The present state of the English apple market is given briefly. There are more com-mon apples there at present than has been the case hitherto this year and really good fruit is exceptionally scarce; the former quality is a drug in the market, whereas good apples are keenly competed for and fancy prices are obtainable. We desired. first of all, that our society should be imof a Gladstone or a great European states man, that would have given it the personal or national element. Our idea is to rise above national sentiment, to be internation For this purpose we set up a standard which we call the 'Peace flag.' This flag is com posed of yellow, purple and white. It is to stand for some thing which is higher than national patriot When it is seen, for instance, by the immigrant, landing upon the shores of the enough." United States, landing on the shores of your country, the latter will feel that he has already an interest in a country which flies the international peace flag, with which he has been made familiar in his own country.

We had to have the red cross before we could have the international peace flag," said the Countess. "The red cross ministered to suffering through war; the peace flag is, to render war unnecessary. It is to stand for the highest ideal in civil life. We begin, you see, with the children. We have won shipped the courage of war; we must begin to instil the beauty and greatness of civil courage; the courage of usefulness and conservation. We already see men risking their lives without any particular stimulus or in spiration. Look at the firemen who risk their lives every day, simply from the idea of duty. We propose to make civil courage glorious. That is to say, the courage to do r'ght, the courage to be tender and pitiful and just in all relations; the courage which shall conserve rather than destroy. Take a history of England, even Green's history, and you will find three chapters devoted to colonial expansion, and all the rest taken up with petty wars. We teach jurispruden when the mind is ripe and the judgment sound; we must henceforth begin to teach the young what is equitable and generou and beautiful in civil relations. As Lyman Gage said to me when I was discussing thi matter with him, if we could get the chil dren to grow up with the universal peace idea, we would have worked a revolution in public sentiment in the course of a genertion. There is already in the minds and hearts of vast numbers a desire for universa arrowness, and utter absence of that spirit peace. We give this direction. That is al There is no question of the work succeeding Our principles are such as will unite al creeds and nationalitics. Catholics and Protestants are rejoiced to find common ground upon which they can take their stand.

The Countess does not think that war will be either immediately or mediately abolished but when the children of any country hav been taught peace drill for a generation in stead of war drill, armies, while they ma not be disbanded, may be expected to becom what they are already in Italy, a part of the police force of the country. For instance a time of calamity or pestilence, the soldie are sent to reinforce the services of the po lice, to do nursing, assist in sanitary work, and the like.

"Why should we go on putting muskets into the hands of our boys at school? They like drill: well, we will drill them in the var ious peace drills which shall have for their object useful activities in civil life. Above all, the economic effects of peace and war are to be taught-according to our Peace Unions. Should there be war, in any part of the world, our flag would be unfurled, and we would everywhere unite to provide money and food and clothing and succor generally for those affected by its horrors. In a word, we desire the reign of conscience in the breast Many religious people have gone on without thinking that conscience was a part of their religion. We have to reawaken conscience and set it upon its throne. Other societies are doing a good work; we begin with the young who, in this matter, have been entirely neglected."

The Countess will inaugurate a Peace Union in Montreal, with the assistance o our local ladies.
