persistently refused to recognize Israel. It will not meet any delegates of Israel except in circumstances in which it cannot be avoided, such as before the United Nations; and it will not negotiate directly with Israel on any of the issues or problems between them.

I now come to the second point dealing with the relations between Egypt and Israel during that period, and I refer to the constant attacks that have been made by the Arab states under the instigation of Egypt upon the territory of Israel. The purpose of these attacks is to terrorize the Israelis because it prevents the settlement and economic development of Israel in the border areas. These attacks are not sporadic or spontaneous ones. They are a matter of calculated policy of the Arab government.

In November, 1952, the Arab representatives on the mixed armistice commission formally declared that border incidents were to be exploited in order to prevent the armistice from being effective. Recently the Cairo radio described the perpetrators of these raids as commandos and heroes in the war against Israel. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to that expression "the war against Israel". It throws some light on the attitude of Egypt towards Israel.

Another event of great importance that has taken place during these years is the blockade of the Suez canal by the Egyptians with respect to all ships carrying goods to Israel. That blockade was condemned by the security council of the United Nations in September 1951, and it constitutes a threat to peace and undermines the authority of the United Nations in the Middle East.

Reference has been made in this house to the refugee question. It should be noted by hon. members how those Arab refugees came to be in the area they now occupy outside of Israel. It was not the Israelis who drove out the Arab refugees. It was the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, the spiritual head of the Moslems in that area, who instructed the Arabs to leave Israel when the Arabs first declared war against Israel. It was an attempt to disrupt the economy of Israel.

What has been done by Israel about the Arab problem? They have removed the block on the blocked bank accounts of the Arabs who left Israel, and the money has been paid over to the Arabs. They have also agreed to pay compensation to Arab refugees who have left the country for their losses of property.

The Israelis have agreed to participate in an international fund to make contributions to the settlement of Arabs in Arab countries. The reaction of the Egyptian government to this proposal has been a refusal to even discuss the matter with the Israeli government. The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) have both put before the house statements made by leaders of Arab governments or spokesmen for Arab governments which make it quite clear that the purpose of the Arab governments is to drive the Israelis into the sea. It would only be taking up the time of the house unnecessarily if I were to repeat those statements, because they make quite clear the irreconcilable hostility of the Egyptian government to the Israeli government.

What is the present situation? Up to about September, 1955, there was an uneasy truce in the Middle East between the Arabs and the Israelis. It was an uneasy truce because there was an uneasy balance of arms. In September 1955, the balance was upset by the announcement made to the world that Russia, through Czechoslovakia, was shipping $80 million worth of arms to Egypt. This created a new problem in the Middle East, and was recently described by former president Truman, in a statement to which I shall refer later, as a threat to the peace of the world.

The hon. member for Cartier has dealt very comprehensively with the background of the Middle East problem. This problem is not peculiar to the Middle East alone but is a world problem. The hon. member has sketched very clearly and very convincingly the part that Russia is playing in this difficulty. In fact, Russia has intruded herself into the Middle East and Egypt is the latest pawn in Russia's game.

We know that the minister of external affairs is proposing to hold discussions in the near future with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. If it would not be presumptuous I have some suggestions which I should like to make. Of course, the first suggestion is one that all of us know will be acted upon, and that is that every effort be made by the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada to bring about a settlement of the problems between the Arabs and the Israelis. The minister dealt with the matter in the address he made last Tuesday and pointed out what he considered certain essential elements in that settlement would be. But those of us who are familiar with the history of Arab-Israeli relations could have but little confidence in the outcome of those efforts. I suggest that other steps should be taken and taken immediately. The proposal I make to the minister is this. He should urge the United Kingdom and the United States, with Canada, to arm Israel immediately with all arms that may be necessary in order to preserve the territorial integrity of Israel. Secondly, the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada should agree to guarantee the territorial integrity of Israel against any aggression. Thirdly, steps should be taken under the auspices of the United Nations to place an international force at the disposal of General Burns to police the border areas.

We must recognize, Mr. Speaker, that it is the fundamental right of every country to defend itself; that is a fundamental right we have enjoyed in Canada. Israel cannot defend herself at the present time without arms from the western nations, because the western nations constitute the only source from which Israel can obtain arms. If we deny arms to Israel we deny Israel the fundamental right to defend herself. On the major issue of Israel's right to survive, Israel is morally right and Egypt is morally wrong. It is the duty of countries to succour those who are morally right.

There is an even stronger reason why arms should be supplied to Israel. By supplying arms to Israel Canada is making the greatest contribution it can to the preservation of peace in the Middle East. There is no possibility of Israel attacking Egypt. I think it is quite clear that the stronger Israel is the less likelihood there is of Egypt attacking Israel. For that reason I say that the strongest deterrent to upsetting the peace in the Middle East is a strong Israel.

I remind hon. members that this government has acted on the policy of the preservation of peace through strength. It was the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who, in the United Nations assembly in September, 1947, enunciated the principle of peace through strength. One result of this was the creation of NATO. This government has followed the principle of the preservation of peace through strength in NATO. The United Kingdom has followed it in the Middle East treaty organization, sometimes called the Baghdad pact. The United States has followed it in the southeast Asia treaty organization. Israel should not be denied the possibility of peace which we admit comes only through strength.

There is another reason why the western powers must not fail Israel in this crisis. Israel was created by the United Nations and is one of its members. The basis of the United Nations is its moral authority. If Israel were permitted to disappear, the moral authority of the United Nations would be irretrievably undermined and the peoples of the world would cease to believe in the United Nations.

I suggest there is another reason why Canada should supply arms to Israel. It is because in the realm of diplomacy the refusal of this country, the United Kingdom and the United States to supply arms to Israel constitutes an unfriendly act. The refusal to supply arms to either party in this situation is neutrality in form only; in substance, it is an unfriendly act towards Israel because Egypt is receiving all the arms she needs from Russia. How can our refusal to grant arms to Israel be anything else but an unfriendly act?

It should be noted by hon. members that Israel is at the moment the only true democracy in the Middle East. Every time a democracy is crushed under the weight of communist oppression, the menace to the free world increases. We in Canada cannot permit Israel to be blotted out and written off as expendable. Every time a light of democracy goes out, the world of freedom becomes a little darker.

I point out another consideration to hon. gentlemen. It is this. Israel could be an outpost and a source of security for the western world in the Middle East. Hon. members are familiar with what has happened in Egypt. The Egyptians have driven the British out of the Suez except for a small remnant garrison, and I believe that must be evacuated by the middle of May this year. A spokesman for the Egyptian government has said that a provision in the treaty—which gives Britain the right, in cases of emergency and security, to return to the Suez canal—will not be honoured. The troops that Great Britain has in Cyprus and in Jordan at the present time occupy a precarious position. Israel could constitute an arsenal for the democracies of the free world in the Middle East.

Hon. members will be interested in the recommendation of former president Harry S. Truman on this question, which was published in the New York Times on January 29 of this year. This is what he said with reference to the Middle East:

> We must counteract every attempt by the Soviet union to upset the present precarious balance of power in this area. This requires that the United States should now provide the defensive arms needed by Israel to protect itself against any aggression made possible by the introduction of communist arms.

The question has been raised, what effect would it have upon Egypt if arms are furnished by Canada and the United States and the United Kingdom to Israel? The question has been raised whether it would have the effect of driving Egypt into the arms of Russia. I say, Mr. Speaker, Egypt has already aligned herself with Russia. Furthermore, when Egypt made the deal with Russia she must have known that the inevitable reaction of the western world would be to supply arms to Israel, because no other course remains open. Egypt will draw near to Russia only if she considers her self interest requires it, and nothing that this government does by way of shipment of arms to Israel is going to change one bit the basis of Egypt's decision to draw close to Russia. But regardless of what the reaction of Egypt may be, we must see that Israel is preserved.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, may I just say my suggestion to the minister is that every effort be made to establish peace between the Israelis and the Egyptians, but that immediately the minister urge the United Kingdom and the United States, with the Canadian government, to supply sufficient arms to Israel to enable her to defend herself against any aggression; also these countries should guarantee the territorial integrity of Israel, and lastly, that an international force be established under General Burns to patrol the border area. Moral forces are still the strongest forces in this world. The free world must not default in its moral obligation to assist Israel.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this debate has dealt substantially with two subjects, and tion has been directed to the shipment of arms by this government and the relation of that shipment to international affairs. There has also been discussion of the position of communist China and the possible recognition of the government of that country. There has further been a reference by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to Germany and the situation there, to which I shall refer briefly. There have been very useful and informative statements in regard to the visit by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to Russia and to other countries in the east within the past few months.

I propose today to deal particularly with the subject of the shipment of arms, what that means from the point of view of our international policies, and also what it means in relation to the responsibility of this parliament and the relationship of government to parliament. I intend also to refer to the subject of communist China, which in fact was the subject which prompted this debate in the first instance, although the Secretary of State for External Affairs dealt with it very briefly.

The statement made by the Prime Minister in this house was a terrible statement, Mr. Speaker. It was a terrible admission of the way in which this parliament is treated by this government. There are no satisfactory explanations of any kind for the incredible record of evasion, misstatement, hiding of the facts, backing away from earlier statements, and finally the admission that most of the earlier statements had been wrong and that everything that had been done had been done by one man under the mistaken idea that he was doing the wrong thing. I make that last statement for this reason. We now find that the very shipment of aircraft which started this whole debate was done under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). We have the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that when he said so emphatically on one occasion there was an order in council he did so believing it was necessary to have an order in council before shipments of that kind could be made. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is also the Minister of Defence Production, does not know when orders in council are needed and when they are not, then surely we have the most glaring admission possible as to why the responsibilities now in his hands should not be entrusted to him. If he does not know when an order in council is needed, then how are we to have any assurance whatever that we get the proper information at the appropriate time?

This goes far beyond the question of shipment of aircraft or the shipment of weapons, very disturbing and very serious though that is. This goes right to the root of the whole question of our parliamentary system. From January 11 to January 31, a matter of twenty days, we had a series of differing answers to questions we had asked about the same subject. Now, in the face of that, how are we to know when we can accept any statement of the government? After all, we had the very illuminating statement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), not made to this house but made to another gathering in Ottawa, which was duly reported as things are reported in a free press. The Minister of Agriculture offered an example to his associates in his own party of the way in which debate should be conducted. He explained an occasion when he had disagreed violently with the government of Mr Mackenzie King. Nevertheless he finally found himself in a minority and when it came into the house he was the minister who presented the argument in support of the thing in which he disbelieved. The importance of this story is that the minister was offering this as an example of the way things should be done. He said as he came out of the house that he was greeted by one of the other members who said, "Jimmie, if you only believed in that, what a job you could have done". The minister went on after that to say, "I gave you this example to show you the way things should be dealt with", or words to that effect.

I am inclined to wonder what the situation might be if we asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if he really believed what he was saying when he answered a statement in this house. It might be contrary to the rules but the fact remains that we would be justified in asking him that question on the basis of his own explanation of the way in which he conducts the business of the government in this house. Even without that illuminating example at the gathering where people were learning a lesson from the sages of the party, which example we now have before us, the example could not be reconciled because right along the front benches we get different statements about the same subject, finally winding up with the thing that many of us suspected before, and that is that it was really a one-man show.

The fact is they all thought it was covered by an order in council. They now find that the Minister of Trade and Commerce apparently did it without even the ministerial consultation he had indicated was appropriate under the circumstances. Has this one minister become the minister of external affairs? We do of course remember that for a while he apparently became the minister of justice. There are hon. members who will recall the control he exercised over that department under the Combines Investigation Act. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce also become the minister of national defence? In this case he has assumed the responsibility of determining what weapons and arms were needed in an extremely critical area of the world and it is quite obvious from the answers of the Minister of National Defence that he knew nothing about it, even less than usual.

We therefore find the Minister of Trade and Commerce substituting himself for the Minister of National Defence as well. I do not know how much farther the influence goes but, Mr. Speaker, if this is the situation with which we are confronted today surely there is not a single hon. member opposite who in his own mind, regardless of what he may say publicly, will be in any uncertainty now as to why we conducted the debate we did last summer. Surely there is not an hon. member opposite who does not now understand why we are concerned about too much power being put in the hands of this one minister. We have seen the evidence of what he does with the power he has, and if that minister thought he should have had an order in council and did not bother to have one passed then it is perfectly clear that he would do anything else without an order in council whether or not he should have it. In this case it was only an accident apparently that he did not need one if, in fact, he did not. We do not yet know just what the circumstances were. We have the ingenious explanation that an order in council is needed if it is the government that is sending the arms out, but if it is a private firm sending them out then they do not need the order in council. That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the most shocking admissions that we have had in this house in relation to a most delicate and difficult international situation. All that is needed to evade the supervision of this government in discharging its responsibilities is to make sure that arms shipments get into the hands of some private organization, which the government can do; under those circumstances an order in council is not needed and it can be done at the instance of a single minister who does not even remember afterwards to tell the house about what he has done when he is asked a question concerning it.

This is a cynical, outrageous transaction. It did not require 20 days to find out the facts which were finally presented to us.

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in dealing with this subject had this to say, as reported at page 701 of Hansard:

> The Minister of Trade and Commerce, on a question of privilege late Friday afternoon, explained that he had incorrectly referred to an order in council when what he really meant was a ministerial decision with respect to the issue of an export permit for the shipment of Harvard trainers to Egypt.

This was no inadvertent answer, Mr. Speaker; this was a subject that had been before the house for three weeks. This was a subject that had been before the house and direct questions were asked in relation to it. On more than one occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the most emphatic, and I might say offensive terms, chided those who questioned in any way the accuracy of his statement as to the date on which the order in council had been passed.

This raises another question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has told us that it was a decision by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now this happens at a time when the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been emphasizing to us the dangers in the Middle East. Those dangers are not diminishing; we have been told they have been increasing. If ever proof were needed that the time is overdue for the business of the people of Canada to be brought back under the control of this parliament it is right now in the face of these admissions of the past few days. At the very time this was being discussed here, at the very time in fact that the first three aircraft of this order were moving in the Star of Assuan to Egypt, President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Eden were meeting in Washington discussing ways and means of avoiding pressure in the Middle East.

May I remind the hon. member who has just spoken about the denial of arms to Israel. We are talking about the supply of aircraft to Egypt and that is what brought up this whole question before the house. If the hon. member has such heart-burnings about Israel, then let him rise and demand that there be no further aircraft shipped, that the three now on the Star of Assuan be not delivered and that the 12 aircraft still in Canada be held here, and then perhaps his words will have some weight.

An hon. Member: That is not what the amendment concerns.

Mr. Drew: I shall talk about the amendment and I shall talk about the shameless pretence there was in regard to the effect of this amendment, too.

Of course I admit that the hon. member for Trinity has had experience serving the government in a legal capacity and perhaps that gave him some special qualifications which appealed to it on this occasion. It was obvious of course that he kept very close to his text but I want to point out—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: The Minister of National Health and Welfare is quite capable of taking care of himself without reading the text of his speeches and it would be a most healthy thing if the statement made by the Speaker last night were to be observed by all the hon. members of this house.

Mr. Martin: Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Drew: I am making this speech and I intend to continue.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Leader of the Opposition does not care to be interrupted, the minister may not do so unless he rises on a point of order.

Mr. Martin: I would just point out to the Leader of the Opposition—

An hon. Member: He is just pointing out; go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it does not appear to be a point of order or a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare rises on a point of order I shall be pleased to listen to him. However, if he does not rise on a point of order he must not interrupt the Leader of the Opposition if the latter does not consent.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I remember one occasion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You are just pointing out.

Mr. Drew: I feel quite sure that the minister remembers more than one occasion.

Mr. Martin: I was just going to say—

Mr. Carrick: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Trinity has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Carrick: If the Leader of the Opposition is intending to intimate by his remarks that I read my speech it is quite inaccurate—

An hon. Member: No, he didn't.

An hon. Member: Every hon. member of this house knows he didn't.

An hon. Member: He didn't say you did.

Mr. Rowe: It would have been better if you had.

Mr. Carrick: That will be a matter of opinion. I had rough notes and I shall be very glad to show them to the Leader of the Opposition if there is any doubt about it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I did not think for an instant that the hon. member read his speech; it was not good enough to have been read.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: When I said it was not good enough to have been read I should have added that I intend to refer particularly to a statement the hon. member made because I would hope if he had taken the responsibility of preparing his address in advance he would not have made the statement to which I intend to make reference in no uncertain terms.

He made certain references which should not be allowed to pass unchallenged in this house. I do want to point out, however, and I will deal with it right now, that when the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Drew: This is what the hon. member said, as reported at page 743 of Hansard:

> I was shocked, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved an amendment in this manner. I want to read that amendment to the house:
>
> "That . . . in view of the present critical situation in the Middle East, this house expresses its strong disapproval of the government's policy of authorizing the shipment of munitions of war to countries in that area not within the NATO alliance . . ."
>
> That is the part I want to deal with. I say I was shocked because it constituted a refusal of help to Israel in her hour of need. I never believed that the erstwhile great Conservative party would ever adopt a policy of that kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin)—

Mr. Martin: I never said a word.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin: What I said was that I never saw the Leader of the Opposition in a happier mood than he is at this moment.

Mr. Rowe: He has good cause.

Mr. Drew: In all the conflicting statements that have been made that at least is a very happy meeting of minds at any rate on one point. However, I do not want to be beguiled by the smiles of the Minister of National Health and Welfare as to what was meant by those words. That was a disgraceful distortion of the facts. It was a shameless appeal to prejudice. It had absolutely no relation to the facts. I only wish that the rules made it possible for me to use stronger terms because the hon. member who introduced that shallow and shameless misinterpretation was dealing with a subject which had been brought into this house by the shipment of aircraft to Egypt. Why did he not say a word about that? Why did he not urge the government to stop the shipment of the remaining twelve if for any reason they could not stop the first three? What a cynical picture we have before us. They ship aircraft to Egypt and then they ship anti-aircraft guns to Israel to shoot them down.

At the very time that this is being done we are paying our respects to the very gallant and effective efforts of General Burns to maintain stability and peace in that part of the world. An appropriate tribute has been paid to what General Burns has done on different occasions. He has achieved the things that he has done in the realm of practical hard negotiation and not by the use of fatuous platitudes such as some of those we have heard in regard to this subject. General Burns is either doing a job or he is not. I understood that this government believe that he is doing a very good job. I believe he is doing a good job and I am sure most hon. members do. It is a very poor award for his efforts that at the time he is trying to cool off the situation in that area this government should be shipping arms to both sides.

Of all the attempts to hide the realities that I have heard I cannot imagine anything worse than the suggestion that this is not really important because it amounts only to a comparatively few hundred thousand dollars. As everyone knows, we heard the expression, "What is a million?" In this case apparently the expression is, "What is two million?" After all it is not a question of the degree, it is a question of whether the thing is right or wrong. I was never aware that under our laws there was any distinction drawn in the case of murder between murder done with an elephant gun and with a .22 rifle. If it is murder, it is murder just the same. If the thing is wrong, it is wrong, no matter how many are shipped or no matter what the amount may be.

It is at a time when all these difficulties are confronting us that we are told that it is dangerous to fan the embers of distrust and hatred in that area. It is at such a time that we see our government presenting this sorry spectacle of slaphappy diplomacy. After all, where has there been any caution exercised? Where has there been any real responsibility? One minister after another, from the Prime Minister down, tells us a different story and we were finally brought up to date yesterday.

I am reminded of a story told during the first world war. Veterans of the first world war will always remember a fabulous character known as Foghorn MacDonald. He had a voice like a bull of Bashan; it was a real voice which could be heard everywhere. During that war there were certain complaints by the fighting troops about a place in London known as Argyll House. It was a large building with multiple halls where people wrote the innumerable papers that seem to have to get written in every war in quintuplicate and sextuplicate, in fives and sixes. There was a notorious uncertainty as to who was really in authority.

I remember well one of the stories which pleased the troops. It seems that Foghorn MacDonald had gone to Argyll House to find out where his woodpeckers—which was what the forestry troops were popularly called—were to be allowed to cut some trees in Windsor great forest. He went to one place and was told that it was another officer who dealt with the matter. Then he went to another place and was told that it was somebody else. After he had gone halfway through that enormous building he came down into the middle of the central hall and in a voice that shook the glass at the top he shouted, "Who is in charge of this dump anyway?" I might explain, that is a slightly modified version of the story.

But, Mr. Speaker, it was the final stage of the story that reminded me of what has been happening in the house because as the story went a head came out of every one of the several doors in Argyll House and shouted at the top of its voice, "I am." Will the Prime Minister please take the appropriate steps to let us know who is in charge of these different subjects? If in fact the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is also Secretary of State for External Affairs, do let us know so that we can address our questions to the proper minister. If he is Minister of National Defence in fact if not in name let us know, so that we can address our questions to him. If in regard to certain matters connected with the Combines Investigation Act authority over that department is once again in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I hope the Prime Minister will let us know so that any further questions along that line may go to the appropriate minister. It would save a great deal of time. Twenty days have been taken up with a great deal of questioning to get the information that was needed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remark from my genial friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that he finds me in good humour, and I reciprocate that. I constantly find him in good humour. But I do not want any impression left that what we are dealing with here is fundamentally any laughing matter. Confusion at some point can become so ridiculous that it is difficult not to laugh, and it was the very wise Voltaire who said that a serious subject should not be discussed too seriously. Nevertheless, tempting though it may be to point out the preposterous nature of the confusion that has emerged, the question presents itself: Why has the government been hiding the facts? Why has the government been holding back on us? Why did the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) take so long to find out what the facts were? Our whole system depends upon reliable answers by ministers and within an appropriate length of time.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs had every reason to know the facts better than he did when, after several flippant answers on different days, he finally did place before us the situation as he knew it up to that time. Since then we have had further revised editions from other ministers. But this story is not simply a story of inaccuracy. It is a story of delay. It is a story of uncertainty, it is a story about which we do not yet know all the essential considerations. We certainly do not yet know why it is that this was done.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is as improper a suggestion as has been made in the house for anyone to suggest that at a time when General Burns is trying to compose the difficulties in that troubled area any attempt to prevent the shipment of arms to both sides involved in that difficulty constitutes an attempt to weaken the Israeli government. Anything further from the facts could not be imagined. Anything more unreal could not be devised. The trafficking in arms is either right or it is wrong. Trafficking in the bloody weapons of war is wrong, and it is particularly wrong when it is done in this secret and underhand way.

We have prided ourselves, Mr. Speaker, on the position of detachment of our government and the fact that it was in effect a middle power over and above the ordinary temptations and weaknesses of other nations. We have gained much in international stature from that very fact. That reputation has been effectively removed by the course of the government in this unhappy incident that we have had before us. Trafficking in arms in an area where we are reminded it is terribly dangerous to fan the embers of hatred and distrust! Is it neutrality, is it detachment to supply weapons to both sides? No. We want the security of Israel established in the one way it can be established: it was most improper for the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) to imply that there had been any suggestion of withdrawal of support from Israel when only in the afternoon the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had so clearly stated the principles by which the protection of Israel could be secured.

What shallow pretence it is to suggest that we are going to help Israel by sending a few arms there! What is going to help Israel is that the nations of the west stand together to say that there shall be no war in that area. Why pretend that Israel, by the delivery of a few weapons, could do more than invite trouble? Why pretend that Israel, by the delivery of a few weapons, could possibly defend itself against the combined Arab states backed up by all the armour being sent from communist countries to that area today?

We know that peace has been saved in different parts of the world. Peace was saved in Germany not by evasion, not by appeasement, but by direct, clear and emphatic statement. Peace was preserved in Germany by the unqualified statement that if Russia moved at all against West Berlin or Western Germany action would be taken immediately upon that happening. As a result of that there has been peace. As a result of that there can be peace in the years ahead.

There is today peace, a tortured peace it is true, in Korea, not because of appeasement, not because of shipping arms to both sides, not because of shipping aircraft to North Korea and anti-aircraft guns to South Korea. There is peace in Korea today because the United Nations stood firm. They stood together and they protected the freedom of South Korea. That protection stands today and the hope of peace stands with it. That is the way that peace can be preserved in Israel. It is the way peace can be preserved in the Middle East and it is the only way.

No single member of the house from any part of Canada has more clearly demonstrated his affectionate interest in the cause of Israel and his support of Israeli aspirations than has the hon. member for Prince Albert. What he has done was recognized by the unqualified tribute paid to him by those in this country whose blood ties carry their thoughts so closely and so constantly to Israel itself. No; it is not for any hon. member of this house to suggest that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) would seek to withhold any support for the state which he himself has supported so well by voice, by action and by everything he has done in this house.

Before I proceed to discuss China, I want to deal with the subamendment introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and which is as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the word "alliance" the following words:
> "without at the same time making sure that peace in that area would be guaranteed either by the United Nations or by the powers that signed the tripartite agreement of 1950, namely the United States, the United Kingdom and France."

Mr. Speaker, we believe that our amendment is perfectly clear and that it leaves no uncertainty as to what it means. It was moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert, seconded by myself and it reads as follows:

> That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "In view of the present critical situation in the Middle East, this house expresses its strong disapproval of the government's policy of authorizing the shipment of munitions of war to countries in that area not within the NATO alliance; and also condemns the government for the lack of candour with which the matter has been dealt with in this house."

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Speaker, we believe that our amendment appropriately sets forward the views we have; and we believe that the subamendment, which would remove certain of the reservations we make in our amendment, would be inappropriate at a time when every effort should be made to smooth out the difficulties in that area, and to prevent by diplomacy and in every way we can the shipment by Russia to Egypt or to any other state the arms that might be used to cause trouble there. We also believe that there should not be, by us or others wherever we can do anything about it, the further shipment of arms that would aggravate an already difficult situation. It is therefore our purpose to vote against the subamendment, although in a general way I support all the views that have been expressed by hon. members of the C.C.F. party in support of our own amendment.

I wish now to speak about the subject of China. Mr. Speaker, that was the subject that prompted me to ask the Prime Minister for a debate on external affairs. On more than one occasion the Secretary of State for External Affairs had publicly left the impression—whether or not that was intended—that Canada was moving rapidly toward recognition of communist China. Whether or not the Secretary of State for External Affairs intended to leave that impression, that was the interpretation placed upon his speeches in British Columbia last summer and that was the interpretation placed upon other statements he has made. It was the interpretation—perhaps erroneously—placed by many people on his article in the magazine Look under date of January 10, 1956. From that statement I am not going to read more than one paragraph which will illustrate something of the reason why a certain amount of concern was expressed. I quote from the article in the magazine Look of January 10 under the title "Are we Losing the Cold War?" and written by the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> We all need to reappraise our cold-war tactics. We need not oscillate so much (as we North Americans are inclined to do) between alarm and optimism. We should have neither chips on our shoulders nor stars in our eyes. This is a time for bold but hard-headed statesmanship, for vigour and vision, where negotiation must not be confused with appeasement, and the positive challenge of competitive coexistence must replace the sense of fear and urgency as the binding element in our democratic coalition.

Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to make certain numbered recommendations. This is recommendation No. 4:

> 4. We should recognize the fact that the Peiping government, and not Chiang Kai-shek, is in control of continental China and likely to remain so; that there are basic problems to be settled in the Far East which cannot be settled without the participation and agreement of that government. We can negotiate with Peiping when necessary and desirable without implying approval of that regime or without weakening our opposition to communism.

It may be that too loose an interpretation was put on this statement in the United States and elsewhere, but it was certainly taken to mean that this government was urging the United States to revise their views; and since they had clearly stated those views previously, there would be only one way they could revise their views on this particular subject.

Having regard to that matter and having regard to the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs last year, that the time had come for a re-examination of this whole subject, we waited with interest yesterday to see what that re-examination was. Let us see just what it was. As reported at page 710 of Hansard the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated:

We have made this re-examination and we feel that the careful policy we have been following, and are still following, has been the right one; rejecting on the one hand immediate diplomatic recognition but rejecting on the other hand the view that a communist regime in Peking can never be recognized as the government of China.

We certainly waited for the mountain to bring forth a mouse because there is certainly nothing there that gives us any reappraisal of the situation. This is the hard-headed statesmanship, the vigour and vision that we have been waiting for! He tells us simply that we stand exactly where we were. In other words, we do not know where we are. We do not know whether it means recognition or not.

Every now and then we see in the press reports that some well-informed source has stated that Canada is moving rapidly toward recognition. I mention this matter today because, from what had been said, I thought we might have a chance to relate our remarks to some definite statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to communist China. But the fact is that this statement tells us nothing. That was the reason that our amendment did not deal with this matter. We want no uncertainty. We want to know that there is not going to be any recognition before the matter has been presented to this house. I would hope that we shall have from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—in view of certain uncertainties on other recent occasions—the assurance that there will not be recognition of communist China until this subject has been discussed here in parliament and all the views upon this subject have been properly expressed upon it. I think that is proper and right because a great deal more is involved than mere diplomatic recognition.

I think this is an appropriate time to discuss the subject. Unhappily there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about Britain's recognition of communist China some time ago. The present government of China was recognized by the socialist government of Britain. That was their right. It is not for us to enter into debate on a matter that has already been decided. But just so there will be no misunderstanding about the attitude of the present Prime Minister of Britain very shortly after recognition had been given, I want to quote what he said on January 20, 1950.

The far eastern policies of the Atlantic powers and their friends are in a rather dismal tangle. They all apparently intend the same thing, but they are moving at so different a pace that they are jerkily out of step.

The recognition of the communist government in China provides a recent example of this inconsistency, though not the most important. A divergence of view and discrepancy in action between the British and American governments in this instance may even do good if they draw attention in both countries to the need to co-ordinate their policies without further delay.

As regards actual recognition, there is a fair field for argument on practical, as well as on legal, issues. The decision to recognize is no doubt eventually inescapable, but it is a real misfortune that in this, as in other far eastern matters, we should be acting piecemeal, both within the commonwealth and as between the commonwealth and the United States.

That was a statement by the present Prime Minister of Britain on January 20, 1950. He has never at any time backed away from the implications of that statement when the subject has been discussed. The present government, when it took office, carried forward that policy. On different occasions the present Prime Minister of Britain, as foreign minister, explained why they were continuing it. The reason is quite clear. It is one that is embedded in the traditions of diplomacy of the government of the United Kingdom. Unless there are compelling and in fact overwhelming reasons, one government does not repudiate the decisions of a previous government in the international field. This has provided a continuity of understanding and performance which makes Britain today the bulwark of European stability.

Mr. Nicholson: The Labour government gave India self government, but that has not changed at all, has it?

Mr. Bell: You are on a different wavelength.

Mr. Drew: The Prime Minister of Britain has followed a consistent course, but he has indicated only too clearly the measure of discomfort that has accompanied some of the things that have ensued. For one thing, they did not get what they thought they were going to get. The Socialist government in Britain obviously thought they were going to unlock the door to trade with China. They did not get anywhere at all. They did not even have diplomatic relations opened up as a result of that humiliating experience.

No, Mr. Speaker; let us not be confused about this. There are reasons why the United Kingdom might perhaps have more cause to be concerned about this than other countries, but let us not forget one thing that the present Prime Minister of Britain emphasized in 1950 and which needs to be emphasized today. It is the vital importance of harmonious action by the great triangle on the Atlantic ocean, the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. Let us never forget the vital importance of this group—associated as they are with NATO and other countries in close fellowship and very close bonds of nationality—understanding where they are going and marching together if that is possible. I, for one, certainly am not going to suggest at any time that the sovereignty of this country should in any way be denied, as is sometimes apparently suggested by this government. I believe that the sovereignty of this country should be asserted on every occasion, whether it is in commercial affairs or international affairs.

But, Mr. Speaker, we would simply be blind if we did not recognize that the great power in the Pacific upon which the whole future of the area depends is the United States. We will only be causing disharmony among ourselves, and wholly unnecessary difficulty, if we do not try to work out our problems in close co-operation. I hope that when the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom comes here he will be in no uncertainty as to the fact that there is a very substantial group of members in this house who certainly do not approve of the recognition of communist China at this time.

So far as that subject is concerned, it can be dealt with and I hope it will be dealt with in a constitutional manner, by presenting it here in parliament. This subject has been under discussion a sufficient number of times for us to want to make sure that we do not find ourselves suddenly in the position where there has been both recognition of communist China and its entry into the United Nations. After all, it is the entry of communist China into the United Nations that is being talked about very largely when we talk about diplomatic recognition.

There are particular reasons why we should move very carefully on this subject of diplomatic recognition. Let us see what the consequences would be. One of the consequences would be that the communist government of China would immediately have a spy centre here in Ottawa, just as other spy centres have been established. The communist government would be able to follow the activities of nearly 50,000 Chinese here in Canada. If there is one group of people in the whole world who have a historic affection for their family, in fact almost deifying their family, it is Chinese. I hesitate to think what might happen to a lot of Chinese in this country as the result of pressure upon them in regard to members of their families now in China, if we permitted this brutal form of blackmail to be established by recognition of communist China at this time.

Make no mistake about it, the evidence of their brutality is there for everyone to read. The evidence of their brutality is actually in the terms of the resolution adopted by the United Nations, which still declares communist China an aggressor. Why should we even be discussing the possibility of recognition at this time?

The other subject that was mentioned was our self interest. If we are going to reduce this to dollars and cents, let us keep it in perspective. I believe a lot of people are being led to expect that if there were recognition of communist China, suddenly there would be big markets for our wheat and our other food products. Let us remember what are the actual facts. The largest amount of wheat that was ever shipped from Canada to China at any time was in 1926. Our exports of wheat to China for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1926, amounted to $10,146,000. Let us just keep this in perspective. Let us not change our moral attitude in the hope of the recovery of a certain number of dollars.

Then, too, when we are discussing wheat we must remember that there is also flour. I would not want to leave that product out of consideration. The largest export of flour was in the year 1929, a year of high prices. In that year our total exports to China were $12,929,000. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we can trade with China now and we have traded with China since the war despite a change of government. If China wants them and we can convince them they need it, there is nothing to prevent us from shipping commodities to China now. The fact is that we can unquestionably sell anything to China they really want to buy, but it is very questionable whether they are in a position to buy in view of the rigid agreements between them and Russia at the present time.

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, I know there is a great deal of heartburning about this question of recognition. As the present Prime Minister of Great Britain said in 1950, it is a debatable subject, and there are different sides to the question. I have made it quite clear that I do not for a moment suggest the time might not come when circumstances would suggest the advisability of diplomatic recognition of China under conditions very different from what they are today. But as it stands at the moment, the communist government of China is a declared aggressor; and what is more, they have brought it right up to date.

I could not help thinking of how inappropriate any hint of this was, in view of the statement made by the premier of China, Chou En-lai, only the day before yesterday. In a long statement of policy to the people of China he had this to say—I am quoting from the front page of the New York Times of Tuesday, January 31, 1956—

> Premier Chou En-lai of communist China . . . urged all Chinese, including nationalists to work for "peaceful liberation" of Taiwan (Formosa). Nevertheless he said red China was "actively preparing" to take it, "by means of war if necessary."
> The premier said communist China wanted peace. He declared, however, it was "also not afraid of war" should, as he put it, "the international aggressive bloc impose war on us."

There is the statement of an aggressive power. The United States has said that she will not stand idly by if Taiwan is attacked, yet we have the premier of China stating that they are going to take it by war if necessary. We should not leave any uncertainty about the fact that while this atmosphere prevails, and until the government of communist China has made clear it intends to follow the course of international decency, we will not even discuss the recognition of that government now or in the years ahead. That may come, as it has in other instances, but under very definitely different circumstances.

I also note there are those who feel that this is something that has to be recognized as a fact. They feel that there is a certain amount of jingoism behind the antagonism to recognition. Let me point out that it has not been generally suggested that the A.F.L. and the C.I.O., which are now united in both the United States and Canada, have been particularly jingoistic. On December 7 this resolution was adopted by a joint meeting of the newly-combined A.F.L. and C.I.O. in the United States. It was the eighteenth of the resolutions passed on that day. The resolution reads as follows:

> Our government should firmly adhere to the policy of prohibiting the admission into the U.N. of any regime which (a) has been imposed on any nation by a foreign power, (b) which exercises effective control of the country only through denying its people the fundamental human rights specified in the U.N. charter, and (c) which is engaged in war or has been found guilty of aggression against the U.N.

There is no uncertainty about it. There is no uncertainty as to what countries it applies to. And just in case we should not feel that this was sufficiently wide in its application, as it dealt simply with the A.F.L. and the C.I.O. in the United States, there was also on December 12, five days later, a meeting of the international confederation of free trade unions in the city of New York. Canadian unions are a member of that international organization. On December 12 they adopted verbatim the resolution which I have just read.

Mr. Philpott: On a point of order, I am sure the hon. member is aware that both the big Canadian trade union organizations have made explicit recommendations to the government of Canada in the past few weeks calling for recognition of the communist government of China.

Mr. Speaker: I point out to the hon. member that that is not a point of order.

Mr. Drew: I have read the resolution which was adopted by the combined A.F.L. and C.I.O. in the United States on December 7, and I have read also a copy of the resolution which was adopted by the international confederation of free trade unions on December 12, 1955.

The statement by Chou En-lai which I read a few moments ago contains one interesting expression. He speaks about urging all Chinese, including nationalists, to work for peaceful liberation. I feel sure that all hon. members will recall the explosive manner in which those same words were greeted by Mr. Khrushchev when they were used in his Christmas message by President Eisenhower. It will be recalled that when President Eisenhower talked about peaceful liberation of the satellite countries, that same Mr. Khrushchev literally blew his top. On December 31 a statement was issued from the President's office, which closed with the definite statement:

> The peaceful liberation of the captive peoples has been, is and until success is achieved, will continue to be a major goal of United States foreign policy.

These words are clear enough, Mr. Speaker. The peaceful liberation of captive people will be the policy of the United States government. He was referring to the satellite powers in Europe. Here is an area, the island of Formosa, which the United States has pledged itself to protect; yet the premier of China does not hesitate to use the very same words in a very different way.

Before I close these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize my belief that first things come first. The speech from the throne pointed out that arms alone would not defend our cause; that the moral issues were the great issues, and that in large measure it was by our moral strength that we would attain our objective. I certainly subscribe to that belief.

I therefore ask hon. members to recall why it was we went to war in 1939. It was because the freedom of Poland had been challenged by aggression. We then went to war to assert the principle that every nation should have the right to determine its own course by its own free choice.

Poland is not free. Poland is enslaved; so is the Ukraine; so are Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania and the Baltic states. All these nations are enslaved. All these nations have been denied what was implicit in the charter of the United Nations, signed ten years ago last spring in San Francisco, that every nation should have the right to express its opinion on the kind of government it wanted.

Mr. Speaker, before we start talking about permitting communist China to enter the United Nations, let us urge that at the United Nations there be a demand that a free vote be taken in the satellite countries under the supervision of the United Nations, so the people there may determine the kind of government they want. That is the kind of peaceful liberation the President of the United States has been talking about in the speeches he has made.

It is not enough to say this would not be accepted. If it would not be accepted, then Russia is not living up to the spirit of the United Nations and the sooner it is put on the record the better. But before we start any course that would bring aid, comfort and help to the communists let us be sure that we maintain our moral position, and that we remember our obligation to those hundreds of millions of people now enslaved who should have the right to state what kind of government they want under a free vote fully supervised by all the members of the United Nations through their appointed body.

This debate will terminate very shortly, Mr. Speaker, and before it concludes there are two things which I hope the Prime Minister will undertake to do. First I hope he will give an unqualified undertaking that there will be no further trafficking in arms such as we have discovered through the disclosures of the past two weeks; and second, we should have the assurance that there will be no recognition of communist China until the subject has been brought before this parliament and fully debated in a proper democratic manner.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege. In view of the importance of this debate, and in view of the fact that the rules have permitted several speeches to be made without a time limit, I wonder if consideration could be given by the house under the direction of the Prime Minister to adding another day to the debate—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Knowles: —in order that some of the many members, including Liberals, who would like to speak might have an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, having spoken already in this debate and having no intention of speaking again in it, I should like to support that suggestion. I believe this is one of the most important debates we have had, and I doubt if we will have a more important debate. It has been made important by a number of the matters brought forward, and I think there would be approval both inside the house and outside of it if a continuation of this debate were approved.

Mr. Speaker: In order not to take the time which remains in case the decision should be contrary to that which is being proposed, may I suggest that this matter be dealt with through the usual channels.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of speaking now, in view of the long statement that has been made by the Leader of the Opposition to which I should reply, and in view of the somewhat challenging suggestion—although it was a friendly challenge—made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) that this debate should not end without hearing again from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am very glad to have the opportunity of meeting his wishes in that regard.

I should first say something, Mr. Speaker, about the matter which was dealt with by the Leader of the Opposition in the last part of his speech, namely the situation in regard to our relationship with communist China. He has asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to give a specific assurance that no action will be taken in regard to the recognition of that government without an opportunity being provided for parliamentary debate.

No doubt the Prime Minister will deal with that matter in due course but I would ask the Leader of the Opposition what we are doing now if we are not debating the subject of recognition of the communist government of China. He has just debated it at some length, and I mentioned it yesterday. He has also debated it on other occasions in this house. In spite of all our discussions, as I said yesterday and as the Leader of the Opposition affirmed this afternoon, it remains a difficult, complicated and controversial question. It is not wise to be dogmatic in regard to it.

The Leader of the Opposition is himself a very good proof of the difficulty of coming to dogmatic conclusions in regard to this matter because he himself—and I am not criticizing him for it—has found it difficult as others may have also, to adopt a strictly consistent course in his public utterances as to what should or should not be done.

An hon. Member: What about you?

Mr. Pearson: On June 6, 1955 as reported in the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph, the Leader of the Opposition in a press interview said:

> Of red China, Mr. Drew said it should never be admitted to the United Nations.

"Never" is a pretty irrevocable word, Mr. Speaker. In Vancouver on September 21, 1955, he said, as reported in the Vancouver Daily Province:

> There is no point talking about red China getting into the U.N. when there are other nations we have refused.

At Quebec last June he is reported as having said, and I think this is a very true statement—

Mr. Drew: I was not in Quebec last June.

An hon. Member: Where did you get that?

Mr. Pearson: Well, I have before me an article from the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph dated June 6, 1955—

Mr. Drew: I am sorry; I correct that statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, yes.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, it is easy to forget these little details.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make it clear that when I made that interjection I was reminded of the debate that was taking place here and I recall I took a week end off in Quebec at that time.

An hon. Member: To go fishing?

Mr. Pearson: On that occasion, and I certainly do not quarrel with this statement, he said:

> It is a debatable question whether or not it (red China) should be recognized.

It is a debatable question, and we gave our views concerning it yesterday.

In September, 1955, in Vancouver, in a statement to the Victoria Canadian Club, the Victoria Daily Colonist reports the Leader of the Opposition as having told his audence:

> He believed the time for recognition and admission to the U.N. of red China was not here yet.

He is also reported in this press statement of that date as having said:

> Trade with red China should be on a practical business basis, not on a diplomatic level.

I am not quarreling with these statements this afternoon. It is not an easy question on which to come to definite conclusions, and it is certainly not wise in discussing it to use the word "never".

Mr. Drew: Nor has it been used.

Mr. Pearson: There were, however, three points raised yesterday in the statement I made about China which were pretty definite; and while we have heard a good deal from hon. gentlemen opposite about recognition, we have heard nothing from any of them in regard to those two statements which did lay down a declaration of government policy on which it would be very helpful indeed to have the views of hon. members opposite.

One was a declaration of non-intervention in the dispute for the possession of the offshore islands between the mainland of China and Formosa. There has been no statement that I recall made in this debate about the attitude of the opposition toward that matter. The second was that we had no commitments in regard to Formosa except those which would arise out of our membership in the United Nations. I have heard nothing about that. The third was that the status in regard to Formosa should be separated from that in regard to continental China. That is an important point about which we have heard nothing from the other side. As my hon. friend has interjected already, there is a very important difference of opinion on that. As a matter of fact about the only thing on which the two Chinese governments are united is that Formosa or Taiwan does belong to China.

I am not going to say anything more on this subject because I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house. In any event the amendment does not deal with China; the amendment deals with something else, arms shipments to the Middle East. In so far as the official opposition is concerned the debate has ranged largely around that particular question.

In the debate and in the attacks that have been made on the government in regard to this matter some hard words have been used in describing government policy, such as confusion, delay, inaccuracy, fumbling, forgetfulness and words of that kind. I suggest that some of those words could very well be applied to the statements made in regard to this matter by hon. members opposite. I shall give one or two examples in order to justify that assertion.

It has been said, for instance, not only in the previous discussion of this matter but this afternoon, that the delay on my part in replying to the original question was unseemly and probably deliberate because it was so long. I had the first question on this matter on Wednesday. As I said the other day, the reply was ready by Friday but other questions had been asked in the meantime. On Friday I was asked not to give the reply on Monday because the hon. member who had asked the question would not be in the house. I gave the answer on Tuesday. Is that any cause for suspicion as to the intentions of the government?

There have been suggestions of confusion and inaccuracy. Let me give a good example of such from the statement made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I had been discussing the question raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), of the equalization of visits between Egypt and Israel. But the hon. member for Kamloops referred to that as though we had stated that our policy was the equalization of arms shipments between Israel and Egypt. There could hardly be a more inaccurate representation of a discussion in the house than that.

Now I come to inaccuracy in figures. We have a statement that shipments of arms to Israel in the last two years amounted to $2,800,000. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) had the list before him and all he had to do was to look at it to see that he was about 25 to 30 per cent incorrect.

The fact is that in connection with this matter of arms shipments all the information asked for has been given. More information in regard to this particular question of arms shipments has been given than is the case in Washington or London. There was a debate on this matter in the United Kingdom the other day. My hon. friends opposite are very often, and rightly so, keen to point to the example of the mother of parliaments in respect of procedures which could well be followed here. In that arms debate in the United Kingdom the minister responsible said that no details could be given because it was contrary to all practice to disclose what was going from government to government in the way of arms shipments.

It is also a fact that our controls are as strict as if not stricter than those of other countries. It is also a fact that exports are very carefully watched, and the figures that have been given publicly indicate that practically nothing has gone to any Middle East country since the deterioration of the position last July. The figures show that in the last two years the total shipments of arms and equipment to all parts of the world except NATO countries and those commonwealth countries which are not sensitive areas totalled under $6 million.

I know this debate has concentrated on this question of arms shipments. A more important feature is the question of policy in regard to this matter. Here the issue is clear, very clear indeed. We are quite happy on this side to stand our ground on the difference in policy that has come into the open in the amendment submitted by the official opposition. In regard to arms shipments that issue of policy is clear. I confess that I was not able to understand, however, what the issue is between us in regard to the Middle East problems generally. I shall come to that a little later and endeavour to show that the proposals put forward by hon. members opposite in that regard really make confusion more confounded. They deserve some of the words we have heard used so often during this discussion.

As to arms shipments, the policy as laid down in the amendment is clear. If I can read English at all it advocates a complete embargo on the shipment of arms to all Middle East countries not members of NATO, to Arab countries as well as to Israel. As was pointed out by my hon. friends opposite yesterday, that part of the world is now an area of tension.

Indeed the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) would go further than the amendment of his own party, when he advocated in his statement last night a complete embargo against shipments to all such areas of tension except commonwealth areas, NATO areas and those with which we have a definite alliance. Those were the words he used, "a definite alliance".

That is perfectly clear; that makes it clear beyond any doubt what the intention of this amendment must be. The proposal of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in effect means a refusal to sell any equipment to certain countries, not only Egypt and Israel but to certain countries in the Baghdad pact or in the SEATO pact, two collective security systems which are being developed against aggression and which the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich rightly called, in the case of the Baghdad pact, a "defensive grouping."

Is that the policy of my hon. friends opposite? Is that the policy of their party? If so, it is not the policy of this government.

However, the amendment itself does not go so far as that. It would have the effect, and I am quite certain that this is the only interpretation that could reasonably be placed upon it, of putting an embargo on the shipment of arms to either side of the struggle in the Middle East, to the Arab states or to Israel.

This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition stated very vigorously indeed that the refusal to ship arms to Israel at this time would not hurt Israel. I ask him to get in touch with the government of Israel to find out what that government is saying about the importance of arms shipments, or to learn about the requests which have been made to governments in the world by the government of Israel for defensive equipment. Then I wonder if he will come to the same conclusion, that an embargo on arms shipments to Israel at this time to Israel would not hurt that country.

The reason given for this amendment, and the reason for this policy of stopping shipments, is that this area which I have just mentioned is one of tension. Indeed it is one of tension, and it is even one of danger. The area of Palestine and the surrounding countries, as I tried to point out the other day, has been one of tension since Israel was established, since the very first day the state of Israel was set up. Indeed, the tension has never been as great as it probably was in those early days when Israel was fighting for its new existence. There has been no peace there at any time since the United Nations sponsored state was formed. There has never at best been anything but an uneasy armistice, when one side has expressed its determination to try to destroy the other.

It follows, then, that if this policy which is now advocated, that is an embargo on shipments to this area as an area of tension, had been adopted by other countries during these years, Israel would have been extinguished almost before it had come to life. I am sure no hon. member in the house would desire that result to be achieved, and that is certainly one important reason why the government will not support any amendment of this kind.

The hon. member for Prince Albert said yesterday afternoon, and I am sure he was quite sincere when he said it, "I believe with all my heart that the state of Israel should be preserved." I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the policy embodied in the amendment would have been a very bad way indeed to preserve it in the past or, indeed, to preserve it in the future. The effect of this policy, if it were adopted by other countries as well as ourselves, would simply be this. The communist countries could keep on sending modern arms and equipment to one side and the countries of the free world would be prevented from sending arms to the other side.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question? He has been very fair. In tonight's Ottawa Journal there is a dispatch from Washington indicating that President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Eden discussed today the possibility of using United Nations forces in demilitarized zones along the Arab-Israeli frontiers, and suggesting that Canada and the Netherlands may be in favour of the suggestion I made yesterday, namely the formation of such a force. Is that a fact?

Mr. Pearson: I was going to come to that in the latter part of my statement when I deal with other matters than arms shipments to that area. I quote also what the hon. member for Prince Albert said yesterday, that the people of Israel are a dedicated people, as indeed they are. If they were not a dedicated people they would not have been able to do what they have done in that land of Palestine. But I do suggest with all respect that if the policy set out in the amendment had prevailed over recent years they would have been dedicated to destruction. I can think of no greater encouragement to aggression than the knowledge that communist arms can go to one side without restriction or restraint, and that all the rest of us in the free world by self-denying ordinance would not send anything to the other side.

In case they think I am misrepresenting the policy of the official opposition, and I want to be very fair about this, I should like to quote again what the hon. member for Prince Albert said yesterday when he seemed to introduce a kind of reservation into his earlier observations. He said, as found at page 722 of Hansard:

> If conditions worsen there—

Not if they get better but if they worsen.

> —we can change our policy.

Well, how? What was he referring to? Apparently he was referring to the shipment of arms, because later in the same part of his speech he said, as found on page 723:

> If conditions got worse and war broke out, then conditions as to the shipment of munitions would change . . .

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, they would change, but it would be too late for the change to be made effective to help the state of Israel. I repeat that this is not our policy. Because we have sent some surplus equipment to Israel over recent years and turned down more requests, because we have sent in ten years three Harvard training aircraft to Egypt with twelve more on order, we are accused—and I repeat the phrase with regret—of "despicable dealings"; we are referred to—and I also repeat the phrase with regret—as following a policy which makes us merchants of death.

It is also stated by the hon. member for Prince Albert that in following this policy of carefully controlled shipments the government has removed the most potent weapon in Canada's arsenal of democracy, the moral weapon. Having been toppled in this way from morality we can no longer criticize the Soviet union. I was asked if I dared rise in my place in the light of this policy and criticize the Soviet union. Well, I do dare, Mr. Speaker, and I shall take advantage of the opportunity when the occasion arises. We are also told, however, that having been toppled from this position of morality we should now go and offer our services to both sides as conciliator and mediator. If we have lost our moral position in this matter, so has the United Kingdom, the United States, France and the other free countries. So has everybody but the Conservative opposition opposite.

The United Kingdom policy in this matter was disclosed in the house at Westminster the other day, in a debate to which I have referred, by the new minister of defence there. He gave figures, but not figures related to countries and areas as we have done. He did not mention categories or types of weapons, but gave total figures. He said that since 1956 £600 million worth of military equipment, exclusive of naval vessels, had been shipped and that during the last few years they had been going out at the rate of £90 million a year. This is the government that was headed by Sir Winston Churchill until recently and is now headed by the prime minister whom we are so happy to welcome here Friday. Has that government lost its moral position, or has the government of President Eisenhower which has followed the same policy in this matter? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that to ask the question is to answer it.

Our policy, then, is not based on the policy of this amendment. Our policy is based on the tripartite declaration of the three powers made in 1950, the three powers with special responsibilities in this area, responsibilities which we are not asked to share because we have not now and have not had the same interest in that area that they have. That tripartite declaration in respect of arms shipments reads as follows:

> The three governments—
> The United Kingdom, the United States and France.
> —recognize that the Arab states and Israel all need to maintain a certain level of armed forces for the purposes of assuring their internal security and their legitimate self-defence and to permit them to play their part in the defence of the area as a whole. All applications for arms or war material for these countries will be considered in the light of these principles. In this connection the three governments wish to recall and reaffirm the terms of statements made and responsibilities on the security council on the 4th of August, 1949, in which they declared their opposition to the development of an arms race between the Arab states and Israel.

That statement of policy has been reaffirmed recently by the government of the United Kingdom and also by the leader of the opposition in the United Kingdom parliament, Mr. Gaitskell. Although he criticized the government of the United Kingdom very bitterly on some aspects of that policy he ended his criticism by saying this the other day:

> We must uphold the balance theory in qualitative terms, not allowing either side to be in a position where they could not buy equally modern equipment.

The same position was reaffirmed by the secretary of state of the United States on January 25 last when he said:

> We still adhere basically to the principles of that 1950 declaration . . .

That is our policy also, Mr. Speaker, and we will continue to put it into effect with care, with every anxiety and, indeed, every determination not to send arms to that area of a type and in a quantity that can add fuel to the flames that are, I admit, raging there. The figures for the last three or four months would indicate that that policy is being carried out. The alternative is to cut ourselves off from the policy of all the governments of the western world, try to persuade them to do the same thing if it is such a highly moral policy, and allow the Russians to send arms there without restriction or restraint.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those three countries are bound by a declaration.

Mr. Pearson: I now want to deal with the other side of the question, namely the political side. It is related to but is even more important than the question of arms policy, because it deals with ways and means of establishing peace in that area.

Yesterday the hon. member for Prince Albert—I think it was he—said that we must face this problem, that is the problem of securing peace in the area, courageously and manfully. Just for a moment I want to look at some of the suggestions the opposition have made which would carry out that wise injunction. The hon. member then went on to say—and I think I am quoting him correctly; he also referred to this matter a moment ago when he interrupted me—that we should set up an international force to protect and assure the boundaries. What boundaries? There are no boundaries established in that part of the world now except under the armistice agreement; and the Arab states have been firm in their determination not to accept those boundaries which have not yet been finally and formally ratified at a peace conference. Hence any guarantee of the existing boundaries would have to be done against the will and in the face of the opposition of the Arab states.

Surely my hon. friend does not wish us to guarantee boundaries against one party to the dispute through the operation of an international police force which might, in certain circumstances, include Canadians as well as other members of the United Nations. I suggest that would not be a realistic way of assisting in the restoration of peace in that area. But a police force under the armistice commission, to keep the forces apart while a peace solution is being sought, to patrol a zone between the forces is something else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is the same thing.

Mr. Pearson: As I said the other day, I have had talks with the leaders of the Arab governments and the Israel government, and I had talks with General Burns when I was out there and at the United Nations. I think there is a great deal to be said for trying to bring that kind of police force into existence in this disturbed area at this time as a provisional measure to keep the armies apart while peace can be secured. If that proposal were made—and I know the Secretary General has been considering it, and from press reports to which my hon. friend has referred I understand that it has been discussed in Washington in the last few days—and if it became a matter for United Nations consideration, I am sure this country as well as other countries would want to do what they could to carry it into effect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister goes on from there, would he answer a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not the touchy sensibilities of some of these interrupters. The question I want to ask the minister is this. Does Canada along with the Netherlands intend to undertake such action, which is similar to what I suggested yesterday?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there has been no proposal of the kind made to this government. I do not know about the Netherlands government, but if and when a proposal of that kind is made to us, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that it will be given serious and sympathetic consideration by the government. But obviously I should not be expected to state what the position of the government would be in respect of a proposal which has not been made and which has appeared only this afternoon in the press.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) also discussed this question of a guarantee against aggression. He said that we should join in the kind of guarantee that was embodied in Mr. Dulles' statement last summer and Sir Anthony Eden's statement in November at a Guildhall banquet in London. He also mentioned the tripartite declaration. The tripartite declaration of 1950 has something to say about this matter. One paragraph of it reads as follows:

> The three governments take this opportunity of declaring their deep interest in and their desire to promote the establishment and maintenance of peace and stability in the area and their unalterable opposition to the use of force or the threat of force between any of the states in that area. The three governments, should they find that any of these states are preparing to violate frontiers or armistice lines, would consistently with their obligations as members of the United Nations immediately take action both within and outside the United Nations to prevent such violation.

As I have said, that paragraph has recently been reaffirmed both by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Secretary of State of the United States. In this regard Mr. Dulles only the other day—and by the other day I mean the statement he made some weeks ago in Washington—said this:

> If other related problems could be solved, the United States would be disposed to join formal treaty arrangements to guarantee Israeli-Arab borders; he hoped that other countries would join in the guarantee and that it would be sponsored by the United Nations.

He then went on to say that permanent borders must be negotiated and some adjustments would be necessary before they would enter into a guarantee of that kind. In November last Sir Anthony Eden also said this:

> The United Kingdom would also participate in a guarantee of Israeli-Arab borders which were drawn as a result of a negotiated settlement.

That is a different thing than taking part in a guarantee of borders which have not been negotiated as the result of a peace settlement. Even this kind of an offer was not taken up at the time it was made, as I recall it, by either side to the dispute out there. But, Mr. Speaker, we have already supported that principle in public. I have already stated that we should rally around and support this approach to the problem made by Sir Anthony Eden and by Mr. Dulles without, of course, subscribing to all the details of the statements they made at that time.

I said something about this matter in the house on January 24. Indeed, I devoted a good deal of attention to the principles which should underlie a peace settlement in that area, which is by far the most important aspect of this whole question. To hon. members opposite who have brought this matter up for discussion I suggest they should have another look at that statement. But that kind of guarantee of borders of a state resulting from a peace settlement is a very different thing than the policy enunciated by my hon. friend opposite yesterday and by my other hon. friends who preceded him. To ask us, as my hon. friend did last evening, before a peace settlement has been reached, to let it be known that we will send troops to that area if the armistice is broken and war breaks out, to make that pledge now is in my opinion completely unrealistic. I suggest that this government would be extremely unwise to give a pledge now that if war broke out in that area in any circumstances, if the armistice were broken, we would send troops to fight there.

If that sort of thing happens it is a matter for the United Nations, which should act swiftly and effectively. It is a matter principally for the big powers who have the most important interests in that area. As was said by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, if that kind of swift international action cannot be taken, and if some kind of international planning to prevent that action cannot be taken now, then the outlook for peace in that area is not too bright. But as I said the other day, I feel that the leaders of the governments there do not want war and that, in view of that feeling, with strong action on the part of the United Nations and the international community to avoid it, war can be prevented. I think our record on this subject in the past is sufficient evidence that we shall play our full part in any United Nations action of that kind, and that we shall do our full duty in that respect.

Now, before I sit down I want to say just one word about the C.C.F. subamendment. It repeats part of the official opposition amendment, that part of it which we cannot possibly support because it is contrary to the policy which has been adopted by and still remains as the policy of our friends who are doing their best to settle this problem. We cannot, therefore, support the first part of the amendment. The subamendment says that after the word "alliance" the following words should be added:

> Without at the same time making sure that peace in that area would be guaranteed either by the United Nations or by the powers that signed the tripartite agreement of 1950, namely the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, that the effect of this subamendment would be to effectively prevent any help going to any country in that area until these conditions were met, even if there were threats by aggression. It would have, I think, the same effect as the amendment itself, because I do not see how we as a government could take the responsibility of refusing to take action which we might think wise in the circumstances unless we had already made sure that peace in that area was guaranteed by the United Nations or some other governments.

While I appreciate the spirit behind this amendment, and while I agree that the United Nations and the three powers concerned should take action in that sense, I do not think it would be wise to tie that subamendment to the official opposition amendment, and we cannot support it for that reason. Certainly we can have nothing to do with the amendment itself which would run counter to what we think is a wise, careful and constructive policy in this whole matter.

Mr. Pearkes: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. A few moments ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the figures that I had given regarding the cost of equipment were inaccurate, and were at least 30 per cent wrong. On page 741 of Hansard for January 31, 1956, after enumerating the equipment which had been sent to Egypt and to Israel, I said that the total came to $2,800,000. It was that figure which the minister said was inaccurate.

The only source of information I had regarding the cost of this equipment was the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself, which is found on page 466 of Hansard for January 24, 1956. These are the figures which I took. The figures for the two years were $2,067,685.19 for Israel and $771,121 for Egypt. If one adds those two figures together the total is $2,838,806. If I was inaccurate, if my figures were 30 per cent wrong, they were the figures which were given by the minister.

Mr. Pearson: I would not like the hon. gentleman to think I deliberately accused him of inaccuracy unless I had some evidence to support my statement. There may be some misunderstanding, but let me read, because I think it is right that it should be on the record, what he said. On page 741 of Hansard he began a paragraph by saying, "Then"—He had been talking about shipments to Egypt and then he went on:

Then, Israel had been sent anti-tank equipment; 75-millimeter shells; tracks and spare parts for tanks.

He went on to itemize the equipment, and then there was this sentence:

The total came to over $2,800,000—

Naturally he was talking about shipments to Israel.

Mr. Pearkes: No, no.

Mr. Pearson: If my hon. friend says he was talking not about Israel, as mentioned in that paragraph, but about Egypt with which he had dealt in the previous paragraph, and intended to cover both, then it is entirely accurate. If it is read as I think it should be read in relation to Israel, then there is a mistake.

Mr. Pearkes: I would just say I was not reading my speech and I did not paragraph it. I am certainly not responsible for the paragraphing. However, "total" means but one thing and I had made no break in the description I had given.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I feel rather in the position of someone who has come in to add a postscript to a letter that has already been written. It will be, I hope, a modest postscript and perhaps avoid some of the colour that has crept into the main body of the discussion.

I have no wish to associate myself with the rather extravagant descriptions of government ineptitude we have heard from this side of the house. I cannot help thinking that to have the opportunity of earning the dramatic and colourful title of "merchant of death" at such a cheap rate as our government apparently has is almost an irresistible opportunity. I believe we have to place this on a more pedestrian basis. I believe also that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to be reminded that this matter arose over a very small shipment of arms, not to the state of Israel about which he expressed such concern a few moments ago, but to one of the possible aggressors against the state of Israel.

I think we have to look realistically at this situation. I cannot for the life of me reconcile two of the statements the minister made within the last half hour. On the one hand, Mr. Speaker, he denounced the suggestion of the official opposition that Canada should be prepared to send forces to guarantee the existing boundaries between the Arab states and Israel without having primarily some indication of what the great powers, who have a greater interest there, are prepared to do. He said that on the one hand, but then dealing with the subamendment that came from this group he told us he could not support that because it meant that we would have to wait until a decision had been made by the United Nations or by the great powers, and that therefore it would hamper our opportunity to take independent action if we thought fit to do so.

There are some inescapable facts with regard to the situation of Israel. One has been mentioned in this house, and that is the disparity in numbers between the inhabitants of Israel and inhabitants of the surrounding Arab states, a disparity of 30 to 1. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, we are deluding ourselves if we imagine that by arming the state of Israel, to the limited extent that Canada could arm her or even to a much greater extent, we could help Israel overcome that initial disparity.

I am well aware, sir, of the ominous, in fact one might almost say sinister, parallel that can be drawn between the present condition in which Israel finds herself and the condition in which the republic of Spain found itself in 1936. I suggest that analogy could be stretched too far; that there was an opportunity, had there been shipments of arms into Spain, for that country to have resisted the forces brought against it. I suggest there is no such opportunity offered today for the state of Israel.

Therefore the subamendment we have moved to the Conservative amendment is a valid attempt to place this on a realistic basis. The only security the state of Israel can hope for must be a security based on guarantees and action by the United Nations or by the tripartite powers. For Canada to dabble even to the extent to which she has dabbled in the sale of arms to either side is not going to improve Israel's final position, but may very well muddy the waters there which should be clarified by United Nations action. It is for that reason that we in this group are hoping that the Conservative opposition—though this hope is very doubtful since the speech of the Leader of the Opposition—will accept our sub-amendment to their amendment and place this whole situation on a realistic basis.

I am not unmindful of the position of Israel, particularly as a member of this group; for there is no group in this house that has closer ties with the state of Israel than this group. The philosophy that motivates the government of Israel is very much akin to the philosophy that motivates this particular group in this house, and for that reason we are even more closely and personally concerned with the fate of the state of Israel than are others in this chamber. I think we shall be serving not the cause of Israel but the cause of world conflagration unless we formulate our policy on the grounds of United Nations action and guarantees in that area.

It is all very well to say that the boundaries have not been finally drawn. There is only one body under whose aegis those boundaries can be finally drawn, and that is the United Nations. I would hope that this government would pursue some of the conversations that were hinted at this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and not attempt to play a not important and perhaps extremely irritating role in the way of shipping arms to the Near East.

An hon. Member: The honest broker.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The honest broker, as an hon. member to my right suggests. I have an idea that in the case of arms there are not very many honest brokers. I think we had better devote our attention to being honest negotiators and an honest pressure group with the United Nations seeking a final solution to this problem.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with a wider range of our policy than is represented by the particular sore spot in the Middle East which the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out to us. Other nations have a greater interest there than we have. We have interests in other parts of the world that are perhaps just as serious as those in the Middle East.

Not long ago, sir, I was reading a recent biography of Canada's first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald. I was struck with the immense, in fact gigantic strides this country has made along the path toward recognition as an independent power speaking for herself in the world in the 89 years since this nation was established. Perhaps the measure of that lengthy travel can be found in the contrast between our situation in 1880, only 76 years ago and within the lifetime of many Canadians now living, when our first prime minister succeeded in establishing in London over the opposition of a very reluctant British government the first official representative of Canada abroad, and our position today when we have a chain of embassies and legations stretching throughout the world, dealing with all, or almost all, of the other nations of the globe.

But during the time we have been reaching that position, other changes have been taking place. Just at the time Canada has reached the position where she can speak and deal independently with other nations on her own initiative, the relative importance of those other nations has been declining, and declining for a very simple reason: the simple reason being that unhappily enough the world continues in a situation in which the final card in the game of international relations still remains the resort to arms.

Small powers and middle-sized nations in the world are aware that in the event of that catastrophe overwhelming the world, each of them must find its place in the train of one or other of the giant powers. We all know that. We know something else, too, in Canada. We know that in that event Canada is irretrievably committed to the United States side in any quarrel, both for motives of self-interest and inclination. I imagine that the close bonds between Canada and the United States in the form of a common language, a common political inheritance and largely integrated economies must appear more striking to those outside of North America than they are to those who dwell on this continent.

I think that creates a situation for which we should be profoundly grateful, because there can be no illusions in the minds either of our potential allies or of our potential enemies that it is possible to break that partnership in North America, and it affords us therefore an opportunity to speak bluntly and plainly when we consider that United States policy is mistaken or dangerous without in any way endangering those solid links on which our partnership is based. I feel we are very fortunate in that this partnership is founded on such solid foundations, and not on the rather precarious basis of treaties or formal alliances.

But I sometimes wonder whether we have not fallen victim to the rather adolescent wish to be loved by everyone. When I hear the ministers and other members of the house pointing with pride to the immense respect in which Canada is held throughout the world, I cannot help wondering whether we have fallen victim to the wish to be the little friend of all the world. I should like to remind the government of Canada that we all know the fate of the man who seeks always to avoid giving annoyance to anybody. He winds up by exasperating everybody. I have in mind a number of cases in which it seems to me that this rather immature desire to be approved and loved has hampered the conduct of our external affairs.

The first of these I want to deal with is the one that was dealt with at some length this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition, namely the question of our relationship with the de facto government of China. I think all of us have known since last year, following the return of the Prime Minister from his world trip, that the Prime Minister and his colleagues are fully aware of and fully awake to the realities of the situation. They have realized that we must eventually face facts, however much we may dislike them.

After the Prime Minister spoke in this chamber—and I may say he spoke in a most forthright manner—on this subject, there could be no doubt in our minds as to where he stood, and in all probability where his colleagues stood, on this vexed question. They knew. They know today that eventually this has to be done.

Now, I wonder—I am not able to say; I have no means of knowing—just what are the considerations that prevents our government following the dictates of its own analysis of the situation and its own common sense. I am reminded that at the present time, probably this very afternoon, in the city of Washington, Sir Anthony Eden is in the process of having conversations with the President and the Secretary of State of the United States. It is reported that one of the matters that will be discussed is this vexed question of the recognition of red China. Despite what the Leader of the Opposition had to say earlier this afternoon, I have seen no indication in any published statements by members of the present British government that they are at all inclined to reverse the action taken by their predecessors in office. I have, on the other hand, through the reading of British periodicals of all political flavours, reached the conclusion that the British government and the British people are impatient with the irrational approach to this question of our United States friends and I am sure that Sir Anthony Eden today would be extremely grateful if in his dealings with the United States authorities he had behind him a forthright declaration on the part of the Canadian government.

I was surprised this afternoon to hear the Leader of the Opposition suggest that recognition of China would be a very bad bargain. I thought it was rather a commercial basis on which to put our decision on this question. I gather that if we were able to sell unlimited quantities of wheat to red China we would be prepared to overlook their immoralities. I do not like to put it on that basis. I like to put it on the basis of the actual facts in the world today.

I was very struck last year when in Ottawa I accepted the invitation of one of the other Asian governments—a friendly government—to attend a showing of pictures of the Bandung conference. I was particularly struck, as I am sure were any hon. members who attended, by the way in which the commentator commented on the arrival of each delegate to that conference. There were a number of delegates there from smaller countries not represented in the United Nations, and in announcing each of them the commentator said, "The delegate for such and such a country, representing so many people not represented in the United Nations". Finally, of course, the representative of China arrived and with particular emphasis the commentator, who was acting as a spokesman for this friendly government, emphasized this fact by announcing the representative of the republic of China, representing 400 million people not represented in the United Nations.

Those are some of the facts in the matter we had better keep in mind when we talk about capturing the support of the uncommitted areas of the world. We have to remember that due to our past deplorable conduct—and I am speaking now of us as a white race—all the actions of the white race are objects of the deepest suspicion to the peoples of Asia. Coupled with their impatience at the refusal to recognize the de facto government of China as such, there will also be the gnawing feeling in the back of their minds that one of the reasons we treat those 400 million so cavalierly is that they are not members of the now declining dominant race of the world.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should add that I quite agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that any decision we make with regard to communist China must not be taken as covering the situation with regard to Formosa. I have an idea that perhaps the Formosan people will look with an equally jaundiced eye upon Mr. Chou En-lai and Mr. Chiang Kai-shek, and will quite likely wish to decide their own future by themselves. I feel that should be made quite clear before any question of the recognition of China comes formally before the United Nations. It should also be made clear that the people of Formosa should be left under the United Nations aegis to decide their own fate.

There is another matter in which it seems to me the government has failed to take advantage of this unique relationship we have with our largest neighbour. It is a matter which I and several other hon. members have raised repeatedly at intervals during the past few years. That is the question of the continuation of the thermonuclear tests in the Pacific.

It appears to be pretty well established that these tests are unnecessary as a means of adding in any material way to the military strength of the west. As one rather caustic physicist put it, "They have enough now to blow up the whole world. Do they also want to blow up Mars?" I am aware, of course, that one of the excuses given for the continuation of the tests is that they provide valuable data with regard to defence against such weapons. I take leave to doubt the validity of that argument, because any data gathered in the far Pacific is not going to be particularly applicable to the case of a bomb dropped on a major city in North America.

There is also another question which I think our government should be considering in this connection. These tests constitute a definite breach of article 73 of the charter of the United Nations, which imposes upon member nations who are in control of non-self-governing territories, including trusteeship territories, the obligation that the interests of the inhabitants shall be paramount. That is the undertaking of a member nation who takes charge of a trusteeship territory. I think we all remember that the unfortunate inhabitants of this area have already placed their protests before the United Nations. I think it is regrettable that in this instance Canada has not taken steps to bring this matter forcibly to the attention of the United States, Great Britain and the U.S.S.R.

I know, of course, the argument is that perhaps the Russians will not agree to it. Good and well; nothing could be a greater diplomatic victory to the west than the refusal on the part of the Soviet union to agree to the cancellation of these tests. We are also told that they might agree but they would continue the tests anyway. Quite possibly; but in the present stage of development of monitoring devices that would be impossible without becoming common knowledge throughout the world, and the Russians would again suffer a diplomatic defeat. I think this is another case where apparently we are suffering from the adolescent attitude of not wanting to be nasty to our friends, not wanting to irritate them or to cause them embarassment.

In the few minutes left at my disposal I want to deal with another aspect of our foreign policy, and that is the link that inevitably exists between our foreign policy and our defence policy. It is almost impossible to separate the two, as we have noted in the course of the debate so far. I have referred to the unconditional manner in which we are committed to the United States. In nothing is this more definite than in the question of the defence of North America, but I think we must take a serious look at our capacity to contribute to that defence today.

I do not often find myself in agreement with Mr. John Foster Dulles, but on the occasion he told us that there is no defence to thermonuclear attack except the fear of massive retaliation I found myself in complete agreement. I presume that Mr. Dulles was voicing the opinion of his military advisers when he made that statement. Where does that leave us in Canada? Just how far can we go in making a contribution to massive retaliatory action against a thermonuclear attack.

Here again I think we perhaps need to grow up. We have to realize that we must make a sober estimate of our capacity in that regard. Remember that we are in an extremely different position today than we were in the first world war or even during the second world war, when it was possible in the then state of military development for a small power to make a useful contribution to a joint effort. A few more divisions, even though they might be small in comparison with the total effort, was that much more additional power. A few more air squadrons, even though they might not constitute more than a fraction of the total air power engaged, would increase the striking power of the air force.

Today we face an entirely different proposition. We face the sort of thing that is going on in the United States today. If we are having delusions of grandeur about being able to play in this game I would refer the house to recent articles which have appeared in United States periodicals about the crash program in connection with guided missiles. The United States are reported as spending $5 billion on this one aspect of defence, and I suggest that is too big a poker game for Canada to be able to buy chips.

We can contribute geography, and we can do something else. We can divert our enormous resources from their present dubious defence uses to the production of capital goods for those areas in the world which are at the present time uncommitted. We are not going to accomplish that by an increase of $9 million, $10 million or $29 million in our contribution to the Colombo plan. We are in a race for time. I would suggest that Canada's most significant role in foreign affairs today would be to gear her economy in large measure to the provision of that aid which may very well decide the battle in the uncommitted areas of the world.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to note that there is about half a minute left in which to deliver a speech which I had prepared. I am afraid that the speech will have to be put in cold storage.

I should like to use this remaining half minute to explain why we are going to vote the way we will vote. If I could have given my speech as planned I would have indicated that this group has no confidence in the present government's over-all policy in respect to external affairs, and if an amendment had been presented as a want of confidence amendment indicating that the government were somewhat insipid and wishful in dealing with communism on the international level, then certainly we would have voted for such an amendment.

However, the amendments deal with only one part of government policy, and must be analysed in that particular light. The Conservative amendment calls for—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five minutes to six o'clock p.m., pursuant to the order passed by the house I must interrupt the proceedings and put the questions.

Motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: May I just say that the business on Friday will be the business of last Friday.

It being twenty-three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS—PENSIONS

Question No. 15—Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired civil servants are receiving pensions of amounts within each of the following brackets: (a) less than $20 per month; (b) $20.00 to $29.99 per month; (c) $30.00 to $39.99 per month; (d) $40.00 to $49.99 per month; (e) $50.00 to $59.99 per month; (f) $60.00 to $69.99 per month; (g) $70.00 to $79.99 per month; (h) $80.00 to $89.99 per month; (i) $90.00 to $99.99 per month; (j) $100 per month and over?

2. How many widows of retired civil servants are receiving pensions of amounts within each of the brackets indicated in the above question?

Questions

EXCHANGES OF WHEAT

Question No. 49—Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many bushels of wheat, week by week, by provinces, have been exchanged under the recently announced policy whereby farmers may exchange good grades of wheat grown by them for low grades, or feed wheat, stored in local elevators?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

As reported to the board by handling companies to January 21, 1956, the bushels of wheat exchanged under board instructions to the trade No. 18 of November 18, 1955, were as follows:

Week Ending	Alberta	Saskatchewan	Manitoba
		(bushels)
Dec. 10, 1955 ...	8,021·1	238·5
Dec. 17, 1955 ...	4,000·4	484·0
Dec. 24, 1955 ...	2,707·8	1,400·0
Dec. 31, 1955 ...	3,197·0	197·0
Jan. 7, 1956	10,190·3	864·7	39·0
Jan. 14, 1956 ...	31,528·0	8,066·6	71·0
Jan. 21, 1956 ...	9,098·0	3,682·2	599·0
	68,742·6	14,933·0	709·0

ST. JEAN, QUEBEC, POST OFFICE

Question No. 62—Mr. Perron:

1. Have tenders been called for the building of a post office at St. Jean, Quebec?

2. If so, when were they advertised, and by what means?

3. What are the names of those submitting tenders and what was the amount of their respective tenders?

4. Who was awarded the contract and on what date?

Answer by: Mr. Pinard (for Mr. Winters):

1. Yes.

2. July 11, 1955, by public advertisement.

3.

Name	Lump Sum (Limestone)	Lump Sum (Granite)
Lemieux & Frere Inc., St. Jean, P.Q.	$503,987.00	$543,987.00
Methe Freres Engr Bedford, P.Q.	494,302.00	559,302.00

Chas. Duranceau, Ltd., Montreal, P.Q.	529,900.00	592,000.00

4. Contract awarded to low bidder on granite alternative, Lemieux & Frere Inc., St. Jean, P.Q., on December 19, 1955, after negotiations with him caused a reduction of his tender to $528,987.00.

Questions

POSTAL REVENUE INCREASE

Question No. 63—Mr. Perron:

During the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, what additional revenue was received from the increase in rates of postage under chapter 20 of the statutes of 1953-1954?

Answer by: Mr. Lapointe:

Postmasters do not record separately receipts for various classes of mail; indeed it is impossible to do so accurately since postage stamps sold may be used to prepay postage on any mailable item, letter, postcard, parcel, etc. However, from an examination of the mail stream it is estimated that during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, the additional revenue received from the increase in rates of postage under chapter 20 of the statutes of 1953-54 was $15,000,000.

MIDDLESEX COUNTY, ONT.—RURAL MAIL ROUTES

Question No. 67—Mr. White (Middlesex East):

1. How many rural mail routes have been extended in the county of Middlesex, in each of the years 1952-1955 inclusive?

2. What routes have been extended during that period?

3. What is the increased mileage in each route extended, during the above mentioned years?

4. How many rural mail couriers have received extra mileage pay for the increased mileage covered?

Answer by: Mr. Lapointe:

1. 1952, 1; 1953, 2; 1954, 5; 1955, 5.

2 and 3. 1952—Wilton Grove R.R. No. 1, 1·4 miles; 1953—Dorchester Station R.R. No. 1, ·8 mile; Lambeth R.R. No. 3, 1·0 mile; 1954—Arva R.R. No. 1, 1·6 miles; Dorchester Station R.R. No. 2, 1·6 miles; Mossley R.R. No. 2, ·8 mile; Thorndale R.R. No. 4, ·8 mile; Wilton Grove R.R. No. 2, 2·8 miles; 1955—Arva R.R. No. 1, 1·0 mile; Byron R.R. No. 1, 8·9 miles; Dorchester Station R.R. No. 1, 3·2 miles; Dorchester Station R.R. No. 2, 5·4 miles; Wilton Grove R.R. No. 1, ·4 mile.

4. All contractors of extended routes received additional payment at pro rata for the increased mileage.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 2, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT OF SIR ANTHONY EDEN—CHANGE IN HOURS OF SITTING ON FEBRUARY 6

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Sir Anthony Eden, will be arriving in Ottawa tomorrow afternoon. Arrangements have been made to have our distinguished guest address the members of both houses of parliament in this chamber at 2.30 o'clock on Monday afternoon. Because of these arrangements it will be necessary to delay the opening of the ordinary proceedings of the house until 4.30 o'clock on Monday. If I may have the unanimous consent of the house I should like to move:

That when this house adjourns tomorrow it stand adjourned until Monday next at 4.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

I understand that the ordinary tickets for the gallery have been cancelled for that occasion and special tickets have been distributed to the whips to be made available to the members of this house who wish to have guests attend the ceremony. It would be appreciated, of course, if all hon. members could be in their seats a few minutes before 2.30 in the afternoon.

We have all received from you, sir, a very kind invitation to attend in your chambers immediately after the ceremony to have the privilege of meeting with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd.

Mr. Knowles: Before the motion is put may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or the leader of the house? In view of the fact that Monday would normally be private members' day, is there not some arrangement that could be made so that the time lost might not be lost entirely by private members?

Mr. Harris: We can solve the problem immediately by saying it had been our intention, and still is, that we should move to go into supply on Monday.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—EXCHANGE OF PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

Mr. Speaker: On the subject matter of the exchange of visits by parliamentarians, I have received another communication from the Secretary of State which I have asked the Clerk to have mimeographed, and copies will be distributed to hon. members.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MINISTERIAL ORDER OF JULY 7

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the discussion that has already taken place concerning the possibility of further discussion on the matter, I would ask the Prime Minister if he would arrange to have the ministerial order of July 7 referring to the Harvard aircraft tabled so that it may be before the members of the house.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this matter has been fully canvassed and discussed—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —and full information has been given as to how that ministerial order was made. The only official document which is provided for by the statute is the export licence.

Mr. Drew: May I then ask the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, if he will have the export licence tabled which covered this particular order?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, that is a document which for other reasons it is not practicable to make public. All these documents dealing with individual transactions of commercial corporations are treated as confidential and are described as such in their form for purposes that are legitimately required by our industrialists who engage in competitive business.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I then ask the Prime Minister what document there is that can be placed before the house which will show what actually took place on July 7?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There is no document which can be placed before the house to show what actually took place on July 7. The hon. gentleman has been informed of how the matter was dealt with. It was dealt with by communications between ministers and those have invariably been regarded as confidential documents and have to be treated as confidential documents so that the ministers who are all jointly responsible for that which has been done, even under statute, by any one of them may see to it that they are properly informed of when and how they are going to have this joint responsibility.

Mr. Drew: In that case, Mr. Speaker, just to clarify it, may I ask the Prime Minister if the published list which is issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce covering aircraft is not in fact the full list of permits that are issued?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, I would have to look at that list. I must confess that I have not recently read any of those lists of permits that have been issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. I will have to look at that and then compare it with the other information that is available to me in order to be able to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, simply by way of explanation—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Drew: Simply by way of explanation I would point out that there is a record of permits issued and that there is one actually published—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —which shows two licences: one for an aircraft to Egypt and one for an aircraft to Arabia which are not included—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel I must interrupt the Leader of the Opposition with regret, but if I am to allow the debating of any one answer I will have to allow all hon. members to do so.

INQUIRY AS TO SECRECY OF EXPORT PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising out of some earlier questions in connection with the export permit mystery, would the Prime Minister state whether there are certain kinds of export permits covering aircraft and aircraft parts which are secret and others which are not secret, and what is the reason for the division between secret and non-secret?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): All export permits are treated as confidential documents for commercial reasons. They contain information with respect to commodities, prices of commodities, the source of supply, the firm dealing in those commodities, and for that reason these documents have always been treated as being confidential for the proper protection of those who are engaged in competitive business.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Prime Minister if that is the view taken by the government even where the purchase is made from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): From Crown Assets—

Mr. Fleming: Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, I would have to inquire whether those permits are in the same form. They are probably in fact treated as confidential but I do not know that they should be.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say, in view of his explanation a moment ago, that the export of arms and aircraft is now a competitive business in this country?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The export of aircraft parts is a competitive business in this country, but I do not think that the export of aircraft themselves could be regarded as a competitive business, not, at least, as between Canadian producers.

Mr. Drew: I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister in view of his last answer. If the sale of aircraft is not a competitive business, then why can the permit covering the export of Harvard planes not be produced?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): You had a bad day yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to interrupt whatever answer the Prime Minister wishes to make to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, but is it the view of hon. members that cross-examination should take place at this point? I do not make the rules but I want to make sure that I interpret them in the way that the majority of hon. members in all parties interpret them. In my view the purpose of our question period is to ask questions for the purpose of obtaining information, not for the purpose of debating a certain matter under the guise of several questions. That is what has been taking place for some time.

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR 25-POUNDER AMMUNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if the cabinet has reached a decision with regard to a request for 25-pounder ammunition which he said was placed before them some time ago?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, the matter is still before the cabinet.

Mr. Rowe: Confidential too, I guess.

REFERENCE TO EXPULSION OF U.S.S.R. OFFICIALS FROM SOUTH AFRICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister of peace—I mean the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister any comment to make on the outstanding action of the government of South Africa in expelling representatives of Russia because of their conduct?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make on that matter. However, I do admit I am glad, in view of the discussions of the last few days, to be called minister of peace.

Mr. Harkness: He meant piecemeal.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1954-55 CROP

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to announce a wheat payment, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian wheat board has recommended and the government today decided to authorize the board to make an interim payment in varying amounts on the higher grades of wheat delivered during the crop year 1954-55. The cheques will be mailed to producers as soon as they can be calculated and issued, probably about February 15.

The interim payment will be 10 cents per bushel on Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 northern and No. 4 special, including toughs and damps of those grades; 5 cents per bushel on Garnets; 25 cents per bushel on No. 1 to No. 4 Durums; 10 cents per bushel on the lower grades of Durum; 10 cents per bushel on soft white springs and 5 cents per bushel on certain minor grades. A full schedule of payments will be issued by the wheat board in the customary way. The full amount to be distributed to producers in this interim payment will be $22,300,000. Returns from the sale of feeding grades of wheat do not justify an interim payment on Nos. 5, 6 and feed wheat. I believe, however, that it will be possible to make a final payment on these grades when the pool is closed.

A final payment on the 1954-55 wheat pool account must await approval of the legislation now before the house with respect to the assumption of carrying charges on excessive wheat board stocks, as well as reduction in the size of this account to a level which would enable the balance to be transferred to the 1955-56 account.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question arising out of his very welcome announcement? Can the minister say whether it is his hope or intention that the final payment can be made in time to be in the farmers' hands before seeding?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I announced some time ago that I would discuss final payment when the legislation now on the order paper had been passed. I had thought that would be a much shorter period than now appears probable. I now understand that the bill is to be filibustered.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question? Will the minister consider discussing with the leader of the house the possibility of calling first tomorrow the item having to do with storage in the hope that it can be passed tomorrow?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, Mr. Speaker. We have undertaken to pass a very simple resolution, and until that is passed we are not prepared to take any other resolution.

Mr. Argue: In other words, the minister is holding up the storage legislation.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would point out that a subject that has been debated one day, even in the sensitive mind of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, should not yet be described as a filibuster.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, arising out of the minister's welcome but very belated statement—perhaps I should have amended the statement I made earlier—would he say what is being done with regard to assuring farmers a greater opportunity to market their wheat through the freight cars that have been made available to a greater extent recently? On the basis of the additional number of cars that have been made available at the present time, would the minister say what the prospects are of an increase in the quota to the various areas of the western provinces?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I gave the actual loadings of last week and as I recall the figure averaged 867 cars per day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Since when?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That was the daily average for last week. I get daily reports from the Canadian National Railways showing the exact number of its cars loaded, the additional cars going into the area, and the unloads at all the ports. Those reports indicate that additional cars are going into the grain movement every day.

I have not the same complete reports from the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the car loadings on the Canadian Pacific Railway are increasing. That railway is also putting more box cars in the grain movement, and, therefore, we can look for steady improvement in the rate of country loadings.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—POSITION OF STRIKING EMPLOYEES OF GENERAL MOTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John M. James (Durham): Mr. Speaker, this may appear a bit unusual, but the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) and I would like to combine in asking the Minister of Labour a question. Would the minister care to comment on the position under the Unemployment Insurance Act of those General Motors employees now on strike who will not be recalled to work immediately following the hoped-for strike settlement?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the joint question of my two hon. friends, the procedure in this case would be exactly the same as in all others. That is as follows: When General Motors resumes operations and the plant starts again, then those former workers who are not taken on or have not found other employment when the plant reaches normal production may apply for unemployment insurance.

As to the definition of "normal production", the former production output and the normal number of employees, of course, are considered as factors. Where there is a difference of opinion between the claimant and the insurance officer the matter may be taken to the board of referees, and, of course, to the umpire if necessary.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO SUPPLYING CF-100 PLANES TO AUXILIARY SQUADRONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether any decision has been made in regard to supplying the CF-100 to auxiliary squadrons?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. The future of auxiliary squadrons is still under consideration, but I hope to be able to make a statement shortly. We have had the senior officers of all auxiliary squadrons in; we have had a number of conferences, and we are now working on proposals for the future.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WHITE (MIDDLESEX EAST)—REFERENCE TO ANSWER TO QUESTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. At page 786 of yesterday's Hansard there is an answer to a question of mine which appeared on the order paper asking for the number of rural routes extended in the county of Middlesex. The answer gives only those extended in Middlesex East, and not the whole county. I would therefore ask that the question be reinstated on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: We will take note of the request of the hon. member; but whenever this type of request is to be made I might inform the hon. member that he may see the clerk of orders and notices if these questions are to be reinstated with respect to the part not covered.

MEAT

HOGS—REFUNDS IN PURCHASES BELOW FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, notice of which I gave him yesterday. Will he make a statement to the house concerning the administrative machinery set up by his department which will guarantee a floor price to hog producers in western Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the arrangement made under the order setting up the floor price for hogs is on the basis of 23 cents for grade A hogs at Toronto and Montreal. The provision under which that floor price can be obtained is that the hogs pass through a stockyard. The floor price is made available at the stockyard. Any person delivering hogs in Saskatchewan can get the floor price at the stockyard and there is no excuse for anyone not getting it provided he takes the hogs there. I have sent for the full information on the slip that was given to me, and I have sent the slip along as well. There is no name on it to indicate who delivered the hogs and there is no explanation as to why he took 25 cents less. I can think of many reasons why some people may have taken 25 cents less.

HOGS—AUTHORITY FOR FLOOR PRICES AT WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister inform the house if there are floor prices for hogs established at Winnipeg and, if so, under what authority?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are floor prices established at Winnipeg. As a matter of fact, floor prices are established at all stockyards across the country. This is done under the authority that established floor prices, the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE LIBERALIZING OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Have discussions been held between officials of his department and officials of the provincial departments with a view to liberalizing the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act and, if so, can the minister report anything by way of progress?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will remember that the other day I indicated to the house that officials of the provincial and federal governments charged with the responsibility of disabled allowances administration were meeting to discuss, as they had decided to do some time ago, certain aspects of their administration. Beyond that there is nothing further that I can say at this time.

POTATOES

REPORTED SHORTAGE OF BOX CARS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister any statement to make regarding the reported shortage in Prince Edward Island of suitable railway cars for the shipment of potatoes?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just put this question and the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) have both drawn this matter to my attention. Unfortunately in the time which has elapsed since they did so I have been unable to obtain any information with which to reply to the question. I shall endeavour to do so tomorrow.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH RUSSIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but first may I assure the Minister of Agriculture that I will send him the name if he so requests.

Mr. Gardiner: I can get it whether you wish it or not.

Mr. Bryson: And I should like to get the slip back.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member be good enough to put his question?

Mr. Gardiner: I think I should be permitted to say, in view of the statement that you, Mr. Speaker, have allowed to be made, that the slip will be returned when I have all the information necessary in order to answer the insinuations that were made.

Mr. Bryson: Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce report on the progress so far in the trade negotiations with the Russian trade delegation in Ottawa?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I must advise that I have not as yet received a report on the progress of the negotiations.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF CONTROLS ON TRADE WITH CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of yesterday's announcement, following the Eisenhower-Eden meeting in Washington, that Britain and the United States have agreed to review the scope of controls on trade with China, will Canada make a similar review with a view to extending our trade in non-military goods to that area?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I presume that Prime Minister Eden will inform us of his discussions in Washington. If, in the light of that information, a further review of our trade relations with China is warranted, I am sure the review will be made.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH MAXIMUM RATE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Interest Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Interest Act, as it now stands, does not provide any limit on the interest that may be charged in this country. In certain fields there are limits on the interest rates that may be charged but those limits are placed there by special acts of parliament. Apart from money lent under the Small Loans Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Bank Act and so on, there is no legal limit to the amount of interest that may be charged. In the fields where there is no limit to the amount of interest that may be charged, large sums of money at very high rates are being made available.

We have already been told that an amendment or amendments to the Small Loans Act will be presented at this session. My understanding is that the bill covering the amendment or amendments will be referred to the banking and commerce committee for study, a move that I welcome. But at this time I want to express the hope that, when the subject matter of that bill is referred to the banking and commerce committee, the members of the committee will be given perfect freedom to inquire into interest rates as they are levied by all companies and business firms in this country. I am hopeful that the discussion that takes place in the banking and commerce committee may be free and that we shall be able to acquire there all the information that may be necessary to write into the Interest Act a definite limit, and one that may be as low as practicable.

When a week ago I moved second reading of Bill No. 3 having to do with limiting the interest that may be charged under the Small Loans Act, a government member moved the adjournment of the debate. The discussion was stopped. At this time I want to express the hope that the government will not have one of its members move the adjournment of this debate but that rather it will allow the debate to go on today just as long as there are any hon. members wishing to take part in it. I do not think the government at any time should use its overwhelming majority in order to cut off discussion.

[Mr. Ellis.]

After listening to the debate that took place on the Small Loans Act one might draw the inference that as long as we have the Small Loans Act in operation loan sharks, in the sense of persons or corporations, are not able to charge excessive rates of interest. The fact is that loan sharks—if you wish to call them that—are free to operate in Canada provided they are not small loan companies making small loans as defined by the Small Loans Act. In other words, as I understand the law, it is perfectly legal for an individual to make a private loan to any other individual at any rate of interest that may be agreed upon. It is perfectly legal for a finance company—an acceptance corporation, as they are often called—to make any charges that may be agreed upon between the purchaser of an article and the company that is financing that purchase.

Mr. Benidickson: If he sets out the effective rate of interest in the document.

Mr. Argue: I understand further that there is no limit to the interest or rate, or whatever name you may wish to call it, that may be charged by a business firm in providing credit for instalment purchases. I am moving this bill in the hope that there may be established in Canada, on all loans that are made on all instalment buying, an interest or rate limitation. I have suggested in this bill—as I suggested in another bill to amend the Small Loans Act—that that rate should not be more than 12 per cent per annum. When I think of the lower rates at which banks are able to lend money and when I think of the experience that credit unions have had from one end of this country to the other in lending money at a maximum rate of 12 per cent and in many instances at the bank rate of interest, I can see no good reason why a limitation should not be fixed on the interest rates that may be charged on all credit that is made available.

The acceptance corporations—that is the finance companies—from what I have been able to ascertain from making inquiries, all charge a rate in excess of 12 per cent. Hence the passage of this bill would place a definite limit on the rates that may be charged by acceptance corporations. As the result of further inquiries I have made with respect to the rates that are charged, it seems to me that a rate of 18 per cent, 20 per cent or 22 per cent is a common one. The effect of this bill would therefore be to reduce substantially the charges that may be made by those companies. Hence, in my opinion, the result would be a substantial saving to the people of this country.

The amount of money that is made available by acceptance corporations is tremendous.

The amount of money that is made available for instalment purchases of all kinds is large and growing. As a matter of fact, it now appears that the total amount of retail instalment sales in 1955 in Canada is likely to exceed the sum of $1 billion. Retail instalment sales include the purchase of such things as passenger cars, radio and television sets, electric and gas household appliances, furniture and other consumers' goods including clothing and jewelery.

The large item in this list is the item for the purchase of automobiles. Instalment credit for the purchase of new passenger cars in 1953 amounted to $252 million. Instalment credit for the purchase of used passenger cars in that year amounted to $321 million. Most of those purchases are made under what is known as a conditional sales contract. As I understand it, the purchaser has no equity in the automobile that he is purchasing, for example, until the last payment is made; and if he should fail to make a payment at any time, the automobile can be repossessed without much trouble. Since it is a conditional sales contract the purchaser is not entitled to any equity in the automobile even though he may have paid a large part of the purchase price.

On speaking to automobile dealers and implement dealers in various parts of this country, I have been informed by them that not only is there a conditional sales contract as far as the purchaser is concerned but that the same type of thing is worked by the acceptance corporation on the dealer himself, and that if there is any loss whatsoever because of the conditional sales contract, the dealer himself will be held responsible for the unpaid balances. Dealers have said to me that, two or three years ago, when things were booming on the prairies—and I am thinking of the prairies particularly—they considered that their net worth was $100,000, $200,000 or $300,000; but because of the conditional sales contract as it has been applied to dealers, and because of the rapid drop in purchasing, they felt that their total net worth —in certain instances approaching a quarter of a million dollars—was in fact at stake. These dealers, because of this type of contract and because of the high rates that are charged, felt that they might lose the total equity they had in their business. In addition to that, the customer would be losing the equity he might have had in the machine he purchased.

This business is very large and very profitable. I have the profit statistics in my hands for four acceptance corporations. The first one is the Union Acceptance Company. In 1948 that company made a profit of $22,500. Six years later, in 1954, it made a profit of over $302,000, an increase in profit of 1,239 per cent. The Laurentide corporation, another acceptance corporation, made a profit of over $30,000 in 1946, and this has been increased to $320,000 in 1954, an increase of 954 per cent within that period. The Industrial Acceptance made a profit of $53,000 in 1946, and 8 years later made a profit of $6,837,000, an increase of 2,596 per cent within that period. The Traders Finance Corporation in 1946 made a profit of $483,000, and in 1954 made a profit of $4,401,000, an increase in the 8-year period of 810 per cent. Clearly, the business of providing money by the acceptance corporations for the purpose of automobiles and other consumer goods is a very lucrative one. It is one which I believe should be inquired into by the banking and commerce committee. Possibly if we had a thorough inquiry into the business practices of the acceptance corporations, into the rates they are charging and into the profits they are making, there could in fact be a decided reduction in the charges they make with a very beneficial result to Canadian consumers.

That is one large field but there is another large field of consumer credit and that is the field of instalment purchases through retail companies. In this field I find that the interest rates or charges, whatever you may wish to term them, go up even higher than the rates charged by the acceptance company. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) a few days ago put on the record in detail the charges made by Eaton's and Simpsons-Sears on the smallest purchase that could be made under the instalment plan. He pointed out that the effective rate on a small purchase was 54 per cent. It is true that as the amount of the purchase increases the rate goes down, but in all instances the rates are considerably higher than the bank rates. In most instances they are from 15 per cent to 35 per cent.

I have quite a number of examples of charges made on the instalment plan, and I shall refer to one at this time. There was an interest charge of 6·25 made on an unpaid balance of $60, repayable in $6 monthly payments. On that unpaid balance of $60, Eaton's or Simpsons-Sears charged an effective rate of 23 per cent. I should like the banking and commerce committee to have before it witnesses from big corporations such as Simpsons-Sears and Eaton's which do such a tremendous business from one end of this nation to the other. I should like to ascertain from them, if we could, the amount of profit that they acquire because of their credit business and see to what extent the total profits of these huge companies are derived, not from the amount of profit they make from the actual sale but from the profit they make through the extension of credit.

I have visited a great many homes, as most members of parliament do. I know it is a common practice, it is almost a general practice, for the housewife to have credit accounts with the big mail order houses. I have made purchases at such firms as Simpsons-Sears, and instead of telling me the article was $5.00, for example, the clerk would say to me, "What is your account number?" I said, "I have not got an account number." I felt rather guilty that I did not have an account number because the attitude they seemed to take was that if you did not have an account number you were a bit of an oddity, a bit of a piker. I said, "No, I do not come to Regina very often so I think I will pay cash." It is very simple to get credit. The charges that are made are very high. I imagine a great many purchasers not only do not understand the rate of charge, but in fact have a difficult time meeting their monthly payments because of the very high rate charged.

I am hopeful that witnesses from these two large companies, from some of these acceptance corporations and small loan companies may be brought before a committee of this house and questioned. If members of parliament had such witnesses before them, they could go into the profits that are made by these corporations and then if desirable introduce legislation to reduce the rate that might be charged. As a consequence, I am certain we would save the consumers, the ordinary rank and file of the Canadian people, ten of millions of dollars within a one-year period. We would not have to reduce the rate too much to save many millions of dollars when one bears in mind that, according to the Bank of Canada statistical summary, $2 billion is being lent in credit of one kind or another. Of course, that is not only credit that is being made available and on which very high interest rates may be charged.

Mr. Harris: May I ask how much of that $2 billion is bank loans?

Mr. Argue: I have not got the statistics at this time. There would be a considerable portion of it in bank loans. I do, however, have the amount of retail instalment purchasers to which I referred a moment ago. I made the statement that on the basis of the information available today it might be that retail instalment credit in 1955 would exceed a billion dollars. If you want to confine yourself to the billion dollar figure only and to say nothing about the high interest rate that may be charged by individuals, the high interest rates that may be charged on second mortgages, I think it is fair to say that many millions of dollars would be saved by the Canadian people if a move were made to reduce interest rates.

One hon. member of the house spoke to me yesterday about a practice that was being followed by people in the business of constructing homes.

It was pointed out to me that the amount of money made available under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not sufficient to pay the total cost of construction, and that very often the purchaser of the house does not have the total cash payment required. Therefore, the contractor takes a second mortgage on the house, and that second mortgage is then taken to a finance company which purchases it at a substantial discount. It is true that if a limitation were put on the amount that may be charged for second mortgages, the amount of money available for such second mortgages in all probability would be reduced, and unless something else were done the single act of reducing the interest rate that may be charged on second mortgages would perhaps make it more difficult for individuals to purchase houses.

At this point I should like to read a statement taken from an article in the Chatelaine magazine of January, 1956. It reads as follows:

> Avoid second mortgages like the plague. Rates go as high as 10 per cent, with discounts of 15 to 25 per cent. This means that if you take out a $5,000 second mortgage, the lender may only give you $4,000 cash (keeping a discount of $1,000) but you will have to pay the high interest rate on the full amount of $5,000. Thus the discount is a way for the lender to get a much higher true rate of interest on his loan than the stated rate.

The fact that houses are being made available, with second mortgages carrying an effective high interest rate, I believe to some extent at any rate undermines the purpose of the National Housing Act. The purpose of that act was to make houses available to purchasers at a reasonable rate of interest. Therefore, in the whole field of credit the government should take certain very definite additional steps. Besides placing a limit on the interest rate, the government should consider, as, passing a new act of parliament that might be called a family welfare loans act, an act which would provide a small percentage guarantee to the chartered banks to encourage them to make loans to families for ordinary consumer credit purchases, the type of purchases for which they are now paying very high rates.

As a result of the experience of the government with the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the National Housing Act and other acts of parliament, an act such as I have suggested would be effective in making money available to Canadians at a low rate of interest and would substitute for any money sources that might be dried up as a result of limiting interest rates to 12 per cent.

I should like to see similar guarantees given under such an act, and under all other acts of this nature, to credit unions. Credit unions in Canada are an important source of credit. They are growing in importance. Over the years they have proved their soundness. I believe the government would be wise to encourage the use of credit union facilities by extending to credit unions in every instance the same type of guarantee that is now extended to the chartered banks, so that in the field of making money available to ordinary consumers the credit unions of this nation would be placed on an equal footing with the chartered banks. If that were done the credit unions would be able to function with a loss ratio not any larger, and very likely even smaller, than the very small and commendable loss ratio now experienced by the chartered banks in this lending field.

As has already been said in this house by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), another thing the government should do is to require all firms, all corporations, all small-loan companies and persons in the field of lending money, to state the effective rate of interest per annum. When a customer comes in and asks for something on the instalment plan he should be immediately informed before the transaction takes place that if he obtains credit of this nature the interest rate will be 10 per cent, 20 per cent, 30 per cent, or whatever the figure may be. If that were done, it would make it much more difficult for those loan companies and corporations to charge an exorbitant rate of interest.

The first action the government should take is to place a definite ceiling on the interest charges that may be made, not only by small-loan companies, but also by acceptance corporations, by large retail firms and by individuals whenever credit is made available.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia that this bill should be referred to the banking and commerce committee in order that there may be a thorough investigation into the subject of credit buying. Most of us are familiar with a number of the practices to which he has referred, practices that may be described as very undesirable ones and I think justifiably referred to in many instances as a racket. However, I must admit that when I first read this bill I was not too well impressed by it. It seems to me that a rate of interest of 12 per cent in an act of this kind is too high. It is true it is only a ceiling; it is true there is no ceiling at the present time; but it does seem to me that when you put a ceiling of 12 per cent into an act you are actually implying that a rate of interest of 12 per cent may be justified under certain circumstances. With one or two minor exceptions I do not think that is the case, and those exceptions can be taken care of by federal legislation.

It seems to me in the past there have been a number of cases where 12 per cent has been charged; for instance, to farmers. As a farmer I have paid 12 per cent. In the early days it was a very common practice to charge a rate of 8 per cent on loans for hail insurance. But the minute that loan became overdue the rate rose to 12 per cent. I have paid that. The due date was October 1, a date, of course, that no farmer could meet. On farm machinery the rate was 7 per cent until due, and then it became 10 per cent to 12 per cent. We all know that in the vast majority of cases it was not possible for a farmer to pay the note when it became due, therefore in a very short time he was paying 10 per cent and 12 per cent. I am glad to say that practice has ceased to a very large extent, but there are still instances where those rates prevail.

It seems to me the only instance where 12 per cent might be justified would be in regard to small loans, but small loans are covered by a federal statute and therefore would not come under this act. Small-loan companies operating outside a federal charter no doubt would feel they could not carry on their business at a rate of 8 per cent. If we put a ceiling of 8 per cent in the act, then I presume they would immediately apply for a federal charter in order to get the protection of the act. I do not like the idea of putting a ceiling of 12 per cent into an act of this kind because, as I say, it does imply, or appears to imply, that a rate of 12 per cent could be justified under certain circumstances.

I would far rather see the rate of interest set at 7 per cent or 8 per cent, and then let us pass federal legislation to take care of cases where a larger rate may not have been fair. But, in the meantime, in view of the fact that this legislation would prevent a higher rate being charged, I would support the bill.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am told that in the early days of Christianity it was considered to be against the teachings of the church to charge any rate of interest at all, and those members of the Christian community who were found guilty of having lent money at a rate of interest were excommunicated. I think we have come a long, long way from that early concept which was held by people toward the use of money. I fail to see how we can set maximum rates of interest that some money lenders in Canada are permitted to charge and then claim to be logical when we say that all others not covered are outside the law in so far as they may charge whatever rate of interest they are able to get.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) placed on the record the other day some statistics concerning the operations of the personal loan department of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Those statistics revealed that although the Bank of Commerce through its personal loan department charges less than 11 per cent interest they still show a net profit of ·77 per cent. I think most of us are aware that over a period of many years the Bank of Montreal has made personal loans available to its customers at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on the minimum monthly balance. I am quite willing to concede that possibly the Bank of Montreal is doing this in the interests of good public relations and that it has to rely on its earnings on larger loans in order to break even.

I am very pleased to note the rapid growth throughout Canada of thousands of credit unions none of which charges more than 12 per cent per annum. A larger number of them find at the end of each year that they are able to supply their customers or members with a rebate of some of the interest that has been paid. We can readily see that the business of lending money is growing rapidly in Canada and the number of individuals, organizations and institutions that are engaging in this practice is steadily increasing. When we look at some of the statistics available to us it is small wonder that the number is growing. It is apparently a very easy way to make a living.

I must say to my shame that I recently visited a cousin of mine who had sold his legitimate businesses. I asked him what he was planning to do now and he replied that he intended to lend out his money because for every $10,000 he had he could arrange to lend out $50,000 and could easily get 2 per cent per month on the unpaid balance and frequently even more. I said that I was ashamed to call him my cousin because I have my opinion in relation to this practice and my regard for people who make their livelihood in this manner is very low indeed.

I have already said it is small wonder that the number of Canadians who are engaging in this kind of enterprise is rapidly increasing. With this in mind I should like to refer hon. members to page 27 of the annual report of the small-loan companies and money lenders. I am using the statistics which appear there simply because I think they are indicative in no small measure of what is happening in the money lending field. We find here the report of the Household Finance Corporation of Canada for the year ending December 31, 1954, in the small-loan field, and I notice that they had a total income of $12,812,433.21. Of that total, Mr. Speaker, they record a profit before income tax of $5,952,743.75. Under their list of expenditure I notice an advertising item of $498,373.17. If you add the advertising expenditures to the profit you get a profit of half of the complete income of this organization. Not only is their profit half of their total income, I notice it is twice the amount of wages they pay. I do not know what their scale of wages is but either it is far too low or the rate of profit is excessive and the interest they are charging is needlessly high.

I also notice there is an investment of share capital paid in cash of $3,070,000. This company in which is invested $3,070,000 was able to pay in dividends to shareholders $3,048,510. In other words, they recovered the whole of their original investment in a 12-month period.

I have available to me a mortgage which was obtained by a mill worker whom I know on a house that would sell for at least $14,000. He needed a bit of money and went to the mortgage company. Apparently he was not able to get a mortgage with reasonable ease so he then went to some of the loan sharks which unfortunately we also have in British Columbia. He signed a first mortgage on his home for $2,300 at 8 per cent and had paid out to him the sum of only $2,000. I have not bothered to work out the interest on that amount.

I have another statistic which I should like to place on the record. The organization to which I am referring is engaged in the business of financing automobile sales. I have a letter from them dated November 10, 1955, which says:

> "If the balance is paid by November 30 you will have to send $179.60."

Then on December 12 they wrote:

> "The balance is, since no payment was received, $198.47."

A further letter sent at the end of the month again states that the balance is $198.47. In other words, Mr. Speaker, for the loan of $179.60 for one month this company was charging an interest rate of 125 per cent per annum. If this customer had been foolish enough to have sent the money on December 12 he would have paid an interest rate in excess of 250 per cent. Added to this was compulsory automobile insurance as well as compulsory life insurance. In cases such as this the customer is completely at the mercy of these companies when he applies for a refund.

There may be a reasonable argument raised on behalf of those who have money and decide to lend their money to someone else. After all, if I have a certain sum of money which is legally and rightfully mine I do not have to make that money available for the use of my neighbour, and if I were to do so the argument could be advanced that I should be entitled to stipulate my own terms and conditions and the reward that I would expect for the use of my money.

I think it is fair to say that 90 per cent of the money being used today in Canada for lending purposes does not belong to the lenders. That money is obtained from regular and recognized lending institutions. It is a very common practice when you are engaged in the retail field or in the business of selling automobiles, or even if you wish to set yourself up as a racketeer and open a finance company, that you supply $1 and the life insurance company or the chartered bank will lend you $4 more so that you will have $5 to lend out. Then you pay 4½ to 5½ per cent interest on that money and as the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) pointed out the other day in the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 10—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course the hon. member will not refer to a debate on another bill.

Mr. Regier: It has been pointed out that this amounts to 400 per cent on the investment. I feel that money in the insurance companies and on deposit with the banks belongs to the masses of the Canadian people and I see something very wrong in people being able to go to those institutions and obtain that money at a low rate of interest and then turn around and lend it back to the people who rightfully own the money at an exorbitant profit.

The argument is sometimes made that the government should not interfere. Let the buyer beware is an old slogan. It is argued that people should acquaint themselves with the rates of interest they have to pay and that these enterprises should be allowed to operate outside the law. These organizations and individuals have the full protection of the law, and when it comes to the customer meeting his part of the contract I submit that if this parliament claims the right to pass laws which authorize individuals and corporations to collect their pound of flesh then this parliament is morally obligated to pass legislation which will see to it that the customers, the general masses of the people of Canada, get an even break in the deal. We cannot have a law which does not place upon those who use the law for their own protection the duty of being reasonable. Some of the things being done in Canada today are not just or reasonable and legislation is necessary. If we do not want legislation to set maximum interest rates then we should abolish the legislation that enables people to enforce the sanctity of contracts. The one is as fair as the other.

I am also rather concerned with the damage being done to ethical and long-established businesses in our nation. Why should the chartered banks who are engaged in the business of borrowing and lending money not be enabled to extend their activities to meeting the needs of the people? Why should not greater encouragement be given to credit unions? I cannot recall anything important that this government has done to extend the credit union movement, although I realize that on the whole that comes under provincial legislation.

There are many respectable companies engaged in business in Canada, even in the business of lending money. Their reputation and ability to serve the people are being seriously hampered by the activities of these money shysters. Take the retail merchants of Canada, as an instance. I can think of two large furniture establishments operating in Vancouver, both selling on the instalment plan. One store allows for a reasonable profit and if an article is bought on the instalment plan the purchaser pays 9 per cent per annum on the minimum monthly balance. While that may be considered excessive by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) I would tell him that we consider the passage of this bill to be necessary because right in that same city is another large department store which has no markup whatever on its furniture and which openly brags that it sells at cost and makes its money out of the finance fees that are collected. They are putting out of business many of the smaller retailers in the city and they are doing injury to the other large retailer who is attempting to earn a living in an honest way.

I am concerned also with the too liberal credit which is being offered today to the Canadian consumer. I do not think that the easy money available these days is of much help to Canada in the long run. As the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has pointed out, these high rates are robbing the Canadian people of millions of dollars a year. Whatever you charge for the use of money or as an interest rate that exceeds the cost of handling money is the amount of purchasing power that you take from the Canadian people.

I have been told that some members of parliament had very little reaction to the first introduction of this bill a year ago, but that is easily understood. People who are in the clutches of loan companies or instalment buying plans do not go around openly bragging about the fact that they have allowed their finances to get into such a mess. Not many of them would want to inform even their federal member of their situation. We have almost reached the position in Canada where people consider it a disgrace to borrow money. Our forefathers had to borrow money to meet their urgent needs and that was considered a perfectly honourable thing to do and should be so regarded in our society. However, as things are now people hate to admit that they are borrowers of money.

I feel that the government must act this year. I interject again: What about the borrower? I think that this bill will be talked about in Canada for a long time if the government does not act. I am hoping that organizations throughout the country will take up the cause and make enough noise about it that it will reach the ears of the government. I hope that our religious organizations who are concerned with ethics will interest themselves in the wholesale robbery of the Canadian people which is taking place. I see no reason why those engaged in the practice of lending money or selling goods on time should not be held responsible for the toll that is extracted.

We need money for loans for necessary and worthy purposes. There are many engaged in that occupation in Canada who have a very high reputation. They are concerned with the security of the loan and all they are asking is that the rate allowed be commensurate with the cost of the services they are rendering to society. Finally, I should like to appeal to the government to rid Canadian society of some of these parasites.

Mr. Philpott: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question before he finishes. He said he could not remember anything that the house or the government had done to assist the credit unions. I am sure the hon. member will recall that last spring when the bill respecting loans to fishermen came before the house the credit unions were made eligible to make loans in record time, and the bill went through the house much faster than this particular measure is going through the house this afternoon.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, I believe I did not say that the government had not done anything. Relatively speaking, I felt that way and I believe I started by saying something to that effect but I amended my statement and said that they had done very little. I had in mind the very amendment that the hon. member has mentioned. However, in relation to what the government does to aid private business it has done nothing to aid the credit union movement.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he not familiar with the fact that credit unions are granted exemption from taxation under the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Argue: That is not true. They pay every tax that every other corporation pays.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I would love to answer the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, there are two sides to this question. I have had some experience with people who borrow and my advice to them has been: Do not buy anything unless you can pay cash. I think that is one thing we should emphasize.

Mr. Ellis: That is easy enough for a $10,000 a year man to say.

Mr. McIvor: I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has done a good job in bringing this matter before the house, but he has overlooked one evil of the system. It is not the interest paid but the way the money is collected to pay the debt. I was called upon once by a young man who had borrowed money. He owed one of these corporations $400. He was told they would foreclose unless he got $100. He got the $100, and then he was told that he must pay or they would take the car his father-in-law had given him which cost $1,000 and also his truck. They said they would take the car and the truck for a debt of $400.

Of course I went to the office of this finance company with the young man. Like a real Irishman, I do like a good fight especially if you know you are right. I said, "This man came to me today and said he was going to go downtown and shoot somebody." I said, "I am going to stay in Fort William for a while and you and I cannot stay in Fort William and get away with this sort of thing."

Of course he made a new arrangement and was able to pay his debt. I hope that the parliamentary assistant will indicate to us some way by which these interest rates can be curbed. I know that the hon. member quoted the attitude of the church towards paying interest. It is a risky business to quote the church or the Bible in support of anything because there are two sides. Even the devil himself was able to support his cause by quoting Scripture but he did not get away with it. I know that the fifteenth psalm says that the honest man does not put out his money to usury. I know that the sermon on the mount says that if a man would borrow from you, turn not away. I also know that the Great Teacher said in the parable of the talents that the man was cast out because he hid his talent in the earth and did not put it out to usury.

The only reason I have risen is that I hope the parliamentary assistant will throw some light on the matter, and I am not going to declare myself until I know what the government is going to do.

Mr. Knowles: Could not the hon. member quote Scripture a little more accurately?

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am going to accept the valuable advice of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) and avoid any quotations from the good book, as he has just suggested. I am very happy to have the opportunity to speak for a few minutes in support of the bill to amend the interest rate which has been introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I feel he has rendered a service to the house and to the people of Canada by bringing this matter forward. As far as I am able to determine, the time is long overdue for a thorough review of the situation to be undertaken by the House of Commons.

As I understand it, the Interest Act is an act that covers in general terms the whole field of the charging of interest upon money that is lent in Canada. The hon. member proposes to amend section 2 of the act by providing for a maximum rate of interest of 12 per cent. That section now reads:

> Except as otherwise provided by this or by the other act of the Parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount that is agreed upon.

I believe that provision has been on the statute books for a considerable period of time without any change. I do not know exactly when the Interest Act was first placed on the statute books of Canada, but I understand that no amendment to the act has been made since the year 1907. On various occasions the parliament of Canada has recognized that it is necessary to place curbs upon the unlimited nature of the provisions of section 2 of the Interest Act and has passed certain special acts which limit particular situations as far as the charging of interest is concerned. We have the Small Loans Act, the Money-Lenders Act and the Pawnbrokers Act.

I think that hon. members should be cognizant of the fact that our predecessors have recognized from time to time the necessity of placing restrictions upon the freedom of individuals to lend money at any rate of interest they may be able to obtain. I also think it should be clear from the review of the current situation made by the hon. member for Assiniboia that since the time when such acts as the Money-Lenders Act and the Pawnbrokers Act were placed upon our statute books there have been some very great and drastic changes in the methods of lending money to Canadian citizens. Because of the fact that over a period of time there have come into existence various new institutions or various new methods for lending, such as the credit systems operated by some of our retail chains today, I think the time has now come when it would be advisable to include within this general act an over-all limitation upon any form of money lending which may be undertaken in Canada either as between individuals or through various incorporated money lending agencies so that, as the years go by, those who are concerned in this business will have no loophole through which to devise various other methods within the law of lending money at excessive rates of interest. That is why I feel that the amendment to this act which is being proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is so greatly to the point.

Some of the hon. members who have spoken have pointed out that over a large field of successful lending operations in this country today interest rates either at 12 per cent or less are enabling money lending businesses to operate with great success, to say the least. While at the time when this act was put on the statute books it might have been a valid argument that if restrictive clauses were attached to this section the field of credit would be unduly limited to those who might have real need of it, nevertheless I think it is fair to say that such is not the situation that exists today. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) pointed out, we are today completely surrounded by various agencies that are only too anxious to make deals that involve the lending of money at interest. As a further instance of that fact, I think it would be worth while at this stage to point out that since the present provisions of this act were established there have arisen in Canada many other fields of lending activity including the whole activity of the credit union movement across this country. That is a movement which has operated successfully within the restriction of the maximum interest rate of 12 per cent. That is a movement which is now sufficiently national in scope to enable all Canadian citizens in need of credit—even if some of these other lending agencies were not in operation—the opportunity to secure credit when they need it.

Apparently the national statistics on credit unions compiled centrally are not particularly up to date; but even in the year 1953 the credit union movement in Canada is reported to have had total assets of $492,384,000 and to have made loans in that year totalling $204,863,000. That fact in itself—to me at least—is an indication of the scope of the present day credit union movement and of the facilities which it has available for making loans to the citizens of Canada. Since their inception and up until the end of 1953, the credit unions across Canada had made loans in a total amount of $1,179,733,000, and they have been growing since 1953. Last year in the evidence given before the banking and commerce committee on the bill to which the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) was referring a few minutes ago, it was indicated that between the years 1954 and 1952 the credit union assets in British Columbia had increased by more than 50 per cent. As I say, while apparently the latest statistics available on a national basis are for 1953, I think it is safe to say that in other parts of Canada the credit union movement has been growing at a comparable rate and that the figures I have just been quoting, if given for the year ending December 31, 1955, would show a material increase over those of 1953.

I have gone to some pains and have spoken at some little length to point out the picture of the credit unions with respect to the offering of credit facilities in Canada. I have done so merely to indicate that, as far as I can see, it certainly would not be valid to argue that any Canadian citizen would be denied an adequate measure of needed credit if the amendment to section 2 of the Interest Act that is proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia is passed by this house.

As to the situation of the credit unions, I feel that I should mention the fact that in many parts of Canada today the credit unions are in effect operating as institutions which employ staff on a full time basis and that they have what one might consider to be the normal operating expenses of other lending institutions. Those of us who have had some experience in seeing credit unions start as small organizations know that a good deal of volunteer work has been carried on by the members themselves, and is still being carried on within those organizations, particularly in the smaller places. But in Canada today there are a great many credit unions which have reached the stage where their operations are of such a size that it has become necessary for them to employ a trained staff to carry on their business just as do many of the private commercial organizations. Some of these were mentioned in connection with our fishermen's credit union in the evidence before the banking and commerce committee last year. The largest of those fishermen's credit unions in British Columbia—I refer to the Prince Rupert fisermen's credit union—at that time had assets of $1,750,000 and was making loans on a scale which certainly could not be handled on a volunteer basis. I mention that matter in case somebody might try to suggest that it is not fair to put forward the fact that credit unions can operate quite successfully within a maximum rate of 12 per cent because of the fact that they are carried on by voluntary work on the part of the members.

Without attempting to repeat the arguments that have been advanced by some of the other hon. members who have spoken, and having simply attempted to emphasize one or two of the points which have not been expanded by them, I feel that I can in all conscience urge upon the house the acceptance of the amendment that has been proposed to the Interest Act by the present bill.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): There are just one or two comments I should like to make on this bill. I feel that as a parliament we have a duty and a responsibility to our people. The very high cost of living in this country is the concern of all thoughtful Canadians. I suggest that by the passage of this bill we would be making at least a slight contribution towards a reduction in the cost of living. We would be, in effect, increasing to at least a slight degree the purchasing power of the low income groups in Canada.

There are many factors contributing to the high cost of living today. There are such things as the excessive corporation profits, taxation at all levels of government, the effect of the tariff structure on the cost of goods purchased, and of course the excessive debt charges carried by the people of Canada have a very important part in the high cost of living. Now, anything we can do to lighten the load, we should do. A few moments ago the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) suggested that the parliamentary assistant ought to be thinking about doing something towards reducing the interest rate. But just thinking about it or turning to the government and asking them to take something under consideration is not good enough. Here, we have a specific piece of legislation which will have the effect of benefitting the low income groups in Canada. If the government is at all concerned about helping the low income group, they will support the bill now before the house.

Mr. Benidickson: You have not read the speech from the throne.

Mr. Ellis: We were hoping the parliamentary assistant would take part in this debate and give us some indication of what the government had in mind. However, from past experience with government legislation we know that there is always a great fanfare about legislation that is coming. Then, when the legislation is introduced, we find that in very few instances does it measure up to what it was cracked up to be. For example, at the time the National Housing Act was introduced, we heard a lot of glowing things about the legislation the government was proposing. Since that time we have had ample evidence that the act has not fulfilled the purpose for which it was introduced. We are now told the government is going to introduce some legislation dealing with interest rates. Therefore, we should keep this issue in mind and face up to the fact this bill has the effect of getting to the root of the problem.

This bill is quite clear-cut. It is quite specific. There is no shilly-shallying around, no ifs or buts. It is quite definite, and that is what we regard as the hallmark of a good piece of legislation.

Now, whatever the legislation the government proposes might be, I think that we in this group are going to make it abundantly clear we want some legislation with teeth in it. We want some legislation which is going to do the job we feel must be done at the present time. I repeat that I consider this bill to be at least one step we could take now to ease the burden of our hard-pressed low income groups in Canada. The hon. member for Fort William stated that in his opinion people should not buy goods unless they could pay cash. I wonder how long business would operate in Canada if all businesses adopted the same point of view. Borrowing is an essential part of our whole business structure. It is very easy for a person with a sizeable income to talk about paying cash, but let us face the fact that if we expect the average Canadian to enjoy some of the amenities of life, if we feel the average housewife ought to have an electric washing machine and some of these other necessary household appliances, then the only way a great many families can buy those things is through borrowing. No amount of lecturing on the part of government supporters is going to change that fact.

Naturally, everyone would prefer to buy for cash. It is the cheapest way to buy. We have all had the experience of going into a store to buy an article priced at say $189. When we announce that we are prepared to pay cash, we usually get a better price. It is, therefore, to everyone's advantage to pay cash. It is all very well for a person with a good income to lecture the poor on the virtues of paying cash, but it is a different matter for a family that is paying exorbitant rents and trying to get the necessities of life to go into the market and pay cash. Unless the government takes it for granted that these people should not have washing machines and these appliances which we have come to regard as household necessities, then I think we ought to be prepared to do something to lighten the load of those who are forced to borrow money to buy these goods.

I believe that from the standpoint of pure economics it is quite obvious that if a person must buy on time or borrow money in order to purchase goods, his purchasing power is reduced considerably. When you multiply the instalment purchases on the part of a great many Canadians from one end of Canada to the other, then you begin to realize the extent to which the purchasing power of the people of Canada is reduced by excessive interest rates. Of course, the effect on business and industry is quite obvious. The less money the individual has to spend on the purchase of consumer goods, the less goods will be purchased. I am suggesting that the passage of this bill bringing about a reduction of interest rates generally will place in the hands of the people more purchasing power, and obviously this additional purchasing power will be used. After all, a family on a low income must spend every penny of that income in order to make ends meet. This money will be spent on consumer goods, and the additional purchases of consumer goods would materially assist the employment picture in this Canada of ours.

When we view this legislation, we must look at it from a broad point of view. Here is a specific example of how we might do something concrete to help the average man.

There are many other ways in which we could help. I mentioned some of the factors contributing to the high cost of living, the tariff structure, the question of corporation profits, taxes and so forth. We must advance in all fields. Looking at this bill now before the house, I suggest it affords every member in this house a definite opportunity of doing something for the people who need help most.

In discussing a bill similar to this the other day which dealt with a reduction in interest rates from 24 per cent to 12 per cent, I referred to the extent to which the people of this country are presently in debt. I placed on the record some figures indicating that there was very little risk involved by the loan companies in lending money. Certainly there is no excuse whatever today for this government permitting loan companies to charge the excessive rates presently being charged because the risk does not warrant them. Certainly, no one is going to suggest that Household Finance, for example, is doing people a favour by lending them money, when they spend nearly $500,000 a year in trying to persuade people to come in and borrow money. One cannot turn on the radio today without hearing some voice saying: "You are welcome at Niagara", or "Come in and borrow money from the friendly finance company". They are spending huge sums of money in order to persuade people to borrow money. They are not doing that as a public service; they are doing that because they know that the lending of money in Canada is one of the most profitable businesses in the country. Apparently the government is prepared to allow them to go on gouging the people of Canada through excessive interest charges.

I am quite willing to admit that many people are not cognizant of the tremendous interest rates they are paying. I believe the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), in a previous debate, referred to the fact that the Canadian Bank of Commerce small loans department found it difficult to compete in some instances with some of the finance companies simply because a great many people were not aware of the disparity in the interest rates because the Canadian Bank of Commerce did not go out into the advertising field and spend a small fortune and charge it, of course, to the fellow who borrows the money. The advertising of the interest rates that he pays is deducted from the income tax of the lending company. Remember, every finance company that is advertising and trying to get people to go into debt is being subsidized by this government in the form of income tax deductions.

No one can rightly say that a great service is being done and that any reduction in the interest rates will drive those people out of the field, or will make credit more difficult to obtain. Remember this, the majority of families in Canada are not in a position to go out and buy a great many of the consumer goods needed in the modern home. The only way in which they can buy those goods is by borrowing money or buying on the instalment plan. You cannot tell me that any level-headed businessman can consider the disappearance of those loan sharks in terms of loss of business. In other words, if he cannot sell his goods he has to go out of business. The lowering of the interest rate certainly is not going to have any effect on the sale of goods through instalment buying, because goods have to be sold and the only way in which they can be sold is by selling them on time.

As I look at this problem from the broad economic point of view, I say we must consider this bill in the light of the effect it will have on the lot of the average family in Canada today. I would venture to suggest that the average low-income family today is in debt, either to a finance company, a department store or a mail order house, and the interest rates which they are paying have the effect of cutting down their purchasing power and thus reducing their standard of living. Therefore, if we are anxious at all to help the low wage-earning groups in this country, then I suggest a positive way in showing our concern is to pass the bill in its present form.

I suggest that the parliamentary assistant should inform the house now as to the nature of the legislation to be brought down. Is he suggesting that it is the same as this bill? What would be the point of staying out of the debate and suggesting this debate is unnecessary unless the government proposes to bring in almost identical legislation? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) laughs at that. Suppose a private member brings in a bill on a certain subject and a government spokesman rises in his place and says, "We want to debate it, but since the government is bringing in certain legislation along those lines we feel this debate is superfluous": the only validity in that argument is that the government legislation is nearly parallel to the legislation contained in the bill brought in by the private member.

Mr. Harris: Such logic.

Mr. Ellis: My hon. friend may disagree but I suggest he has an opportunity to refute that position and to put forth his point of view.

The government has remained strangely silent in respect of putting forth some concrete reasons why this bill should not be passed in its present form. Here is a definite test of the government's concern or sincerity over the question of excessive interest rates in this country. If they believe in doing something to relieve the heavy burden imposed by those rates on the wage earners of this country they will pass the bill in its present form.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the arguments which have been set forth by the previous speakers, particularly those from the C.C.F. group, have struck a responsive cord in my being. I agree with them completely that there is a most serious need for some facility whereby the ordinary individual who meets with misfortune can secure himself against a debt which could utterly ruin him throughout the remainder of his life.

Suppose a person, just an ordinary man, working, we will say, for $2,000 a year, has a mishap, for instance the occurrence of a serious case of cancer in his home. He does everything that he possibly can to give his wife, we will say, a chance to recover from the disease. He takes her wherever it seems advisable to take her; he probably takes her to the Mayo clinic and in so doing destroys his financial stability for the remainder of his life, if his wage-earning capacity does not in some way increase. Now, surely any ordinary person realizes it should not be necessary for a man who is placed in circumstances such as these to become the victim of loan sharks .

Take the case of death. No one can possibly escape the consequences of a death in the family. By the time one recovers from the expenses of a funeral, usually they run into the neighbourhood of $500. Let a person borrow $500 at an interest rate amounting to 24 per cent a year; let him be supporting a family which requires all the money he is able to earn, and then let us contemplate the dismal prospects which he faces in life. Then think about that case in terms of the development of communism in the world.

A great many of us are altogether too much inclined to forget that we have been more or less fortunate in life, and it is fortunate. The very best off of us are well-off because of good fortune. The very best that any man can do can fail to win competence in the economic and financial world, without what we call the breaks. What facility have we anywhere in our whole financial and economic structure for providing a person, stricken with a mischance, the like of that which I have indicated, with the means whereby he can go through this experience and emerge with some possible hope of recouping himself, getting on his feet?

I am not prepared to say, Mr. Speaker, that the way of providing for most of the mishaps which I have indicated is through the small-loan company. I sympathize with the points set forth by my hon. friends, but I am not sure that the small-loan companies would be the agencies through which we should endeavour, as an enlightened people in Canada, to provide against the hardships I have indicated and many others which hon. members can think of immediately. I am wondering whether or not we should pass some legislation similar to the Farm Improvement Loans Act or some other of the various acts which we now have such as the Industrial Development Bank Act? I wonder if we could devise some means whereby an agency more or less analogous to those which I have mentioned could be set up from which people who fall upon evil days financially could obtain loans which would enable them to recover economically and financially.

It has been suggested to me by some people that in setting out to solve this problem we could have arrangements with the chartered banks under which the federal government would finance, support or guarantee them in making loans up to a certain amount and under certain conditions, in order that people who are stricken by misfortune would be able to obtain sufficient money to tide them over the period of emergency. It was suggested that an interest rate not exceeding 5 per cent be charged on such loans. I simply throw out that suggestion for your consideration. I have not had sufficient time adequately to think this suggestion through. However, I believe that every hon. member will agree with me that there has long been a need in this country for a facility of this kind. The need is urgent; it is right upon us at the present time.

I well remember when my father died leaving a widow and a family of 13 children on a farm with a 20 year old boy as the oldest breadwinner. The cost of my father's funeral almost sank the family financially. I do not know what would have happened had my father not left a certain amount of assets which could be liquidated. By the time the funeral expenses were taken care of and the succession duties were paid we were very nearly reduced to scratching on gravel. No family should have to face financial difficulties of that kind. No member of any family should have to make the kind of sacrifice which was made by one of the members of my father's family in order that the family could economically survive. I just leave this matter with the house and with the government. I urge that those who have charge of the financial affairs of our country do not disregard this need. Please do not shrug it off. I urge you to take cognizance of it and to put your best efforts into finding a solution which will actually provide relief for hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I had not expected to say anything in this debate but I am brought to my feet at this time to express surprise at the fact that my hon. friends on the government side do not have more sympathy for the victims of these money lenders whom we have heard referred to today by almost all the names that are parliamentary. Is there no member on the government side bold enough to oppose this bill? We are accustomed to seeing the hon. members on the government side not being bold enough to support bills brought in by the opposition side.

An hon. Member: We have a good government.

Mr. Knight: That is the reason I rise to register my surprise at the silent treatment being given this bill by hon. members opposite. What about my legal friends on the government side of the house? What about the hon. members of the legal profession? Is it forsooth because in some cases they are members of this nefarious system of money lending?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knight: Is it true that some of them are merely collection agents for these people? Is that why we have not heard one word in opposition to the bill.

My friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) said that he was not going to say anything about the bill and he rose from his seat and admirably carried out that intention. He said the condition on which he would say anything about the bill would be if he first knew what the government side of the house was going to say or think about it. I particularly expected that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) would have something to say on this matter. I should like to know what he thinks about it.

Mr. Benidickson: This is private members' day; we are giving you a full chance to express your views.

Mr. Knight: And that is why I am taking my full chance.

Mr. Benidickson: You complained contrariwise the other day.

Mr. Knight: I should like to agree with my hon. friend from Fort William. He said we should pay cash as we go along. I think that is a delightful idea! However, as my hon. friend from Lethbridge has said, life does not always flow in an even stream and a man who is earning $100 or $150 a month and is spending his entire monthly earnings as he receives them for the necessities of life for his family cannot escape the fact that there are vicissitudes in life. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) mentioned just one, death, which is pretty certain, I think, in most cases. There are other events, too, including happy events like weddings when our daughters or sons get married. These occasions involve expenses outside of the ordinary expenditures which we are usually prepared to meet. On the other hand, I do not think the wife of a man who is earning only the bare necessities of life should have to do without many of the things which are enjoyed by the wives of my hon. friends opposite. I am all for the theory advanced by the hon. member for Fort William; it is a wonderful one. I could only wish that it were practical. I do not think the wives of what are called "humble" people—and I do not like that term—should have to do without some of those things which we have come to consider as necessary.

Why do the government members not say something about this bill?

An hon. Member: You said that.

Mr. Knight: It is a strange sort of debate when only a few people in the opposition do the speaking. What is the government's intention concerning this bill? Has the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance nothing to say? What is the reason for this silent treatment? I challenge hon. members opposite. I think they are afraid to speak in this debate. I do not think there is a man on the opposite side—

An hon. Member: Period.

Mr. Knight: —who would dare to rise and oppose this. Naturally we cannot expect them to support anything which comes from this side of the house; they never do. There was a little discussion about that at the meeting of the Liberal association when our two senior cabinet ministers were honoured—and quite rightly so—the other evening: "You must follow the party line". The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said, if he was correctly reported, that there had been occasions upon which he had differed with the government but that he had suppressed his natural desire to oppose what the government proposed. Of course I presume that to him, as to many of my Liberal friends, the ultimate catastrophe would be the defeat of this government and so, with a majority of something like 120 members—it is so large I cannot keep track of them—it would never do for three members of the government side, for example, to get up and vote for something which would be good for the wheat farmers of Canada. The government might be defeated. And so the advice goes out: "Follow the party line; follow the whip; do what you are told." I think there is some merit in the accusation—

Mr. Benidickson: You kicked out the member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) when he did not follow your whip.

Mr. Knight: —that this government is becoming more and more a dictatorship. Today it says that bills or resolutions brought forward by anyone except someone who follows the line and who obeys the whip of the government side are not worthy of debate. Let some of my honourable and learned friends on the other side get up and oppose this bill.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, apparently the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has not his notes organized as yet so I will give him a few minutes longer to prepare.

Mr. Benidickson: This is your bill.

Mr. Nicholson: My reason for rising to support the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is to stress the fact that he has presented to parliament proposals which should receive the sympathetic consideration of hon. members in all sections of the house. I have before me the latest statistical summary issued by the Bank of Canada which points up some facts in connection with charge accounts, retail dealers instalment credit, finance companies instalment credit and cash personal loans from chartered banks.

I suggest that an analysis of what has happened in Canada during the so-called boom would result in some pretty careful consideration. For example, I find that from December 1951, which is apparently as far back as our records go, charge accounts increased from $420 million to $533 million for September 1955, the last period for which statistics have been compiled. In the case of retail dealers instalment credit the increase was from $126 million in December 1951 to $309 million for last September. The finance companies instalment credit increased from $180 million in December 1951 to $575 million, while the cash personal loans increased from $338 million to $790 million. If you add those together you find there has been an increase from $1,120 million to $2,212 million, an increase of over $1,000 million.

I am sure the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance will agree that this indicates a disturbing trend in a country allegedly as prosperous as is Canada. When these statistics reached me I phoned the Bank of Canada to find if it would be possible to get information as to how those figures compared with consumer credit figures for the period prior to the crash of 1928-29, but I was informed that we were not compiling those statistics in Canada at that time. Therefore we have to rely upon statistics supplied by the United States for that period.

It would appear as though this alarming increase in Canada resembles in many respects the increase in credit buying that prevailed in the United States prior to the crash back in 1928-29. It is not hard to figure why there should be this large increase. I am told that nearly anyone who has a clean shirt can go into almost any used car lot in Canada and drive away a car which will run for some considerable time. I am told also that those who are selling radios, television sets and electric refrigerators do not seem to worry very much about the fact that many of their customers are committed to paying more each month than their salaries will permit. That does not seem to disturb many people who are finding that they have to pay interest rates as high as 50 per cent, as was mentioned a few days ago by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis).

It is obvious that the person who cannot pay cash, as was suggested by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), is not going to get out of trouble by paying 50 per cent per annum as interest on the purchase of things which the storekeeper is prepared to sell him. It is bound to get him into trouble eventually.

The latest publication by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) dealing with the distribution of non-farm income in Canada should be examined along with the statistical summary of the Bank of Canada. This publication indicates the staggering information that 34 per cent of Canadian families of two or more persons have an income of less than $2,500 a year; over one-third of Canadian families receive less than $2,500, an average of $1,530.

I think it is pretty obvious that if one-third of our families are getting an average income of only $1,530 annually and cars, radios, electric refrigerators and other electrical appliances are so plentiful on the market and are being pushed, if interest rates of as high as 50 per cent are being charged, there is going to be trouble for someone some time.

If you divide the Canadian families in another way and take those getting less than $2,000 a year you find that there are 23 per cent or almost one-quarter of the families in Canada of two or more persons who are getting less than that figure per year. If you average the incomes of those 23 per cent you find that it comes to $1,190 per year or less than $100 per month.

You are not going to solve the problem of people in this group if you encourage them to buy television sets, radios, electric refrigerators and what have you by extending credit at interest rates of as high as 50 per cent. Therefore I say that the proposal brought forward by the hon. member for Assiniboia should receive the favourable consideration of hon. members in all sections of the house. We should have legislation which will place a ceiling on these interest rates and assist our friends in the lower income brackets who have such a small average income but who, according to the Bank of Canada, have extended their credit commitments by over $1,000 million since we first started compiling these statistics back in 1951.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have looked around and it does not appear that any other hon. member wants the floor to speak in this debate.

Mr. Argue: We have more speakers.

Mr. Benidickson: I will yield the floor.

Mr. Argue: No, go ahead.

Mr. Benidickson: Hon. members will realize that a bill in similar terms was introduced rather late in the last session, and at the same time another bill was introduced by the same hon. member to amend the Small Loans Act. There was a debate in connection with the amendment to the Small Loans Act last year. It was indicated by me then that the small loans legislation was receiving the consideration of the government and it was altogether likely that legislation would be introduced at the next session of parliament, which is the present session. It was indicated that the history of parliamentary activity in this field showed that a discussion of interest rates and lending practices generally was usually advanced and aided considerably by having public representations through the operation of a parliamentary committee.

I cannot make much reference to the debate last week on the small loans bill because of the rules of the house, but I indicated at that time that government legislation regarding the small loans field would be introduced within a short period, and that that legislation would be referred to a suitable parliamentary committee. I am able to say more than that today. The legislation will be introduced in a day or two and we will have the benefit of a parliamentary discussion in a parliamentary committee. I am sure that as a result of that discussion there is bound to be a consideration of the Small Loans Act and of the general situation respecting lending and interest rates. It seems to me there is a much wider opportunity to discuss problems of this kind when the discussion is brought about by reason of the introduction of government legislation.

I pointed out in connection with the other bill that there were a number of other items standing in the names of private members which, under our rules, receive attention in the early days of the session but might not receive the same opportunity for debate later in the session and that, as hon. members know, there are not similar restrictions to the discussion if we are considering a debate that comes under the heading of government orders. Legislation with respect to the Small Loans Act will be introduced under the heading of government orders.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is that bill to be introduced in the house or in the Senate?

Mr. Benidickson: I am not able to say as to that, Mr. Speaker. I believe it has just received consideration by the cabinet today in final draft form. That would be a matter on which the cabinet would make the decision, and I would think that decision would be made almost immediately.

I do not propose to deal with the merits of the particular bill before us because, as I say, there will be another and a better opportunity to do so later in the session. However, hon. members have asked why one would not readily accept a bill of this kind. I think I can give a very good illustration from a debate concerning the Small Loans Act, to which I can refer because it is the debate that took place last year. The sponsor of this particular bill introduced an amendment to the Small Loans Act last year, and at the same time I gave him the assurance that we would likely be considering legislation in this field this year I pointed out to him that I did not think his bill of last year was in a form that would satisfy even him.

I pointed out at that time that he was simply amending one section of the Small Loans Act, and that the effect of his measure neglected the licensing and regulation of small loans in a very wide area. The effect would be that the regulating and licensing provisions elsewhere provided for in the act would simply apply then to only such loans as were made at interest rates between ·95 of one per cent and one per cent, which as hon. members can recognize is a very narrow range.

So far as the bill we are discussing today is concerned, I do not want to delay the house because I know there are other items under public bills and orders of quite a worthy nature in which private members are interested, and doubtless they want to proceed with them. As I say, there will be another opportunity to discuss this matter. I think some hon. members—including, I believe, the sponsor of the bill—referred to the desire that there should be no charges—I believe that was the word he used—in connection with loans that would involve costs exceeding 12 per cent. I point out to him that in its present form the amendment he has introduced would not ensure that a lender would not be able to make an agreement with a borrower under which the borrower would be obliged to pay, shall we say the insurance premium cost, the cost of drawing up a chattel mortgage, legal fees and various things of that kind which, if taken into account, would be a rather expensive item so far as the borrowing of that money was concerned.

In the Small Loans Act there is a section stipulating that the charges to the borrower must be all-inclusive of not only interest but any other incidental charge related to the borrowing of the money. The hon. member would not accomplish purposes of the kind described in debate by the bill he has introduced today. Therefore when hon. members see the government legislation that is to be introduced almost immediately I think they will realize that the opportunity for a wide discussion of the Small Loans Act will be most beneficial to members of the house before they make up their minds on the question of lending and interest rates generally, particularly when they can see how easy it is to pass legislation such as this that does not take care of costs of all kinds relating to a loan.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, and without discussing in detail the points raised by a number of hon. members, because an opportunity to do that will come at another time this session, I should like to move that the house do now proceed to the next order of business so as to provide other private members an opportunity to debate other measures under public bills and orders, because this is the last debating day provided for the discussion of public orders.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Benidickson) which was agreed to on the following division:

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMMUNICATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9 to amend the Income Tax Act (communication of information).

He said: In presenting this bill, Mr. Speaker, I am conscious of the fact that it is contrary to government policy as it obtains at the present time. I hope no member on the government side will be afraid to stand by government policy, in view of the news in the press this afternoon as to what sometimes happens to a member as the result of taking such a position. At any rate, we are all enjoying the publicity which the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) is achieving, and we are glad to know the shot was not fired at him personally but only at his appearance on television.

Someone is reminding me that there are two Tuckers anyway, so we are very glad one of them is still with us.

Mr. Tucker: If I did not have nine lives the C.C.F. would have got me long ago.

Mr. Argue: We have got you eight times so far.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Knowles: The purpose of Bill No. 9 is to amend section 133 of the Income Tax Act. The proposed amendment is not new to this house. Indeed, I have presented a bill in similar terms on several occasions in recent years. Section 133 of the Income Tax Act provides for ironclad secrecy with respect to information obtained through income tax returns. It is our contention that although such secrecy is proper with respect to the income tax returns of individuals, the iron curtain should be lifted so far as corporation income tax returns are concerned.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to speak at any length to this bill, for the reason that all the arguments have been advanced a number of times across the years. We feel that corporations are matters of public concern. The business they do affects the economy of the nation. The income taxes they pay either increase the income of the federal treasury, thereby reducing the amount that others have to pay, or their income taxes are reduced, leaving a deficit to be made up by others, notably by individual income taxpayers. Therefore we feel that corporation income tax matters are of public concern, and that it should not be possible for everything in relation to corporation income tax to be carried on behind a wall of secrecy.

I do not suggest in this bill that every corporation income tax return should be printed and made public. Apart from other reasons for not advocating such a proposal, it would involve a tremendous amount of printing that certainly would not be useful or necessary. But we do feel that, particularly where members of parliament believe that information contained in certain corporation income tax returns should be made available, it should be possible for a minister of the crown to give that information. Hence, all this bill does is add to the secrecy provision which is now set out in section 133 this proviso:

> Provided that nothing in this section shall operate to prevent a minister of the crown from communicating to the Senate or to the House of Commons any information with respect to corporations obtained under the provisions of this act.

I emphasize again the fact that the proviso which my bill would add to section 133 does not alter the secrecy that now obtains with respect to individual income tax returns.

There are those who have offered as an argument against my bill the suggestion that most corporation income matters are already made public through the annual reports and financial statements which are published by all corporations. I recognize that fact, Mr. Speaker. That is one of the reasons why I do not think we should go to the extent of requiring all of this material to be published again. But what is not made public, either in the annual financial statements of the corporations or in any other way, is what goes on in arrangements that take place between corporations and the income tax branch.

All of us know, Mr. Speaker, that an individual income tax return, particularly in the case of a great number of Canadian individuals, is a relatively simple matter. The average taxpayer may not call it a simple matter the night he is making out his income tax form, but it is relatively simple. He discovers, for example, that there are not very many deductions he can make. The average taxpayer is limited, so far as deductions are concerned, to contributions he may make to an approved pension plan and to his trade union dues, together with charitable donations and medical expenses. Both those latter items are limited, as set out in the act. I shall not go into the details now.

Beyond those deductions, of course, there are the statutory deductions of $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married person, and a deduction for each child. There are no other deductions that the ordinary taxpayer, filling out the simple form, is permitted to make. As a result there is not much leeway; there is not much question as to what the average individual's amount of income tax will be. It is a very simple matter to work out. But when you come to corporations, the list of items that can be regarded as deductible is very long. In addition, there are the questions of depreciation and all the other kinds of allowances that are provided so far as corporations are concerned.

Obviously, in the very nature of things, when you have so many different factors in the picture as you have with respect to the computing of corporation income tax, there can be a good deal of leeway, a good deal of dispute as to what amounts should be allowed. We all know that these things make a great deal of work for accountants and lawyers, both on the side of the corporations and on the side of the income tax branch.

We have no way of knowing, Mr. Speaker, to what extent certain kinds of expenses are allowed. There is this whole question of advertising. To what extent does one firm get the advertising it claims allowed as deductible before it pays income tax, as compared with the extent accorded to another firm? When is advertising really advertising? When is it political propaganda, or propaganda on the part of an employer against a trade union with which it has a dispute? These are the kinds of things that are involved in arriving at the amount of income tax to be paid by a corporation.

We feel that one corporation as against another should have the right to know what yardstick is being applied, what rules are being used, so there might be fairness as amongst various corporations and so they might know that there is fairness. In addition, we feel the public has a right to know to what extent all of us are really paying for some of the things for which corporations take the credit.

For example, to what extent are we, out of the public treasury, paying for all the advertising with which we are being flooded at the present time? I will not break the rule and refer to the debate that took place earlier today, but I can remind hon. members again that finance companies and loan companies, as well as many other companies, are flooding us, through the press and by radio and television, with a tremendous amount of advertising. We are conscious of the fact that the consumers pay for that advertising in the price of the product, but it is also true that a portion of that advertising is paid for out of the public treasury to the extent that such advertising is allowed as a deductible expense to those corporations. I think that is a matter of public interest and of public concern. I think we should be able to get information as to how much this company or the other was allowed as a deduction for its advertising expenses. That is a type of question that we could get answered if it was not for the ironclad secrecy which is provided in section 133 as it now stands.

I have referred in passing to disputes that take place from time to time between employers and employees. Frequently in such disputes the management will indulge in full page newspaper advertisements stating its side of the case as against that of the union; but when I have asked in the House of Commons as to whether the cost of that advertising was allowed as a deductible expense—in other words, was it being paid for out of the public treasury—I was told that this information could not be given because of the secrecy provision.

So one might go down the list. There are these full page advertisements which the chartered banks publish in the newspapers at the end of the year. I think it would have to be admitted that frequently they are largely political documents. They express views on matters of political concern. Sometimes we in this movement are favoured by being the object of that advertising; sometimes it is pro-government as against the official opposition. To the extent that this sort of thing is political in nature, is it not a fair question to ask if it is being paid for at least in part out of the public treasury by means of an allowance against taxable income before taxes are paid?

The whole question of political advertising could be raised more directly. Are there instances where firms are in effect making contributions to political causes, but doing so indirectly by paying for advertising or by charging up some other kind of expense and receiving a deduction for it? There certainly have been suggestions in the past that this kind of thing goes on. The government of course denies—and I would expect the government to deny it—that there is any recognition by the income tax branch of contributions to political parties as such. But do we not have the right to know whether income tax deductibility is being allowed for some other kinds of expenses which might appear to some of us as being in effect contributions in support of a particular political cause.

The question of brewery and distillery advertising, and indeed the whole question of the brewery and distillery business could be raised. To what extent are their expenses allowed or disallowed for income tax purposes? I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that all of this raises questions as to the treatment of one firm as against another, and it also raises the question as to whether or not the public interest is being fully protected.

I have no doubt as to the zeal of the income tax branch in its determination to collect from every possible source all the revenue the law says must be collected. I would point out, however, that parliament has a place in activities of this kind, and I do not think we should be asked simply to take it on the word of the department that this is being done.

A great many matters have been raised in discussion in the last week or two and there has been some difficulty obtaining information concerning these matters which we feel parliament has the right to know about. I feel the same thing applies in this important field.

I said a moment ago that when an individual files his income tax return he discovers it does not take too long to fill out his form because there are only two or three things he can claim by way of deduction, but if you are in business or if the case is that of a corporation it is a somewhat different story. I am always interested in these voluminous books which are published as a guide to completing income tax returns. I have one such book in my hand at this moment consisting of 118 pages and entitled "Your Income Tax". This is a booklet that tells individuals and corporations how to make out their returns to their best advantage, and of course it is full of suggestions as to what one can do to achieve that end. In addition to that I have in my hand another tiny document called "Canadian Pocketax" which purports to be an authoritative guide on income tax, gift tax, succession duties, etc.

If one turns to pages 20 to 24 of this little booklet one will find a long list under the heading "Deductible Items". In fact I have counted the number of main headings in this list and I find there are 46 of them, not including all the little subheadings. I am just going to read some of them: accounting expenses, advertising expenses, automobile expenses for business use, appraisal cost for insurance, bad debts, bank charges, carrying charges, efficiency experts' fees, hire of capital equipment, industrial engineers' fees, insurance premiums, fire, theft and so on. Then there is interest on borrowed money, interest on succession duties, legal expenses. There are a couple of subheadings there, to collect business debts and to defend action under the Combines Investigation Act. I move on to management costs, production control costs, raw material costs, sales promotion expenses, secretarial expenses, taxes on real assets, technical assistance, telephone and so on.

I again make the point, Mr. Speaker, that in view of that list—and I did not exhaust it by any means—it is obvious that there is a great deal of room for dispute, a great deal of leeway, and much room for bargaining, arranging and discussing as to what is the correct amount of tax that a corporation should pay. I feel it would be in the public interest that where it is desired we should be able to get at that information, so we may know what we are in effect paying for out of the public treasury and can therefore know whether or not we are receiving from private corporations all that the public treasury should receive under the income tax law as it stands.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I shall be quite brief in contributing to this debate. We are all fairly familiar with the arguments which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has put forward, because this is not the first time he has spoken on this matter.

Parliament has thought it wise to make these returns confidential. The hon. member who has just spoken approves of that in so far as individuals are concerned, but not in so far as corporations are concerned. That seems to me to be unsound. In fact I think you could almost make an argument that in the case of individuals it is only their personal feelings that are concerned but in the case of corporations, if you force them to disclose all the details of their business you may actually injure them in competition. In speaking of competition I think one should bear in mind that corporations compete not only with each other but with non-incorporated businesses.

Today a friend of mine gave me a rather astonishing illustration of this. He spoke of a case where a certain corporation for which he had worked showed a profit of $2,500, while a certain unincorporated body for which he worked had a profit of over $1 million. I feel the idea which many people hold that corporations are big and individuals are small leads us too far afield. Consequently I want to back to the basis on which this is proposed to be done.

I was rather struck with the fact that the hon. member said the minister should apparently exercise this discretion, and a difficult discretion it would be, at the instance of a Member of Parliament. Now, I am a Member of Parliament, and I should like to be able to think well of myself and of all of my colleagues. However, he seemed to suggest that if a Member of Parliament wanted to go and obtain information from the minister then that was, as I gathered from him, almost a sanction in itself.

As a matter of fact it seems to me that there is a double, almost a triple, objection to the minister having this discretion. First of all I take it that parliament if it wished could by resolution or otherwise—the hon. member knows more about procedure than I do—get the facts if it wanted to. It could get whatever information it considered desirable. I do not think this discretion should be taken away and given to the minister.

As a matter of fact I think it might be argued that there are two objections almost opposite to each other. If you had this discretion in the minister a very conscientious minister might feel that he had to disclose all cases, whereas another minister might not be so conscientious and be even suspected of allowing bias of various kinds to sway him. I do not believe that the minister should be given any such discretion. I have tried to imagine how such discretion would be exercised, and I find it extremely difficult. My colleague suggests that it would be dangerous as well.

I want to come back to the basis of this. It is not a flimsy basis; it is not technical; it is full of common sense. Under the provisions of our law people are asked to make a full disclosure of their position. As I said a moment ago, I think it would hurt less if individual income tax information were disclosed. At any rate, business comes along and makes a full disclosure of facts which are withheld from competitors. Facts of great importance to the conduct of their business are disclosed to officials of the Department of National Revenue. I feel that the practice which has been followed is sound, that it is based on common sense. I think the reasons for suggesting that it is not well carried out are flimsy, and I feel that this bill should not pass.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in support of the position taken by the hon. member for Greenwood and against the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Before I do so I think I should make some reference to the opening remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which were made in all good nature. I am sure we were all glad he made them, because it was an amusing episode about which we all have read with such delight on the front pages of today's newspapers. I think it indicates the affection and respect with which the hon. member for Rosthern is regarded by members in all parties in this house. I think it is worthy to note that he himself laughed most heartily at the joke which we all shared. I sometimes believe it is a great compliment to any speaker, when people cannot find the answer they are seeking, that they must resort to what one might call Manitoba C.C.F. confetti.

Speaking seriously about the bill proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, may I say that personally I am completely opposed to the suggestion he made. None of us in this country likes to pay taxes of any kind, and none of us likes to pay income taxes. I for one do not believe that an individual or corporation should be subjected to any kind of political inquisition as a by-product of having to make a return to the Department of National Revenue.

I think perhaps that is the thing which divides me from my hon. friends immediately opposite, more than any other point. I agree with almost everything for which they stand in the way of social welfare, although I sometimes feel a bit sorry for them because the Liberal party has so completely supplied all the welfare measures which my hon. friends have stood for that it is almost like a man who has lost the upper part of his bathing suit being threatened with the loss of the lower part as well.

I believe there is danger in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Corporations are compelled by the law of the land to file returns in great detail with the Department of National Revenue. There are many of us who over the years have found out how extremely efficient that department is in checking even he amount spent on travelling, say from Vancouver to New Westminster. I think we will all agree that the Department of National Revenue is not allowing anything to slip in the way of collecting taxes due to his country.

As to the suggestion that these income tax returns should be made a sort of mine or bonus for members of parliament from which they could obtain information against corporations which in the ordinary course of events they could not get, may I say that I for one am completely opposed to it. I am opposed to it because I think it is wrong, and I am opposed to it even more on the ground that I am a member of parliament trying to do my duty to my constituents and I have enough to do in connection with immigration and other kinds of cases without wanting to be burdened with the insidious task of having a corporation write to me to try to get secret information on its competitors by using my privileges as a member of parliament.

For that reason, and there are a great many others I could give, I am completely opposed to the bill proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly in support of the bill which stands in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As has been mentioned already, this is not a new subject in this house, and the usual objections have been raised to the adoption of this amendment.

First of all, what is the situation today? If I understood the argument presented by the hon. member for Greenwood it was that this amendment would provide discretion for the Minister of National Revenue which he does not possess today, and would put him in the position of possibly or potentially abusing that discretion.

What is the situation today? We find that when a question is asked or an order for return passed with respect to a corporation the minister is able to brush it off by saying that he cannot give the information because of the provisions of the Income Tax Act which prohibit him from doing so. That places hon. members of this house in the position, not of being up against the discretion of the minister, but of having the minister tell the house that he cannot give the information because he is prohibited from doing so.

On the other hand, if this amendment were to carry it would not give the Minister of National Revenue any more discretion, but it would give discretion to the house as a whole in seeking information and in passing motions for certain returns. It would be the responsibility of all hon. members to decide whether that information should or should not be brought down.

Therefore, unless I misunderstood the hon. member for Greenwood, I fail to see how the passing of the amendment would give the Minister of National Revenue any greater discretion than now exists. It would still be the responsibility of members of the house or a majority of them to decide at any time a motion was made for the bringing down of certain information, whereas at the present time discretion is not in the hands of the members of the house but the matter is controlled by a provision in the act which prohibits the giving out of information.

There are many reasons why this information should be made available. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was quite correct when he stated that this change would not lead to anything like what has been envisaged by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) when he referred to an inquisition involving every return of every corporation. Perhaps that is a very extreme example, but there come times when certain information should be made available in the public interest.

I can recall that during last year's session of the house I personally sought certain information with respect to certain corporations which had received a remission of taxes, and just at the point when we were beginning to get some information we were told, "That is as far as you can go; the act prohibits the giving out of any further information." Therefore we had to accept the explanation of the government as to what they had done.

Unsatisfactory though it was, that was as far as we could pursue the matter, and it was only our imagination against their word. Therefore occasions do arise when I think it becomes necessary for the house to concern itself with the protection of the public interest. I believe that members of the house as representatives of the public can be trusted to use their good judgment to seek the kind of information necessary for the protection of the public interest, and not to seek information for the purpose of giving any corporation an advantage over another or to seek information purely out of curiosity.

For example, there is the question of deductions. The hon. member who introduced the bill has already given a few examples of what may happen where the deductions in respect of one corporation may be far more lenient than in the case of another. Who is going to judge whether a fair and square deal is being given to all corporations? We, the public's representatives, who after all represent all the people of Canada including the corporations—

Mr. Trainor: Are you very concerned about them?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes, I am just as concerned about one corporation as I am about another.

Mr. Trainor: That is a very sudden change.

Mr. Zaplitny: I want to see a fair deal given to all. At the present time, however, we are not in a position to find out on what basis these deductions are being given. There may be a particular need for such information in a case where the government itself becomes involved with a private corporation. That is something that may happen at any time now. For example, the arrangement being made among the federal government, the government of the province of Ontario and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is something which to a degree combines the operations of a private company with those of a crown company. There is a case where it may become very necessary for the public's representatives, in order to ensure that the public interest is being protected, to know just what is going on with respect to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to the extent that it is involved in a joint enterprise with a crown corporation. I am sure, however, that unless this provision of the act is changed there will come a time in the house when we will be seeking that information, and we will be told that the act does not permit it to be given.

Then we have the question, touched upon in passing, of deductions by corporations with respect to contributions they make either indirectly or directly for political purposes. It is a very interesting field. I recall that two years ago the former member for Quebec South, who is now a member of the other place, wrote an article which appeared, if I remember correctly, in MacLean's Magazine. It was a most interesting article written by a gentleman with wide experience in that particular field, a man who had been responsible for a great deal of the fund raising for the Liberal party, and who was intimately acquainted with the methods and procedures used in keeping the treasury full.

We must remember that the article was written by one who sat as a Liberal member in the house, and therefore he would take a lenient view in writing it with repect to his own party; but even what was disclosed in the article was enough to indicate that there must be a good deal going on behind the scenes about which the public is not allowed to know anything. We know, and the members of the government know, that there are corporations which, by their own admission, make very substantial contributions to the funds required by the Liberal party for election purposes. I am sure they are not going to deny that; if they are I hope they will speak up now. They do not, so that is established.

Mr. Harris: Don't be silly.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am admonished by the Minister of Finance not to be silly. I am glad he spoke up, because if he wishes to deny it right now I will give him the opportunity, and then we will proceed from there.

Mr. Harris: If I told you what I am thinking you would not like it.

Mr. Zaplitny: The minister may say what he pleases, but the point I have made is this.

Mr. Bennett: Oh, go on with your speech.

Mr. Zaplitny: That is exactly what I am doing. The point I have made is that the huge corporations of this country have, by their own admission, made very substantial financial contributions to the Liberal party. I have stated that if any member of the government or the party opposite wishes to deny that statement I will be glad to hear it. Instead of that—

Mr. McCann: What is wrong with it?

Mr. Zaplitny: That puts a different face on it entirely. Now one of them speaks up and says, "What is wrong with it?". It depends on which way you look at it.

Mr. McCann: Yes, exactly.

Mr. Zaplitny: From the point of view of good Liberals there would not be anything wrong with it. As a matter of fact, if it were not for that I imagine the great majority of them would not be here at all.

Mr. Hosking: Who pays your expenses?

Mr. Zaplitny: It helps them to overcome their opponents. Another gentleman from the Liberal ranks speaks up and asks who pays my expenses. I am glad that question was asked, because it so happens that in any election in which I have participated, and there have been six of them, I have never gone outside my supporters in my own constituency to ask for five cents, nor have I ever accepted anything. That is more than the hon. gentleman who asked the question can say, I am sure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing second reading of Bill No. 9, an act to amend the Income Tax Act.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

Income Tax Act

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had just drawn attention to the fact that many of these large corporations whose income tax details are protected under the present statute do in fact make substantial contributions to the treasury of the Liberal party. At that point the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) interrupted to ask, "What is wrong with that?" That brings up for consideration an interesting principle, because if the government takes the attitude that there is nothing wrong—

Mr. Carrick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not think the Minister of National Revenue asked what was wrong with it. What he said was that it was nonsense.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Zaplitny: If the Minister of National Revenue said "nonsense" it would not be the first time he has said it. But as I heard it, the minister wanted to know what was wrong with corporations making contributions to the Liberal party. If the minister did not say that, of course I shall be glad to withdraw it; but that is my understanding of what he interrupted me to say. That in itself is not entirely the question. The question with which we are faced is this.

Mr. McCann: Speak a little more loudly, please.

Mr. Zaplitny: The question with which we are faced is this. To what extent are the government's actions influenced by such contributions from big business? A great many people in Canada today believe that the federal government is being unduly influenced by big business.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Zaplitny: I hear some hon. members across the floor laughing. I imagine they do not agree with me. I have before me some figures which were taken in a recent public opinion poll in which people were asked who, in their opinion, influences the federal government most. Of the 84 per cent of those who had an opinion to express, 37 per cent said "big business". I think that must include a large number of the Canadian people.

But be that as it may, the question with which we are faced is this. Under the present provisions of the statute the Minister of National Revenue, when a request is made for information with respect to the income tax of a particular corporation, may reply as he has replied in the past—and quite properly under the present statute—that he is prohibited by the statute itself from giving that information.

What this amendment would do is this. It would not automatically disclose the details of the returns of all the corporations of Canada, but would simply leave to the members of the house the discretion as to whether that information in any particular case should or should not be disclosed. In other words, it would take way that umbrella provision under which the minister at the present time, without justifying his refusal on the grounds of public interest or for any other reason, may simply state that under the statute he is prohibited from giving the information, and that is the end of that. This amendment is an attempt to place the responsibility as to what information shall be given by the government in the hands of the members of this house, where I think it properly belongs.

As representatives of the public we have a right to know what is going on. We must be in a position to answer to these people upon whom taxes are levied and whose money is being spent out of the public treasury. We must be able to answer questions that are put to us. It is a poor position for a public representative to be in when he is obliged to say to his constituents, the Canadian people, "I am sorry, but I cannot give you this information because it is prohibited by statute". Prohibited by whom? Prohibited by the members of this house, because they are the ones who passed the statute in the first place, and they are the ones who must amend the statute if they are going to change the situation. That is what this amendment seeks to do.

Questions arise from time to time. A while ago I mentioned the disclosures that were made by a former member of this house, in which he stated quite frankly that the party of which he was a member—that is the Liberal party—received substantial contributions from various corporations. Various corporation officials themselves have admitted that they make substantial contributions to the party cause. People have a right to know whether such donations or contributions are deductible as an expense when these corporations file their income tax returns. They want to know whether political advertising, which is an indirect contribution to the party's cause, is deductible as a legitimate expense with respect to their income tax returns. They want to know whether in fact the Department of National Revenue collects all the revenue which is lawfully payable to the treasury by the various corporations.

As representatives of the public the members of this house, in their opinion, have a right to be able to assure the public that this matter is being properly handled, that the laws of this country are being properly carried out, and also that the public treasury is not put in the position of being obliged to subsidize any political party in this country, because that is exactly what happens when a corporation may pay for political advertising, make cash contributions or in any way, directly or indirectly, pay into the coffers of the political party in power and, as a return for so doing, be able to deduct that amount as a legitimate expense in making their income tax returns. As representatives of the public we want to be in the position of being able to check on that kind of activity.

That is the main purpose of this amendment. I want to emphasize again, Mr. Speaker, that far from this amendment giving more discretion to the Minister of National Revenue or to any other minister, it is putting the discretion in the hands of the members of this house, where it belongs.

Within the last few days we have been faced with the situation that the government has been in a position to refuse enough information, or to refuse information often enough, without any statute calling for secrecy but simply on the basis that it is not, in their opinion, in the public interest to disclose such information. For example, even this afternoon the Leader of the Opposition was told that the government could not table a certain export permit having to do with the export of arms, not because it was prohibited by statute but because, in the opinion of the government, it would not be in the public interest. We are not even in a position to find out what is being done by private concerns with respect to arms shipments which affect both domestic and international policy.

Without even having a statutory prohibition, there are enough grounds on which the government finds it possible to refuse information. I see no reason why there should be any extra umbrella of secrecy under which they can continue to refuse information which should be in the hands of this parliament.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska.

Mr. Knowles: You little people are having a lot of trouble.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, there happen to be two little men up on their feet. I shall yield to my hon. friend, but I will say that I was up on my feet at six o'clock, thinking that the hon. member for Dauphin was through.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take part in this debate for many reasons. The first is that the measure under discussion was introduced by my good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In the second place, I would think that as a matter of parliamentary procedure, he is out of bounds in bringing in legislation such as that which he is trying to present today. Even if the intentions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are always the best, the words he uses to express his intentions do not always represent God's will. I should say that in the present case what he is aiming at is to destroy the most important piece of legislation in any of the democratic countries in the world. He is doing this by introducing one of those shadowy measures which will cut at the roots of our economic system.

When the hon. member asks us to vote for a measure which will have the effect of disclosing in this house the income tax returns made by corporations, he is asking something that will reduce the Income Tax Act to nothing. I shall try to make my point on that. It is against the procedure in our courts of justice to have these documents produced and examined by judges. This measure is an indirect way of cutting at the root of the Income Tax Act. He is asking us to do one thing for one purpose, and next year he will come and say, "Let us do it again for another purpose." The income tax returns would be open to the public and I think that would be the worst thing that could happen in our country. By their very nature these income tax returns are confidential.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would not be pleased to have his tax return published in the newspapers of this country. I am sure he is doing right when he makes his return, and I am sure all the people of Canada make honest returns. But they are confidential documents, and are considered as confidential documents in every country in the world.

Let us examine what May says about it. I am taking the citation from Campion, "Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons," at page 195:

> The rule as laid down by May page 433 is "a minister is not at liberty to read or quote from a dispatch or other state paper not before the house, unless he is prepared to lay it upon the table."

If, therefore, a question arose in the house about a return made by a corporation, the minister would be forced to deposit the return on the table, because he could not talk about it or refer to it without doing so. In this way all returns made by corporations could be produced, deposited on the table of this parliament and be open to public discussion. I should think that would be against public security, in the sense that any corporation is entitled to make a return in the knowledge that it will not be made public.

Let us go further; let us go before the courts of justice. It has been acknowledged by the courts of this country that an income tax return is to be considered a confidential document which should not be disclosed in any trial. This rule has been followed, with one exception, by every court in Canada. What will happen to that rule if we vote for this measure introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? All the returns made by corporations would be tabled in the house and would become public. It would be impossible, therefore, in any trial to keep those returns as privileged documents. They could be introduced in any trial concerning income tax.

In my opinion this legislation is not aimed at the good of Canada, the good of the corporations or the good of the people. In the end it would mean sabotaging the Income Tax Act. If there is one law which has to be protected by this parliament it is the Income Tax Act. I know some people would like to know what there is behind the corporations in this country. It is easy to find out what is behind the big corporations. Their business is well known to everybody. The large corporations advertise the results of their yearly business by publishing reports in our newspapers. Anyone who wants to know these things can find out by looking at the newspapers, and does not need to ask this parliament to make a disclosure of income tax returns.

I do not wish to take much of the time of this house, because it is so precious. However, when I see legislation that is tending toward a system that will bring no good to anyone, I am glad to fight against it. I am of the opinion that this measure is only aimed at the destruction of a system which has built this country, and which is now making this country one of the greatest in the world.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the legislation presented by the hon. member constitutes an amendment to the present Income Tax Act. One should analyse this amendment very carefully. I cannot help thinking that my hon. friend has not given enough thought to its wording. I am rather inclined to think that if the amendment passed it would turn out that he would eventually get something he did not want. The bill does not make it mandatory for the minister to give information when it is asked for. If it were mandatory perhaps this group would have looked upon it with a little more favour than it does. It would still give the minister a perfect right to withhold information if he so desired. The only thing that would happen is that the minister could not be fined $200 if he did give the information, but if he did not want to he would not have to.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we examine this amendment more carefully we shall discover that it could be one of the most dangerous pieces of political legislation to have on our statute books. Let me visualize what could happen. I am not saying it would happen. Suppose, for instance, there is a corporation in the province of Saskatchewan in which members of the government have an interest, or some member of the government has an interest. Suppose we take it into the political realm. Let us suppose that a Liberal from Saskatchewan should get wind of something that was unsavoury in connection with that company and should move on the floor of the house for the production of the income tax papers respecting that company. The minister intimates that he is quite willing to give that information and he does so. I would go so far as to say that if there is something unsavoury about it perhaps it should be revealed. Nevertheless this is the picture. He reveals the information and somebody is destroyed. The government of Saskatchewan could conceivably be destroyed.

Let us take another province which we will suppose is a Liberal province. Some member of the opposition gets wind of something that is unsavoury in connection with a corporation, and he moves for the production of the income tax files of this particular corporation. The minister rises in his place and says that he does not think it is in the best interests to reveal the details of that particular case. Of course the house will not get the information then. Therefore I am saying it could be used—I am not saying it would be, because I will not accuse this government of being capable of doing a thing like that—as one of the most dangerous pieces of political legislation we have. I wish the hon. member would give consideration to that. Of course the legislation does not present itself favourably to me or to many of my colleagues. I have not talked it over with all of them.

We are still living under a competitive system. We are still living under a system where we believe that competition is the life of trade. This piece of legislation might be all right if there were a socialist government sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, under which every man's business and every corporation's business could be revealed, if there was a corporation left that was not government-owned. But we in this group still believe in the private enterprise system; we still believe in the competitive system, much as may be desired in respect to it. We do not believe we can take the abuses out of it in this way. In fact it might give rise to even more serious and worse abuses. There should be other ways of doing the same thing.

It could reasonably work in this way. If a corporation has given some funds to the party in office—we know there are some who contribute to the party in power, and some contribute to my friends and some to us, but we do not seem to get very much; corporations and people do support all political parties—it could work out in this way. A corporation may say, "We will give you a donation, but when we give it to you it is going to become public knowledge. If it becomes public knowledge we might lose business, and therefore you see that you take care of us." It could work in that way.

I do not see how the proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act will do what the hon. member wants done. Once again I say, let us have it one way or the other. Let us not leave it to the discretion of the minister. Either leave the thing the way it is or else make it mandatory. Personally I do not think I would be in favour of making it mandatory. We have to give governments a certain amount of authority. They have to collect taxes, and we have to give them the authority to collect without letting the whole nation know everybody's business. That is my view of it. I feel quite certain that if our friends were sitting on the other side of the house they would take the very same view.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned I am afraid I shall have to vote against the amendment.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to make available to the House of Commons, through the minister, information supplied by corporate taxpayers. In so far as it has been advanced on the basis that it is right and proper, that the House of Commons should be able to call for all information that is necessary or desirable to enable it to discharge its duties, a principle of that kind would commend itself to all members of the house. Parliament can only function if it is able to inform itself. Parliamentary privilege assures that the House of Commons is able to inform itself. If that were the purpose of the bill we might look at it favourably.

The other principle of the bill, as I understand it, is that the house suspects the ministry in the way it administers the income tax laws, and wants to obtain information to demonstrate that its suspicions are well founded. We on this side of the house of course know that the ministry deserves suspicion, and that principle certainly commends itself to everyone on this side, but the proper remedy is to turn out the ministry and get one which is above suspicion, and not to go tinkering with somewhat basic legislation.

Looking at the bill itself and the arguments which have been advanced in its support, we see different reasons for this peculiar little bill which appears to be so virtuous and yet has in it the seeds of so much discrimination and snooping. What is the information in question? The information is that which is supplied by taxpayers, all people who are called upon to pay income tax whether they are individuals or corporations. That is information to which the government would not otherwise have access, which would not be gathered in one place if we did not have income tax laws and taxpayers were not required to divulge their income so the government could ascertain with reasonable accuracy whether or not the taxpayer was paying his full tax.

Let us not forget that this information is forced out of the taxpayer for one purpose, and one purpose alone. It is not there to inform all and sundry, to disclose the business of the corporation or of the individual unrelated to the payment of taxes. It is really private information, and the principle of the act has been to keep it private for the purpose of seeing that the income tax due is paid.

As I listened to the arguments presented by the sponsor of this bill I came to the conclusion that apparently his fear was that improper deductions were being made. In other words his fear was that the income tax officials were allowing corporations to make deductions which they were not entitled to make. He suggested certain advertising expenses as an example. He did not suggest any yardstick by which the propriety of deductions could be measured, but I am sure the officials have a yardstick and when they find a corporation has spent too much in advertising an inquiry is made to see just where the money went and to ascertain whether it is properly deductible from income.

We then came down to what seemed to be the real nub of the matter, and that is whether corporations might be allowed to make political contributions and have them deducted from taxable income. I do not consider that there is any difference in principle among the hon. members of this house with respect to the deduction of political contributions. They are not properly deductible as income tax exemptions. If corporations make political contributions they make them out of their own funds, at their own expense. That information is open to any member of the house. Any hon. member could rise in the question period and ask the minister whether or not the political contributions made by corporations are allowed as tax deductions by those corporations, but I am satisfied that is not the principle followed in the administration of the act.

Disregarding the principle, we are urged to inquire into specific cases to see whether or not the ministry is properly enforcing the law. As I suggested previously, the remedy for lack of confidence in the ministry is one that is well known under the parliamentary system; in fact, it is the basis of parliamentary government. Those who supported the bill did not ask the ministry this question. They did not ask the principles on which deductions are allowed. They want instead to snoop into the affairs of certain corporations.

This brings me to the other objection I have to this bill, and which I think every fair-minded member will have. I refer to the fact that it singles out one type of entity in a most discriminating manner. That is to say, it singles out the taxpaying corporation from amongst the taxpayers who are required to supply information, and it does this on no sound basis of distinction and with no principle behind it. The discrimination is between those taxpayers who are corporations and those who are individuals. It is not for the purpose of collecting taxes; it is for the purpose of finding out what political contributions have been made. It does not reach all those who might be interested in making political contributions. There are entities other than taxpaying individuals and corporations, who would not be touched at all by this legislation.

I need not enumerate too many of them to show that there is a discrimination in that respect if the purpose of the bill is what the sponsors have indicated it to be. In the first place, on no sound basis of distinction—I will just elaborate on this for a moment—it leaves out a person who is in business, who spends money on advertising and who has just as much right as a corporation to deduct this expense from his taxable income. So there is no real difference in principle, as was suggested by the sponsor of the bill.

[Mr. Michener.]

In fact, all that long list of 46 expenses, with the possible exception of one or two—and I am not sure there are any real exceptions—apply equally to an individual who is carrying on a commercial business as they do to a corporation, because the same expenses are met by an individual in earning a profit and carrying on a business as are met by a corporation, and the individual is properly entitled to deduct all expenses necessarily paid to earn a taxable income. There is a considerable argument in the fact that the individual as well as the corporation is not only subject to inquiry as to the basis of his expenses but there is the first problem which the tax authorities have to determine and that is, what is his income?

There is a good deal of information which may be required to determine that question. What is income may depend on the difficult distinction between what is commonly called a capital gain and what is properly called income or revenue. This distinction which the proposed bill seeks to establish as between an individual and a corporation is entirely without any foundation in reason; therefore I say it is discriminatory. It leaves out the individuals as taxpayers, but it also leaves out individuals who are not taxpayers, non-profit corporations which are not taxpayers, other corporations which are not taxable, certain co-operatives and trade unions which have been alleged to make political contributions, crown corporations, municipal corporations and other bodies who have funds in their possession which they are free to spend and which are not subject to scrutiny under the provisions of this bill.

For the purpose for which it was designed this bill is a discriminatory measure which no one should consider as sound legislation in amendment of the Income Tax Act, which has been devised after very careful study not only by the authorities and the best brains of the administration but by those who are taxpayers, their various organizations and the community at large.

No; the shaft is aimed at the secrets of the taxpaying corporation alone, with a view to prying into how they spend their own money. The C.C.F. party, which professes to be free of discrimination and to treat all equally, hereby discloses its most common political phobia, abuse of those who endeavour to make a profit.

An hon. Member: Hydrophobia.

Mr. Michener: Not individuals, because individuals have votes and so information as to their profits is not to be included. It is only corporations, which have no votes.

I suggest that the need in the case of corporations is less than in the case of those who are left out of this bill, because the laws of all the provinces and of the federal government require every corporation of any size engaged in a public operation to deliver to its shareholders 10 days in advance—14 days in the case of the dominion—of its annual meeting full particulars of its earnings and expenses, with a balance sheet properly audited and certified by reputable auditors. That is not required of most of the other entities and persons who would not be touched by this bill.

The bill itself seems to be unnecessary. I suggest that the present section of the Income Tax Act does not prevent parliament from calling for any of this information by a proper order duly passed with the approval of a majority of this house.

Mr. Knowles: Members of the hon. member's party have tried that quite often.

Mr. Michener: The section reads:

> 133. Every person who, while employed in the service of Her Majesty, has communicated or allowed to be communicated to a person not legally entitled thereto—any information obtained under this act or has allowed any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under this act is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $200.

Those are the key words, "person not legally entitled thereto". The question is whether the present section could be read as meaning that parliament is a person not legally entitled to the information. If parliament is legally entitled to the information, then there would be no offence under this section and there would be nothing to prevent parliament asking for a particular bit of information on those occasions when a majority of the house thought it proper to call for it in the usual way by an order for return or whatever procedure might be adopted.

The definition of person is well known. The Interpretation Act defines a person as follows:

> (22) "person", or any word or expression descriptive of a person, includes any body corporate and politic, and the heirs, executors, administrators or other legal representatives of such person, according to the law of that part of Canada to which the context extends.

I do not think anyone will argue that the House of Commons is a body corporate or politic under the law of any part of Canada to which the Income Tax Act extends. Furthermore, this section does not prevent the crown from having the information. It is a well known maxim of construction that statutes do not apply to Her Majesty unless so specified. The crown is not "a person not legally entitled" to the information. I am not sure whether a minister is a person; some of them may be, but whether they are legal persons under this act may be doubtful. When you take into account the Interpretation Act as it stands there does not seem to be any real reason in law why it would be an offence for a member of the administration staff of the Department of National Revenue to produce papers called for by an order of this house.

On that account the bill would seem not to be needed, and it does not appear to advance the privileges of the house with respect to obtaining information that it thinks it should have. Therefore I suggest that this measure can only be described as a discriminatory, snooping bill for low partisan purposes.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this bill No. 6 might well be designated as the hardy perennial of the Canadian parliament.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister like to correct that? It is Bill No. 9.

Mr. McCann: It is six upside down. There have been so many arguments turned upside down that I referred to it as No. 6 instead of No. 9. For the sixth time this bill has been introduced by the hon. member in almost as many years. While I do not intend nor would I like to impute motives to the hon. gentleman, my opinion is that this bill is born more of curiosity and suspicion than with a view of doing any great public good.

I wonder why it is that the C.C.F. hate to see anyone make an honest dollar unless they can share it almost immediately. That is really what this does. The hon. gentleman started off by saying how he would like to see what discussions go on between corporations and the income tax branch. He does not make any accusations, but by innuendo and suspicion he attempts to cast reflections upon the administration of the national revenue department. I submit to him that the public interest is not being protected by arousing suspicions that things are not right in the Department of National Revenue.

The Income Tax Act came into being a few years ago following the old Income War Tax Act. It was introduced one session and then held over designedly to the next session for enactment in order that hon. members might have an opportunity to study it.

I think my hon. friend has introduced this bill following what he did last year, when he tried by every possible method of questioning to have me give information which I was not permitted to give. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that had I broken the provisions of the act and given the information which he requested in his series of questions he would have been the first to ask for my removal from office or see that I was fined $200. So I think the hon. gentleman is stooping to pretty low motives in wanting to put his nose in every other people's business.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McCann: All he has to do—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think it is quite parliamentary for any hon. member to say of another that he has stooped to pretty low motives. I think the minister would do well to withdraw the expression.

Mr. McCann: If the language is unparliamentary I withdraw it.

An hon. Member: With reservations.

Mr. McCann: With reservations.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McCann: I simply repeated what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Minister of National Revenue is quite capable of making his own remarks, and he would do well to withdraw the words "with reservations".

Mr. McCann: All right; I will do that. I want to say to the hon. member and members of his party that if they are so interested in corporate business, why do they not buy one share of a corporation, go to the annual meeting and ask all the questions they want to ask. They would then be able to find out all about the business of that particular corporation. But no, they want to parade before this house and before the public of this country all the details of business firms throughout the country, and then the next step will be the details of the business of individuals.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is not in the public interest. I submit further that it would be very definitely class legislation. All corporations are persons under the law, and they are entitled to the same protection of their rights. Every reason for maintaining the secrecy provisions for the protection of individuals applies with equal force to corporations. In fact the vast majority of corporations are owned by individuals through shareholdings, by one person or by a very small group who have assisted one person financially in the establishment or the extension of the business. Most of these corporations are in substance proprietorships under a legal corporate form. I do not intend that what I have to say shall be limited to small corporations, because I feel that my remarks apply to all corporations, whether large or small, just as they do to individuals.

As everyone knows from common knowledge, from time immemorial the Englishman's home has been his castle, and all matters pertaining to him and his family are protected by law from trespass or exposure. You cannot enter his house without his permission. You cannot ascertain his private affairs without voluntary disclosure. This right of privacy that every Englishman possesses is as strong in this country and in all the countries of the commonwealth as it is and has been from time immemorial in England, from whence we draw so many of our laws and so much of our tradition. This right of privacy that every Englishman possesses is, as I said, as strong in this country as in any other.

These comments are not comments in law. They are comments on things vital to the nation and the welfare of the people, and are instinctively understood, appreciated and jealously guarded by common consent of every citizen in every nation. The provisions of the Income Tax Act respecting the right of the taxpayer to have his appeal heard in camera, and the provisions respecting secrecy which the bill proposes to amend, have been in the Income Tax Act since it was first enacted away back in 1917.

I think it can be taken that these provisions are a recognition of the inherent right of the citizen to have his business affairs kept as private as possible. This right of privacy is necessarily invaded for the purpose of collecting taxes, but when that purpose has been attained these two present provisions of the act preserve to him that right of privacy in all his affairs. The tax laws of all countries of the commonwealth provide that disclosures of their affairs by taxpayers made to tax authorities are to be held confidential and secret.

The taxpayer is by statute compelled to produce and file with the government and its officials for the purposes of revenue, and for the purposes of revenue only, certain portions of his private affairs, namely his income, the contracts out of which his income is earned, his investments, his relations with other businesses, all of which from time to time play a part in determining what the taxpayer's income may be and have to be produced to the revenue officials. On many occasions in litigation between subject and subject litigants in order to advance their case have subpoenaed officers of the crown for the purpose of compelling them in the witness box to disclose information which came into their possession as officers of the crown under the compulsion of revenue laws, and to compel them to make disclosures. Where the matter was a civil question between subject and subject the courts have sustained the basic British right of privilege or privacy and secrecy pertaining to a man's affairs, and the inroad into those private affairs is not to be made through the medium of subpoenas.

I am informed that the courts have said that while the right of production as an abstract right is not to be denied the courts, it is equally clear that that abstract right is not to be invoked by order of the court to serve the end of litigants in our courts, which are places of public entry. Having secured the abstract right to the courts, they nevertheless realize the paramount need of the nation as a whole and do not issue orders demanding the production of documents which are received under compulsion of law in the course of carrying out a revenue measure.

In cases of litigation in civil courts between subject and subject our Canadian courts have followed the practice of the British courts of maintaining the right of the court to compel the production of any evidence; but where the Minister of National Revenue or his officers state that it would be injurious to the public interest to produce the documents or to give information, they have consistently held that production should not be made or evidence given. I should like to quote from the judgment in a British case in 1953 as follows:

> They (meaning those who are in the public service and the minister in charge of the department) must know the exigencies of the public service far better than the court and therefore the courts, although not departing—

Mr. Knowles: What date did the minister give for that judgment?

Mr. McCann: In 1893.

Mr. Knowles: I thought you said 1953, but last year when you quoted it you said 1893.

Mr. McCann: 1893.

Mr. Knowles: The same speech.

Mr. McCann: I continue:

> —from the power to have the question thoroughly investigated, nevertheless recognize, in all except extreme cases, that the word of the officer who is head of the department ought to prevail on the question whether the production of the document would be injurious to the public service.

The courts have dealt with this subject on the broad basis of public policy. I think I would go further and say not only would it be injurious to public policy—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. I am interested in knowing what the rule is with regard to the reading of speeches. I am interested not only in the fact that the minister seems to be reading from a typewritten document, but also that I am able to follow most of it paragraph by paragraph in Hansard of March 22, 1955. He is now reading a paragraph which is to be found in column two on page 2269.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member knows, the other day I placed a statement in Votes and Proceedings regarding the rule on the reading of speeches, and I did include a few suggestions in that statement. Until the house has signified some approval and support for the suggestions contained in that statement the rule is the one that is quoted in May, Bourinot and Beauchesne, namely that a member while speaking must not read but may refer to his notes. Further to that, there are two statements made by Mr. Speaker Macdonald in 1951 which are to the effect that in speaking, cabinet ministers, the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other parties or someone speaking on their behalf may read their speeches. That is my position at this moment.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I have no apology whatever for using substantially the same material as I used last year, because exactly the same type of case has been presented. This is the sixth year this case has been presented, and the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill did not have one single argument to put forward today that he has not made repeatedly for the past six years. I challenge anybody in the house to read the speech the hon. member made today and the speeches he has made in the past six years. They are the same.

Mr. Knowles: I challenge anybody to read any two of my speeches and find identical paragraphs as one can in your speech.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. members be kind enough to address themselves to the chair.

Mr. McCann: What I was reading was a quotation from a British case in 1943.

Mr. Knowles: 1893.

Mr. McCann: Do you expect that I am going to memorize judgments?

Mr. Knowles: 1893.

Mr. McCann: 1893; that is what I said.

Mr. Knowles: You said 1943.

Mr. McCann: I think you had better get a hearing aid.

Mr. Knowles: The minister had better get another pair of glasses.

Mr. McCann: I do not attempt to memorize judgments given by courts. Since the hon. gentleman has succeeded in interrupting me, I am going to repeat this judgment of 1893, because it is extremely important. The quotation is as follows:

> They (meaning those who are in the public service and the minister in charge of the department) must know the exigencies of the public service far better than the court and therefore the courts, although not departing from the power to have the question thoroughly investigated, nevertheless recognize, in all except extreme cases, that the word of the officer who is the head of the department ought to prevail on the question whether the production of the document would be injurious to the public service.

The courts have dealt with this subject on the broad basis of public policy. Information which is received by the crown for the purpose of revenue only will not be used directly or indirectly in any other direction or for any other purpose. I might interject here, Mr. Speaker, that there have been deviations from that course. For instance, the supreme court decided in 1954 that notwithstanding the section, employees of the Department of National Revenue could be required to classify and produce returns in criminal cases.

My further remarks will have to be with reference to the hearing of these corporate appeals in camera and the necessity that they be kept private and confidential. Court procedures may well expose the trade secrets and every financial operation of a corporation to the full view of its competitors, a process which would completely eliminate the fruits of good business principles and administration and do irreparable harm to the business.

The Income Tax Act gives the minister the widest power to demand information from any person of his own or another taxpayer's affairs for the sole purpose of assessing taxes. That is the reason it is required. Obviously the minister would not of his own volition bring to the house information obtained under the authority of the act. These amendments necessarily mean that somebody in the house or the Senate must seek that information, and the purpose for which he seeks it may be good or evil. Parliament could be made the instrument of securing private information compelled initially to be given by statute, solely for the purpose of revenue; and the house could not possibly know with complete satisfaction why the information in a particular case or group of cases was desired.

It would be my view that parliament is supreme in all these matters. If parliament indicated that this information must be given, we would comply. However, the question that is being put to the test is this. Should this amendment be the means through which persons in this house can cause the minister to secure information and bring it to the house in response to any inquiry or motion?

I suggest it is more desirable to deal with these matters directly. If any corporation is to be interrogated, or its private affairs examined, then parliament can do so if it so desires, by the appropriate procedure of which every member of this house is aware. That is, it can do directly what this bill seeks to do indirectly.

There are not many more comments that I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, except to say that in addition to the powers of parliament to which I have just referred, the Auditor General of Canada has free access to and has members of his division practically in our head office and in a good many of the more important offices throughout the country. Chapter 116 of the revised statutes of 1952 gives him certain powers. Section 66 of the Financial Administration Act reads as follows:

> 66. (1) Notwithstanding any act, the Auditor General is entitled to free access at all convenient times to all files, documents and other records relating to the accounts of every department, and he is also entitled to require and receive from members of the public service such information, reports and explanations as he may deem necessary for the proper performance of his duties.

The Auditor General has full authority to examine into the tax returns of any individual or corporation, and he may seek—and he always gets full co-operation and assistance from the members of the Department of National Revenue.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is a matter of pride that the Department of National Revenue has administered this law loyally and meticulously and has complied with all the secrecy provisions, though of necessity the collection of taxes requires the production in detail of the private business affairs of all taxpayers. Should these amendments pass, any resulting disclosure of private information to this house would be disclosure to the public at large, including competitors. That is something which I submit would be resented; and notwithstanding the legality with which these amendments would clothe that disclosure, such resentment would reflect on the administration which had secured the information for the sole purpose of levying taxes.

I am of the opinion that the adoption of these amendments would be a backward step and accordingly I, on behalf of the government, oppose the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must point out that I have been saved the necessity of making any notes with regard to the speech just given by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I have it all before me in his speech of last year at pages 2268 to 2271 of Hansard of March 22, 1955.

Mr. McCann: Why did you not read it? You were defeated on exactly the same arguments for the last six years.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the minister seems to take some pleasure in the fact that the majority of the house happens to agree with him that the proposal set out in this bill should not be enacted. I am aware of the fact that on this measure there seems to be great unanimity amongst the Liberals, the Progressive Conservatives and the Social Crediters in this house. One often hears it said, particularly by Progressive Conservatives and Social Crediters, that parliament should be given full information, that all the matters with which the government is concerned should be brought to the light of day. This is particularly true if the Canadian National Railways is under discussion, or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or any other crown corporation, or the affairs of the government itself. All these things must be brought out to the light of day. The veil of secrecy must be lifted.

Mr. Fleming: We put public money into them. You vote public money for them right here.

Mr. Knowles: My friend the hon. member for Eglinton says that we vote public money. My point is that the amount of money in the public treasury is, to a large extent, determined by the taxes levied on corporations, and the amount obtained from corporations is in turn affected by the treatment accorded to their income tax returns. I contend that this matter is as much a matter of public interest and public concern as are the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canadian National Railways, the Polymer Corporation or the government itself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends shout in holy horror against that view, but it is just a matter of whose ox is being gored. My hon. friends seem quite willing to make their attacks on crown corporations and public bodies, but they want nothing to strike at this sacred privilege of private corporations to enjoy the protection of secrecy. It is interesting to notice the way in which the members of all parties surrounding us get together on this issue.

Mr. Fleming: Everybody is out of step but Stanley.

Mr. Knowles: I was quite interested in the forthright statement of the position of those opposed to this bill which was given by my good friend the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert). He went to town; he pulled out all the stops. He said this is something that is sacred; this is one of the most basic things in our society, this right of private corporations to have their income tax matters secret. This is a matter of public security. This is attacking the good of Canada, to attack the secrecy of income tax matters of private corporations.

We contend, Mr. Speaker, that there is no such thing as a corporation—that no corporation in this country would get anywhere—without the people who do the work and who provide the markets out of which these corporations make their income. We contend that these matters are matters of public concern, and that the corporations have no right to the protection of this ironclad secrecy which is given to them by section 133 of the Income Tax Act. It is guaranteed to them, apparently, so long as there are enough Liberals, Tories and Social Crediters in combination to provide a majority in this house.

The Minister of National Revenue makes a good deal of the fact that these corporations are legally persons. I recognize that that is a legal interpretation of a corporation, but surely there is a difference between the Canadian Pacific Railway and James J. McCann or Roland Michener. Surely their being persons is something different than the personality which is ascribed to these corporations. We contend that these corporations should be made the servants of the people, of the living human beings in this country; that they should not have the right to make huge profits out of the economy of this country and have the matter kept in complete secrecy.

Mr. Trainor: Who says the profits are huge?

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of National Revenue, in that part of his speech which was not in the printed speech of last year, said something he was required to withdraw. But in saying that he suggested that some of us were throwing innuendos, were arguing that the income tax department is to be suspected, that it is not to be thoroughly trusted. If the income tax department is completely above suspicion in all its dealing with individual corporations; if it treats every corporation, whether it is the little corner store or a huge distillery, on the same basis with respect to all its different kinds of expenses; I would think it would be the first to say, "We want this material out in the open so there will be no question about it."

This could be described as a bill in defence of the purity of the income tax branch so far as these matters are concerned. I should say very strongly that if there is any matter the people of Canada have a right to know anything about, it is the income tax arrangements with these huge corporations that are making money that they could not possibly make if it were not for the fact that there are 15 million Canadians in this country to do the work and provide the markets out of which this great wealth is made.

Mr. Boisvert: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Very gladly.

Mr. Boisvert: How many of these people are living on what the corporations are doing in this country?

Mr. Knowles: Most of the people in this country are living by the sweat of their brow. Most of the people in this country are living by their toil on the farms or their toil in industry, out of the wages they receive. They are not living out of corporation profits. Only a few are doing that. My hon. friend's approach—

Mr. McCann: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. McCann: Does he realize that the government of Canada, for the people of Canada, has a 45 per cent interest through the corporate tax in all the profits of every corporation in Canada? It is that tax that helps to provide—

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the point.

Mr. McCann: It is that tax which helps to provide all the social security and other requirements of the country.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for helping me out with my speech. This is something else that was not in the part of last year's speech which he read. He is making the point that the people of Canada, through the government, have a stake in corporate profits to the extent of 45 per cent of those profits. I believe that is one more reason why we should know whether or not that 45 per cent is levied properly and accurately in all cases, whether it is completely fair across the board. It is all the more reason why we should have the kind of information this measure aims at obtaining.

You see, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor), the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), the Minister of National Revenue and others who might be named seem to think that corporations, because they have payrolls, because they do a certain amount of developmental work, are beneficent feudal lords. They are quite satisfied this is the way our economy should be run. We should bow down and worship these corporations because they provide jobs.

It is our contention, as I have said several times tonight, that no corporation would be able to exist at all in this country, no corporation would make any profit or get anywhere, if it were not for the part that the people play through their toil or through their role as consumers. What we are trying to emphasize is the social fact of what corporations are, and it is because of that social fact we contend we are entitled to such information as is available in the income tax department.

Mr. Studer: Tell us about the socialist corporations.

Mr. Knowles: A number of my friends raised an interesting question. They wanted to know whether I was not being discriminatory in distinguishing between individuals and corporations. I point out, of course, that the Income Tax Act distinguishes between individuals and corporations. There are the two groups. There is the individual income tax and the corporate income tax.

I point out also that when I first introduced this bill, and as the Minister of National Revenue says that was a long time ago, its provisions were not limited to corporations. When I first introduced the bill it called for the possible revelation of this information from any income tax return. There are still 50 or more hon. members around who were here when I first introduced this bill, and if they will search their memories they will realize that the main criticism levelled at my bill when it included individual income tax returns was that this was peeping Tom legislation; this was getting into the private affairs of individuals. All the attacks on that first bill of mine were levelled against the extent to which it seemed to get at individuals. I said all right; if that seems to be the main criticism of this bill I will accept it and take out the part regarding individuals, just leaving the corporations. The fact is that far more holy horror is expressed now when an attempt is made to get information concerning corporations alone than was expressed when it related to individuals. We know now who the sacred cow is so far as the other three parties of this house are concerned.

Mr. Fleming: Go on with your hymn of hate.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends can make these interjections if they wish. They are simply making it clear that their concept of public service is to provide special privilege for monopolistic corporations, even in a day when society has moved on to the realization that most of the things we do are by common, community, co-operative effort; what we gain we gain by our common effort, and what we have won in that way really belongs to us all—at least, the knowledge about it, such as that which is in the possession of the Department of National Revenue.

Some of those who have criticized the bill, notably the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), have asked questions about the mechanics of it in the form in which it is drafted. The hon. member for Macleod implied that if the publishing of this information by the government were made mandatory by my bill instead of voluntary, his attitude toward it might have been different.

Mr. Trainor: He said he did not think so.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I have a pretty good idea what would have been said by him and by others in this house if I had brought in a bill making it mandatory to publish all the information in all the corporation income tax returns filed with the Department of National Revenue. I would have been told it would involve a huge amount of printing; it would involve an endless and wasteful expenditure, and therefore we simply could not go ahead with it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, despite the charges that have been made that I did not think this thing through too well before I drafted this bill, I make the assertion that I did do a great deal of thinking about it and did discuss it with legal counsel as well, as to what was the best way to go about it; and it was quite a deliberate decision on my part that one should not require that all the information should be published automatically but rather, as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) put it, that the umbrella under which the Minister of National Revenue can now hide should be removed, and moreover that the legislation should be such that a minister of the crown could give this information in the Senate or in the House of Commons.

The bill as worded does not require such information to be requested by a member of parliament. Indeed, the minister could make such information public on his own initiative; but I suggest that the hon. member for Macleod is really handing out innuendoes when he suggests that if this bill were passed any minister would take the position in reply to one request that that kind of information could be given, but in reply to another, which might be embarrassing to his side of the house, that information would be withheld.

Mr. Hansell: I did not say that. I said it was conceivable that that could happen.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member said it was conceivable. I am sure that if he will read the bill more carefully and think it through he will realize that if it were passed, not to be mandatory that everything be published but with a provision for the minister to make any of this information available to parliament, I suggest it would be an affront to parliament if any minister after that refused to give any information of that kind that was requested.

Some have said that parliament can get action today. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) said that parliament can pass the appropriate order for return and get the information, but the Minister of National Revenue does not agree with the hon. member for St. Paul's on that point. On February 21, 1955, as recorded at page 1331 of Hansard, my colleague the hon. member for Dauphin moved a motion calling for certain documents in this field. This was the reply of the Minister of National Revenue:

> Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I will have to oppose this motion, and suggest to the hon. member that it be withdrawn. I oppose it on the ground that this is private correspondence between a taxpayer and the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue and that, according to the secrecy provisions, it cannot be disclosed.

I remind the hon. member for St. Paul's that last year when we were dealing with a certain question his colleague, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), sought to get certain information. He was told, as I was told at the same time, that we could not get that kind of information because of the secrecy provisions of the act.

Mr. Michener: Because the order was not passed.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend says: "Because the order was not passed". Does he not know that at the present time there is in this house an overpowering majority that defeats motions of that kind every time? And does he not realize that he himself admitted that if by any chance his party were on the other side they would take the same stand? He said that tonight.

Mr. Fleming: No, he did not.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fleming: He did no such thing.

Mr. Knowles: He said that the way to correct what he thought might be some doubtful practices in the Department of National Revenue was not to lift the veil of secrecy; no, keep it on, just change the party in power.

Mr. Michener: On a question of privilege, what I suggested was that if the house by a majority called for those papers there was nothing in the act as it stands to prevent them being given.

Mr. Knowles: That is a debatable point. I do not think the Minister of National Revenue will agree with the hon. member that they could be brought down even if the house passed the motion, since it is against the statute. If I may offer my opinion, even though I am not a lawyer, the only way the house could override a statute would be by passing another statute, not simply by an order for return, as my hon. friend suggests.

But the point is—and the hon. member for St. Paul's has made his party's position clear in this matter—that so long as the majority is against this kind of thing we will not get it. We know the Liberals are against it. We know now the Conservatives are against it. We know the Social Crediters are against it. It looks as though the secrecy surrounding private enterprise is protected, and therefore for some little while longer private enterprise can go its merry way knowing that its affairs, though they are of public concern, though they are possible only because of the contribution the public makes to them, will not be made known to the people of this country.

This is a longer speech, Mr. Speaker, than I made when I introduced the bill. At any rate, nobody would say I am reading it, or that I ever read a speech in this house.

An hon. Member: Maybe you cannot read.

Mr. Knowles: I hear someone say, "Maybe you cannot read". That might be correct. I am also aware of the fact that when I introduced the bill I thought, well, it is just a harmless little bill. The rest of the boys, and the girls, do not like it, but it will not stir them up too much. But lo and behold, it has. It has stirred them up as it did before because of the interest so many members in this house seem to have in protecting private enterprise and the profits that huge corporations make out of the Canadian people.

Some day there will be a change. Some day the people of this country will realize that the economy of this country is a matter of public concern, and that all its benefits should accrue to the people of Canada themselves.

EDUCATION

PROVISION OF NATIONAL SCHOLARSHIPS AND BURSARIES

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hollingworth:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level who are in financial need, in so far as the subject matter of this resolution is within the competence of parliament.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) upon presenting this resolution to the house. It is significant that the members of all parties have paid tribute to my colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) for having presented a similar resolution to parliament year after year. Now that hon. members of all parties have indicated their support of the ideas expressed in this resolution I hope that action will be taken very soon and funds made available for this purpose.

Recently I saw some statistics prepared by the Canadian Bank of Commerce indicating the division of federal, provincial and municipal taxes. The breakdown to the nearest percentage showed that of the Canadian tax dollar, 74 per cent comes to the Minister of National Revenue and 14 per cent to the provincial treasury, with 12 per cent going to the municipality. I think it must be obvious to everybody that the municipalities and the provinces with but 26 cents of every tax dollar provided by the Canadian people cannot furnish that quality of education which is necessary in this day and age.

Education

When we consider the amount spent by the Canadian people on educating our young people during the war years it is clear that we are going to have to tackle the problem of providing funds for university education just as we provided funds during the war years.

I remember that during the war a question was asked of Senator Power, who was then minister of national defence for air, as to the cost of training a pilot. He said the cost was around $30,000. A year ago the present Minister of National Defence was asked the same question, and he said the cost is now $65,000. If the people of Canada are able to spend $65,000 on the training of a pilot, we can spend adequate amounts to provide university education.

This morning I ran across a new book, "The Age of Mackenzie King". I am sure that all members of parliament will want to read this very interesting book written by H. S. Ferns and B. Ostry. I find that the book is dedicated to the memory of Flying Officer William Paterson and Pilot Officer Leon A. Titof. Those members who were here in 1940 will recall that Flying Officer Paterson was on the prime minister's staff at that time. He was a very brilliant young Canadian who had started out in external affairs and was then in the prime minister's office.

I remember being in the home of our station agent on Christmas eve, 1943, I think it was. The year before the station agent had received word that his only son, who was in the R.C.A.F., had been reported missing. Later the news of his unfortunate death was received. Flying Officer Paterson was overseas with the R.C.A.F. and on Christmas morning his wife received word that he was missing. Later it was confirmed by the R.C.A.F. that he would never come back to Canada. Pilot Officer Titof also came from my constituency. His father was a merchant, and this young chap was able to join the air force when he finished school. He was such a promising young lad, and of course he never came back.

When one considers that thousands of our young people had similar experiences to those of Flying Officer Paterson and Pilot Officer Titof one might expect that now, in memory of these young men and their pals, we would find ways and means to see that the young people of Canada who have the mental qualifications are given a chance to go to university and make their contribution to the life of Canada and of the world.

Therefore I hope there will be unanimous support for the resolution moved by the hon. member for York Centre. I hope we will all accept the resolution.

Education

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in support of the resolution of the hon. member for York Centre, which I think is supported in most quarters of the house. Before I do so, however, I should like to make one point that has not been made yet.

While it does seem to me that we need more of the right kind of students in all our educational institutions, the primary schools, the high schools and the universities, I think we now have a great many of the wrong kind of students at all levels of our educational system. It seems to me that not only in the higher grades of our primary schools but in our high schools and in our universities there are people who do not want to be there, who are kept there more or less against their wills, either through family pressure or other pressure, who are only marking time. The net effect of their presence is to clog the progress of all. I think these beliefs would be borne out by almost anyone who acts in a professional capacity at any level of our educational system in Canada. In other words we have too many drones, too many dead cells, in our educational institutions.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I think it must be obvious to anyone who studies the facts that there are a great many potential leaders in all walks of life who never get the chance to become leaders in our society because they lack the opportunity to get such education as would enable them to do so. I think the very first point made yesterday in the joint declaration by the two great leaders of the western democracies, President Eisenhower and Sir Anthony Eden, centred on the value of the individual.

It seems to me if there is one thing that differentiates our ideals from the ideals of certain other parts of the world it is that we place as the supreme value the worth of the individual citizen in our democracy; and it is a fact that is easily ascertained by studying what happens in any walk of life in our society that a great many people who are potentially great in any field do not get a chance to make the most of their talents simply because they lack the education.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Philpott, seconded by Mr. Garland, moves the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MacInnis: Talk it out.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour will please say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Coldwell: On division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried on division.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

POSTAL WORKERS' BROTHERHOOD—BRIEF

Question No. 14—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Was a brief submitted to the Minister of Finance, the Acting Postmaster General and the Secretary of State, on May 27, 1955, by the postal workers' brotherhood of Canada, asking for an increase in their salaries?
2. If so, has consideration been given by the government to this request and what decision was made?
3. Has the government given consideration to the setting up of a board of arbitration or commission to hear representations and to make recommendations relative to the request by the said brotherhood?

Answer by: Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East):

1. Yes.

2. Yes; no general increase in civil service salaries has been made since the request. The brotherhood was told that ministers had not been convinced there is a justification for special action in regard to the salaries of postal workers, but they would be glad to see any further evidence that the brotherhood wishes to present in support of its case.

3. No; the Prime Minister informed the brotherhood that the Civil Service Act did not provide for arbitration and the law relating to conciliation boards in industrial disputes is clear in stating parliament's intention that it should not apply to the civil service. It was pointed out that the civil service commission is an independent body, established by parliament and not subject to any direction by the government, which has the duty of investigating questions of the kind referred to by the brotherhood, hearing the views of associations and making recommendations upon them. The Prime Minister expressed his view that this full-time tribunal, established by parliament and assisted by a large and expert staff, is far better able to give proper consideration to matters of this kind than would some ad hoc conciliation board as proposed by the brotherhood.

WHEAT BOARD—INFORMATION SUPPLIED TO DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Question No. 40—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the Canadian wheat board supplied the Department of National Revenue with statements of payments made to producers?
2. If so, under what authority?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. Yes.

2. By order of Department of National Revenue dated September 13, 1948.

Questions

GRAIN—LOSS THROUGH SPOILAGE

Question No. 57—Mr. Thatcher:

How much grain, owned by the Canadian wheat board, has been lost in storage through spoilage, in each of the crop years, 1952, 1953, 1954 and 1955?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

The Canadian wheat board has no knowledge of loss of grain through spoilage because licensed elevators are responsible, as warehousemen, for maintaining condition of grain. Spoilage is a negligible factor in warehousing Canadian grain.

WHEAT—BARTER SALES

Question No. 59—Mr. Thatcher:

1. During 1954 or 1955, have any nations expressed a specific desire to the Canadian wheat board or to the Canadian government to barter merchandise or raw material for Canadian wheat?
2. If so, what nations, and for what products?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. No.
2. See answer to No. 1 above.

COAL STATISTICS, 1955

Question No. 75—Mr. Regier:

1. What is the extent of the consumption of coal in Canada for the year 1955?
2. How many tons of coal were imported into Canada in 1955, and how many tons were exported?
3. What is the estimate of duty paid on Canadian coal sold to the United States in 1955, and what is the estimate of duty received on American coal entering Canada in 1955?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

1. Consumption of coal in Canada, calendar year 1955, 34,810,000 tons (preliminary estimate).

2. Canadian imports of coal, 10 months ended October 1955, 16,319,058 tons.

Canadian exports of coal 11 months ended November 1955, 554,999 tons.

3. Estimate of duty paid on Canadian coal sold to United States in 1955, not available.

Estimate of duty received on American coal entering Canada January 1-October 31, 1955, $4,767,706.

FARM STATISTICS, PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Question No. 78—Mr. Boisvert:

How many farms were in operation in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta for the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954 and 1955?

Answer by: Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):

Number of occupied farms in 1951 (1951 census): Manitoba, 52,383; Saskatchewan, 112,018; Alberta, 84,315.

For the years 1950, 1952, 1953, 1954 and 1955, the information is not available.

As a result of the census to be taken in June of this year, an up-to-date figure will be obtained.

Questions

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BUILDING ERECTION, OSHAWA

Question No. 87—Mr. Starr:

1. Have plans been made for the erection of a building in the city of Oshawa to house the local branch of the unemployment insurance commission?

2. If so, in what location?

Answer by: Mr. Pinard (for Mr. Winters):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 3, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

AIR TRANSPORT

CORRECTION IN STATEMENT AS TO FLIGHT HOURS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): On a question of privilege, I wish to say that on Wednesday, in replying to a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I said that flight hours and hours between flights for aeroplane pilots did not fall within the jurisdiction of the air transport board.

I find that I was misinformed and I much regret that this wrong information was given to the house. May I add that I am informed that no representations in this matter have been received by the air transport board.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—CHANGE IN FLIGHT HOURS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce supplementary to the statement just made by the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether Trans-Canada Air Lines have received representations asking for a change in flight hours and hours between flights for air line pilots?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I know of none, and I would not be informed on that subject. That is a matter of conditions of work, which is wholly the responsibility of Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is a matter of internal management of the air line.

POTATOES

STATEMENT ON SHORTAGE OF BOX CARS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I have been asked by all the hon. members from Prince Edward Island to make a statement in regard to railway cars for the shipment of potatoes.

I have made inquiries of Canadian National Railways and the management inform me that the present is a period of the year when the demand for refrigerator cars throughout the continent is at a peak. Movement of all commodities in the maritimes was hampered severely in the first two weeks of January by extreme weather conditions, resulting in a backlog which has not yet been overtaken. I should add, however, that on January 25 there were 32 per cent more refrigerator cars in the maritimes than on the same date last year, and that everything possible is being done to increase further the number for Prince Edward Island.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED DELIVERY OF ARMS BY RUSSIA IN RETURN FOR SLAVES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he enlighten us further or indicate the position taken by this government in regard to the shocking facts disclosed in a report to Dag Hammarskjold referred yesterday to the United Nations in connection with the reported purchase of arms from Russia by the delivery of 1,500,000 Chinese slaves?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was not given notice of this question, therefore I am not sure that the facts as reported in the press or as reported by my hon. friend are correct. If I recall his question correctly, I believe he said that this was a report of the Secretary General of the United Nations. That was not my understanding of it, but I shall look into the matter and see whether a statement can be made as soon as I have seen the report in question.

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MINISTERIAL ORDER OF JULY 7

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition, addressed to the Prime Minister. The question was:

In that case, Mr. Speaker, just to clarify it, may I ask the Prime Minister if the published list which is issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce covering aircraft is not in fact the full list of permits that are issued?

The answer is that there is no published list of permits issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I assume that the Leader of the Opposition is referring to the export statistics published monthly by the dominion bureau of statistics recording exports from Canada. This report shows the export of one aircraft to Egypt in May, 1955, and one aircraft to Saudi Arabia in July of that year. I am advised that the aircraft in question are light civilian planes purchased by oil companies operating in these countries for patrolling their pipe lines. Export permits were issued covering each of these transactions in the usual way.

Canada has developed commercial aircraft which are in demand all over the world and we do not consider that these aircraft have any strategic importance or that these should be considered as war material. It will not help Canada's growing civilian aircraft industry if full particulars of every transaction in this highly competitive field have to be made public for the benefit of their foreign competitors.

STATEMENT AS TO SECRECY OF EXPORT PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked whether goods obtained from the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation are subject to export permits. The answer is that goods purchased from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation are subject to the same export permit procedure as goods purchased from commercial firms, and these documents are given the same confidential treatment.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of record, I would point out that the lists—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would remind hon. members of a story I told in this house and ask who is in charge here.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might supply a clue as to that. It is, of course, well-known that answers to questions should not be debated. If the Leader of the Opposition is leading to a question and wishes to state some facts in order to come to his question, of course it will be allowed; but I think what provoked the calls of order by the hon. members was the fact that the Leader of the Opposition apparently proceeded to debate the question.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in view of the observation you have made I would point out that it is impossible before a single sentence has been completed to determine what the remainder of the sentence is going to be.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: I had understood that it is not only permissible but desirable to correct inaccuracies in statements when they are made.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Drew: However, Mr. Speaker, there will be other opportunities to deal with that aspect of it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Drew: I will ask a question, however, in regard to this matter. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has given for the first time the information as to the aircraft. Is it not correct that the air force of the United States has bought quite a number of these same aircraft?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. If they have bought the same planes, the reference is to the Chipmunk plane arranged for civilian use.

Mr. Drew: And used for training purposes.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is not used for training purposes. It is used to inspect oil pipe lines. It was bought by a private oil company and if a private oil company uses it for training purposes I do not know what the training would be for. I hope my hon. friend does not attempt to distort a simple statement of fact.

PRESENT POSITION OF EMBARGO ON ARMS SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. What is the present position in regard to the embargo which the Prime Minister undertook to impose pending the foreign affairs debate on shipments of aircraft and armaments in general to the Middle East? Has the embargo which was imposed been lifted or is it still in effect? What is the position with regard thereto?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The embargo has not been lifted and the matter is now under consideration.

COMMUNIST CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that no response was made to my suggestion during the debate which took place on Tuesday and Wednesday, may I ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to give the house an unqualified undertaking that there will not be recognition of the government of communist China until the subject has been brought before the House of Commons?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no consideration being given at this time to any proximate recognition of the government of communist China.

Mr. Drew: That was not my question. I asked the Prime Minister if he would give an undertaking that there would not be recognition before the subject had been brought before the House of Commons for consideration.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The government will give careful consideration to its responsibilities, both to the House of Commons and to the Canadian people, in considering this matter.

BRIDGES

PETERBOROUGH—INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OF SWING BRIDGE OVER TRENT CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, of which I gave him notice. Can the minister say when the swing bridge over the Trent canal on the Warsaw road in Peterborough will be ready for traffic since the veterans in that district now have a long detour to get to the city to work?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said he gave me notice of the question, but I regret to say I have not received it. I shall have to made inquiries in order to answer the question.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I am sorry. The letter was mailed in this building at eight o'clock last night and I thought the minister would have it.

TRADE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH RUSSIAN DELEGATION—INQUIRY AS TO REOPENING OF CONSULATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether it is a fact that in the course of the current negotiations the representatives of Russia are seeking the right to reopen consulates across Canada. If so, what position are Canadian representatives in these negotiations taking on the subject?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to talk about pending negotiations. When the negotiations are completed I shall be glad to make a report to the house, but I think I can say that no suggestion of opening consulates across Canada is involved in the present trade agreements, which are merely that, trade agreements.

[Later:]

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in view of the earlier answer given to my question by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Has any application been received from the Russian government or the Russian ambassador for permission to open consulates across Canada? Has there been any expression of a desire in that respect?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not able to give me notice of his question. I take it that it does not relate to the current trade discussions but to whether or not a request has been made previously to open consulates in Canada. Obviously that is something I will have to look into to see if such a request has been made.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF HEAVY WATER PLANT AT TRAIL, B.C.
