House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT.

Monday, September 3, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.]

IMPERIAL MUNITIONS BOARD EMPLOYEES.

*Mr. LANCTOT:

1. How many men, officers and employees of the Imperial Munitions Board are of military age?
2. What are their names and respective salaries?
3. Who, if any, have military badges, and on what grounds in each case have they been granted?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The information asked for in this question is not available. The Imperial Munitions Board is under the control and direction of the Government of the United Kingdom, and it is not under the control or direction of the Government of Canada, which exercises no direction or control whatever with respect to the employment of persons who are in the service of that Board.

THE MOTOR BOAT SCOUT.

*Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. Was a steamer or motor boat, called the Scout, purchased by the Government of Canada from any person or persons at Halifax, N.S.?
2. If so, from whom, when was she purchased, and what was the price paid therefor?

Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The name of the motor boat mentioned in this question, the Scout, is an error and I wrote the minister a few days ago giving the correct name of the boat. I wish to know if the answer is to the question as amended?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not know about the amendment of the question. The answer is to the question as it stands.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I promised to give the correct name privately.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member gives me the correct name I shall answer.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

*Mr. KYTE:

Is it the intention of the Government to amend the Military Service Act, 1917, by Order in Council or any other way, to provide for the exemption from the calling out on active service provided for by section 4 of said Act of those engaged in agriculture or of those engaged in industrial or other work which provides material for the war?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is believed that the provisions of the Military Service Act of 1917 make adequate arrangements for the exemption of all persons necessarily required for agriculture, or other essential industries.

OFFICERS OF THE 66th FUSILIERS.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

1. How many Lieutenant-Colonels are attached to the 66th Princess Louise Fusiliers at Halifax?
2. On what dates were each of said Colonels appointed?
3. What is the rate of pay and allowance to each?
4. Are all of said Colonels giving their entire time to the performance of their duties?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1 and 2. The usual number of officers are employed with the 66th Princess Louise Fusiliers at Halifax which is on active service, namely:

Acting Commanding Officer Lt.-Col. A. King, appointed August 9, 1915, in command of the 66th Regiment, vice Lt.-Col. H. L. Chipman, seconded, which Regiment, since the beginning of the war, has been on active service in connection with Halifax defences.

Temporary Lt.-Col. R. B. Simmonds, Senior Major, 2nd in Command, appointed August 11, 1914. (Lt.-Col. Simmonds draws Major's pay.)

REVISED EDITION

The Medical Officer of this Regiment is Hon. Lt.-Col. M. A. Currie, appointed December 14, 1904.

The Chaplain of this Regiment is Hon. Lt.-Col. the Rev. W. J. Armitage, appointed April 16, 1913, whose services, owing to the Regiment's isolation, are required.

The Commanding Officer of this Battalion is Lt.-Col. H. L. Chipman, appointed 3rd May, 1910. This officer, however, is not at present in active command of the 66th Princess Louise Fusiliers, as he was seconded to command the Composite Battalion stationed at Wellington Barracks, Halifax, on the 9th August, 1915.

3 and 4. The pay of Lt.-Col. A. King and Lt.-Col. H. L. Chipman, when on active service, is $5 per diem, with subsistence allowance of $1.50 per diem, and field allowance of $1.25 per diem, and that of temporary Lt.-Col. R. B. Simmonds (who draws Major's pay) is $4 per diem, with field allowance of $1 per diem and subsistence allowance of $1.50 per diem. These three officers give their whole time to their military duties.

The pay of Hon. Lt.-Col. M. A. Currie, Medical Officer, when on active service, is $4 per diem, with $1 per diem field allowance and $1.50 per diem subsistence allowance. This officer gives six hours a day to military duty.

The pay of Hon. Lt.-Col. the Rev. W. J. Armitage, when on active service, is $5 per diem, with no allowances. This officer also performs certain duties as rector of St. Paul's Church, Halifax.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH-SPEAKING MAIL CLERKS.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Is it correct, as reported at a convention of mail clerks, that when from twenty-five to thirty of these English-speaking clerks in Ontario enlisted, their places in the province of Ontario to as far west as Sarnia were filled by able-bodied French Canadians?

2. Could returned soldiers not have been obtained to fill the vacancies caused by the enlistment of those English-speaking clerks?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. No. Only one French Canadian employed in Ontario to replace mail clerks who enlisted, and he had been discharged as medically unfit.

2. Returned soldiers were obtained in every case where it was possible to get them.

LIEUTENANT JOHN D. McNEILL.

Mr. CARROLL:

1. Has Lieutenant John D. McNeill, of the 25th Battalion, C.E.F., formerly of Whitney Pier, Sydney, been promoted to the rank of captain?

2. If so, when?

[Sir Edward Kemp.]

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Appointed Acting Captain 25th September, 1916; authority London Gazette.

2. Particulars of date and number of Gazette not yet received.

MR. ISIDORE LACASSE.

*Mr. DELISLE:

1. Was Mr. Isidore Lacasse, of St. Henedine, employed in the Department of Public Works at the City of Quebec?

2. If so, did he resign?

Mr. REID: The answer to each of these questions is, No.

167th BATTALION.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Has Mr. Payne been commissioned to make an inquiry in the matter of the officers of the 167th Battalion?

2. If so, how long is it since he was so commissioned to make this inquiry?

3. What is his salary, and what is his profession?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1 and 2. No. Mr. Payne was employed to assist the Deputy Inspector General in his inquiry.

3. Mr. Payne is a hand-writing expert, and, on the advice of the Department of Justice, his services were loaned by the Post Office Department on the 29th of June, last. This department has no official knowledge as to his salary. He is a civil servant employed in the Post Office Department.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Have Lieutenant-Colonel J. T. Langton and Major Deaken been commissioned this year to make an inquiry at Quebec in the matter of the 167th Battalion?

2. If so, has the said inquiry taken place, and have the officers of the said battalion been heard?

3. At whose request had the said inquiry been granted?

4. What has been the result of this inquiry?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1, 2, 3 and 4. An investigation into the affairs of the 167th Battalion was applied for by the Officer Commanding, and also by the Pay Department Branch of the Inspector General. As the investigation concerned matters of pay, canteen and regimental funds, it was not necessary to go to the expense of holding a court of inquiry, as there are officers specially appointed at militia headquarters for this purpose, and an investigation was made by Colonel Langton, deputy inspector general, at the beginning of this year.

This investigation disclosed grave irregularities. The matter was, accordingly, referred to the Department of Justice, in order that it might take the necessary action.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. How many Government employees from the county of Dorchester have been given employment since 1916, to date?
2. What are their names, the nature of their employment, and their respective salaries?
3. Has the Government raised the salaries of any of its employees from the county of Dorchester since the month of December, 1916?
4. If so, what are the names and the amount of their respective increases?

Mr. DELISLE:

1. How many post offices have been opened in the County of Dorchester since December, 1916, and what are the names and salaries of the Postmasters?
2 Has the Government given new contracts for the carrying of mails in the county of Dorchester since the month of December, 1916?
3. If so, to whom, and for what amount?

Mr. HUGHES (Kings):

1. What are the names and addresses of the medical men now employed or who have been employed by the Government or the Militia Department in Prince Edward Island since August, 1914, to August, 1917, in connection with recruiting or any other military work?
2. What pay or allowance is received by each of these medical men, per day, per month or per year, and what is paid to them for each recruit examined?
3. What is the total amount received by each of these medical men since the beginning of the war to the 1st of August, 1917, both in salary and for examination of recruits?

RELEASE OF THOMAS KELLY.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents addressed to the Minister of Justice concerning the release from penitentiary of Thomas Kelly, contractor of Winnipeg, sentenced by Judge Prendergast to two and a half years in the penitentiary for obtaining money, approximating $1,000,000, in connection with the construction of the Manitoba Parliament Buildings.

Mr. SPEAKER: The mover of this motion proposes an amendment, which I should like to submit to the Minister of Justice. It is proposed to add after the word "justice" in the second line, the following:

Which, in the judgment of the minister, in conformity with the usual practice in such cases may properly be brought down.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move that all the words after the word "penitentiary" in the fourth line of the motion be struck out. They add nothing to the information asked for.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Kyte—For a return showing the names and addresses of recruiting officers employed in the province of Nova Scotia since August 4, 1914, with the respective amounts of pay per day. And showing the total amount received by each of said officers on account of such pay and the respective amounts received by each for expenses and outlay.

Mr. A. K. Maclean—For a return showing the names of all the officers of the R.C.N., or R.N., employed at H.M.C. dockyard and on H.M.C.S. Niobe, and in the Naval Service at Halifax. Also a list of the names of captains and officers employed in patrol service, showing the salaries and nature of employment, respectively.

Mr. Macdonald—For a copy of all letters, papers, telegrams and all other documents relative to the application of the Souris Packing Company of Charlottetown, P.E.I., for storage facilities for a quantity of hams and bacon in order to save it from destruction?

Mr. Fortier—For a detailed statement of the amount paid Colonel Rev. Dr. A. E. Burke since his appointment as a chaplain, including items for travelling and hotel expenses.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. PUGSLEY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On August 31 I made some remarks in the House in regard to the distress caused by the high cost of living. I have noticed in several newspapers the statement that I said that a great many people had been thrown out of employment. I do not know how the statement came to be made, because I made no reference whatever to people being thrown out of employment, nor did I intend to make any such suggestion. My remarks were directed to the hardship caused by the high cost of living.

SALES OF FLOUR BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I desire to direct the attention of the Government to a report appearing in The Modern Miller, of St. Louis, U.S.A. The report says:

Canada officially, by legislation, removed the duty on both wheat and flour some months ago, which automatically removed the United States duties against Canadian wheat and flour under our last Tariff Act. Then the Canadian food controller prohibited wheat exports and this left flour officially free to enter the United States from Canada. Canadian millers were not slow to act and a large amount of flour was shipped from Canadian mills to eastern markets. This resulted in the United States Millers' Committee suggesting to W. J. Hanna, Canadian food controller, that they were prepared to recommend to United States millers an agreement to be effected with Canadian millers prohibiting sales of flour between the two countries during the period of the war. In response Mr. Hanna advised he is entirely in sympathy and it is to be assumed that satisfactory arrangements will be made.

I desire to ask the Government whether such arrangements have been made.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No such arrangements have been made. I was not aware that any such proposal had been made to the food controller as that which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. The statement set forth in this news item comes to me for the first time to-day.

REMOVAL OF DUTY UPON POTATOES PROPOSED.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton): The Government by Order in Council have given wheat and wheat products free entry into the United States, but they have not carried out that principle with regard to potatoes, which, under the United States tariff, are in the same category as wheat and wheat products. There is an enormous crop of potatoes in central Canada, where our principal market is, and I would ask the Government to take into consideration, as a war measure, the advisability of placing potatoes on the free list in order that we may have the advantage of selling our potatoes in the United States markets.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will give our best consideration to what the hon. gentleman has suggested. If there should be any announcement, it will be made in due course.

ATLANTIC PATROL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I desire to ask the Minister of Naval Service (Hon. J. D. Hazen) whether the patrol service at Halifax and Sydney, Nova Scotia, is a Canadian or an Imperial establishment? If it is a Canadian establishment, to what extent is it to be developed and enlarged?

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Naval Service): It may be correctly said that the service is partly Canadian and party Imperial. There is a section of the patrol service which is under the control of Imperial officers; another is under the control of the Canadian Naval Department. In respect of certain parts of the service, it might be said that there is mixed control.

BACON AND LARD PURCHASES IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): On Saturday I directed the attention of the Government to a report in regard to the cessation of the purchase of bacon by the British Government. In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) said that possibly the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be able to give an answer at a later date.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are in communication with the British Government, through the Acting High Commissioner, on this question. Pending the receipt of a reply, there is no announcement to be made.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. HAZEN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I should like to correct a statement which was made in the Committee of the House by my hon. colleague from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) on Saturday. The subject under discussion was the appointment of Mr. M. G. Teed as counsel for Sir Ezekiel McLeod in the McLeod-Tellier investigation. I quote from page 5569 of Hansard:

> Mr. Crothers: Who employed him?
> Mr. Pugsley: I have no doubt the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) suggested his appointment.

On the following page, 5570, the report reads:

> Mr. Meighen: The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said that he was appointed by Chief Justice McLeod, and he was right. Why would Chief Justice McLeod appoint him if he thought he was favourable to this Government?
> Mr. Pugsley: I have no doubt he was recommended by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

I simply rise to say that I neither suggested nor recommended Mr. Teed's appointment to Chief Justice McLeod, to any member of the Government, or to any one else. I know of my own personal knowledge that the suggestion for his appointment came from the Chief Justice, Sir Ezekiel McLeod himself.

SUPPLY BILL—THIRD READING.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance), Bill No. 128, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918, was read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

GAME IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of Interior) moved concurrence in certain amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 100, respecting game in the Northwest Territories of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This Bill is very technical. I suppose the amendments have been made for a purpose. Are they satisfactory to the minister?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The only important change is the amendment in section 4 changing the close season for the hunting and killing of moose, deer and mountain goats. I presume my hon. friend has looked into the matter and is satisfied that the period suggested is preferable to the one contained in the Bill as it passed this House.

Mr. ROCHE: The officials of my department assure me that it is all right.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister state shortly the effect of this amendment?

Mr. ROCHE: The difference made by the amendment is this: in our paragraph (a) of section 4, we have the following arrangements for the close season: moose, caribou, deer, mountain sheep and mountain goats between the 1st day of April and the 15th day of July and between the 1st day of October and the 1st day of December. The Senate have amended that so that the close season is:

> Moose, deer, and mountain goat between the 1st day of April and the 1st day of September.

That is, they are extending the time from the 15th of July to the 1st of September. As regards caribou and mountain sheep, they are adding to the close season already provided for in the Bill, the period from the 1st of April to the 1st of August.

Amendments concurred in.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Trade and Commerce—Imperial Year Book of Canada, $4,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the minister explain what this publication is?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This publication, which is now in its third edition, is called The Imperial Year Book because it publishes statistics of the whole Empire. If my hon. friend has seen either of the two previous editions he will appreciate the completeness and scope of the work. The third edition, a book of about six hundred pages, is now in the press and will soon be ready for distribution. I have seen a good many of these year books, but this is one of the fullest and most complete of which I have knowledge. In all, 7,500 copies are to be issued. Of these, we issue 2,500 copies under our own direction, and the others are issued under the advisement of the Government; that is, a list is submitted to the Government for its approval.

Mr. MURPHY: Did we purchase copies of the previous issues?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: Who publishes it?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The author of it is in Montreal. The soul and body of the work is Mr. Southall. The book has been very highly commended, and I have received numerous requests that we should help it through this war year, which, of course, is a pretty difficult year. A number of copies will be sent to our consuls and trade commissioners for distribution to such bodies as they see fit. Boards of trade, chambers of commerce, libraries and similar institutions, both in the English-speaking world and outside, but mainly in the English-speaking world, will receive copies of the book. Altogether, I think this is an appropriation which will be exceedingly useful in its results.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I must confess that I am ignorant of this book. I do not know whether a copy has ever reached me. Is it a book of statistics on the British Empire?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Purely statistical from beginning to end.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Relating to trade navigation and commerce, etc.?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. It touches every department of our administrative work.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it printed at the Printing Bureau?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, it is not a government work. We are simply buying copies.

Bureau of Industrial and Scientific Research—Salaries and expenses, including printing and stationery, and the collection and distribution of information, $43,600.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: "Salaries and expenses, including printing and stationery," is a very elastic term.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has to be elastic. My hon. friend understands the organization of the advisory council. It consists of eleven members, who, with one exception, are all giving their services gratis. The administrative commissioner, Professor MacCallum, receives a salary of $10,000. This item of $43,600 is for the travelling expenses of the council, and expenses incurred in gathering information and making their investigations. As regards studentships, we are following the plan which has been adopted by the advisory council in Great Britain and elsewhere. The idea is to get hold of those students who are just about ready to leave the university, and who have proved themselves during a collegiate or scientific course of any kind to be particularly adapted for investigation along a certain line. The studentship is $600 for the first year, and $750 for the second year if a second year is added.

Mr. MURPHY: Is that to maintain them at the university?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will explain it. In order to get a studentship these young men must continue their investigations along a line which must be approved by the advisory council. Full inquiry is made into the student's antecedents, the work he has done, and his ability in the particular line of inquiry in which he is engaged. If that is a line of inquiry which commends itself to the advisory council as likely to prove useful and advantageous in connection with the industries of the country, they may approve of such an one for a studentship. The university gives him the run of the university during the year of his studentship; that is, he has the advantage of the laboratory and whatever is necessary in his investigation. That is the contribution on the part of the university toward that year's work, and the studentship of $600 is granted to induce him to carry on his investigation for the year. If, at the end of that year, after thorough examination and supervision by the advisory council, it is found that he has made much progress in that line of his work that it promises to yield beneficial results for practical purposes in the industry to which it is allied, a second year scholarship may be given under the same conditions and carried out in much the same way, except that it is not necessary for this second year's work to be carried on all the while in the university; the student may be transferred to a large industrial concern where he can carry on his investigations in connection with the actual work of the industry itself. In the United States and Great Britain it is considered to be an essential part of the work of the student that a certain amount of time should be devoted to this work in the atmosphere and amidst the practical surroundings of the industry to which his investigation is allied. A student or a fellow has to promise that he will devote his work and his ability to our own country. It is a rather pitiful comment that nine-tenths of possibly the brightest scientific students who have been developed in our country have gone to other countries to carry out the practical results of their work, many of them to the United States. There are students who have thus gone out from our colleges who to-day, in the United States, are drawing salaries of anywhere from $5,000 to $20,000. That is the talent we need to keep in our own country, so far as possible; it is the kind of talent which is now, more than ever before, absolutely necessary to the development of our industries on the lines of competition, with the saving and resulting effects that come from the application of close scientific knowledge to the industry itself. As an example of the kind of investigation contemplated, one of these aids is to be bestowed on an investigation now going on in the University of Saskatchewan as to the possibility of utilizing straw for the purpose of making gas. As a by product of the making of gas out of straw there is quite a large percentage of valuable oil. These investigations have been going on under one of the professors in the Saskatchewan University, and one of our aids will be given to assist in bringing that, if possible, to an ultimate and successful conclusion, so that the vast quantities of straw now mostly wasted in the West (although part of it is eaten by young cattle) may be utilized in heating and lighting and producing motive power for the people on the prairies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When was the bureau established?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A year ago last June.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has stated that among the salaries there is one of $10,000 to Dr. MacCallum. What other salaries are paid out of the $43,000?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Dr. MacCallum, the administrative chairman, is the only salaried one of the advisory council. We have a secretary of the council who is an officer of the Department of the Interior. This gentleman has offered his services free of charge to the advisory council this year as secretary, and he is carrying out that work excellently. He divides his time between his duties in the Interior Department and his duties for the council, working particularly in the evenings for the council. I refer to Mr. Challies, who is a most valuable secretary at this juncture. He is thoroughly conversant with the water-power system of the Dominion, and his knowledge of this and cognate subjects has been of great assistance. Outside of that we pay no salaries except for the clerical and stenographic help that is required. I think I can say to the committee that probably the most important work now being carried out is the issuing of sets of questionnaires to the colleges and universities, to the scientific societies and associations, and to the industrial establishments of the country, to ascertain the facilities and resources for research which now exist, and by whom and to what extent they are being utilized. Going out into the wider fields of industry to get this information from the industries, we ask: what are the problems which meet you in the development of your industry, whether it is some operation in connection with steel, or gas, or water-power, or any of the many problems that come up. It is desired to get a tabulation of all that information. All these questionnaires have been sent out but, as I explained the other day, the sending out of the questionnaires will not be the only means adopted to obtain the information desired. The Mining Institute, the Manufacturers' Association, the Chemical Association and other societies have volunteered their own personal work in seeing that a question, as it is directed to any establishment, shall be understood and answered. They have perfected their organization and they have engaged in actively supervising and facilitating the collection of that information, from 500 to 600 persons. All this work is done voluntarily and out of the good will of these societies, the whole of it being destined to bring that basis of information in a collated form in which it can be made the groundwork for subsequent action. When these answers come in and the advisory council find what these problems are, they analyse the problems by means of their various committees. They select those of them which they consider the most important for solution and they, having the knowledge of, the facilities, and the resources for investigation, distribute each problem to the resources of research which is working along that particular line. Another important investigation which they are supervising at the present time has reference to the tar sands of the West which have already been under investigation by the western universities. This investigation will be aided to a certain extent from this vote.

Mr. MURPHY: Do I understand the minister to say that Mr. Challies, or his work, will be assisted out of this vote?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I said that Mr. Challies was anxious to do what he could in this way and that he had offered his services for a year during the war period free of charge.

Mr. KNOWLES: The item of "special problems" seems to be nebulous for me to give my support to. Anything in the world can be included in it and the minister's remarks have left me in a more nebulous condition mentally than when I first glanced at the item. The people's money is very precious now-a-days. This money has to be taken from the people and it seems to me that the special problem that everybody has to deal with now is to know where to get the money to pay the taxes rather than to increase the taxes by an artificial expenditure on an academic matter called the solving of special problems. If you are going to solve the problems of this country it will take a great deal more money than the sum that the minister has placed before the committee. I would think that the greatest problems now confronting this country are the servant girl problem, the bi-lingual problem, and the conscription problem. Why should we toy with the people's money in an era of high prices by undertaking investigation and research work into such purely academic and nebulous matters as are described here as special problems? All levity aside, the most pressing problem with which this country is now confronted and one to which this money might well be devoted is the war. I think the minister might very well drop this nebulous and mystic thing called "special problems."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am sure that my hon. friend (Mr. Knowles) has not done himself justice when he puts this forward to the committee as a sober criticism of an item for a purpose of this kind. I will leave it to the committee to say if it thinks that he has. No one expected that this money was to come from any other source than the source from which money generally comes. It has to be raised by the different methods by which revenues are raised and appropriated to its different purposes. If my hon. friend will do a little reading—I am sure he does a great deal—and a little thinking; which but for this exhibition I would have supposed he did a good deal of —he will see that there is no progressive nation in the world to-day which is not putting a tremendous amount of its force into these very things. Great Britain, as most other nations, the United States not excepted, found when this war opened and communications were cut, what she has lost in the preceding ten or twenty years in not pursuing problems like this and making them concrete. She found that she was practically helpless in reference to some of the most basic needs of the country. She woke up and woke up mighty quickly to the necessity of seeing that such should not happen again. This Bureau of Industrial and Scientific Research is formed upon the same plan as the advisory council in Great Britain. At present the advisory council has connected with it the best talent and the best advisory committees in all these different lines of scientific and practical business and industrial knowledge that Great Britain can afford. The British Government have put behind that council £1,000,000 for expenditures along lines tending in this very same direction. I do not think I ought to take up the time of the committee in replying to the little flight of criticism of my hon. friend. It would not be fair to him and it would not be fair to the committee. He did not do himself justice in making that criticism and no other in respect to this matter and I am sure he would feel that way too himself. I do not want to make him feel too badly and I shall not say any more about it.

Mr. CARROLL: I understand that these studentships and fellowships are for the purpose of investigating special problems but I did not understand what the $25,000 was for.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There are studentships and fellowships and then there are special problems which are to be attacked.

Mr. CARROLL: I understand about the studentships and fellowships.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are really processes by which the students as students always have to progress in their researches. Whilst engaged in research work upon any line, if they are successful we get the practical result of that investigation but they are still perfecting themselves along lines of research and learning to be successful investigators. In that line of research, carried on after a university course of one or two years, they might light upon certain solutions and they might be very successful in that way. But the problems, one of two of which I mentioned, are to be undertaken by men who are expert researchers, and the vote of $25,000 is to provide for this work.

Mr. CARROLL: The University of Saskatchewan is investigating the various purposes for which straw may be utilized. Is that, for example, a special problem, to which a portion of this $25,000 will go?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In that particular case, I think, if I remember rightly, it is to provide an analyst for the professor who has been carrying on the investigation for a year or more.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand these students are to be selected from among the most proficient in certain lines of study; will they be selected by Professor Macallum?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: These gentlemen who make up the advisory council are really representatives of our universities, where scientific courses are carried on, as for instance, McGill, Kingston and the others. The council gets into communication, in the best way they can, with all the local students who are approaching their final terms in these different universities, and gets their history from the university authorities. By that process of inquiry, and often by actual interview of some member of the advisory council with these young men, they obtain the information. Of course, every young man carries on these studies in the university under the superintendence of some professor or expert, and the council gets the report from the professor or expert as to the young man's work. Something depends, too, upon the kind of investigation which the young man is carrying on. With reference to some lines of investigation the advisory council would say: That is all very well for pure science, but we want to get hold of what attaches itself particularly to the uses of industrial work; your line of investigation is good in its way, but we will not take that. They have the power to make their choice, and in that way they come to their conclusions as to who shall receive these studentships.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister kindly state in what line of work Professor MacCallum has achieved distinction? The minister might also tell us who comprise the advisory board.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I thought my hon. friend understood all about it, and I did not want to bother him with it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it is well to publish it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have already read it in the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does it appear on Hansard?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes. The administrative chairman is A. B. MacCallum, M.D., Ph.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Ottawa.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What do all these letters mean?

Mr. GRAHAM: We want an interpretation clause.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not want to make the matter too easy for the hon. gentlemen opposite. The members of the council are: F. D. Adams, Ph.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S. Dean, Faculty of Applied Science, McGill University, Montreal; T. Bienvenu, Esq., vice-president and general manager, La Banque Provinciale du Canada, Montreal; R. Hobson, Esq., president Steel Company of Hamilton, Ont.; S. F. Kirkpatrick, M.Sc., professor metallurgy, Queen's University, Kingston, Ont.; J. C. McLennan, Ph.D., F.R.S., professor of physics and director of the physics laboratory, University of Toronto, Toronto; A. S. Mackenzie, Ph.D., D.C.L., president Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S.; W. C. Murray, M.A., LL.D., president University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; R. A. Ross, Esq., E.E. (Tor.), M. Can. Soc. C.E., consulting engineer, 80 St. Francois Xavier street, Montreal; R. F. Ruttan, M.A., M.D., Sc.D., professor of chemistry and director of the chemical laboratories, McGill University, Montreal; Arthur Surveyer, B.A.Sc., M. Can. Soc. C.E., consulting engineer, 274 Beaver Hall Hill, Montreal; secretary, J. B. Challies, CE. (Tor.), M. Can. Soc. C.E., superintendent Dominion Water-Power Branch, Ottawa.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By whom were these gentlemen appointed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Governor in Council. I may say that Dr. McLennan, professory of physics in Toronto, is now in England, and the advisory council have appointed him to represent them on the advisory council there. The advantage which we get, and which they get from that is this: he meets with them and they have information of all that we are doing here along this line, and he gets information from them as to how they are carrying on their work on the other side. It is an interchange of information, of ideas, and of suggestions.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend, instead of answering my question, gave a long list of handles to Dr. MacCallum. One was that he was a doctor of philosophy, and the other that he was a doctor of science, but in what line of work has he gained distinction? Is it in the line of applied science?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He is one of the most distinguished scientific men in Canada. For many years he has been professor of pathology in the University of Toronto. He is a noted physiologist, and also a chemist of high standing. I do not know any better qualified man, from the standpoint of general scientific knowledge, in Canada than Professor MacCallum.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am glad to learn that he has gained distinction in the work of chemistry, because I would suppose that is the most important work that this bureau would have to perform. I recognize the very great importance of it, and all that I was anxious to know was that the work was to be undertaken on practical lines.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the hon. minister mentioned any representative of Laval University on that board?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not. In preparing the list for the advisory council the desire was to obtain men from the universities, and to make the very best selection of scientific men along practical lines that could possibly be made, and, of course, it must be along scientific lines. Inquiry was made in reference to Laval University, I may inform my hon. friend, but it was not found that that university had on its list any specially distinguished professor in the lines of work which we require in the advisory council.

Mr. MARCIL: I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman say that, because Laval is affiliated with all the colleges in Quebec. To be told that there was not a man to be found in that university fit to serve on a council like this is news to me.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend should not put it that way. A great number of men in Canada are fit to serve on a body like this, but we want only a restricted number, and we try to get those who will best make up that restricted number. I am informed that Mr. Surveyer is a graduate of Laval.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that the lawyer?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Thank Heaven, this is one board that is able to get along without a lawyer.

Mr. MARCIL: Laval occupies an unique position in this country. It is the university that first had a Royal charter in Canada; it is representative of one class of the population. In undertaking a work such as my hon. friend is now undertaking, I assume that he desires the co-operation of all the elements of the population. Laval has produced many distinguished men; some of them are to-day in Quebec colleges—men of high standing. They may be found also in the Royal Society of Canada and in other learned bodies. I am sure that if the minister will give the matter consideration, he will come to the conclusion that it would be good policy to include in this body a representative of Laval University.

Mr. OLIVER: At the risk of incurring the unfavourable criticism of the minister—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Do not be afraid of that.

Mr. OLIVER: —I take very much the same position as that taken by the member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles). I cannot help thinking that however meritorious this proposal may be or would be at any other time, this is not an appropriate time or occasion to introduce it. There is the foundation here of a large organization, involving the expenditure of a large amount of money —money that will be devoted more to organization than to the producing of results. At this time we cannot afford to spend money on anything but results. At a time when the requirements of the country are so immense, so urgent; when we are descending to the point of soliciting private help from individuals throughout the country for the carrying of our war burdens, we should not enter upon what the member for Moosejaw calls a nebulous scheme of scientific research. My hon. friend mentioned two matters that are of interest particularly to the prairie West. One is the discovery at Moosejaw of a method for the production of gas from straw. This is a matter of inventive genius; it is not in any way indebted to scientific research arrangements; it is not connected with this or any other similar proposal. My hon. friend now proposes to introduce a subsidiary matter in connection with that as an excuse for the establishment of this big organization. If he is desirous of carrying to success the extraction of various articles from the tar product of the gas, a small grant to the university of Saskatchewan will produce all the results in that particular that his proposed organization will produce. The same may be said with regard to the tar sand of the Athbaska. If my hon. friend is desirous of securing information that will lead to the utilization of the tar sand, a small grant to the university of Alberta would produce probably better results than would be produced under this organization that he proposes. The time is ill-judged for launching what will turn out to be a very expensive organization, whether it produces any results or not. The amount he asks for is not seriously large; it is the principle that I object to—the principle of introducing new expenditures and new causes for expenditure into the Budget at this time of stress and trial, when we are preaching, or assuming to preach, to the people the necessity of their saving in order that they may serve.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: A grant is proposed to be given in reference to the extraction of benzine and toluene from coal gas by means of absorbents for the purpose of accurately determining the quantity of these compounds. There is in the coal gas product in the various cities and towns of this continent a considerable quantity of these two compounds, particularly of the first. These go to waste at the present time; they are valuable, and a solution of the problem would be of incalculable benefit. A grant is to be given to the University of Manitoba under the charge of one of its professors; that is the very thing that my hon. friend thinks we ought to do. The grant is given under the supervision of the advisory council; it is not a subsidy to assist the university; it is a grant for a specific purpose. The separation of tar from the tar sand is another very important matter. If that problem could be solved, immense benefit would result to the western country. A grant of a small amount, about $1,500, is to be given to that university under the supervision of the proper professor—who is conversant with the question and who is carrying out an investigation at present—to enable him to carry his work to a conclusion. That is the very principle upon which we are proceeding; and that, I think, answers the objection that my hon. friend made in one part of his remarks.

Mr. OLIVER: What the minister has said in regard to grants to universities exactly bears out what I say: the practical result to be expected will be reached by the making of small grants to the universities. I am not suggesting that the minister should make grants to universities in respect of these particular questions, but if he feels the impulse to do something, let him make the grants to the universities directly for these purposes; let him not launch upon this country at this time an expensive organization which will cost $91,000 to start—no one knows how much it will cost to carry it on—when all that he proposes actually to spend in regard to the tar sand is $1,500. I presume a similar amount will be expended for research work in regard to the tar extract from the gas from burning straw, and possibly a similar amount as to the extract from coal gas. Those are moderate amounts, and I suppose nobody will object to their expenditure for such purposes. Let the minister make those expenditures if he pleases, and the country will support him, but let him not burden this country with an expenditure of $100,000 for the purpose of giving four or five thousand dollars for actual research work.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The expenditure of $100,000 for scientific research in Canada is not objectionable, if we have the proper organization. It is quite possible, if real practical work is done by the commission, for an expenditure of $100,000 to yield a return of $1,000,000. I suppose one of the best instances of the value to a country of scientific work was that performed by the late Mr. Saunders in the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Saunders developed a seed wheat for Canada which matured some weeks earlier than any other wheat that had been known prior to this time in Canada.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What wheat is that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know what the name of the wheat is, but the fact which I have seen stated in government publications is that, through Mr. Saunders' effort, a special wheat was developed which matured very much earlier in Canada than any wheat previously known. I did not know that this fact was ever in question. I could easily put my hand upon written authority in which it is stated by very prominent persons that the result of this was the widening of the wheat belt in western Canada by many miles.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I think the wheat to which the hon. member refers is Marquis wheat. The experience of practical farmers has been that it matures eight or ten days earlier than other kinds.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman may be correct, but I am simply stating to the committee a fact which I have seen stated a score of times. I am giving it to the committee just as I have gained it from my reading, and I have no doubt I am correct in this.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I only wish the statement were true.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is well known that the work done by Mr. Saunders in this respect resulted in securing for Canada a seed wheat which enables us to harvest wheat very much earlier than we were able to do before, and that was a very important matter in a country in which the summer season is short. If what I have stated is correct, Mr. Saunders' work was worth millions of dollars to Canada.

When the Bill establishing this commission was before the committee, I objected to the personnel of the commission, and I want to repeat my objection. It is not satisfactory to the people of Canada; it is not satisfactory to some of the members of the commission. The men constituting that commission should be much younger men with some practical experience. I do not believe in establishing a commission composed of men who are able to give attention to this work for only a few days in a year. The appointment of such a commission is fraught with great possibilities for this country. The idea is absolutely sound. This is the time above all others in our history when we should be doing work of this kind. The very fact that we have a tremendous debt to meet in consequence of the war is one reason why we should engage in this sort of work. My experience—and I am sure it is the case with other hon. gentlemen—is that I am frequently approached by men in my province who are confronted with some problem for the solution of which they desire scientific assistance. They cannot very well purchase this knowledge; they are not in a position to go abroad and bring into this country experts who would solve such problems, and this work should be done by the country, because it will aid in developing our commerce and our trade. Great care should be exercised in the selection of the board. I think a mistake has already been made; in fact, the whole board is a mistake. I do not wish to say anything more about it, because it is not pleasant discussing the personnel of a commission of this kind for, after all, the men on it are distinguished men and amongst our best citizens. But it is possibe to make a very grave mistake in judgment in selecting men for this work even if you do take them from amongst the most distinguished men of our universities. A great problem for a body of this kind would be in connection with soil fertilization. Nothing could be more important than that to this country. If this commission can ascertain some method of providing for the farmers of this country a fertilizer, in sufficient quantities and at a fair price, they will be doing something which will be worth millions of dollars to this country, and the expenditure of $100,000 would be a small matter in accomplishing such a result. What does the minister purpose doing in co-ordinating the work to be done by the commission and that which is now done by other departments? There are scientific men in the Department of Agriculture. There is a vote in the supplementary estimates of $6,000 for forestry studies. I do not know if it is advisable to make an expenditure for that purpose just at present. There are in the Department of Agriculture now some technical officials whose work is particularly along such lines.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Forestry lines?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is in the Interior Department.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In the Interior Department to some extent, and in the Department of Agriculture there is at least one gentleman whose work is along that line. In the Mines Branch there are quite a number of scientific men who devote their time to the scientific side of our mines and minerals, and you will probably find scientific men in other departments. Is the minister going to have them work together or separately? Could not their labours be co-ordinated? Possibly it might be advisable to take the scientific men from all the departments and put them into this branch.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is exactly what is being very successfully done, and with the greatest good-will on the part of all the departments. They understand each other, and the council works with them and they work with the council. The idea is to co-ordinate and to bring, so to speak, into focus all those different agencies that have been doing excellent work, each by itself. My hon. friend is quite mistaken as to the number of men engaged in forestry work connected with the Department of Agriculture. They are in the Interior Department and in the Conservation Commission. They are working in strict conjunction, and the experiment, for which this vote is in the estimates to-day, is to be carried out by the experts in the Interior Department. It is not by any means a duplication of energy. The intention is to avoid that and to co-ordinate and concentrate the work upon the development of the resources of Canada.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I understood my hon. friend from Halifax to say that some of these men are devoting only a portion of their time and energies to this work. If that is so, how many of the council are devoting their whole time and energies to the work? Some of them, surely.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The only one who is doing that is the administrative chairman. My hon. friend must remember that these gentlemen have been selected because of their eminence and practical knowledge in certain lines of investigation. It was never contemplated that they should themselves go into the laboratory and conduct experiments. They constitute a committee to set to work, and keep at work, and co-ordinate all the different agencies, and to apply whatever money we may appropriate for work along these lines. All of these men, with the exception of Dr. MacCallum, are giving their services free, but that does not mean that they are simply taking a holiday and taking no interest in the matter. These men have been at work now for more than a year, and I know what they have done. They have devoted a very large portion of their busy lives to this work, and are thoroughly enthusiastic in seeing that it is brought to a successful issue— that it shall not be a mere fad, but give practical results which will be of very great benefit to the country. The council has met in Ottawa once or twice a month since it was appointed. They sit from three to five days; at one meeting here they sat a whole week. They are not treating this matter as a plaything or anything of that kind.

Their viewpoint was a very good one, and it entirely coincided with mine. A council of that kind, with that desire and that ability to work along these lines, cannot, if good results are to be obtained, all be working separately with no one responsible for the whole work. It was essential that one man should be appointed to co-ordinate their efforts, and the best man amongst them was chosen—he was their choice as well as mine—to act in that capacity, to direct, to consult, to keep the whole machine going, as it were, with these men as the motive power. But that is really the smallest thing that has been done. The advisory council has been at work a little over a year now, and in that time has brought together all the different forces in the Dominion that are engaged in industrial or scientific research, and which hitherto had been doing their work on their own, often duplicating each other, and lacking that energy and spirit that comes from co-ordination with other workers in the same line with a common object in view. The research branch of the Interior and Mining Departments, the Conservation Commission, the Inland Revenue and other research branches, have all been linked up with this general endeavour. In a little over a year all this dispersed effort has been concentrated, and has become inspired with a spirit and energy, and with a determined effort to work along these lines, that was foreign to them entirely a year ago. The council has put new spirit into them all.

I do not need to follow up what my hon. friend from Halifax said as to the immense necessity of this work, particularly at this time. A few thousand dollars is a mere bagatelle to the advantage that only one successful solution along some line might bring to the economic strength of this country. This work is almost an absolute necessity, if we are to keep abreast with other nations. My hon. friend says that this is not the commission we should have appointed. I would ask him to give the commission a free rein for a while, and after a year or so, I think he will come out of that contemplative area in which he has rested for about a year now, as respects undue criticism, and I think he will then revise his opinion of these men. Nobody can select members to suit everybody; we all have our opinions about them. But I am of the opinion that we have just about the very best council that could have been got together in the whole Dominion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would it not be well to have some representative of agriculture on the council?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I suppose there is not a college or university in the whole Dominion which symbolizes agriculture so much as does the university of Saskatchewan, over which Dr. Murray presides. That is the foundation principle of his university, which was founded with a view to the agricultural possibilities and necessities of that great province.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That hardly answers my question. I know Professor Murray very well. He has had very little to do with agriculture in a practical or scientific way in all his experience. He is a very busy man and is engaged in the building up of a new university in a new province. I am not objecting to him being a member of the board at all, because he is an excellent man indeed, one of the very best on the council. Still, I think it would be desirable to appoint another representative of agriculture to the board, with the qualifications I have indicated.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As these scientific men receive no salary, I can see no reason why the minister should not enlarge the council. It is a very big problem these men are undertaking, and there does not seem to be any reason why the number of members should be limited. There is a university in Nova Scotia, St. Francis Xavier, which has a number of eminent men on its staff who are devoting their time to scientific research, and I am sure some one among them could be found who would be of great value to the council if the minister should make up his mind to enlarge the number, I trust he will not fail to give this proposal his best consideration. I agree with my hon. friend from Halifax that youth counts for a great deal in work of this kind, especially for the chairman, and if the minister has put in charge of this work a man whose best days are over, and who has not the energy required for this work, I think he has made a mistake. I do not know Professor MacCallum at all, but I have heard that remark made by men who are interested in the work of this council.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What does my hon. friend think is the age of Dr. MacCallum?

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is what I want to know.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You seem to have assumed that he is an old man. He is a comparatively young man.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does "comparatively" mean?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He is somewhere around fifty-five or fifty-six. I do not consider a man old at that age.

Mr. GRAHAM: If that is so, he is almost too young.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister should be able to give exact information on that subject.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He may be older than that; I do not know.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has not yet stated the salary to be paid.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: $10,000 per year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not a bad salary.

Mr. ROSS: Every member of this committee will agree in the principle that it is a proper thing for the Government to pursue research on special problems. It may be very laudable and very profitable for the country to do so. But it may be questioned whether this is the proper time to establish a system of work of this kind, with our finances in the condition they now are and with pressing need for money for other purposes. I think the minister should not ask us to pass the various items included in this vote without giving more details. The first item is for $43,600 for salaries and expenses, including printing, stationery, etc. The minister has told us that the salary of the chairman is $10,000. He has told us, moreover, that none of the members except the chairman receive any salary. That still leaves $33,600, for salaries and expenses, to be accounted. This Government, since it came into power, has proceeded with almost a riotous abandon to create public officials, and it would look from this vote as though they were going to follow their own bad example. The minister owes it to the committee to inform it as to how the $33,600 is to be expended. What is the staff of this bureau to consist of? Do they have to pass the Civil Service Commission and be appointed by that body, or are they to be appointed by the Government of its own motion? The minister has said that Professor MacCallum's duty is to keep the whole machine going and that is the smallest part of the work, yet in addition to the salary of the chairman, there is this $33,000. The minister should give more detailed information as to how the money is to be spent.

Mr. NICKLE: It seems to me that the criticism which hon. gentlemen opposite are directing towards this vote is founded on a thorough misapprehension of Canada's requirements in the solution of the industrial problems that confront her. Prior to the outbreak of the war it was recognized that Germany and the United States were making more rapid advance industrially than any other nations in the world. Germany was making her advance because she had applied technical education to the education of her workmen, and had solved industrial problems by the application of chemistry and science. Some one has said that if Germany had been willing to stand by for another fifteen years she would have dominated the world industrially and economically and would never have had to fight this war. The United States was making the same advances in the industrial world that Germany was making, and the reason that these two nations were making such tremendous strides was that each had started much later in the industrial activities of the world than England. England had developed her industries along individualistic lines; they were not as all-embracing as those of Germany and the United States. The United States had taken advantage of the co-ordination of wealth and effort, and had developed tremendous industries. Germany had also attained the same thing with state aid, the result being that these two nations were enabled, through their mighty industries, to take advantage of the intelligence of the world and to apply chemistry and science to industrial problems. England, with her smaller industrial establishments, had been less progressive. We in Canada are just at the beginning of things. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have said that this is not the time to branch out along new lines of work, that we should wait until the war is over, that other things require the expenditure of that money more than the solution of these industrial problems. It seems to me that these hon. members are entirely wrong, that there never was a time when it was so necessary for Canada to embark on this line of work as it is to-day. Some gentlemen have deprecated the application of science to industry. They must have closed their eyes to what has been going on in the world during the last twenty years. Look what the application of science is doing in this war for the lessening of sickness. It controls typhoid fever, a disease that, years ago, took two men out of every ten, because in the wars of the past disease took more soldiers than bullets. Look what science has done when applied to industry. We have cheap steel to-day. Why? Because Bessemer applied a process to steel that so cheapened the product that to-day it can be bought for one-half what it cost a few years ago. Take what has been done in recent years by the scientific application of electricity, by making use of our water-powers. To-day munitions are turned out in this country by the use of hardened steel tools in the lathes with a rapidity that a few years ago would have been impossible. We have the steel so tempered and hardened that it can be used in a rapidly moving lathe until the tool practically becomes red hot, so hot that, with the old process, it would have lost its point and edge. That is all possible owing to the application of science to industry. Then take the abrasives used in the manufacture of munitions and metal wares. Their production has become possible only through the application of science to industry. Then if Germany had not solved the problem and were not taking advantage also of Norway's development of electricity in taking the nitrates from the air, the munitions with which Germany is fighting to-day could not be made and peace with victory for the Allies would have come long ago. This line of thought brings another great problem to our attention. We have in this country great water-powers. We ought to do something to develop another great industry; we ought to take steps along a line of development that will make possible some economic method by which we can get nitrates from the atmosphere, and make a cheap fertilizer for our farmers. I believe that, in the United States to-day, they are spending some millions of dollars in an effort to solve that problem, yet we have done nothing. It seems to me that now is the accepted time and that we should begin. Reverting to what I said about our having small industries in Canada, and to the point that the great industries of Germany and the United States made possible the employment of the best men for the solution of their problems, let me direct attention to the fact that many of the best and brightest men who graduate from the universities of this country go to the United States because, when they have graduated from our colleges, there is no opportunity in Canada to secure adequate employment and reasonable remuneration, and if most of our industries have not attained a sufficient size and importance to warrant the expenditure to secure chemists of the highest class, is there any wiser thing for the Government to do than to take the matter in charge, to establish some central bureau or board that would keep in touch with the great problems touching this country's industrial life and the industry of the world, and keep in touch with the brightest minds of the universities, and give assistance to this university or to that, according as its men are working out the solution of one problem or another. I believe that if this scheme is properly managed, it will be of tremendous advantage to the country. I think it wiser that there should be a central board rather than that grants should be made to this university or that, because if you leave it to the universities—and I speak now as a university man—there will always be a tendency to spend the money on what you might call pure science rather than on the development of industrial science. If the money that is being expended here should result in the discovery of some process by which the nitrogen contained in the air or feldspar could be made available as a fertilizer, it would do more for this country than ten times or a hundred times the money contained in this vote.

I cannot speak with regard to the personnel of all of the commission. I do not know all the men who compose it. I have for years known Dr. MacCallum, a distinguished graduate and professor of Toronto University; I know Professor Kirkpatrick, professor of metallurgy in Queen's University. I know that he is a man of ability and energy, and that he represents the best thought in the faculty of science of Queen's University. He has applied his brains to the solution of practical problems, and what he has done has been for the advantage of this country. I desire to acknowledge the work that has been done by the young men of the universities. A few years ago an amount of money was given by this Government to the School of Science at Kingston for the investigation of the cobalt problem, and to see if something could not be done with cobalt ore. Professor Kalmus and his assistants devoted attention to that question for three years, and discovered a process by which cobalt is used as a plating material. It is better and cheaper than silver, it does not tarnish, it lasts longer, stands harder service and wears better. I just quote this simple instance to show how the brains and energy that are to be found within our colleges can be profitably applied. I hope this committee will look with sympathy upon this vote, and that it will uphold the hands of the minister in trying to get this estimate through the House.

I hope the time is not very far distant when we will have a proposition before this House with reference to technical education. If we are going to develop our scientists in the application of science to industry, we should have technical education so that those who are to be the users of scientific methods may appreciate and make the best use of the scientific processes placed at their disposal.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What does the minister say to my proposal for the enlargement of his board so as to take in a representative of St. Francois Xavier College?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The principle which was decided upon at the first was that we should not make it representative of all the universities, because otherwise the number would be so great that it would be unworkable. Our people have to come from all parts of the Dominion. I think that I was perfectly right in getting a comparatively small committee. That does not, to a single hair's breadth, operate against the co-operation of every university, scientific institution or scientific person in Canada. It is the object of this council to organize all the talents and scientific knowledge by way of co-operating committees, and the council is at present developing its scheme in that respect. No person from Laval University down to the college of which my hon. friend speaks, or any other person who has abilities in that direction, will be left unsolicited. All others will be solicited and they will be joined into subsidiary committees working in connection with the central body. That is the line upon which Great Britain is proceeding. She has instituted, under her advisory council, committees in every portion of Great Britain, each for its special line. The idea is to call out from the country and use in this active co-ordinative work all the ability and talent we have.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Over and above this advisory council of scientists, there is constituted, I see by the statute, a scientific research subcommittee which is charged with the appointment of this council. How is that subcommittee constituted?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is composed of the Ministers of Mines, Interior, Agriculture, Labour, Inland Revenue and Trade and Commerce. With the exception of the Department of Labour, these departments have research branches.

Mr. ROSS: What staff has Dr. MacCallum surrounded himself with and which will be paid out of this amount of $43,600? How many are there and how are they appointed? Are they appointed by the Civil Service Commission, by the Government or by the doctor himself?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend raises a question as to the machinery for carrying out the work and he seems to be seized with a very great fear that there will be some improper manipulation in reference to the help that these gentlemen require. I can assure my hon. friend that there is not the least danger of that. This is not a patronage department in any sense whatever. There will be no patronage in any way. If these gentlemen require to have a question put out in order to get information, we supply Dr. MacCallum with such help as he considers necessary and we apply to the Civil Service Commission for the purpose of getting the help to assist in that work. They are employed while they are able to do the work and no longer. At present there is a secretary without pay, there is a clerk, who has charge of the general department, under Dr. MacCallum, and there are temporary helpers to the extent probably of half a dozen who are engaged in the work in connection with these questionnaires. When they finish that work, if other work is necessary to be carried on, they will be at the disposal of the advisory council, as long as they are required but they will not be kept on a day if there is no work for them to do. I want to assure my hon. friend that it is not the intention with reference to this matter—as indeed it is not the practise with reference to my department—that there shall be any patronage. It is absolutely outside of patronage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It must be a very important exception.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It must really surprise my hon. friend from St. John taking into account the way he used to carry on his department.

Mr. ROSS: I think the question is a very proper one. The minister seems not to have liked it very much.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentleman is wrong in that; I want to give all the information.

Mr. ROSS: This is public money and I presume that any member has a perfect right to ask any question. As long as I am here I am going to do it. The minister's answer does not satisfy me. He still has $33,600 at his disposal after Dr. MacCallum has got his $10,000.

I think it is a very laudable and may be a very profitable scheme in any country, but I doubt whether this is the proper time to embark on such a work, in spite of what the hon. member for Kingston has said. The hon. minister tells us the council has a secretary who is not paid, and there are six or seven temporary employees, and that the expenses of this advisory council cannot be very heavy, because they do not meet often. The only other item of expenditure included in this vote is stationery, and yet he asks us for $33,600. I think he should give us more details, or cut down this item because that sum is not needed for the work he has mentioned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will give all the information I can, and the hon. gentleman must not think that I wish to refuse him any. I appreciate his evident anxiety for fear something will go wrong; I could not help but appreciate that anxiety. He said there was $33,600, made up of what items?

Mr. MURPHY: Deducting $10,000 salary from the first item of $43,600.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the first place, these gentlemen who give their services, cannot be of essential service at all unless they meet together.

Mr. ROSS: Do they have regular meetings?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: How often?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Once or twice a month. They have met regularly, not less than once a month and in some months twice. They come from Halifax in the east, and from points as far west as Saskatchewan. We pay their travelling and living expenses, and they hold about 20 meetings per year. These expenses form a part of the item. Whatever printing and stationery are necessary have to be provided for. If they require printing done, in order to help them out, it will have to be paid for. They will have to provide for distribution of information in different ways. These questionnaires, to which I have referred, deal with the chief work they are engaged in at the present time, and they involve an immense amount of tabulation. I will lay these questionnaires on the Table. When replies to all these questionnaires come in from industrial establishments, colleges, and scientific institutions, they will have to be collated, and the desired information tabulated. This vote will provide for that work. I am not prepared to say whether this $43,600 will be too much or too little. I have made a rough estimate for the first year, because it is experimental, but I can assure my hon. friend and the committee that nothing will be expended unless it is thought necessary, in the opinion of the advisory council.

Mr. CARROLL: I have been watching, with some interest, an attempt that has been made to grow trees on Sable Island, for the purpose of keeping the island from wearing away, and becoming more dangerous than it now is. Was that work started under the direction of this board?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That was commenced earlier.

Mr. CARROLL: With what success?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I have not followed it.

Mr. CARROLL: It might be interesting to direct the attention of the council to that question. The great difficulty is with the soil, which is sandy.

Mr. MARCIL: I did not hear the minister mention any special problem to be dealt with, except two in western Canada, one with regard to straw being converted into gas, and the other in connection with sand. Is there any problem to be solved in the other provinces?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The other provinces will not be left out. It is impossible for me to keep pace with all the deliberations of the board, so as to know exactly what they are doing. They are appointed for a certain purpose, and are supposed to be able to select the most important questions. I remember talking over one problem of great importance which is being considered at the present time, namely, the influence of fogs on sound. That is intimately connected with navigation. There are certain difficulties in respect to it, which, if overcome, will be of great benefit to navigators.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Might I suggest the importance of investigating certain practical questions connected with the fisheries, for example? We have some problems on the coast of the Maritime Provinces, in connection with the fisheries, which have never been solved, and I do not think any attempt has been made to solve them. For example, we are spending a large sum of money in hatcheries, and millions of lobster spawn are scattered on the face of the waters every year. Although we have been carrying on this propagation of lobsters for many years, no one can say, with authority, whether these lobsters live, develop and grow. It is a practical question and an expert should be able to solve it with a little consideration. There is another question with regard to the spawning place of the haddock and cod. Applications were made to prevent trawling in certain waters—the Gulf of St. Lawrence, for instance—and many fishermen had the idea that that was the spawning place of these fish, which, if so, would be a strong argument in favour of preventing trawlers operating in that locality during the spawning season. I mention this matter so that the minister can direct the attention of those investigators to these problems, which are of such vital importance to the fishing industry.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does this board initiate the matters which are to be investigated, or will they investigate any subjects referred to them, either by the Government, or by individuals? I should like to know upon what line they proceed. We know there are many questions of practical interest which people would like to have investigated. The question asked by my hon. friend from Kingston, in regard to the production of nitrogen from feldspar is a very important matter, and the problem in connection with that has been very largely solved, but it might be taken hold of in a practical way.

So with regard to the obtaining of oil from shales, which are very numerous in this country; so with regard to obtaining by-products from bituminous coal. Will any person interested in work of this kind be encouraged to present his views to the board?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am quite sure that one of the objects of the board's work will be to find out the problems that are troubling the industrial and productive interests of the country. The questionnaires which have been sent out broadcast have that purpose in view. They are to ascertain from these different industries and productive interests what their difficulties and problems are; these will be tabulated and work will be begun towards solution of the most important of them through these channels of investigation. Any such questions asked by individuals—not industrial establishments or corporations—will no doubt be taken into consideration by the advisory council. I may say to the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that it escaped my recollection that Mr. Surveyer is a professor in Laval University.

Mr. OLIVER: I take the responsibility of suggesting, in view of the statements made by the minister and of the other information that we have had here to-day, that the organization which my hon. friend proposes will be a close corporation for the suppression of individual initiative in regard to scientific research.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am willing to let it go at that, if my hon. friend is.

Mr. MURPHY: In times past considerable sums of money were voted for experiments in connection with the production of peat as a domestic fuel, and electric smelting as applied to the production of steel. I think this expenditure was made under the Department of the Interior.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Mines Branch.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it proposed that these two matters will come under the jurisdiction and special charge of the industrial bureau which we have been discussing?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Mines Department is co-ordinated with the advisory committee and they work together. One of the principal aims of the council is to co-ordinate all these different branches of industries. I do not know what practical results have come from these investigations. I think that they have succeeded in making a peat which is useful and has been used; how far it has gone towards being a commercial success I do not know. Probably a good deal more money will have to be spent before the inquiry can be said to be an absolutely successful one.

Steam service between Prince Rupert and Queen Charlotte Islands—further amount required, $5,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that a weekly service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is a tri-weekly service. In order to have it carried on under present conditions, the Post Office Department and the Department of Trade and Commerce had to make a slight addition to the former subsidy.

Mr. OLIVER: How many vessels are employed in that service?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: One, the Prince John—a very superior vessel.

Department of Finance and Treasury Board—To hereby promote H. Goode to Third Division, subdivision A, $100.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do object to Parliament being asked by legislation to promote a man from one division to another. If this gentleman is entitled to promotion, he is entitled to it under the Civil Service Act. The House is asked "to hereby promote" this gentleman; what right have we to be asked to promote a man from one division to another? If he is entitled to promotion, let him have it, and let a salary be provided for it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend uses language of hyperbole to describe what is really a very simple and proper transaction. My hon. friend is spending the powers of his intellect against a young woman, Miss Goode, who is to be promoted from one division to another, to take the position of Miss McConnell, resigned, who was paid $1,200 a year. She is employed in the office of the chief accountant. Miss Goode entered the service on July 1, 1915, and has passed the Civil Service examinations for stenographers. When she took over Miss McConnell's work it was found that the Civil Service Commission required her to pass in two or three extra subjects not covered in her stenographer's examinations before it would be possible to promote her to Third Division, subdivision A. She is one of the best clerks in the department, and we should have lost her services if we had not been able to promote her. This is not the best time to obtain skilled assistants of the kind in question; we are finding that out in the department. Generally speaking, I agree that it is not advisable in any way to transgress the provisions of the Civil Service Act; but I call my hon. friend's attention to item 410, in which the Civil Service Commission has been obliged to do this very thing themselves. Item 410 is to provide for the promotion of one clerk from Third Division, subdivision B, to Third Division, subdivision A, $112.50.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They have been encouraged by what the minister has done.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So that if the Civil Service Commission, owing to a shortage of help in a time of war, have felt themselves justified in inserting an item of this kind, I do not think that my hon. friend ought to protest so strongly against our promoting this exceedingly efficient clerk to a position in which she will get $900 a year.

Department of Insurance—to provide for three clerkships in Third Division, Subdivision B: one at $800, one at $700, one at $600—$2,100.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Several members of the actuarial staff of the department have enlisted. It is proposed to provide substitutes for those by making appointments in the lower divisions, which appointments it is necessary to create, the department having no vacancies in this division. Some of the younger men, who were very desirous of going to the front enlisted.

Mr. MURPHY: What has become of the positions which are vacated? Were salaries voted for them?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The men who have enlisted receive their pay and their positions are being held for them, but as the department is handicapped by their absence, it is necessary to provide these substitutes by making appointments in the lower divisions, the idea being that, by the time those men come back, the work will have so increased that it will not be necessary to let any one go. The work of the Insurance Department is very efficiently done, and not with a large staff.

Department of Insurance — contingencies, printing, binding and stationery, including cost of annual reports, further amount required, $5,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This amount is intended to cover the increased cost of printing and materials, and also to provide for an increased circulation. More and more of the reports issued by the Insurance Department are being asked for each year.

Pensions—compassionate allowance to Private Colin C. McNab for a disability arising from service during the Northwest Rebellion, 1885, $1,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is not in his seat. This matter has been discussed at two previous sessions of Parliament. It has been brought to my attention by the Hon. Mr. Graham, by Dr. Maloney of South Renfrew and some others. Last year, in order that we might have an authentic report upon the case, and be informed as to its merits, I asked the Board of Pensions Commissioners to investigate the matter specially. They did so, and as a result they recommended to me that there was merit in the claim and that an allowance of $1,000 would, in their judgment, fairly meet the case. This item has been inserted accordingly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why was the claim refused before?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This man, as I recollect the matter, was not a member of the force, but he had been specially requested to go along as an expert telegrapher. It is, of course, very necessary that telegraphers should accompany an expeditionary force. During his employment in that connection, by reason of exposure and the hardship of the campaign, his health was so affected that he subsequently became totally blind. There are two points: First, as to whether his blindness was directly related to his experience in the Northwest rebellion, and secondly, as to whether it would be proper, under any circumstances, to allow him a pension as he was not a member of the combatant force. It is open, of course, to Parliament to bring in a special item providing a pension for any person if the circumstances are such as to warrant it. This seems to be a case in which this man's service rendered to his country was a direct cause of his permanent disability through blindness. The Board of Pensions Commissioners have satisfied themselves that the blindness was so related to his experience, and it seems proper, under the circumstances, that Parliament should be generous to him.

Miscellaneous—Canadian Associated Press, $8,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The explanation of the vote is: The Canadian Associated Press operates a cable service between Great Britain and Canada. This service was established in 1903, aided by a Dominion Government grant. J. Ross Robertson is president, and J. E. Atkinson, secretary-treasurer. A grant of $8,000 was made last year, when the association requested that such an amount be granted each year for five years—this being equivalent to the proportionate yearly value of the five years' subsidy ended June 30, 1915. For its last fiscal year, the cost of operating the association's cable services was $21,188, $13,188 being borne by the newspapers. Thirteen of the largest daily papers in eastern Canada take the direct service of the association, while in western Canada thirty papers get the cables through the Western Associated Press. Through regular news channels, the news so cabled is distributed indirectly to the daily and weekly press of the Dominion. During the past year, 208,000 words were cabled in addition to ordinary news of interest in connection with trade and financial matters, questions of interest to Canada and the Empire, etc. Since the war special attention has been paid to the activities of the Canadian forces in England, while a special correspondent pays a periodical visit to the front in France.

Miscellaneous—to provide for the administration of the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916; appointments for the purpose may be made without reference to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, $150,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A similar estimate was adopted by the House last year. It is, of course, only an estimate. The other day I brought down in the House an answer to a question in which I gave the information, if my recollection serves me aright, that the cost of administration for the portion of the year up to March 31 last during which the Act had been under administration, was something under $100,000. We think $150,000 will be an adequate estimate, and it is really a low percentage, having regard to the amount of taxation which we expect to collect from the Business Profits War Tax Act and its amendment this year. The staff was organized last year with representatives in every province, and in some provinces three or four representatives, with such clerical assistance as was necessary to carry out the work.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do you propose to increase the staff?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It will be the same staff. What I have in mind at present is to extend the business profits war tax staff in order that they may carry out also the administration of the income tax. It will undoubtedly be necessary to have a very large staff to carry out efficiently the income tax measure. It is the first work of that kind that has been done under Dominion administration, and every province will have to be covered, but we have a nucleus in the business profits war tax staff, and by expanding that I hope to cover the ground.

Mr. MURPHY: Why are you excluding the Civil Service Commission from making these appointments?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not because I do not realize the utility of the Civil Service Commission, but I do not believe it would be possible to get qualified men who were capable of passing the Civil Service examination in time for the organization of a staff such as we have in mind. Take our experience last year. It was necessary to find men of business and accounting experience, and it is very difficult to get those men. We got men around 35, or 40, or 45 years of age, who had had banking or business experience, and after considerable trouble we managed to get together what I regard as a very creditable staff. I am quite satisfied, however, that few of them, if any, would be able to pass the Civil Service examination. The type of man you want is a man who knows business pretty well, and men pretty well, and has a certain force of character, but who probably would not be able to pass the academic examination which he might have been able to pass when he was sixteen years of age. My hon. friend from Russell could not begin to pass the Civil Service examination.

Mr. MURPHY: I would not attempt it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And as for the leader of the Opposition, he would be hopeless.

Mr. KYTE: Is it the intention of the minister to appoint members of the outside service in various parts of Canada to administer the Income Tax Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not given the matter the attention it will receive before we can determine upon the organization. My own view is that if this Act is efficiently administered—and I do not want to administer it unless it is efficiently administered—we must have officials whose business it is to look after income assessments throughout this country. It has been suggested to me that we should use the provincial machinery. I doubt very much the advisability of that. The responsibility for the administration of this Act rests upon the Dominion Government, and I think it must be carried out through officials who are responsible to the Government for administering the Act. I do not think the work should be done by Customs or other officials throughout the country giving a small portion of their time to it. I would prefer to have each province organized with an efficient staff whose duties will be to see that assessable incomes in Canada are assessed, and that those who derive them will pay this taxation. If that is not done, I am satisfied that the income tax administration will be more or less a farce. In the cities of this country the municipal income tax is not administered as it should be. Of course, there are a great many exemptions which are not in our Act. Our Act calls for the assessment of the whole income of individuals no matter how derived, and so far as I can see, there are not many loopholes, if any, for escape. I am perfectly satisfied it would be a profound mistake to skimp it, by trying to get men who will give a little of their time to the work, and who would necessarily discharge their duties in a perfunctory fashion. The Act should be administered in a business-like way in order that those who are subject to this tax shall pay it. These are but general observations. I am sorry I am not able to answer my hon. friend more particularly, but he knows how busy I have been during the last two weeks in the House, and I have not yet turned my mind to the question of organization.

Mr. KYTE: If the minister will permit me to make a suggestion, I think he might with profit utilize the services of the municipal clerks and treasurers. In municipalities there are, in all probability, only a comparatively small number of men with incomes liable for assessment under this Act, and it would seem to me to be an unprofitable expenditure to appoint officials of this Government for the special purpose of collecting the income tax when there are not more than a dozen or two incomes to tax in a municipality. The municipal clerks and treasurers are familiar with the circumstances of all persons in the municipality; they are used to looking after the collection of taxes for municipal purposes, and it does seem to me that the collection of the income tax by this Government could be more efficiently done by municipal clerks and treasurers, particularly in the smaller municipalities in Nova Scotia. I would ask the minister to take this suggestion into consideration, and I think upon receiving more information he will conclude that I am right in saying that these men will be the best persons to perform this work, being able to do it more efficiently and with less expense than officials specially appointed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am much obliged for my hon. friend's suggestion, which I shall be glad to take into consideration. It was not in my mind, however, that the Government should appoint officials with limited districts, speaking geographically, to look after the administration of the Act. I should not like to appoint an official who had only a few assessments to make. But if we had an organization adequate to cover the province of Nova Scotia and other provinces, so that they would all be engaged all the time, I think there could be no objection to such a scheme, and if the information could be obtained, I think that would be the better way. But I am very glad indeed to have the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When the minister organizes his staff for the collection of the income tax, I would suggest that he select men who will command the respect of the people, who will be looked upon as capable men anxious only to do their duty, and who will not be partisans in any way. The minister promised that the appointments in connection with the Business Profits War Tax Act would not be partisan appointments, and in the administration of an Act of this kind I think it is particularly desirable that officers should not be appointed merely by reason of political qualifications. They should be men who would be favourably regarded by the citizens generally regardless of political party. The suggestions of my hon. friend from Richmond might be valuable in a degree, but in a degree only. There are some counties where the municipal officers would not be competent—at least, that is my judgment. I think their general record as tax collectors is not a good one; their training has not been very good. While a municipal officer here and there might collect the income tax in his district very quickly and cheaply, I should not like to agree to that being done generally.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have made no appointments having regard to political considerations, as nothing could be more unfair than to have politics mixed up with the administration of a taxation Act. Before making an appointment in Halifax, I consulted a number of the leading business men of the city, and finally a very reputable man, who, I believe, is acceptable to the business community, was selected. I think the work there has been carried out quite satisfactorily. In New Brunswick we selected a man who had been for many years an assessor in St. John, and I believe that he has the esteem and confidence of the citizens. The chief collector in Montreal was an accountant who for many years was attached to the Department of Justice here, a very competent man. Similarly throughout the whole country the appointments have been made, and we have received extraordinarily few complaints with regard to the officers administering the Business Profits War Tax.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

LOAN OF $7,500,000 TO THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

Loan note exceeding $7,500,000, repayable on demand with interest payable half yearly at the rate of six per centum (6%); to be used to meet expenditure made or indebtedness incurred in paying interest on securities of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company; to meet deficit in operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system and for betterments and the purchase of rolling stock; said loan to be secured by mortgage upon the undertaking of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company containing such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve. The disposition of the loan to be subject to the direction of the Governor in Council. The company agree to constitute its board of directors as may be required from time to time by the Governor in Council.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in a position to give any information in regard to the total cost of raising the rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Edmonton and generally in regard to the results to traffic and damages to property resulting from the raising of those rails?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No; it did not occur to me that the question would arise in connection with this vote although I think it is proper for the hon. gentleman to raise it. The work of raising the rails is in progress but it is not yet finished. I am not in a position to make any statement as to the cost of replacement or the damages, if any, to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. OLIVER: Would not the question of damages to the Grand Trunk Pacific have some bearing on this item? Would there not be a serious and important payment to the Grand Trunk Pacific because of the taking up of these rails? They surely are entitled to be paid for the rails and they are entitled to payment for the loss accruing. There should be some means of arriving at the cost.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It does not occur to me that it will have any material bearing upon the amount of this estimate because the damages, if any, are quite indefinite and they may be set off for some advantage. It is obviously impossible to make a definite statement as to what the financial consequences would be of the transaction in question, and unless some definite information were had, which cannot well be had at this time, it does not occur to me that it will have a bearing on the question of the amount which Parliament should vote for the purpose of enabling the Grand Trunk Pacific to operate as a going concern during the next year.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to discuss too intimately with the minister that point, but I would think it would have a very important bearing, first, upon the amount of money that would be at the disposal of the company during this current year, and, second, on their facilities for operation. On that point, I am in a position to inform the committee that the difference in the cost of operating is a matter of 250 tons per freight train; that is, the Grand Trunk Pacific can haul five cars of freight less with the road as it is now than it could haul with the road as it was. That is one item that is entitled to consideration. Generally speaking, the transaction is one of such a very remarkable character that I think the country is entitled to a great deal more definite information in regard to it than it has yet received. I cannot conceive of any occasion upon which it would be more appropriate to place that information before the House and the country than during the consideration of this item. Many hundreds of people have been put to great damage, inconvenience and loss, aside altogether from the railway company. Business enterprise in that locality has been seriously impeded. I am prepared to say that not a rail has gone forward to France that has been taken from that track and I am assured that not a rail will go forward to France, first because the shipping facilities are required for food and ammunition, and second, because the rails are not suitable or desired in France, they being very much heavier than are required.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The information which I have is that 100 miles of rails have been taken from the Grand Trunk Pacific and that they are either in France or on the ocean and that in the east 30 miles have been taken west of Three Rivers. As to the rails taken up on the National Transcontinental railway, they are all in France. I may say to my hon. friend, that, while I know that this matter arises in his constituency, I have never been able to understand his attitude towards this taking up of rails. There is no one who is more loyal or has a better appreciation of this war and what it means than my hon. friend. I put to him the question: If an urgent request came from the British Government "We want rails and we want the Dominion Government to give them to us," would my hon. friend give them or would he not? That is the position with which we are confronted. Supposing that there is inconvenience, supposing that damage has resulted, does my hon. friend mean to say that this Government should hesitate to take up rails and send them over to France? I do not know whether my hon. friend has been at the front or not. I was at the front and I saw that if there was anything that was needed at the front last fall it was rails in order to get the guns up. What happened at Loos? What happened at other places? They might launch the fire of their artillery and destroy the trenches of the enemy but when they came to follow up they found that no headway could be made because the big guns could not be moved forward quickly enough to destroy the reserve trenches. The Germans might be driven off the first and second line trenches but it was absolutely necessary to move the guns up quickly and to do that they required heavy rails. Light rails were of no use for the purpose. They could bring up supplies of a certain character with light rails but to bring up the heavy guns they needed heavy rails. This is something that I will defend any place in Canada. It needs no defence. When we were informed that the British Government needed heavy rails we said that these rails should go forward and we proceeded to tear them up. The Minister of Railways said he would tear up half the rails in Canada to supply transport for the men at the front; so would I, and I would not hesitate about it. What does it matter about tearing up the rails, if it is going to save the lives of our noble soldiers. The boys at the front are being decimated; they are suffering great hardships, and dying, and, forsooth, because it is going to cause some inconvenience, it is said we should not forward the rails. I have not been able to understand my hon. friend's position in this matter, because he is a loyal man, and has suffered much in this war. He knows the situation at the front, as well as any man in this House, and upon my word, I cannot understand the attitude he takes in regard to the matter of rails.

Mr. OLIVER: I am equally at a loss to understand the position my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways have taken. When this matter was up for consideration before, I raised the question as to why these rails were taken from Jasper pass, when rails could have been obtained much nearer the Atlantic coast, and I was told the reason they were taken from there was because they were of the same boring as the rails at the front. The minister made the statement that it was necessary to take the Grand Trunk Pacific rails instead of the Canadian Northern rails lying alongside of them, because there was a different boring for the bolts, which, by means of the fishplates, connected the ends of the rails. I say, on the information I have from France, and on the common sense that any ordinary man has, that the reason given is no reason at all. It is nothing more nor less than nonsense, and I think such an argument should not be advanced in the House of Commons by a responsible minister of the Crown. In the first place, these rails were taken from the Jasper pass, 2,500 miles from the Atlantic seaboard, when they had just as good a right to be taken, and could have been taken, from within 200 or 300 miles of the Atlantic seaboard. In the second place, they were taken from the Grand Trunk Pacific in the Jasper pass, when, alongside, was the Canadian Northern, with identically the same weight of rails, the same kind of rails, lying on a road not nearly as well graded as the Grand Trunk Pacific, and with steeper grades. They were taken off the Grand Trunk Pacific, instead of being taken off the Canadian Northern under the pretense—I say pretense—that, because there was half an inch difference in the location of the borings, therefore it was not convenient to use them in France. I say that, in view of such arguments being put before the House, supposedly by a serious Government, I am entitled to call in question the good faith of the Government in this matter, and to say that these rails were not taken up and sent to France because they were needed in France more than any other rail.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Why were they taken up?

Mr. OLIVER: Because it was the policy of this Government to wreck the enterprise, and for no other reason. Has the Government ever laid on the table of the House the request of the British Government for these rails? No, they have not.

Mr. BRADBURY: Why should they be sent there, if they were not needed?

Mr. OLIVER: I am at a loss to understand why this Government does certain things. They have accounted for what they have done by talking nonsense.

Mr. BRADBURY: My hon. friend should not say it is nonsense.

Mr. OLIVER: I am saying it is nonsense, when they say that they had to take Grand Trunk rails, instead of Canadian Northern rails, because there was half an inch difference in the borings.

Mr. BRADBURY: That is an important thing.

Mr. OLIVER: I have information from the front that they link up all kinds of different rails.

Mr. GRAHAM: They do.

Mr. OLIVER: And so they can. My common sense tells me that for work at the front they do not want 80 pound steel, if they can get 60 pound, or lighter steel. Any man's common sense would tell him that, and when the Government undertakes to tell this House that they took up those rails because they had to, and because it was in the interest of the Allies fighting the battles in France, they are not doing justice to the intelligence of the House or of the country, and when I ask him what the cost is going to be—

Mr. HANNA: Does my hon. friend not know that the Railway Commission ordered those rails to be taken up at that particular place? The Railway Commission should know what is best to do in this matter.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not acknowledge allegiance to the Railway Commission. It is a creature of this Parliament—of this Government.

Mr. HANNA: They would be very much obliged to you for that statement.

Mr. OLIVER: I would be very glad to make that statement anywhere. This Parliament is not subject to the Railway Commission; the Railway Commission should be subject to this Parliament. That commission has no authority from this Parliament to give its opinion as to where the rails should be taken up. They were taken up on the responsibility of the Government of this country.

Mr. HANNA: Does my hon. friend not think that the Railway Commission was a pretty fair authority to state where the rails should be taken up?

Mr. OLIVER: The advice of the Railway Commission is no doubt quite good in many respects.

Mr. HANNA: Absolutely.

Mr. OLIVER: But that commission was not appointed—and it is no part of their duty—to advise this Government as to where it should take up rails. The Railway Commission has certain important functions to perform, and I believe it performs those functions very well, but that is no reason why they should perform functions they never were appointed to perform, and which they are no better qualified to perform than my hon. friend or myself. If my hon. friend saw his constituents practically driven out of house and home by the action of this Government, and set afoot on the roadside, after they had spent most of their lives in a certain locality, he might take a different view of the matter.

Mr. HANNA: Not under the circumstances.

Mr. OLIVER: I think he would.

Mr. CARROLL: Did the hon. gentleman say the rails were not sent to France?

Mr. OLIVER: My information is that they have not been sent to France. The minister says they have been sent there, and I am bound to take his word. If they have been sent to France, I can only say that, if it is possible to transport 80 pound rails by the shipload across the Atlantic to France, there cannot surely be such trouble about getting food across the Atlantic as has been represented.

Mr. BRADBURY: It is just as important to have the rails as the guns.

Mr. OLIVER: It is important to have rails, but not as important to have those particular rails. There are other rails besides those in service through the Jasper Pass, and I say the false pretenses of the matter are that my hon. friend took the rails from the best graded road, and left them on the worst graded road, lying right alongside. What difference did it make to the British Government whether these rails be taken off the best graded road or off the poorest road, when they were the same kind of rails?

Mr. BRADBURY: There would be no difference, if th y were the same kind of rails.

Mr. OLIVER: They were the same kind of steel, and everything the same, except that the borings for the bolts which hold the fishplate were in a little different place. My hon. friend should know the boring for the fishplate is not an important mechanical performance, and, as a matter of fact, my information is that they link up all kinds of rails over there, and that they must do so, or they could never get along. The thing is too absurd for words, and when such a statement is made to this House in a serious way, I say it discredits the whole attitude of the Government in regard to the matter, and when I ask the ministers a plain simple question as to what this performance of theirs is costing either the country, the British Government or the Grand Trunk Pacific, they can tell me nothing about it. They say that it is a matter of no importance; I beg to assure them that it is a matter of very great importance. Is it not a matter of importance that men have been left stranded in the wilderness as these men have; that enterprises in the Jasper Park have been left practically in the air by the taking up of these rails? This Government has a right to consider the interests of the people. My hon. friend asks whether I am interested in the winning of the war. I think that I am in that just as much as he is.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I admit that.

Mr. OLIVER: We are not arguing that point. Surely we have a right to hold the opinion that these rails could have been got nearer the Atlantic seaboard than the Jasper pass; that the rails that were taken were not rails the removal of which would do the least harm to the country or its work; that, the transport of food across the ocean being as important as it is, those rails could have been got in England or in France more conveniently than in Canada. Why does my hon. friend not lay on the table of the House the demand of the British Government for these rails? That has not yet been produced. I want to see that demand; I want to see if they asked for 80-pound rails off the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MORPHY: Has communication not been afforded in some other way in places where rails have been lifted?

Mr. OLIVER: So far as the Transcontinental traffic is concerned, yes. But I have already informed the committee that this was done at a cost of five cars of freight less each way. That is, by reason of the taking of Grand Trunk Pacific rails instead of Canadian Northern rails, trains will haul five cars of freight less each way. That is one result.

Mr. HANNA: Do they not haul all the freight they get?

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly, but the easier the grade, the more economically the freight is handled. After all, with a railroad as with everything else, it is a matter of profit on the work done. My hon. friend must realize that where men have settled down in the occupation of land, houses or property in a certain locality because the railroad is there, the pulling up of the rails wipes out the value of their time and investment. What is going to be done with regard to these people? Are they to be paid damages for the losses that they have suffered? If they are, who is going to pay those damages? Is the British Government to be wolfed because of this mismanagement and waste? Surely the British Government never bargained for any such transaction as that. I have letters from a school district asking what is to become of the school debentures raised in the town of Tollerton, a town that has gone out of existence because of the lifting of rails. These are matters that the Government of Canada must seriously consider. Remember that we are here for the Government of Canada, not for the Government of France or the Government of Britain.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; we are here for the Government of Canada, but we are here also for the British Empire and trying to win this war. My hon. friend puts forth the argument that this Government, in taking up the rails on the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, was actuated by a desire to ruin the Grand Trunk Pacific rather than a desire to get forward the rails required by the British Government. Does he suppose that any man in this committee who has a remnant of reason left will accept that argument? Does he think that the people of the country will accept it for a moment? My hon. friend says that without any request from the British Government, simply in order to destroy the Grand Trunk Pacific, the enterprise of the late Government, we took up these rails and sent them to France. Does my hon. friend think that he is addressing himself to men devoid of reason—because that is what his argument implies. The British Government needed rails to get up the heavy guns. They wanted 80-lb. rails, and they so specified. We sent them 80-lb. rails; in order not to embarrass railways in Canada other than Government railways, we took them in the first instance from the National Transcontinental railway. When we had sent them that kind of rail they wanted us to send the same kind in the further quantities that they were anxious to secure. We then asked Sir Henry Drayton, chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada, to advise us where in Canada that particular kind of rail could be taken up with the least public inconvenience. What else could the Government do? How could the Government have acted more fairly? To what other tribunal should we have applied? The Board of Railway Commissioners is a non-partisan tribunal, responsible not to the Dominion Government, but to this Parliament. On their advice these rails were taken upon the Grand Trunk Pacific. My hon. friend knows that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern lines parallel each other in this particular district of which he is speaking; he knows that a composite road was made there. We made the best of the situation in order that we might send forward these rails which were so urgently required and at the same time have due regard to the public interest. My hon. friend speaks of the practicability of joining 60-lb. and 80-lb. rails, or 80-lb. and 40-lb. rails in France. That could be done near the seaboard by the use of hand forged fish plates; there is plenty of time; there is no such inconvenience as there is nearer the front. But when the men have to work under fire, the authorities want rails that can be joined by standard fish plates. That is the reason why, having got 300 miles of rails from the National Transcontinental, they wanted other rails from the Grand Trunk Pacific, of the same weight and the same borings, in order that standard fish plates might be used near the front, where the men work under the greatest possible inconvenience and danger. There it is necessary that these rails should be joined up quickly in order that the great guns may be sent to the front to follow up any advance movement that may be made.

My hon. friend's attitude in this matter is the most extraordinary that I have ever seen taken by any man in this House. He solemnly gets up and puts forward the suggestion that we have not sent these rails over to assist the men at the front, or in response to the urgent request of the British Government instigated by an urgent demand on the part of the commander in chief at the front. He says: that is not what you were doing; your sole object was to destroy the Grand Trunk Pacific; you have acted like a lot of mad men in tearing up rails that were not wanted at the front. Without exception, that is the most preposterous statement I have ever heard made in this House. My hon. friend says: that we took up the rails from the Grand Trunk Pacific, and that means that we took away a part of the railway itself which is covered by mortgage in favour of its bondholders, and is a part of the capital investment of the company. I said that this matter had not any bearing upon the item under consideration; I still say that, because the replacement of rails means the replacement of capital. In this estimate we are dealing not with capital, but with the question of deficit on operations and interest upon underlying securities. This estimate is to furnish the Grand Trunk Pacific with $7,500,000, in order, first, to meet the deficit on operation, and, second, to meet the fixed charges for the year. Whatever sum is given the Grand Trunk Pacific in respect of rails taken up will simply be replacement of capital to that extent. As to claims for damages on the part of those who may hold that they have been inconvenienced or damaged by the taking up of the rails, that is a matter for consideration.

I cannot say offhand here to-night how much money is involved one way or the other. In estimating what damage, if any, has been sustained by the Grand Trunk Pacific, there would have to be a consideration as to the value of the rails and the replacement, and, on the other hand, any advantage the railway company might gain as against the disadvantages of which my hon. friend has spoken. I have not passed an opinion upon the matter, and it is not possible for any one to do so offhand. My hon. friend has gone beyond himself in conjuring up fantastic reasons for the action of the Government, which was taken at the urgent request of the British Government in order to meet a very pressing need at the front. He says that we have not placed the papers upon the table. In connection with the war, there are hundreds of papers which we cannot place upon the table of this House, which are of the most secret and confidential character, involving wants and needs of the Imperial Government, disclosing a situation of which they are willing to make this Government aware, but which they would not like to be published to the world. My hon. friend surely would not ask that there should be laid upon the table secret documents that might give to the enemy information of a kind that would be of value to him. My hon. friend, I am sure, would be the last man to suggest that. I cannot help thinking that my hon. friend has been carried away by his partisanship in this matter to such an extent that he feels justified in making these wholly fallacious charges against the Government, which is acting in the utmost good faith in this transaction.

Mr. OLIVER: If the Government has acted in good faith its arguments do not lead one to that conclusion. This vote is for an advance to the Grand Trunk Pacific railroad, taking security upon the property of that road. The advance of last year was the same. Surely the security is deteriorated by the removal of the rails on 130 miles of the road.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not if they are replaced and the damage repaired.

Mr. COCHRANE: They have been replaced.

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid my hon. friend is not well informed.

Mr. COCHRANE: I know I am right.

Mr. OLIVER: I would say, if I would not be out of order, that I know my hon. friend is not right, because, as a matter of fact, the rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific have been partially, but not altogether, replaced. My information is that the difference between the haulage possibilities of the Grand Trunk to-day and what it was before it was deprived of those rails is five cars per train.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is not true.

Mr. OLIVER: Very well, that will have to rest. My hon. friend and I cannot arrange that now. My statement will have to stand as a statement of fact for the present.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is a statement of yours, not of fact.

Mr. OLIVER: That is quite satisfactory to me. It is very conclusive on the point.

Of all the arguments that have been put forward on behalf of this very remarkable transaction, the most absurd is that which has just been put forward by the Minister of Finance as the reason why the documents have not been laid upon the Table, namely, because of the special request of the British Government, because of their secret character, because they might give information of value to the enemy. I appeal to the committee if that is not more absurd—if I am not out of order in using the word—than the assertion that it was necessary to take the Grand Trunk Pacific rails because the Transcontinental rails had already been taken. It is not good enough for this Government, charged with the responsibility of governing the people of this country and protecting their interests, to shelter themselves, first behind the British Government, and secondly behind the Railway Commission. There is no power nor authority that this Government is entitled to shelter itself behind in regard to matters of administration touching the affairs of the people of Canada. Let there be no mistake on that point. When people are dispossessed of their property, as they have been in my constituency—

Mr. BRADBURY: How many of the hon. member's constituents are affected?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not say how many, but it does not make any difference if there is only one. His rights are just as sacred as the rights of any other man in any other part of this country, as the rights of any corporation or company in this country. Those people have a right to be protected, and if they have not been protected, if their rights have been thrown aside by the lifting of the rails, then they are entitled to compensation without undue delay. The Government, having made up its mind to do as it has done, having the reasons it says it has for its action, has a right to deal promptly and effectively with the people whom it has dispossessed of the value of their property. The enthusiasm of the Minister of Finance for the winning of the war by tearing up the rails out in the Jasper pass reminds me very much of the late Artemus Ward, who, at the time of the American Civil War, declared that he was for the winning of the war even if it cost him all his wife's relations. The minister was willing to tear up the rails out in Jasper pass. There are, however, rails very much nearer the Atlantic coast than the Jasper pass is. Why did he not tear up a few of them? There are rails between the good city of Toronto and the town of Sudbury where there are two parallel tracks. Those rails are much nearer the Atlantic coast than is the Jasper pass, but the minister did not touch a rail there. There are three railway lines between Ottawa and the city of Toronto, but none of those rails were raised. I would like to see a little even-handed justice in this matter. If the needs of the war demand that rails shall be taken, why certainly let them be taken, but I do not see why they should all be taken from my constituency to the loss and damage of my constituents, when other people in other parts of the country are left free of any damage, while they shout their patriotism to the four winds of heaven. They can afford to be patriotic if it does not cost them anything, or when it costs only the people out in the prairie West something. That sort of patriotism does not appeal to me, and it certainly will never prevent me from standing up for the interest of my constituents in this House as long as I have a seat in it. I am willing to stand by the war, by the country, and by patriotism, but I want some of the other men who are doing so much shouting to do a little of the sacrificing also.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In order that the committee may have further information as to this matter, I read this extract from the Order in Council which has been laid on the table of the House:

> Further, the minister has had the question of this further trackage required referred to Sir Henry Drayton, Chief Commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and he is in receipt of a communication from Sir Henry recommending that a further 300 miles of rails be obtained from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, partly from that portion of their lines running through the Yellowhead Pass which closely parallels the Canadian Northern, and partly from some of the main line track at other points. The latter to be replaced by other rails.

Then the minister proceeds with his recommendation. There has also been placed on the table of the House a letter from the Comptroller of Railways enclosing a report from A. C. Henry of the engineering staff, covering his investigation in connection with the taking up of the rails of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway through the Yellowhead pass, in which the comptroller says:

> The plan proposed permits of the salving of all the Grand Trunk Pacific rails through the construction of a composite line, made up from the roadbed of the Canadian Northern Railway for 128 miles, and the balance from the Grand Trunk Pacific roadbed, for 77 miles.

After referring to the details of the composite line as shown on the sketch plan attached to the report, which is dated June 12, 1917, he says:

> The only disturbance to settlers of any moment is on that part of the Canadian Northern line between Ansell and Leaman, and the reasons for this and the proposed method of dealing with the settlers, is fully set out in Mr. Henry's report.
> The work of track lifting is proceeding with the utmost despatch. All section men on both lines and all local labour available, are being utilized, and in addition, we have 150 soldiers from construction battalions, detailed by the Department of Militia and Defence, who arrived at Jasper on the 4th instant.
> The first of the rails will be in transit to Three Rivers this week, and unless some unforeseen contingency arises to retard the work, we hope to have all rails in transit by the end of July.

My hon. friend has made the statement that these rails are not in France nor on their way to France. The Comptroller of Railways says he has reports every day as to the position of these rails in their movement towards the front. The statement I have made is absolutely correct. Mr. Henry, the assistant engineer, says in his report:

> In my view the general allocation of the composite line, having regard to the fact that rails of Grand Trunk Pacific type are required for shipment overseas, is the only feasible one. Under the proposed arrangement, all the coal mines in operation along both lines are served and the least possible disturbance and inconvenience caused to the settlers tributary to both lines. In addition, there can be no doubt that the single composite line proposed, if properly operated, will be able to handle the traffic of both lines on this section for many years, at a much lower operating expenditure than would be involved in the maintenance and operation of both lines between these points.

These documents are of record, having been laid on the Table. I have no manner of objection to my hon. friend getting up and talking in favour of his constituents; that is an almost universal practice in this House. But I do object to his putting forward in this House the assertion that this Government tore up the rails on the Grand Trunk Pacific, not for the purpose of meeting the request of the British Government or of assisting military operations at the front, but solely with the idea of destroying the Grand Trunk Railway system, which was brought into existence under the late Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I fully agree with the hon. member for Edmonton in saying that the reason given as to the fish plates and the borings is not very strong. The fish plates would have gone with the rails that went over; the readjusting of two joints is the only change that would have had to be made. All the switches and branch lines at the front are not of the heavy weight rail. Any man who has studied railway construction at all knows it is perfectly laughable to make such a fuss about fish plates.

I see in the Grand Trunk Pacific statement that of this $7,494,760.78 only about $2,500,000 is guaranteed by the Dominion Government. I think it is only fair the committee should understand that the amount of money that is being granted to pay the interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific is not all on account of bonds guaranteed by the Dominion Government. Out of the total amount of $7,494,760.78 only about $2,500,000 is under Dominion guarantee.

If I am not mistaken, of this $2,500,000, $1,655,000 is payable on the contract by the Dominion Government on the mountain section seven years from the 1st of January, 1916. So if we deduct that $1,655,000 from the $2,500,000, we would have less than $1,000,000 guaranteed by the federal authorities. The balance of this amount is made up of guarantees from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I notice, too, that there is an estimated operating loss on the steamship company of $100,000. It had slipped my mind that the steamship company was in this transaction, but it appears that the Grand Trunk Pacific Steamship Company running from Vancouver to Prince Rupert is a part of this agreement, and we have here an amount to assist in making up the operating loss on this line of steamers.

Then there is another very interesting item here—not providing, of course, for interest—namely, that the Grand Trunk Pacific with its branch lines has an operating surplus of $1,100,000. I do not want to make any very lengthy remarks to-night, because I think we discussed this question at great length in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway system, but the entire railway situation in Canada, particularly in the West, is so bound up that that could not be avoided. The Grand Trunk Pacific, however, in its present condition can never hope to be made a paying institution, for it is obvious that the object in view in the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific line has not been carried out. I frankly admit that it was a matter of frequent contention between the late Mr. Hays, president of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and myself, that it did not construct a sufficient number of branch lines as it went along with their main line. Great hopes were entertained of a steamship line between Prince Rupert and the Orient, but those hopes have not materialized, and the Grand Trunk Pacific system will never be made the great success it was intended to be until that steamship connection is made. I do not wish to detract from the merits of any harbour, but I think there is no better harbour in the world than Prince Rupert, and the optimism of the Grand Trunk Pacific people and the Grand Trunk as well as of the Government was bound up largely in connection with the Orient, from where it was hoped to get through traffic for the Grand Trunk Pacific via Prince Rupert. But so long as we have not got that line of steamships to connect up the Orient with the Grand Trunk Pacific, so long will the Grand Trunk Pacific be merely a local line. At the present time it runs from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert, with no connection of its own at either end. The whole line from Winnipeg east belongs to the Transcontinental.

The haul from Winnipeg east belongs to the Transcontinental, and even the Grand Trunk Pacific has no way of getting to the lakes now over its own connections. It is shut off absolutely at Winnipeg. I have great faith, though, in the future of this line of railway. The Government has handed over to the Senate a Bill providing for the taking over of the Canadian Northern railway and will be in a position, perhaps, to discuss the question of branch lines in a more favourable way than heretofore. There are two or three things needed to make this enterprise a success. In the first place, I believe that steamship connection with the East is absolutely necessary, because one of the great objects of the line will be unattainable if we do not have that steamship line. In the second place, I am inclined to think provision must be made for the construction of a greater number of branch lines, particularly in the prairie country and perhaps in some of the valleys of the mountains. As to the Grand Trunk Pacific running a line to Vancouver, there is now a line projected and partially constructed over which there has been a great deal of difficulty, and I would not dare discuss that. But with the Canadian Northern railway in the position it will be now, in the hands of the Government, perhaps some of this difficulty might be obviated. The great object of the Grand Trunk Pacific was to get a through line via Prince Rupert to the Orient. A question was raised by the Prime Minister the other night about the co-operative administration of roads. If he meant that all the lines are to be under one ownership, it would be a big question to discuss. My own view is that there are a thousand and one things to be considered in addition to rates, and that without competition you would lose a great deal of the benefit, or rather you would fail to derive benefit that you would have with competition. Take, for example, car distribution. While we have an Act dealing with this subject and many regulations covering it, the fact remains that laws and regulations do not operate as advantageously as competition. A shipper between here and Toronto informed me that now that he has three lines of railway passing his town he has no difficulty in getting a car at any time. His shipping with competition is much more advantageous than with one line. The Board of Railway Commissioners would say: You must have a car at a certain time and the rate must be fixed at a certain amount, but the little details that competition brings do not come to the users of a line without competition. I believe that some method could be devised by which we could arrange for the use of lines by roads other than the owners of those lines in a better way than we have been able to do heretofore. The Canadian Pacific Railway is very much crowded in certain parts of the West, and has been discussing double tracking a large mileage. It has already expended many millions of dollars for this purpose. I see no reason why provision could not be made to relieve the congestion on any one line by operating part of its traffic over another parallel line on which the traffic was not so heavy, so that the business of the people would not be retarded, because the people of the country have built these roads to a very large extent. The Prime Minister spoke about co-operative management. I think it would not need co-operative management exactly, but certain terms could be laid down under which one road would use the rails of another and a car could be handed over by one company to another on definite terms laid down by the commissioner. In this way two parallel roads could be used as a double track system with great benefit to the people.

As to the future, I have confidence that the railway mileage of Canada is not too great. It may be too great for the production of Canada at the present time, but not for the productiveness of Canada, and it will be for the people and Parliament of Canada to see that, when the war is over, we have the people to develop all our western country; and this railway mileage will not be excessive for the productiveness of our country when we have people on the land, for with the productiveness of the land will come the productiveness of all our industries, because, after all, our future is bound up not in any one thing but in many things. I received information to-day about a mining proposition that seems to have very great prospects. I was asked if it would be possible to get the Government to build a branch line to a certain mining development. My advice was that the Government would probably be from Missouri just now and would have to be shown before extending mileage, but if in any part of Canada there was a development for the good of Canada, Parliament would be ready to vote money for any reasonable proposition of that kind if it were a paying one.

So far as the Dominion is concerned, we are not paying this money so much for securities guaranteed by the Government as to aid the projects of other guarantors of the securities, and in this connection I may be pardoned for saying that I have always had a rather kindly feeling for the old Grand Trunk as one of the pioneer railways of Canada. The Grand Trunk is committed to the Grand Trunk Pacific very heavily in guarantees, and I believe that the Government at the present time could not do else but take such step as this unless we are going to embarrass the Grand Trunk and place it in a position which I still maintain we should not allow our roads to get into at the present time, as our own credit is bound up with theirs to a larger degree than some people seem to realize or admit. While I realize the financial situation, I am not pessimistic at all as to the future of Canada and its railway projects. I believe that in years to come, when the great development of our country is to take place after the war and we have to face all these situations, the people of Canada will be capable of facing all these difficulties. We all believe that the resourcefulness of Canada is equal to any demands that may be made upon her.

It will not be long, I hope, before peace will come and we will have an opportunity of arranging our financial affairs so that we can proceed with the development of the country, which for the time being has been retarded, but which has only been checked and not stopped. The way in which they have acquitted themselves has shown the people of the world that the men produced on this half of the North American continent are worthy of their sires, and what they have accomplished and will still accomplish in their fight for freedom is indicative of what they can do when peace comes in the development of their own country.

Item passed.

To increase the pension of Mrs. Margaret Johnson Brooke from $1.25 to $1.75 per diem, further amount required, $182.50.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will read the following explanation, which is signed by the Prime Minister:

Mrs. Margaret Johnson Brooke is the widow of the late Staff-Sergeant Brooke who was drowned while on duty in 1903. She was granted a pension of 75 cents per diem, representing one half of the pay of her deceased husband—

Mr. GRAHAM: Carried.

National Gallery of Canada—further amount required, $10,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Our policy has been to cut down these grants as much as possible since the outbreak of the war. At the first revision of the estimates, after the war broke out, this grant was cut down from $100,000 to $25,000. In the main estimates of this year the grant of $25,000 for 1917 was cut down to $8,000. In view of the fact that this amount is adequate only for salaries and expenses, leaving nothing to purchase the works of Canadian artists, this $10,000 is being provided for that purpose. The war has been very hard indeed upon Canadian artists, some of whom are engaged in painting for the National Gallery. The cutting down has been very substantial, from $100,000 to the present amount, and I hope the committee will take a fair view of this and grant this further sum, having regard to the important work of some very worthy Canadian artists.

Mr. MORPHY: What kind of paintings are the Canadian artists engaged upon? It seems to me that if they are engaged upon ordinary everyday paintings, the country's money might better be spent in attempting to have these artists put on canvas something that would perpetuate the valour of the Canadian soldiers who are fighting at the front. I fancy the battle of St. Julien, or the second battle of Ypres or the battle of Langemarck would be very good subjects. Some such pictures as these would be desirable acquisitions for the National Gallery. But, if they are going to paint orchards, flower beds and rivers I would oppose the vote.

Mr. OLIVER: What artists painted the war or military scenes that are on view in the gallery on the fourth floor of this building?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it was Homer Watson.

Mr. OLIVER: Is he still at large?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to these particular paintings, to which my hon. friend refers, I will not give any opinion to the committee but I would say that Mr. Homer Watson is one of our most distinguished artists. My hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) suggested that some of our artists might be engaged in painting battle scenes. If you take a man out of his particular sphere he is apt to accomplish the opposite to an artistic result. I do not know whether we have any artists in Canada who are capable of painting battle scenes but we have some very deserving artists and I think that even at a time like this we should not overlook those members of the community, who mean a great deal to the country from the aesthetic point of view, who have to make their living like the rest of us and whose numbers I should personally like to see increased rather than diminished as the nation goes forward. We must not think, although we are sometimes prone to do it, that the only votes which should go through are those for dredging or public works. If we are to be what we expect to be we must keep the light burning in the realms of literature, art and science.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the minister think that at this time it would be inflicting any great hardship on our artists if we did not have this vote? We are all more or less affected with financial stringency and we have been willing parties to asking any person who makes an income to contribute a good deal of it towards carrying on the war. Under those conditions, does the minister think that the people who want to be taxed to carry on a war would be willing to undergo the same operation even to encourage art at this particular time? The encouragement of art at the proper time, of course, is very laudable. At this particular time we are being asked to restrict our appetites, to control our food consumption and to contribute of any little means we may have in order that the financial condition in Canada may be kept equal to the demands upon it. In addition to that we are asked to send away our sons to fight an enemy who is a real enemy. Under these conditions does the minister think we ought to expend money for this purpose, no matter how laudable it would be under ordinary circumstances?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was influenced by the same view that has moved my hon. friend to express himself as he has. I think his criticism would be amply justified if we had maintained the original vote. This country has been in the habit of voting $100,000 a year to encourage Canadian art. This is not for the purpose solely of giving Canadian artists work. This National gallery lends pictures to all the cities throughout Canada, especially, I understand, in the West, so that the work is really a national work. The vote for the year preceding the war was $100,000, last year it was cut down to $25,000, and this year the amount placed in the estimates was $8,000, but it was thought it would have a serious effect on the artists and sculptors, and it was decided to place an additional $10,000 in the estimates, which will make the total vote this year $18,000. I do not like to ask Parliament to spend money for anything other than practical purposes, especially during the war, but I feel a certain kindness towards men engaged in art and science. They do more for the nation than we realize, and I think we should be generous, rather than otherwise, with them. This is not a large amount. It is the amount barely necessary to take care of commissions which have already been given, and it will not have any appreciable effect on military efforts during the war. The money is paid out to artists. Some meritorious cases have been brought to my attention since the war broke out. We have some notable sculptors in this country, men who have brought credit to Canada by their work. Some of them have devoted their lives to the profession, and the war has caused a stoppage of orders. We have been gradually slowing down in the matter of this vote, but we think we have given fair consideration to these artists and sculptors.

Mr. MORPHY: It is quite true that the amount is insignificant, and hardly worth while talking about, but there seems to be a principle underlying it, and if the minister by governmental action is going to take care of all the individuals in Canada who have suffered by the war he will require a large appropriation. Our pension bill is going to be very heavy, and there is a continuous cry—and I think a proper cry—that more should be done for the returned soldier, for those who are entitled to pensions, for everybody who has suffered through the war. I wish to refer to a case in my own constituency, and I am sorry the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), who is head of the Patriotic Fund is not here. I refer to the case of a woman whose husband was killed or disabled at the front. She did not apply for separation allowance until just lately, and the Patriotic Fund authorities of the province refused to give her any separation allowance, because she did not apply in time, and they claim they are hard up for money. Every fund that is being distributed for the benefit of the soldiers is short of money at the present time. The principle I object to in this item is the specific favour to some people who cannot show that they deserve anything at the hands of the country, except for a sentimental reason. Are these artists fighting at the front? Are they of the proper age to go and fight? Who are they? I can conceive that there are some young budding artists who have gone to the front and are fighting, and I would not object to paying those men. The Kaiser sent artists to the battlefields to portray the valour of his troops. But when a widow is refused separation allowance from the Patriotic Fund, because, forsooth, she did not apply in time, it is coming to a pretty pass. She could not even get the back pay of her husband. I do not believe we should be extravagant in our allowances, unless it is advisable in the national interest. These artists are doing good work in the development of art, and elevating the public mind to a higher plane, but just now I would say that we should not vote this money.

Mr. PARDEE: I desire to endorse the sentiments of my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy). Not long ago we had the argument that, if the income tax were passed, the rich man would not give to the Patriotic Fund. I have one case in mind in regard to which I had correspondence with the authorities in regard to a separation allowance. The authorities did not know that they could make the allowance, and so forth. It appears to me that, as far as it is possible, the Government should just pare down to the very bones the financial necessities of this country. I have some regard for artists and sculptors and so on, but when we get down to the real necessities, why should artists and sculptors have to be taken care of more than men who, by reason of the war perhaps, have suffered just as much as they have? These men have as much right to be considered, but not on the lines of aestheticism, as suggested by the Minister of Finance. Why should the artist be taken care of any more than other men who have suffered? We know that there are thousands of cases of men and women, who, by reason of this war, have been deprived of a livelihood. and many women have not only been deprived of a livelihood, but have suffered a great hardship by the loss of relatives and helpmeets. After all, when we go out and talk to the people and say, "Now, we must have thrift here, and production there, the country is in this state, and in that state, and the very worst is liable to happen to us," I do not know why the artists should get a grant of $18,000 out of the hard earned money of the people. These times, when we are talking of hundreds of millions of dollars $18,000 may not look large, but every little helps, and, so far as I am concerned, I cannot see that this vote is necessary. These men have taken up this line; perhaps I am not inclined to regard it as poetically as the Minister of Finance, but the artists and sculptors have chosen their profession the same as you or I chose our professions, whether it be law or medicine or anything else. If these artists are deprived of their livelihood, they are in no worse position than thousands of other men in the country, and I do not know why the taxpayers of the country should go down in their pockets to recoup them. It appears to me the item should be struck out.

Mr. OLIVER: You might do this as a compromise—

Mr. GRAHAM: Imagine Oliver compromising!

Mr. OLIVER: —give each of the artists a military pension, on the basis of total disablement, with the understanding that they should not paint any more pictures until the war is over.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If the minister is influenced by politicians, that is one thing; but it is not a charge against a minister that he is influenced by considerations advanced by those who are interested in scientific studies. The remuneration of the men who carry on this work is very small; they work unselfishly and in a disinterested way. Certainly, while I find very little difficulty in standing out against the representations made by the politicians, so to speak, I do find a good deal of difficulty in standing out against the scientific men, men from universities, men engaged in literary or artistic work.

Public Works—chargeable to capital—Ottawa Eastern Departmental Block—new fireproof roof, etc.—revote, $125,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister was going to explain this item the other night.

Mr. REID: I did explain it. The amount is a revote, and is intended to be applied towards fireproofing the old portion of the Eastern Block and rearranging the offices on the top floor.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Surely this item ought to be dropped. There is no intention of spending the money this year.

Mr. REID: If it is at all possible, this work should be undertaken in the interests of the protection of the Eastern Block. The officials thought that we would not be justified in dropping the item, and under the circumstances I should be glad if the committee would allow it to pass.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This amount was voted last year; it has not been spent. If there was good reason for not spending the money last year there is greater reason for not spending it this year. Last year the Minister of Finance was able to borrow money at 5 per cent; this year he is obliged to pay 8 per cent. This roof is probably the same one that has been there for many years; no fire is likely to occur from the outside.

The roof does not require to be fireproofed; protection against fire should be afforded inside the building. I have no doubt that care is exercised in that respect; the police are in constant attendance. When I was minister, work was undertaken for creating a thoroughly fireproof section in the wing where the valuables are kept. In view of the fact that there is a war on, and that it is difficult to get money, and that heavy taxes are being imposed upon the people, this vote ought not to be pressed.

Mr. REID: The part of the building to which my hon. friend refers is not fireproof at the present time; the roof is a wooden one, and it is necessary to rearrange the whole top floor. The Parliament Buildings were there for many years, yet they did not burn down. The officials tell me that the work on the Eastern Block should be proceeded with if at all possible; it should have been proceeded with last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the roof of the Eastern Block similar to that on the Western Block?

Mr. REID: No, the Western Block had a new roof put on after the fire in that building. The Eastern Block is the only one now that is not fireproof—the new Parliament Building will have a fireproof roof.

Contribution to aid in carrying on the work of the Astronomical Society—further amount required, $1,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Royal Astronomical Society of Canada is a national society and has centres and groups in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Regina, Victoria and other important cities in the Dominion. Headquarters are at Toronto: Albert D. Watson, president; J. R. Collins, general secretary. The grant from the Government is used for the purpose of publishing the journal of the society, which disseminates not only articles of scientific interest written by Canadians, but also the best from journals published in other countries. The editors are Professor Chant, Dr. Plaskett and Sir Frederick Stupart. Without the Dominion grant, it is stated, the journal would have to be suspended altogether. The University of Toronto also supports the work of the Society by a small grant. The grant to the society last year was $2,000; I cut it in two for the 1917-18 main Estimates. However, more representations were made to me with regard to the voting of the further $1,000 than were made in respect to any other item in the estimates. It is not the easiest thing in the world to cut down these grants. Representations were made to me from very many quarters indeed that the work of this society, though it might not appeal to the public in general, was really very necessary and desirable scientific work. Taking everything into consideration, I thought that we had better make the usual grant of $2,000.

Mr. OLIVER: This is certainly an occasion when our idols are being shattered. We look to the Minister of Finance to stand as adamant in maintaining a policy of economy, consistent with efficiency. I am sure the committee will feel pained to hear the confession my hon. friend makes tonight and to learn that the treasury is not as we believed it was, founded upon principles of security and economy.

Vancouver harbour improvements, $111,000.

Mr. REID: This appropriation is for a new shed on the wharf at Vancouver. The Public Works Department have built a wharf at Vancouver, and a large elevator has been built on that wharf. One shed has already been built on one side, and now the Public Works Department are building another one exactly the same. The shed built last year is filled to capacity with general merchandise, and as a consequence business offered to the Harbour Commissioners had to be refused. As a remedy for these conditions they ask that another shed be erected. The chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, in a report dated March 29, 1917, recommends that a wooden freight shed 900 feet long by 87 feet 8 inches wide be built at an estimated cost of $67,500. In a further report, dated 14th June, 1917, he states that only an approximate cost of $100,000 can be given for a freight shed 1,005 feet long by 92 feet wide, equipped with offices, lighting, drainage, plumbing, etc. When I visited Vancouver last fall, I saw this wharf, which is a splendid one and on which there is an elevator and a shed. I know that this second shed is an absolute necessity, and the people of Vancouver have been urging its erection. For that reason we are proceeding with it this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) is not in his seat, because I would like to ask him as to the location of this wharf and as to whether this is the property he referred to some little time ago when he said it had been leased or sold to Mr. Kelly. Is that the property?

Mr. REID: The property was bought from the Hastings Shingle and Mill Company and the Canadian Pacific Lumber Company three or four years ago. The Public Works Department then constructed this large wharf. Later on, the Department of Trade and Commerce built a large elevator on the shore end of the wharf. When the wharf was built, a shed 676 feet long by 78 feet 8 inches wide was erected. That shed has been filled to its capacity. The deputy minister tells me that the freight has been piled all along the other side of the wharf, and this new shed is therefore being constructed for the purpose of handling this excess freight.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is somewhat anomalous that the Public Works Department should be building the wharf and the Department of Trade and Commerce building the elevator.

Mr. REID: The elevator is on the shore end of the wharf. The wharf extends from the shore out 800 feet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why has that departure been made and why is the Department of Trade and Commerce undertaking the erection of the elevator?

Mr. REID: The hon member will remember that the Department of Trade and Commerce have built three or four elevators in the prairie provinces besides this one at Vancouver.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Have they architects in their department?

Mr. REID: The Grain Commission had the plans prepared by those who were submitting tenders.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems anomalous that a department which ordinarily has nothing to do with the erection of public buildings, which has no staff of architects, should be undertaking the erection of public buildings. I thought that work peculiarly belonged to the Department of Public Works, excepting, of course, that the Department of Railways probably erect elevators, they having their own staff for such work, I suppose. When was the elevator completed?

Mr. REID: About a year and a half ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has its erection resulted in the transportation of grain through Vancouver?

Mr. REID: Some grain, not a very large quantity, has gone through.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is any grain stored in this elevator?

Mr. REID: Some, but not a very large quantity. Last fall, when I was at Vancouver, the quantity was not very large, and it was rather for local consumption, but I understand that some will be going there very soon.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the explanation of there not being any considerable quantity as was expected?

Mr. REID: The Minister of Trade and Commerce, of course, could explain that more fully than I could. It was expected that the grain would be shipped via the Pacific and through the Panama canal to Liverpool. When the war broke out it was impossible to get tonnage for shipments via that route, and for that reason, I suppose, there has not been the quantity of grain shipped through this elevator that was expected. I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce saying the other day it was likely that some would go through soon. Some of the new vessels are going through the Panama canal, and they will take a quantity of grain in order to see how grain will go through Vancouver ot Liverpool by that route.

Victoria harbour improvements, further amount required, $370,000.

Mr. REID: This amount of $370,000 is required in addition to the amount of $1,000,000 in the main estimates for the following improvements:

1. Completion of breakwater, under contract with Sir John Jackson (Canada), Ltd.	$ 125,000
2. Completion of piers Nos. 2 and 3, under contract with Grant, Smith & Co., and McDonnell, Ltd.	1,076,340
3. Wooden freight shed on pier 2, 702' x 200'	125,000
4. Car-ferry slip—to provide rail connection with railways and wharves	25,000
5. Trackage—5,400 ft. of trackage, 60-lb. rails	12,000
Inspection	6,660
Total	$1,370,000
Less: Vote in Main Estimates, 1917-18	1,000,000
Vote asked for as above	$ 370,000

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will that all be expended this year?

Mr. REID: Yes, under the contracts that are now running.

Halifax Quarantine Station on Lawlor's Island—water supply, $5,000.

Mr. REID: This vote of $5,000 is to cover the cost of the sinking of an artesian well, providing boiler and pumping engine, making use of the large tank which at present contains salt water, which would be emptied, and pumping the fresh water into this tank. This water would then be distributed through the present fire mains and branches laid to each building. It is considered that the supply of fresh water would be sufficient for both fire and domestic purposes. The estimated cost is as follows: Sinking well, $2,000; boiler, pumping engine and shelter for same, $1,650; laying branches from main to the different buildings, with valves, excavations, etc., $463; incidentals and contingencies, say, $887; total, $5,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has the work been commenced?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will you ask for tenders?

Mr. REID: It may be hard to get tenderers. If so, we can do the work ourselves.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There will be no trouble in getting people to do the work. Will the minister ask for tenders? On a public work costing over $5,000 I think the minister is expected to call for tenders.

Mr. REID: The sinking of the well is estimated to cost $2,000, so I think under the Act we could put a well-digger on it. We may, however, call for tenders if the department think it advisable. It is not a very serious matter either way.

St. John old post office—rewiring entire building, $2,000.

Mr. REID: This money is to be applied in entirely rewiring, for electric lighting in an up-to-date manner, the old post office at St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it requires it.

Grosse Isle Quarantine Station—new buildings—revote, $123,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why should not that item be left out?

Mr. REID: The Minister of Agriculture cleams that it is absolutely necessary to have this amount voted. He has been pressing for it very hard.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are no immigrants coming in now.

Mr. REID: It will take a year to get ready for them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This vote cannot be absolutely necessary, because the money was voted last year and nothing was spent. The minister must see that there is a vast number of items, amounting to a very large sum, which have apparently just been put in in view of the election coming on—for it was not thought necessary to put them in the main estimates. They are put here with the view of making the people believe that a large amount of money is to be spent here and there throughout the country. It is just done to excite hopes which, perhaps, it is not intended to gratify. Why should all these amounts be included in the supplementary estimates under Public Works? Take for instance, this item of $123,000 for Gross Isle quarantine station, which has already cost a large amount of money. This amount was voted last year, so apparently there is no urgency, because not a dollar of money was spent. Why should this item be in now, when it is far more important even than it was last year, to save all the money we can and use it for the purposes of the war?

Mr. REID: We must get ready for the immigration that will come immediately after the war. If we have this vote passed, we shall be in a position to proceed with the work as soon the war looks to be ending.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You could not commence until next spring, anyway.

Mr. REID: But we can call for tenders. Without a vote, it would be impossible to proceed with this building if the war should cease. We expect immigration after the war, and the Minister of Agriculture claims that this building will be absolutely necessary then.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the war end before next spring?

Mr. REID: We thought so last year when this vote was taken.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On what grounds did my hon. friend think so?

Mr. REID: I had my own views, and I think they were shared by a great many other people. To-day some people think the war will last one or two years more, and others think it will be over in the next six months.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What does the minister think?

Mr. REID: I hope it will. At all events, it is better to have this vote passed in case it does, so that we shall be prepared to go on with the work.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the minister think that the immigrants will swim across the Atlantic or come over by aeroplane?

Mr. REID: They may come both ways.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the only way they can come immediately after the war.

Mr. REID: I do not say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There will be very great demand upon transportation facilities to bring our soldiers back to Canada after the war. I do not like the minister to put forward to the House, or that we should approve of the idea, that immediately upon the war being over the Government will rush into all kinds of expenditure like this. As my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) suggests, it must be quite a time after the war before any immigrants will be able to be transported across the Atlantic. It will take two years at least to get our soldiers back to Canada.

Mr. REID: It would take at least a year to complete this building after work on it was commenced, and by that time surely our soldiers would have been returned. We want to be ready when immigration comes.

Mr. PARDEE: Would it be at all possible that this vote was put on this year and put off last year because the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) knew there was not going to be an election last year, and that there is probably going to be one this year? That would not be within the realm of probability, I suppose?

Mr. REID: I would not do that.

Mr. PARDEE: That supposition would not apply to the rest of these items that were in last year, and are now being revoted.

Mr. REID: We struck out all the election ones.

Mr. BURRELL: Perhaps I am responsible for most of these items being here and being pressed. We have been under very serious disability at Grosse Isle. The last time we had much disease there, we had to get tents, because there was absolutely no hospital accommodation. If, after this war, as usually happens after big wars, there should be much typhus or other bad disease, we should be in a most deplorable condition at Grosse Isle.

We have the foundation of a hospital there, and it is a matter of urgency that the buliding should be completed. I have been earnestly pressing this on my colleagues for the past three years. I can assure my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) that there is no politics in this particular vote.

Mr. PARDEE: Perish the thought!

Mr. PUPSLEY: The main estimates for Public Works amount to $16,000,000. That would be a large expenditure even in peace times. Now it is proposed to add nearly $3,000,000, making about $19,000,000 to be voted for Public Works this coming year. The minister would be well advised if he would endeavour to make a reduction, as this is quite without justification.

Mr. REID: The estimates last year were $30,000,000, so there has been a reduction of over $10,000,000. These items are very urgently needed; most of them are small items for repairs that we could not avoid.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The supplementary estimates total $50,000,000, which is away beyond any thing any Government has ever asked. The minister cannct justify the extravagance in his department by comparing this year's estimate with last year's, because the estimate of last year was beyond all reason. The total expenditure of the department during the last three years I was minister was $37,000,000; but in the first three years of this Administration the Public Works estimates ran to $80,000,000 —two and one-half times what they were in the last three years of my administration. The Government went wild over public works, and their extravagance was beyond anything in the history of any country. Now, when the war is on, it is proposed to spend in one year more than one-half of the amount expended in the last three years of Liberal administration during times of peace, when the country was prosperous, when population was increasing, and additional public works were necessary. It is startling that the minister should ask for such a large amount of money.

Mr. REID: While it is true that in the first three years of this Administration the Public Works estimates did increase very much, it must be remembered that the Government undertook the development of all the large harbours, Victoria, Vancouver, St. John, Quebec, Halifax.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Many of these works had been undertaken, and the work at Halifax is, I think, altogether chargeable to the Railways and Canals Department, so that is in addition to this enormous expenditure.

Mr. REID: Even leaving Halifax out, there have been very large expenditures under the Public Works Department for harbour improvements. The expenditure in the last year of the hon. member's administration was $14,338,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was $5,000,000 less than you propose this year.

Mr. REID: In 1915-16 it was $16,150,000. Then there are all these large works for which the contracts have been let and which must be carried out. We are decreasing this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You ask for $19,000,000.

Mr. REID: We are decreasing the estimates by $10,000,000 in the Public Works Department, so although we expended $16,000,000 last year, it will be less this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You are working for the election year and are asking $4,000,000 more than you expended last year.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. REID: The hon. member knows it is impossible to estimate the exact amount that will be expended. In the last year of the hon. member's administration he asked for $24,301,475 and expended only $14,338,000, a little more than half. Last year the minister asked for $30,828,000, and expended $16,150,000 about the same proportion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). The amounts voted for public works would total enough to meet the immediate necessities of the Canadian Northern railway, which would have obviated our embarking on the very doubtful scheme of government ownership of that road, a scheme which may be the most serious thing this country ever embarked upon. You could not very well drop some of these votes, such as the completion of the contract at Vancouver. This public work was commenced before the war and, of course, must be completed. But there are the items for public buildings in the several provinces.

I think these items might be abandoned for this year. I doubt very much that in any case the expenditures will be made. Then, for my own province of Nova Scotia, I see that there is over $2,000,000 to be voted for harbours and rivers. Speaking generally, I think I may safely say, that none of this money is necessary for the present year. You cannot expend money during the balance of this year for harbours and rivers in Nova Scotia. You cannot get the necessary material. It is difficult to get labour. Furthermore, the season is not convenient for repairs to public wharves and works of that kind. If we vote this $2,000,000 it will not be expended this year. The same is true of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario. It is hardly possible to believe that actual expenditures are contemplated under these votes. If they cannot be expended within the next two months, they cannot be expended until next year, in April, May or June, which is the proper time to make expenditures of this kind. Therefore, I agree quite heartily with the remarks made by the hon. member for St. John. It appears unfortunate to ask Parliament to vote these sums at this time. A few months ago, the late Minister of Public Works, in a speech at Montreal, said that he was cutting down the public works expenditures to about $7,000,000 and was eliminating everything. It is quite obvious that these items are not inserted in the supplementary estimates with the view of making expenditures. There are three or four pages which the minister ought to drop.

Mr. REID: Nearly all these items in the supplementaries are for repairs that are absolutely necessary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will not be done.

Mr. REID: The deputy tells me that they have only put in those that are actually necessary and that they will be done.

Mr. PARDEE: Will be done this fall?

Mr. REID: If they are not done this fall they will be done next spring.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the minister mean that the money is to be expended during the winter?

Mr. REID: We can get out timber in the winter and get ready if we cannot complete the work before spring.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Then the minister should cut out three or four pages of these items.

Mr. REID: We cannot; they are absolutely necessary.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no trouble about that. In New Brunswick last winter, while the elections were going on, they were making roads and cutting down bushes alongside of the roads.

Grosse Isle Quarantine Station—boiler house, new boilers, etc., $25,000.

Mr. REID: This is required for two new hundred-horse-power boilers and the remodelling of the present boiler house. The two boilers will cost $8,000 setting $3,000; remodelling the boiler house, $10,000, and contingencies $4,000.

Mr. PARDEE: Will this work be done this fall?

Mr. REID: It will be done as soon as the vote is passed.

Quebec post office—enlargement and alterations—additional—revote, $15,000.

Mr. REID: This is required, in addition to the sum of $80,000 in the main estimates, for carrying on the work under contract on the Quebec post office, and for additional work, such as fittings, furniture, lock boxes, heating, sidewalks, fence, elevators, tower clock installation, etc.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When was that new work commenced?

Mr. REID: This work is under contract and this $15,000 is required to finish it. The work of rebuilding the post office in Quebec was started about four years ago.

Three Rivers—new public buildings, $20,000.

Mr. KYTE: This is a vote for a new building entirely according to the statement in the estimates. It is not for a building in course of construction. That certainly is an item which should be allowed to stand.

Mr. REID: This is for a new building, but it is really to finish a building the contract for which was let in January, 1914. The contract was let to Joseph Bourke, of Hull, and he is proceeding with the work.

Galt drill hall—grading, paving, etc., $8,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not new?

Mr. REID: That is for grading and paving, and putting in concrete gutters around around the drill hall already built.

Kemptville public building—$2,100.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What county is Kemptville in?

Mr. GRAHAM: Who represents the riding—or misrepresents it?

Mr. REID: This vote of $2,100 is to provide, first, for balance on a lot 30 feet 2 inches by 92 feet, situate on the north side of the Kemptville public building, the purchase of which was authorized by an Order in Council dated 5th March, 1917, and, secondly, to clear the lot of all burned stone, brick and timber, as well as other debris resulting from the fire of 7th February, 1915, and to level the ground so that it may be made into a lawn; relaying sidewalk on Prescott street. The explanation of that is this: a public building was erected in Kemptville. The lot was purchased prior to 1911.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not this lot.

Mr. REID: No, the lot on which the public building was erected. Adjoining the public building was a store owned by Mundle & Percival. That building took fire and burned down, and did considerable damage to the public building. The people in Kemptville urged that, instead of allowing Mundle & Percival to build on that lot, and possibly endanger the public building, it would be better for the Government to buy the vacant property owned by Mundle & Percival. That would make the public building on the square.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is this lot to be used as a tennis court?

Mr. REID: I do not know what they will do with it. Mundle & Percival asked a much larger amount than this, and the Public Works Department negotiated with these people, with the result that they purchased it for this amount of $2,000. They wanted a very large amount for the property when the building was on it, but the Public Works Department finally bought it at this figure.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose recommendations were made by members.

Mr. REID: No.

Kingston Royal Military College—enlargement of educational block, $150,000—to complete new dormitory by adding two wings, $100,000.

Mr. REID: This vote of $150,000 is asked to make provision towards the extension of the educational block of the Kingston Royal Military College. In their notes on military buildings, dated 14th October, 1912, the Militia and Defence Department stated that in view of the increased number of cadets who are accommodated at the college it is found that the present educational building does not provide ample class-rooms, dining-rooms, recreation rooms, etc., and it is proposed to extend the present build-to this end. The actual accommodation required consists of mess-room, 75x40, for 300 cadets; library; one big lecture hall, which will hold all the cadets at a time for general lectures, etc.; a draughting room; two additional lecture rooms for classes of 50 cadets; and a chemical laboratory for practical work. The present mess, draughting and book rooms in the old building would be used for other purposes. In a reply to a letter from the Deputy Minister of Public Works of 7th June inquiring as to the necessity of a list of works requested by the Department of Militia and Defence to be noted in the supplementary estimates, the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, under date 23rd June, states as follows:

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, and to inform you that the various items contained in your letter have been carefully gone into, and it is requested that the following items which are urgently required be provided for in your supplementary estimates: Enlargement of educational block, $150,000; complete new dormitory, adding two wings, $100,000. It is hoped that every effort will be made to provide these items

This extension of the educational block was recommended by the Militia and Defence Department, December, 1913, October 31, 1914, and October 24, 1916.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it not a fact that applications for admission to this institution had to be refused this year for lack of accommodation?

Mr. REID: That is true.

Mr. GRAHAM: These are big items, and if they were for something else, I would be inclined to oppose them; but the Royal Military College has proved itself such a wonderful institution, and its graduates have shown themselves to be such brave and splendidly equipped men during the present war, that I would hesitate to object to any vote for the improvement of this great college. Even in peace time the education given at the Royal Military College has been such that some of our leading men have been produced by that institution. The training is not, as some people appear to think, only physical, but there is a mental training, and a course of study to equip young men for the activities of life in a practical way, which might well be envied by some other institutions. If those in charge of the Royal Military College assure the Government and Parliament, as I believe they do, that this vote is necessary for the better equipment of this institution, and, as I am privately informed, for the present needs, I would be in favour of passing these items. If it be true, as we have been told it is, that on account of lack of accommodation, applications have been refused this year to young men who wish to enter the Royal Military College, then we cannot too quickly remedy that defect.

Mr. NICKLE: The original educational building is the building now being used for the education of cadets. The cadets are intensely crowded in that building. I think the original scheme of accommodation was for some 80 pupils. Now they have a great many more there, and the demand on the part of young men to enter the college is so great that we have competitive examinations. The second item is to complete the new dormitory by adding two wings. Some five or six years ago, before the dormitory building was erected, one part of it was bricked up. The main building is stone, and, the idea is to remove this brick, and to complete the building by the erection of the additional wing. The commandant tells me it is absolutely essential, if good work is to be done, that further dormitory and educational accommodation must be provided, and those who have followed the history of this war must be aware that a great many of the men who received their training at that institution have by their conduct won distinction for themselves and for this country.

Mr. GRAHAM: Could the minister explain this: we had in the main estimates quite a number of votes, and we have in the supplementary page after page. Why is it necessary to have supplementary estimates? Why were these items not put in the main estimates?

Mr. REID: The main estimates are made up in October. These are repairs that have become necessary from time to time since then.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the House had not been in session, you would have had to do without these votes.

Ottawa Departmental Buildings — rewiring, etc.—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. REID: This is to complete work that has been going on in connection with rewiring the public buildings. There yet remain to be done three corridors and 46 rooms in the Langevin block. The estimate was prepared in 1912-13, since which time the cost of labour and material, principally material, has advanced in some cases fifty per cent.

Ottawa—pavements, including Government's share of cost of repaving Sussex street from Rideau street to St. Patrick street, $43,000.

Mr. REID: This covers the following works: repaving Sussex street from Rideau to St. Patrick street, Government's share of cost, $18,785; pavement in front of Government Printing Bureau, $6,200; repairing asphalt pavement on Wellington street, west of Bank, $17,000; repairing Wellington street pavement between Connaught Plaza and Bank street, $1,015.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is this for paving the roadway?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is there a law in Ontario that the proprietors pay half the cost of paving the roadway?

Mr. REID: Yes; this is our share of the cost.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is this our legal share?

Mr. REID: The deputy informs me that the Government are in the same position as private owners.

Ottawa Government Printing Bureau—freight elevators, $8,500.

Mr. REID: This is to provide for two standard electric freight elevators of 6,000 lbs. capacity, at 100 feet per minute, to replace old elevators now operated by steam power in the Printing Bureau at Ottawa.

Prescott public buildings—repairs and renewals—revote, $3,000.

Mr. REID: When I came through Prescott this morning I noticed that they were repairing the buildings there. The chief architect has mentioned during the last two or three years that the buildings required repair; the same view has been expressed by officials in the Post Office and Customs buildings there. The roof has been in very bad shape; the bricks have been falling away from around it. The work really had to be proceeded with this year; it will be completed within the next ten or twelve days.

Stayner—public buildings, $10,000.

Mr. REID: This vote is to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building in the town of Stayner for post office purposes.

Mr. PARDEE: How big is Stayner?

Mr. REID: The population is 1,200.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What county is it in?

Mr. REID: Stayner is an incorporated town in Simcoe county, Ontario, a station on the Meaford branch of the Grand Trunk railway, nine miles from Collingwood and twenty-three miles from Barrie. It has eighteen stores, three hotels, shingle, planing and woollen mills, one brick kiln, carriage factory, branch bank, printing office, and a weekly newspaper.

Mr. GRAHAM: How does the minister reconcile this vote with his assurance to the House that no new works would be started? An election is coming on and it is thought that a lot ought to be bought in Stayner. We have been assured over and over again that no new works would be started. Here is a violation of that pledge.

Mr. PARDEE: The minister has not given an explanation why he is starting to undertake new works. He has said that no new buildings would be started.

Mr. REID: We will let the item stand until I can get more information.

Item stands.

Manitoba public buildings—Winnipeg—alterations to immigration building No. 1, for accommodation of postal station A, $20,000.

Mr. REID: This vote is to provide interior alterations to immigration building No. 1, at the Canadian Pacific Railway station at Winnipeg, for the accommodation of postal station A.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that a wood or a stone building?

Mr. REID: It is a brick building with stone trimmings.

Saskatchewan public buildings—Regina—alterations to Assistant Receiver General's buildings, to accommodate post office, $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why is this required?

Mr. REID: This vote of $10,000 is required for alterations to the Assistant Receiver General's building (old Royal Bank), Regina. This will provide for a proper staircase, overhauling heating apparatus, paving lane, installing electric freight elevator, conveyor from present post office across lane, etc. The estimated cost of the proposed alterations is $9,250, with contingencies of $750, or a total of $10,000.

Alberta public buildings—Coutts—immigration building, $2,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where is that?

Mr. REID: That is right on the boundary line, south of Calgary. There are no buildings there. It is where the Canadian Pacific crosses the boundary. This amount of $2,000 is required to reimburse the Department of the Interior for the construction of immigration building at Coutts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is right on the international boundary line?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Spirit River—immigration building, $5,000.

Mr. REID: This is to reimburse the Department of the Interior for the erection of an immigration building at Spirit River settlement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where is Spirit river?

Mr. REID: It is in Edmonton county. We have a recommendation for this from the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

British Columbia public buildings—William's Head quarantine station water supply, $150,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a large item. What is the explanation?

Mr. REID: This amount of $150,000 is required to provide an adequate water supply for the quarantine station at William's Head. The present water supply is obtained from the Quarantine lake, a distance of 3½ miles, and was installed about 1894. It was repaired on many occasions between 1900 and 1913; but constant attention is necessary in stopping leaks, etc. In case of fire the pressure would be greatly inadequate and the chief of the fire department states that the existing conditions are extremely dangerous and unsatisfactory. During the summer months the watershed from which the present water supply is obtained dries up, and there is always a scarcity of water. To overcome this serious drawback it is proposed to obtain a new source of supply. The proposed work consists in the construction of a water main from a point known as "Bray's Farm" on the waterworks system of the city of Victoria, to the quarantine station at William's Head, a distance of about 8½ miles. The construction of this main is in accordance with an offer made by a resolution of the municipal council of the city of Victoria on the 28th May, 1917, as follows:

Resolved, that the Water Commissioner be authorized to submit an offer to the proper official of the Dominion Government to supply water from the city water works to the said quarantine station in accordance with arrangements to be mutually agreed upon, embracing the following general terms and conditions, namely, to sell water to the Dominion Government for this purpose, delivered at a point known as "Braye Farm," at six cents per thousand gallons, the Government to furnish and lay the necessary main, and the city to maintain said main, after it is laid, for a period of five years.

In view of the increasing prices for cast iron pipe it is proposed to use the pneumatic tubes which have been in storage in Toronto for post office purposes and thereby effect a material reduction in the cost of the work. The chief architect of the Department of Public Works in a report dated 23rd June, 1917, states as follows:

Since negotiations with regard to this supply have been in progress the cost of cast iron pipe has advanced very materially. In January, 1917, our resident architect at Victoria estimated the cost of 10-inch water pipe on that date as $52 per ton. I am now in receipt of an estimate from him, dated 22nd June, in which the price is quoted at $85.20 per ton. This difference in cost of cast iron pipe will, of course, very materially affect the estimate for the cost of the work, which was about $150,000.

I have taken up the matter of using the pneumatic tubes which we have in storage in Toronto, with Mr. Chipman, C.E., of Toronto, and have received from him a report as follows:

That from the tests made on the pneumatic tubes he is of the opinion that the pipe would prove satisfactory for water works purposes under a working head not exceeding 300 ft., but before being used they should be thoroughly cleaned, re-coated, tested and weighed; and that greater care will be necessary in laying these pipes than in laying standard cast iron water pipes. The pipes must be laid more closely to grade and to line than with standard pipes. For a long conduit these pipes would be equivalent if not superior to the standard pattern of pipes. He states he would have no hesitation in using these pipes on a water works system provided they were cleaned, coated and tested.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What number of immigrants are coming to William's Head?

Mr. REID: I know there was a very large number last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Coming from where?

Mr. REID: The Orient.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This seems to me a very large expenditure for a quarantine station water supply.

Mr. REID: All the vessels have to stop there. I understand there will be more immigrants next year.

Dawson post office—vault, $10,000.

Mr. KYTE: Some days ago I put some questions on the Order Paper with reference to this item. I asked the minister if he had any report from his officials asking that this expenditure be made, and he answered yes. I also asked him to produce the correspondence, and he replied in the affirmative, but I have not received it yet.

Mr. REID: I remember looking up the matter. All who have made recommendations in this matter agree that the vault is in a very bad condition. The deputy minister will send over the correspondence to my hon. friend. I understand that a telegram came not very long ago from Ernest Revard saying that this expenditure was no longer necessary, but that was when he was no longer agent of the Public Works Department. He seems to have changed his mind since he severed his connection with the department.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is a vault there at present, is there not?

Mr. REID: This vote of $10,000 is to be applied in tearing down and rebuilding the vault in the Dawson post office building, which has been sinking. This vault was not built on a proper foundation in the first place and is gradually dropping down into the earth and at the same time toppling over; in its present condition it is not fireproof, and in the event of the building being destroyed by fire, the vault would be almost certain to topple over and break up, and even if it stood, would not protect the contents from fire.

Dawson being built on a glacial formation, any building or heavy weight, to be substantially placed and remain true in its position, must have foundations put down (12 feet) through the muck and ice over burden to the frozen gravel below. Nothing else will stand. The weight of this vault, as it settles, is shoving over the whole post office building to such an extent that doors and windows have been crushed out of position, the floors and ceilings cracked and pulled down to a slant. The present vault is enclosed in the main building, and it is proposed to erect the new vault outside of and connecting with the building on the inside only. The vault doors will be stationed, and access will be had to them from the main building. The outside dimensions of vault will be 12x14 feet, with stone wall 12 feet high; brick wall on top 25 feet high, and chimney erected at the corner of the vault. The reconstruction of vault has been recommended by the Department of the Interior October 20, 1916, and by Mr. George Black, Commissioner of the Yukon Territory, in a letter dated 24th August, 1916. I also remember seeing a letter from the Collector of Customs, another from the postmaster, and one from Mr. Revard himself.

Mr. KYTE: Does not the minister think it would be well to have an inquiry to verify the facts, inasmuch as Mr. Revard has notified the department that there is no expenditure required, as the vault is in good condition? Does not the minister think it would be well to inquire why Mr. Revard has changed his mind?

Mr. REID: I feel this way about it. Mr. Revard, when agent of the department recommended this expenditure. It has also been recommended by the gentlemen I have mentioned, in all of whom I have confidence. I think that Mr. Revard must have some grievance, and is now trying to prevent this expenditure. At all events, the agent of the department will look into this matter before we proceed with it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Who is the agent?

Mr. REID: No one has been appointed yet.

Mr. KYTE: When did Mr. Revard cease to be the agent?

Mr. REID: I do not know the exact date, but the correspondence will show.

Mr. KYTE: Would the minister let the item stand for the present?

Mr. ROCHE: I had the privilege of being in Dawson city a year ago last summer, and was taken through this building by the officials. It was undoubtedly in a very dangerous condition. The floor had sunk very considerably, and the partitions had drawn away from the ceiling. It was impressed upon me how necessary it was to have this vault rebuilt. I know nothing whatever as to the expenditure, but most assuredly the building was in a very dangerous condition.

Item stands.

Public buildings—rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $324,000.

Mr. REID: There is an increase in this item, owing to the advance in the price of coal, of about 20 per cent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the price of coal to the Government in Ottawa?

Mr. REID: It is $9.25 a ton.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have been informed by a citizen of Ottawa that the fuel controller has no authority under the Order in Council appointing him to enforce his injunctions or to inflict punishment for infringement of them.

Mr. REID: The intention was that the fuel controller was to get the coal to parties in Canada at a reasonable price. I should prefer to look over the Order in Council before saying just what his powers are.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Tuesday, September 4, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT PRESENTED.

List of shipping, issued by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, being a list of vessels on the registry books of the Dominion of Canada on the 31st December, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Hazen.

THE MILITARY SERVICE COUNCIL.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) laid on the Table copy of Order in Council, dated 3rd September, 1917, appointing the Deputy Minister of Justice, Oliver Mowat Biggar, of the city of Edmonton; John H. Moss, of the city of Toronto; Louis Loranger, of the city of Montreal, and Lieutenant Colonel H. A. C. Machin, of the town of Kenora, Ont., a council to advise and assist in the administration and enforcement of the Military Service Act, 1917, to be known as the Military Service Council; the Deputy Minister of Justice to be chairman of the council.

[Mr. Roche.]

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Stewart in the Chair.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—Ben Eoin—wharf, $2,200.

Mr. KYTE: Is this for the construction of a new wharf?

Mr. REID: These small items are for repairs at different places.

Mr. KYTE: When is this money to be spent?

Mr. REID: As soon as the vote is passed. In some cases work is being proceeded with now.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain why he has dropped certain items that were in the estimates during the last few years and introduced new ones? For the last five or six years there has been in the estimates an item for a wharf at Cole harbour—which is as necessary, in my judgment, as any wharf proposed to be built on the coast of the Maritime Provinces. This item has been dropped from the estimates, and certain other items dealing with works not nearly so important have been introduced. This is not an isolated case; quite a number of projected works in estimates and new items have been in Nova Scotia have been dropped from the Estimates and new items have been inserted in their places without any apparent reason. Upon what principle has the minister made up these supplementary estimates?

Mr. REID: This amount is required to construct a creosoted timber wharf 175 feet long and 16 feet wide—with a head block 20 by 30 feet—and a small warehouse thereon, 10 by 14 feet. The estimated cost is $1,634.50, made up as follows: creosoted piling, $819.60; native round logs, $25.20; dimension timber, $260; timber, plank covering, $163.20; driving and securing 40 piles, $147; sand and gravel in approach, $34.50; warehouse, $175; land, $10; total, $1,634.50; superintendence, contingencies, etc., $365.50; total, $2,000. Add ten per cent for advance in prices of labour and material since the report was made, $200. This is really a new work; it is in the constituency of Cape Breton South.

Mr. KYTE: I understood that this was a new work, and I was rather surprised at the minister saying this item was for repairs.

Mr. REID: I was speaking about the preceding item.

Mr. KYTE: We are discussing this one. I would like the minister to read the report recommending the construction of this wharf.

Mr. REID: District Engineer Bernasconi, in his report of March 20, 1915, says:

> There are at present seven public wharves on the shores of East Bay, fairly well distributed, with the exception of the shore between Big Pond and the head of East Bay, a distance of 12 miles. The proposed wharf at Ben Eoin would be about midway between these points and would fill the gap and give the required accommodation to the inhabitants of that section of the district. The site for the proposed wharf is owned by Mr. Joseph McLellan, who offers to sell the land required for the sum of $10, which price I consider fair and just.

That is the official information.

Mr. KYTE: Will the minister explain why it is that, report having been received in 1915, no appropriation has been placed in the estimates until now?

Mr. REID: I cannot explain that. The estimates, of course, were made out by the Minister of Public Works. These are the explanations furnished by the department, and I cannot give any others.

Mr. KYTE: Does the minister think there is more money with which to build wharves this year than there was in 1914?

Mr. REID: I am not doing any thinking on this; it is an estimate of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. KYTE: If the minister is not doing any thinking, it would be a good idea for him to do some.

Mr. REID: I am satisfied that the Minister of Public Works would not insert this item unless he thought it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. KYTE: For election purposes.

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. KYTE: The report says that there are seven wharves already in East Bay, but inasmuch as there is a distance of 12 miles between two wharves, it is important that this wharf should be built. I very much regret that the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) is not here. He might perhaps produce the plan which he laid upon the table of this House in 1910 or 1911, and on which he had marked out the number of wharves in the Maritime Provinces built by the late Government, as he said, without any justification. This is another case in which the Government appear to have gone back on whatever record they made, when they were in Opposition, with respect to the expenditure of money upon wharves. I am as much interested in the convenience of the people of my district as the acting Minister of Public Works can possibly be, but the people of my district realize the necessity for economy on the part of the Government, and I beg to assure the minister that they understand why this estimate is brought before Parliament at the present time. A request was made three years ago for the building of a wharf at that point. That request was not complied with. Year after year went by; estimates were voted by Parliament, but no provision was made for the building of this wharf until the year 1917. If this item had been placed in the main estimates for 1917-18, the Government might still be entitled to some credit for discharging a public duty; but inasmuch as provision for the building of this wharf is made only in the supplementary estimates, which came down after it was determined by the Government that there should be an election, we can all realize the motive that actuated the minister. If there ever were a time when provision for expenditure on new work ought not to be made, it certainly ought to be now, and I would suggest—and I take all responsibility necessary for making this suggestion—that the minister drop this item out of the estimates.

Mr. CARROLL: I know something about the location of this wharf, and the engineer who reported to the minister that there were seven wharves in East Bay must have been seeing seven times as many wharves as he should have seen. There are not seven wharves in East Bay. Three years ago I forwarded a petition from the people at the head of East Bay to this Government asking for repairs to a wharf which has been of considerable service to the inhabitants of that place, and which is quite near East Bay church in the vicinity of which the larger proportion of the people live. The Department of Public Works paid no attention to the matter, and, as a result, that wharf is absolutely useless and worthless to the people of that section. Has the minister any plan showing how the people who would be served by this proposed wharf are going to get to the main road? It is about two and one-half miles from the main road, and there is absolutely no communication. If the minister wishes to have a wharf which will be of service to the people, he should repair that wharf which has been allowed to go to ruin. Instead of there being seven wharves, there is one on the south side of East Bay in the constituency which I represent and another on the north side of East Bay in the constituency represented by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). There must be some mistake in the report.

Mr. BRADBURY: That is too bad. So ne more wharves should be built there.

Mr. CARROLL: I am not complaining about this wharf. Of course, my hon. friend knows all about this wharf as he knows, or pretends to know, whether he does or not, about wharves in all parts of the country. I am simply giving to the minister information which I think he should have. I am not objecting to the item at all.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) asks that this item be dropped.

Mr. CARROLL: If my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) would attend to his business and endeavour to give information to the minister as I am trying to do, he would get along very well. I do not interrupt my hon. friend when he is giving information to the minister in regard to matters in his riding. The Minister of Public Works should investigate this matter and take into consideration the petition sent in to the department three years ago for repairs to a wharf at the head of East Bay. Perhaps the deputy minister will remember about the petition which was signed by a large section of the inhabitants there, headed, I think, by the clergyman in charge of the parish.

Mr. REID: I have no other information than this before me, and the officials of the department have given me the report of the officer in charge of that district who recommends that this wharf should be built. As I understand the hon. member, this wharf which it is proposed to be built is in his constituency.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes.

Mr. REID: I have the plans here showing the proposed wharf. Do I understand the hon. member to say that this wharf is not required and that he wants the item struck out, because if he does I will strike it out.

Mr. CARROLL: If the minister will guarantee to me that he will look at the Government wharf at the head of the south side of East Bay, and instead of spending the money on this wharf, will spend it on repairing that wharf, which will better serve the people at Ben Eoin, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. REID: I cannot make any such guarantee, because we cannot expend any amount on repairs on some other wharf unless the item is placed in the estimates just as this one has been. Therefore, if I strike out this item the matter of the repairs to the wharf mentioned by the hon. member will, of course, have to be taken up by the department, and if the situation is as he describes, an item can be inserted in the estimates next session.

Mr. CARROLL: So far as I am concerned, I would recommend the striking out of this item.

Mr. REID: I will strike it out.

Mr. CARROLL: It amounts to $2,200. This wharf would not serve the public at that point at all. The minister need not think I am afraid of striking out any item that is not going to serve the people.

Mr. REID: I am not saying that.

Mr. CARROLL: The engineer may have been misinformed. It would have been better had the department done as it was requested to do, namely, to make repairs to the wharf at the head of East Bay. I see no good in building a wharf at this particular place. I would be glad if the minister would show me on the plan how he is going to get from the proposed wharf at Ben Eoin on to the main road.

Mr. REID: The right of way is marked on the plan, showing how you can get to the wharf.

Mr. CARROLL: You will have to buy the right of way.

Mr. REID: The man is willing to sell it for $10.

Mr. CARROLL: That is cheap enough.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the minister is mistaken when he says he has not the power to change an item in the estimates. I know for a fact that he has done it in reference to a wharf in my constituency. Prior to the defeat of the late government a sum of money was voted for the building of a wharf at Sand Point, on the Strait of Canso. More than that, a contract was entered into, and the material collected for the building of the wharf, but when the present government came into power their friends in that locality persuaded them to change the site of the wharf to another place further down the Strait. The reason for making this change was that the government wanted to purchase a site from a Conservative heeler in that locality, as a reward for his political services. The wharf was built at this new location, and then it turned out that there was not enough water there to make the wharf of any service to the people. The intention was to build a wharf at which the steamer which plies between Guysborough and Mulgrave could call, but the water is so shallow the steamer is unable to come in, and consequently the wharf is no good to anybody. The owner of the land got his purchase price for it, and he was the only person who benefited by the expenditure of $5,000 at that point. So there is one case in which the minister changed an item in the estimates, and if he was able to change an item then, he ought to be able to change one now for my hon. friend from South Cape Breton.

The minister has never answered my question as to the principle which is acted upon in making up the estimates. I have pointed out to him that there has been an item in the estimates for the last six years for the building of a wharf in my constituency at a point where it is very much needed. Time after time the minister and his predecessors have promised to construct the wharf. The point where this wharf is required is not in the woods, where there are no roads or people, but in a thickly settled district, and the people of Cole Harbour, Charlos' Cove, Cashin's Cove and American Harbour have all asked that it be built. The minister has cut that item out of the estimates, and in its place has an item for the building of a wharf at Ben Eoin, where apparently there are no inhabitants and no roads to give access to the wharf. I should like the minister to tell the committee on what principle he makes these changes in the estimates.

Mr. REID: There are, of course, many wharves in the province of Nova Scotia, and applications are coming in every year for new wharves. Some of these applications are put off from time to time, but each year the minister takes up the most pressing cases, and selects those which he thinks are the most urgent. These items are all small amounts. Personally I feel that the people who have not the advantage of railway accommodation should have the benefit of wharves, and that these should be much closer together than in the older settled parts of Canada where there are railway facilities. I have never raised any objection, and never will, to giving the people along the Atlantic coast proper wharf accommodation. The hon. member says that he knows of a case where the money was not spent where it was intended to be spent. My information is that the department do not know of a case of that kind, nor do they understand that it is possible to change the location when the vote has specified the point at which the money must be spent. But it may happen that the engineer may move the site a hundred feet or perhaps half a mile if he thinks it will be an improvement, and that is quite within the spirit of the law.

Mr. CARROLL: But this money has not been voted yet.

Mr. REID: It is in the estimates, and if the item goes through, the wharf will be constructed at that point. Possibly there may be other points in the hon. member's constituency where the need is more pressing; that is a matter of opinion. I have never been in that locality, and my hon. friend knows it better than I do, but the officials of the department down there say that that is the point where this wharf should be built.

Mr. CARROLL: They are not doing their duty.

Mr. REID: A number of people live in that locality.

Mr. CARROLL: Not where the wharf is to be; nobody lives there at all.

Mr. REID: Ben Eoin is situated on the southern shore of East bay, thirteen miles southwest of the city of Sydney, which is the nearest railway station. It has a population of about a hundred, whose principal occupation is farming and fishing.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend is referring to East Bay. At Ben Eoin there are only about seven families, and if the wharf is built at that point, it will be right at the bottom of a mountain. Half a mile down the shore at East Bay, where the population is, there has been a wharf for a great many years, perhaps for half a century, and it has been kept in repair by succeeding governments.

It serves the people of East Bay, the 100 families the hon. gentleman refers to, together with the seven or eight families on the mountain of Ben Eoin, four miles from East Bay. Three or four years ago, or more, the wharf got into disrepair, and a petition was sent to the Government to have it repaired. There was no necessity for buying land there. If the Government spend $500 on the old wharf, which is in the centre of the population, they will be serving the whole neighbourhood. I think it is unfair to the people of East Bay that this wharf should be built at Ben Eoin, and that the wharf in their own county should be left to go to destruction. I am taking this point in the interest of the people themselves. I know the locality almost as well as I know this Chamber. I am surprised that any engineer should say there were seven wharves in East Bay, and that this wharf is serving 100 families.

Mr. REID: If we put this vote through I do not see that it can be used for repairs to a wharf at some other place.

Mr. CARROLL: I understood the minister to say he would strike it out, if I recommended it. I would not recommend the striking out of anything that would benefit the people in my riding. I would be a foolish man to do anything which was not beneficial to them, if I intended to go back for re-election. That is certainly logic. I am recommending this item should be struck out because it is not in the public interest.

Mr. REID: Then we will strike it out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I remember something taking place about this matter when I was minister, and I remember that I was pressed to take over that old wharf and put it in repair. Does the minister think there is a prominent place in East Bay where the wharf could be properly placed? Why not insert the word "Ben Eoin wharf, at or near East Bay?" We need not strike out the item.

Mr. REID: If the hon. gentleman thinks the wharf should not be built there I do not want to keep the item in the estimates, but I think it would be better to leave it in, and before the department would proceed with it they could look thoroughly into the matter and decide on the proper course. However, I do not think we should waste time over it, and I move that the item be struck out.

Mr. CARROLL: Would it be in order to make a motion to use $1,600 of this money to make improvements on the wharf at East Bay?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dugald Stewart): No.

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This vote is for the construction of a new wharf, and there are several votes under the headings "Harbours and Rivers—Nova Scotia," for new wharves. The Minister of Finance solemnly promised Parliament, on more than one occasion, during the last two years, that no new public works would be undertaken. The late Minister of Public Works also promised Parliament the same thing. I say that on that ground the item should be dropped. This item of $97,000 for new wharves and repairs in Nova Scotia should be struck from the estimates. Every single item of such a character should be dropped, for the reason that the money will not be expended this year. It is practically impossible to effect repairs to wharves late in the year; it will not be possible to place this work in the hands of competent men before October or November, and it will then be too late. Parliament must meet again before March 31 of next year. There will then be sufficient time to vote these moneys, and no useful purpose can be served by voting them now.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I sincerely hope the minister will not yield to request of the hon. member for Halifax. Nearly all these items are for repairs, and a dollar spent now may mean a saving of a thousand dollars later on, and prevent a good deal of hardship.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We will attend to it next year.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman says this is not the time to spend money on wharves in Nova Scotia. I desire to say that from now to the middle of November is the most feasible and practical time for such expenditure. The farmers are not very busy now, and we are having our best weather. I am absolutely astounded to hear the hon. member for Halifax objecting to a paltry expenditure of a little money for repairs to keep the wharves of that province in proper condition. I believe his statement will be received with a great deal of regret and astonishment by the people of his province.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not at all.

Mr. CLEMENTS: I have no interest in the matter, and it makes no difference to me whether the items are struck out or not, but I want to say that I represent a constituency three times the size of Nova Scotia, and I have a coast line three times the length and breadth of that province, and I can assure the hon. gentleman there are no items for new works in my province, the items being all for repairs. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman did not include British Columbia in his request for cutting out the items. Our waters are infested with teredo, which are very destructive to wharves. I have known piles 18 inches thick to be cut off by teredo in British Columbia in one year. I hope the hon. gentleman from Halifax will not press his request. When a wharf needs immediate repair it is good policy to attend to it at once, because, by spending a dollar, you save an expenditure of ten or fifteen dollars. I assure the members for the Maritime Provinces that, so far as British Columbia is concerned, there is no necessity for any arguments with regard to new wharves, because all the items in the supplementary estimates for that province are for repairs only. Practically three-quarters of the coast line in British Columbia are in my own constituency.

Mr. CHISHOLM: My only difficulty in regard to this question is that all these repairs are required this spring. I called the attention of the Government to several works in my own county, when the general estimates were brought down, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman from Annapolis did not protest then that these items were not contained in the main Estimates, because, if they had been in those estimates, there would be some hope of having the money spent this year.

Mr. REID: The general estimates were made out last October.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I can tell the hon. gentleman that, so far as my county is concerned, all the works provided for in the supplementary estimates were necessary, and this money was required four years ago. The Government has failed, year after year, to put one dollar in the estimates for repairs in the county of Inverness. I can assure the hon. gentleman that all the works in Nova Scotia are in the same position. Here we have $18,000 for repairs and improvements for Margaree harbour. I succeeded in getting the Public Works Department to look after this important public work in Margaree, but if it had been attended to four years ago an expenditure of $1,800 additional to the amount expended would have been sufficient. I protested against the failure of the Government to look after it, and to-day we have $18,000 in the estimates to repair the destruction which has occurred in the last four years. The Government cannot say that they did not know the conditions in that district because I warned them continually year after year for four or five years. I believe they repeatedly found this in that one instance.

There is another item for Port Hood wharf. There is a wharf which cost this country about $40,000 and the Government let this wharf go into decay and destruction year after year, for five years. I pointed out to the department how this work was going to decay. Neither the Minister of Public Works nor the Government paid any atteention to my warning. The surprise to me is that at this moment, preceding an election, I find $6,000 to do a work of repair that will cost about $35,000 or $40,000. I find the same conditions along the coast from one end of the county to the other. There are seven or eight votes that cannot be spent this fall with any reasonable results, and the work of destruction is going on all the time. Every fall, for the last four years, when there has been any agitation around Margaree with respect to municipal politics, or something of that kind, you would find a dozen of men at work in October or November. The foreman was getting his full time although he did not put in more than forty-eight hours a week. I find no fault with the foreman, under the circumstances he could do no better. This was going on during October and November. I told the Minister of Public Works that that was an awfully poor way of spending the money. If they attempt to get any work done along our coast after September they cannot get good results. If the foreman were authorized early to go to work he could get honest results. The timber is growing in the woods yet.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will my hon. friend allow me——?

Mr. CHISHOLM: No, I am not done yet. Let my hon. friend possess his soul in patience and not be in so much of a hurry. With regard to the work which is provided for here, if the minister will give me the assurance that they will go on with the work immediately, I will point out several expenditures that he might get results from. But, I anticipate that it will be impossible. The Department of Public Works have not the machinery at work to enable them to put the material out before October. If they cannot get the men at work by October it is a crime to spend the money there.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Does the hon. gentleman advocate striking out the items in so far as they appertain to the county of Inverness?

Mr. CHISHOLM: My hon. friend in this thinks he is smart. I advocated for the last five years that expenditures should be made every year in order to preserve the public works in Inverness. Had the Government acted upon my advice they would not have had to expend within 20 per cent of the money that they will now have to expend to put these works in repair. I am not particularly worried as to whether we leave these items in the estimates or not if I have not the assurance of the minister that they will be spent because this Parliament will meet again next winter and whether we have these items in the supplementary estimates now or whether they are in the estimates when this Parliament meets next winter, makes very little difference. But, the hon. gentleman does not think I am silly enough to ask that any of these items be struck out. I have been advocating for the last five years that these works should be kept in repair.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman thinks I must be under the impression that I am smart because I asked him to answer a plain, straightforward question. I hope nothing I have said will indicate that I have any great conceit or that I think I am particularly smart. I would think it a fair inference to be drawn that when items are inserted in the estimates, and when an hon. gentleman who is usually silent, gets up and protests, he must want them struck out. That is the only inference I can draw and I am afraid I cannot get very much light from his answer. If hon. gentleman opposite had not consumed so much of the time of this Parliament, if they had allowed the business to proceed more expeditiously, these items would have been passed several months ago and the money would have been available in the early summer. But, I cannot agree with the hon. gentlemen when he says it is impracticable to spend any money this fall. October is a very desirable month in which to spend money. The hon. gentleman seems to be incensed because certain expenditures have been provided for and yet the moment these items are placed in the estimates they meet with a protest from the desk mate of the hon. gentleman. I can understand why the Government might be a little reluctant to make expenditures in Nova Scotia when the members sitting for these seats themselves are the first to get up and protest. We had a case this afternoon. There is in the estimates an item for Cape Breton county and a protest against it comes from the hon. member who represents that county. Then, when we come to an item for Inverness county, the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) vehemently protests against any item of that kind being inserted in the estimates at any time during the period of the war. I think hon. gentlemen can hardly expect the Government to be very liberal when their action in this respect meets with so much opposition from hon. gentlemen opposite. If the hon. member for Inverness is anxious to have money spent in his county on needed repairs he should desist from criticism of the expenditures.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I do not want my hon. friend (Mr. Davidson) to create the impression that I protest against these items. I protest against the idea of placing these items in the supplementary estimates when it will be impossible to spend the money this fall. And my hon. friend should be able to understand plain English before he undertakes to put questions which cannot do more than expose his lack of common understanding. I protested that these items should have been contained in the general or supplementary estimates of last year, the year before and the year before that so that something could be accomplished. My hon. friend twits me because I am not heard very often in this House. I am heard whenever occasion demands it and the interests of my county need attention and my country in my judgment needs my opinion.

Mr. DAVIDSON: No, not at all. I did not mean that my hon. friend was not heard from often.

Mr. CHISHOLM: He is surprised that men like myself who do not often address this House should get up and offer any criticism to items of this kind. The business of this House would be expedited if there were more members like myself and if they possessed a little particle of modesty.

Mr. REID: I could not agree to strike out any of these items.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I must protest again; I never asked it. He desires to put me in a false light. I want every item and ten times as many and the need of Inverness requires it.

Mr. REID: At any rate the hon. junior member for Halifax said that he thought that they should be all struck out. I am not referring to the hon. member for Inverness. The main estimates were made up in October. These items were all taken up during the winter and this list has been made out. In making out the list of these repairs, the officials of the department take the reports of the engineers in the district and collect the ones that in their opinion are the most urgent. I believe that every hon. member, no matter on what side of the House he is, will admit that the repairs on the list are actually required at the places which are named.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Certainly.

Mr. REID: The Minister of Public Works, in selecting the places thought to be most urgent, did not select all the places where repairs might be done. He has taken wharves in Inverness, Cape Breton, Cumberland and other counties and he was very fair in making his selection. I agree that there are many other wharves which probably require repairs but some of them are not so urgent as others. Under the circumstances it does strike me that the hon. member should allow these small amounts to go through. As far as completing these repairs is concerned, hon. members know that the amounts are small.

There is no reason why any one of these votes could not be spent this fall; they are for small repairs, and it would surely be better, if these wharves require repairs, that they should be made and that the people should have the benefit.

Mr. CARROLL: The minister having struck out the item for Ben Eoin wharf, to which I objected, I am in accord with everything else that is proposed to be done in my county. The new wharf at Grand Mira is an absolute necessity, and so are all the repairs to wharves in Cape Breton county.

Mr. REID: I think it would have been better to have left the vote for Ben Eoin wharf in and to have carried on the work if possible.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) has made a serious charge against the department: that although he called attention to the need of inexpensive repairs to the breakwater at Margaree harbour five years ago, nothing was done, and the breakwater has been so damaged that it is now necessary to spend this large amount of $18,000 to make the repairs. If that is true, it is criminal neglect, and some one ought to be held accountable for it.

Mr. REID: Frequently, when statements of that kind have been made in this House, I have found from the reports of the engineers that they are not well founded. The hon. member may possibly have had a report from some one in the locality who wanted a little work.

Mr. CHISHOLM: When I make a statement I generally know what I am talking about. I live within half a mile of this wharf, and, when the weather is fine, I go down there about once a day. I have gone out of my way to get all the information necessary. I have written the department and interviewed the minister in regard to this work many times, and it will be news to the people of that locality that the minister thinks that right treatment has been given to that public work for the last five years. I venture to say that $38,000 will not fully repair that wharf. In 1911 there was a vote of $10,000 in the general estimates to be spent there, but it was not spent. Small sums were spent each year, in October and November when results could not be accomplished, and that has been the great difficulty.

Mr. REID: I have looked at the official explanation of this vote, and my hon friend seems to be quite mistaken. This $18,300 is not to repair a breakwater.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I did not say that nor could I, because I do not know yet what it is for.

Mr. REID: He was arguing on the assumption that it was for the breakwater. It is for repairing the breakwater; but, in addition to that, it is for the building of a proposed sand groin 550 feet long and 15 feet wide, a new work entirely.

Mr. MARCIL: Is this new work a war time work?

Mr. REID: The hon. member for the county will agree that it is necessary to repair this breakwater. The sand groin is erected opposite the breakwater to protect it from the action of the waves.

4 p.m.

Mr. MARCIL: It is not to protect the country from the Huns is it?

Mr. REID: I am glad my hon. friend takes an interest in protecting the country from the Huns, and if this breakwater or any other will prevent the Huns from landing there, I am sure every member will support it.

Mr. MARCIL: We are told there would be no new works during the war.

Mr. REID: This is repairing an old work. I am sure the hon. member for the county will agree that this sand groin is necessary to protect the breakwater. This sand groin is to be 550 feet long and 15 feet wide, and the estimated cost is $7,500. In addition to that, there is an item for dredging the channel at the entrance, $6,000, which is not applied to work on the breakwater. I mention this only to show that the hon. member did not understand the nature of the vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. D. Stewart): The committee has been discussing the item of Margaree harbour, which we have not yet reached. It would be better if this discussion was discontinued and resumed when the proper item is called.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for South Cape Breton says that the item now under consideration is not necessary; we will strike it out.

Mr. MARCIL: When an engineer of the department makes a report and the minister accepts it, is it the policy of the department to throw out the item simply because a member says that the work is unnecessary?

Mr. REID: The member for South Cape Breton knows the locality; he says that this work is unnecessary because there is another wharf about a mile from the place where this wharf is proposed to be constructed. He says that this wharf would serve only seven or eight families. Under the circumstances, pending further investigation, I am willing that the item be struck out.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the hon. gentleman not ask that the old wharf be repaired?

Mr. REID: Yes, but I cannot change a vote for the construction of a wharf to a vote for repairs to another wharf a mile away.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The report of the engineer shows that the wharf is really intended to be at East Bay. The report says that there are one hundred families where this proposed wharf is to be built; the one hundred families are at East Bay, not at Ben Eoin. The member for South Cape Breton does not want a wharf constructed half a mile or so from a settled district where there are a large number of families and where there is already a wharf, although it is in bad repair. If you build a wharf half a mile away from a settled district you create division of opinion in the community; the tendency is to take the business away from the settlement and to establish a little community in a new place, which is extremely objectionable. I have always endeavoured to see that the necessary public accommodation was afforded in the settled localities.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no motion before me with reference to this item. The minister simply said that he was willing to strike it out.

Mr. CARROLL: Mr. Chairman, I will make a motion.

The CHAIRMAN: I cannot receive a motion from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. REID: I move that the item be struck out.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be a mistake to say that the Chairman could not receive a motion from the member for South Cape Breton.

The CHAIRMAN: I was mistaken; I had something else in my mind at that moment.

Motion agreed to, and item struck out.

Boularderie Centre—repairs to wharf, $625.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have no doubt that these repairs are quite necessary; I know the wharf well. A good deal of money has been spent upon a wharf at New Campbellton, but the work has never been completed. What was expended will go to waste unless something be done to keep the wharf in repair and to complete the work. I would suggest that the minister get a report on the matter.

Mr. REID: I shall bring the matter to the attention of the department and have the information placed on record when the estimates for next session are being considered. They are generally considered in the month of October.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister could get a little money to put that wharf in repair, he should not wait until next year.

Mr. REID: We might take it out of the general vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Bernasconi, the government engineer at North Sydney, could report on it. New Campbellton is only a short distance from the town of North Sydney.

Cow bay (Port Morien)—repairs to breakwater, $1,800.

Mr. REID: Assistant District Engineer Cooper reported on February 6, 1917, as follows:

The face-timbers on inner side of the head block have been eaten away and the bays back of this face have had the ballast washed out by the under-tow that continually heaves around the corner. The covering and stringers on the outer head are also in a bad condition and to repair this part I beg to recommend placing a concrete block, 25 feet in length and of the dimensions shown on the accompanying plan and in placing a concrete covering over the outer head block.

Mr. CARROLL: Was any money spent on this work this year?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. CARROLL: During the last few years an amount of money has been spent there every summer in extending the breakwater. The tidal water is very strong there; it has been found necessary to put concrete wings on the breakwater.

Mr. REID: My memorandum shows that this breakwater was built by the owners of the Gowrie coal mine on the north side of the bay, and came under the charge of the department in 1873. It originally extended 1,347 feet, to 17 feet at low or to 23 feet at high water, and was about 44 feet in width. The area of the basin enclosed between it and the shipping pier of the Gowrie mines, now the property of the Dominion Coal Company, was 17 acres, 10 acres of which had a depth of from 9 to 17 feet at low water. The breakwater was seriously damaged during the gale of August 24, 1873. Large expenditures have been made from time to time in extending and repairing the work. During the year ending March 31, 1915, the sum of $4,075.76 was expended in completing the placing of concrete blocks for the protection of the seaward face of the work. Work was done by day labour During the year ended March 31, 1916, the sum of $1,850.54 was expended by day labour on procuring a derrick with winch and in constructing and placing large concrete blocks along the seaward face of the breakwater, over a distance of 53 feet, thereby completing the concrete blocks' protection on the seaward face of the breakwater.

Mr. CARROLL: This is a work that should be undertaken right away. It is in a sort of a basin in which the wind does not have much effect, and if the work were undertaken now, it could be finished this fall.

Mr. REID: The work will be undertaken as soon as the estimate is passed.

Cribbin's Point—repairs to wharf, $1,500.

Mr. SINCLAIR: When is it proposed to do this work?

Mr. REID: There should not be any trouble to do this work within the next two or three months. The work is to be done by day labour; $1,004 out of the $1,500 is for timber and planking, and $200 is for removal of old work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the material been purchased?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No part of the money has been expended up to date?

Mr. REID: No money has been spent because the estimate has not yet been passed, but the intention is to go to work at once on all these small works in these different localities.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What has become of a number of other items for works in the county of Antigonish? I cannot say from memory the names of all the places, but a list of them has been put before the House several times by Mr. William Chisholm the former member. They were voted some years ago for the purpose of carrying a local election in that constituency. They were repeated in the estimates for a number of years, and they have now disappeared altogether. Does the minister ever intend to renew those items?

Mr. REID: I think the Minister of Public Works explained, on the main estimates that he had dropped a long list of items for new work that he did not consider it necessary to proceed with during the present season. I suppose the items mentioned by the hon. members were among those that disappeared in that way.

Eastern harbour (Cheticamp) retaining wall, $1,000.

Mr. REID: This is required to construct a dry rubble retaining wall asked for by the fishermen.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I have been advocating this work for some time. It is very desirable.

Fourchu—extension of wharf, $4,200.

Mr. KYTE: When is this work to be undertaken?

Mr. REID: As soon as the item is passed.

Mr. KYTE: Is it intended to extend the wharf further out into the harbour?

Mr. REID: We are going to raise and extend the wharf.

Mr. KYTE: How far is it to be extended? What is more important than raising the wharf is to have some dredging done there, so as to enable a steamer to call at the wharf. When the wharf was purchased in 1911, it was intended that the steamer which serves the southern shore of Halifax and Cape Breton should call at the wharf for the purpose of giving the residents of that important community connection with their markets east and west. Unfortunately, since the change of Government, no improvement has been made in that harbour up to the present time. Considerable dredging was done before 1911, but more is necessary at the approach to the wharf. These people are without any communication with the outside world, as the sailing vessel which used to call there was lost some years ago, and they now have to depend entirely upon a small steamer owned by a private company that operates during the lobster season between Fourchu and Louisburg. I would urge the Government to take a portion of the money which is to be voted under the head of dredging in the Maritime Provinces, and do some further dredging in the neighbourhood of the wharf, to give the people in that locality the same advantages that are enjoyed by other ports in the province. It is one of the most important fishing communities in the province of Nova Scotia, and the people are severely handicapped by having no means of exporting their fish to the markets to which fish caught in other parts of the province are shipped. I am very glad indeed to see the Government is going to extend the wharf, but they should not stop there, because extending the wharf will not be sufficient. Some dredging is absolutely necessary in order to give a sufficient depth of water to enable these steamers to call there.

Mr. REID: I see by the report that this is a very important matter for the people in that locality, as they are forty miles away from a railway, and depend entirely on one schooner to carry their fish to Halifax. I shall draw my hon. friend's statement to the attention of the officials, and will see if any dredging can be done.

Friar's Head—repairs to breakwater, $1,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: How much has been spent on repairs to this work the last couple of years?

Mr. REID: The breakwater was built of concrete in the year 1901-03, and was 110 feet long, 4 feet on top, and 6 feet on bottom. The total expenditure to March 31, 1916, has been $3,773.76.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The engineer reported in 1911 that $2,200 or $2,500 was required to make the repairs to this breakwater. This money was provided in the general estimates of 1911 by the late government and should have been spent by the present Government if they had an honest desire to preserve this important public work; but then the Conservative party came into power and very few repairs have since been made. They would not even allow to be spent the amounts provided by the Liberal party. They permitted the work to go to destruction and decay. The destruction of the breakwater has continued right up to to-day, and I find that the same engineer now says that $1,000 will cover the repairs necessaray there. I cannot quite understand that. I know that $1,000 will not begin to do the repairs. I should like to know what particular part of the work is going to be repaired. The repairs are very necessary and should have been made long ago, in order to preserve the work already done there.

Mr. REID: The figures are as follows: 1,200 ft. B.M. scantling for forms at $30, $36; 800 ft. B.M. boards: $30, $24; 3,000 lbs. steel rods reinforcement at .06, $180; 70 cu. yds. concrete at $10, $700; add for omissions and contingencies, $60; total, $1,000.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That does not complete the work.

Mr REID: I do not think so.

Mr. CHISHOLM: It is only $1,000 out of the $3,500 that was granted in 1911 by the Liberal government. That is to say, this Government are giving only $1,000 six years after they came to power out of the $3,500 provided by the Liberal party in 1911.

Mr. REID: It is all that is being done this year.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The other $2,500 has not been spent.

Gabarus—extension of protection works, $750.

Mr. CARROLL: This is a very important fishing station. But for the protection works the fishermen of Gabarus would have great difficulty in getting their boats in and out of the harbour, if harbour you can call it. I have been in communication with the representative men of Gabarus, and I know they expected a much larger sum than this to be spent on the extension of the protection works. If it was only some small improvements that were required, $750 might be sufficient, but I think the minister will agree with me that only a very small extension can be made for that sum. The protection is required for the boats passing in and out of the harbour. The fishermen are also having difficulty with the sand filling up the channel.

Mr. REID: I understand that $250 has already been spent this year on urgent repairs. This $750 is all that it is proposed to spend during the present season.

Mr. CARROLL: What does the engineer's report say?

Mr. REID: In a report dated March 30, 1915, District Engineer Bernasconi states that the beach protection work built has proved very beneficial to the harbour, but it does not extend far enough to protect the whole of the harbour, and it is now asked that it be extended a further distance of 500 feet in a southerly direction. As the work is necessary for the protection of the harbour, he recommends its construction.

Mr. CARROLL: There is no question as to the necessity for this work, but I think $750 will scarcely build 750 feet.

Mr. REID: It will build a piece of it.

Mr. CARROLL: A very short piece. I should like the department to get a further report from the engineer. I understand that the channel is fast filling in, and that the fishermen have great difficulty in getting their boats in and out of the harbour.

Grand Mira—wharf, $1,000.

Mr. REID: This amount is required to construct a block and span wharf, 70 feet in length and 16 feet wide, with an "L" at the outer end 20 x 20 feet, and extending to 8 feet at low water, also warehouse 12 x 14 feet thereon.

Mr. CARROLL: This is a new wharf?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: Does it say on what side of the Grand Mira river?

Mr. REID: It is asked for on Grand Mira North.

Half Island Cove—repairs to breakwater, $700.

Mr. REID: This amount is asked for by District Engineer Millidge to reconstruct the outer face of the breakwater at the inner end, estimated cost $700. The work is required to prevent further damage to the breakwater during the fall storms.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is that amount considered sufficient to put the breakwater in good repair?

Mr. REID: That is what he reports.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has the engineer made any report in regard to another breakwater in the locality? I understood there was an application for a breakwater on the other side, at Half Island cove.

Mr. REID: That may be, but that would be new work, and we are only taking items for repairs.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister intend to make the repairs this year?

Mr. REID: Yes, we will proceed with them immediately the vote is passed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The wharf is in a dangerous condition at present. It is in a very exposed place, and in storms the whole sweep of the bay is breaking against it. It is in such a condition that it may not stand through the winter, if some repairs are not made to it, and I am glad to know the minister is taking some steps in regard to this wharf, as it is an important wharf for that locality. If the work is not done soon it may be all carried away.

Mr. REID. We could not proceed with it until the vote was passed. The deputy had instructions to proceed with all these works at once.

Inverness harbour—repairs and improvements, $5,500.

Mr. REID: This amount is asked for by District Engineer Bernasconi to effect the following improvements: (a) Repairs to western breakwater, $1,000; (b) Dredging the entrance channel and extending the eastern breakwater, $4,500.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Can the minister tell me what amount of work has been done? They have been doing a little work there this summer. Will the hon. gentleman tell us the nature of the work, and the amount of money already expended?

Mr. REID: We have not a record of the work that has been done this summer. I will obtain the information.

Mr. CHISHOLM: This $5,500 is for the purpose of continuing the work that has been commenced this summer?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Does the minister propose building any new structures there this fall?

Mr. REID: We will proceed with what this vote provides for. It is for repairs to western breakwater, $1,000; dredging entrance to channel and extending the eastern breakwater, $4,500. The eastern breakwater and the repairs to the western breakwater will be commenced at once. There is a little dredging in connection with that.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What is the nature of the dredging? How does the minister propose to have it done?

Mr. REID: The fishermen and inhabitants of Inverness request that a channel be dredged or excavated across the beach into McIsaac's lake, to a depth of one foot at low water spring tides, fifteen feet wide on the bottom. To dredge such a channel, fifteen feet wide on bottom to a depth of one foot at low water spring tides, would require the removal of about 4,000 cubic yards from situ, to which add 25 per cent for filling in during storms, or a total of 5,000 cubic yards.

The eastern breakwater as it now stands is 652 feet long, and the bottom, at the outer end, is about 1½ feet above low water spring tides. This breakwater should be extended out 175 feet so that when completed there will be at least one foot of water at low water spring tides at the outer end.

I would suggest that a channel, 15 feet wide on bottom, about 1,100 feet long, be excavated to a depth of one foot below low water spring tides, by horses and scrapers, and that while this work is in progress the eastern breakwater be extended 175 feet long, 15 feet wide, by building a native timber cribwork breakwater, filled with stone ballast, sheathed with native timber and covered with three-inch spruce covering.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

The cost of the proposed improvement is estimated at $4,500, made up as follows:

5,000 cu. yds. dredging at 30 c., $1,500; breakwater extension, 26,250 cu. ft. breakwater at 10 c., $2,625; add for omissions and contingencies, $375; estimated cost of extension, $3,000; total $4,500.

Mr. CHISHOLM: This work was undertaken seven years ago, and a very considerable amount of money was spent. A very substantial structure was built on the eastern side by creosoted timber, the intention being to open up a channel to enable schooners and steamers that ply along our coast to enter. When this Government came into power there was a considerable quantity of that creosoted timber on the eastern side, intended to be used in continuing the work then in progress, viz., the building of breakwaters on the eastern and western sides of the entrance, and if I am rightly informed that timber is covered with stones and sand and is not available without a great deal of difficulty, all the results of the indifference of this Government and their absolute neglect of public property, but I question very seriously whether the fishermen of Inverness are satisfied with a depth of one foot of water even at low tide. I do not see the sense of it for a moment. The depth of water contemplated by the original surveying was, I think, ten feet at low tide. The work was initiated with a view of having that depth of water, and all the work done by the late Government is evidence of the intention of the late Government. This is, I suppose, one of the most exposed portions of the province of Nova Scotia, and to think that a depth of one foot of water, at the expenditure the minister proposes to make there, is going to be of any lasting benefit appears silly to anybody who knows anything at all about cost. In the first place, if he contemplates doing this work this fall, after the middle of next month he can only work perhaps two or three days in a week, and the work he will accomplish to-day will be destroyed to-morrow, unless he extends that breakwater to the distance contemplated by the late Government. It will be much better to continue the original plan, get that creosoted timber the Government succeeded in losing through some official's neglect, and put it where it was intended to go first by way of extending this breakwater, which would not cost this country but a small amount compared with the buying of the useless Quebec and Saguenay railroad or many other indefensible expenditures.

When the Government have accomplished that they can go to work in a common-sense way and do the dredging but to think you are going to dredge a harbour with a couple of teams of horses and a scraper on the north shore of Inverness, is to me an evidence of the weakness and absolute lack of business qualities of the department and Government. To me it would be as sensible to throw that money in the fire as far as results are concerned. The Government cannot be serious in the handling of this harbour work at Inverness, and I am sure the engineers who advise the Government expenditure of money at the entrance of Inverness harbour in the months of October and November for the purpose of deepening the channel one foot should be inmates of a lunatic asylum, rather than in charge of government works. This is one of the most important harbours on the whole coast of Inverness or the coast of any other county east of Halifax. The town of Inverness is very prosperous, an industrial town of 3,000 souls where a first-class market is available for a quantity of our fishermen's catch, but besides that it is the northern terminus of the Inverness railroad and first-class opportunity is afforded for the fresh fish business with the markets of Canada and the United States. Off this coast we find one of the best fishing grounds in Canada, or I might say, in the world. There are great prospects there for a first-class fishing industry. I have been endeavouring to point this out to the Government for the last five years. In 1911 we had $15,000 in the estimates and a provision made in the general vote for dredging of $42,000. Had that money been spent in 1911 and 1912 we would have had established perhaps one of the finest fishing industries in Canada, and would give employment to hundreds of our industrious and ambitious young men who could earn a splendid livelihood and would place within the reach of our country the very best of food—fresh fish in the very best of condition at a reasonable price, which is so necessary at present in view of the tremendous increase in the cost of living. We all know the importance of fish to-day.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Why was it not expended in 1911?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Because the right party, the friends of the labouring men, were not in power.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am not speaking of the expenditure made before September, 1911. Why did the party then in power leave this till October?

Mr. CHISHOLM: The fact is that the Government that was defeated in September, 1911, was carrying on the work of building the piers and had brought there a very large quantity of creosoted timber so as to be in a position to continue this work. The work was in progress in 1911 until the defeat of the late Government. When the party, which is the friend of the poor people, was in power, it continued the work until it went out. Then the friends of my hon. friend opposite came into power and they lost this timber by allowing it to be covered with sand. They did not continue the work for which the late Government provided the money, but allowed the money votes to lapse and never made any attempt to resume the work until now an election is imminent. The timber is there yet. In place of being put where the Liberal party contemplated it was going to be put, that is in the breakwaters, my hon. friends left it there and allowed the sand to cover it. It will cost almost as much to recover that timber as to buy new timber. Now, in the dying moments of this Parliament, to put in a small vote of $5,500 is, in my judgment, bordering on silliness, because they cannot accomplish anything practical with that vote so late in the season. However, as far as it goes, we will be grateful even for small favours, and if they will only expend this money in continuing the work initiated by the late Government, with a view of having substantial and lasting results, it will be continued by gentlemen opposite or by this side of the House as the country may determine in the near future. But I cannot characterize the idea of deepening the channel by one foot as anything but silliness, and a very striking exemplification of the business calibre of the present Government.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman is hardly right when he suggests that nothing has been done by this Government. I find that previous to 1911 a small amount had been expended each year.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Where?

Mr. REID: In 1908-09, $3,012 was expended; in 1910-11 $13,000, in 1911-12 $3,782.77, and in 1912-13, $2,596.90. Now we are going to expend more.

Mr. CHISHOLM: We had to fight Mackenzie and Mann for a number of years before we could get the land expropriated.

The vigorous and unrelenting efforts of my predecessor, the late Dr. McLennan, resulted in securing for the county the lands to enable the work to begin. When we went out of power we had all the machinery to continue this work in a vigorous way. If the Liberal party had been returned to power in 1911 they would have proceeded with this work. They provided the necessary money not only for the breakwater but for the dredging, and had secured a very considerable quantity of creosoted timber and were carrying on the work in a manner which assured a substantial structure and the creation of a satisfactory harbour for Inverness.

Irish Cove — reconstruction of wharf— $2,700.

Mr. REID: This work is recommended by the district engineer. The money is to be used to construct a new block at the outer end of the present pier 40 x 20 feet by 14 feet high. The estimated cost is $2,700.

Mr. CARROLL: Will this be done by day labour?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: Under the supervision of the engineer?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: When this wharf was being built we had a very capable man in that district to look after the work under the district engineer. I refer to Mr. Malcolm McNeil who lives quite near the wharf. I would recommend to the minister that before looking for anybody else to act under the supervision of the engineer he would endeavour to find out the capacity of Malcolm McNeil.

Mr. REID: I will do that.

Mr. KYTE: When did the minister receive the report from the engineer asking for this expenditure?

Mr. REID: I have not the date here.

Mr. KYTE: I think the minister will find it extremely difficult to get the work done this fall. It is rather unfortunate that these amounts were not placed in the main estimates so that the work could have been done in the early part of the season when it could have been done to advantage.

Jamesville—repairs to breakwater, $1,800.

Mr. McKENZIE: On this item I think I must have a heart to heart talk with the minister. The estimates of 1910-11 contained a very substantial amount for a breakwater at Jamesville. There is a report from the engineer on file recommending the height and depth of water at the outer end of the breakwater and the general dimensions. Before a dollar of the money was spent there was a change of Government. There is a letter in the department from Mr. McCormick, who used to be my opponent, recommending that this expenditure should not be made. It was dropped and there was nothing done. The minister will find that letter in the department. It was written some time in the fall of 1911 by my good friend Mr. McCormick. I am not finding fault with what he said. Possibly that was his judgment. But, later on, there was a local election in the county of Victoria and gentlemen from outside of the county came in and the announcement was made to the people of Jamesville that although Mr. McCormick had recommended that the breakwater should not be built, something would be done. A second report, now in the minister's department, was obtained from the same engineer recommending a very much smaller amount of money and a very inferior piece of work. They started with that expenditure and they have been doing something for the last two or three years. A frail structure was put into the water and a good deal of money was expended with the result that last fall, when a considerable southwestern breeze was blowing, the whole thing took a notion that it would not stay in the water any longer. It came ashore. The minister, if he went to Jamesville, would find it high and dry, suitable only for kindling wood, at the top of the beach. I would ask the minister to let this item stand until he brings down the reports. This is an important work and it should have been done right from the beginning. Putting this small amount of money it is merely money thrown away. If he starts with $1,800 to gather these matchwood pieces from the beach and put the structure out again it will simply come ashore. If the minister will refer to the reports in this department he will find that what I say is correct. It will be very much better to save the $1,800 and to put twice that amount in the estimates so as to provide something that will be of some benefit to the people.

Mr. REID: This vote is in accordance with the recommendation of Assistant District Engineer Cunningham. From his report it would seem that something should be done, if only to protect the present work.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am as anxious as any member to have money spent in my riding, and I never object to that; but I must, in all conscience, tell the minister that this thing is absolutely useless. The minister will find that when Mr. Bernasconi was asked to make a second report for a certain amount of money he reported that anything that could be erected for the amount specified would not stand, and what he predicted has come to pass. I would not do justice to the people of Jamesville if I was a party to the rebuilding of this disgraceful thing, which was erected for the miserable consideration of trying to get a few votes in that by-election. If this $1,800 is spent in this way it will be against my will, because after what has been put there it is practically throwing the money into the water. The only effective measure will be to begin anew and erect a proper breakwater there.

Mr. REID: The objection to striking it out is that Mr. Cunningham reports that the work is necessary to protect what is already there. I feel that we should pass the item on the understanding that no work will be done without a thorough investigation by the department, and, of course, the engineers will visit the work in their official capacity.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister would see the work he would understand how useless this vote is. One-half the structure came ashore, the other half has sunk beneath the waves, and it is now proposed to put something more on top of the submerged portion.

Mr. REID: If this should not be a sufficient amount to properly complete the work, we might be able to help out from the general vote. There is no desire on the part of the department to spend any money unless the engineers assure the department that the work will be permanent.

Mr. McKENZIE: The original plan is in the department, and if they build according to that there will be some good result.

Jones harbour — repairs to breakwater-wharf, $1,000.

Mr. REID: This vote is asked for by District Engineer Lock to make repairs that are absolutely urgent and necessary at this place at which there is greatly increased shipping.

L'Ardoise—repairs to breakwater, $2,600.

Mr. REID: This vote is asked for by Mr. Bernasconi to repair several bad breaks caused by windstorms.

Mr. KYTE: What is the date of that report?

Mr. REID: June, 1917.

Mr. KYTE: That is another work that cannot be done this year, as it is at one of the most exposed places on the southern coast of Cape Breton, and any work to be effective should be done early in the season.

Mr. REID: These estimates can be used until the latter part of April, so that it may be done in the spring.

Lingan—repairs to beach protection works, $650.

Mr. REID: This is asked for by the district engineer to make urgent repairs and to raise the beach protection work to the proper height, which is necessary to the permanence of this work.

Mr. CARROLL: I think I noticed last summer that much of this brush work had been washed away, or else had sunk into the sand. It has served a useful purpose, as similar work on other beaches has done. This $650, if it is sufficient, will serve a useful purpose in keeping the road intact.

5 p.m.

Malagash—repairs to wharf, $1,000.

Mr. REID: When the ice was breaking up this spring there were exceptionally heavy storms and the wharf at Malagash was considerably damaged. This is to effect the necessary repairs.

Mr. CARROLL: Were any petitions sent to the Department of Public Works from the New Waterford fishermen with regard to the necessity for some protection to enable them to do fishing there?

Mr. REID: I will make a note of that and send the hon. member a letter explaining the matter.

Mr. CARROLL: I have received letters from two or three fishermen there in regard to this matter and I told them that when the estimates were up I would bring it to the attention of the Government. I think that the department sent a man down there; I do not know what report he made as to the feasibility of establishing some kind of small harbour for the fishermen. I should like the minister also to give consideration to the matter of repairs at East Bay. If he could obtain some money from the general vote for harbours and rivers, dredging, etc., in Nova Scotia, I wish he would take the necessary steps to repair that wharf. At that place they have a steamer service twice a week, but it is almost impossible to land anything at the East Bay wharf. I would suggest that the department get Mr. Bernasconi to make a report on the matter. They do land certain supplies there in small boats, but that operation takes a good deal of time, and the steamers have only a short time within which to make the trip.

Mr. REID: I have asked the deputy minister to read Hansard to-morrow and take note of what the hon. gentleman has said.

Margaree harbour—repairs and improvements, $18,300.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am anxious to get a little more information on this item. Will the minister give me an idea of how this $18,300 is to be expended?

Mr. REID: The amount of $18,300 is required to make the following repairs and improvements to Margaree harbour: (a) construction of sand groin and block, $7,500; (b) repairs and strengthening of breakwater, $4,800; (c) dredging channel and entrance, $6,000; total, $18,300. The sand groin, consisting of crib work, will be 15 feet wide on top, extending seaward from the beach, a distance of 550 feet towards the outer end of the breakwater with a solid timber block with creosoted timber substructure, 30 by 30 feet, on top at its outer end; estimated cost, $7,500. During the heavy gales which visited the western coast of Cape Breton Island in December last, a section of the breakwater at Margaree was badly wrecked and in order to prevent a breach through the work it is necessary to repair and strengthen the damaged portion as soon as possible after the opening of navigation in the spring.

Mr. CHISHOLM: This programme is in line with what was suggested five years ago, as can be seen in the reports in the minister's department. That was my own suggestion after consulting my fishermen; $10,000 was appropriated for extending the wharf and breakwater, and an additional amount of $24,000 for dredging. I approve the plan that is to be acted upon; I think the only solution of our difficulties down there is the building of this crib work to the west of the harbour, running at an angle towards the end of the eastern breakwater. But I repeat that the expenditure of $4,500 this fall will do nothing more than perpetuate the conditions that have obtained there during the last five years. The minister proposes to expend this mere pittance to make a partial repair of the breakwater, and he is going to leave that structure in such condition that it will be further damaged this winter and next spring. He cannot hope, even if he economically expended this amount of $4,800, to make proper repair of the breakwater. I want to impress upon the minister the fact that this $4,500 will not make the necessary repairs on that eastern breakwater; that is, it will not place the breakwater in the condition that it was in five years ago. The report of the engineer makes reference to the fact that a portion of that breakwater was carried away last fall. The engineer has not made a full report of the conditions in respect of the rest of the breakwater, which is gradually being destroyed. The engineer took care—I do not know why—not to explain that the portion of the breakwater carried away last fall was the work done only the fall before. The new work was carried away, and it took with it another portion of the breakwater. And I will say this, that if the engineer had consulted his foreman who did the work he would have been informed of the absurdity of the course followed by the engineer. The foreman's judgment, in my opinion, was better than the engineer's with respect to this repair work. If the minister wants anything like a proper repair of the breakwater, he must repair it in such a way that the work will be substantially done and will withstand the storms. The trouble with the work done last fall was that the spikes failed to hold because of their having been driven into old decayed wood making up that portion of the breakwater to which the new work was attached. The old work had been left gradually to fall into decay through the evident indifference of the engineer or the department, or both. In order properly to repair this breakwater, work must be begun at the bottom. If the minister proceeds as the department has proceeded during the last three or four years, he will simply furnish a number of fishermen with firewood next spring, made up of the wood that he is going to buy, at a good price, no doubt, and put into that breakwater. The expenditure of this $4,000 will accomplish no object, unless it be that of attempting to defeat me at the next election in that district. I promise him that the only way he can accomplish that is to convince the people there that he is honest in his efforts to improve this harbour, and to do this he must change his policy of granting money at a time when results cannot possibly be secured so far as our harbour conditions go, and when there is every evidence that the work is not intended to be done. Whether he defeats me or not, the protection of our public works is of more importance to me while I represent my people in this House. It cannot be said by the Government that I have not kept the facts before them year after year; nor can it be said that the Government have made an honest effort to keep these works in good repair. I am glad that after my continued efforts I have succeeded in convincing the minister of the importance of building this western breakwater and of doing the necessary dredging, and for their action in the matter I thank the Government. I do impress upon them, however, the extent of their failure to keep up the other breakwater; it is nothing less than a crime, and I also wish to tell the minister that I am doubtful of his sincerity with regard to the expenditure of this money.

Mr. REID: This matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Public Works early in the year by the hon. member, and, of course, it was impossible for him to do anything until he had the necessary amount placed in the Estimates and sary amount placed in the estimates and passed by Parliament. We could not do anything until now.

When the hon. member states that this item is probably put into the supplementary estimates on account of an election coming on, that is hardly a fair statement, because the minister would have had these estimates before Parliament in February or March if Parliament had not adjourned. For that reason, we were not able to go on with these estimates until now. The hon. member states that we cannot go on with this work this fall. The advantage of having this amount of $18,300 in the estimates is this, that even if we cannot do anything with this work this fall, we have the money with which to go on with the work early in the spring. We can use the amounts in these estimates up until the beginning of April, and then we can place in next year's main estimates or supplementary estimates an amount with which to continue and complete it; $18,300 is all that the department estimate they can expend during the present fiscal year. Under the circumstances, as the Minister of Public Works took this matter up when he was making up the supplementary estimates in February last, no such charge can be made against him as that this item was inserted on account of an election coming on. It was put in because there was a strong petition from the fishermen in the locality that the work should be done and because the officials of the department reported that it was absolutely necessary and urgent. The hon. member agrees with me now that this item is perfectly justifiable. The only claim he has is that the money cannot be expended during this fall. As I have said, this estimate lasts until the beginning of April, and, therefore, if the work cannot be done on account of storms in October or November, the work can be proceeded with next spring. The hon. member has no ground for his suspicion that this item is inserted for election purposes. It was put in, as he himself has admitted, on account of the actual necessity and urgency of the work.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I must admire the minister's apparent candour. He tries to convince me that he did all he could do because, forsooth, he put this item into the supplementary estimates to repair a condition that existed last year, and for the last four years, when he might, if he were sincere in his desire to repair those works, have put it into the main estimatesfl He had a year before last February to consider the main estimates, and he had plenty of time during his consideration of the main estimates, to consider these works. Had he included this item in the main estimates, he might have been expending the money this fall. The minister tries to make the committee believe that because the deputy minister inserted these items in the supplementary Estimates, he did all that he could do. I have every regard for the intelligence of hon. members of this House, and I do not believe the minister's representation can possibly make the slightest impression upon any hon. member. I am also positive that they will not make any impression upon the people whom I represent, because they are intelligent people.

Mr. REID: There is no doubt that they are intelligent people.

Mr. CHISHOLM: The minister says that the amounts in the supplementary estimates can be expended next year. The amounts, if they are included in the general estimates of next year, can be expended next year. It is quite apparent to my hon. friend that he cannot begin this work this fall, and the insertion of this item in the supplementary estimates is in order to hold out hopes to the people of Margaree that this work will be undertaken. What justification have the people of Margaree to believe that this work is going to be undertaken next summer, particularly in view of an item of $10,000 which was put into the general estimates in 1911 and which has not been expended up to this day? When a Government, after money has been voted for a particular purpose, neglect to go on with the work, any reasonable person would expect such a Government to continue their indifference to the interest of the people. The Government are not sincere because they will not expend the money during this winter. The majority of the people of this country are convinced that another king will reign next year and that another party will be in power who will expend this money, but this Government have no intention in the world to expend it. This Government did not, during the last five years, spend money that was provided by the previous Government, so that it is not very likely, when they are inserting this item in the estimates in this slipshod manner, that they are sincere and will expend the money at this time. My conviction is that the Government do not intend to expend one cent of it.

Mr. REID: As I stated a few moments ago, the main estimates were made out in October last, and therefore—

Mr. CHISHOLM: The need for this expenditure existed six months, a year, two years before that.

Mr. REID: If that is so, I have here the report of District Engineer Bernasconi, which is dated November 22, 1916, or a couple of months after the main estimates had been completed and passed by Council and were ready to be submitted to the House. There was, therefore, no possibility of getting this item into the main estimates at that time. The matter was taken up immediately afterwards and an item placed in the supplementary estimates. The work would have been under way and probably all completed had it not been that there was an adjournment of Parliament, on account of which we could not reach the supplementary estimates. The Government are absolutely sincere in expending this money, but we have been kept here until this late date of the season so that we may possibly not be able to expend the whole amount between now and the end of the season. I am positive, however, that we can expend the amount before the end of the fiscal year, before this appropriation lapses, and it is the intention of the Government to do so. The hon. member has stated that there is no intention on the part of the Government to expend this money between now and the end of the fiscal year. I promise the hon. member that that will be done and the deputy minister has instructions, in regard to all these items, that the work is to be proceeded with at once. I take exception with the hon. member when he states that probably another king may be in power at the next session.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister is wrong about that.

Mr. REID: I am satisfied that we shall have the same king that we have now, namely, the Right Hon. Sir Robert L. Borden, in this House with a larger majority than he has ever had.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I must say that I am not surprised at the conclusion of the minister. I would have expected no other conclusion. The sincerity in either case is questioned by me seriously. The minister, however, does not understand the conditions at Margaree. He could not do any work there in November, December, January, February, March, or April, and if he does not know that fact he should know it.

Mr. MARCIL: He does not attempt to know it.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I know that. He has repeatedly stated that the ex-Minister of Public Works could not include this item in the general estimates. I cannot for the life of me understand what he has in mind. The ex-Minister of Public Works assured me a year and one-half ago that this matter was under consideration.

Mr. MARCIL: The elections were not decided on then.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There must be something wrong with the machinery of the Government if an item that comes to their notice in November through a report from their engineer that a public work is disappearing for want of repairs cannot be included in the estimates that are placed before the House in the following January. The matter requires some explanation from the minister.

He says the report of the engineer reached the department in November, and that it was too late then to put an item in the main estimates for this year. If that is so, I must say that the main estimates are prepared very slowly indeed. This is surely not such a big book that it could not be put together and printed in a few days. How is it that an urgent request made in November could not be provided for in the main estimates? The minister also promised some explanation why this long delay took place. He has been urged by the hon. member for Inverness, for the last five years I am told, to attend to this work, which has been going to pieces from year to year. The minister has officers down there, but nothing was done, and I think it is up to him to explain who is to blame for this condition of affairs. If it is true that this breakwater could have been repaired four or five years ago at a trifling expense of $400 or $500, and we are now asked to spend $5,500 for it, simply because of some one's neglect in the department, I think the minister ought to explain who is to blame. The responsibility should be thrown on some one.

Mr. REID: The only person I can throw it on, from the evidence I have, is engineer Bernasconi. There does not appear to be any official report earlier than November 22, 1916, but a couple of months afterwards there was a strong petition from the fishermen. I am not finding any fault with Bernasconi. Of course, I could not censure him at all. The official report I have before me shows why the repairs were not provided for before. I do not wish to throw the blame on any one. I have no doubt at all that the hon. member brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Public Works, but that is being done every day by members, and the minister has to consider which works are the most urgently needed. Perhaps Bernasconi did not press this as hard as the hon. member thinks he should have done. Of course, the great storm just prior to Bernasconi's report damaged the breakwater much more seriously than it had been damaged before.

Mr. KNOWLES: What was the date when the council approved of the estimates?

Mr. REID: I could not say offhand.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister sure it was prior to the 22nd of November, when this urgent report came in?

Mr. REID: The estimates were all made out at the end of October by the officials of the different departments, were submitted to council and approved, and then printed.

Mr. KNOWLES: If it is to be understood that the Government makes out its estimates in the month of October, and that no matter how urgent a request may come in in the meantime, no further item will be included, even if the House does not meet till the middle of January, as was the case this year, a greenhorn or layman would come to the conclusion that the Government was running its business in a very unbusinesslike way. If there is a hiatus between October and February during which no item can be added to the main estimates, the people ought to know that such is the case. On the face of it, it seems absolutely inexcusable, but there may be some technical reason to account for it.

Mr. REID: The hon. member knows that that is not in accordance with the facts. The estimates made out in October are for expenditures to commence from the 1st of April of the following year. The hon. gentleman knows that if any urgent work is required to be done before April 1 an item can be put in the supplementary estimates. He also knows that the House meets in January of every year at the latest, and sometimes in December or November, and that supplementary estimates are always brought down shortly after Parliament meets, to take care of urgent and unforeseen expenditures. The hon. member also knows that the fact of the estimates being prepared in October, and being presented to the House in January, does not delay construction on any particular work for one minute.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not know anything of the kind. I repeat that it is a lamentable condition of affairs if the fishermen are to be deprived of this work because of this lapse of time, during which an item could have been put in the main estimates. The Government may be very busy, and no doubt is, but the Public Works Department is not and has not been; that department has been one of the snaps in public life in Canada since the war broke out, compared with the work required of the minister in ordinary times, because no new works on a large scale are being undertaken. There is no gainsaying that it is a very lame way of doing business if the minister knew in November by an official report that the need for this work was urgent, anl yet did not put an item in the estimates although Parliament did not meet till January. I am not convinced that there is not some explanation, but the explanation the minister has given so far rather convinces me that my criticism was justified. He says that the main estimates brought down shortly after the House meets are for the expenditures commencing after the opening of the fiscal year. The fiscal year opens on April 1. What season could be more appropriate for doing this work than shortly after the 1st of April. If ever an item ought to be necessary it seems to me it is this one, and if ever delay was inexcusable it would seem to me to be in this case, where work is to be delayed until the month of September.

Mr. REID: In preparing the main and supplementary estimates this Government is simply following what has been the practice for the last thirty or forty years. The estimates have always been prepared two or three months before the House meets. Even if an item for this work had been in the estimates we could not have proceeded with the work until the main estimates had been passed by this Parliament, and that was only two weeks ago.

Mr. KNOWLES: What was the reason that the main estimates were not approved before last week?

Mr. REID: They could not be approved until they were passed, and they only passed this House ten or twelve days ago, and were then sent up to the Senate. We have had very important legislation before the House, and as it has been the custom every session, the estimates have been allowed to stand until the most important legislation is passed. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do why the estimates are late in passing this year. We had a two months' adjournment in the spring, and we have had some very important legislation to dispose of.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister's excuse now seems to be that the main estimates were late in passing. His explanation before was that even if an item had been in the estimates, the money would not have been available for expenditure prior to two weeks ago. Since he has hopped to that leg to stand on, I ask whose fault is it that the estimates are late, if not his own fault and the fault of the Government? If I am wrong I wish to be corrected.

As I understand it, the Government is in charge of the business of this House. The Orders of the Day are called and, and for weeks and weeks every day has been a Government day and the business that has been brought before the House is absolutely in control of the Government. If the minister will say that the Government during all those months could not bring the estimates until last week there is only one explanation, namely that they did not want them passed, because they never were obstructed. There has never been any suggestion of the minister's estimates being obstructed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: If I am wrong in that, I would like to be shown wherein I am in error. The passage of the estimates has been facilitated. In contradiction of what the minister says, I remember distinctly that a large per cent of the main estimates went through without a murmur on more than one occasion. I think a sixth or a twelfth went through without a vote.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman states that the Government is in control of the House, and should have passed these items before. We are in control of the House, but the hon. gentleman on the other side did so much talking on the other Bills that they delayed these estimates until the present time. That is the reason of the delay in bringing down the estimates. I am not saying that the Opposition delayed the estimates. It is true we are in control, and we had to take control in order to get through. That is the whole position. We would have had these estimates before us long ago, if hon. gentlemen had not talked so much on the other Bills which came before us.

Mr. KNOWLES: I cannot allow that statement to go uncontradicted. With regard to the voting of money, hon. gentlemen on both sides have been very generous and reasonable with the Government. Without any question or hesitation or debate, on all occasions that I remember, a large fraction of the main estimates was passed. That is the fact, and once a fraction of the estimates is passed the Government can go on with the work, because Parliament is committed to the expenditure.

With regard to the other statement made by the hon. minister, I think he feels it is well to get ready for election time, the House is drawing to a close, and he makes the statement that hon. gentlemen have obstructed and talked too much. It is up to him to withdraw that statement or prove it. Hon. gentlemen have not talked more than the importance of the subjects demanded. The minister is at sea in regard to that. Can the hon. gentleman tell us any debate that was too much protracted? I think he should refrain from a general statement of that kind, because it will not promote expedition in the passing of the estimates to make a blanket charge, without telling us to what he refers.

Mr. REID: I am not saying that there was any too much discussion on any of the items, but I say that, in the discussion on the other Bills that were submitted from time to time since May we have had very lengthy discussions; and if the hon. gentleman wanted me to give him instances I could show him in Hansard—

Mr. GRAHAM: Hansard would be against you. You would find the greatest number of pages filled by speeches of hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. REID: I have gone over certain debates, and I have come to the conclusion that there was more debating than there should have been. We have a sample of it in the present debate. It is the first time there has been too much debate on any of the estimates. I am not saying that the hon. gentleman has acted unfairly, but this item has been discussed by the hon. gentleman in whose constituency the work is to be performed, and he understands the whole matter. We have had a lengthy discussion, but perhaps not too long, and now the hon. member for Moosejaw proceeds to speak on it, and he does not know anything more about it than I do, and I am just taking the statements of the deputy minister. It looks to me that the course the hon. gentleman is taking in this matter is simply for the purpose of prolonging the debate on this particular item. I may be wrong, but this is my opinion.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Customs, who is Acting Minister of Public Works, said the Government had to take control into their own hands. Does he know that when a certain Bill was being discussed in committee, up to the time the Government gave notice of closure, the Conservative members had spread out their remarks to the extent of 69 columns of Hansard, while the Liberals only consumed 50?

Mr. REID: I did not know that

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a fact.

Mr. KNOWLES: When the hon. minister said I spoke this afternoon for the purpose of obstruction, I say his statement is not correct. I stated, as a general principle, with regard to repairs, or to public facilities of any kind, if there was to be as much delay as there has been in some cases, the attention of the Government should be called to it, and the system should be reformed, so that there could be quicker provision for obtaining money, and that the Government should not be compelled to wait for the sittings of Parliament, which sometimes means that a whole year will be lost. I was not referring to this particular case, but I could refer to Inverness, if I wished, or to the place the hon. gentleman comes from. I am interested in the business management of the affairs of this country, and I think that there should be quicker provision of money, especially with Parliament sitting, in view of the fact that there has been no obstruction from this side of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. gentleman from Moosejaw is a living example of why we are delayed here so long. The same thing would apply to a goodly number of members on the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman from Renfrew points to a certain debate, in which he said the members on this side of the House, being very considerably more in number than the members on the other side, took a little longer in actual debate than the members on the other side. I venture the assertion that the remarks of members on the other side have filled double as many pages of Hansard as the speeches by members supporting the Government. I would concede that, as they are the critics of the Government, it may be their right to talk more than members on the Government side. A certain number of members, particularly from the Maritime Provinces, occupy a considerable amount of the time of the House. I was going to suggest that we institute a little Parliament just for those Maritime Provinces, and I do not think it will be necessary to have a Hansard. Fifty per cent of the time of the House is occupied by members from those provinces by the sea. Many of the members from Ontario and the western provinces have privately discussed this matter and we feel that they unduly take up the time of the House. If all the members would insist upon their rights to be heard in this House to the same extent as some of those hon. gentlemen, we could not get through a session of this House in ten years, and I think some of those gentlemen who are accustomed to talking so much should stop and consider, for a little while, the other members representing constituencies in the Dominion of Canada, who should have something to say from time to time. We do not wish to be unreasonable with them, and I would ask the hon. gentleman who is looking at me just now—

Mr. McKENZIE: I am much interested.

Mr. WRIGHT: —to look up Hansard, and see how many pages he has filled, and compare the number with the number of pages occupied by any member on this side of the House, and I think he will not have much criticism to offer.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman from Muskoka (Mr. Wright) has given us a very timely lecture, but if it takes him three years to incubate a little bit of a speech, that is not our fault. Nature does not always produce in the same way, and, as a farmer, he knows that. The farmers have hens, sheep, and horses that produce in their season, and they have not all the same manner and kind of production.

Hon. members on the other side of the House are of the same class and of the same manner of production. But you must not blame us because we are the Opposition. When my hon. friend was in Opposition I remember him well, and if he will look at Hansard of those days he will find that his planting time will be over before he can count his lines and speeches in any one year. He must remember that the side of the House on which we are makes a great deal of difference in the length of our speeches. There are certain functions and duties devolving upon the members of the Opposition. When an important measure is to be brought down the hon. member for Muskoka and his fellow-members have had an opportunity of seeing it perhaps a month before we see it. He has had an opportunity of debating and discussing it in caucus, of approaching the minister who is to bring it down, and of knowing all about it before it is brought into this House at all. Thus, to him, there is nothing new about it, but to hon. gentlemen on this side, who see it for the first time, it is altogether new. They are supposed to be the critics of the Government and the protection of the country against legislation introduced by the Government. Therefore, if we on this side take a little longer than the supporters of the Government, under the requirements of our constitution and form of government, there is a good reason for it. I can assure my hon. friend from Muskoka that there will be no reform on this side of the House while such measures as he and his Government produce are incubated and brought forth from that side.

As far as what the minister says about his estimates is concerned, I have had a great deal of experience with the Department of Public Works for the last fourteen years. My idea of what Government officials do is that they report annually to the department before the main estimates are prepared and that anything of an urgent nature contained in the report will be included in the main estimates. The minister tells us that Mr. Bernasconi reported in November last year. It would appear that the report would contain all the principal requirements of his district. The report should certainly have contained a statement with regard to the serious conditions of the harbour of Margaree. I am sure that the committee of this House would not obstruct the passing of any estimate if the minister would tell us that it was urgent. If these matters are allowed to drag along from month to month it is not the fault of the Opposition. If the minister has an estimate that he feels should be put through, all he has to do is to stand up and tell us and that estimate will go through if it is a proper one. There is one thing that I have to say about the engineers. Mr. Bernasconi is a very capable man. Perhaps he is one of the oldest engineers in Canada. He probably has three good men in his office. I would wish the minister to impose upon these gentlemen the duty to report upon the works they have to look after. It is in the interest of the country that, once money is expended by the Department of Public Works, that money should not be allowed to go to waste because of the want of proper expenditure for repairs. The responsibility of keeping these works in repair should be upon the engineers of the different districts and it should not be left to members or anybody else to report upon the condition of these works. It could be done by Mr. Bernasconi in my district.

Port Hood—reconstruction of wharf, $6,600.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What is this vote for?

Mr. REID: This amount of $6,600 is asked for by the district engineer to make repairs to the present wharf and to provide for the construction of a new block 20 x 100 feet on the southern end of the block constructed during 1914-15. The estimated cost is as follows: 40,000 cu. ft. of crib work, $4,000; clay and stone filling over old work, 2,000 yds., $1,200; superintendence, contingencies, etc., $800.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Is it the intention to put this wharf in the condition that it was in five years ago?

Mr. REID: The wharf at Port Hood is an old structure commenced by the local government of Nova Scotia during 1865 and assumed by the federal Government in 1871. The original work was extended, repaired and improved by the Department of Public Works at different times but owing to its being constructed entirely with native timber, the substructure was weakened by the ravages of the teredo and it was found impossible to keep the work in proper repair. The amount asked for is intended to complete the reconstruction of the head on new lines, by the construction of a new block 100 x 20 feet on the southern side of the head, and the filling in of the top of the old work inside of new blocks with stone and clay. This work is not only necessary to meet the requirements of the business of the locality but also to secure the stability of the new work already built.

Mr. CHISHOLM: There was an important portion of this wharf carried away by a storm some years ago.

Mr. REID: In 1912.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I suppose this is a continuation of the work undertaken three years ago in order to replace the wharf and to put it in its original condition?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Will the work be done by day labour or tender and contract?

Mr. REID: Day work.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I understand that work costing over $5,000 is done by tender and contract.

Mr. REID: The timber will cost $4,000 and the stone filling about $1,200. Most of it is for timber and material.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Why is it proposed to do it by day work?

Mr. REID: These very small repairs are generally done by day work.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Is it the intention to continue the work of closing the northern entrance of Port Hood harbour?

Mr. REID: The only plans we have in view are those indicated here.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I would like if the minister would give me some information in regard to the work of closing the entrance at Port Hood harbour.

Mr. REID: That is a work which has been under construction for a number of years, but I could not give the hon. member a statement of policy in regard to it. Of course, I am only acting minister and know nothing about it. I could not state a policy without going into the whole matter and submitting it to council.

Soldier's cove—wharf, 2,500.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why is the minister departing from his announced policy, in regard to this wharf at Soldier's cove? The ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) told us over and over again that no new works of this kind would be undertaken until those for which votes had been in the estimates for some years many of them when he came into office, had been constructed. But here is a new wharf that is now in the estimates for the first time.

Mr. REID: We have passed votes for new works at other points, including Grand Mira.

Mr. McKENZIE: Those are very small. The only new one of any importance was Ben Eoin, and that was dropped. There is nothing of any importance in Nova Scotia.

Mr. REID: This is urgently required. My note says that the residents are engaged in agricultural pursuits and number about 40 families, but the number of familiies here and in the surrounding district who will benefit is about 400. I feel that along this coast, where they have no railway facilities, any assistance in our power should be given.

Mr. McKENZIE: I know this place and I do not know what shipping is going there. It is not a fishing point; it is a farming community, and there is abundant wharf accommodation in the district. It is near Red island, between St. Peters and Irish cove.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This item for a wharf at Soldier's cove appears to be a new vote. There was a distinct understanding with the late Minister of Public Works that the items for wharves and breakwaters that were struck from the estimates would be the first to be considered when the Government commenced the construction of new works. In my constituency a number of wharves and breakwaters were provided for in 1911 in places where they were very much needed; the items for these were afterwards dropped from the estimates upon the assurance from the minister that they would be taken up first when new works were being considered. The minister has not given any reason why he should make a distinction in the case of Soldier's cove. I might refer him to a proposed wharf at Marie Joseph, the extension of a breakwater at Charlos' cove, a proposed wharf at Cole harbour, and a number of other public works of the same nature along the Atlantic coast in my constituency. The objection I have to this item is that it constitutes a breach of the understanding that was arrived at.

Mr. REID: We did pass one or two new items before six o'clock. It is true that the Minister of Public Works struck out many items that had been in the estimates; indeed, there were many applications for new works this year. If there had been many large items for the construction of new works, probably there would be good ground for complaint, but in view of the fact that there were no new items in the main estimates and that the items for new works in the supplementary estimates are few in number and small in amount, I think that the hon. gentleman should not object. Evidently this work was promised to the people in that locality.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister is not well instructed as to the prospective usefulness of this proposed wharf. Perhaps he will tell us what steamers will call at that wharf after it is constructed, and what outlet it will give to the products of the farmers in that part of the country. A steamer now calls at Johnston's harbour, a few miles below the place where it is proposed to put this wharf. Why should another wharf be built within a few miles of Johnston's harbour? Moreover, the place where this wharf is to be built is not far from St. Peter's, at the end of the canal, where there is plenty of wharf accommodation. A little farther down is Irish cove, where there is a wharf. During the last fifty years nobody ever suggested or asked for a wharf at Soldier's cove. The minister admitted that it was to be the rule that no expenditure should be made until the items that had been in the estimates at the commencement of this Administration were dealt with. In a place where there is no need for it at all, we are to start in with a new work, while the needs of other places, in respect of which items have been in the estimates, are not to be considered. It is not a right thing for a minister of the Crown to make an arrangement with members of the House and then break it without any justification.

Mr. REID: Perhaps I can explain this matter better by reading a petition that has been sent to the minister setting forth the need for this work. It is as follows:

> That the erection of a wharf there would benefit not only the district of Soldier's Cove, but that also the large districts of Grand River, St. Esprit, Loch Lomond, Framboise and Salmon river would be similarly benefited.
> That the wheat and oats in these districts, ground last fall, were, in the opinion of the experienced miller, equal in quality to the best he had ever seen, yet, because the products of the farms have to be hauled from ten to forty miles or more at present to market, there is little ambition for greater production as the Government desires. A great deal of this drawback would be removed by the building of this wharf, and it is safe to say that in a very short time the country would be benefited in the increased production more than the cost of the wharf.
> That at present steamboats subsidized by one or both Governments pass within a mile of Soldier's cove without conferring any benefit whatever upon the people of those districts although they pay their portion of those subsidies.
> That in the districts aforementioned the building of this wharf would accommodate and benefit about 400 families.

That is the only information that I have. I think it reasonable that $2,500 should be devoted to the construction of this wharf. The amount is small; the benefit to the people would probably exceed $2,500 in one year. If these people have to haul their produce from ten to forty miles in order to ship it out, I think we should not hesitate to give them this small wharf.

Mr. McKENZIE: Nothing could be more absurd; nothing could be so absolutely without foundation, as the petition—whoever on earth wrote it—that my hon. friend has just read. The petition says that this proposed wharf would accommodate the people of Loch Lomond. The nearest wharf to Loch Lomond is Irish cove; if a man in Loch Lomond wants to ship out any produce, he can send it from Irish cove. Money was voted this evening for repairs to the wharf at that place. But this petition intimates that he will not take his goods to Irish cove. Well, in that case, he can go to Johnston's harbour, a distance of eight or ten miles from Irish cove. But, the petition says, he does not want to use the wharf at Johnston's harbour; he wants to go another eight miles up the shore until he comes to the new wharf proposed to be built under this item at Soldier's cove. This shows how the minister can be imposed upon by ridiculous petitions. Then we are told that the people of Grand river, forsooth, would be served by this wharf. Grand river falls into the Atlantic on the southern side of the island entirely away from this place altogether. Soldier's cove is on the Bras d'Or lakes.

Mr. REID: How far is soldier's cove from Grand river?

Mr. McKENZIE: The mouth of the Grand river would be about thirty or thirty-five miles from Soldier's cove. The people of Grand river, forsooth, are going to leave their open harbour and splendid shipping accommodation on the Atlantic on the southern side of the island and pull their grain over hill and dale until they come to the Bras d'Or lakes, which they will find absolutely frozen in winter time, and they are going to camp on this new wharf at Soldier's cove until the ice breaks up in the spring. I know the conditions down there. If the proposition were that this wharf was needed in order that the people might bring in the supplies necessary for their families, there might be some reason in it, but the proposition that the wharf is required in order that grain, etc., may be hauled away in large quantities from Soldier's cove to the markets of the world, is dreamland so far as I know anything about the matter, and I know the locality very much better than the minister does. Some one has been imposing upon the department. This item is in exactly the same category as the item for the Ben Eoin wharf that was struck out this afternoon. There is a new candidate in that county, a great man for manipulations of this kind, who expects to run in the next election.

Mr. REID: What is his name?

Mr. McKENZIE: John C. Douglas.

Mr. REID: I did not know that. I should have left the item in, and then it would have been all right.

Mr. McKENZIE: He finds these wonderful places. He found this place of Ben Eoin. We have heard wonderful accounts of the condition of things on the north shore of lake Superior, where men have to be tied with ropes when they work on the railroad so that they may not fall into the lake. From the description I have of this place the conditions will be very much the same; the workmen will have to be let down with cables and pulled up with cables.

Mr. REID: Perhaps they would have to use an elevator.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes. This new genius who has entered into the political life of Richmond county is finding those wonderful developments that can be produced by giving him here and there a few thousand dollars to be spent on day labour in order to make promises and make votes. The minister can have this item put through if he chooses. He can throw to the winds the honour of the gentleman whom he represents here, who has made a bargain with us that this sort of thing will not be done. I suppose he can secure a majority to smash all those regulations and all those matters of honour that have been agreed upon, if he wants to give Mr. Douglas some thousands of dollars to be spent on day labour and to allow him to promise in advance the wonderful things that are to be done. I cannot protest too vehemently against the voting and expenditure of public money under the present conditions of the country, and against conduct of this kind.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have not heard much of the discussion this evening about this vote for Soldier's Cove wharf, but I trust the minister will agree to drop this item. I see the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in his seat sitting close by the acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Reid). I said this afternoon that the Minister of Finance, on several occasions during the past few months, solemnly promised Parliament that, during the war, no new public work would be undertaken if it were at all avoidable. Here is a proposal to spend a few thousand dollars in the construction of a wharf at a place at which, I am informed, it is absolutely unnecessary. I understand that efforts were made, during the last twenty-five years, to have this work done by the Government, but all governments have declined to proceed with it or to vote money for the purpose. It is true, there is but a small amount of money involved, but why should we vote even that small amount this year, under all the prevailing circumstances, in order to build this wharf? The minister should not require any argument to induce him to withdraw the appropriation. I should feel inclined to move that the item be dropped, but I hope the minister will follow the precedent which he set this afternoon in regard to another appropriation, and drop this one. There is no necessity for a wharf at this place and even if there were, it can wait until next year. The acting minister surely would like to make a reputation for himself, while minister of this department, so as to leave a good example for the man who will later on become Minister of Public Works. Will the minister not agree to drop this item?

Mr. REID: I could not possibly agree to drop this small item. I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House when I read a petition from 400 families miles away from a railway, who say that they have agricultural products they want to take out from that place and no doubt they want to bring in supplies required for their own needs. This petition is signed by the people living in that locality. While there is no doubt at all that the former Minister of Public Works said that he would strike out items and that he did strike out of the estimates items aggregating $10,000,000, he never promised, and no minister would promise, that he would not insert any items. If that petition is correct, 400 families will be accommodated by this wharf. I believe the people who signed that petition are honest people and that they would not sign it unless the work was a necessity and should be done at once. It may be true that this matter has been neglected, that the wharf has not been built before.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Wait until next year.

Mr. REID: The hon. member this afternoon wanted every item struck out in the way of repairs to and construction of wharves for the accommodation of the people of Nova Scotia; or, in other words, he was willing that all the items in connection with Nova Scotia be struck out, while he allowed all the items in connection with every other province to pass without a single word of protest.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. We have not yet reached the harbour and river items of the other provinces.

Mr. REID: The hon. member knows that we have passed all the items in the main estimates for the whole Dominion, and during the passing of all the main estimates, the hon. gentleman never raised an objection to an item in any other province, but he now says to this committee: So far as Nova Scotia is concerned, I want every single dollar of expenditure struck out of the estimates, even to the extent of $2,500 to accommodate 400 families in one district. Even though these are estimates for Nova Scotia, and I come from Ontario, I will stand by every item so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. It is not fair for the hon. member to take that position in regard to his own province. The former Minister of Public Works took it for granted that the people were honest in signing this petition; his officials reported that the wharf was required; and I, therefore, feel like standing by this item.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The minister is trying to make a political speech, and that will do no good here or any where else. I will take the responsibility for the decision I took this afternoon. I was quite willing that all these items be struck out this year. I said last evening that three or four pages of estimates of this character might very well be dropped, because I think this is a time when we should restrict our public expenditure as much as possible. Does not the minister agree with that? Now he proposes building a wharf at a place where I doubt very much if it is required, and he gives us as justification a petition. Now a petition never establishes anything. I could go to the minister's own constituency and get a petition addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, signed by hundreds of my hon. friend's own constituents praying that he be removed from office.

Mr. REID: No, it would be the other way.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will guarantee that the petition will be signed, and will send you to the right people.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I remember the days when my hon. friend took up considerable time of the House decrying works of this character in Nova Scotia. I have heard him repeatedly say that there was not a spot left where a wharf could be built. If there was any real necessity for this work being undertaken, the Liberal party, which was in power for fifteen years, would very likely have accomplished it. I am informed that requests for this work have been made to successive Governments by two or three people in the district, but the request was always refused by the department. If that was the policy of the department in the past, I submit that we require something more than a petition to justify this vote. Perhaps the minister will say whether any one else besides Mr. Douglas has requested this.

Mr. REID: The petition was signed by the people in that locality. They are the ones who have requested this work; it is not Mr. Douglas' petition at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood the minister to say that this place was only eight miles from St. Peter's. From St. Peter's to Soldier's cove, from Soldier's cove to Johnston's harbour, and from Johnston's harbour to Irish cove—that is along the southern shore of the Bras d'Or lake—is a very sparsely settled district, and where the minister can get four hundred families in the eight miles between St. Peter's and Soldier's cove to sign this petition, I don't know. He talks about this place being so very remote from a railway. As a matter of fact, there is a railway only eight miles from St. Peter's, and that road connects with the Intercolonial. I represent a county which at its extreme northern end is 110 miles from a railway. Three-fourths of my county is more than forty miles from a railway. But there is no use my talking to the Minister of Railways about that, for he won't do anything for me. Then a little below this place is Johnston's harbour, where the boat we were speaking of calls. There is not the slightest reason for this item at all, except to put $2,500 in the hands of the minister's political friends to spend on timber and sticks, and they will promise to give fellows a day's work when the election comes on; that is all this vote is for. The county of Richmond was represented by Liberals practically for the whole fifteen years Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power, and if there was any necessity for this work being undertaken the wharf would have been built in our time. One was built at Irish cove, and another at Johnston's harbour, and another at St. Peter's. The minister is well aware of conditions in his own part of the country, where there are farms running down to the lakes, and he knows that if there is a public wharf every eight miles or so the people are doing pretty well. It is only eight miles between Johnston's harbour and this place, and another eight miles to the canal, where there is a wharf. There is no justification whatever for the minister pressing this item through, even if we did not have the promise of the late Minister of Public Works that no new undertakings would be entered upon until financial conditions changed, and I feel confident that if that hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) were still in charge of the department he would have kept his word and these new items would not have been put through.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister does not reply, so it is pretty hard to tell what he intends to do about this matter. He has referred to a petition that was sent to him, but has made no reference to the report of the engineer. If there is any doubt as to the facts the minister should be able to find out the truth in the report of the engineer. The minister knows the usual way of dealing with a petition when it comes to the department. It is referred to the district engineer, who examines into the facts and makes a report to the minister, and I venture to say that it very often turns out that the report of the engineer is very different from the statements made in the petition. The minister has not said very much about the report of his engineer on this undertaking. My hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has pointed out that the district is pretty well accommodated already, and that this wharf will be so far away from the people the minister says it is intended to serve that they will use other wharves.

In explaining to the people I represent why the various items for works along the coast were struck out of the estimates, I gave the promise of the late Minister of Public Works that whenever the Government began to construct new works those items that were struck out would be gone on with first. Does the promise of the late Minister of Public Works go for nothing? Is the present Minister of Public Works not going to observe it? If new wharves are to be constructed I want to put in a claim for the wharf that was dropped in my constituency, and which accommodates three villages and a large district along the coast. I urge the minister to restore the item for a wharf at Cole harbour, because from what I know of both localities this work is much more important than the other. I should like a statement from the minister as to whether or not he intends to disregard the pledge that was given the House by the late Minister of Public Works.

Mr. REID: I should like to keep this item in, but in view of the discussion I will take this matter up with my officials and investigate it further. If we pass the item, we should then be prepared to go on with the work, if inquiry justifies it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister let the item stand in the meantime?

Mr. REID: It is only a small item and I think we had better put it through. I don't think my hon. friend should ask me to let it stand. I may have to get a report from the engineer in that locality, and the hon. gentleman knows that, at this late hour of the session, it would be impossible to get the report in time. I will ask the deputy to look into the matter thoroughly. After this discussion, they will not proceed with the work, and I am not going to push it. It is not the desire of the Government to expend any money where it is not really necessary. It might possibly be that they have been wrongly informed. but the discussion has brought the matter very forcibly before the department, and before I undertake the expenditure, I will take the matter up with the engineer and other members of the staff, and go into it thoroughly. I would not like to strike the item out and ascertain later, on investigation, that, in the opinion of the department, it should have been passed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The late Minister of Public Works is sitting behind the hon. gentleman just now, and can speak in regard to the pledge given to the members when other items were struck out. If this item is to be struck out, what are you going to do about the Cole harbour item, which has been dropped?

Mr. REID: The only thing I could do would be to bring down another estimate, but we are not going to present any more estimates, so that I cannot do anything in connection with that item this session. We have brought all the items we intend to submit this session.

Mr. McKENZIE: If we are to abandon the position which the minister helped us to take, when he asked us to hold back and say nothing, as there was a strong reason for not going on with construction. What about the next item?

Sydney river—wharf at Perry Lewis, $3,300.

What are we to say about the Sydney river item, if we let the Soldier's cove item go through?

Mr. REID: The discussion brings the matter to the attention of the department, and if it is found they are not absolutely required the items will stand; but I do not think it is fair to ask us to strike out the items altogether.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We should all be treated alike.

Mr. REID: These repairs are provided for in every constituency.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is wrong in saying that we are criticising the items for repairs. They are absolutely necessary, and I have no fault to find with them. Repairs have been much neglected, but repairs and new items are quite different.

Mr. REID: I was not finding fault with the hon. gentleman in regard to his criticism of items for repairs, but I wish to impress upon him that, so far as repairs and a few little items for new wharves are concerned, these are distributed in the constituencies of members on both sides of the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. minister provides for three new wharves in the same riding. The item for Ben Eoin wharf is dropped. Soldier's cove is another new item, and the wharf on Sydney river is a third item. There may be more. Why should this constituency be singled out from the others? So far as I know, there is nothing else new in the province.

Mr. REID: My hon. friend says these are all in one riding. Sydney river is in Cape Breton county, and Soldier's cove is in Richmond county.

Mr. McKENZIE: For the purpose of the next election, they are in the same constituency.

Mr. REID: I do not know.

Mr. McKENZIE: South Cape Breton and Richmond are the same riding.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are like Leeds and Brockville.

Mr. DUGALD STEWART: Leeds and Brockville are a combination of two constituencies—a double-barreled constituency.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have the same agency presenting these three items. The gentleman who is to be the candidate for South Cape Breton and Richmond is bringing pressure to bear on the department for these new items. It is not fair to the rest of us, and I am sure there should be some place where we can get a decent show from the Government. The older members, such as the hon. member from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) myself, and others, had items in the estimates in 1912, and they went through while this Government was in power, and when they dropped them they gave us the explanation that the revenue had dropped, and later that the war was on, and we were to let the items stand. A new candidate comes in among us, and he gets at least three new items in his riding, for the construction of brand-new works, and our old works are to be dropped and nothing to be done about them. I submit it is absolutely unfair, and not the kind of treatment that should be meted out to gentlemen who are willing to take the hon. minister's word for it, and keep absolutely quiet. I wrote to my constituents, saying that, by reason of the falling off of revenue and other great demands on the treasury of the country, these works could not be proceeded with. Now we have a different condition of things entirely. The minister has no reports from his engineers on this matter, and that is another reason why it should be allowed to stand. It was the custom, when I had anything to do with works of this kind, when petitions were presented and letters forwarded, to send these petitions and letters to the engineer, and he would report, and the decision would depend upon his report. Why was this matter not sent to Mr. Bernasconi for report? But we have nothing but this petition, which is of the most absurd character. It says that people from Grand river have to come over thirty miles to this place for a decent wharf. The same is true in regard to Loch Lomond and other places. It accommodates a few people at Soldier's cove, but accommodates nobody else. I should like to have the minister send that petition to his engineer at North Sydney, and have a report, and if that report is favourable I will not say one word against it; but until he has something tangible I will oppose it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What does the minister say to that proposal?

Mr. REID: I will have the petition sent back again to the engineer. I will get his report as to the necessity of this wharf before we proceed with the work. I shall have the deputy minister take up these three items, and unless, upon investigation, we find them to be urgent we will not proceed with them. No one wants to spend money if it is not necessary. But the former Minister of Public Works had a very strong petition asking for this wharf and I feel I should not be justified in striking the item out at this late stage of the session, when I should not have an opportunity to have it reinstated. Therefore, I will have to ask the committee to allow the item to stand in the Estimates on the understanding that we will make a thorough investigation before proceeding with the work.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Finance has been advertising for people of ordinary means to buy war certificates. Suppose he put an advertisement in a paper in Sydney asking for a number of men and women to buy $100 certificates in order to spend the money on these three new works, do you think he would get eighty applications? It is going to take eighty of these $100 certificates to build these three new works, which the men living in that vicinity say are not needed. The Minister of Finance is asking us to put forth every effort to secure money by the thousands, and down to a hundred and to five and ten dollars. At such a time as this, does the hon. Acting Minister of Public Works think it is fair, in view of the fact that men coming from these constituencies protest that the expenditure is not needed, that the Government should take eighty of these $100 certificates and put them into new work?

Mr. REID: The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture, and other members of this House have been urging the people to produce more.

Mr. GRAHAM: And to save.

Mr. REID: And to save. We have been urging the people to raise more agricultural products. They say: We are producing more, but we require better transportation. Then, having asked them to produce more, shall we refuse to spend $2,500?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is $8,000 for the three items.

Mr. REID: Here is one item with regard to which 400 families represent to us that they have taken the advice of the Minister of Finance and produced more. If they have produced $300,000 more in agricultural products surely we can spend $2,500 to get the products out. All over this country we are extending railway sidings and helping people, when they do produce, to get their products out. With this expenditure of $2,500—

Mr. GRAHAM: Eight thousand dollars for the three items.

Mr. REID: Yes, but the larger expenditure accommodates more families.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is not the amount particularly, although these small amounts combined form a very large sum. The members of this House who are responsible to these people tell the minister that the petition is not well founded and that several of the localities mentioned in the petition are nearer by eight miles to a wharf already constructed than they are to this point. Many of those who, the minister says will be accommodated will have to pass one wharf and some of them two. Some of them will have to leave a wharf on the Atlantic coast and go 25 miles back to the Bras d'Or lakes. Surely a member of Parliament living in the vicinity knows what he is talking about. If I were the minister and a member for the constituency said: "Leave it out," I would leave it out so quickly that it would surprise him. But the fact is that it is a man not in this House who is urging this and you have three new items in one constituency amounting to $8,000 which the men representing that constituency in this House say are not needed. Surely the minister has every reason to strike them out, if it be not that in the political sense they are going to help somebody. In these times we have to drop that kind of thing.

Mr. REID: The hon. member (Mr. Graham) suggests that the members representing the constituency have said that it is not a necessary work. If my memory serves me, the member representing that constituency said that every work provided for in the constituency was an absolute necessity. Even the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) did not say that this was not necessary; he said that these items were necessary. Is it fair for the hon. member (Mr. Graham) to ask me to strike out this item because members in other constituencies say it is not necessary? The hon. member is hardly fair when he says that members residing in the constituency have asked me to strike it out.

Mr. GRAHAM: Here is a member (Mr. McKenzie) who is right adjoining and he knows all about it.

Mr. REID: But that is another constituency. The member representing the constituency said that every item was a necessity.

Mr. McKENZIE: The mill to which they would send the grain is in my constituency and I am sure that I would be willing to draw grist to my own mill. If there was any grain at Johnston's harbour or at Soldier's cove across the lake, that would come out by this wharf, it would have to come to this provincial mill in my constituency and I would be very sorry to say a word against it. There are wharves at Irish cove, Johnston's harbour and St. Peter's, and I will give the minister $5 for every bushel of grain that any one ever sold at any one of these wharves that were built fifteen or twenty years ago. The statement in the petition is absolutely false although the minister may believe it in preference to my word if he likes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is quite clear that the minister is not going to regard the promise made by his predecessor. He is apparently willing to treat it as a "scrap of paper." The main question before the committee is: Are we going to keep faith with the members of this House when a promise of that kind is made?

I have put up with items for my constituency being struck out, on the ground that every dollar was required for other purposes. I submitted to the proposal of the late minister that these matters should lie over, with the distinct understanding that when new construction was undertaken they would have precedence of all other claims. The minister has not dealt with that point. He says this is a small item. But it is not small when you consider the promise made to the House. There is no question that promise was made; the minister does not deny it. If his only reason is that this will help some one politically, that is a very poor reason indeed at a time like this. This Government has the reputation of being very partisan, and they need to do something drastic in order to convince people that they are not thinking all the time about keeping themselves in power, and that they have some regard for the public interest. I put it to the minister that he ought to do this for the reputation of the department and for the reputation of the retiring minister, who gave us that pledge. Is he or is he not going to keep that promise? There are other similar items in the other provinces. The minister said that we had passed one already, but the fact that we passed one without any one noticing it is no reason why we should pass these items. If he can justify these items, there is no reason why he should not build a new wharf in every constituency where a Conservative candidate asks him to do so.

Mr. REID: I do not think I can add anything to what I have said. There is no danger of any more wharfs or other work being proceeded with than are provided for in the estimates. I do not think the ex-minister promised not to go on with any new work, as that would prevent his acting in cases of urgency. Nor do I think it would be fair to strike this out when the member for the constituency has agreed with the late Minister of Public Works and has said that every one of these works is necessary.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is not in Mr. Carroll's constituency now, although it will be for the election for which this vote is intended. If the minister will consult his files he will find that no one asked for this except Mr. Douglas, who is not a member but will be a candidate in this election. Have we the promise of the minister that he will obtain a report from the engineer at North Sydney and submit it to the House before proceeding with this work:

Mr. REID: I shall tell the deputy minister now to write to the engineer instructing him to investigate and see if the work is urgently required, and we will act on the report of the engineer in that district.

South Side (Donald's Head) Cape Sable Island—breakwater extension, $1,800.

Mr. REID: This is asked for by Engineer Lock. It is for an extension 40 feet long, 30 feet wide and 17 feet high to the outer end of the breakwater. It is required to enable coasting steamers to call at all times of tide.

Sydney river—wharf at Perry Lewis, $3,300.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is another stormy petrel, and if the minister gets it through to-night it will be as much as I can promise him. This is in the city of Sydney.

Mr. REID: This is for a wharf at Perry Lewis.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is practically in the city of Sydney. There is a Government wharf in the city of Sydney already. The shore of the harbour is lined with wharves. Why in the name of anything that is sensible are we going to put another Government wharf in the city of Sydney? The thing is most absurd.

9 p.m.

Mr. REID: The report I have says that Assistant Engineer McKeen says that Sydney river is a settlement on the southern arm of Sydney harbour, at the mouth of Sydney river. The site is three miles from the city of Sydney, about 500 feet below Gibbons' bridge. The settlement is the centre of a flourishing district and there are quite a number of summer cottages owned and occupied in summer by Sydney residents. The residents applied for the construction of a wharf so that steamers plying on Sydney harbour might be induced to call for passengers and farm products, etc. Then it would also be used by picnic parties. During the past years steamers carrying parties were compelled to carry a scow or scows and transfer their passengers at high tide.

Mr. McKENZIE: Three miles from Sydney! I hope there is somebody here who knows Sydney. That place is not more than a quarter of a mile from the city limits, if it is not within them. The city runs about two miles along the water front and here we have a representation that this is three miles from Sydney. There is only one solitary merchant in that vicinity and you are going to give him a wharf. The Intercolonial passes right by his door and there is a siding at Gibbons' bridge, 500 feet away. No boats pass this point, as Gibbon's bridge is the end of the harbour. This man Lewis is doing a little business up there, and if the Government build him a wharf they will find that every merchant in the city will want one also. They have just as much right to it as Perry Lewis has.

Mr. REID: The only information I have in regard to the matter is that which has been placed at my disposal by the department. In view of the statement that has been made by the hon. member, we will not proceed with the work unless, after investigating the matter, we find that the work is absolutely necessary. In view of the representations made by the department with respect to the alleged necessity for the wharf, I cannot understand how the conditions can be as the hon. member states.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister is going to make inquiry into the matter, he ought to inquire what steamers are to call at that wharf. The bridge across the river 500 feet further up is the end of navigation on Sydney harbour. The main post road bridge, or Gibbons bridge, and the railway bridge cross there side by side. There is no draw on the railway bridge, and I do not think there is any on Gibbons' bridge. The minister may be under the impression that quite a number of steamers pass up and down there and call at that wharf. If steamers do call, what are they going to call for? For passengers? Where are the passengers to come from? There is only one merchant there; I suppose we are going to build a wharf for him. The Intercolonial passes at his door; there is a small station at the end of Gibbon's bridge, 500 feet away. Moreover, there is a Government wharf in the city. The member for Lunenburg (Mr. D. Stewart) calls out "carried." If items affecting the county of Lunenburg were under consideration, I should have very little to say, but when the hon. member calls "carried" at this time he does not know what he is talking about; he does not know anything about this vote. If he is here as the special agent of John C. Douglas, I can understand why he is parroting the word "carried" every time an argument is advanced from this side of the House.

Mr. D. STEWART: I was not aware that I had opened my mouth, much less said anything. On a previous occasion the hon. member accused me of interrupting him; I can assure him that I was not conscious of having interrupted him to-night. I know very little about this matter. I do know something of the locality affected by this vote, but nothing that would be of any value to the minister or to the committee. I rise merely to correct the assertion of the hon. gentleman that I interrupted him, for I had no intention of doing that.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say that the hon. gentleman was interrupting me; nor did I regard the remark as an interruption. But he is continually crying out "carried" when I am trying to explain to the minister the conditions in my own constituency, with which I am familiar. I do not regard it as courteous for an hon. member who knows nothing about the situation to be continually crying out "carried."

Mr. STEWART: I did not even use the word "carried." I had not opened my mouth to speak—I may have opened my mouth, but not to speak. I was not interfering with the discussion, for the reason, as the hon. gentleman says, that I know very little about the matter under consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has not answered the contention that this place has already sufficient accommodation. He has struck out several items in respect of works on the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia, where there is no accommodation—places situated fifty miles from a railway, where a public wharf would afford the people their only facility for the shipment of fish, the landing of coal, etc. He appears to be willing, at the instance of the Conservative candidate, to build a wharf at a place which is close to a railway station and which has ample accommodation—a place occupied by only one merchant. I should like him to justify that if he can.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman, who lives in the constituency, knows the locality better than I do. Evidently the former Minister of Public Works, when he made out these estimates, considered, in view of the information before him, that this work was necessary. I feel, therefore, that rather than strike this item out we should take the matter up again with the officials at Sydney. If the statements made by the member for North Cape Breton are in accordance with the facts, we shall not go ahead with the wharf. It would be absurd to build a wharf at a place where only one man lives and where there is practically no freight. I have instructed the deputy minister to take this matter up with the engineer down there and to refer him to the statements of the member for that district. Unless he can show that the statements made are not in accordance with the facts, I would not proceed with the work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it correct to say that Mr. John C. Douglas asked for this wharf?

Mr. REID: Mr. John C. Douglas has asked for work in that constituency. But, besides Mr. Douglas, other persons have made application; petitions have come in from other sources.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not care anything about other petitions; who asked for this work?

Mr. REID: Supposing it was Mr. Douglas—

Mr. BUREAU: Who is Mr. Douglas?

Mr. REID: He is a member of the provincial legislature; he represents the constituency in question.

Mr. BUREAU: Is he a Tory?

Mr. REID: He certainly is, so far as I know, but the fact of his being a Tory is no reason why he should not look after the interests of the constituency he represents. He is a member of the local legislature. I think, therefore, he is perfectly justified in asking for anything he thinks is absolutely required. His constituents would no doubt intercede with him in his capacity as their member and endeavour to have their requirements brought before the proper department at Ottawa.

Mr. BUREAU: Is Mr. Douglas a candidate for Parliament?

Mr. REID: He is a member of the local legislature for that constituency and has been for many years.

Mr. ROSS: Is he a candidate for the Federal Parliament?

Mr. REID: I live in Ontario, and I know only the candidates in that province. I cannot say anything as to the candidates in Nova Scotia.

Mr. ROSS: Will the minister consult the sitting member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) in regard to this expenditure?

Mr. REID: I cannot say whom the ex-Minister of Public Works consulted. I am consulting the hon. member for the constituency now and will deal with the matter afterwards.

Mr. ROSS: It is rather late now.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the minister will give us some dimensions in regard to this wharf. What is the length? What will be the depth of water at the outer end, or at the side? Has he procured the site, and how much is the site going to cost?

Mr. REID: It is proposed that this wharf shall be 100 feet in length and 20 feet in width, with an "L" on the eastern side of the outer end. The amount asked for the lot is $300.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister did not answer the question as to the depth of water he will find at the end of those 100 feet.

Mr. REID: The plan shows that there is twelve feet three inches of water at the "L" and sixteen feet nine inches to seventeen feet six inches of water at the outer end.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At low tide?

Mr. REID: The plan does not say whether this is at high tide or at low tide. Does the hon. member know what the rise and fall of tide is there?

Mr. McKENZIE: There would not be very much tide there as it is well up the river. I wish again to point out to the minister that it is rather extraordinary for the Government to start building in Sydney river a wharf 100 feet long in order to get to the centre of the river for some depth of water when there is plenty of accommodation a little further down the river where the real harbour is. A few years ago we had a very interesting lawsuit in Sydney in which it was attempted to be proved that Sydney river was not navigable above Wentworth creek, which is about two miles nearer the harbour than the proposed site of this wharf. We now have the Government going two miles further up the river and building a wharf 100 feet long to reach the channel, as the only depth of water is in the channel of the river where it comes under the bridge. That is a most extraordinary thing to do, and the minister will find, if he will inquire into the matter that everything that I say is correct. In this city there is a very distinguished gentleman who was interested in this lawsuit, who is now chairman of the Pensions Board. I refer to Mr. Ross, who was then living in Sydney, and who will tell the minister, if he chooses to inquire, that Sydney river is not navigable beyond Wentworth creek, where his dwelling was located. I cannot too strongly protest against this expenditure.

New Brunswick—Grand Anse—repairs to breakwater $2,000.

Mr. REID: This amount is to repair the breakwater and complete groyne.

Mr. TURGEON: Is the work to be done at once?

Mr. REID: I have told the deputy minister to proceed with the work at once.

Shippigan—wharf improvements, $2,000.

Mr. REID: This amount is to close pile one or both sides of nine 25 ft. blocks of the approach of the Shippigan public wharf and the outside of the ferry landing to enable additional berths to be provided by dredging. For some time complaints have been received as to the lack of room at this wharf. The Gloucester Navigation Company's steamer, making two trips daily, has often difficulty in discharging freight and passengers for this reason, and when the fishing fleets come in to unload their catch or take in supplies every week or fortnight, the wharf is crowded. More shipping would use the wharf if there were room.

St. John harbour—extension of and repairs to Negro Point breakwater, $250,000.

Mr. REID: This amount is required towards the construction of an extension and repairs to the breakwater at Negro Point. The probable cost of the work is as follows: Negro Point—Extension of breakwater, $400,000; Negro Point—General repairs to breakwater, $15,000; total $415,000. Tenders for this work are now in. District engineer Goodspeed submitted a report estimating the cost of the proposed extension at $920,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Perhaps the minister will give some reason for launching on such an expenditure as this under present conditions. The harbour of St. John has been in existence for a great many years, 150, I suppose, and has been doing a lot of good work. Why is it necessary to start out on an expenditure of nearly $1,000,000, one quarter of which is to be called for now? The minister states that tenders have been called for; they have been advertised in the newspapers, and I presume they are now in the department. I know the faithful in St. John who always get their hands in the public till have been very busy during the last few weeks figuring on these tenders, asking certain people to tender, and keeping other people from tendering. We have had some revelations in New Brunswick recently as to how they keep people from tendering on public works down there, and drive everybody out except those who are wanted to get the contract. I imagine the same thing is happening this time, because I have heard something of what has been going on in St. John during the past couple of weeks. Why is it necessary, with the enormous financial problems Canada has to face at the present time, to start on an expenditure of this kind at St. John?

Mr. REID: This is a protection for the new wharves that have been built at St. John. It is claimed that this protection is an urgent necessity on account of the flow of water around the new wharves. The Secretary of the St. John Board of Trade writes as follows under date March 31:

> The experiences of the past winter have so strongly emphasized the necessity for the extension of the Negrotown breakwater to Partridge Island that the council of the St. John Board of Trade has directed me to ask you whether it is the intention of your department to proceed with this work during the coming spring and summer, so that it may be ready for next winter. Not only are the new government piers endangered by the undertow which sweeps through the west channel at times, but shipping at these and other piers has been imperilled and in some instances damage has resulted.

The extension to the breakwater has been asked for by H. B. Schofield, harbour commissioner of St. John, in a letter dated July 31, 1912. Tenders for this work were only received last Monday.

Mr. CARVELL: And the gentleman who is here hopes to get the job.

Mr. REID: Well he did not get it if it is a St. John man you mean.

Mr. CARVELL: He is.

Mr. REID: They tell me an Ontario firm is likely to get it, they are the lowest tenderer, we will put it that way.

Mr. CARVELL: There is some comfort in that statement. I am very glad indeed that the gang in St. John, who have been manipulating the thing for the last three or four years, won't get their fingers in the pie this time. But while it may be an Ontario firm by name, I think you will find the patronage committee in St. John will be in it just the same. You cannot eliminate them as long as this Government continues to be run as it is. But that is not the point I am making. There is no doubt that under certain conditions it might be an advantage to have the breakwater extended; I believe it would be. But all this talk about the new wharves being undermined is simply nonsense. The new wharves are I should say about half a mile up the harbour from the point under discussion. Partridge island is out at the mouth of the harbour, and there has been a breakwater extending towards Partridge island for a great many years to keep the water from going up to the wharves. If my hon. friend has a plan, he will see that it is a long way from those wharves down to the breakwater, and much farther down to Partridge island. No doubt some silt may be drifting into the channel, and if that passage were closed up it might be of benefit to the channel. But why should the minister expend this enormous amount just now when an election is coming on? Down in New Brunswick whenever an election is coming on friends of my hon. friend always get busy. Let me give him a little illustration. An election was brought on last February and a contract was made to build a railroad. The contractors had a valid contract and agreed to build the road on certain plans and at certain schedule prices, but no tenders were called for, and no notice of the work was given. Four days after the House was dissolved in February a new agreement was promptly executed with the same contractors, by which the price of a small branch line twenty-five miles long was boosted by $76,000. The day after the contract was signed, the contractor paid $20,000 over to a gentleman named Tennant, a director of the St. John Standard and a member of the patronage committee. Two days after that Tennant cashed the cheque, and paid $20,000 to Mr. Thomas Bell, another member of the patronage committee, and a director of the St. John Standard, just a little ring that manipulates things in St. John——

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Standard Railway?

Mr. CARVELL: No, the Standard newspaper, the organ of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). Another election is coming on, and these same gentlemen are showing the necessity of some public work, in order to get funds. They were very open about it, and paid the money over to the patronage committee, and distributed it around. Knowing as I do what is going on in St. John, and in New Brunswick generally, and knowing the barefaced way in which they take money voted for public purposes, I cannot view this vote with anything but suspicion, based upon almost actual knowledge that an election was coming on. I do not know what the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) may say, and do not care very much, nor do I care what the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries may say, but I protest against this Government entering into a quarter million dollars expenditure for election purposes in St. John under these conditions. No man need tell me it is a prime necessity to have the breakwater extended. I admit that the extension would improve the harbour of St. John. In time it should be extended. The present channel between the breakwater and Partridge island should be filled in, and it would be a great benefit to shipping; but they can handle the shipping there just as well next year as they have done for the past five years, and last year there was more tonnage out of St. John, by twenty-five or fifty per cent, than ever handled before. They are supposed to have one or two berths in commission this year that were not in commission last year. There is no doubt they require all the berths they have got, and probably more, and if my hon. friend were building wharves, I would not say anything about it, because, under present conditions, with the enormous amount of traffic going from this country across the water, and with the necessity of making the harbour of St. John as convenient as possible, and rendering all the necessary aid to the exportation of our products, and it being the terminus of the Canadian Pacific railway on the Atlantic coast, it is all right to build wharves. But when they commence to talk about the breakwater, which has been discussed since I was a boy—I can hardly remember a time when they did not talk about extending Negro Head breakwater—it looks to me so much like election campaign matter that I cannot help voting against it. The minister should consider carefully before rushing the country into an expenditure of a million dollars—it may be two million dollars; they admit a quarter of a million for a starter. I protest against it, and I believe the vote should be dropped.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before deciding the motion of my hon. friend and before passing the vote, it would be only right that some information should be given. There is no doubt that for many years there has been an urgent demand from some quarters for the extension to Partridge island. When I was minister I had plans prepared, after consultation with those acquainted with the harbour which included two things—building the breakwater from Partridge island eastward, and filling up the gaps between the present breakwater and Partridge island. There was quite a difference of opinion at that time as to whether it was desirable to extend the breakwater or not, because the space between the breakwater and the island was used quite largely by small vessels coming into the harbour, and there was also the objection that if the breakwater were extended, and that channel filled in, the result might be to cause a current from the harbour directly outward to the Bay of Fundy; but I think, upon the whole, the people who are best qualified to judge are of the opinion that it would be desirable that the breakwater should be extended and this gap filled in. My own judgment is that the work of building the breakwater from the island is equally important, if not more important, and of course would cost very much less than I understand this work is going to cost. But there is nothing that I can say which would induce the minister to make provision for the immediate construction of the breakwater from the island eastward. The vote could not be changed to accomplish that, and, therefore, the question is, whether or not it is desirable to go on with the work. There is no doubt the condition of affairs in the harbour of St. John has been greatly changed by the dredging out of a very large area on the western side of the harbour, and I believe it is true that in times of storm there is considerable danger to shipping on the west side which it is thought would be obviated if the gaps were filled in. Would the minister tell me what is the difference between the estimated cost at the present time, certain changes having been made, and the cost under the previous plan? Plans were called for some time ago, and I believe the minister at the time was of the opinion that the cost was too great, and a change was made in the plans which, it was supposed, would greatly reduce the cost. I am rather surprised to find that the cost is going to run as high as $900,000. I was of the opinion that, with the changed conditions, it would not exceed $500,000. Having called for tenders, before asking for the vote would it not be reasonable that the minister should lay on the Table the tenders received, so that the committee would act with a full knowledge of what is being done? If the amount is going to run into a million dollars, I would not be disposed to urge the passing of this vote, but I rather think a smaller amount could be better expended by building a breakwater from Partridge island eastward, which would protect the buoys on the western side of the harbour from eastern storms. Many people who are quite familiar with the harbour of St. John are of the opinion that the breakwater ought to be first constructed. A good deal would depend on the relative cost of the two works.

Mr. REID: I have before me the estimates the engineer in charge of the work at St. John gave to the minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What was the lowest tender for the work previously?

Mr. REID: I was going to say that this estimate that he gave was $400,000 for the extension of the breakwater, and general repairs to breakwater, $15,000, or $415,000, of which he wants $250,000 this year. Coming to the tenders that were called for—I suppose it is this same work—on October 7, 1914—

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was the time.

Mr. REID: There were two tenders then. The tender of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, the lowest, was $769,860.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was thought to be entirely too high, and it was supposed that after the change in the plans the work could be done at much less cost.

Mr. REID: There were two tenders, the other tender being that of S. Pearson, Son & Partners, Limited (Canada), the amount being $1,233,720. The Board of Trade of St. John have been pressing for this construction. These tenders were received on Monday. They have not been laid before me in order that I might examine them. There are quite a number of tenders, but I have not seen them. The deputy minister has given me a little information.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the amount of the lowest one?

Mr. REID: I do not think it is fair to give out the amounts of the tenders when I have not seen them or submitted them to Council. The lowest tender is very much in excess of the lowest tender of 1914.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Very much higher?

Mr. REID: The lowest is over $700,000. In view of the statements that have been made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to-night, I would ask that the item stand, so that I may have an opportunity of looking over the tenders and coming to some decision as to what action the department will take. The very fact that the engineer reported $400,000 and that we have got tenders at almost twice as much, is certainly one that calls for some consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it would be well to allow the item to stand. Every large amount that is voted for any community is naturally charged up against that community in asking for other appropriations. I think it is very desirable, particularly at this time, when money is scarce, that any constituency should have the most effective work done with the appropriation that is made. I think that the minister ought to look into the matter, see what the tenders are, and then bring it to the attention of the committee.

Mr. REID: Yes, I will give the committee full information and I will bring the item up when both these hon. gentlemen are present.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that under the new plan a large amount of stone is to be used and it is proposed to get that stone on Partridge island, where officials of the department were making borings. Partridge island, I understand, is owned by the city of St. John, and I suppose the city has agreed to allow the stone to be quarried there. I understand that the stone is to be cut upon the island, carried by an overhead apparatus and dropped into place in the harbour. If that is so, one would suppose that it would cost very much less than under the previous plan, and, therefore, I am greatly surprised to learn that the previous tender is exceeded by $750,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Do the present plans call for the complete filling up of the channel between the lower end of the present breakwater and Partridge island?

Mr. REID: I am informed by the deputy minister that they do call for the complete filling up of the channel.

Mr. CARVELL: So that the opening from the Bay of Fundy into the harbour will be completely filled up?

Mr. REID: Absolutely.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not an engineer and I have never gone over the ground particularly, but it would seem to me that under ordinary conditions that would be a benefit to the harbour. What I am protesting against is embarking on a work of this kind under present conditions when it has been mooted for years and years. I can hardly remember when they did not talk of filling that channel so as to prevent the silt filling up the dredged area. I notice that my hon. friend referred to the fact that the Maritime Dredging company had tendered on this work.

Mr. REID: That was in 1914.

Mr. CARVELL: I do hope the Maritime Dredging company will not have any hand in this. If the minister does not know about the Maritime Dredging company, I might explain that it took a big part in the elections of 1911. In the Public Accounts Committee we spent three weeks talking about the Maritime Dredging company and its enormous profits. About ten days after the election I was in St. John and I saw all this crowd that had been running things go into a room in the Royal hotel and they simply took over the Maritime Dredging company and changed it from a Liberal organization to a Tory organization. Of all the raw deals that this Government has been the victim of since 1911, none could exceed the deals that have been put over by the Maritime Dredging company. There is nothing that they have not had a hand in around the city of St. John. They bought out the plant and contracts of the old Maritime Dredging company. The Conservative members of this House, and even my hon. friend the present minister, went around talking themselves red in the face before the elections about the iniquitous prices that were paid to the Maritime Dredging company, but when the new organization took charge they went right on and paid the same prices and extended their contracts; no tenders called for. There was nothing going on in St. John that they did not take a hand in for the purpose of making money. They even built wharves. And such a mess as they made of it! They had a contract to build a line of wharves and they built berth No. 17. They built a concrete wharf in the harbour of St. John. You could stand at one end and look down the line, 700 or 800 feet long, and it looked just like the waves of the sea, going three or four feet in and out. It was all level at the start, but it had no foundation and it went up and down. I was down there about a year ago and I went out on the wharf. They were taking hundreds of thousands of yards of spoil from Courtenay bay, for the dredging of which certain people had been paid a large price, and they were dumping this spoil in the middle of the wharf. When they got a certain amount of spoil in the middle of the wharf the walls began to bulge out. Then they put some hawsers across, reminding me of the way in which a farmer fastens his sled stakes with hay wire. But the "hay wire" did not hold. Yet they paid the Maritime Dredging company for putting this stuff in. If there is anything that is vicious in connection with the Public Works Department it is its connection with the Maritime Dredging company and with this whole St. John business. There never were any wharves needed worse in the whole British Empire during the last two or three years than these wharves have been. Hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars have been spent in order that this crowd in St. John might make money, and any man who knows anything about the record of this company gets a little suspicious about any further work being done in the harbour of St. John. If the minister ever decides to let this work, I suggest to him that no St. John men be connected with it, especially the St. John men who were up here in the last eight or ten days. I saw them here and I know who they are. They are the men who were in the Valley railway contracts, they are the men who handle the money, and it naturally makes one suspicious.

However, if the item is to be allowed to stand, I think I have said enough to point out to the Minister, who is new on the job, some of the pitfalls standing in his way. I have tried to put him in a position where he will be protected from his friends, and the Lord knows that if ever a man needed protection, the present minister does when dealing with certain friends in St. John.

Mr. REID: We will let the matter stand. At all events, there are not any St. John firms or men who are the lowest tenderers.

Mr. CARVELL: You want to watch very carefully.

Mr. REID: We do not want to go into a million dollar expenditure which is not necessary.

Mr. CARVELL: We thought there were no St. John men in these Valley railway contracts, but they were there. They know all the tricks of the trade. There is nothing in the way of getting inside of contracts that they do not know all about.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has been a little too broad in his remarks upon St. John men. I can assure you and the committee that we have in the city of St. John men who are as good contractors, as honourable contractors, as can be found anywhere. My hon. friend refers to the attacks made upon the old St. John Dredging company by reason of high prices. I think that when the contract was taken over it was generally recognized that the prices which the previous Government was paying were fair and reasonable. I think they were prices that everyone familiar with dredging in such a place as St. John, where the tides are very high and the difficulties considerable, regarded as fair and not too high. There is no question that the work done in connection with the wharves is justly deserving of the criticism which the hon. member for Carleton has levelled against it. There is a strong feeling in St. John that the work of building the wharves was badly done, and a great many people think that the fact of the minister having allowed dredge material to be dumped into the crib work, instead of insisting upon the cribs being filled with stone—as I think, the contract called for—was a great mistake and no doubt had a great deal to do with the subsidence or bulging of one at least of the wharves on the western side of the harbour. I trust that the minister will not for a moment hesitate to go on with his work simply because it may be undertaken by St. John contractors. All we ask is that the contract, if given, should be given to the lowest tenderer, provided he is a responsible man and puts up the necessary security. I certainly hope that the cost will not be as large as the minister intimates. I hope also that when the vote comes up again the minister will inform us of the names of the tenderers. The committee would be entitled to that, because ordinarily, when a vote is asked, the names of the tenderers are brought down. I do not suppose the minister would bring them down until he had decided whose tender was the lowest and who was entitled to the contract.

Mr. REID: I am glad the hon. member was here when the hon. member for Carleton made his remarks about St. John, because I think the censure was more on the previous Government than on this Government.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. REID: The hon. member states that the Maritime Dredging company was in existence during the term of the previous Government, and that when this Government came in the Conservatives simply took over the Maritime Dredging company.

Mr. CARVELL: Took their place, yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They simply bought them out and formed a new company.

Mr. CARVELL: They called it the Maritime Dredging company.

Mr. REID: What the member said was that this Government simply continued extending the contracts made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) when he was Minister of Public Works.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as dredging is concerned.

Mr. REID: And these men had the contracts and were subscribing to political campaigns. The contract was made, as I understand, after tenders were called, legally called, by the member for St. John when Minister of Public Works, and this Government simply extended the contracts at the prices under the tenders called for by the hon. member for St. John. Where we have got into difficulties is by carrying out the contracts made by the member for St. John when Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, no, that is not the charge. The charge is that the Maritime Dredging company extended their activities and went into all kinds of contracts outside of dredging.

Mr. REID: I understood the member to say that he blamed this Government for extending the contracts made by the hon. member while Minister of Public Works. Again we got into trouble in this way. It is complained by the member for Carleton that this work has not been done properly, that is that the contractors have built it in such a way——

Mr. CARVELL: In 1911 the Maritime Dredging company simply had a contract for dredging certain areas in the harbour of St. John, and that was the extent of their operations. When the reorganized Maritime Dredging company came into existence, they not only carried out that contract—the Minister of Public Works extended their contract without tender—but that would not have been so bad if they had not gone into wharf building. They went into all sorts of things.

Mr. REID: I suppose they were the lowest tenderers.

Mr. CARVELL: There were no tenders about it. The Government simply kicked Mike Connelly out and put them in. They put them in on a contract basis in some things, but mostly under the system of cost plus percentage. I should like to know how much they paid the Maritime Dredging company for putting the spoil in the wharf. They got paid first for the dredging, and under the dredging contract they were compelled to carry the dredge material two miles out to sea and dump it. But instead of taking it two miles out to sea, they were paid another enormous price for dumping it in these wharves, and then, when the thing commenced to spread, the Government had to turn around and pay another big price to have it taken out and have the wharf filled with proper filling. It would be interesting to know how much the Government paid the Maritime Dredging company for dredging, for dumping the spoil in the wharves, and then for taking it out again.

Mr. REID: Perhaps that is too big a matter to take up to-night.

Mr. CARVELL: I am pointing out the class of people he has to deal with in St. John and cautioning him to be very careful.

Mr. REID: We will watch them this time.

Item stands.

St. John harbour—Partridge island—rebuilding extension to low-water landing, $1,400.

Mr. REID: This is required towards the construction of a cribwork wharf filled with ballast, 224 feet long on the centre line on top and 30 feet wide on top, the basin to be dredged 12 feet below low water. The proposed wharf is to permit of landing at both high and low water. The wharf at which boats now land in low water is in exceedingly bad conditions. There is no wharf at which boats can land at low water except a small block 16 feet square. This work was asked for by Dr. Montizambert.

Quebec — Cap Chat river — improvements, $5,000.

Mr. REID: This is for the construction of a dam and the making of an excavation as a means of diverting the river back into its former channel, which it is leaving through erosion caused by the swift current of the river.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What interest is served by this proposed work?

Mr. REID: The report of the engineer is as follows:

The Public Works Department of Ottawa have constructed, extended and repaired a training pier some 750 feet long with approaches which has proved very useful and will make, when completed, at the actual outlet of the Cap Chat river one of the best and safest harbours of the coast. The provincial Government have built twice over at the outlet of the Cap Chat river a bridge over 1,000 feet long which has proved very expensive but indispensable. To-day the river, in its very erratic course, if not stopped in time, is going to prove useless the works of both Governments and to stop for an indefinite time the progress and economic development of Cap Chat and the whole neighbouring district. Both one mile above and nearly one mile below the Richardson spool wood establishment, the soft alluvial soil with under strata of sand and gravel over soft clay has been badly eaten away by the river which has left its first straight course two miles above the outlet to cut away the roadway westward and the steep hill where the roadway had to be removed some 125 and up to 200 feet above the river level, and still keeps eating away.

One mile below the Richardson Company dam the river has travelled east and northeastward and with such rapidity lately that the first heavy freshet might cut away altogether the eleven hundred feet of light soil that now separates the river from the sea and thereby leaves altogether its old channel for a new one that will carry away the best part of four neighbouring farms and affect half a dozen land owners, making useless all the works done by both Federal and Provincial Governments at the actual outlet of the Cap Chat river. Something should be done without delay and, if in any way possible, before the next freshet that, on account of the altitude of the head of the river, generally happens in June.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The facts are as represented by the minister. The current of the river at its mouth is very swift, and a large part of the land has been eaten up. If these works were not carried out, a very serious condition would result. I myself sent a petition to the department in respect to that work.

Cape Cove—repairs to pier—further amount required, $500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This wharf is much needed for the fishermen, but the principal wharf in that district is at Percé. The Percé wharf has been broken by the sea, and it has not been repaired. Will the minister do something next year with that wharf?

Mr. REID: We will have to take it up next year. It will cost about $45,000 to do the work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The wharf is a very useful one; it cost the department nearly $100,000.

Chicoutimi—repairs to wharf, $2,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope my hon. friend will not overlook the importance of performing certain work at Ha-Ha bay, near Chicoutimi. A big chemical pulp plant is being put up at that point by London interests. Lately they have started the construction of a large building. They are constructing also a wharf at their own expense to be used for the shipping of their products. Some dredging, however, is needed around the wharf. Last year a dredge was sent to that place but it was not suited to the work and had to leave somewhat early. I hope that this year a suitable dredge will be sent so that the work may be properly carried out.

Mr. REID: I know the place quite well. The dredge was there this spring, but the company had not proceeded with the wharf at the time, and the dredge was taken away. The department will renew the dredging and go ahead with the work when the company is ready.

Laprairie—repairs to wharf and completion of approach, $4,000.

Mr. LANCTOT: Is that the wharf at the town of Laprairie or at Côte St. Catherine?

Mr. REID: This wharf is the public structure at Laprairie and should be completed to facilitate the freight and passenger traffic from Laprairie to Montreal and other points.

Mr. LANCTOT: Is the minister aware that we have had no boat there for the last seven years, and that there is no probability of our having a boat for another twenty years, if not for a century to come? This is not the time for spending money on that wharf, and I cannot understand why the Government should ask the people of this country to spend $4,000 more on it. I move that the item be struck out.

Mr. REID: These repairs are asked for by the district engineer. Does the hon. member say that no boat has been coming to this wharf in seven years?

Mr. LANCTOT: Yes.

Mr. REID: Then we shall let the item stand until I can get further information.

Mr. LANCTOT: Is work going on at the protection wall or dyke at Laprairie?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. REID: I am not very familiar with the work to which the hon. member refers. I understand they are rebuilding the dyke along the roadway. Is that what the hon. member refers to?

Mr. LANCTOT: Yes.

Mr. REID: So far as I can remember, that work was let to one contractor who failed. We advertised again for tenders, and the Carleton Construction company of Ottawa took over the work. They failed, and we are now having the work done by Quinlan & Robertson. That is the firm who were recommended to proceed with this work and complete it at once.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they at work now?

Mr. REID: They are going to work at once. Both ends of the road have been completed, but the contractors have not proceeded with this part, and they are going to proceed with it at once. We are confiscating the $8,000 deposited by the Carleton Construction company, and we are going to have the work done by force account.

Mr. LANCTOT: This work is more urgent than the repairs to the wharf at Laprairie

Mr. REID: I am letting the item for the repairs to the Laprairie wharf stand until I can get further particulars.

Three Rivers—repairs to wharf, $9,500.

Mr. BUREAU: What wharf is to be repaired and what repairs are to be made?

Mr. REID: This revote of $9,500 is asked for by District Engineer Tourigny to complete repairs to the coal wharf at Three Rivers. He reported, on April 13, 1917, that he did not apply for the insertion of this item in the main estimates because of the policy of strict economy decided on in the Public Works Department and because there was, at that time, no immediate necessity for the execution of the work. Since then, however, a new washout has occurred, which imperils the stability of the wharf and is very prejudicial to the coal business. He, therefore, urges that the amount requested be inserted in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. BUREAU: Have plans been submitted of the work to be done? This is the wharf that was constructed by Collings & Giroux.

Mr. REID: I have the plan here.

Mr. BUREAU: An additional amount was voted to complete the work, and it seems to be in perfect shape now. It was filled up with quicksand. That was washed out and it was refilled, branches, dirt and sand being put on the top. I do not see where the work is now required. They have been putting stone on the end of the wharf that faces the current and that meets the ice jams in the spring.

Mr. REID: We will let this item stand until I can get further particulars.

Verchères—partial reconstruction of wharf, $4,700.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The department knows that there are two wharves, both of which have been broken by the ice. Which one is to be repaired?

Mr. REID: The memorandum does not say what wharf it is. I can show the hon. member the plan. There is a stone approach from the lighthouse. Does the hon. member say that the repairs to this wharf are not required?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: No, the wharf should be repaired.

Ontario—Bruce Mines—dredging, $21,000.

Mr. REID: This amount is required for the dredging of a basin in front of the Bruce Mines Trap Rock Company's wharf, to permit vessels to use the wharf, which, under existing conditions it is very difficult to do. The estimated cost is as follows: 6,500 cubic yards, class A, at $3, $19,500; 5,000 cubic yards, class B, at 30 cents, $1,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do other vessels stop there, besides the Bruce Mines vessels? The hon. gentleman referred to a certain company's wharf?

Mr. REID: The work is in front of the company's wharf, and all vessels stop at this wharf, so the deputy minister tells me.

Mr. GRAHAM: Who has the contract?

Mr. REID: It is not under contract yet.

Burlington channel—In full and final settlement of all claims of D. G. Stewart in connection with his contract for construction of revetment wall, $10,441.

Mr. GRAHAM: When was that contract completed?

Mr. REID: This amount is required to pay Mr. D. G. Stewart in full of claims in connection with the construction of a revetment wall at Burlington, as authorized by Order in Council of 15th May, 1917. On August 3rd, 1915, while the work was in progress, an unusually violent storm occurred, the gale reaching a velocity of 48 miles an hour. Extensive damage was done to the revetment wall. The contractor filed a claim with the Department of Public Works to be paid the sum of $18,377.43, in addition to what was paid to him under the contract. The chief engineer gives each item in this memorandum. This claim may be summarized as follows:

1. Making good damage done by the storm of August 3, 1915. This amount includes $1,064.21 for injuries to a derrick and scow...	$14,778.18
2. Change in location of cross cribs at openings, and concrete work..	1,326.25
3. Additional cost for placing talus stone in the year 1916, 2,273 cubic yards at $1 a cubic yard...	2,273.00

The auditor of the Chief Engineer's branch, after a careful examination of the contractors' books, pay-sheets, accounts, etc., covering repairs made to the damaged portion of the work, found that the total cost to the contractor for making good the damage caused by the storm amounts to $9,896.16.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would not the terms of the contract made originally include everything of that kind? When the contractor tendered for this work, did he not, as a matter of fact, take all the chances himself as to what condition should arise? It is customary where work is being done in a dangerous place for a price to be fixed accordingly, and the contractor takes all the risks of what may ensue.

Mr. REID: This was a most violent storm. The deputy tells me that where a contractor has met with a very heavy loss on account of serious storms, such as sometimes occur, the department have not taken advantage of the terms of the contract, and after they have gone into the matter thoroughly, they have paid claims of this kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: If, for example, down on the Atlantic coast, the Railway Department would do this, it would be in trouble all the time, because the work at times is very difficult on account of the storms that may arise. Contractors invariably figure on the situation, and the conditions that are likely to arise, when they make their tender. I understand a man could put in a lower tender if he did not take into account this kind of thing, if he were sure the department would come to his rescue in case a storm destroyed his plant. I think a claim of that nature has been standing for many years in the Department of Railways and Canals, in reference to something that occurred along the coast of one of the Great Lakes, but the department contended that the contractor had taken all the risk himself, and tha other contractors had tendered higher, but that he had received it on account of his lower tender, and that when he came to add the amount of his damage to the amount of his tender, his tender would be really higher than the tender which had been rejected.

Mr. REID: The deputy tells me it was an exceptional thing. Mr. D. G. Stewart, of Ottawa, was the contractor, and I understand that where a storm of very unusual violence destroys the contractor's work and causes an enormous amount of damage, so that the contractor does not make anything out of his contract, the department have paid. And so they have decided to pay this claim.

Collingwood — harbour improvements — (revote, $72,000), $75,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that a continuation of the work?

Mr. REID: The district engineer recommends the following improvements:

(a) The construction of a wharf 800 x 55, having cribwork substructure and concrete superstructure, and the dredging of a slip and turning basin at Beech street, estimated cost $196,016.86.

(b) The reconstruction in concrete of the superstructure of the west breakwater, 700 x 22, and of the east breakwater, 1,815 x 24, $200,615.

It is estimated we would spend about $72,000 of that this year. This work has not been commenced.

Mr. PARDEE: It was voted last year, and why was it not commenced?

Mr. CURRIE: It was voted for an elevator.

Mr. PARDEE: Why did they not spend it last year?

Mr. REID: Because they had not started the elevator.

Port Dover—repairs to piers—revote, $6,000.

Mr. PARDEE: Why were those piers not fixed last year?

Mr. REID: In a memorandum dated 6th June, 1917, the chief engineer states that the cost of the necessary repairs will be from $2,500 to $6,000, and that the exact amount cannot be estimated until such time as the repairs are actually commenced. Acting district engineer Stevens in a report dated May 5th, 1917, states as follows:

[Mr. Graham.]

The entrance piers to Port Dover are in a very dilapidated condition. If these piers are not to be rebuilt during the present fiscal year, it will be necessary to provide money for patching and renewing portions of the superstructure of both the east and west piers.

Port Hope—harbour improvements, $13,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the explanation of that item?

Mr. REID: It is for the renewal of 100 lineal feet of the revetment wall on the west side of the harbour in front of the Brandon Shell Company's factory at $55 per foot, $5,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has this repair anything to do with that shell factory?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: The company has gone out of business. I understand the ferry which carries coal across the lake lands at Cobourg, and not at Port Hope.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some person told me that the ferry landed at Cobourg rather than at Port Hope, on account of the inefficiency of the harbour and poor landing at Port Hope.

Mr. REID: The Grand Trunk have their own landing at Cobourg. They have been there for years, and they never really started at Port Hope. Port Hope people were fighting for the traffic but they did not get it.

Manitoba—Little Pembina river—diversion into Pelican lake, $12,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the explanation?

Mr. REID: This amount is asked for by Acting District Engineer Taylor for the construction of a small diversion dam in the Little Pembina river and the excavation of a channel with stop-log control from the Pembina river to Pelican lake, a distance of 4,500 feet.

Selkirk — shipyard, including arrears of rental and interest thereon, $7,200.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the explanation?

Mr. REID: This amount of $7,200 is required to pay for the purchase of land which is being used as a ship yard by this department at Selkirk and is made up as follows:

Purchase of land from Mr. T. A. Burrows as per Order in Council of June 21, 1909, $5,000; rental for same: 12 yearly instalments of $140 with interest at 5 per cent (simple), $2,142—$7,142.

Mr. CARVELL: What kind of boats do they build there?

Mr. REID: This is where we lay up our dredge.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the minister pretend to tell us that the department let the rental run for twelve years and now proposes to pay interest on it?

Mr. REID: This land was purchased by Order in Council in 1909. Mr. Burrows could not give title and that is the reason why payment is delayed. They had to pay him rent until he gave title. If they had paid for the cost of the land there would not have been interest upon it. The amount of $2,142 is less than the interest would have been on the money for that time.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why could not the rent have been paid every year?

Mr. REID: They were waiting for the title.

Mr. GRAHAM: They did not need any title to pay the rent.

Mr. REID: No, but they purchased the land and instead of settling for the interest they gave him a rental.

Mr. GRAHAM: They did not give it to him; they promised it.

Mr. REID: He was entitled to the money by that Order in Council 1909.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am pointing out the slipshod way of doing business.

Mr. REID: The deputy minister tells me it was Mr. Burrows' fault. He could not produce the title until this time. Instead of paying interest they paid him a rental.

British Columbia—Fraser river—dredging in North Arm, $100,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a big item.

Mr. REID: This dredging will be 150 feet wide, carrying a depth of 10 feet at low water from the end of the present channel at Iona island to the city of New Westminster. The work is asked for in a resolution passed at a joint meeting of the South Vancouver Board of Trade and Municipal Council on April 16, 1917, and in a letter, dated May 9, 1917, from the corporation of the district of Burnaby. The object of this dredging is to give a channel 10 feet deep at low tide from Iona island to the east boundary of Burnaby to serve the industries that are situated on the north arm of the Fraser river.

Mr. CARVELL: In what way is this different from the item in connection with St. John harbour that was held up a while ago? No doubt, in ordinary times it might be of some benefit to industry in that province, but it does seem to be an inopportune time to spend nearly a quarter of a million dollars on dredging in the north arm. There is also the next item on "improvements and repairs." I do not know anything about the location and therefore I cannot discuss it intelligently, but it is going into a pretty big expenditure and it seems to be a new work. Unless there is some explanation this item should stand.

Mr. REID: It is a new work. New Westminster is growing very fast and it appears this work is necessary. However, the item is large and perhaps I had better let it stand until I get further information.

Mr. TAYLOR: This is not a new work. This is a continuation of a work commenced about four years ago and which was finished about three months ago. One contract was let for the larger part of the dredging necessary the channel being part of the entrance to the north arm. This is for a continuation of the large contract amounting to $850,000 and running up towards the city of New Westminster. The urgency which caused the board of trade and council of the two municipalities concerned to pass the resolutions referred to arose from the letting of a contract for the building of ships for the Imperial Munitions Board to a yard in South Vancouver. They realized that when they launched these ships they would not be sure of being able to float them unless the dredging under contemplation by the department were proceeded with. That is the reason why these two bodies acted together and urged on the Government the continuation of the work that has been going on for three years past.

Mr. CARVELL: Do I understand the hon. member to say that they are building ships at Vancouver, and that they require dredging at New Westminster, 14 or 15 miles away, to enable them to launch those ships?

Mr. TAYLOR: It is not at New Westminster. The location of the shipyard is at South Vancouver, four miles from the end of the present dredging, and about ten miles below New Westminster.

Mr. CARVELL: Why all this dredging if it is below the city of New Westminster?

Mr. TAYLOR: There are two channels in the Fraser river between the mouth and New Westminster. The dredging of the north arm was undertaken a few years ago because that is the channel most commonly used by the traffic between the west coast of British Columbia and Fraser river points, the distance through the north arm being from 8 to 12 miles, according to the draught of the vessel, shorter than through the main channel into the Fraser river. Another reason is that the main river is so much exposed to storms that very serious loss occurs in the towing of booms of logs that are used in the mills on the Fraser river. Besides the reasons connected with the towing of logs, the district along the north arm of the Fraser is regarded as the main industrial location for what is known as Greater Vancouver, being away from the congestion of Vancouver city and offering very unusual facilities for industrial enterprises of all kinds. They already have two lines of railway along the shore line there but for the want of proper connection at all stages of the tide there has been great reluctance to locate industrial establishments there unless the owners of these establishments were assured of the dredging. The city of New Westminster, about fourteen years ago, obtained the services of the eminent engineer, Le Baron, who made very complete plans showing how the river might be developed. It is on these Le Baron plans that this Government plan has been prepared. As a matter of fact, the work was promised by the late Government but only put into effect since the last general election. It is part of a well designed and well considered plan made by Engineer Le Baron so long ago as 1904, and has been part of the fixed policy of the two Governments from that time until the present.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend's explanation does not sound as well in Parliament as, perhaps, it would in his newspaper.

Mr. TAYLOR: So keenly interested are the people of the district in this matter that, on a recent occasion, when the candidate of the hon. gentleman's party for the district bordering on the north arm returned to that district from Ottawa, he announced in Vancouver, as one of the triumphs of his visit to Ottawa, that he had called at the Public Works Department and there secured an appropriation of $100,000 for this dredging, which was so necessary to his constituency.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the candidate's name?

Mr. TAYLOR: C. E. Macdonald.

[Mr. Taylor.]

Mr. GRAHAM: He is on the food controller's staff?

Mr. TAYLOR: He says so.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has given another reason why this should not go through, because if a Grit politician can come down to Ottawa and pull off a stunt like this it seems to me the matter is open to very grave suspicion. I have no doubt that ultimately this work ought to be done. Would the hon. member state as a fact that vessels could not be launched and taken to the Fraser river without this dredging? We get suspicious sometimes when we hear these loyal reasons given for certain things. I do not think the hon. member would go so far as to say that the Imperial Munitions Board has been foolish enough to let a contract for the building of a ship in a yard from which it cannot be taken to deep water.

Mr. TAYLOR: I said that was the occasion of the resolutions of the two councils mentioned by the minister. The firm in question was Harrison & Lamont. In addition to moving the councils, they sent me a very urgent telegram. I do not know either of these gentlemen, but as one of the two members interested, my district being on one side of the channel and Vancouver on the other, they urged me to do what I could for this dredging.

Mr. CARVELL: No doubt hon. members supporting the Government have received urgent requests from all over Canada, and quite proper ones. I am not finding any fault with the expenditure of public money on public works, but I do not think I have to go over again the very very serious financial problems we are facing in Canada at the present time. If I can believe what I am told, that the problems are so serious that it is a question whether Canada will be able to carry on her full duty in this war, on account of financial matters—I am not going into that part of it, it would not be right to do so.

Mr. CURRIE: You could not help but say a mean thing about it, could you?

Mr. CARVELL: What has got wrong with the hon. member?

Mr. PARDEE: He is crazy.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh no, he is not crazy; he is just devilish. He has these fits every once in a while, and when they come on him it is like a brainstorm.

Mr. CURRIE: Not at all.

Mr. CARVELL: It is not craziness, it is a brainstorm, and he is not responsible for a short time. But the brainstorm passes away, and after a while he is a very genial fellow. I was pointing out that the financial affairs of this country were serious, and I do not think we are justified in making an expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars on the ground that it would be of benefit to the locality, as I believe it would. It is just like the expenditure in my own province. While I believe it would be of great benefit and should be carried out, I do not think this is the time for it.

Mr. TAYLOR: The item before us is not for a quarter of a million. The next item item is different. That is the main channel.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not finding the fault that it would not be a great improvement if carried out, but it does seem to be that, under present conditions and under the policy that has been laid down by the Government, this item should be dropped, and we should not go on with a work of this kind, because if we spend $100,000 this year it will develop into $200,000 or $300,000 next year, and so on.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) that these items are not identical. There are certain lands along the north arm that would become valuable for industries if this dredging were done and a good channel put through there. The next item is for the main channel which is used all the time and stands in a different position from this particular item of $100,000, which I think might well stand for further investigation. The item in reference to the main channel is in a different position. Any necessary repairs to that channel ought to be made.

Mr. TAYLOR: What will the hon. gentleman say to Mr. Macdonald?

Mr. GRAHAM: He did not communicate with me on the subject. If I get into the Government I will have my answer ready.

Mr. REID: I was at this place and I really think that this main channel work is one that must be carried on. Perhaps I can get some more information about this other item, and let the $100,000 item stand.

Item stands.

Revelstoke—extension of wing dam, $20,000.

Mr. REID: This is asked for by District Engineer Ford to build an extension to the wing dam to divert the main current from flowing over against the wharf, threatening its destruction.

Resolution stands.

Dredging in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec—further amount required, $50,000.
British Columbia—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are these items taken every year in addition to the specific items?

Mr. REID: This is required in addition to the amount in the main estimates to carry out dredging at various places in these provinces.

Mr. CARVELL: Are these amounts for dredging required to finish up present contracts?

Mr. REID: We have plants in all the provinces; this is to carry on the work of the dredges that are being used. Many dredges have been laid up during the last year or two.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do you intend to keep all the dredges busy?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. PARDEE: Are there any dredges along the river St. Clair that are not being used at present and that are available for small works?

Mr. REID: The deputy tells me that there is one in that district.

Mr. PARDEE: Is there one near Chatham?

Mr. REID: Yes, I think there is one there not in operation.

Slides and booms—Gatineau river—new boom, $11,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. REID: The present boom has been in use since its construction in 1874. After a long service of over forty-two years, it is not to be depended upon to the same extent as in the past. Each additional season that the old boom is used, the risk will be increased. Some of the timbers are decayed, especially on their outer surface. Others appear to be sound, but altogether the boom shows evidence of having been subjected to severe strain.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it possible that the federal Government is providing booms for lumbermen?

Mr. REID: The Public Works Department have always provided booms on the Saguenay, the St. Maurice and the Gatineau rivers. They charge tolls; quite a large revenue comes from the lumber men in respect of these booms.

Mr. CARVELL: Even though this practice has been followed for forty-two years, surely it is time for the Government to ask the lumbermen to look after their own booms. I do not understand upon what principle the Government of Canada should build booms for lumbermen on the Gatineau, the St. Maurice or any other river.

Mr. REID: This boom was built many years ago. These works were started to help the lumber trade; they have been carried on ever since; there has been no change.

Roads and bridges—new bridge to replace present Union bridge over Ottawa river between Ottawa and Hull, $120,000.

Mr. REID: This amount is required to replace the present steel span bridge over the Ottawa river, between Ottawa and Hull.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where is this bridge?

Mr. REID: Between Booth's and Eddy's.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the Dominion Government build the bridge in its entirety?

Mr. REID: Yes. It is an interprovincial bridge; it was built in 1889 by the Dominion Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Dominion Government does not build all interprovincial bridges.

Mr. REID: They built this one, and now we have to rebuild it.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the Dominion Government charge the Street Railway company anything for the use of the bridge?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a great thing to live in Ottawa.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is news to me if the Federal Government builds any of these bridges in their entirety. It is very rarely that the Federal Government give aid to an entirely provincial scheme, although it has done so under exceptional circumstances. The Federal Parliament has quite frequently granted aid to interprovincial bridges, but here is a case where both provinces are relieved and the federal authority assumes the entire responsibility. If Ottawa and vicinity were made a federal district, as has been suggested, the federal authority would be expected to do this work. But, unless there is some arrangement between the province and the federal authority, I cannot see why this Parliament should be asked to pay the entire cost of a bridge between the two provinces.

Mr. REID: I agree with the hon. gentleman that, this being an interprovincial bridge, the provinces of Quebec and Ontario should pay for it, assisted, perhaps, by the Dominion Government.

Mr. PARDEE: Does this amount cover the whole cost?

Mr. REID: Yes. The engineer condemns the bridge, and it is necessary to proceed with a renewal of it at once.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will the minister make inquiry, and when his estimates come up again give us an explanation of his? This is establishing a precedent; if we build an interprovincial bridge here we could build one elsewhere

Mr. REID: I will get the explanation for my hon. friend.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Wednesday, September 5, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.]

MOTOR BOAT ALASE.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Was a steamer or motor boat, called the Alafe, purchased by the Government of Canada from any person or persons at Halifax, N.S.?
2. If so, from whom, when was she purchased, and what was the price paid therefor?

Mr. HAZEN: This question refers to a motor boat called the Alafe. No such motor boat was purchased by the department, but a motor boat called the Alase was purchased by the department, and I am answering the question on the presumption that that is the boat to which the hon. member refers. Motor launch Alase was purchased at Halifax from Messrs. McInnes, Mellish, Fulton and Kenny, in June 1917,, for $10,000.

DYNAMITING OUTRAGES.

Mr. ETHIER:

1. Has the Government been informed of the attempt against the property of one Gedeon Bigras, of Ste. Scholastique, county of Two Mountains, by means of dynamite on the 14th of August?

2. If so, has the Government taken necessary measures to prevent any such future attempts?

3. Is it true that the Government has offered a reward of $5,000 to any one who will give information necessary for the arrest of the dynamiters of the property of Lord Athelston-Graham at Cartierville?

4. If so, has the Government any intention of acting in the same manner in order to protect the property of an ordinary citizen as well as that of a millionaire, or lord, such as Lord Athelston?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The Government was not informed, but the police officers learned of the attempt through the newspapers.

2. Mr. Bigras was communicated with, but as he did not desire any investigation, having reason to believe he knew who was responsible, no action was taken.

3. Yes.

4. The action of the Government in such matters must be and is governed by considerations of what the public interest requires, and not of the personality or position of individuals affected.

2. What was the amount paid to each of these officers individually, for his service as recruiting officer?

3. Is there a recruiting officer (or officers) at present in Cape Breton? If so, what is his or their name and address or addresses?

4. What remuneration is being paid, and to whom, for recruiting services at the present time?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

DORCHESTER COUNTY RAILWAY.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to construct a railway in the county of Dorchester, across the parishes of Frampton, St. Odilon de Crambourne and St. Leon de Standon?

2. If so, when will the work be commenced?

Mr. COCHRANE: The intention of the Government in this matter will be announced in due course.

LIEUTENANT R. J. MOFFAT.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES:

What were the expenses of Lieutenant R. J. Moffat while stationed in Summerside, P.E.I., in connection with or as Supply Officer of the 105th Battalion?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: $10.

STEAMER C. E. TANNER.

Mr. PROULX:

1. Was the steamer, or motor boat, called the C. E. Tanner purchased by the Naval Department at Halifax?
2. If so, from whom was this boat purchased, and when?
3. What was the price paid for said steamer?
4. If chartered, what is the price paid for this boat per day?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. No.
2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.
4. It is understood that the C. E. Tanner is being utilized by Imperial Government officers in Canada.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Mr. CARROLL:

1. Who were the medical examiners appointed by the Minister of Militia in the county of Cape Breton to examine recruits since the 4th of August, 1914?
2. How many recruits were examined by these medical officers?
3. What amount was paid to each such officer for his services?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Chisholm.—For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions, etc., in any way referring to an application for a public wharf at Chimney Corners, Inverness County, N.S.

NOTICES OF MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS.

On the Notices of Motion:

Mr. KYTE:

For a return giving the names, rank, pay, nature and date of employment and previous service of (a) all officers employed in or connected with the Naval Service at Halifax, including patrol Service; (b) all civilians appointed since November, 1911. Also giving a list of the number, names and rate of pay of returned soldiers or sailors included in (a).

Mr. KYTE:

For a return showing the names, rank, pay, nature, and date of employment and previous service of, (a) all officers employed in or connected with the Naval Service at Sydney, N.S., including patrol service; and (b) the number, names and rate of pay of returned soldiers or sailors included in the above service.

Mr. KYTE: I would be willing to amend these orders so as to limit the information desired to the names of the officers who are employed. I think that would very materially reduce the work necessary to prepare the returns.

Mr. HAZEN: I presume that would meet the difficulty, although I am not quite sure. Perhaps the hon. gentleman had better let the matter stand until to-morrow, and I will ascertain from the department if that will meet the difficulty.

Notices of motion stand.

CANADIAN AVIATION FUND.

In the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Have the Government knowledge of the fact that Col. W. H. Merritt, who purports to be secretary of the Canadian Aviation Fund, is collecting or attempting to collect money for the purchase of aeroplanes. The object of the Canadian Aviation Fund is to give help to the firing line by means of trained aviators and aeroplanes. The cost of a machine is $7,600. If the Government have knowledge of Col. W. H. Merritt's operations, have those operations their approval?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: So far as I am informed, the Government have no knowledge of what operations Col. Merritt is carrying on, but inquiry will be made, and my hon. friend will receive an answer, if not to-morrow, as soon as possible thereafter.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Cape Breton telegraph system—branch telegraph line from Washabuck wharf to McKay's Point, $420.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the cause of the sudden demand for assistance to the telephone system?

Mr. REID: I do not know that there is any increased demand this year. There are items in the estimates for small extensions of the telephone system owned by the Government in different parts of the country, and there will be small expenditures at the different places named. This is simply an extension of three miles of line at this particular point. The superintendent recommended it, and that is why it is being put in.

Mr. McKENZIE: This little extension is in my riding, and I should like to know something about it. Can the minister tell me which office it is connected with, starting from Washabuck wharf?

Mr. REID: There is a telephone line at present from Washabuck bridge to Washabuck Centre. It is intended to extend this line from Washabuck Centre to McKay's Point, three miles.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where are you going to make the terminus?

Mr. REID: At McKay's point.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will these be telephone or telegraph offices?

Mr. REID: It is a telephone system.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are the telephones used anywhere else on the system in the county of Victoria?

Mr. REID: They are mostly telegraph lines in that county.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it the policy of the Government to build telephones throughout the country, and why is the Government doing it?

Mr. REID: The Government has a telephone system in different parts of Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why?

Mr. REID: We have had telephones for many years in certain parts of the country, and this is simply an extension.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I suppose the system is general through all parts of Canada?

Mr. McKENZIE: Can the hon. minister tell me what communication can be obtained by the telephone system in this county, except for those three miles, which are not connected with the town in any way? How will the system be connected up? The whole of the rest of the system all through the county is a Government telegraph line. It is a telegraph line from Orangedale down to Washabuck Centre. The minister tells us he is going to extend that system three miles further down the line, and it is going to be a telephone system. The lines will be no use unless they connect up with some outside system, or connect somewhere with telephones.

Mr. REID: I understand in these districts the telephone system is used at the present time, but the tendency is to change the system, and have a telephone line instead of the telegraph, and, to my mind, that would be more advantageous. But the hon. gentleman can see that, if you have the telephone, you can get the advantage of the telegraph system by telephoning your message to the telegraph office, and asking them to forward it.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister will train somebody at that place in the use of the telegraph system, until they get a telephone system established, it would be an advantage. Anybody can use the telephone, but many people cannot operate the telegraph.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister has not properly answered the question asked by my hon. friend from Victoria-Haliburton. It seems to me, after looking over two or three pages of the supplementary estimates, that we are raising a pretty big question. Is the Dominion Government going to establish a telephone system all over Canada, or not? I think that question should be answered. This little transaction only involves an expenditure of $420, they have already a telegraph line to Washabuck, and they are extending a wire, to be used as a telephone wire a distance of three miles, which is not very serious, but you are establishing a principle. I do not know much about the thing locally, but I do know there is as fine a telephone system in the province of Nova Scotia as can be found in Canada. They have some sort of a municipal system, and their rates are reasonable. Here we find five or six different instances in which the Government is going into the telephone business in the province of Nova Scotia. I think we should have some policy laid down by the minister, in order that we may know what we are to look forward to. The minister knows very well that if the Government is going into competition with the telephone company one of two things will happen, either the Government will have to buy out the telephone companies, or the companies will have to go to the wall.

Mr. REID: This particular locality is covered at the present time by a telegraphic system. There are no telephons. The extension we are now providing for is a three mile extension to a system which has been in existence for many years. As I understand it, this line is not in competition with any other telephone system in that locality. In British Columbia and in some parts of the province of Quebec where they have no privately-owned telephone systems, the Government has provided telegraphie communication for the people. In my opinion it is necessary that those systems should be changed as quickly as possible, for the reason that it is very difficult to get telegraph operators because of the small rate of pay. It is much easier to get operators to handle a telephone system.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The reason I asked the question was that there are certain areas in Canada which have no communication with the outside world. If the Government proposes adopting the principle of providing telegraphic and telephonic communication in one part of the country, it is only fair that every section of our great Dominion should have the same privilege. In some of the sparsely settled parts of the riding I have the honour to represent, they have no such communication, and we have had to go down into our pockets to provide funds for the building of our own telephone lines. If those lines are going to be under Government patronage in one place, they must be under Government patronage everywhere.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are sections of the riding I represent which are not reached by the Bell Telephone company. I have become a member of a local organization to get telephone communication to these people. Had I known the Government intended to launch out into new fields in the federal telephone business, I would perhaps have asked the Government to build lines to some of these places. I see one province is to be given $219,000 in the supplementary estimates for telephones. When the people of other parts of the country become aware that the Government is providing telephonic communication in some parts of the country, while they have to construct their own lines, they will be displeased, to put it mildly. Years ago, of course the situation was different. Telephones were a new thing, and there was really only one company. At the present time there are local telephone systems throughout the length and breadth of the land, and we have passed legislation at this session of the House compelling the trunk lines to give connection with the local lines under certain conditions. I do not object to reasonable expenditure to open up the country, but, as my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) says, if it is to be done in one part of the country it should be done everywhere. Within 150 miles of Ottawa there is territory just as remote from telephonic and telegraphic communication as is this community in Nova Scotia.

Mr. REID: In the province of Ontario the Government has a telephonic system.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. REID: In the Timiskaming district.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is along the line of railway, probably.

Mr. REID: No, it is not along the railway We have cables to Amherst island, and we have a telephone system in some parts of New Ontario. There are so few people in the district that it would not pay a private company to build a line.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Then, am I to understand that if we come along with our petitions we will get the lines?

Mr. REID: No, not at all. The greater part of the older counties is well settled.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What about the parts which are not settled?

Mr. REID: The municipalities can give aid to any one who would put in private lines. Who in the world would ever build a line there in the districts around Tadousac or Chicoutimi? Those people are entitled to some communication with the outer world.

Mr. CARVELL: What about Dorchester county?

Mr. REID: The telephone system has been there for many years.

Mr. CARVELL: They are putting in a new one there now.

Mr. REID: We are dealing with this particular one now, and it has been established for many years. We are only following out the policy inaugurated several years ago, to give the people in that locality the use of this line.

Mr. NESBITT: Could the minister tell me how large a place Washabuck is?

Mr. REID: Perhaps the hon. member who comes from that district could answer that question.

Mr. McKENZIE: Washabuck, which is a small corner of my constituency is about the size of North Oxford.

Mr. NESBITT: North Oxford is bigger than the whole of Nova Scotia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is one very objectionable feature about these items. It is that they are brought in so late in the session in the supplementary estimates and in such large amounts. If it was necessary to provide for telegraph and telephone lines, the appropriation ought to have been asked for in the main estimates. The total in the main estimates for this service is $60.875. The Supplementary Estimates are supposed to be for the purpose of covering items that have been overlooked in the Main Estimates. It is entirely wrong to leave important matters, which might as well have been provided for in the Main Estimates, until the Supplementary Estimates are brought down late in the session. While in the Main Estimates we are asked to privide $60.875, we are called upon to vote in the Supplementary Estimates the very large sum of $271,000 for this service, or more than four times the total of the vote contained in the Main Estimates. I have looked through some of these items. It is evident that it was not considered desirable to put them in the Main Estimates, because the largeness of the amounts would attract public attention and invite public criticism; or that the minister, seeing an election very near at hand, is impelled to realize the importance of putting these items in the Supplementary Estimates in order to gain popularity in the districts which will be affected. It is unfair to Parliament to ask us to vote this very large sum for this service, distributed over three provinces, and provided for in the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. REID: I hardly think the hon. member is putting it fairly when he suggests that we are bringing down these Estimates so late in the session on account of an election coming on. These Supplementary Estimates have been down for some time. It has always been customary to bring down such Supplementary Estimates as are necessary during the latter part of the session. The adjournment for a couple of months and the time we have taken over important Bills has prevented the Estimates being taken up before this. When we made up these Estimates we believed and intended that there should not be an election this year.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the Main Estimates.

Mr. REID: The main estimates and the supplementaries were prepared long before that. The extension of Parliament was referred to in the speech from the Throne, and these supplementary estimates were already prepared before we knew there would not be an extension of Parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that we would not have had any supplementary estimates if there had been an extension granted?

Mr. REID: I say we expected we would have had an extension of Parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, you did not expect that.

Mr. REID: Of course we expected it, because last year the extension was granted and the reasons this year were much stronger why it should be granted. If the hon. gentleman had carried out the same policy that he pursued last year, the reasons being much stronger this year, we should have had an extension of Parliament and we would not have had an election.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the hon. gentleman had done what he promised last year he might have had an extension.

Mr. CARVELL: We are going to have an election, and I am going to discuss the reason why this vote is brought down. These items are here, and I am afraid that the minister intends to force them through. This is in line with the general policy that I am protesting against under present conditions. First, the minister brought down the main estimates, and he only asked for $60,000 for all the telegraph and telephone lines in Canada. The votes were largely for repairs. But now he comes with supplementaries late in the session, and he wants between $200,000 and $300,000, and not for repairs at all. If it were only a question of the little item of $420 that is now under discussion, I would not raise any question about it. But my hon. friend is branching out upon a great scheme of public ownership of utilities in British Columbia, the end of which no man can see. He is asking for $219,000 for the province of British Columbia in addition to $22,400 voted in the main estimates. The item in the main estimates looked all right on its face. It says:

British Columbia—mainland telegraph and telephone lines—general repairs and improvements, $22,400.

That did not look very bad, and, therefore, Parliament might say that it was necessary to vote that in order to put the service in good condition and not allow deterioration to affect it. But he comes forward now with an entirely new policy. It is not a question of repairs at all; it is an absolutely new policy as far as British Columbia is concerned. A new policy also is contemplated in so far as some portions of Nova Scotia are concerned. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the geography of that portion of Nova Scotia to know exactly whether they have a telephone system in any of these places, but they must have in many of them. I cannot conceive that there are half a dozen places in Cape Breton island where they do not have the telephone. The conclusion is forced upon one's mind that there is some connection between these telegraph lines being converted into telephone lines and the election. I know the gentleman who manipulates affairs in Cape Breton island. His name was mentioned last night.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Douglas.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, John C. Douglas, and one becomes suspicious when he sees items like these appearing in the supplementary estimates. I have no objection to the $420 being expended for extending this line three miles, but I am going to vote against this item as a matter of principle. I asked the minister to cut out a quarter of a million dollars at St. John, for which I know a great many people will not thank me, and he has done it. I asked him to cut out a quarter of a million dollars at another place, which the minister has agreed to do. Now he comes forward with a quarter of a million for telegraph and telephone lines in British Columbia, and I am going to vote against it because I think it is my duty to do so.

I take the ground on broad principles that if everybody is asked to retrench owing to the exigencies of the situation, surely the Government ought to be asked to retrench. They have given us their pledge that they will not embark on any new schemes, and if they cannot build wharves, breakwaters or railroads, surely they are not justified in going on with a great system of telephones, the end of which nobody can see. I am voting against it on that broad ground. I quite agree with the minister that if you have a telegraph line and want to make a short extension it may be better to instal the telephone rather than the telegraph. That is quite reasonable. I know there was a time when it was necessary that the federal Government should extend the telephone line to the Yukon, as private enterprise could not do it. The Government was equally justified in building telegraph lines down the St. Lawrence and into the Saguenay and Chicoutimi districts. Private enterprise would not build up the Saguenay twenty-five years ago, and a line was necessary in order to give those people an outlet. It may have been necessary to build a telegraph line in Cape Breton island, although I do not believe it. But, I do not think it is necessary that this Government should vote $10,000 or $12,000 to extend that system in Cape Breton island, or $2,400 for a line in the county of Quebec. And surely it is not necessary to spend $2,500 for a telephone line in Dorchester. I am not now saying anything about British Columbia. The whole thing is as plain as the nose on a man's face the Government are starting out for the election and certain men have got in their work and have had these items put in the estimates. I think the Government should drop all these votes.

Mr. KYTE: When the Government established the telegraph line in Cape Breton, that course was quite justified, but when it comes to establishing telephones in the province of Nova Scotia, that is quite different. The provincial government some years ago passed an Act providing for the incorporation of rural telephone companies. The provincial government gave aid to these companies sufficient to pay for the wires and insulators, and for the swinging of the wires, so that the shareholders are called upon only to furnish the poles and set them up. As a consequence of that policy we have many rural telephone companies in Nova Scotia and they give a very efficient service. Their systems are connected, under the authority of the Utilities Board at Halifax, with the main telephone system of Nova Scotia. If the Government embark on a system of establishing telephone lines, they will interfere very materially with the enterprise of the people of Nova Scotia, which has already developed a very important system of rural telephones. If the Government contemplated only the extension of the telegraph lines, particularly for short distances like three miles, there could be no real objection, but I do say they are going to interfere with the enterprise and the industry of the people of eastern Nova Scotia and the island of Cape Breton if they establish a system of telephones. We will then have a multiplicity of telephone systems that will only lead to confusion and add to the cost to those who are obliged to use the telephone lines. The subscribers to rural telephone companies have to pay for their connection with the main telephone system, and if the Government establish a system of their own it means additional tolls to the subscribers, and more evil than good will result from the action of the Government. I do say that at present, in view of the assistance given to the establishing of rural telephone lines in Nova Scotia, this Government is going out of its way to interfere with a development that should be left entirely to the people.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I propose to move an amendment which I think is in order. I have not it written, but perhaps the minister would consent to its being passed.

Mr. KYTE: Who is the general superintendent of Government telephone and telegraph lines in Cape Breton?

Mr. REID: The deputy tells me he thinks his name is McKee.

Mr. KYTE: That is the general superintendent at St. John. He is the manager of the Western Union. There is a man, I think, named Livingstone.

Mr. REID: He is a line repairer under Mr. McKee.

Mr. KYTE: He has general charge of all lines in Cape Breton.

Mr. REID: Under Mr. McKee.

Mr. KYTE. Then there is a local man in each county responsible for the making of repairs. Who is responsible for seeing that these assistants actually do their work?

Mr. REID: Of course the system follows down from the general superintendent to each individual officer.

Mr. KYTE: If an assistant repairer was not doing his work, it would be the general repairer who would report to the Government.

Mr. REID: He would report to his superior officer.

Mr. KYTE: Who would see that a man who was not doing his duty was dismissed. I have a case in my county where that practice was not followed. I shall read the correspondence, which was produced in the House a few days ago, in answer to an order for all correspondence etc., relating to the dismissal of Hector Urquhart, as linemen between Grand river and Enon, Cape Breton county, and the appointment of Dan A. McLennan in his place. The correspondence reads:

Glace Bay, C.B., Sept. 16, 1916.

Hon. Robert Rogers, Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Re Government Telegraphs.

Dear Mr. Minister:—

I hereby recommend the dismissal of Hector Urquhart of Grand river, Richmond county, as telegraph line repairman, and the appointment of Dan A. McLennan, Head of Loch Lomond, as his successor.

The new appointee is more suitably located for giving attention to the repair work on the line, besides he is more efficient.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) Jno. C. Douglas.

Telegraph Service, P.W.D.,
Ottawa, Sept. 27, 1916.

John C. Douglas, Esq.,
Glace Bay, N.S.
Local Repairer, Grand river—Enon.

Dear Sir:—

Having reference to your letter of the 16th instant to the Hon. the Minister of Public Works, I beg to acquaint you that an authorization has been given for the discontinuance of the services of Mr. Hector Urquhart and the appointment of Mr. Dan A. McLennan, Head of Lock Lomond, to succeed him.

The arrangement is being put into effect forthwith.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) D. H. Keeley,
General Superintendent.

Then there are the following letters:

Ottawa, Sept. 27, 1916.

Hector Urquhart, Esq.,
Grand river, C.B.

Dear Sir:

I have from the Hon. the Minister of Public Works an instruction to discontinue your services as local repairer for the telegraph line between Grand river and Enon. You might please deliver to our agent at Grand river the tools, etc., which you have in your charge. The superintendent at St. John, Mr. C. W. McKee, is being advised of this requirement and will send you in due course whatever payment is due to you to the end of the present month.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) D. H. Keeley,
Gen.-Supt.

Ottawa, Sept. 27, 1916.

Dan. A. McLennan, Esq.,
Head of Loch Lomond, C.B.

Dear Sir:

I have from the Hon. the Minister of Public Works an authorization given on the recommendation of Mr. J. C. Douglas for your appointment as local repairer for the Government telegraph lines between Grand river and Enon, a distance of about 19½ miles. The pay attached to this position is fifty dollars ($50) per annum, without any other allowance, and you will be expected to keep the line clear of interruption and promptly make trips over it for that purpose whenever called upon to do so by the Superintendent, Mr. C. W. McKee, at St. John, N.B., or his representative, Mr. A. E. Hoyt at North Sydney. Anything in the way of overhauling or reconstruction work when required will be attended by the general repairer for the district. The tools, etc., which have been in the care of the former repairer are being turned over to our agent at Grand river to whom you might please apply for them. Mr. McKee is being advised of your appointment, please let him know when you are ready and the payment for your services will begin from the date you enter upon your duties.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) D. H. Keeley,
Gen.-Supt.

Ottawa, Sept. 27, 1916.

C. W. McKee, Esq.,
Supt. Govt. Telegraph Service,
St. John, N.B.

Dear Sir:—Local Repairer—Grand River—Enon.

A change in the above position has been ordered whereby Mr. Hector Urquhart is to be retired and will be succeeded by Mr. Dan. A. McLennan of Head of Loch Lomond.

You might please see what it is contained in the two accompanying copies of letters sent to Messrs. Urquhart and McLennan to-day and take such further action as is found to be called for.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) D. H. Keeley,
Gen.-Supt.

That is the history of this extraordinary transaction. The facts are these: Mr. E. D. McKillop who had the Government telegraph office at Grand River falls, and whose wife was the telegraph operator removed from that district about a year ago. The telegraph office, therefore, became vacant. Two applicants for the position presented themselves. One was this man D. A. McLennan and the other was a man named McLeod. They were equally deserving in the eyes of Mr. John C. Douglas, who holds the patronage for the county of Richmond. Mr. Douglas was unable to give both the position of telegraph operator, so he decided that he would have Mr. Hector Urquhart dismissed from the trifling position which he held as assistant to the repairer at St. Peter's, and bestow the position upon Mr. Dan A. McLennan. Through the adoption of this course, both his supporters would be reconciled; both would get some consideration for their political services. The minister said that the general repairer would be responsible to the Government for the proper discharge of the duties of the assistant repairers. That would appear to be reasonable and proper. If Mr. Hector Urquhart was not properly discharging the duties of his position, one would imagine that this Government would have received a report back from the local superintendent of lines to Mr. McKee at St. John, which report would have been transmitted to the department. No such thing happened; there was no question whatever about the efficiency with which Mr.

Urquhart was discharging his 4 p.m. duties. He had been assistant to the repairer for seven or eight years; no complaints had ever been made. If any complaints were to be made on account of any deficiency on his part, those complaints would come through the repairer at St. Peter's. But, upon the recommendation of Mr. John C. Douglas, the dispenser of patronage in that part of the country, who asserted that Mr. Hector Urquhart was not efficiently discharging his duties, the Government, without obtaining any report from their own officials, discharged Mr. Urquhart from the position which he held and handed over his paltry salary of $50 to Mr. Dan. A. McLennan, solely because of the dispute which had arisen as to which applicant should receive the position in the telegraph office. I am glad to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in his place, because the noble sentiments that he expressed two years ago, in which he deprecated the idea that patronage should continue, still re-echo through this Chamber. Only two days ago, when the member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) suggested that there might be patronage in connection with the appointment of a commission that was under discussion at that time, the minister indignantly repudiated the idea that such would be the case. It is a matter of regret that the principles adhered to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce have not been adopted by his colleagues in the Cabinet. We have here the most contemptible instance of political partisanship ever heard of in a county where many instances have occurred in the last four or five years. Appeals are being made to all classes of the community to make sacrifices on account of the conditions in which we find ourselves; appeals are being made to all political parties to forget politics, to get together, to form a union government, to devote all their energies towards carrying on the war. While these professions of a desire for union among the people are being made, cabinet ministers resort to the most contemptible means of persecution of those who are not of the same political faith as themselves. I realize that nothing we can say on this side of the House will change the temper and spirit of the Government or the principles upon which it acts, but it is well that while these professions are being made by gentlemen upon the Government benches and by those sitting behind them; while they assert that they have eliminated politics entirely from all considerations of govern ment, and that they honestly desire all political parties to unite for the purpose of carrying on the war, it is well that these instances should be brought before the public in order to show the people how hollow is the hypocrisy practised by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) is very much exercised over the fact that the late Minister of Public Works (Hon. Robert Rogers) took some advice from Mr. John C. Douglas. This is not the first time the hon. member has brought the name of Mr. John C. Douglas before the House. Every session an attack is made upon Mr. Douglas. My only knowledge of Mr. Douglas is that obtained through his visits to Ottawa, but I have always found him an upright and honourable man. I do not think that I am the only one who has confidence in Mr. Douglas. He placed himself before the constituents of the district which my hon. friend represents, or a portion of it, and if I remember rightly, he carried the constituency by an overwhelming majority. The people in that district, therefore, hold Mr. Douglas in great esteem; they showed by their vote that they preferred him to the gentleman who opposed him. Simply because Mr. Douglas places before the Government at Ottawa the requests of the people whom he has the honour to represent, is he to be slandered by the hon. gentleman? Is it to be said that the only way the people of my hon. friend's constituency can get fair play is by the adoption of his recommendations? With all due respect to the hon. member, if the patronage of his constituency were left in his hands, I would say: God help the Conservatives in that district.

That is my opinion of the hon. member. I am not saying it unfairly. I believe the hon. member has so much sympathy for his own friends that he would supply them first with all that they could get, and after that there would be nothing left for the Conservatives. The hon. member has also stated that this Government has been preaching that, since they have been in power, they have been treating those of the opposite political faith fairly. That is a fact. We have been dealing fairly with and keeping on all the officials, unless, by their own actions, they are entitled to be dismissed. I say, with all frankness, that that has been the case, and it is unfair for the hon. member to make such statements so far as public officials are concerned. Officials in both the Inside and Outside Services would justify the statement I have just made. The hon. member, because some officials have been dismissed on account of actions of their own, makes this onslaught to-day. Mr. John C. Douglas represents this particular constituency in the local legislature.

Mr. KYTE: He does not represent this constituency.

Mr. REID: He represents a constituency in the local legislature.

Mr. KYTE: The adjoining one.

Mr. REID: Well, the adjoining one. He has made the statement that he believes the people of that district would be better served if the office was more conveniently situated. The Great Northwestern Telegraph company, or the Canadian Pacific Railway company, change their offices every day in towns, villages, and districts to suit the convenience of the people of these localities. Just because Mr. Douglas happens to be the local member, a Conservative, and because the people of that district have done him the honour to choose him as a candidate at the next election to oppose some one—I do not know whether it is the hon. member or not—the hon. member makes this onslaught. I believe the representations of Mr. Douglas are entitled to consideration, and I do not believe he deserves the remarks made by the hon. member.

Mr. KYTE: The minister entirely loses the point of my criticism. I have no fault to find with the Government accepting political recommendations from Mr. John C. Douglas, as he is in charge of the patronage of that district. That, however, is not the case in this instance. Mr. John C. Douglas states that Mr. Urquhart is inefficient, that he ought to be dismissed for inefficiency, and another man appointed. What I find fault with is that there is no report from Mr. Urquhart's superior officer as to the manner in which he has been carrying on his work. If Mr. Douglas had said that Mr. Urquhart was a political partisan, and that, therefore, he ought to be dismissed, then on account of the precedents established by this Government during the last four or five years, nobody would be surprised, that his recommendation should be carried out, but he could not say that about Mr. Urquhart.

Mr. REID: Did not Mr. Douglas recommend this change in the location of the office in order that the people might be better served?

Mr. KYTE: Is not the man placed over Mr. Urquhart the proper person to make a report to the department on that point?

Mr. REID: He may state that this man is well qualified to discharge his duties, but he cannot state as to the suitability of the location of the office. The people in the surrounding district would know what is most convenient for them.

Mr. KYTE: The general repairer for the telegraph lines lives at St. Peter's and goes over that territory week after week. He has on the line two or three assistants who have been there for the last five or six years. If Mr. Urquhart is not suitably situated to discharge his duties, or if he is inefficient, one would imagine that the Government would have received a report from Mr. Urquhart's superior officer, that report transmitted, if you will, by Mr. Douglas to the department. There is no suggestion from the general repairer for that district that Mr. Urquhart is inefficient or that he is not suitably located. Mr. Douglas wanted the office for a political friend. He could not trump up a charge of political partisanship against Mr. Urquhart, so he wrote a letter to the minister containing this statement:

> The new appointee is more suitably located for giving attention to the repair work on the line, besides he is more efficient.

One would imagine that the minister would have transmitted Mr. Douglas' letter to Mr. McKee, the superintendent over that section of the telegraph line, and got a report from him. Nothing whatever was done in that direction. Mr. Douglas' unsupported statement that Mr. Urquhart was inefficient in the discharge of his duties was accepted by the minister, and his dismissal was immediately asked for. The minister expressed a pious hope that God might help the Conservative party. If that is the best example that can be given of defence for their conduct, then I say: God help the Conservative party in the hands of the minister.

Mr. McKENZIE: We are lectured almost out of sight this afternoon because we happened to mention the name of this saintly man, John C. Douglas. If the minister will listen to me for a moment, he will understand why we do not like the idea of a government led and directed by Mr. John C. Douglas. Mr. Douglas is the local member for the county of Cape Breton, and if the minister would follow his history and the ways by which he succeeded in creating certain dissensions in the mining communities, so that he managed to secure a majority, he would not be very proud that this gentleman represents the county of Cape Breton. I had the privilege of meeting Mr. John C. Douglas in a local contest in the county of Victoria. He had in his hand a telegram which he said was from the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) telling him that a Mr. Angus R. Campbell, who had been dismissed by the Minister of Railways from the West Bay Road station on the Intercolonial would be restored to his position in a very short time. The telegram arrived in the county while the contest was on and while I was there with Mr. Douglas. Knowing the Minister of Railways, I was very much surprised that he would send such a telegram. I did not believe he had done so; I told the people I did not believe it; but Mr. Douglas was the big man that he is in the estimation of the Minister of Customs and acting Minister of Public Works, and people around there believed that he had received that telegram from the Minister of Railways. Mr. Douglas fooled this poor fellow who was dismissed and his friends into voting for his party. The man who was elected in the contest was unseated on account of bribery and corruption. Mr. Douglas went on the stand at the trial; the copy of this telegram was produced to him, and he was asked on oath: "Did you get this telegram from Mr. Cochrane?" He said: "Yes, not only did I get the telegram from Mr. Cochrane, but I discussed the matter with Mr. Cochrane." Shortly afterwards I moved in this House for all the correspondence and papers passed between the Minister of Railways and Mr. Douglas. Papers were brought down, and the return is still obtainable in this House, but there was never such a telegram sent. To make sure, I went to the minister and said: "Surely Mr. Douglas would not first lie about this thing to me and then go on the stand and swear to it." I asked the minister if there was such a telegram, and he told me that he never had, at least up to that date, had the slightest communication of any kind, by telegram or otherwise, with this man Douglas.

Still he went lying around the country, representing that Mr. Cochrane was trying to interfere in a local election. Mr. Campbell was never restored, and the minister never promised to restore him, but he got a few votes on the strength of the statement. He got into the box and swore that a thing, which never existed, was true. That is the character of man the minister has in Mr. Douglas. His name is like a red rag to gentlemen who want to do things in a decent and honest way. If the minister desires to be led by John C. Douglas, he will have lots of trouble. I am simply giving a small part of his character.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is the minister not going to consider the question whether he should pass these estimates for telegraph lines? I see no reason why telegraph lines should be built in Cape Breton, and not in other parts of Nova Scotia. It has been drawn to the minister's attention already that we have a very good telephone system in that province, and there are scarcely any of the rural districts which are not now supplied with telephones. The local government has done a great deal to encourage the telephone system of the province. They have a superintendent who looks over the ground when any new line is to be established, and the government gives financial assistance, and the farmers and fishermen can, without expense get incorporation to organize telephone companies. There is a subsidy of $20 a mile which, as the hon. gentleman from Richmond stated, in ordinary times paid for the wire, so that the local people have only to provide the poles, and set them up, and provide the boxes which is done at very little expense. In this way provincial government aid has enabled the people of Nova Scotia to have rural telephones in all the districts. Unless we are going to embark on a Federal Government telephone system, and supply such places as Mabou harbour, Margaree harbour and Baddeck with telephones, I do not understand what justification there can be for this vote. There must be something behind this that we do not understand. No one from that locality will tell the minister that it is necessary to spend this public money in that district, unless it is for the accommodation of one or two friends of John C. Douglas. No doubt it is a political scheme, and I do not think the minister should ask the House, at a time like this when we are endeavouring to save money, to embark on the work of constructing these lines, unless the minister agrees to embark generally on the construction of telephone lines. We should not start this construction unless we adopt some kind of a policy on the whole question. The minister is projecting not only these lines in Nova Scotia, but lines in the other provinces of Canada, which we find provided for in these estimates. If we pass this item for the construction of telephone lines in Nova Scotia without any protest, we will be committed to the construction of telephone lines in other provinces. We want to know what the minister's policy is. Is he going to build telephone lines all through Canada, or is he not? If he is not, I do not think these lines proposed in Nova Scotia are justified at all.

Mr. REID: In Cape Breton we have, on the Government system, 948 miles of lines, of which 719 are operated by telephone, with 88 offices, and 129 operated by telegraph, with 45 offices. This system has been established for years.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am talking about extensions.

Mr. REID: This is for half a dozen extensions. It is not a new policy. $3,400 of this item is for re-poling and general repairs. Every year since the system was started small extensions have been made. Whether it is a government or a private system, small extensions will always be necessary.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister establish telephone lines in my constituency if I send a list of those that are necessary?

Mr. REID: None of these systems are on the mainland, which is served by a private corporation. If we acceded to the hon. gentleman's request we would be starting on a new policy, so far as the mainland of Nova Scotia is concerned, and that question would have to be considered before I could give an answer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are not those lines in British Columbia and the other provinces on the mainland?

Mr. REID: They are in outside districts, which are sparsely settled, and where you could not get a private corporation to build a telephone system. Those systems were established years ago. We had them in the Yukon long ago.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I see here an item for a branch telephone line from Inverness to Mabou harbour. There as two possible routes which that line might follow. I want to know which route it will follow. I am quite in accord with the idea of constructing that branch, because it is very necessary. I have been advocating it for years.

Mr. REID: That is from Inverness to Sight point, Sight point to Mabou mines, and Mabou mines to Mabou harbour.

Mr. CHISHOLM: What is the distance?

Mr. REID: Five miles from Inverness to Port Ban, and two and one half miles from Port Ban to Sight point, seven miles from Sight point to Mabou Mines, and three miles from Mabou mines to Mabou harbour; a total of seventeen and one-half miles.

Mr. CHISHOLM: This line goes from Margaree harbour to Chimney corner. How is it that this line stops at Chimney corner contrary to the promise made to me six months ago? I cannot understand why the line should be stopped there, because that is only a short distance from Margaree harbour, and just as important a section of the country lies to the south of that. I would expect the line to go at least as far as Ste. Rose and Dunvegan to serve the whole settlement there. I have been advocating this for the last two years and got the assurance of the Government that the line would extend from Margaree to Dunvegan. I think the line should stop at Dunvegan. I am not finding fault with this construction, because it is only in accord with the suggestions I have been making for two years and the Government is only carrying out part of their promise. The only fault I find is that they are not carrying the line as far as they promised.

Mr. REID: I understand the hon. gentleman thinks that this line running from Margaree harbour to Chimney corner, five miles, should be continued six miles further.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I should think it should go six miles further, because there is a very important settlement there all along the line to Dunvegan.

Mr. REID: The proposal of the minister this year is to take the five miles and in another year he will consider the extension. These are all small extensions, and there are requests for further extensions. They must be extended to these different places from time to time as the Government can see its way clear to extend them. That has been the policy of all governments for the last thirty or forty years in regard to these telephone and telegraph systems. The hon. member knows that members on both sides of this House from those different places which are dependent on telephone and telegraph lines owned by the Government have asked for these things, and this is part of what has been asked for.

Mr. CHISHOLM: There is only one complaint I have to make, and it is the same as the complaint I made last year. So far as the county of Inverness is concerned, the policy is not an old one at all. It was inaugurated by the present Government in 1911. The late Government had provided for telegraph lines in certain sections of the county, which were in process of completion when the present Government took charge. This Government converted the telegraph system into a telephone system. I cannot understand why the Department of Public Works would not extend the same privilege to our people as would be extended to them by any private telephone corporation. For instance, if John Smith, or Tom Jones, wishes to get a telephone in his house he should be able to do so. The Government will not permit this, however. I cannot understand why they insist on placing the telephone offices in the hands of their own friends, to the exclusion of every one else. I submitted this complaint to the Minister of Public Works last year. If it is the intention of the Government to serve the public, I cannot see any reason why they should refuse telephones to any person who is prepared to pay for them. I know the system as it is now is nothing more nor less than a little bit of political machinery. I have no doubt if my own party came into power, and if we were to allow certain advisers to guide us, the same system would be followed. Personally, I would not stand for it, and the best element of the population would not stand for it. To my mind it is a preposterous condition of affairs that you cannot go to any of these telephones and talk to your friends without everybody excepting your friends hearing what you have to say.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister want any further evidence of the absolute viciousness of the whole system, beyond what has been given by the hon. member for Inverness?

Mr. REID: The hon. member has just said he requested this line.

Mr. CARVELL: Think of a telephone system being installed for the benefit of the public, and a Liberal cannot get a telephone in his house even if he is willing to pay for it, and cannot hold a conversation over the telephone without every Conservative in the place hearing what he has to say. The minister wants Parliament to vote nearly $300,000 to perpetuate a system of that kind. Of course, the minister is not responsible for this condition of affairs, and I sympathize with him. He is working under an existing system, and he is forced to come here and put this through. At the same time, any man who has any idea of right and wrong must rebel against the perpetration of such a system. If you are going to run a telephone line for the benefit of the public why cannot every man get an instrument if he is willing to pay for it and comply with the requirements? I am a director of the New Brunswick Telephone company, and I can speak with some knowledge of the business. If any officer of our company refused to instal an instrument, for a man who was prepared to pay for it and to comply with the requirements, such an officer would not last ten minutes. Just as long as this Government, or I think any other government in Canada, tries to operate telephones, or railways, or electric lights, or any other public service in Canada, just so long will you have this contemptible, small, party patronage. It seems to me the time has come when the Government should be big enough to get away from this. I am not taking any "holier than thou attitude," and I admit if our party came into power many people would wish to perpetuate the same contemptible little system. It seems to me there must be a great change of sentiment in Canada before any Government can carry on these systems and make them of any practical benefit to the public. The whole principle is so vicious that I feel the minister would be justified in abandoning it entirely, not only in Nova Scotia, but in Dorchester county and everywhere else, and when the war is over let us see if we cannot get back to some sort of business principles. If the Government is going to operate telephones, let it make some arrangement with the local people to go out of business, then take over the lines and give a really useful and businesslike service. There must be many places in the island of Cape Breton where they have telephone communication at the present time? Are there no telephone systems in Inverness?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Yes, but not sufficient. We want to get more.

Mr. McKENZIE: The heading of this item is somewhat misleading. I asked the minister if this little extension from Washabuck Wharf to McKay's point was a telegraph line or a telephone line, and the minister told me it was a telephone line. If it is a telegraph line I have no fault to find, because it is a continuation of the line which is there already.

Mr. REID: The deputy minister informed me it was a telephone line, but that is a mistake. It is a telegraph line, and it is so marked on the map.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is certainly sensible, because it is a continuation of a telegraph line already in existence.

Mr. CARVELL: What are the rules and regulations governing the location of instruments, the granting of privileges, the tolls or rentals, the revenue received, and the operating expenses? I would like the minister to tell us just how bad it is, from an economic standpoint.

Mr. REID: The information my hon. friend is asking for is published.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the deficit?

Mr. REID: I do not know what the deficit is. We have quite a telegraph and telephone system in Canada, comprising about 11,600 miles altogether.

Mr. CARVELL: How many instruments have you?

Mr. REID: I could not say offhand. Of course, you cannot expect much of a revenue from many of these places. It costs a great deal of money to build a line, and in many sections the country is sparsely settled. My hon. friend may be right in saying that probably the time is coming when this whole system should be revised, but it is a system which has grown up, and these extensions have to be made. I do not see that we can do anything else, unless we took over the whole thing.

Mr. CARVELL: I will admit that so far as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and possibly Ontario lines are concerned, the system may not be so reprehensible, because there you are to some extent face to face with existing conditions. Quebec and British Columbia are different, and I have some doubt as to the advisability—

Mr. COCHRANE: There are none in Ontario.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I find this item in the estimates.

Bath, Amherst Island telephone line—reconstruction and improvement, $2,200.

There is one part of my question to which the minister has not replied, and that is: What are the conditions of the service?

How do people obtain instruments and what rentals or tolls are charged? We all have some idea what it is costing for telephone service generally and I would like to know what people are paying for this service. I would like also to know if what my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) says is correct. If it be true that nobody can get telephones, except a few picked out by the patronage committees for the purpose of listening to all that is going over the line, there would not be much business done over a line of that kind.

Mr. REID: I heard the remark of the hon. member for Inverness and it strikes me that it would be a remarkable system if it was carried on in that way and if it is being carried on in that way, it will be remedied. It would not be fair to have a system that only those who might be supporting the political party in power would be allowed to use, and conversations were permitted to be publicly known. With reference to the other question as to the conditions under which the telephone and telgraph services are given to the public, I might say that we have 10,300 miles of telegraph lines. There is only one office and one operator in each locality. There are 1,300 miles of telephone lines throughout Canada. My information is that people living along the line are entitled to telephones on payment of a rental. The rental varies in different localities. There is no regular rate. It just depends on the different settlements.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister mean to say that they have no schedule by which a man can say: "I am entitled to a telephone if I pay so much a year"?

Mr. REID: It differs in different localities.

Mr. CARVELL: How could it differ? If you have a telephone line in Cape Breton, does the minister mean to say there is no schedule by which a man can say: "If I pay a rental of $15, or $18, or $21 a year, I can get an instrument"? Is it as bad as that? If it is, it is worse than the condition pointed out by my hon. friend from Inverness, because in my friend's case the use of this service is confined to one political party. If on the other hand, there is no schedule and they can give one friend a telephone for $10 and the next one a telephone for $15, the minister is discriminating as between his own friends.

Mr. REID: My information is that the rates vary. The rate in one locality may be more than it is in another. When a telephone line is constructed in Inverness or any other locality, the Government will charge a rental that will pay for the maintenance and cost of construction of the line. They are not making a lot of money out of it. They want to give the people the benefit of this service at the lowest rate. In some localities the line may cost more than in others. It is not like a private corporation that is in it to make profits.

Mr. CARVELL: As much as the public utility boards will allow them.

Mr. REID: They may possibly do that in New Brunswick.

Mr. CARVELL: That is done in Ontario too.

Mr. REID: In Ontario the service is pretty good, but there are some parts of Canada where it is not as good as in Ontario or New Brunswick. That is the reason why the rates vary.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the rate in Cape Breton?

Mr. REID: I have not got it before me.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister ought to have that information.

Mr. REID: I will get it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: All we ever heard about this telegraph service in Cape Breton was in connection with the Victoria by-election. It was used by the Conservative party to carry messages free for the Conservative party prior to the election. It was thrown absolutely open. They sent as many messages as they pleased to people along the line and paid nothing for the service. It was proven at the trial that any messages sent by the other side were open to them and that there was no secrecy about the messages. That seems to bear out the theory of my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) that this telegraph and telephone system is just an annex to the patronage committee of the Conservative party in Cape Breton. That is one reason why we would like to have more information. I would like the minister to tell the committee if these lines are free to the Conservative party in Cape Breton and, if he is charging anything to others, what amount is he charging. My hon. friend from Inverness has made the statement that the department does not give accommodation to people along the line if they are not of the right political stripe. That is rather a serious charge.

I do not want to vote for this appropriation, although it is small, unless the minister will say that every man along the line, of whatever stripe of politics he may be, will be entitled to hook on the line provided he pays for it at a uniform rate. My hon. friend from Inverness has stated that he had complained last year that people who had made application had been unable to get the telephone service while the country is paying for the lines. Will the minister say that in future any man who applies for a telephone, lives up to the rules, whatever they are, and pays his money, will be entitled to the service?

Mr. REID: I will certainly say that. If the telephone service is there, every man, irrespective of what his politics are, must have a telephone in accordance with the rules that have been laid down for that particular line. I will find out if there are any complaints and, if there are, they will be attended to. I have sent for the rates. This line has been there for many years. I suppose that while my hon. friends opposite were in power for fifteen or sixteen years the line was carried on.

Mr. CHISHOLM: No, the telephone has been in existence only for the last five years.

Mr. REID: That is only in that constituency, but there are other parts where it must have been for a longer period.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That was the telegraph line.

Mr. REID: If there has been any change in the telegraph or telephone system, or if the lines are being used as the hon. member has said, that would be most unfair and unjust, and I do not think any minister would stand for it for a minute, or permit any operator in charge of an office to be guilty of such conduct.

Mr. MORPHY: Are there not public pay stations with cabinets?

Mr. REID: There are public pay stations into which any person can go and talk so that the operator cannot hear.

Mr. MORPHY: Then how does the want of secrecy occur?

Mr. REID: They have their public places to talk.

Mr. CHISHOLM: No.

Mr. CARVELL: No. There is no such thing on Cape Breton Island as a pay station with a cabinet. The telephone instrument is put into the kitchen of somebody who happens to be the head worker for the party.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman does not know, he has not been there himself.

Mr. CARVELL: I am properly describing the conditions. I have been in Cape Breton island a good many times, and I know something about what goes on down there. Talking about having a cabinet with any secrecy in a public telephone system on the island of Cape Breton—you might as well talk about finding a white blackbird. They do not do it that way.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is true of some other telephone systems is it not?

Mr. CARVELL: To some extent.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: People are very curious.

Mr. CARVELL: But in other places they make a pretense of secrecy. Not so in Cape Breton Island. Does the department rent telephones to subscribers or simply put an instrument in some person's house and call that a station from which the people may telephone? I had an idea that there was no such thing there as rental to subscribers. People simply use sufficient political influence to have a telephone put in somebody's kitchen and then the neighbours go and talk over the instrument in the kitchen while the family carry on their conversation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It cannot be that way unless it is a thing inherited in 1911 by my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: There were no telephones then, they were all telegraphs.

Mr. GRAHAM: These listening boards seem to have been established since 1911. I want to ask the minister if he thinks it right, under present conditions, to put in the estimates $272,000 for telephone in British Columbia?

Mr. REID: That is not all for telephones, some of it is for repairs to present lines.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is $272,000 for telephone and telegraph systems, and a great portion of that is for new lines. For repairs to existing lines, provision should be made, because otherwise these lines would go out of use, and the people who now have the accommodation should not be deprived of it; we should keep up our property. But when the minister starts out on the wholesale construction of new lines, it is not fair to the country. Of this $272,000, I imagine $50,000 or $60,000 would repair all his lines, and to that extent no person could object to the vote. But the people of Canada, in their present temper, with our taxation and the financial pressure now upon us, no matter what their politics may be, will wonder how the Government can justify the plunging into an expenditure of more than a quarter of a million dollars where perhaps $50,000 or $60,000 would do. Every person is making some sacrifice, and if the people who will be accommodated by this large new expenditure were asked, I have no doubt that 95 per cent of them would say: Let it stand until after the war is over. That is the spirit of the Canadian people. We heard this afternoon about a request made by Lieutenant-Colonel Merritt. We have all received that request. One of the great needs of the Allies to-day is greater strength in the air. We read to-day, yesterday, and the day before, of attacks made on London and other parts of England by air raiders. Colonel Merritt asks that a large number of air fighting machines be procured, and so necessary does he think they are that he is soliciting private aid. With this vote of $272,000, thirty-eight air fighting machines could be procured. If we took $60,000 out of this $272,000 for repairs, and I submit that would be enough, we could send the Allies thirty of these air fighting machines. I leave it to the minister to say to which purpose we ought to devote this money.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am not surprised that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) should oppose public ownership. I understand that he is a director and shareholder in a very profitable electric light company and also in a very profitable telephone company, a privately owned corporation; and it is not uncommon for men in those positions to resist any advance along the line of public ownership. But if I have observed the attitude of the public correctly, the whole trend is towards the public ownership of these public utilities, and although these big financiers, who are looking for big profits, may resist and protest, this wave of public ownership is coming over this country. The hon. member for Carleton and all the other vested interests in the country notwithstanding, public ownership is going to prevail in this country, and the people are going to be served well.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the first time I was ever called a big financier. I do not know whether to take that as complimentary or otherwise.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think my hon. friend is fast approaching that class, and if his company is allowed to operate these concerns, which I believe are very successful, he will approach that class, if he is not in it already.

I am a little surprised that hon. gentlemen representing Nova Scotia constituencies have not arisen to defend the maintenance by the Government of telephone and telegraph lines in Cape Breton. I am not particularly acquainted with the locality but I have been there several times, and my observation has been that the telephone and telegraph services there are of great convenience to the people. I refer particularly to North Cape Breton and Victoria. There are in that county large sections where the people are very much isolated and would be almost out of the world if they were not kept in touch with other parts of the province by means of the telegraph. Without it they would never get news or be able to summon a doctor, as no private company would think of establishing a telephone or telegraph line there for profit. Such a line must be run at a loss. But the people are a deserving people; they are doing a good work; they are engaged in fishing and producing wealth for the country, and I think it is only just that the Government should spend money in their behalf. I should be sorry if the Government curtailed a public service of this kind. I was amazed at the assertion made by the member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) in regard to the partisan manner in which, as he alleges, the system is conducted. I would not doubt the word of my hon. friend; I do not believe that he would deliberately deceive the people, but I am inclined to think that he has been victimized; he has been wrongly informed. I should be surprised, indeed, if, in a certain village where there was a telephone line, a man would be refused a telephone because he was a Liberal and another man would be given one because he was a Conservative.

Mr. CHISHOLM: It was a surprise to me.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I would like the hon. gentleman to give the chapter and verse; I would like him to give the names. The hon. gentleman would not dare go into the county of Inverness and make the statements that he has made here to-day. I do not believe that anything of the kind is done. It is true that a man living remote from the main line might make application for a telephone and the authorities, upon consideration, might decide that it was not practicable to grant his request. But that is what private corporations are doing. The company of the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) does not put in at the regular rate a telephone for every person who asks for it; it does not run private wires six or seven miles for the sake of giving service to one person. So that quite as much complaint could be made about the operation of telephones and telegraphs by private corporations in Nova Scotia as could be made respecting the operation of lines by the Government. The hon. gentleman speaks about the lack of a public telephone. In every rural community in Nova Scotia the same method is followed as that which is followed by the Government in Cape Breton county. Perhaps in a certain locality a public telephone will be placed in somebody's kitchen. A man comes in and uses the phone; somebody on the line may hear his message. But you cannot expect in a rural community all the facilities and accommodations that are afforded in cities. The Government telephones are operated in Nova Scotia just as other privately owned telephone systems are operated under similar circumstances. There is a regular scale of rates; the public are served much in the same way, but with this difference: the private corporation could not be induced to serve some of the territories that are served by Government telephone systems. Through the extension of the Government phones to these remote districts, great convenience is 5 p.m. enjoyed by the people. I think the people would resent the suggestion that the Government should withdraw from this business and allow privately owned and operated telephone systems to serve the country. So far from suggesting that government ownership of telephones be curtailed, I would say that we ought to enlarge and extend the operation of such government owned public utilities.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I do not know why my hon. friend is so lavish with his challenges. He does not know the first thing about the matter; he does not know any more about the district that I have in mind than a babe unborn.

Mr. DAVIDSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman to be good enough to give the names and the places where, as he states, such discrimination occurred?

Mr. CHISHOLM: I wish the hon. gentleman would be good enough to sit down until I have finished. I called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this matter two years ago. At that time, if my memory serves me correctly, the minister said that it was his policy not to rent phones to anybody.

Mr. CURRIE: Do any private companies operate in that part of the country?

Mr. CHISHOLM: Yes, but not in this particular section where the lines are to be built. My hon. friend challenged me to give instances of cases where Liberals were refused phones. I could give him a dozen instances. I challenge the hon. gentleman to name one person in the district of North Inverness who is a Liberal and who has a phone. There is not one instance. I would no more use one of those phones if I had a political message to send than I would hang myself.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I challenge the hon. gentleman to give names and places and to inform the committee where any Liberal has been discriminated against.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I will satisfy my hon. friend: North East Margaree and South West Margaree.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Give the names.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I refuse to be catechised by my hon. friend to that extent. I will not answer all his petty questions.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister was to give information to the committee as to the rates charged, the rentals, the difference between the price charged to Liberals and the price charged to Conservatives, and so on.

Mr. REID: If a man who lives half a mile from the line, has a phone, he is charged $4.50 per annum. If he lives a mile away, the charge is $9.

Mr. CARVELL: Suppose he is on the line?

Mr. REID: If he uses the public telephone, he pays a certain fee.

Mr. CARVELL: Generally speaking, except in the case of a man who lives off the main line, there is no such thing as a general rental system.

Mr. REID: No, any one has a right to use the public telephone and to pay for any message that he sends over the lines. Returns are regularly sent in as to the number of messages and the tolls collected.

Mr. CARVELL: What are the rates charged for a conversation over distances of 25, 50, 100 miles? There must be a certain schedule of tolls, according to the distance.

Mr. REID: The rates are somewhat the same as those charged by privately owned companies under similar circumstances.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the rate per conversation, not per minute?

Mr. REID: They charge so much per minute for the conversation, according to the distance. The method followed is the same as that adopted by, say, the Bell Telephone Company—or, indeed, any other private company.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister mean to tell the Committee that the Government puts up the poles and wires and establishes a telephone half a mile away from the main line for $4.50 a year? We had better let the Government put in all the phones.

Mr. REID: The people who use the public phones pay for their messages; I have given the rates charged to persons who have their own phones.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the yearly revenue obtained from these phones?

Mr. REID: The revenue from all these systems is published in the annual report.

Mr. CHISHOLM: If I make a recommendation to the minister to give telephones to, say two or three persons in my district, will he give me an assurance that he will do so. I will give the minister my word of honour that I will recommend only persons qualified to use those telephones.

Mr. REID: I have stated the policy adopted by the department. As I understand it, if a man applies for a telephone along the line, the department gives it to him, and it is practically made a public telephone. Whatever the policy is—and that is as I understand it—if the hon. member sends me the name of a party, I will see that he is put on that telephone line. There will be no discrimination. Every man will have the same right on that line, irrespective of politics or anything else. If a man, whether in my hon. friend's constituency or in any other portion of Canada, makes an application for a telephone on a government line, I will guarantee that the policy of giving the public the use of those telephones as freely as it can be given will be carried out.

Mr. COPP: I notice in this report on telegraph statistics, which I have in my hand, the gross revenue for 1916, on lines under the control of the Dominion Government, amounts to $181,227.04, while the expenses amount to $661,982.34. There is therefore, a very large deficit.

Mr. REID: That is the expenditure for the whole of Canada, including extensions of lines.

Mr. COPP: There is a great difference between the revenue and the operating expenses.

Mr. MORPHY: I have listened for a long time to this discussion which seems to be more or less of a family quarrel amongst hon. members from Nova Scotia. I have never before seen the minister begged so hard to refrain from giving hon. gentlemen money as the minister has been begged today. I feel like voicing the opinions of my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) and the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that this is an opportune time to ask the minister to turn his eyes to Ontario, the people of which province want the service that the people of Nova Scotia apparently do not desire.

While I quite understand it is hard to strike out an item that has been inserted after mature deliberation on the part of the officials surely the minister can do so this afternoon after the heckling he has received from the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) who says: I have a number of friends who are going to get this extension, but, on their behalf, I do not want it and I ask you to strike out the item. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) wants to strike out everything. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) would also become very economical and not let anything further get to his friends. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) is split in two; he is divided in the middle; he wants it and he does not want it; he says: If a real Liberal can get on to the extension, so that he will not be overheard, I want it; if that cannot be done, I do not want it. It is all a question of politics with hon. gentlemen opposite. I am sorry the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) is not in the House. We have in old Ontario, to say nothing of the new, a large territory in which a system of this kind would be of great advantage. Take the Bruce peninsula, the land contiguous to Georgian bay and lake Huron, the territory running up to lake Nipissing and the north country; we can take thousands of miles of telegraph or telephone lines if the Government will only give them to us. They would be of great benefit for life-saving purposes when storms occur on the lakes, and for warning against forest fires. These wants are apparently all satisfied in Nova Scotia.

Mr. BRADBURY: The people there do not want them.

Mr. MORPHY: They have them and they are using them. It is time for the Government to strike out those extensions which they have been coaxed to strike out. Why should the Government leave them in the estimates? Hon. gentlemen opposite represent the people there; they know what their constituents want, and they say those extensions are of no use to the electors, ratepayers, and citizens of various constituencies in Nova Scotia. Under the circumstances, I would for once go over the heads of the department who have recommended those public benefits and say to the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair): All right, we will cut out your extension telegraph service; and I would say the same to the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm).

Mr. CHISHOLM: I am heartily in accord with the idea of continuing the expenditure. The hon. gentleman is wrong when he includes me with the other hon. members.

Mr. MORPHY: I will leave my hon. friend to fight it out with his fellow members on the other side. I take from his statement the argument that the extension is of some service in at least one county—

Mr. CHISHOLM: Certainly it is.

Mr. MORPHY: —and that the extensions are desired and required. I would cut out all the extensions except that one in the county of Inverness, on the request of the hon. members who represent those counties. The money could be saved and sent up to the province of Ontario, as extensions are very badly needed in some of the northern sections in which the inhabitants are labouring under greater disadvanages than are the people of Nova Scotia. If there is any legal way of accomplishing this, the minister should strike out all those other extensions now and give extensions in the northern parts of Ontario where they are much more needed.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Excepting Inverness.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member is altogether wrong in saying that I oppose any accommodation to the people in my county of North Cape Breton and Victoria. The wrong information was given to me by the minister. Inadvertently he told me he was going to put in three miles of telephone line at the end of about 100 miles of telegraph line. I could not understand the sense of putting in three miles of telephone line which would have no connection with any telephone system. After a little further inquiry, the minister and I discovered that this was merely a three-mile extension of the telegraph system in the county, and with that I am perfectly satisfied. I did however, combat the idea of building three miles of a telephone line all by itself with no earthly connection with any other telephone line and of no use to anybody. Those telegraph lines in the northern part of Victoria and throughout Cape Breton were put in by our own friends when we were in power, and we are not going to find fault with them to-day.

New Brunswick telegraph and telephone lines —Chatham—Escuminac and Point Sapin telephone line—extension to Kouchibouguac, $3,000.

Mr. REID: The superintendent states that this extension is required in order to reach the fishery establishment at Kouchibouguac.

Mr. CARVELL: Who owns the fishery establishment?

Mr. REID: The W. S. Loggie Company, Limited.

Mr. CARVELL: As I am afraid there may be some connection between the W. S. Loggie Co. Limited and the hon. member for Northumberland, I want to put myself straight on the situation. I am just as strongly opposed to this vote as I was to the vote in regard to Nova Scotia, or as I will be in regard to the votes in regard to Quebec and British Columbia. I have never been on the ground actually myself, but, as I understand, perhaps 30 or 40 years ago the Federal Government built a telegraph line from Chatham, down the south bank of the Miramichi river, running out to a point at the mouth of the Miramichi river called Point Escuminac. This line was extended to Point Sapin. It was for many years run as a telegraph line, and no doubt was of very great value, because it was used in connection with shipping; the arrival and departure of vessels being telegraphed to Chatham and in that way reached headquarters at Ottawa. I have never been at this place myself and, therefore, I cannot speak with the knowledge of the hon. gentleman from Northumberland, but I know that the New Brunswick Telephone Company goes to Escuminac, and has a line to Kouchibouguac. It seems this is a proposal to extend the line beyond the point at which the Government line of telephone comes in contact with the New Brunswick line.

Mr. REID: Do I understand that when this is constructed it will join up the present Government system?

Mr. CARVELL: No, they are joined up now. Some years ago the telegraph line was converted into a telephone line, and an arrangement was made with the New Brunswick Telephone Company by which there was interchange of service. I do not remember the details, but I think it was satisfactory to both companies, as they come together at Kouchibouguac. This proposal is that the Government shall extend 10 or 12 miles further down the bay. I am opposed to it.

Mr. REID: Will there be opposition?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I believe it is not covered by any telephone line, and I do not believe it is a paying line, but, for all that, I am opposed to it, and I believe that if they apply to the New Brunswick Telephone Company they can get a service, although it will be at a loss to the telephone company. If there has ever been an application to the New Brunswick Telephone Company to extend their line, I do not know about it, and I think if it happened in the last ten years I would know. The difficulty is that people start after the Government and say: Let us get the Government to do this. There is no money in the New Brunswick Telephone Company extending the line 10 or 12 miles down that shore; but I say here, with some knowledge of the responsibility of the position I occupy, I believe that, if the people try, they will get the service. I have never heard of an application to that effect, but I think my hon. friend from Northumberland knows what he is doing. He says: Let us get the Government to do this. If they can get the Government to do this on the same terms as they get the service in Nova Scotia, $4.50 for a telephone—on the mainland it is nothing except a small toll service—no wonder they want the Government to do it. There is no reason why the Government should interfere with any of these utilities, except in a place which is inaccessible and where no privately-owned corporation would operate. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman from South Perth to talk about going up into the wilds of Ontario. No doubt people up there would like telephones. We have places in New Brunswick where the lumbermen would like telephones, but they have to build them themselves. I do not see why they cannot build lines into the forests of Ontario, as well as they can in New Brunswick. I am talking on a question of principle, and I am just as strongly opposed to this item as to any other similar item. I think the principle is bad. The Government should not meddle in the policy of building and operating telephone lines, whether in New Brunswick or any other province.

Mr. ROBIDOUX: I trust the minister will not treat too seriously the abuse which has been heaped on the Government telephone lines by hon. gentlemen opposite. I happen to know about that part of the line to which my hon. friend refers. It extends from Chatham to Point Sapin, part in Northumberland county, and part in Kent county. It is about 50 or 60 miles in length, and the proposition is now to extend it from Point Sapin to the Kouchibouguac river, following the shore, through districts sparsley settled, and altogether out of communication with the rest of the world. The people who live along the shore are engaged in fishing and the telephone service is their only means of communication with the outside world. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) referred to the New Brunswick Telephone Company, and the readiness of that company to do anything they could to give telephone facilities to the people of New Brunswick. I do not know how telephone companies act in other parts of the Dominion. But I want to say that in New Brunswick, so far as telephones are concerned, we have one of the worst monopolies in the Dominion of Canada. We formerly had two companies in New Brunswick, the Central Telephone Company and the New Brunswick Telephone Company. I do not know to which company the hon. gentleman belongs, but today competition has been absolutely abolished by the absorption of the Central Telephone Company by the New Brunswick Telephone Company. The hon. gentleman has stated that the New Brunswick Telephone Company was always ready to come to the rescue of people who desired telephone communication and I desire to say that that is not so. I know a number of instances where applications were made to the New Brunswick Telephone Company to extend their lines to different localities and they would not give the people these facilities. The New Brunswick Telephone Company was generous enough to say to the people: You put up the poles, we will put up the wire, and the line will belong to us. That was the basis upon which they were prepared to give telephone communication to these people. The proposed line will end at Kouchibouguac beach. It does not connect in any way with the New Brunswick Telephone line at Kouchibouguac; it connects with the main line at Chatham, and gives very valuable service to the people of that section of the country; the government will be well advised, if they extend the system further whenever needed. Reference has been made to the amount paid for rental on these lines, and the $4.50 rate has been considered ridiculous by gentlemen opposite. Well, $4.50 at first sight is ridiculous, but it is not quite so ridiculous when you take into consideration the fact that by paying $4.50 you merely get communication with Chatham, and the localities along that line, which I say are sparsely settled.

Mr. CARVELL: 60 miles of communication.

Mr. ROBIDOUX: 60 miles of communication through wilderness, and the New Brunswick Company would not, under any consideration, undertake to build the line there, and the moment you reach Chatham if you want to communicate with any other portion of the province you must pay 25 cents to the New Brunswick Telephone Company. If you were to telephone into Chatham, in order to get your connection with the town of Chatham you must pay a pretty heavy toll. The Department of Public Works would be well advised not to pay too much consideration to all this howl which is raised against their telephone lines, which are giving good service to a portion of the population, which would not get any service at all were it not for those lines.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not want to go into a dissertation about the vices or virtues of this telephone company, because I would be very much out of order. I want to say to the hon. gentleman, however, and I am very glad to have an opportunity of making this statement to-day, that the New Brunswick Telephone Company has no monopoly in any portion of the province of New Brunswick. Any person or any company who can get the rights from the municipal authorities is absolutely free to parallel the lines of the New Brunswick Telephone Company at any place. We have competition in many parts of the province, and we encourage the construction of local companies wherever we can. In many cases we hand over certain territory to those people and say: Now, develop it. When I hear of the trouble they are having in Ontario in regard to telephone companies, I think there must be something wrong, either with the Bell Telephone Company or with the local companies, because we have no friction whatever in the province of New Brunswick. My hon. friend speaks about the charges made. It may surprise him to learn that in the province of New Brunswick we have the cheapest telephone service in the Dominion, and we have the finest example in Canada of what can be done by a properly organized and properly conducted public utility corporation. We have no mortgages and no bonds, and a very small capitalization.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What does the farmer pay per year?

Mr. CARVELL: Fifteen dollars, for unlimited service.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: A party line?

Mr. CARVELL: Unlimited party line service. In some of the towns we get the service down as low as $15. To show you the difference between a properly operated company-owned line and a government-owned line, I will give you an illustration. There are about 1,000 telephones in the town in which I live, about one-half in the town and one-half in the country—the country subscribers get the service for $15 a year, and I think the lowest rate in the town is $15 or $18.

Mr. HANNA: That is for house telephones?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, $18 for a business telephone. I simply mention this to show what can be done when a company operates a public utility under proper conditions.

Mr. COPP: Why is it lower in some towns than in others?

Mr. CARVELL: Because of the service given. The larger the exchange the higher the price, on the theory that they are getting more service from the telephones. So far as I know, the New Brunswick Telephone Company has never refused to grant a service, even though it be not upon a paying basis. No doubt there have been many applications for service which have not been granted, and you will find that everywhere. My hon. friend says that if the people will erect the poles the company will agree to string the wires. That is true in many cases, and it has frequently been taken advantage of. I presume the same thing applies all over Canada. I would like to ask my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Robidoux) whether the New Brunswick Telephone Company was ever asked to construct the line in question under this vote.

Mr. ROBIDOUX: I cannot give my hon. friend the information, but I believe the matter was broached when Mr. Richard O'Leary was a member of the board of directors of the New Brunswick Telephone Company, and my information is that the company could not consider the question of establishing a telephone line in that district, because the line would have to be built through about ten miles of uninhabited country, from which no revenue would be derived. From a business standpoint the proposition could not be considered at all, and the New Brunswick Telephone Company would not consider it. The company is not in business for the good of the health of its members; it is in business for dollars and cents, and that is the policy it followed ever since it has had the monopoly. Before the New Brunswick Telephone Company had obtained a practical monopoly in the province we could get certain privileges and certain advantages from the rival companies, but evidently the competition was not satisfactory to the shareholders of the New Brunswick Telephone Company, so they absorbed these other companies. This was good business. Although it is permissible for any man or any body of men to start a telephone company in the province of New Brunswick. it is a difficult matter to carry on a business of that kind with competition as strong as the competition of the New Brunswick Telephone Company. For that reason there are no rival companies. In many instances the rates of the New Brunswick Telephone Company are fair, but in many others which I could enumerate if this were the time and place, they are unfair.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the Government persists in spending $272,000 to instal new lines, when $50,000 or $60,000 would be sufficient to repair the old lines, when they go to the people and ask them to economize, they need not be surprised if the people laugh at them and have no confidence in their sincerity. If they propose to build new lines to the extent of at least $200,000 which could be done without until the war is over, and then ask the people to contribute for war purposes, they need not be surprised if the people ask them why they did not save $200,000 when they had an opportunity. I protest strongly against a dollar being expended for new lines at the present time. Old lines should be repaired and kept in as good conditions as possible, but the people of Canada can until after the war join in the sacrifice which is being made, by doing without telephone lines which they never before had. If the Government persists in spending this money at the present time, they are not keeping faith with the people, and they are not using their best endeavours to conserve the finances of the country in order that the war may be prosecuted.

Mr. COPP: I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to or criticising the particular item under discussion. I would like to ask the acting Minister of Public Works upon what basis he makes the estimate to give aid to certain sections of the province and not to the others? I quite understand the argument made by my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Robidoux) that it would be a very great advantage if the Government owned the telephone service in that section of the province of New Brunswick which is sparsely populated. But there are other portions of New Brunswick to which the like argument would apply. Will the same consideration be granted to other portions of New Brunswick as is being granted to this section?

Mr. REID: This is merely an extension of the present line. We are not adopting the policy of starting out in some other place to build an entirely new line. My hon. friend from South Renfrew is protesting against expenditures on account of war conditions. He is absolutely right and we all agree to that and we have curtailed expenditures. But, there are urgent cases like the present where the extension is to give communication to a large fishing industry. We are urging people to catch more fish and that large industry has increased its output for the benefit of the people during the war. No Government can sit still and not do what is necessary in connection with the works that are already established. Some hon. gentleman states that the Government system does not amount to much. We have some 10,000 miles of telegraph service throughout Canada while the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company has 10,000; the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph Company, 14,000 and the Grand Trunk Pacific 5,000. We are in the business in about as large a way as any of them. The only difference is that the Government have to build these lines in sparsely settled districts where a private corporation would not extend their system. Would the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) who is interested in a telephone company say that the Bell Telephone Company are not extending their line one mile during this war; but that they are taking the money that they might use for extensions and putting it into war bonds?

Mr. CARVELL: Our company are certainly extending their lines the least possible distance and we are putting every dollar we can get our hands on into war bonds or into contributions to the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman has answered my question as I expected he would. He admits that they are extending their lines to the least possible extent and I tell him that the Government are doing the same, as was proved when the hon. member for Inverness complained that he had asked for 7½ miles of telegraphic line and that the minister had cut it in two.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister talks about his great system of 10,000 miles of telegraph and telephone lines. This is a system that was started to reach parts of the country that could not possibly be reached by any ordinary business organization. They had to go to the Yukon, twelve or fourteen years ago and that takes in 1,000 miles. They had to go to Labrador to facilitate the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, and that takes in 2,000 or 3,000 miles, and they had to go down the north shore of the St. Lawrence for the same reason. Years ago they constructed a line from Chatham to Point Escuminac, which also was necessitated by the requirements of navigation. But that is a different principle altogether. That does not get you away from the fact that the hon. gentleman, on the eve of an election, is expending over a quarter of a million dollars for telephone lines that are not needed. Do you tell me that it is necessary for the industries of this country, for the carrying on of the war, or for the carrying on of the affairs of the country, that this Government should expend $3,000 to extend a little telephone line in the constituency of my hon. friend from Kent? It is a most wonderful thing how they have got along there for fifty or seventy-five years without a telephone line. It is a most wonderful thing that any of the telephone companies in New Brunswick have not heard about this. It is a remarkable thing that they have carried on their business down there without a telephone line, and that just on the eve of an election my hon. friend wants to spend $3,000 in order that the hon. member for Kent may obtain a few votes. That is what we object to. If the Government telephone system were a real business proposition from which they were expected to pay interest on the investment it would be a different thing. But we know that these are not business propositions. We know that they never expect to get a cent of revenue from the investment. We have the admission that they spend $600,000 or $700,000 a year in getting a revenue amounting to about one-third of that. But what I am saying now is only a bagatelle as compared with what ought to be said with reference to some other items in the estimates. A man would not know very much about what was real loyalty to his country who would stand up without protesting against the proposal of the Government to launch out into the expenditure of this enormous amount of money simply that there might be easy sledding for certain of his friends when the election comes on.

Mr. COPP: The acting Minister of Public Works did not answer my question in regard to the policy of the Government. He made the statement that this amount was being expended in that section of the country for the purpose of reaching the fishing establishments and giving the people telephonic communication with Chatham and elsewhere in Kent and Northumberland. Is it proposed to extend that system to any other localities in New Brunswick?

I know of farmers who have left their places because they could not get telephone connection. It is as important to farmers to have telephone communication as it is to fishermen, and if the policy laid down with regard to this line is right, it would be equally correct to give assistance to agricultural communities in the outlying settlements of the different provinces. If I can say to my constituents that the Government will assist them in establishing telephonic lines of communication with the more populous centres, they will consider it a great advantage. Leaving aside the general question of public ownership, I can see no reason why one section should get this advantage and assistance and other sections be denied it.

Mr. REID: The policy of the Government is only to extend certain lines that are in existence, not to build new lines in new localities.

Mr. COPP: What is the difference between extending an old line ten miles into a new district and building ten miles of line in a new district?

Mr. REID: The difference is that to adopt such a policy would involve a very large expenditure. These are small amounts to extend some of the present lines a few miles.

Mr. CARVELL: How many phones does the minister anticipate placing on this ten or twelve miles of line, and what will be the estimated cost and the revenue?

Mr. REID: I shall have to get that information between now and eight o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL: Is this line to be operated on the same principle and under the same conditions as the line in Nova Scotia, which is that there will be no such thing as a man renting a phone, but that a phone will be placed in somebody's place of business or residence, and people will go in and pay a certain toll? I understand that this line will extend about 70 miles to Chatham. If this system is to be adopted, does it mean that the same charge will be made for all points on that 70 miles, and, if so, what will that rate be?

Mr. REID: That is a very reasonable question and I shall procure the information before eight o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL: I may say that I am absolutely opposed to the whole system and feel like criticising each item and getting all possible information. I think it necessary that the people should have some of this information in order that they may realize what an awful system is being imposed on them for what, in my judgment, is purely a political reason. I shall continue to ask questions and I hope the minister will realize that I am doing it only from a sense of duty.

Mr. REID: The information I have before me is what it is usual for the minister to have in passing these estimates, but of course there may be questions that call for fuller information and I shall have the proper official here at eight o'clock. It is better to have the items criticised because in that way information may be forthcoming which will be valuable to the minister in respect to either expenditure or operation. I want the hon. member to feel that I am not withholding any information.

Mr. CARVELL: As the minister is in the happy position of not having any information, of course he cannot withhold it. If this discussion has done nothing but reveal the condition of affairs existing in the county of Inverness, and if it produces a remedy for that condition of affairs and places this system in such a position that it will not be an absolute political machine but will be of some benefit to the public, the afternoon will not have been spent in vain.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Telegraph and telephone lines—New Brunswick—Chatham—Escuminac and Point Sapin telephone line—extension to Kouchibouguac, $3,000.

Mr. CARVELL: What rates are to be charged on this line, and what is the expected revenue?

Mr. REID: I will hand my hon. friend an extract from the report of the Department of Public Works; it will give him some information on that.

Mr. CARVELL: On the Escuminac line the expenditure last year was $1,692.83 and the revenue $968.20. What is the anticipated revenue from the proposed extension to Kouchibouguac?

Mr. REID: Two hundred dollars a year over cost of operation is expected.

Mr. CARVELL: Does that mean $200 over the annual expenditure for keeping the line in repair—replacements, betterments and maintenance?

Mr. REID: Two hundred dollars a year over the cost of maintenance. The man who is looking after the other line will keep this one in repair.

Quebec—Quebec county telephone lines, $2,400; Dorchester county telephone lines, $3,500.

Mr. BOULAY: In making appropriations for telephone lines the Government has evidently forgotten a part of the country which is in great need of that service. I refer to that part of Quebec extending fro... Matane to Gaspé, along the south shore of the St. Lawrence. This part of the province is settled chiefly by fishermen, whose only communication during the winter is by telegraph. In this district, which covers an area of about 200 miles, lumber mills are being established and business is going to improve, but very likely the people there will never have the benefit of a railroad. Part of this district is in the county of Rimouski and part in the county of Gaspé. I hope the Government will bear my remarks in mind and make an appropriation next year with a view to improving the means of communication afforded to these people, who, as it were, are buried under the snow nearly seven months in the year. I wish to call the attention of the minister also to the condition of the Matapedia road. Some improvements have been effected, but this year the item for the necessary work has been entirely forgotten. The Matapedia road is a very important one; it is much used by travellers; automobiles and teams pass over it when going from Quebec to New Brunswick. It is the only road in the Matapedia valley leading into Campbellton. It is in a very dangerous condition.

Mr. BRADBURY: Does the Dominion Government keep up that road?

Mr. BOULAY: Yes, it was built by the Federal Government. There should be an appropriation this year to put that road in a safe condition.

Mr. BRADBURY: When was the road built by the Federal Government?

Mr. BOULAY: I think it was before Confederation. If no appropriation is made this year for making repairs to that road, I hope the minister will see that the matter is attended to next year.

This road should not be neglected. It is the only road we have. It should be widened. In some places it is only from twelve to fifteen feet wide, and travellers complain that in some parts the telegraph poles are right in the middle of the road. Steps should have been taken long ago to compel the Great Northwestern Telegraph Company to move those poles to one side of the road. This should be done as soon as is convenient.

Mr. REID: I will make a note of the hon. member's remarks and will take the matter up with the department.

Mr. PROULX: Are these telephone lines in Quebec and Dorchester counties to be used in connection with the operation of the Transcontinental railway?

Mr. REID: No, they are just for the use of the people living in the locality.

Mr. PROULX: Why this discrimination? Why is the Government building telephone lines in only two counties of Quebec?

Mr. REID: If the hon. member will look over a list of the lines in Quebec he will see that there are telephone or telegraph lines in many constituencies of the province along both shores. Away down along the north shore, where neither railway companies nor private companies have lines, the Government have had to build lines. I speak of the north shore at points such as Tadoussac and Chicoutimi, where telephonic communication is required for the protection of shipping and to enable the fishermen to do business. That is the only communication the people have with the city of Quebec.

Mr. PROULX: The Charlevoix, Chicoutimi and Saguenay districts are very sparsely populated, but Quebec and Dorchester are old counties with dense population, and in many counties in Quebec there are private lines with connection with the Bell Telephone Company. In my county there is the Bell Telephone Company and two private telephone lines which have connections with the Bell.

Mr. REID: The district in which the hon. member lives is well settled, and the Bell Telephone Company has lines all over that locality. But in the district we have spoken of there is no telephone system and we are merely extending the Government line.

Mr. TOBIN: Do I understand the minister to say there are no telephone companies in the county of Dorchester?

Mr. REID: Not in the locality referred to.

Mr. TOBIN: If this is going to be the policy of the Government as regards the south shore of the river, I may say that Dorchester county has a telephone line that runs through all the parishes.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I know that this item for telephone lines for Quebec county is required for the parishes of Tewkesbury, Notre-Dame des Laurentides, Lac Beauport, Lac St. Charles and another parish the name of which I do not remember. I know personally that in that part of Quebec county there is no telephone at all and no telegraph, and it is distant from any railway. It is only fair to the people of those parishes that they should be afforded some means of communication with the rest of civilization. It is true, as has just been mentioned by my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin) that many parishes in my county have telephone lines which are giving a very good service, but it is also true that in four new parishes in the upper part of the county, St. Cyprien, St. Louis, St. Abdon and St. Luc, there is neither telephonic nor telegraphic communication, and they are about fifteen miles from a railway. Those parishes were visited by officers of the Department of of Public Works who made a very favourable report on the proposed work.

Mr. TOBIN: When did the minister receive the report referred to?

Mr. REID: March 10, 1917.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are those parishes in Dorchester county well settled agricultural communities?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No, they are new parishes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The mere fact that a district has no telegraph system, no telephone system and is fifteen miles from a railway, is not good enough ground to warrant the Government incurring an expenditure in order to instal a telephone system. There are scores of places in Canada much less favourably situated than are these parishes in Dorchester county. These votes for telephone lines, with which we have been dealing this afternoon and with which we shall probably be dealing with all evening, are a serious matter. This is a departure from what has been the settled policy of this country for many years, and it looks as if we were about to embark upon the general construction, in several provinces of Canada, of telephone systems. It is quite true that, at one stage of our history and at certain places in Canada, there was justification for the expenditure of money to give telephonic and telegraphic communication to certain isolated parts of a community or of a province. That day has passed. There is not a place, in Nova Scotia at least, in which the Government should be operators of a telephone system. We have several private companies operating there which are controlled, as to rates, by public utility boards. Every year many farmers' telephone lines are being installed, and it seems to me it is time for the Government to go out of the business. Instead of constructing new lines, they should dispose of those they now have.

We should know whether or not this is the settled policy of the Government. If it were merely the construction of a few miles of telephone lines, I could understand it, and it might not be objectionable, but starting, as the Government is this year, with all this proposed construction, is it not likely to grow? If there is one enterprize in the world in which a government—the Dominion Government, at least—should not enter, it is the telephone system. It would be far better to give small bonuses to local companies to assist them in the construction of telephone lines in certain communities, and then we are done with it.

Mr. REID: I do not think the hon. gentleman is quite fair in this matter. He is trying to lead the committee to believe we are adopting a new policy in building telephone or telegraph lines in Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It looks that way.

Mr REID: And he suggested that, instead of operating the line, it would be much better to give a subsidy to some other company.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not urge the giving of a subsidy, but I said that would be a better policy.

Mr. REID: I believe the Government would be glad to hand over the lines to any company that would agree to operate them. These lines are not built by the Government for the purpose of making money, but to accommodate the people in these outlying districts where they have no communication with the outside world, except by wire. I suppose it is 30 or 40 years since the Government started building telephone lines in these outlying places. There is no doubt that these lines had to be built, and from 1896 until 1911, when the hon. gentleman was on this side of the House, that was exactly the policy carried out. In these districts where they have no telegraph communication new telegraph lines were constructed. We have 11,000 or 12,000 miles of lines throughout the Dominion, and I venture to say, that 5,000 or 6,000 miles were built when the hon. gentleman occupied a seat on this side, and he voted for every item and never raised an objection to the policy. We are simply carrying on the extension which is necessary this year, at the least possible expenditure. We have in Canada many telegraph and telephone companies, some large corporations like the Bell Telephone Company and the New Brunswick Telephone Company, and some rural telephone lines; and I venture to say that there is not one system, either telegraph or telephone, which has not extended its lines many miles during the last year, and will continue to do so every year. The government system was inaugurated perhaps thirty or forty years ago and since then every government has simply been extending those lines, or building lines in newly-developed localities where you could not possibly get a private corporation to venture. During this session we are only adding a few miles to some of these lines, where the former Minister of Public Works, when preparing his estimates, felt it absolutely necessary to take some action at the present time.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister tell me what lines he is extending in Dorchester county, and what lines the Government now own, which they think it their imperative duty to extend, especially since the Dorchester election?

Mr. REID: I stated that the Government were simply following out the policy of extending some of the present lines, and building in a new country, where there was a population with no telephone system. These few miles of lines which are being constructed in Dorchester county are in a part of the country only partly opened up, where there is now no telephone communication.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This apparently means the adoption of a new Government policy in respect of telephones. I am quite aware that in the past the Government constructed many miles of telegraph system, and have been operating the same for many years. In many instances I have no doubt it is very desirable indeed that the Government should do this. I think I may also safely say that, in past years, when construction and extensions were made they were quite necessary. Extensions were made in districts which were very thinly populated and where it was not possible to get private companies to go. But there never was a time when the estimates disclosed expenditures for the construction of 50 or more extensions of telephone lines. The most that Parliament ever voted in any one year would be very few in number. The minister goes into Dorchester county, where there was not a telephone line owned by the Government. I should think that that is one of the oldest-settled counties in Canada. Surely there would be private companies quite willing to go and serve the parishes to which the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue refers. If the Government once starts putting in a few miles in Dorchester county in one year, similar demands will come from every county in Canada. This is a new policy.

Mr. REID: I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. It may be that the construction of a telephone system is a new policy adopted by this Government. It may be the previous government did not adopt the telephone system when they were building lines. The cost of a new line would be the same, whether it was a telegraph line or a telephone line. There is no doubt in my mind which of the two I would instal. Any person can operate the telephone system, you can have a great many people using it, and they can talk from their own houses; but if you build a telegraph line, parties must go to the office, even though it be miles away, to have their messages sent by the operator, and they do not know whether they are sent in the right way or not.

Mr. COPP: How many inhabitants are there in those parishes in Dorchester county?

Mr. REID: Probably the Minister of Inland Revenue could answer that better than I can. My hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has also laid stress on the fact that this is an old-settled county. The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) made the statement to-day that there are parts of the province of Ontario which are very sparsely settled, and there is not a private corporation which would think for a minute of building a telephone line in them. In the county of Hastings, 100 miles from Belleville, there are very few people. If you asked the Bell Telephone Company to put a line there, they would laugh at you. You could not even get a rural line started, because there are so few people. Many years ago the Government adopted the policy of building these telegraph and telephone lines, and what we are doing now is simply carrying out that policy. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Chisholm) told us here to-day that his application for extensions had been cut in two. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) has been pressing for the line from Chatham. All the items before us have been urged by members on both sides of the House and are in the estimates after thorough investigation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And you will have more next year.

Mr. REID: If my hon. friend can get the members for Cape Breton, where these Government lines are, to say they will take them over and operate them to the satisfaction of the public, so far as I am concerned I would be prepared to recommend to the Government to hand them over.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the minister be prepared to do that in New Brunswick?

Mr. REID: Will my hon. friend take this line?

Mr. CARVELL: Will you make the offer?

Mr. REID: Now that the line is built—

Mr. CARVELL: If the minister will make the offer I will be only too happy to submit it to the company.

Mr. REID: The Government is building this line from Chatham down to Mr. Loggie's fishery industry. If the hon. member will take his line and pay five per cent on the investment, and operate the line to the satisfaction of the public—

Mr. CARVELL: That is another thing.

Mr. REID: The line will cost about $3,000. We expect a revenue of $200 over and above operating expenses. This is more than five per cent on the investment. I am willing to recommend that the Government accept less than that, but my hon. friend will not take it.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister is getting away from the question now. He is talking about giving over those Nova Scotia lines to somebody. Will he hand over the New Brunswick lines to the New Brunswick Telephone Company, if the company undertakes to operate them?

Mr. REID: I have given my answer.

Mr. TOBIN: Has the work of building these lines been started?

Mr. REID: Not yet.

Mr. TOBIN: The county of Dorchester is one of the oldest counties in the province of Quebec. There are about eighteen or twenty municipalities, or parishes, in the county, and the Minister of Inland Revenue says there are only four parishes which have no telephone system. He knows very well that if it were not for the promises he made to his friends in the election of February last the Government would not be installing telephone systems there to-day.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I made only one promise in my election.

[Mr A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. TOBIN: You made a great many promises, and you cannot carry them out.

Mr. REID: Did my hon. friend ever make any promises when he was running an election?

Mr. TOBIN: None that I could not carry out. In the carrying out of these promises, an engineer was sent down there, and he made a report on 10th March, just a few weeks after the election. Now they are coming forward with an estimate for $3,500. If it is going to be the policy of the Government to build telephone lines in all the rural municipalities in the province of Quebec I have nothing to say; but, if these lines are only being built to fulfil election promises, I think this item should be struck out.

Mr. REID: It is not being done to redeem an election promise.

Mr. TOBIN: The election was held on 4th February last, and the engineer's report is dated 10th March. The Government is asking everybody to save, to cut down expenses, to tighten up their belts, to eat less, to give money to patriotic funds, and so on, yet they carry out an election promise to the extent of $3,500 on one item in one county. The hon. gentleman who represents that county knows very well that they have local telephone companies, and that the farmers could organize under the laws of the province of Quebec and get their charter at a cost of about $10, and could operate their own local companies. The minister knows perfectly well that if it were not for the election we would not have this item in the Estimates to-day.

Mr. PROULX: What is the estimated revenue of those lines in Dorchester?

Mr. REID: It is estimated that the revenue will be about equal to the operating expenses.

Mr. PROULX: Are they to be operated by Government employees, or on a commission basis?

Mr. REID: By Government employees.

Mr. TOBIN: What is the population of those parishes?

Mr. SEVIGNY: There are about 75 families in the parish of St. Louis, and, as my hon. friend knows, the families in the province of Quebec are large.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are they so large that each family would require more than one telephone?

Mr. SEVIGNY: I don't know. There are about 50 families in the parish of St. Cyprien. The only way they can have communication with the rest of the world is by means of this telephone system. They have no telegraph lines. They are really pioneers. This is a new part of the county, about five or six miles from the boundary line.

Mr. BOIVIN: How long have those new parishes been established in your county?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Four parishes were established about five or six years ago. They are new settlements.

Mr. CARVELL: We have new parishes in the province of New Brunswick along the line of the Transcontinental. If my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. Boulay) were here he could tell you all about them, because two or three days after the election he went down and ordered them to change the names of some of the stations along the line. He knows we have parishes there with hundreds of families, instead of 75 families.

Mr. SEVIGNY: On the Transcontinental line?

Mr. CARVELL: No, away in the wilderness. Those men get telephonic communication through their own energy. The idea of asking the Government to come in and build a few miles of telephone line, in order to implement an election pledge, is something very small indeed, so small that the Lord knows what this country is coming to. There is nothing to it except to carry out pledges made in the past and try to get votes in the future.

I felt that my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Reid) would be up against a stone wall this afternoon. I have a good deal of sympathy with him. He is carrying this thing along and he is exercising a great deal of ingenuity—and no man possesses more ingenuity than he. But when he tried to get down to principles, I knew he was going to get into trouble. All of yesterday and this afternoon he was talking about an extension of existing lines. Because I happen to have some little connection with a telephone company in New Brunswick he put a staggerer to me. He grinned clear to the back of his neck when he asked me if we would extend our lines, and I said: "To the least possible extent." He said: "That is exactly what we are doing; all we are doing is extending existing lines." But now we find that he is starting out after new business entirely. There never was a government line there. But the trouble is that the Minister of Inland Revenue wanted to get elected last year and he promised everything—telephones, telegraphs, bulls, rams, and everything else imaginable, and he got them. The bulls and rams are not there now, or they are not in the condition they were in when they went there. It is anything in the world to get votes. If the minister will own up—admit the whole story—I think we will let this item go through.

Mr. REID: Carried.

Mr. CARVELL: If the minister will own up like a man, if he will simply say that he is carrying out the pledges made by the Minister of Inland Revenue to get some votes and that he is ashamed of the whole thing—as the whole party is ashamed of it—we might make an exception in this case and let the item go through. Personally, I felt that he was up against a wall, that he would not be able to carry this out in principle. And he is not through yet; this is only the beginning.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister hardly states the case correctly when he says that these votes are merely a continuation of the long-established policy of the Government. It has been a long-established policy of the Government to give telegraphic communication to outlying points strategically situated for the transaction of business or the promotion of settlement, or for other reasons of public policy, but it never was any part of the policy of the Government to provide purely local telephonic communication. That is a new development, the policy of this present Government, and, I judge, of this session of Parliament. There is no part of the country where the policy of the extension of telegraph lines has been pushed more than in the part of the country I represent. Telegraph lines were extended to the Peace river country many years ago with a view to assist in carrying on the trade then existing and for the development of settlement which was then coming in. There is no doubt that the building of that particular telegraph line, as well as most of those telegraph lines which have been built out into that new country, has very well justified the enterprise that placed it there. But in the Peace River country the settlers are providing their own local telephonic communication. A group of farmers organize and provide poles and wires linked up with points where there is telegraphic communication. This they do at their own expense. I do not see any particular reason why, if the pioneer settlers of the Peace river are able to protect their own interests to that degree, the pioneer settlers in Dorchester should not do exactly the same thing. I do not wish to raise any complaint against the giving of advantage to these settlers simply because they are new settlers. That is a reason why they should get advantages if they are not so situated that they can be relieved by the establishment of local lines which are well within their own resources. That is the difference between the policy that has been pursued and the policy that is now being instituted. If the Government proposes to take upon its shoulders the burden of supplying local telephonic communication to every section of the country throughout the Dominion or to every locality in which the people have sufficient pull with the Government to secure its attention, it is a most objectionable policy, and I protest that it is not in accordance with the policy of telegraph line construction that has prevailed in the past.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the Minister of Inland Revenue inform the committee of the size of the parishes in Dorchester county and state the distance between the present established telephone lines and the most remote parish which is to be served by the new lines?

Mr. SEVIGNY: The parish of St. Louis is about ten miles from the parish of Ste. Rose where they have a telephone line.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How many people are in that parish?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Seventy-five families.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In one settled community?

Mr. SEVIGNY: Spread over. It is a newly colonized district situated about five miles from the Maine border. The parish of St. Cyprien is about six miles from the parish of St. Louis. I think there are about 50 families of pioneers there. The parish of St. Luc has just been opened up; they have had a priest for a month only. There are about 25 or 30 families there.

Mr. CARVELL: How far are they from the Transcontinental railway?

Mr. SEVIGNY: These people are forty miles from the Transcontinental railway.

Mr. CARVELL: What railway is nearest to them?

[Mr. Oliver.]

Mr. SEVIGNY: The Quebec Central. They are about 15 or 20 miles from it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The system of telephones grew up in the province of Nova Scotia in this way: Many years ago the fishermen wanted communication along the coast in order to get ship news, news of wrecks and of the location of bait, and the Government built these telephone lines in Cape Breton for the accommodation of fishermen in outlying places. But the present Government has embarked in the telephone business and has connected the telegraph lines with districts by telephones.

Is the minister going to extend that to other places? I have in my constituency a number of places of that kind which have no telephone lines and where the people would find it difficult to build lines because of the expense. One or two of these places correspond closely with the description given by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny). Will the minister do the same thing for the outlying districts of Guysborough?

Mr. REID: If the hon. member will send in an application, I will promise to give it my serious consideration if he will promise not to accuse me of doing it for political purposes.

Mr. MICHAUD: I wish to direct attention to the conditions in connection with the telephone line along the International railway which was purchased by the Government. It is about 115 miles in length and about 900 families live along it. It is almost impossible to obtain the use of the line, as we are informed by the operators that it belongs to the Government and not to the settlers. I have tried to use it myself without success. If the minister will telegraph to-morrow morning to the agents along that railway that they are to permit the settlers to use the telephone line, he will greatly please and benefit them.

Mr. REID: That line would come under the Railway Department, not under the Public Works Department. I will mention it to the Minister of Railways, but I should suggest that the hon. member should write to the minister. Of course it is quite essential that the line should be under the control of the train dispatcher if it is used for the operation of the trains.

Mr. CARVELL: There is only one accommodation train a day each way, and the line could not be used for more than half an hour by the railway.

Mr. MICHAUD: As to the operators being busy, very often they are not. The line is not properly operated, and the trains are delayed for hours every day, and never reach their destinations on time. The operators as a rule would have ample time to help the public in this matter.

Mr. CARVELL: That is Government operation of railways.

Mr. NESBITT: Upon what principle is the minister acting in establishing telephone lines in a community such as that described by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) in Dorchester, where there are 75 families within ten miles of another line, 50 families within six miles of another line, and 25 families within a distance which was not stated? There is not another place in Canada that would ask to have a telephone line built under such circumstances. In every part of Ontario that I know of the people
9 p.m. themselves establish these lines, paying the entire cost of construction and operation. As a Parliament, we are supposed to use every section of the country alike, and I should like to know the principle acted on in this case. It looks absurd on the face of it.

Mr. REID: I explained that it is a new colony that has gone into this territory, and this is to give the people communication with the outside world.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why do they not build it themselves?

Mr. REID: These people are starting a new colony and they have not the means.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How do you know?

Mr. REID: The hon. member has heard the Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He did not say they were without means.

Mr. REID: He said they were settlers just going in to open up this new territory, and as a rule they are not very flush.

Mr. NESBITT: I understood that Dorchester was an old settled county.

Mr. REID: Part of it.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The lower part; this is a new part.

Mr. NESBITT: Every county may have some part that is not settled, but that is no reason why we should establish telephone lines in it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Then the pioneer of Dorchester referred to by the minister is not the pioneer of fifty or a hundred years ago. These settlers are probably the children of well-to-do people in the county of Dorchester who are going on new land.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Oh, no.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Minister of Inland Revenue ought to be ashamed to go to the Government and ask them to spend $3,500 on this telephone line. He should show a better example to his colleagues, to the country and to Parliament, and should ask to have the amount withdrawn now. It is nothing but looting the treasury by means of an Act of Parliament.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The Minister of Inland Revenue is not ashamed at all to ask for that amount in the estimates. If the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) will look at the estimates presented to this House for the last six years, he will notice that there never was $50 in the estimates to be spent in the county of Dorchester.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It has something to do with the question. I am asking that this amount be voted for my county, because it is necessary to give accommodation to the people—unfortunately, poor people, in four new parishes that have no telephones or telegraphs—who are fifteen miles from a railway line and who are making every possible sacrifice in an effort to develop this new district. They are certainly entitled to some encouragement. I am sure that many people who voted against me in January last will be surprised that there is such strong opposition on the part of Liberal members to the making of this appropriation for my county. This Government is asked for this appropriation, not only by my friends, but by the priests, by the Liberal leaders, by everybody. It is only fair that the people should be given this accommodation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It does not matter if everybody in Dorchester county asked for these telephones. The minister would display more commendable qualities as a representative of the people if he had strength enough to say no to the people in his county who ask for this expenditure. A public representative should learn to say no; it is easy enough to say yes. Does the Minister of Inland Revenue attempt to justify this vote on the ground that during the last six years no public expenditures have been made in Dorchester county?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No, not at all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman said a moment ago that no public money had been expended in his county during the last six years. I understand that a great number of cattle for breeding purposes were sent to Dorchester county, and that somebody ran away with them. That must have involved an expenditure of public money; therefore, there was some expenditure in Dorchester county within the last few years. I am afraid the real reason of it all is, as the minister inadvertently stated a few moments ago, that he wants some money spent in Dorchester county, and it might as well be for telephones as for anything else.

Mr. CARVELL: Two very vicious principles have been enunciated by the Minister of Inland Revenue in his brief remarks. First, he says that he is not ashamed to ask for this vote because during the last six years not $50 has been expended in his county. Second, he says that the people want this appropriation. Of course they want it. That is what I have been trying to fight against for some years. The people "want"—and as long as they have a paternal government that will give them what they want, they will continue to make demands. No man knows that better than the Minister of Inland Revenue. He stated that no public money has been expended in his constituency. Well, no public money has been expended in my constituency during the last six years, unless for necessary repairs to the three public buildings that we have in that county. There has been no new work. I have not asked for any; I would not ask for anything unless it was absolutely necessary. Although I do not represent a constituency of saints, I will never go to my constituents and ask them to vote against the Government because public money has not been spent in the constituency. No public money was spent in my constituency when I supported the Government; I could never ask them to vote for me on that account. The acting Minister of Public Works says something about the St. John Valley railway. Yes, the Government gave a subsidy to the St. John Valley railway, and their political friends stole $100,000 at the very first crack, in one lump, a few days before the provincial election of 1912. I do not want public money simply because of a desire that public money shall be expended. I commence to see light in this matter. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) sat here all last evening and all to-day; his colleagues from his own province were here, waiting and wondering when these infernal Grits would ever stop talking. The Minister of Agriculture has $200,000 in the estimates for telephones; his colleague, the Minister of Inland Revenue, had one hundred bulls in his constituency after the last election. As Gadsby says, he converted a lot of them into benevolent neutrals, in order that they might be more docile in the yoke, and in order that they might work in the fields. When I see these two hon. gentlemen working together, not for the propagation of live stock, but for the prevention of the propagation of live stock—well, the plot thickens. The conspiracy is so absolutely patent that I think we should have some explanation from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. McKENZIE: The member for Carleton suggests that there was an exchange of bulls for telephones; perhaps there was. That brings out another reason why the county of Dorchester should be more in touch with civilization; if officers of the law could have been speedily informed about these bulls, perhaps the animals would not have been stolen. I have already drawn the attention of the former Minister of Public Works to the matter of entering upon new expenditures. At page 4354 of Hansard, I said:

> When the war broke out we in Nova Scotia were willing to give up all our public works. We had large votes in the Estimates, and even before the war began, on account of the fall in the revenue, we were advised that we should cease pressing for improvements that had been promised, or from pressing for the expenditure of money that had already been voted. We were told by the minister that large expenditures had to be dropped; that practically all public expenditures that were not absolutely necessary were to cease. Accordingly, we have not been pressing the minister for any expenditure, although some of these works are very necessary.

The hon. gentleman accepted that as being the correct position. He answered as follows:

> Mr. Rogers: If my hon. friend, who says that I am undertaking new work, will only look at the item he will see that there is a reduction in it of over $2,500,000, which is an evidence that we are adhering to our policy of economy during war time, even in such important matters as the great harbours of this country. The harbours enumerated here are national harbours. Before the outbreak of the war large contracts had been let for the purpose of improving the harbours to meet the trade requirements of the country, and the amounts here asked for are simply to carry out the contracts that were then entered into.

The minister told us then that any large vote he was asking for was simply for the carrying out of contracts to which the country had already committed itself, and that nothing really new was being entered upon. I read this for the information of the acting Minister of Public Works, so that he may see the real attitude which the gentleman responsible for the estimates took when this question was put up to him.

Saskatchewan and Alberta telegraph and telephone lines—extension of Lac La Biche telephone line, $1,200.

Mr. OLIVER: To what point is this extension being made?

Mr. REID: This is required to extend the Government telephone line from Lac La Biche mission to Lac La Biche railway station, a distance of approximately eight miles.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there a probability that the work will be done this fall?

Mr. REID: I can give the hon. member only the same answer that I have given to others. I have given instructions to the deputy minister to proceed with these works immediately now that the votes are passed. He tells me that, if possible, he will go ahead and carry out this work at once.

Mr. OLIVER: I would urge, to give this extension precedence for this fall if possible, because there is no telegraph line to Lac La Biche. The railway company have a telephone system along their line, but there is no means of the public reaching Lac La Biche by wire except over the Government line which does not reach Lac La Biche station, which is the place at which the business is being done. At present the Government line as far as Lac La Biche mission is practically useless; it is so many miles of line, which is of no value for the transaction of the business of the district. That condition will continue until the extension of eight miles is made so that the present line will be able to transact the business of the town at the railroad station. In the interest of the public and of the Government revenue. I would respectfully urge that the work be done this fall, so that we shall have the benefit of that extension during the winter.

Mr. REID: I have just given the deputy minister instructions, and he and the superintendent of the telegraph service, who is also here, will pay special attention to the matter. Instructions will be given to-morrow to have the work proceeded with.

Saskatchewan and Alberta—shifting line to roadways, $8,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. REID: This amount is asked for by the superintendent of the telegraph service for the purpose of shifting the telegraph lines from the farm lands to the roadways. The sum of $5,000 is required for Saskatchewan and the balance of $3,000 for Alberta. The lines were run through before the surveys of that country were made and they are all on the farmers' lands.

Mr. CARVELL: Are these telegraph or telephone lines?

Mr. REID: Telegraph lines.

St. Paul de Metis—Durlingville telegraph line —extension to Beaver crossing, $4,500.

Mr. OLIVER: From what point and to what point is this extension being made?

Mr. REID: From Durlingville to Beaver crossing on Cold lake, a distance of twenty-six miles.

Mr. OLIVER: Beaver crossing, I would think, is the crossing of Beaver river, which is some little distance from Cold lake. I am anxious to know if the intention is to extend the line to Cold lake or only to the crossing of the Beaver river.

Mr. REID: On the plan it is marked "Extension to Beaver crossing, 26 miles." How much further would it be to Cold lake?

Mr. OLIVER: I think it is four or five miles from the crossing of the Beaver river to Cold lake. It is not a great distance. It is, of course, very desirable to have the telegraph line as far as the crossing of the Beaver river, but if it were intended to put it through to Cold lake, that would be still more desirable, and I am anxious to know if that is the intention.

Mr. REID: On this map, Cold lake and Beaver crossing are the same. Therefore, it would look as though the extension were to Cold lake.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister promised me some information in regard to some of the items for telegraph and telephone lines in Nova Scotia which were passed without discussion. Perhaps he will tell me how he proposes to make those repairs to the Cape Breton telegraph system, for which he asks $3,400.

Mr. REID: The wire from Baddeck to the point of divergence is run on the telegraph poles, and new poles are provided for the rest of the distance.

Mr. McKENZIE: How far from the point of divergence do they run the telephone line?

Mr. REID: The line is seven and one-half miles.

Mr. McKENZIE: It goes on the poles already there for seven miles?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then there is a break in to the shore. How far does it run down the shore?

Mr. REID: It runs seven and one-half miles, and it starts off with telegraph poles, and come out two miles, and goes six miles behind the mountain to New Harris, so that would give eight miles of poles, and fifteen and one-half miles of wire.

Mr. McKENZIE: How far does that leave you from New Campbellton, which is further down the shore on the same line?

Mr. REID: I do not know that territory, and the deputy cannot inform me.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was not consulted about this matter, and I do not know whose plan the hon. minister has before him. This is all a very deserving settlement, but I do not see why make two bites of a cherry. If it is accommodating that settlement at all it should go right down to New Campbellton, and I hope the minister will attend to it.

Mr. REID: Is New Campbellton not already connected on the main line?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a telegraph there, and if a telephone were within decent reach it would be a great accommodation.

Mr. REID: I can quite understand that, but the hon. gentleman will see that this other territory is not served at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: But it must be 20 miles from where it stops to New Campbellton, and no line between. I think the minister will likely extend it down there by and by. With reference to the expenditure of $3,400 for the obtaining of poles and for repairs, where is that being spent, and who has control of it?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. REID: I am informed that the poles are purchased from the farmers all along the line.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is a large system—the whole island of Cape Breton. What county is it in?

Mr. REID: There are poles scattered along the line all over the section—166 poles were purchased from farmers between Gillisville and the south side of East bay. From Eskasoni to Grand Narrows, 22 miles, 700 poles are required; from Grand Narrows to shunacadie, 240 poles, and they were purchased from the farmers in that section. From Big Bras d'Or to Englishtown, 14 miles, 450 poles are required; from Louisburg to Gabarus, 38; from Gabarus to Marion bridge, 50; from Gabarus to Enon, 165. Thus a total of 1,809 poles were purchased in 56½ miles, as I understand from the farmers in the several sections.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the minister put an upset price on poles?

Mr. REID: Yes, $1.25 with long haulage, and $1 for short haulage.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am surprised to find that the poles from Gillesville to East Bay and Grand Narrows are all gone already. Those poles are only six or seven years old. On whose report are all the new poles coming in? It is a comparatively new line.

Mr. REID: I am told they are all spruce poles in that section, and the superintendent tells me that about seven years is the life of a spruce pole.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any particular report to the department for the necessity of these poles?

Mr. REID: Yes, there is a report from the lineman. There is no doubt the poles are in bad condition, for otherwise they would not renew them.

Mr. McKENZIE: The superintendent is present, and he will pardon me for being inquisitive about this thing. When we had this famous election there were poles taken out all the way from Baddeck up to bay St. Lawrence and allowed to rot on the wayside. I am anxious to have things done properly in my riding, and I am not in favour of encouraging a business of that kind. Who is to have charge of the business. Mr. Livingstone is the superintendent, and no friend of mine, and appointed by the present Administration. I believe he is a decent man, and I should like to know if this work is to be put in under Mr. Livingstone. If so, every chap who thinks he is a ward heeler can get an order for telegraph poles, whether they are wanted or not.

Mr. REID: I am informed that between Washabuck Centre and Iona is about seven miles, and that Mr. Dunlop who is dead, was the line repairer at the time, and he ordered some poles without the authority of the department, but afterwards the poles were taken over. The poles were used on the line and there was no loss of any kind. There were not very many poles.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where were they used?

Mr. REID: Between Washabuck Centre and Grass pond. The poles I am referring to were the 309 poles.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was no telegraph line between Washabuck Centre and Grass Pond. The minister is providing for poles between Washabuck Centre and McKay's point. If you are going to Grass pond you would go in 11 miles. That is down within two miles of Iona station, and there is no telegraph there at all, so the minister is misinformed.

Mr. REID: I am only giving information as I have received it. The superintendent tells me there is a line between Washabuck Centre and Grass pond, that there are already seven offices on the line, and that those poles were used.

Mr. McKENZIE: Of course the minister does not know the geography of the district. You can start from Washabuck Centre and follow the shore all the way around to Grass pond. If there is a line there now, why is the minister providing for the first three miles from Washabuck Centre down to McKay's point, along the shore?

Mr. REID: Of course I do not know the geography. The superintendent tells me it is in the opposite direction, southwest of this line.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister tell me where are the offices between Washabuck Centre and Iona, and who have them?

Mr. REID: The postmaster at Grass pond has one; then there are several by the name of McNeill who have offices.

Mr. McKENZIE: What has the minister to say about Mr. Lavingston whose particular business it would be to look after this work? Is it the intention that he should have charge of purchasing those poles and seeing that the work is properly done?

Mr. REID: The general repairers have charge of purchasing those poles. There are two in that section, one named Dunlop, and the other Joseph Logue.

Mr. McKENZIE: If you put the matter in charge of Joseph Logue, it would be well and honestly done.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I am informed that the Nova Scotia Telephone Company is going to build a line along the shore, parallel with the proposed line. If that be so, will the Government build its line along the same route?

Mr. REID: We have never heard of it. I will have the department make inquiries before we proceed with this work. Of course, it would be absurd to parallel another line.

British Columbia—Ashcroft-Barkerville telephone line—branch from 70-Mile House to Mount Olie, $9,000.

Mr. CARVELL: I think before we come to this we should have an explanation from the minister on what certainly is a new policy to a very great extent at least. I have before me a return which was brought down a few days ago containing a copy of the papers with reference to the Government of the Dominion building competing telephone lines in British Columbia paralleling lines of the Okanagan Telephone Company already in operation. Up to the present time the Government has been justifying the expenditure of those comparatively large amounts of money on the ground that the lines were being constructed in out-of-the-way districts, putting the people of those districts into communication with the rest of the world, and that it was impossible for such communication to be established unless the Government came to the rescue. I thought he strained it to the breaking point in dealing with the county of Dorchester. We all know conditions there, and the minister did not try to explain it at all. He simply threw himself on the mercy of the House and said, "For God's sake put this thing through." We have an entirely different condition of affairs in the province of British Columbia. The minister may say the idea is to give telephonic communication to outlying settlers, but before he does so I want to point out a few things which appear in this return, so that he will not stumble too far into it. We find there has been a genuine competition going on in the province of British Columbia between a well-established company, known as the Okanagan Telephone Company, and the Government. The question was, which was going to win out. Of course the inevitable happened—the Government won out, because the Okanagan Telephone Company had to furnish their own money and run the line as a business proposition, and could not compete with the Government, which was throwing in money at the rate of $25,000 in the first year, and in 1915-16, $97,000, and it is now up to $200,000, and no man on earth could tell where it would be if things were unfortunately allowed to continue for three or four years longer. I find from the statement made by the local superintendent, Mr. W. H. Stevens, that the system of the Okanagan Telephone Company comprises about 138 miles, and consists of trunk lines built to connect nine local exchanges. These exchanges are located at Salmon Arm, Enderby, Armstrong, Vernon, Lumby, Kelowna, Peachland, Summerland and Penticton. The Government system comprises about 1,300 miles, and has been constructed for the purpose of affording telephone service to the widely-scattered settlements throughout the region, while incidentally operating six local exchanges located at Nicola, Merrit, Princeton, Hedley, Keremeos and Chase. Then there came a fight between Enderby and Vernon, I think, and in some cases for nearly 100 miles—I am not exactly sure as to the mileage, but for a long distance in any event—the Government lines and the company lines were parallel, and, as if that was not bad enough, the Government actually built another line parallel to the company line.

Mr. REID: How long was that?

Mr. CARVELL: Somewhere about fifteen or twenty miles.

Mr. REID: Is it not the other way? Did not the company build after the Government line?

Mr. CARVELL: No, the company built first and the Government line was built afterwards. It ran into 1916 and the matter was referred to the Minister of Agriculture. He took the very wise course of handing it back to the local superintendent. He said that the superintendent was on the ground and he knew the conditions better. But there was a recommendation by the Conservative Association. So they built the line. Finally it got so bad that they had to come to some kind of an agreement, and an agreement was entered into between the Government and the company. While I do not know the geography of that portion of British Columbia sufficiently well to discuss it as the minister can, I think the great majority of these lines are in the minister's own constituency. I find here tens of thousands of dollars to be spent in the Okanagan country which I understand is in the minister's constituency. But here is one little thing that I can tell without being very intimately acquainted with the geography of the country. In the agreement between the parties it is provided that:

> The company agrees to extend within three months the local circuit from Enderby to Mara connecting with the Enderby exchange to take care of the local business.

I find in these estimates this item:

> Okanagan telephone system—establishment of rural system between Enderby and Mara, $2,100.

That must be the same thing. This carries out exactly the same idea as that laid down by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue in Dorchester awhile ago in the House when he said: "The people want it." That is what is going on in British Columbia to-day. They made a trade with the Okanagan Telephone Company by which the telephone company is to do certain things; but sufficient political influence is brought to bear and the Government is doing it instead of the company.

Mr. REID: When was that agreement entered into?

Mr. CARVELL: The 16th June, 1917.

Mr. REID: These supplementary estimates were prepared some time ago and if that agreement was made since, of course, this item would not go on.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, if we knew these things we would discuss them.

Mr. REID: When we come to the item we will strike it out.

Mr. CARVELL: The Minister of Agriculture has been for three or four years building up the Government telephone system in his county in competition with a private firm. Now he comes down to Parliament and asks for—and I suppose it will be forced through—a vote for $50,000 for building telephone lines. Why, he is worse than the Minister of Inland Revenue. That hon. gentleman only wanted a few miles. He is a poor innocent creature. The idea of the Minister of Agriculture entering into a conspiracy with the Minister of Inland Revenue and then beating him out to that extent—putting off the poor Minister of Inland Revenue with a paltry $3,500 and taking $50,000 for himself. The Minister of Agriculture must be covering every mount, crag and valley in his constituency with telephones. Then they jump over to Vancouver island. I suppose that is where our hon. friends from Vancouver island come in. I do not think they will contend that these are all extensions; they seem to be a lot of new works entirely. I realize that my hon. friends are all sitting around here, and I know that they are going to put up some plausible excuse for all this expenditure; but, after all, the only possible excuse is the election, nothing else in the world. These people know that without something like this they are in pretty bad shape in British Columbia, and they are simply calling upon the people in the eastern part of Canada to put up money to help them to win the election. I would think it pretty small business if the people in eastern Canada were playing the game that our friends from the West are playing. I suppose that nothing that anybody could say would divert the minister from carrying out the wishes of his friends, but this is opening up something which is very vicious. I do not know if you would expect it. There has been a good deal of talk about the Canadian Northern deal, but this is as bad as that—it is worse, because that is a great transportation proposition, it is in existence and it must be carried on in some way. Men may honestly differ as to the manner in which we should work out the Canadian Northern problem, but here is a new policy of spending public money which should be expended by the people of the locality, as is being done in nearly every other portion of Canada. All the telegraph and telephone lines which the Government have built heretofore, except in British Columbia, have been in outlying districts where there are very few people. but I learn by this report that they go into the city of Armstrong, and they are able to string their lines on electric light poles some sixty in number. Talk about going to the outlying districts. They find that traffic is so heavy that they are compelled to have additional facilities to enable them to carry on the business. Yet they say that it is necessary in order to give the people telephone communication. I think we ought to have some explanation of this matter from the minister. I am glad to see he is going to strike out one item. He should strike out the whole of those items excepting possibly that for the Yukon. I know nothing about that. I assume that, if there is to be telephonic communication in the Yukon, it may be necessary that it should be provided by the Government. With that exception, I can see no justification for this expenditure excepting that it is necessary to get votes in the coming election.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not purpose taking up very much of the time of the committee but I do not want to allow the remarks of my hon. friend—although I think they are not meant seriously—to pass without saying a few words. He seems to think that there is something sinister and peculiar in the extension of the telephone system in British Columbia. A good many remarks have been made about the system in British Columbia, and I think that the committee, or some members of it, are under some misapprehension regarding the whole matter. My hon. friend said that I seemed determined to cover every crag, valley and mountain in British Columbia with telephones. When I tell the committee that my own constituency of Yale-Cariboo is twice as big as the whole of the Maritime Provinces, hon. members will understand that we are dealing with a condition of things that is in no way comparable with the condition to be found in any other part of Canada. This telephone system has sprung out of the desire to give communication to the old established settlements far from civilization throughout the province, and as the traffic would not justify any company in taking it up it was only natural that the Government should do it. It was not this Government that took the step first.

For instance, in the north end, in 1904, when I first went over my present constituency, I took a team of horses at Ashcroft, leaving the main line of the Canadian Pacific and drove 755 miles before I saw the railway again. There were settlements like Barkerville into which gold miners went from California in 1862. These men are hundreds of miles away from other settlements, shut off from every one else. There were men there in 1904 who had never even seen a railway, some of the old miners who had gone in there in 1862. I think it is perfectly desirable and justifiable that such pioneers, who have settled the remote parts, should have, even at the expense of some of the more fortunate parts of the country, some of the advantages of modern civilization, particularly in the way of communication. There are cases like Barkerville. In 1904 I drove out from the 150 Mile House into the Chilcoten country. There are thousands of cattle there on isolated cattle ranches. I met one man over on the Fraser river who had had to send for the doctor at 150 Mile House owing to the illness of his child, an illness which did not prove to be very serious, and the doctor's visit cost $75. The man was not in touch with civilization by telegraph, railway or telephone, and it is natural how people in such districts cry out for some of the conveniences that people in better settled districts enjoy. That was the genesis of the thing, and, so far as the lower part of the country is concerned, the line was taken down there by the late Government—not by this Government—from Kamloops down through the Similkameen and Penticton country, and part of the Okanagan. This is another stretch, 250 miles and 350 to 400 miles around. When I was first there in 1904 I practically had to drive the whole distance. There was nothing there but the main line of the Canadian Pacific. It is true that, later on, the company to which my hon. friend refers came in there and established a line. They were offered a right of way on the Government line from Penticton, I think, to Vernon. They did not want that and they built a line of their own, parallelling the Government line. The Government line there had to be metallic as it was carrying the whole circuit around to the Similkameen and Okanagan country. The country went on developing, and exchanges and connections were established. I want my hon. friend to feel that I am not here to put up any plausible excuses. I am not making excuses. I have not asked for all these lines. Some of them I did not know were in, because the country is so big, and the applications were made direct to the department; and I have always taken the ground that all these things should be dealt with absolutely on their merits, and that the department should deal only with those things which were justified as of public benefit. It was quite natural that, when these large circuits were completed, the settlements, some of considerable size, should desire to be linked up to the main trunk line of the Dominion Government, and so exchanges were established and every once in a while an extension was made. I think it was justifiable for the Government to do that, and thus to make the system pay instead of being a strain as the main line was. I think that several of these districts where these votes are being asked for are now on a paying basis, and it is not a waste of money, but is a great public benefit, for the Government to build and operate the lines. It is true that when the company to which my hon. friend refers objected to some operations of the Government there was a very violent outcry, simply because the country did not want to be delivered into the hands of a company if the Government stepped out, knowing that in that event the rate might be very considerably increased, and we charge a rate that actually pays in a great many cases. But naturally, in a country like that which is very expensive to build in, they did not want to be delivered into the hands of a monopoly, and there was more or less friction between the Government and the company system. But I have done my best. I have met the directors and discussed the thing with officers and shareholders out there and have done everything I could to arrive at a settlement fair not only to the investors in the private company but to the public who are getting the advantage of Government 'phones. I think I am within the mark in saying that quite recently an agreement was entered into that is satisfactory to the company, the public, and the Government. One could not do more and one could not do less.

I do not want to discuss these items unduly, but I may take up one or two. My hon. friend referred to Bella Coola. The hon. member for Comox-Atlin (Mr. Clements) is interested in that and I am interested to this extent, that that area from Ashcroft north to Caribou, 260 miles up, was settled forty to fifty years ago and is absolutely cut off from the coast. The line running from the Caribou road, 300 miles direct to the coast of British Columbia, has put the people on all these scattered branches, all the pioneers in that country, in direct touch with the coast of British Columbia; and although it is true that these lines are costly, I think that, on the whole, this is justifiable expenditure on the part of any Government, justifiable in its inception—for it was not started by this Government—justified by its continuation by this Government on behalf of people who, whatever else may be said of them, have laboured and founded settlements in the country where they are isolated, valley from valley, by stretches of mountain ranges, and so are cut off from the privileges we enjoy. I do not think that any member would hesitate to endorse in the main the principle involved, and most of the details, if he had lived under the conditions under which these people have lived.

Mr. CARVELL: That all sounds very nice from the standpoint of a member who wants public money expended in his constituency, and I have no doubt that everything the hon. minister has said is true. We know that if people go out into the mountains a hundred miles from Ashcroft on the Cariboo road they must not expect much civilization. But they have been going there for fifty or sixty years and people have got along very well. Perhaps they have suffered in many cases from want of telephone communication, and there is no doubt that the telephone will be as great a benefit to these people as has been pictured by the minister. But you do not have to picture things like that. I am surprised that my friend took up so much time telling us the benefits of telephone communication with the outside world. We all know as much about that as he does, although we may not know as much about the internal conditions of British Columbia. But any one who has ever been there knows that the Lord never intended very many people to live there anyway, and he will not be disappointed in the next one hundred years.

Mr. BURRELL: While my hon. friend says that the Lord never intended many people to live there, down in the Okanagan valley, for which many of these votes are asked, they have sent—and that is only a very small part of my constituency—nearly 3,000 men to the front to fight our battles.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and they have sent them from all over Canada, too. It is no use of my friend trying to wave any flapdoodle flags. We are talking business to-night, and if my friend wants to get on his hind legs and talk that kind of thing we will do it with him. But let us talk business now, and my friend can talk to-morrow on the other side of the case. He talks about sending 3,000 men from the Okanagan valley. Does he think that he is justified, under present conditions, in spending $300,000 since the war began, in order to give telephone communication to his constituents? That is the question which I want him to answer. That is the ground on which I objected last night to the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars in the constituency of the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley); that is the ground on which we are finding fault with this whole transaction. My hon. friend talks about sending men to the war; yet he is willing to use $300,000 that ought to be devoted to taking care of these men and furnishing them with supplies and munitions. He does not seem to care two straws whether they get that money or not.

Mr. BURRELL: Where does my hon. friend get the $300,000?

Mr. CARVELL: Since the war began, taking into consideration this vote, the amount will be nearer $350,000 than $300,000—that is for telephones alone in British Columbia. My hon. friend talks about sending men to the war; he had better try to get money to keep those men supplied with munitions. I was charged last evening with doing a mean thing when I tried to direct the attention of the Acting Minister of Public Works to the actual condition of financial affairs in Canada to-day. I doubt whether the members of this House really know how serious the financial conditions are. I know enough to make me feel that every man in Canada who has any desire to see Canada do its duty in this war must be very seriously concerned about our financial condition. If these were normal times and the Government were anxious to embark on the principle of public ownership of telephones, I know of no place in Canada where such services are more greatly needed than in British Columbia. But it is wrong to spend $300,000 to give my hon. friend's constituents telephone communication at a time when the money is needed so badly that I dare not say here how badly it really is needed. My hon. friend knows the conditions better than I do. These works may be called extensions, but after all they are new expenditures. The Government has taken over the Okanagan Telephone Company. The people in that country have got along all right for some years with the Okanagan Telephone Company and its connections; yet fifteen or twenty extensions are proposed from the Okanagan telephone line out into different parts of the country. It might be wise to engage in this work in times of peace, but it is not all right in time of war, when undertaken by the Minister of Agriculture in order to get votes. At a time when the Empire is simply up against it in respect of the necessities of the war, the Minister of Agriculture presses the Minister of Public Works, against his will, to put a proposal like this through the House. I do not think we had better hear any more from the minister about the men that have gone to the front from his constituency.

Mr. BURRELL: I was not forced to apply for these votes. Many of them were not known to me; they were applied for by people interested who thought they were justified. My hon. friend showed unnecessary heat in regard to one of my remarks when he said that it was no wonder that few people settled in that part of British Columbia. I merely mentioned the number of enlistments as an indication of the number of the people there were in that particular valley.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend says that he did not ask for the vote. I find by this correspondence——

Mr. BURRELL: I did not say that I did not ask for any of it; I said that some of it was even unknown to me.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister had the benefit of the advice of a gentleman who was very close to the gentleman who is sitting beside him (Mr. Stevens), and who, I think, probably would know about the matter. The minister cannot take much credit to himself because he did not know of some of these items. I have no doubt that he knew about all of those affecting his own constituency.

Mr. NESBITT: I have no doubt that the Minister of Agriculture is right in his desire that these people should have telephone and telegraphic communication with the outside world. I appreciate their necessity; I myself, if I lived in a place where I had no communication with the outside world, would be glad to be furnished with telephone communication. However, these people have been there since a little after 1849, at the time of the California gold craze; they have done without telephone and telegraph communication for a great number of years, and I suppose they got along very well. That was a very touching story that we heard about the man with the sick child; I always feel sympathy for people who are so situated. At the same time, when these people went into the country of their own free will, there was no telephone ahead of them, no telegraph, no railway, in some cases no roads. Last year we bought a railway because those who had lived in the locality in question for a hundred and fifty years had never had railway communication. These people are in somewhat the same box. During three years Canada has experienced conditions of financial distress; the people are being taxed very heavily for the carrying on of the war. They do not resent that, but they do resent the undertaking of new expenditure not connected with the war. I do not say that these expenditures are being undertaken for election purposes; I do not know that that is true. But I do say that these people could get along very well without this accommodation until after the war is over. A few linkings up might have been provided for, but I think it is a short-sighted and uncalled for policy on the part of the Government to spend about $200,000 at a time when we require every dollar we can get for our part in the war. When the main estimates were going through the then Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) told us that no new undertakings would be proceeded with this year, or during the war. We took his word for that, and passed his estimates as they came up. He was good enough to strike off many of the estimates that had been in for two or three years, in order to demonstrate his intention of really not undertaking any expenditure that could be avoided. As it is the intention of the Government to put these items through, no matter what we say about them, I suppose it is a waste of time to discuss them. However, I cannot but protest against this unnecessary expenditure during the war.

Mr. REID: These items are all in the estimates, and I would like them to pass. As the Minister of Agriculture has stated, we will let the department look over the whole matter again, and if there are any items that we can stand over I will promise the hon. member that, unless the works are urgently required, we shall not go ahead with them.

Mr. STEVENS: It is too late in the season to go ahead with some of them.

Mr. REID: As it is late in the season, we may not be able to go ahead with some of them. I will promise to keep the expenditure down to the very lowest possible point and to have the whole matter looked into again.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a fair proposition, although I observe by the returns of last year that work was carried on during November and December. There is a return by Mr. Stevens, the superintendent, that one man was in charge from the 3rd of October to the 12th of November, at which date another man took charge, and there is nothing to show how long he worked, so the fact that it is late in the season would not make any difference. I pointed out the night before last how they can do these things when it is necessary and when there is an election coming on. Last February, in New Brunswick, they built roads when there was four feet of snow on the ground, and the people of that province do not know anything as compared with the people of British Columbia in regard to matters of that kind. With this pledge from the minister, while I do not withdraw my opposition, I do not feel it is necessary for me to say anything further on this subject.

Mr. McKENZIE: I must again bring to the notice of the department my serious ground for complaint about expenditures of this kind. I have repeated over and over again that my people will expect me to bring this matter to the attention of the minister. The people of my province have had large votes and large works promised to them. They have harbours requiring improvements, and fishermen of my province are in need of breakwaters and wharves. The gentleman who was for some years responsible Minister of Public Works, (Mr. Rogers) told us that the situation was grave; that money was required for other purposes, and that we must not press for money at all. As I have shown from Hansard to-night, we accepted his word in regard to the matter, and we stopped pressing for these appropriations. We were told that all the money the country could get together was for one purpose only; that any other expenditures would be of the slightest possible kind and only in regard to matters of the greatest possible urgency. The Minister of Agriculture has been in this Parliament as minister since 1911. In 1911, 1912, 1913 and the early part of 1914, there was an overflowing treasury. He found the treasury with $40,000,000 of a surplus in it, with all bills paid and the country carrying splendid sail, and everything all right. But during those years from 1911, to 1916 there was nothing in the estimates about those telephones and telegraph lines in British Columbia. Conditions have not changed in regard to them since my hon. friend became Minister of Agriculture. The necessity was just as strong years ago as it is now, and I cannot understand why a minister of the Crown should come to us at this stage, a few weeks before an election, with an extraordinary presentment of this kind. I think I have been in this House longer than the Minister of Agriculture, and in my experience of fourteen years I have never seen a private member or a minister taking the responsibility of presenting for the consideration of a committee of this House such an array of items as he presents to us in the midst of a war and a few weeks before an election. He had five or six years of better conditions when those things might have been presented, but not a word was said about them The minister may be acting in absolutely good faith, but, in view of the conditions confronting us, it looks as if this were done for a purpose, particularly in view of the statement by the ex-Minister of Public Works that no extraordinary expenditure of this kind would be made. All the ministers, who are supposed to be strong men in their counties, who are supposed not to require to be bolstered and propped up by expenditures of this kind to ensure their return to Parliament, should set a good example of economy, and should run their elections upon their strength as men and as ministers and not float their elections on votes of this kind. If a private member should present to the minister a list of items for expenditures on behalf of his constituency, what answer could he make? No answer at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to correct a statement which the Minister of Agriculture has made and which, I think, is an error. I do not say that he intentionally sought to mislead the committee, because I do not think the minister would intentionally mislead any one.

Mr. BURRELL: Certainly not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Agriculture rather put forward the argument that these extraordinary votes were required because the people to be accommodated were in remote settlements in British Columbia shut out from the world, and that, therefore, it was only reasonable and fair that they should have telephonic communication. But the larger amounts are for telephonic communication in well-settled districts of British Columbia. Take for instance the Golden-Windermere line, the extension from Windermere to Fairmont. There is a daily train running all the way from Golden to the Crow's Nest line, as my hon. friend knows. The country is well settled and there are quite a number of prosperous villages, almost towns, in that locality. It is one of the most beautiful sections of country to be found in the world, and a private telephone system would be almost as apt to pay there as in any other part of Canada. Then again take the Okanagan valley. There are some eight or ten telephone lines there connected with the Okanagan Valley Telephone system. There is a railway from Sicamous Junction to the head of the lake, and there is daily steamer communication, summer and winter, from the head of the lake to the foot. The country is beautiful, rich and well-settled. That surely does not come within the description that the minister has sought to give to the committee of the localities occupied by those people to whom telephone accommodation is being given. Let us take the largest amount in the estimates, $28,000 for an extension from Ashcroft to Agassiz in connection with the Okanagan Valley Telephone system. Both of those points are stations on the Canadian Pacific. Thus the proposal is to spend $28,000 to build a telephone line between two important stations on that line of railway.

Mr. CARVELL: They have the Canadian Northern on the other side of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It cannot be said that the people in that district are shut out from the world. They have the two termini, and the stations on the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend shows he is unacquainted with the facts. The item he has mentioned, $28,000, was put in the estimates, I believe, on the strongest possible recommendation of the Board of Trade of Vancouver.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: For this reason: hitherto the only telephonic communication between the large mining centres of the interior of British Columbia and the coast, the financial centres, has been Seattle, Spokane, and north from Nelson and further in. It has been an exceedingly difficult method of communication. By linking the line from Agassiz to Ashcroft, we can have a direct line through from the coast to the interior. One of the great trials in British Columbia during the 25 years that I have been a resident of the province has been to see millions and millions of dollars worth of business going to Spokane every year from the interior of British Columbia. Two things are going to overcome that. One is already in operation, the Kettle Valley railroad. That is one of the most necessary works to link up the coast district with the interior. This telephone system is another vastly important one. My hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) mentioned another thing, and that is the necessity for retrenching, because of economic conditions. I do not want to make any far-fetched argument. I am discussing this matter from a business and economic standpoint. We have been developing in British Columbia certain mining centres. We have Princeton and we have Hedley, and we have mining districts on the Kootenay further east again. These have all been linked up by the Government system, and they would never have been linked up by any other system. A great many of these items, while headed Okanagan, have very little to do with the settlement of Okanagan. They connect the main Okanagan trunk line with outlying districts and with centres remote from civilization. The mining centres are usually away off in the mountains, remote from settled districts. I will give one illustration, to give the committee an idea of what we are up against. One company has spent about $3,000,000 in the last two years in diamond drill work at Copper mountain. They have actually proven that there is over 11,000,000 tons of copper ore in the mountain, and they are tunnelling to take it out. That is only one company, and there are dozens. One of the greatest industries is mining, and the only way you can successfully produce from our mining resources is by having adequate communication and proper methods. Those are essential.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How far is that mine from the main Government line?

Mr. STEVENS: I should say it would be about ten miles.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And that company has spent $3,000,000 in drill work, and want the Government to provide them with a telephone? In New Brunswick the lumbermen would have provided themselves with a telephone, if they spent a fraction of that sum.

Mr. STEVENS: I say that is just an illustration of what one company is doing, and we have dozens in the interior in a similar position. As far as telephonic communication is concerned, nearly all that mining business has been done through Spokane. My hon. friend will see on the file letters from the Vancouver Board of Trade, which have been working on this proposition for years, to try and induce the Government to put this line through. The telephone company out there, which operates on the coast, goes to Agassiz; it would not build the line from Agassiz to Ashcroft and into the interior. No company would do that. There is a stretch of country there which, if we can connect it up, will bring the whole business of the interior of British Columbia into Vancouver, and it is of vital importance, not only to Vancouver but to Canada as a whole, to keep the business as far as possible within Canadian channels. When I went to British Columbia we used to think the dry belt south of Kamloops was utterly useless except for grazing. I do not think that at that time there was a bushel of wheat exported from that district. Last year 250,000 bushels was exported from Kamloops, raised in the district to the south, to which it is desired to extend this telephone line. I received a letter yesterday from a man who had gone in there, taken up land and gone into farming, and he said the only way to induce people to go into these districts was to give them some sort of communication. Then there is the Okanagan valley, which exported to different parts of Canada, over 3,000 carloads of fruit and vegetables. The hon. gentleman must remember that if you are going to develop production in British Columbia, or anywhere else, you have to provide facilities. Unfortunately in British Columbia our agricultural land is in the valleys, and is split up by long ranges of mountains, more or less remote, and can only be reached by certain avenues of communication. These votes are for the purpose of linking up the scattered districts in British Columbia. I know my hon. friend is not serious when he casts a reflection on British Columbia as a desirable place in which to live, as I know when he was there two years ago he expressed considerable pleasure over his visit. We will not censure him in that regard, because I am sure he does not wish to reflect upon the province. Those who have lived there for many years think a great deal of British Columbia as a place to live in.

Mr. CARVELL: The old saying, "Every man to his liking, as the old woman said when she kissed the cow," but if it suits my hon. friend I have no objection. However, the hon. gentleman has made the strongest argument against the granting of this money that could possibly be made. He is speaking of a country where the mining companies are spending $3,000,000 in development, and taking out $10,000,000 worth of ore. They have a valley which exports 3,000 carloads of fruit. The country around Kamloops which was always supposed to be a dry country, last year exported a million bushels of wheat. In our country, when we have conditions of that kind, we build our own telephone lines, we do not ask the Government to build them. No argument so absolutely condemns the proposition as that of my hon. friend from Vancouver.

Mr. STEVENS: My point is that there is a piece of country going through the Hope Mountain from Agassiz to Ashcroft, where there is no settlement, hardly, except on the line of the Canadian Pacific, running, as my hon. friend will probably remember, a distance of 85 miles or thereabouts. No company will build a line there, and our only communication between Kamloops and those districts which I have mentioned and Vancouver, is by a route about 650 or 700 miles, by way of Spokane and Seattle. It is absolutely absurd to say that the huge developments in the interior of British Columbia are to be deprived of means of communication with the business centre and shipping facilities of Vancouver, for the want of a few miles of trunk telephone lines.

Mr. CARVELL: That is exactly what I thought. There is enormous business in the centres and there is enormous business in Vancouver, but they will not spend their own money in order to get telephone communication.

Mr. STEVENS: How could the city of Vancouver or the district around Vancouver spend money to have telephone communication?

Mr. CARVELL: They are spending money all over Canada. Capitalists are putting up the money. The moment there is business to be done they can get a telephone line, but as long as they have a paternal government, with the Minister of Agriculture saying, "Never mind whether you are getting money to pay for munitions or not, we will stand by you for the telephones," of course they will not put up their own money for telephones. Just as long as the minister holds out the hope that the Government will furnish the money, just so long will the capitalists sit back and let the Government do it. I am opposing this whole system of public ownership of telephones. The Government in its paternalism is building those lines, and if it left them alone they would be built by business men.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Reference was made to the extension of lines from Ashcroft to Agassiz. I understand there is telegraph communication between those points.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. REID: If the items are passed, the Minister of Agriculture and I will go through the whole list, and if we can see our way clear not to proceed with any of them, we will do so.

Mr. CARVELL: You can do without them all.

Mr. REID: We will do without as many as we can.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend knows very well that the Railway Commission would give them authority to put a circuit upon the poles of the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian Northern between Ashcroft and Agassiz, if necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps they are going to do that.

Mr. CARVELL: There are many cases where the telephone wires are strung along the railway poles. If the business people of British Columbia wanted those lines, and were not looking to the Government for them, there would be no difficulty at all in getting the connection.

Okanagan telephone system—establishment of rural system between Enderby and Mara, $2,100.

Mr. REID: I move that this item be struck out.

Motion agreed to, and item struck out.

Public works—chargeable to income—miscellaneous—river gaugings and metering—further amount required, $7,500.

Mr. REID: This further amount of $7,500 is asked for by District Engineer Chapleau for maintenance of gauges above lake of the Woods, automatic and sight, calibration of power section Fort Frances-International Falls, office reduction of data and compilation. This work is necessary in order to collect data as to the fluctuation of various rivers so that information regarding all rivers will eventually be on record. The work done during the present fiscal year consisted of maintenance of gauges, securing and calibration of data, and general supervision of private works on the river.

Gratuity to Onesime Chayer, who was permanently injured while at work at Lake Timiskaming dam—further amount, $500.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How much was paid to him before?

Mr. REID: Five hundred dollars.

To pay Robert Dunbar for reporting proceedings at coroner's inquest into the death of the victims of the Parliament buildings fire, $74.40.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister kindly state whether it is intended to pay any claims which have been presented for loss of property in the fire?

Mr. REID: There was a statement made the other day to the effect that certain claims were filed, but they have not yet been considered. Of course they have nothing to do with this item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This item is for reporting proceedings.

Mr. REID: It is to pay Mr. Dunbar for reporting proceedings at the coroner's inquest into the death of the victims.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister tell us how these property claims came to be filed?

Mr. REID: The parties simply filed them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Was there any indication given by the department that it would consider claims?

Mr. REID: No, they just sent them in.

Construction and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, surveys in connection therewith and settlement of land damages—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I feel somewhat interested in this work, because it was initiated while I had the honour of occupying the position of Minister of Public Works. I would like to ask whether the results have been satisfactory.

Mr. REID: It is working out satisfactorily.

Compassionate allowances to the widows of the late members of the crew of dredge No. 6, who were drowned when the vessel was wrecked in a storm near Shag Rock, N.S., on the 17th January, 1917, as follows: $2,000 each to the widows of Capt. L. A. Hatfield, Alzear LeBlanc, Harry Burrows, Peter Bonin, William Holland, John Greek, Gordon Miller; $1,000 each to the widow and mother of A. R. Selig, and $1,000 to the mother of Foster Knickle—$17,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain the difference in the allowance given to the relatives of the members of the crew?

Mr. REID: My information is that in the case of the married men $2,000 goes to the widows and families of the men who were drowned, and in the case of single men, $1,000 goes to the relatives.

Mr. NESBITT: The item says: "$1,000 each to the widow and mother of A. R. Selig, and $1,000 to the mother of Foster Knickle"

Mr. REID: In the case of Selig, $1,000 went to the widow and $1,000 to the mother.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The point is, one widow gets $2,000 and another only $1,000. This has occurred at different times during the present session.

Mr. REID: In the case of A. R. Selig, his mother and his widow get $1,000 each. They were both living with him. Foster Knickle was unmarried and his mother was living with him. She gets $1,000. The intention was to give $1,000 to each of the persons who were living with and dependent on the person drowned.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We have just passed an item for the widow of the late C. Gee who was drowned on June 14, 1917, near Nanaimo. In that case we have given $2,000. I cannot understand why one widow gets $1,000 and another $2,000.

Mr. REID: In one case the man left a widow and a mother who were the only ones who were dependent on him. In the other case there was a widow with children. She had a small family dependent on her.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The dredge was wrecked on the coast of my constituency. It was sent in the winter along the south coast of Nova Scotia at a very stormy season without any proper appliances to enable the men to escape. The hawser broke, the dredge went on the rocks, there was no lifeboat and no way of the men escaping. Their lives were apparently thrown away by the carlessness of some of the officials of the department. Has the minister a report of the accident from which he can give us some information? I do not think we have had any information beyond that which has appeared in the newspapers.

Mr. REID: There was an official examination by the wreck commissioner and the report is in the department. I have not got it here now. I am told that the wreck commissioner exonerates the officials of the Public Works Department entirely.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who was to blame?

Mr. REID: It was the storm. It was an extraordinary storm.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why was the dredge sent there in the winter time?

Mr. REID: She had gone before over the same course exactly in the winter time and no trouble had resulted. But in this case a great storm came on. The wreck commissioner, if any blame could be attached to anybody, would have had no hesitation in placing the blame.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My recollection is that a tug was taking this dredge along the coast and that the men on the dredge were those who were drowned. They had no life-boats and no means of escape. Because of a defective hawser, the dredge parted from the tug and was swept on the rocks. I do not know how everybody can be exonerated from blame for an occurrence like that. I have never seen any satisfactory explanation as to why that dredge was moved from one part of Nova Scotia to the other at that season of the year. There was no work for it at the place where it was going, and it was not sent there, I understand to do any particular work at that time. There is a suspicion among the people who have suffered from this accident that somebody was to blame.

Mr. REID: If there had been any possible chance of blame being attached to anybody, the wreck commissioner would have found some one to blame. But he exonerates the officials in every way. In the report I find it is stated that:

> The court found that the loss of the dredge and scows was due primarily to the scow breaking adrift from the dredge; secondly, the Roebling's hawser parting; and lastly, to the inability of the crew of the dredge to get the Roebling's hawser on board the scow. The loss of the crew is attributed to the fact that they did not get in their boats when they were first put in the water, and why they did not do so, the court failed to understand.
> No blame was in any way attached to the department in connection with the loss of the dredge.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That does not explain why the dredge went there in the stormy season.

Mr. REID: We would not have much to do with the details. They are all attended to by the officials of that department. But this report says that no blame should be attached to them. I take it for granted that she was being sent at the end of the season.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the date of the wreck?

Mr. REID: The report states:

> They left Isaac's Harbour at 7.30 a.m., January 17, and at 9.30 a.m. the stern scow broke adrift. The wind was then W.S.W. and increasing, and sea rising. The Lisgar after having been signalled several times by the dredge, let go his hawser from the dredge and picked the scow up. At 11.45 a.m. the Roebling's hawser parted close to the dredge. After heaving the hawser in, they bent on a 3½-inch line, steamed down close to the dredge and after some time succeeded in getting the small line on board the dredge and told them on the dredge to haul in and get a turn with the hawser—they did not do this but made the small line fast. Capt. Mood of the Roebling then told them that he would try and turn the dredge round so as to give them a lee side to put their boats out on—he had just succeeded in getting the dredge round when the small line parted.

In the meantime the captain of the Lisgar when he saw that the dredge had broken adrift attempted to heave his line in, which he could not do and then gave orders to cut the line. When this was done he proceeded close to the dredge in order to render any assistance possible.

The dredge put both her boats in the water, while the tugs lay to leeward in order to pick them up—the boats of the dredge lay alongside for some time but no attempt was made by any of the crew to get in them. Finally, one boat capsized and the other one shortly after broke adrift.

A dory was then launched over the Roebling's stern and drifted alongside the dredge. The dredge in the meantime had let go both anchors and swung head to the wind. No attempt was made by any of the crew on the dredge to get into the dory, which capsized and broke adrift about ten minutes afterwards.

The Lisgar then proceeded into the Life Saving Station at Deeming Point, but found the life-boat broken up. She then proceeded out towards the dredge.

The dredge struck on Black Ledge, pounded over and sank at 2.30 p.m., in the vicinity of Shag Rock.

Perhaps the hon. member knows these waters generally. I suppose that the dredges work pretty late in the season?

Mr. SINCLAIR: This was the worst time of the year probably.

Mr. REID: At all events, that is the report we have.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It contains no explanation of why the dredge was moved at that time. There is certainly an apparent carelessness on the part of the Marine Department in regard to the life saving station located at that port.

From the statement of the minister it would appear that the lifeboat at that place was broken and was unable to give any assistance to the wreck. If the lifeboat had been in proper repair the lifecrew might have saved the lives of those men. That has been stated in the press on several occasions, and I have never seen any proper explanation of the lifeboat's condition. The late inspector said in a letter which I saw that the Marine Department was notified that the lifeboat was broken and a request was made for a new one, but that request was disregarded by the department. Then the accident came and those men lost their lives. It is discreditable to the department if that is the case. I should like some explanation of the dredge being taken from Yarmouth, or from Lunenburg to Cape Breton at that season of the year.

Mr. REID: The dredge was being taken to Sydney to undergo repairs and receive a new boiler for the next season's work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But there is no slip or dry-dock at Sydney.

Mr. REID: She would not have to go into dry-dock to have a new boiler put in. The department have had dredges repaired at Sydney.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why did the dredge pass Halifax?

Mr. REID: I do not know. It was going to Sydney. As to the question about the lifeboat, the report says that there were boats enough on the dredge but that the men did not enter them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The boats were too small to live in that sea.

Mr. REID: The report does not say that. Of course the question of the lifeboat comes under the Marine Department.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does not the report say something about negligence in not dismantling the dredge?

Mr. REID: I do not see anything of that in the report.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister will understand that I am not in any way opposing the vote. My reason for insisting on some information is that the relatives of the men who were lost have felt, I understand, that some person was to blame and that there was carelessness on the part of both the Marine and Fisheries and Public Works Departments in this matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is another case where the advice of this distinguished man whom the minister seems to follow in all these things proved disastrous to the lives of these men. This vessel was being dragged to Sydney for the purpose of getting work for J. C. Douglas' friends in the city of Sydney—some miserable patronage. It was being taken there in the midst of winter along the most dangerous coast of Canada, without being dismantled and without any precautions being taken, in order that a few dollars could be spent in Mr. Douglas' constituency. The result is that those men have lost their lives and the Government has lost its property. It would be well for the minister not to be so very zealous in carrying out Mr. Douglas' representations.

and to be a little more careful about putting lives in jeopardy in mid-winter in order to please Mr. Douglas and to make a few miserable votes from the graft that might be made out of this vessel. There was no other reason for their going there at that time of the year.

Public works—chargeable to collection of revenue—Levis graving dock—further amount required, $2,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How is the work on the graving dock at Lévis progressing?

Mr. REID: The new dock will be completed and in operation this year.

Telegraph and telephone lines—Prince Edward Island and mainland—revote of lapsed amount, $14,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. REID: That is for two annual subsidies of $7,000 each due to the Anglo-American Company for 1915 and 1916.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does a company own the line and the Government pay a yearly subsidy?

Mr. REID: Yes. Since Confederation this has been done. It was part of the terms of Confederation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You control the rates?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why are we voting two year's subsidy now?

Mr. REID: There was a dispute between the department and this company as to the rates that they should charge and as to other matters connected with the operation of the line. For this reason, during about two years the subsidy was not paid, pending final settlement of the dispute.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We get no revenue from it.

Mr. REID: No. This communication is furnished under the terms of Confederation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Navigation is closed for several months of the year between Pictou and the Madgalen islands. Under an arrangement made at my request, during the winter months the people of the Magdalen islands received over the cable a synopsis of news from the outside world, which was distributed to different places on the island over the telegraph line. Is that service being continued?

Mr. REID: For all I know, it is. I do not know that there has been any change.

Mr. McKENZIE: The cable between the Magdalen Islands and the mainland lands at a place called Meat cove. For about a year the cable was broken, and it was not repaired,—there was a good deal of complaint about the negligence of those in charge. On that account, for a time the winter news of which the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) speaks was not conveyed from the mainland to the Magdalen islands. But the real reason was that the highly competent operator who had been in charge of the cable station at Bay St. Lawrence was dismissed by this Government. In her place they put two men, neither of whom was a telegrapher. One was named McNeil and the other McDonald; they are still there. No, and then they pick up a boy here, and a boy there and get them to do some operating. It was found convenient—by those who wanted to help them out—to keep this cable broken. There was a combination between the men who were in charge as operators and the men who were in charge of fixing the cable, and that convenient arrangement was carried out. The cable was not in a position to receive any news; it was so arranged that the blame would not fall upon those men. That is the condition there. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will find that if the people on the Mgdalen islands expect to get a news service from the mainland, they will have to insist upon the Government putting a competent operator in charge of the operating station. The Government is paying big salaries to men who are absolutely incapable of doing the work.

Mr. CARVELL: Surely the minister is not going to allow a charge like that to go by unnoticed? This is the worst of all the charges that has been made during the course of these estimates. What has the minister to say about it?

Mr. REID: All I have to say is this: It is hard for me to believe that any person in charge of a telegraph office would deliberately break the cable, as the hon. member has stated.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say that they had broken the cable. The line was left broken for over a year.

Mr. REID: Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hansard will show that I said nothing of the kind. The line broke at a convenient time, and for over a year it was left in that condition without being repaired.

Mr. REID: Well, we will put it that way—

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no need of putting it that way; that is what I said. I did not say that they broke the wire.

Mr. REID: Do I understand the hon. member to say that this line was conveniently broken, and that it was kept in that condition for a year?

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not say that it was broken by somebody. I said that it broke at a convenient season; that it was left in that condition all through the winter; that for over a year it was not repaired, notwithstanding the fact that the cable vessel Tyrian was in the vicinity.

Mr. REID: It is hard for me to believe that any man would be capable of doing such a thing. However, the hon. gentleman has made these statements—

Mr. McKENZIE: I have made them, and I stand by them.

Mr. REID: I am not asking the hon. member to take them back. As I have said, it is difficult for me to believe that any man would do such a thing, but as the hon. member has made the statement, I would not feel justified in letting the matter rest at that. Whether I had answered the hon. gentleman's remarks or not, I would have asked the deputy minister to make inquiries and to get some explanation of the matter. Certainly if men would do a thing of that kind, I do not hesitate to say that they are not fit for the positions that they are filling.

Mr. CARVELL: They should be prosecuted.

Mr. REID: They should be prosecuted if they did anything of that kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister is absolutely wrong in saying that I said that they broke the cable. I gave the minister all the data that he requires; I know what I am talking about. Let him inquire when Mr. Theriault and his wife were dismissed. They were capable officials; they were dismissed for party reasons, without the slightest justification. Let him find out, also, when the cable broke; that must be a matter of record in the department. He will find that the cable broke very shortly after the change. I do not say that these people broke the cable, but I do say that the cable broke very shortly after these two incompetent persons were appointed. For over a year the cable was left in that condition; that also must be on record in the department. The minister will find that during the time when this cable remained broken, he had these incompetent men in charge—men who could neither receive nor transmit a message. That is sufficient data for an inquiry. Let the minister investigate the matter; he will find that I am absolutely correct.

Mr. REID: I shall certainly inquire into it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Those men are still in charge.

Mr. REID: The cable was broken and no business could be done. What I cannot understand—

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister says that the cable was broken. I repeat that the cable broke; I do not know who broke it or how it broke. The breaking of the cable, however, synchronized with the appointment of these men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: During the fifteen years that I represented Magdalen islands as part of the county of Gaspé, it frequently happened that the cable broke, because it is exposed to the shifting of the ice in that section of the gulf of St. Lawrence. Possibly that was the cause of the breaking in this instance.

As to the facts, I do not know. I know that the people of the Magdalen islands were given, during the winter months, a synopsis of the news, and besides they had made arrangements with the Public Works Department through Mr. Keely, as they do most of their business with Halifax, Sydney, Pictou, and Nova Scotia generally, to wire their letters at a very low rate to the operator at Meat cove, and then the operator would mail their messages to the firms at Halifax, Sydney or Pictou, thus facilitating business with the Magdalen islands during the winter months. My hon. friend may not know it, but there is a very interesting and large population in the Magdalen islands. There are 6,000 people there, and there are some very large industries, for instance, the lobster and mackerel industries. There are some very large firms from Nova Scotia operating on the islands, and in the spring, summer and fall of the year, Americans do considerable fishing in that district. According to the Fisheries Treaty, that is one, if not the only spot in the Gulf of St. Lawrence where they can get their bait and enjoy all the privileges of our own fishermen, so that for several months in the year the Magdalen islands are frequented by a large fleet of schooners and other vessels. In the winter months however, the islanders are deprived of all communication with business firms on the mainland. I, therefore, made arrangements that they could wire their letters at a low rate to the Meat cove cable office, and the operator would mail them from that point. Each time, however, the breakage occurred, the Tyrian, which is the repairing vessel in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, could at once find out the break and make repairs; but I never heard that the cable had been out of business for such a long period as this.

Mr. REID: That is a surprise to me too.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If that is the case, it is bad for the department, and I would urge the minister to see to it that this cable is put into proper order.

Mr. REID: It is a surprise to me, too, that the cable should be out of order for a year. I cannot understand it because the officials of the Department of Public Works, with whom I have come in contact during the different times that I have been acting as minister of that department, have, always, in my judgment, been very capable men and very attentive to their duties, and unless there was some reason why that vessel could not be got, I cannot understand how the break could have been left for a year. During the war the Tyrian might have been employed on some other work from which it was hard to take her away. I have no explanation to offer why that break was not repaired within a year, but I will certainly make inquiries.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It would be better to let the item stand until the minister gets the information.

Mr. REID: There is no item in connection with the Magdalen islands.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister see that the news service is re-established; that the cable is repaired, and that the same system is maintained as regards the mailing of letters from the cable office?

Mr. REID: Yes, but the deputy has no information to show that the cable has not been repaired.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it is repaired now.

Mr. REID: The hon. member has just asked if I will see that it is repaired, but I understand that it is repaired. I understand also the news service is going on.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who recommended the dismissal of Mrs. Theriault and the appointment of McNeil and McDonald as operators of this station?

Mr. REID: I have not that information.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the minister ought to give that information to the committee. It is rather a serious matter if, at an important station like that, we have incompetent men appointed by some political influence, although unable to send a message. It looks like a very foolish thing for us to vote money to maintain a cable line if the people at the station are unable to send the message. What does the minister say to that?

Mr. REID: I do not know whether I can get the information as to who recommended the dismissal and the appointments. Those recommendations, of course—

Mr. CARVELL: I guess it is Mr. Douglas all right. He does all that work down there.

Mr. REID: If that answer is satisfactory to the hon. member, of course, I am willing to let it go. I do not know whether I can get that information or not. I can ascertain whether this man is really capable to fill the position. I shall have to take the opinion of the officer in charge.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister bring down all the correspondence and papers in connection with the dismissal and appointment of these parties?

Mr. REID: I have told the deputy minister that, if there is any correspondence in the department, to bring it to me, and I will bring it down or send it to the hon. member.

Mr. McKENZIE: That matter was in charge of Mr. A. B. McDonald, who is now chief electrician of the Government on board of the Tyrian, a most capable man who was operator at that station for many years, and who, no doubt, was receiving and sending those cable letters. When he was appointed as inspector by the former Government—and Mr. Macdonald was a friend of the present Administration, having been there long before the change in 1896—he left the office and moved away with his family. Mr. Theriault, a former resident of the Magdalen islands, was appointed in his place. Mr. Theriault was not much of an operator himself, but his wife was a most capable operator. She taught her sons to send the messages, and she and her children took charge of the office. Shortly after this Government came into power, these people were dismissed without the slightest justification, and two farmers and fishermen, who had not any more knowledge of telegraphy than I have, were appointed. How they got along, I do not know, but Providence intervened and broke the cable. With the cable broken, there was very little for them to do, and they have got along nicely up until now and are drawing handsome salaries. It was a case of the cable be darned and let the farming go to the dogs while they drew their salaries in this way. That is the situation exactly. Whether telegraphy grew into their heads without their receiving any instruction, I do not know, but there they are, and the minister can see them there any day in the week.

Telegraph and telephone lines—British Columbia mainland—further amount required, $2,200.

Mr. CARVELL: Surely British Columbia ought to have been satisfied with what they have already received this evening.

Mr. REID: This is a small amount.

Mr. CARVELL: What is it for? Eight or nine thousand is a small amount for British Columbia.

Mr. REID: This is for increases in the salaries of those who are receiving less than $1,200. This increase is made on account of the high cost of living, and the operators are getting small pay.

Mr. CARVELL: On what principle are the tolls from rentals based in the telephone system in British Columbia? Is it the same as in Nova Scotia, or have they a modern system where people can rent a telephone, as in other parts of Canada?

Mr. REID: The only information I can give the hon. gentleman is that given in the official report.

Mr. CARVELL: There is nothing in that.

Mr. REID: The information in this book is as follows:

Kamloops-Okanagan Valley System (Telephone).

Local and through rates, 25 cents to 60 cents, according to distance between offices 100 miles apart or over, in stretches of 50 miles':
Where message rate is 25c. for 10 words, 2c. for extra words: conversation 10c. per minute.
Where message rate is 25c. for 10 words, 3c. for extra words: conversation 15c. per minute.
Where message rate is 40c. for 10 words, 3c. for extra words: conversation 20c. per minute.
Where message rate is 50c. for 10 words, 4c. for extra words: conversation 25c. per minute.
Where message rate is 60c. for 10 words, 4c. for extra words: conversation 30c. per minute.
Minimum charge for messages, 25c.; for conversation, 15c.

Mr. CARVELL: That is for telegrams.

Mr. REID: No, this is the Kamloops and Okanagan telephone system.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Any charge for listening?

Mr. REID: Fifteen cents per minute in some cases. Then we have the rates for the Salt Spring Island telephone system as follows:

Local rate—Conversation, 2 minutes, 25c.; each additional minute, 15c.
Through rate—The above line connects with the B.C. Telephone Co. at Duncan Station. The company's tolls are added to the above rates on through business.
Conjoint rate—between offices on the above island and offices on the C.P. line, on government line reached by the C.P. telegraph on Vancouver Island, 25.2.

Then there is the Golden-Windermere telephone line:

Local and through rate, 25.2.
Subscribers for telephone at $36 per year are exempt from above tolls for messages.

Mr. CARVELL: If a man rents a telephone, and pays $36 a year, he has the long distance thrown in.

Mr. REID: No, he can only telephone on that exchange. Then the Vancouver Island line:

Local rates between offices, 25.2.
Conjoint rate between offices on government line and C. P. telegraph line on Vancouver Island, 25.2.
Through rate, business exchange with Canadian Pacific telegraph at Nanaimo and Victoria, same as local rate, 25.2.

Mr. CARVELL: I was asking as to whether the same system prevails in British Columbia as in Nova Scotia. It seems to me that, in Nova Scotia, only a favoured few can obtain telephone, and practically there is no rental at all, as I understand it. They pay a certain rate for a distance beyond the main line. The telephone is put in a man's place of business, and that is the sort of public place where business comes. But there is no such thing as rental as known in the telephone world. Does that condition of things obtain in British Columbia, or are there rentals?

Mr. REID: In British Columbia it is the ordinary telephone system. They rent the telephone.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the rental?

Mr. REID: In British Columbia $36 a year.

Prince Edward Island and mainland—revote of lapsed amount, $14,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was not in when the Prince Edward Island and mainland vote was passed. Was that for cabling or telephone? I understand there is telephone communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Mr. REID: I explained that item of $14,000 in the estimates. An agreement was made at the time of Confederation that the Government were to keep up that communication, and $7,000 a year was the arrangement made with the Anglo-American Telegraph Company. Since Confederation the Government have been paying $7,000 a year as a subsidy. This has been paid every year. This $14,000 is for 1915 and 1916. The reason it was not paid in these years, as I explained, was this: The Department of Public Works was negotiating a new agreement with the Anglo-American as to the rate of toll—and the hon. gentleman knows when you come to make an arrangement for tolls it cannot be done in a hurry. While negotiations were being carried on the Department of Public Works refused to pay the subsidy. When an agreement has been made and signed the Government has to pay the subsidy, and not having paid it in 1915 and 1916, they have to pay it now.

Mr. MACDONALD: Nothing to do with telephones?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will this matter come under the Railway Board?

Mr. REID: I suppose so, because all these rates are under the Railway Board of Canada.

Laprairie—repairs to wharf and completion of approach, $4,000.

Three Rivers—repairs to wharf—revote, $9,500.

Mr. REID: These two items were held over. The Laprairie-Napierville item was for repairs to wharf, but I am willing that that item should be struck out. The wharf should be kept in repair, but we will drop it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I saw the hon. gentleman from Laprairie, who was called away, and he maintains the objection he made last night. I know the conditions because I was brought up in that district. In the old days there was a steamer service between Montreal and Laprairie, but this was abandoned ten years ago. The last boat which plied between Montreal and Laprairie was destroyed by fire seven or eight years ago, and you can see the remains of the steamer near the wharf, and the channel which was used by that steamboat from Montreal to Laprairie has been partly filled, so that even if you were to repair the wharf, which is not badly in need of repair, you would have to dig a new channel between Montreal and Laprairie for that size of boat.

Mr. REID: I am striking it out.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is not necessary.

Mr. REID: There was the other item for Three Rivers, to which my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) raised some objection last night. Last year we had an appropriation of $20,000 to repair this wharf, which is used on a large scale for the unloading of coal. The officials tell me it is absolutely necessary to finish up this work, and I would not feel justified in dropping the item altogether. I will have to ask the committee to allow it to stand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Still you have the objection made by the hon. member from Three Rivers, which seems to be very radical. He said last night:

An additional amount was voted to complete the work, and it seems to be in perfect shape now. It was filled up with quicksand. That was washed out and it was refilled, branches, dirt and sand being put on the top. I do not see where the work is now required. They have been putting stone on the end of the wharf that faces the current and that meets the ice jams in the spring.

Considering the view taken by the hon. member from Three Rivers, who has a perfect knowledge of the situation, I do not see how the minister would be justified in maintaining that item.

Mr. REID: I hardly think the hon. member for Three Rivers went into the matter as thoroughly as he should have done.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister promise in this case, as he did in the case of the telephone lines, that before spending the money he will see that a proper inspection is made, and that no money will be spent unless it is absolutely required.

Mr. REID: I will certainly do so.

New Brunswick—St. John harbour—extension of and repairs from Negro Point breakwater, $250,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister state what the work would cost?

Mr. REID: The work if proceeded with would cost $750,000 to complete. We will have to look into the matter thoroughly. In the meantime I would like the item to stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are the figures based upon the idea of utilizing stone from Partridge island?

Mr. REID: The parties tendering were free to take the stone from wherever they wished.

Ontario—Stayner—public building, $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I believe the minister was going to consider the advisability of striking out this item. I think he should be guided by the fact that when the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) was asking for the passage of the Bill relating to taxation, and indeed in bringing forward subsequent measures, he gave his assurance to the House that no new work would be undertaken. I think that pledge should be lived up to. A great many items have been struck out on that ground.

Mr. REID: I agree that that was the understanding, and therefore I am not sure that we will go on with the work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it would be better if the item were struck out.

Mr. REID: Perhaps it would be as well to leave it in, and we will not proceed with it if it is new work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It must be new work, because the amount is required to buy the land.

Mr. REID: If that be so, I suppose we will have to strike it out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The fact of it being there is evidently a printer's error.

Mr. CURRIE: That is a very worthy building, and it happens to be in a good Liberal town.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The building is only imaginary as yet.

Mr. CURRIE: Of course, if my friends on the opposite side of the House want the item struck out, it cannot be helped.

Mr. McKENZIE: What county is Stayner in?

Mr. CURRIE: It is the town of Stayner, which has done a lot for the war, and has never had a cent spent on it in its whole history. I think it is only right that the town should be recognized.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let it wait until we have a union government.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. CURRIE: If we have a union government, of course the work will go on.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are they all Liberals there?

Mr. CURRIE: As a matter of fact there is no truce now, as there was when the statement was made that no new building would be proceeded with. When that statement was made there was a political truce between the parties, but the situation is changed now. The Opposition has forced the Government to go to the country, and I do not see why it is absolutely necessary that the arrangement made then should be carried out. During the last two days I have heard nothing but abuse of the Government. Not a single item in the supplementary estimates passed without some blame being imputed to the Government. It was claimed the items were for a war-time election. If I had been the Minister of Public Works, I would have given a war-time supplementary estimate to hon. gentlemen opposite, and give them some excuse for kicking.

Mr. CARVELL: We think you would.

Mr. CURRIE: So did the hon. gentleman and there is no better politician or party man in this House than himself. As far as this public building in Stayner is concerned, if hon. gentlemen opposite are opposed to it, if they want it struck out and if there is any agreement to strike out, we will strike it out and let them take the blame.

St. John harbour—extension of and repairs to Negro Point breakwater, $250,000.

Mr. REID: This is the only item of the Public Works Department left. I cannot add anything to what I said except that the work will cost probably between $750,000 and $1,000,000 before it is completed. This is asked for the commencement of the work and so much will be spent per annum. I would suggest letting the item go through, and of course we would have to consider going on with the work in view of the statements which have been made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). If the committee desire further information I will let the item stand.

Mr. CURRIE: If there is anything in the argument that no new work should be undertaken during war time, it is unfair to strike out the item of $10,000 for Stayner and then ask to have a quarter of a million dollar item left in as hon. gentlemen opposite are asking.

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member for St. John is well known to be very friendly towards this item. This is new work and it is not needed at all. It can very well stand over during the war, and I think the minister should strike the item out. There is no argument in favour of it that I can see as far as the rest of the country is concerned.

Mr. REID: We will let the item stand.

Mr. CURRIE: I will be right here to fight it the next time it comes up.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not here to fight for St. John—it can take care of itself—but there seems to be an argument in favour of leaving it in. The minister tells us that he has to call for tenders and that he is likely to accept one.

Mr. REID: I have not accepted any. Tenders were called for but no action was taken.

Mr. CARVELL: How many were received?

Mr. McKENZIE: It is not usual to ask for tenders and then strike out the item.

Mr. REID: Six regular tenders and four irregular.

Mr. CARVELL: Irregular in what way?

Mr. REID: We required a certified cheque with each tender, and no cheques were sent. Those that were irregular were considerably higher than the lowest tender that was regular. I can say that the lowest tender is not that of a New Brunswick firm.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you not tell us all about them and who they are?

Mr. REID: I would not have any objection except that I have just got a memorandum now from the deputy and the tenders have not been submitted to council. It is not customary to give information about a matter of this kind until it has been submitted to council.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the item is to stand over for a day or two I would be agreeable, but otherwise I would like to present some very strong reasons for passing the item. This is a revote. The item was voted by Parliament two years ago and tenders were called by the minister for this work which was deemed very necessary and apparently essential for the protection of the harbour. Owing to the lowest tender being higher than the amount the minister thought he ought to expend, he decided to call for new tenders. New tenders were called for under the previous vote. This is really a revote.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the hon. gentleman tell me why it is not mentioned here that it is a revote? It says:

Extension of and repairs to Negro Point breakwater, $250,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know; but my hon. friend will find that what I say is true. It may be that tenders were called for to be paid out of the general vote for St. John harbour.

Mr. REID: Yes, that is the reason.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand it was decided to make a change in the kind of stone that might be used. The previous tenders required that granite only should be used in the breakwater. A change was made in the hope that the tenders would be for a considerably lower amount. But, undoubtedly the vote in Parliament two years ago authorized the calling for tenders. The reason the work was not gone on with before was the belief that by making this change it would be done at a lower cost.

Mr. CARVELL: I am willing that the item should stand, but I do not go back on what I said last evening. This is a new work in my judgment and I want to be fairly consistent. I opposed the rest of the new works and I oppose this.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the use of allowing this item to stand if we will not embark upon any new work?

Mr. REID: The reason I ask that it be allowed to stand instead of striking it out is that I am only acting for the department and I would like to submit it to my colleagues.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It seems to be agreed that, the Minister of Finance having made that announcement, the committee is bound by it. I agree with my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that Stayner and St. John ought to be treated alike. I am prepared to vote to strike that item out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I sincerely trust that the most my hon. friends would ask would be that the matter should stand a day or two so that it can be looked into. It is not a new work in the ordinary sense. The breakwater has been extended out from Negro point comparatively close to Partridge island. The department has done a lot of work, has built wharves, and the opinion of experts is that the closing of this gap is necessary to protect the wharves and also the very large amount of shipping that is coming to the harbour and using these wharves on the western side. Therefore, this is simply carrying on a work which has been in progress for a number of years.

Mr. REID: My reason for asking it to stand is this: Tenders have been called for, they are in the department and I would not like to dispose of the matter without consulting my colleagues. We might allow the whole item to stand and I will bring it up when members are present without taking any advantage or asking it to be passed in their absence.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member for St. John wants to knock out a $10,000 item in Ontario, but he objects to the leaving out of an item for a quarter of a million dollars of which Ontario pays a large proportion. One item should stand against the other.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not do any injustice to any part of Ontario, or any other portion of Canada, but in the case of this building I have no doubt the post office is being carried on in rented premises. The land has not been purchased. The report says that the vote is required to purchase the land. The ex-Minister of Public Works last session dropped similar items with respect to public buildings and made the announcement that no public building would be undertaken while the war lasts.

Mr. CURRIE: Hundreds of thousands of dollars needed to repair docks and improve harbours in Ontario, but there has not been a dollar of new work put in. This condition at St. John has existed from time immemorial.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No.

Mr. CURRIE: There is no condition there that requires any change, and we could go on for three or four years more without having this work done. I quite agree with the hon. member that this is new work, and by what means of hocus-pocus that big item of a quarter of a million dollars can be put in these estimates, and even before it appears in the estimates tenders can be called for, is, I fancy, something entirely new in this department. This item is not urgent, and I think if one item stands the other should stand. If it is any money to be spent at St. John the late minister stands up for it, but he spends the time of this House trying to stick his knife into the items of other provinces, and I think it is time he was called in that respect—because if the rule is to be applied it should be applied all round. If it is a good rule, I am willing to abide by it; but let the hon. member for St. John abide by it and take the advice of his own colleagues and ask the minister to strike the item out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is labouring under a very grave misapprehension. I did not try to stick a knife into—

Mr. CURRIE: You are, all the time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I never did that. On the contrary, when I was minister and since that time, I have always encouraged development in all parts of Canada. See what has been done in the hon. member's own constituency, at Collingwood, and all through western Ontario. Very important works were constructed. I would appeal to representatives from these sections of Ontario as to whether or not I showed a generous spirit, not a niggardly spirit, in regard to improvements. The hon. member seems to think that conditions in St. John are what they have been for many years. That is not so. There has been a very large degree of harbour development there; a great deal of dredging has been done, and the wharves have been built lower down the harbour and nearer to the gap from which the southwesterly storms affect the harbour, and it becomes, so these experts say, necessary to protect—

Mr. CURRIE: What experts?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The enginers and people connected with the harbour, experts of the department. There is a vast deal of shipping coming to St. John. It would amaze the hon. member to know what is being shipped to Great Britain, largely munitions and supplies for the Allies. Many vessels with cargoes of enormous value sail from the harbour, and those familiar with the harbour assert that it is necessary to fill up the gap in order to protect the shipping now coming in such great quantities to the harbour, and also that it is necessary to protect the wharves upon which a large amount has been expended by the Government.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the whole item looks very suspicious. For that reason I think the best thing we can do is to strike it out altogether.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With the Canadian Northern?

Mr. CURRIE: Well.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 12 o'clock midnight.

Thursday, September 6, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

INTRODUCTION OF THE BILL BY HON. ARTHUR MEIGHEN.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 133, intituled, "The War-time Elections Act."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is in the name of the Prime Minister; it is very much to be regretted that owing to his illness he will not be here to expound its provisions. As it is not probable that he will return to the House for some little time at least, I have been asked to make the necessary explanation in his place. The Bill is of such importance that I think a departure might well be made from the usual custom of Parliament, and that I might state very fully to the House not only the scope and purpose of the Bill, but also, in very brief terms, what we deem to be its justification.

As the title would indicate, the scope of the Bill, so far as the period of its operation is concerned, is limited indeed. Its provisions are to operate only during the period of the present war and of demobilization thereafter. That is to say, so far as the Bill amends the Dominion Elections Act, it amends it only to cover the now apparently certain event of an election during the war or before demobilization. After that the Bill ceases to affect the Dominion Elections Act; the general law becomes the same as it was before, the same as it is to-day. The necessity for the Bill arises out of the precipitation of an election in time of war. But for that becoming inevitable, there would be no justification for the measure; therefore we must reflect first of all on the conditions that we find ourselves in, facing, as we do, an appeal to the electorate under the wholly unprecedented circumstances of this fearful war.

The first consideration that presents itself is the absence overseas of a large section of our male population. Some 300,000 of the foremost and bravest of our sons are abroad, engaged in the strife, the turmoil, the ordeal of war. A Military Voters' Act has been passed, the purpose of which is legally to enable those men to exercise the franchise should there be a contest in their absence. In that Act machinery is provided that goes as far as Parliament can go to make it physically possible for these men to avail themselves of the electoral privilege. Nevertheless, it is inevitable that a large number of them—nobody can say how large; it may be proportionately large, and it may not be so large as we anticipate—will not be able, no matter what machinery we have provided, to exercise that franchise. There are as well many thousands who are enlisted overseas, not in the Canadian overseas forces, but in the British forces. These men, though under the Military Voters' Act, they have, I understand, been given the right to vote, will inevitably in the main find it impossible to exercise that right. There are, besides, many thousands more who before the war were reservists in Canada—and some who were not reservists—who are to-day fighting in Europe or other continents the same battle in which we are engaged, but who are doing so as members of the Allied armies. They have not the legal right to vote; if they had it, they could not possibly exercise the franchise. An election is to be held at a time when the most deserving, the bone, sinew and virility of our country, are only partially at least enabled to take part in the contest by way of voting. There are also thousands who have fallen in battle, whose voices are stilled. There are, besides these, some thousands who are prisoners of war. Their voices also are silent; under no imaginable circumstances could they take advantage of the Military Voters' Act.

Nor can we forget what is a more potent fact still; that each and all of the men overseas are stripped of the influence which under normal circumstances they could exert among their fellows in an election contest.

That personal force, that persuasive power, that electoral influence which, particularly appertaining to men of the nature of those who are overseas, is indeed a potent factor in any contest. That great factor is eliminated. On the contrary those at home—those who should be here and those at home who should not be here, are normally left in the full enjoyment of their electoral rights and privileges, and are enabled to exercise them to exert a control over the destinies of our defenders overseas.

Very briefly stated those are the main facts of the situation that confronts us, and they are sufficient, I think, to bring home to the mind of every member of this House the certain truth that on the franchise as it stands to-day, on what may be described as a peace franchise, a very grave and a very gross injustice will be done to those men. The injustice is done not only to them but it is brought home to Canada. The injustice really is done to the Canadian nation, should an election take place on the franchise as it stands to-day, eliminating the influence of these men, eliminating entirely the voice of those who have fallen and are prisoners, eliminating entirely the voice of those who fight in the Allied forces but were formerly citizens of this country, stripping entirely those men of the personal force which they should of right exert.

It is mainly to meet those conditions that the Bill, which I now have the honour to move to introduce, is brought before this House. The measure constitutes an attempt to repair, so far as Parliament can repair, the injustice which I have described as falling under present legislation on our overseas forces, and ultimately on Canada herself. The only method of reaching a result that may be said best to represent or to re-echo the voice of our soldiers abroad is to reach their representatives at home. If the direct vote cannot be obtained, if the direct influence cannot be obtained, then the best way to repair that injustice, at all events the only way that seems available, is to reach such of their kin at home who can best be said to be likely to vote in such a way and to influence the electors in such a way as they themselves would do were they upon our shores. Consequently, this Bill provides a measure of woman enfranchisement which endeavours to attain that end.

It will be remembered that earlier in this session the Prime Minister intimated to the House that there would be a measure of woman suffrage should an election appear in sight, a measure of woman suffrage granted under such conditions and limitations as Parliament might provide. Parliament is now facing the necessity of providing those limitations. In this connection hon. members should keep especially in mind the fact that a very substantial portion of the women of this country who are now British subjects, and who, under any general scheme of enfranchisement would be entitled to vote, have become British subjects by a process of constructive naturalizaton, by the naturalization of a parent, or by marriage. Remembering this, it seems very plain, indeed, that it would be unfair and unreasonable at this time, and under the shadow of this war, that an unlimited woman suffrage should be granted. The necessity, then, of drawing a line is at once upon us, and it has been decided, and it is embodied in this Bill, that the line so to be drawn shall be the line of service. Not only do those who are nearest of kin to the overseas forces more likely represent in sentiment and in purpose the voice and will of those who are fighting for us, but also those whose sons, whose brothers, and whose husbands have gone to the battlefield, have given a service and made a sacrifice in this war of a character higher and greater than that which any other person is able to give or to make. Consequently, on the ground not only of their representative capacity, but of the service and sacrifice which they have rendered, it is not unjust or unfair that those nearest of kin to our soldiers overseas should be given special recognition at this time.

The Bill, therefore, provides that the wives, the widows, the mothers, the sisters, and the daughters of the members past or present of the actual overseas force shall have the right to vote in the war-time election. This privilege does not extend to such relatives of those of our expeditionary forces as have not gone overseas. They are still with us, and the same reasoning does not apply to them. They, of course, can vote, but their relatives are not enfranchised.

The Bill has another aspect which I shall now explain. In this country we have a substantial portion of our population who are of alien enemy birth, or alien enemy blood, or near extraction. Many of these people have been citizens of Canada for a great number of years; many of them have become accustomed to our institutions, and as years have gone by they doubtless have been more and more divorced in sympathy from the land of their nativity. But, on the other hand, there are a large number who are comparatively recent arrivals in this country, and who consequently have not the same sense of Canadian and British nationality as have we, and who cannot be expected to have wholly separated themselves from the sympathies and predispositions which governed them in the land whence they came. Furthermore, inasmuch as war service should be the basis of war franchise, and inasmuch as from the commencement of this war, not only in Canada, but in Great Britain, it has been found undesirable and unwise to accept those of the citizens of the class I have described for the highest service of war, it does not seem unreasonable that they should not exercise, during the war, that control of our destinies which is vested in the franchise. It is in a sense unfair to those men themselves, many of whose sons and brothers are fighting in armies in Europe against us, that they should be asked to take up the real war burden and go to battle against their next of kin. It is also unfair to them that in the midst of such a war they should be called upon to determine by their vote the vigour, or the direction, which that war should take, while their next of kin and their brothers, or their sons, are fighting in the armies against us. That argument has been advanced to us by some of this class themselves.

Not only is it unfair to them that they should be asked to decide the destiny and the vigour of a war against their brothers in Europe, but it is unfair to the rest of the population that they should have the right to so decide. I am quite free to admit, that, taken all in all, those who come from alien enemy countries have, in the main, during the progress of this war, conducted themselves satisfactorily within lines of obedience to the laws of Canada. It is not based on any complaint of that kind that the principle embodied in this Bill is adopted. It is because of the reasons I have mentioned, namely, that those who cannot in the nature of things be absolutely divorced in sympathy or sentiment from the peoples from whom they come should not be permitted, in justice to the rest of the population, to exercise a measure of control over the destinies of the war against those peoples, because it would be unfair to them to ask them to go to the polls and vote on an issue which decides to a degree the vigour, the purpose and the destiny of that war. It is also because war service should be the basis of war franchise. The two should go hand in hand—the obligation and the privilege. If, for reasons special to themselves, these people are not in a position to render war service of the highest kind they should not be entitled to the franchise while the war is on.

There has not occurred as yet in any great country engaged in this struggle of unprecedented dimensions a general election. Where democracy governs nations in this war, it has not as yet left to individualism, by means of the ballot, the determination of the conduct of the war, save in one country alone. That country is Australia. When they were, in Australia, facing a situation such as we face to-day, but by no means as aggravated as ours, they prepared by legislation for the contest along lines similar to those of this Bill. They, however, disqualified for the war time election all of their citizens who were of alien enemy birth no matter how long they had been in Australia or how long they had been naturalized. This Bill does not go that far. This Bill disqualifies, for the war time election, those of alien enemy birth, or of other European birth and of alien enemy mother tongue or native language, who have been naturalized since the 31st March 1902. All who were naturalized prior to that date remain in the enjoyment of the exercise of the franchise. In Australia they made exceptions of any who had sons or brothers enlisted in the overseas forces engaged in the war. In Canada we allow the exception to go further and we admit to the franchise any whose sons or grandsons or brothers are enlisted in the overseas forces. There was an exception also in Australia of Armenians and Syrians known to be entirely out of sympathy with Turkey. We are making the same exception here. But, for the wider exceptions which I have named, our law in this regard follows the lines of the Australian law. As far as the franchise is concerned, these constitute the two fundamental changes brought about by this Bill.

It is further to be noted that whosoever is disqualified from voting by this measure is at the same time exempted entirely from combatant service in the war.

Heretofore the Dominion franchise has been, in seven provinces of Canada, the provincial franchise. Whomsoever the provincial legislatures admitted to the franchise was admitted to the franchise in a Dominion contest, save in Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon. In those provinces and that territory, there has always been a Dominion franchise; that is a Dominion qualification for admission to the franchise at Dominion elections. By this Bill the provincial franchise is adopted in every province of Canada including Alberta and Saskatchewan. It cannot, of course, be adopted in the Yukon as there is no Yukon franchise.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The provincial franchise?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The provincial franchise, subject to the operation of the two principles I have described in the foregoing part of my address, is adopted in every province including Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Franchise, of course, is one thing and list making is another. The alterations in the franchise, described in that portion of the Bill dealing with the franchise which alterations I have endeavoured to explain so far, were such that there had to be variations in the elections Act to enable the lists to be made. For example, in British Columbia and Manitoba, the lists that are now made contain the names of all women as well as of men; consequently we have addressed ourselves to the task of providing for the making a list to meet the franchise requirements of this legislation. In the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan there are no provincial lists and by our own Dominion Elections Act, which has been in force since 1905—indeed, I think before—the Dominion provides machinery for the making of the lists. By this Act the machinery which heretofore has been applicable only to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan is made applicable to all those provinces where the present lists are such that new lists are necessary; namely to the four western provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and as well to Prince Edward Island. It was impossible to use any lists to be found in those provinces and consequently the machinery which has been in force for twelve years as to the provision of lists in Alberta and Saskatchewan is made applicable to the other three provinces.

This application, however, is subject to certain safeguards that have not heretofore existed. In the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan the lists are made by enumerators appointed by the Governor in Council or by returning officers, and are posted up eight days before the polling day and then are subject to certain revision by enumerators up to two days before the polling day when they are final, save with this proviso, that any voter can go to the polls on polling day and by taking the oath that he has the right to vote, cast his ballot in the same way as can any other voter who is on the list. That has been the law all along in these two provinces. In the province of Alberta there has been for provincial contests a partial safeguard provided against the practice of swearing in votes on election day.

We adopt in principle the safeguard so provided, but we extend it. I shall describe that safeguard as we adopt it. Wherever a voter is not on the list as made up by the enumerator and claims a right to vote and swears that he has a right to vote, he is on being refused able to go in and vote on election day. He is first entitled to and receives a certificate of refusal from the enumerator. He makes an affidavit of his right, His vote, however, is placed in an envelope, and on any recount, should it appear that there are enough votes placed in envelopes to affect a recount, the right to that vote is reviewed by a judge, and the vote is allowed if the voter had the right. Such is, substantially, the safeguard that has heretofore obtained in provincial elections in Alberta.

We, however, extend that safeguard much further. Not only may a man vote to whom the enumerator has refused a vote—his vote to go in an envelope and be afterwards judicially reviewed, but the vote of any man who is put on by an enumerator and whom the agent of any candidate claims should not be put on may be challenged by that agent by affidavit asserting his belief that the voter has not the right to vote and giving the reasons. If the agent does so that vote also goes in an envelope and is subject to the very same review. Consequently it will be seen that, while we adopt the provisions of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta which have been in effect by Dominion legislation since 1905, we adopt safeguards against any work of the enumerator that might be objected to, with the ultimate result that the whole of the enumerator's work may, if desired, be subjected to judicial revision. It will, I think, appear to all that the objections that have heretofore been levelled, with some force, against the list-making provisions enacted in this House and applicable to Alberta and Saskatchewan, are eliminated in this Bill, and that such safeguards are provided as will render the making and operation of those lists absolutely fair.

I have covered the method so far as it applies to the four western provinces and Prince Edward Island. There are left the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In those provinces the women are not on the list last made up. In the province of Ontario the list last made up was prepared last fall and completed, I believe, in December. It is only a male list. That list has also been judicially reviewed according to the Ontario law, and there is no reason for throwing it away and making a new list by enumerators. My words in that regard apply only to the counties of Ontario and to towns up to 9,000 population. In towns over 9,000 and in cities, there are no completed lists. Consequently, as to towns and cities in Ontario, another method of making the list has to be devised. First let me deal with the counties of Ontario. In the counties of Ontario there is a list covering all places except towns and cities over 9,000 population. That list has been made up and was revised judicially last December.

In Quebec, in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, there are also completed lists, and in all the rest of Quebec there are lists now approaching completion, and to be completed this month. Those lists should be kept in mind in conjunction with the Ontario lists in counties, because all are treated the same. Similarly in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia there are lists now complete.

The lists so made up of male voters all judicially revised in Ontario and Quebec and revised by the provincial methods in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are by this Bill adopted, so far as they go. The only requirement as to them is to add such of the women as by this Bill are to be entitled to vote and to substract such of the men, if any, as, by reason of alienage, should not be entitled to vote. This is done by means of a system of enumeration similar to that adopted in the other provinces. The names of women are enumerated along the lines of the present Ontario Act. I am not speaking now of the cities of Ontario; I shall ask hon. members to forget the cities of Ontario until I get through with the counties of Ontario and with the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. As regards these latter the lists are adopted and the enumeration only goes to the adding of the names of the additional women now entitled to vote and to the striking off of those who by reason of alienage, and nothing else, are disentitled to vote. That is the province and duty of the registrars or enumerators, whatever you call them, and that alone. They cannot in other respects affect those lists.. The work of the enumerators to that extent, namely the adding of the women and the taking off of the men by reason of alienage, is subject to the same safeguards on election day as obtain in the four western provinces and in Prince Edward Island. That is to say, any one who is taken off by the enumerator and claims the right to vote, may, by taking the necessary oath on election day, vote, and his vote goes in an envelope; and if any one has not been put on by an enumerator and claims the right to vote —and it must be a woman of course because no one else has the right to be put on—she may go and assert her claim, and if the enumerator refuses it she may vote and her vote goes in an envelope. The vote of any one claimed to be wrongfully put on may be challenged, and it will then go into the protested lists and be subject, as all other protested votes, to revision.

I now come to the cities of Ontario. But perhaps I should first repeat that there is no review of what has already been reviewed; that is to say, of the lists as already made up in the counties of Ontario, in Quebec, in New Brunswick, and in Nova Scotia. There is no review of those lists except, of course, so far as the work of the enumerator goes, and the enumerator has power only to add the women vote and to strike off by reason of alienage. He can strike off for no other cause.. That work and that alone is subject to final review by a judge. The rest of the list is already completed and revised, and that stands for this election.

Coming to the cities of Ontario, the lists made up for those cities are only partial. Under the Ontario law towns and cities of over 9,000 population make up what they call part one and part two, which do not contain the manhood suffrage voters. Consequently, those lists cannot be used in any sense as final lists, the same as in the counties in Ontario, and the lists for the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Therefore in Ontario, in cities of over 9,000, lists have to be made. The method adopted is virtually that provided by provincial legislation. Men are appointed whose duty it is, similarly as under the provincial legislation, to enumerate the voters in those cities, and to make out lists, and those lists so made out are revised immediately they are completed by a Board of Revision, precisely the same Board of Revision as now revises in Ontario. I think it is composed of a judge and some other of the higher officers. At all events, there is judicial revision. That is to say, in towns and cities of Ontario of over 9,000, where the lists are to be made, they are made up entirely, and they are subjected to the same judicial review as now obtains in those towns and cities under provincial legislation.

I may add further—and this applies to the whole of this list making from coast to coast—that wherever the enumerators have the duty of making up lists they are permitted by the Act to use as a basis any lists already made up, so far as they can be used. Using these, so far as they go, as a basis, of course, is one thing, and making the lists complete is another thing.

Looking over the whole measure, so far as these list-making provisions are concerned, it has subjected the existing law to as little change as possible, and only where it is essential that such change should be made in order to get lists conforming to the franchise requirements of the Bill. Such is the spirit of the measure that there can be no lists for this contest that will not be, either before or after, in the method I have described, judicially revised.

I may add that the desire has been—and if the Bill does not fully carry out that desire, amendments to that end will be welcomed—that all provision for list-making shall be absolutely fair, and that no party advantage shall be taken. We have to make provision for the making of these lists within such reasonable time as will make the period of the election contest not unconscionably long. Consequently it is necessary, in the cities of Ontario particularly, that while we adopt the provincial plan, we make more expeditious the preparing of the list and the revision.

Subject to the necessity of not extending too long the turmoil and too far the expense of a contest, and, therefore, the necessity of bringing the list-making to an end as soon as could be done consistently with fairness and thoroughness, this Bill has, I think, omitted no safeguard.

I repeat, that the necessity of the Bill is brought upon us by the precipitation of a contest in time of war. That, in our judgment, necessitates the changes in the franchise which this Bill proposes. These changes necessitate provision for a method of making the lists where no lists at present are in existence that can be of any practical value in this contest, and to supplement lists where necessary, and only to that extent is there any change whatever.

The purpose of the Bill is to endeavour that this contest shall be conducted in such a way, and by such a method, as will do justice to those to whom the best of justice must be done, namely, the defenders of our country; to see to it that the voice of Canada, as heard in this contest, shall express the real views of the Canadian people, and that such injustice as would be done by the present franchise to the best of our sons and to the nation itself, is repaired, so far as Parliament can repair it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the Bill make any provision in regard to that class of people who may be known as conscientious objectors to military service?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I said that we had endeavoured to frame the Bill on the principle that war service or the obligation of war service should be the foundation of war franchise, and, that principle has a bearing on that class of our population known as conscientious objectors. The Bill provides that all those exempted from military service by the section of the Military Service Act which applies to certain Doukhobor and Mennonite immigrants shall be disqualified for this contest, and also, that all others who have applied for and have not been refused exemption from combatant service in the war on conscientious grounds are disqualified from voting. If, of course, such men are refused they have the right to vote. The Bill further provides that any who vote in the contest shall not thereafter be entitled to exemption on conscientious grounds. It seems entirely unfair that those who, for reasons special to themselves, are freed entirely from the burden and sacrifice of this war, in so far as the real sacrifice of war goes, should have a say in deciding the character and turn the war may take.

The Bill goes further and provides that any who have been convicted of an offence under the Military Service Act shall thereafter for this election be disqualified.

I have now enumerated the main features of the legislation. I should have said that, as there are no lists in the unorganized districts of Ontario, it is deemed best that the unorganized districts of Ontario should have lists made up, on the same basis as the four western provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there any provision as to the age limit for the women voters?

Mr. MEIGHEN: All women voters must be as to age, race and residence, qualified in accordance with the laws of the provinces where they reside.

Mr. GLASS: I should like to ask the minister if any provision has been made in regard to the female relatives of soldiers who are overseas, some 50,000 or so?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That matter has been fully explained. They have a right to vote.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not rise on this occasion to discuss the merits of the measure which has just been introduced by the Secretary of State; I simply rise for the purpose of asking questions on some points which I think I have rightly understood, because the statement of my hon. friend was lucid, but I desire to be doubly sure.

I understand from my hon. friend that he has taken the provincial franchise qualifications as the basis of the measure which he has just introduced. If I understand him aright, he has made quite a departure from those qualifications, because, in five provinces, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, women have now the franchise, but, under this legislation, the women of those provinces, with the exception of those who happen to be relatives of men who have enlisted, are deprived of the franchise. Am I right in that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Except for the two main features of the Bill, the enfranchisement of women relatives of soldiers and the disfranchisement of recently arrived persons of alien enemy birth or extraction, and conscientious objectors, the provincial franchise is adopted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Am I right in this: that while the women of Ontario and the western provinces have to-day, under the laws of those provinces, the right to vote, they will, with the exception of those who are qualified as the relatives of men who have enlisted, not have the right to vote in this election?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is correct.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It was understood on this side of the House, when my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) drew attention to the matter, that, in the next election, the women would have the franchise. Under this legislation, in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, where women have not the right to vote, those women who happen to be relatives of soldiers will have the right to exercise the franchise. To this extent the provincial franchise is interfered with. I thought I understood the measure correctly, and I see I am right. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that Assyrians and Armenians, who are naturalized British subjects, were to be deprived of the franchise?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. They will have the franchise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am glad to hear that. In regard to Ontario, I understand that my hon. friend takes, as the franchise list, the list made up in the month of December of last year under 4 p.m. the Act which was repealed recently by the provincial legislature. The province of Ontario has provided for a new franchise, the vote being given to the women, and for a new method of making up the list. I understood from a cursory reading of this Act that the former Act was abolished and was no longer in force; but my hon. friend, if I understand him aright, takes the list made up in the month of December last and makes it the basis of this measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is correct.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

The SPEAKER: When shall the Bill be read the second time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I dare say that the Bill will not be ready until to-morrow. We should have some time to look over it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill will be ready to-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But I do not expect it will be discussed to-morrow; it is a very important measure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We would prefer to take it up to-morrow, as there is very little other work for Parliament to do. That is why we desire to take it up.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sorry the measure was brought down so late, but, as it is a very imporant measure, I object to its being taken up to-morrow.

REPORTED INCREASE IN PENSIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): My attention has been drawn to this despatch appearing in certain newspapers as coming from Toronto under date of September 5:

A sixty per cent increase in the pensions to be paid members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force is to be granted by an Order in Council to be passed in Ottawa within the next few weeks.

This Dominion Government announcement of such a large pension increase, amounting to many millions of dollars, was made to local officers of the G.W.V.A. by the Cabinet at Ottawa, according to their statement here.

I desire to say, as this report appears to have received wide circulation and currency, that there is no foundation for it. The question of the amount of increase in pensions has not been determined, and no intimation nor statement has been given or made by the Government respecting such increase.

CERTIFICATES TO THOSE MEDICALLY UNFIT.

On the orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have seen it stated in the press that certificates are shortly to be given to those men who have offered to enlist, but who have been refused on account of medical unfitness. Can the Minister of Militia say if that is a fact? Has any list been kept by the Militia Department of those who offered to enlist and were refused. If the minister has any such list, can he give to the House the number of such men?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will look up my hon. friend's question in Hansard to-morrow. I am not prepared to give an answer to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister will do so to-morrow?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will try to give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow or the next day.

OVERSEAS EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

PAY OF SOLDIERS PROMOTED AND OF OFFICERS WHO REVERT IN RANK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton): I wish to ask the Minister of Militia whether it is a fact that men who have been promoted on the field in France and Flanders, and who, having been wounded, return to the base or to Canada, receive only the pay of the position which they occupied when they left Canada, while men who received their appointment in England or in Canada, upon being wounded, receive the pay of their present rank.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will get my hon. friend an answer as soon as I can get the particulars from the department.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand that officers who revert to lower rank in order to get to the front were at one time entitled, upon so reverting in rank, to receive the pay of their previous rank. I believe that that practice has been discontinued, and that the men now receive the pay of the rank to which they revert. When the minister is looking up the information asked for by the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), he might give me some information with regard to this matter.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I will have the matter looked into.

ARRESTS IN MONTREAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to the arrests that have been made in Montreal in connection with the dynamite outrages. I see by the press that at least three of the men arrested were old jailbirds, who were not long ago released on ticket-of-leave. Their names are: Blackwell, Monette, and Handfield, alias Leduc. Is that a fact?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not clear that there were three who had been previously released on ticket-of-leave. I have been informed that of the three mentioned, two had been under sentence and were released on ticket-of-leave.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Lately?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not very long ago; within a few months. I can give the exact information if my hon. friend desires it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend be good enough to lay the information on the table of the House?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

SALUTES TO OFFICERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I have noticed in the newspapers the statement that orders have recently been issued requiring all soldiers in London to salute all officers whom they may meet at any time or under any circumstances.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Even with ladies.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to know whether that order was issued by the Minister of Militia and Defence, or by the overseas minister. Is the minister aware that the number of officers who are running loose on the streets of London, England, and not discharging valuable duties, is a disgrace to the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is exceeding by far his privileges.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: With regard to the former part of my hon. friend's remarks, I would say that it is proper and right that members of the rank and file should salute commissioned officers when they meet them on the streets in any part of the Empire.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is it not the bounden duty of any officer to salute a private?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Certainly; his duty is to return a salute. The member for Edmonton did not raise that question.

SUGGESTED REVISION OF PENSIONS SCALE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) made reference to the fact that the matter of increase of pensions to soldiers was under consideration. I would suggest to the minister that when this matter is being considered something should be done along the line of equalizing the pensions paid to privates and to officers. A general feeling exists throughout the country that the disparity between the amount paid to an officer and the amount paid to a private is too great.

WAR CHARITIES ACT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 130, relating to war charities.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister explain this Bill? Nobody has a copy of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declared the motion carried, but there is no objection to the hon. member speaking if the House consents.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Bill is not yet distributed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I had intended to explain the Bill in Committee. The Bill was introduced into and passed by the Senate, and has now come to the House of Commons in my name. The statement was made that the Bill had not been distributed. I perceive by the Order of the Day, No. 21, that it has been printed in English and in French; I understood that it had been distributed. The Bill is of a comparatively unimportant character, and I think it is not necessary that there should be any delay. Its object is to provide that organizations making appeals to the public for war charities or alleged war charities must be registered under the provisions of this Act with the Secretary of State, or must obtain, in a simple manner provided in the Act, exemption from such registration by the Secretary of State. In other words, the object of the Bill is to protect the public against possible frauds by those representing themselves as acting for war charities.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Short title:

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Bill seems to be of considerable importance, and I think it is objectionable that it should be considered in Committee before copies have been distributed. I have just this moment received a copy. I do not think the minister should proceed to the consideration of the Bill in Committee to-day. Members of the Committee are entitled to know the nature of a Bill before it is considered in Committee.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This Bill has been upon the Order Paper for some little time, and I was not aware of the fact that it had not been distributed. If hon. members think that under the circumstances we should not take up the Bill in Committee to-day, I am willing to suggest that the Committee should rise. The Bill has been printed and has been distributed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have a file of all the Bills distributed. The Bill now before us came to me within the last few minutes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is on my file.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not on mine.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is on mine, and I do not think I have had any preferential treatment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has been better served than members on this side. It is not on my file.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Under the circumstances, as there is evidently a mistake, I would suggest that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT.

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE.

House proceeded to consider the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 73, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.—Mr. Hazen.

Hon. Mr. HAZEN moved that the amendments made by the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. MACDONALD: This Bill went through the House originally under conditions which provided for extremely onerous changes in connection with the lobster-packing industry. The attention of the House was not directed very closely to the changes, but on the matter coming before the Senate the wholesale effect upon the industry was pointed out, and it was indicated that those changes were of the most radical character and I am advised by gentlemen in my constituency who are connected with the industry and to whom the matter was referred, that the proposals made by the department in regard to them, as contained in the Bill originally, were of a character that would involve a serious disarrangement of the industry and a very large expenditure of money in connection with carrying out the details of the Bill. The objections which were urged in the Senate to this particular phase of the question were of the most energetic character and the whole case made by the senators from Prince Edward Island who discussed the proposed Act indicated that the effect of this measure would be of the most serious character. Under all these circumstances the House should pay very careful attention to the amendments that have been made by the Senate and I trust that the minister will, at some length and in the clearest possible way, tell us exactly the effect of the legislation as it comes from the Senate.

Incidentally, I would like to ask if the action of the minister in arranging new seasons for catching lobster this year has met with the approval of those engaged in the industry. The extension of the season which, I understand, has been made till the tenth of this month, is also objectionable. I understand that the ground upon which it was done was the desire to increase the supply of food. There was no necessity for any such action in regard to the matter of food. I was amused at some of our good friends in Toronto calling it a perfectly wonderful performance that a car load of good fish had been brought up from the Maritime Provinces through the food controller to Toronto and sold at an extraordinary low rate as though the good people of Toronto and Ontario, who are apt to dictate to the rest of us, had heard for the first time that there are unlimited quantities of fish in the Maritime Provinces. The action of the minister in extending the time for the purpose of providing more food was entirely unnecessary because any one who knows the conditions in the Maritime Provinces knows that the whole thing is a matter of transportation. At this time there is no reason why the conditions should be disrupted with the result that a heavy additional burden will be put upon the people engaged in the fishing industry.

In view of the fact that this measure passed this House without full attention being paid to it, very difficult and almost impossible conditions, as far as the industry is concerned, have been imposed by the Bill and in view of the fact that the Senate very wisely and properly went into the Bill in the fullest possible way, the House is entitled to the most complete explanation from the minister in regard to every detail of the Bill.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member or Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), I am afraid, has received some incorrect information in regard to this Bill. There was no intention of imposing any onerous or improper conditions on people engaged in the business of packing lobsters. The Bill, as it came from the department, did not impose any such onerous conditions. The Bill was necessary because the work of inspecting establishments where fish is canned under the Meat and Canned Foods Act has been transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It was necessary, in order that the work might be carried on properly, that the law should be clearly defined. The Bill, as it came from the Department of Marine and Fisheries—and this is the only amendment made by the Senate—provided that:

> Cans of lobster shall contain the following minimum amounts of dry lobster meat:
> A one-pound can, 13 ounces, avoirdupois;
> A three-quarter pound can, 9¾ ounces, avoirdupois.

And so on. The Bill was referred to a committee of this House composed of members of both political parties—the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries. That committee met, and, after considering the Bill, did not think this provision went far enough. Instead of providing that a one-pound can of lobster should contain 13 ounces of lobster meat, they amended the Bill and provided that a one-pound can should contain 16 ounces of lobster meat and cans of other weights in proportion. My hon. friend will therefore see that it was the action of a select standing committee of this House that imposed—if it can be said to have imposed—a more onerous burden on those who are the canners of lobsters. The Bill as it came from the department, and as it was introduced by me to the House, provided for the quantity of canned meat which had always been contained in a pound can, but the committee thought that when a man buys a pound can of lobster he ought to buy 16 ounces. Therefore the committee amended the Bill, it came before the House and was passed as amended. The Bill then went to the Senate, where, as my hon. friend says, there were a number of gentlemen who are very familiar with the whole lobster business, and it was considered very thoroughly in the Senate. The amendment the Senate made was to reduce the quantity of dry lobster meat that a pound can should contain from 16 ounces to 14 ounces, not to 13 ounces as was provided by the Bill as I introduced it to the House. The Bill comes back from the Senate with the provision that a pound can of lobster shall contain 14 ounces of dry lobster meat and other cans in similar proportion. The reason given for this amendment to the Senate was that it would be a hardship to require 16 ounces of dry meat, because a pound of lobster meat requires 2 ounces of liquid to give it the proper quality and flavour. If 16 ounces of dry meat were required the cans would have to be enlarged, necessitating changes in the can making and stamping machines, in the size of the tin plates and in the cutting dies. These points were all considered by the committee, and it was believed that as the Act would not become operative until December, 1918, there would be ample time to ascertain if the increased quantity of meat required to be put in a can would cause a hardship to the industry. The Senate, after thoroughly considering the matter, came to the conclusion that 14 ounces, not 13 ounces, should be contained in a pound can, for the reason that a pound can of dry lobster requires 2 ounces of liquid in order to give it the proper quality and flavour. That amendment is quite acceptable to the department and the Government. That is the only change, with this exception: There has been a can put up from time to time which is known as a picnic can. That picnic can contains 10 ounces. The Senate struck that out. They said that in view of the fact that their changes provide a can of 9½ ounces, it is unnecessary to continue the picnic can of 10 ounces, because there is only half an ounce difference between the two, and to have one can of 9½ ounces and another of 10 would lead to confusion. I think there is something in that view of the case, and there is no reason why the picnic can should not be cut out. These are the only changes made by the Senate, and they are amendments which we are quite willing to accept.

Mr. LOGGIE: I happen to be a member of the committee to which this Bill was referred but unfortunately I was absent when it was under discussion. I certainly would not have given my assent to the report of the committee as it came before the House, nor to the Bill as it passed the House and went to the Senate. As to the contents of tins, whether they should be 16 ounces of dry meat, or 13, or 14, or 15 ounces, that is a matter of opinion. It has not been the practice to put 16 ounces of dry meat in a pound can of lobster for a good many years. Dry lobsters are not considered as acceptable to the trade as those that have a little juice in the can when it is opened. It has been the practice for many years by most packers to put 15 ounces of meat in a pound can and one ounce of pickle; then when the can is opened it contains 15 ounces of meat and one ounce of juice, and so in proportion with the half pound, the quarter pound and the three-quarter pound tins. It is important that there should be uniformity, and I think there is a movement in another department to have the net weight put on all tinned goods. That is the law in the United States. For instance, a tin of fruit known as a No. 2 tin, commonly called a 2-pound tin, contains actually only about 20 ounces, and under the American law the net weight must be put on all labels. The minister is in error in saying that the picnic can and the three-quarter pound can are the same. The picnic can is a tall can about two and one-half inches in diameter and nearly four inches high. The three-quarter pound can that he refers to is a flat can.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not say that the three-quarter pound can and the picnic can were the same. I said that the picnic can in the Bill we introduced contained 10 ounces, but that as the Senate reduced the weight so that one can will now contain 10½ ounces, they did not consider it desirable to continue the picnic can with 10 ounces.

Mr. LOGGIE: The three-quarter pound can is not the same shape as the picnic can and it is desirable to retain the picnic as there is a demand for lobsters put up in that shape; it is a can which contains 9¼ ounces of solid meat and ¾ of an ounce of juice. There is a difference of one and one-half ounces between it and the three-quarter pound can.

Mr. HAZEN: Under the Senate amendments a one-pound can will contain 14 ounces, and the three-quarter pound 10½ ounces. The picnic can contains 10 ounces.

Mr. LOGGIE: But that 10 ounces is on the basis of 16 ounces to the pound. The real net weight for a picnic can should be 9 ounces or 9¼ ounces, so that I am quite right when I say that there is a difference of one and one-half ounces between the picnic and the three-quarter pound can.

Mr. HAZEN: The Senate struck out the picnic can altogether.

Mr. LOGGIE: I am trying to show that it is a different size from the others and that it should not be abolished. I do not see why it should not be replaced in the Bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Senate is opposed to picnics.

Mr. LOGGIE: There is a demand for this package in some parts of the United States and in the Maritime Provinces as well. I do not see any serious objection to the change in the weights. Is any provision made for the exportation of canned lobsters with no label on them? The minister knows that there are dealers in France who use their own labels, and the trade would be handicapped if we were forced to put labels on the cans.

Mr. HAZEN: There is no change in the law in that respect. That refers to lobsters and salmon.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does not the Bill provide that all cans should be labelled?

Mr. HAZEN: There is a provision that the minister may exempt cans intended for export.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind hon. members that the House is not in committee; that one speech only is permitted to each hon. member, and that the motion before the Chair is that the House do agree to the amendments made to this Bill by the Senate.

Mr. HAZEN: May I say that the only amendments made by the Senate are with regard to the quantity of lobsters to be contained in each tin?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Reverting to the question whether the cans are to be labelled or not, section 12 reads:

12A. (1) All fish and shellfish canneries shall be inspected as provided by the regulations. All fish and shellfish packed in cans shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing and all such cans shall be marked with,—

(a) the initials of the Christian names, the full surname and the address, or, in the case of a firm or corporation, the firm or corporation name and address or the name and address of the packer or of the fish dealer obtaining it direct from the packer;

(b) a true and correct description of the contents of the can, including the vernacular name and the minimum net weight of the fish or shellfish in the can plainly printed in a conspicuous manner, and the name of the place where the same was packed.

Section 12g of the Bill reads:

12G. No person shall offer or accept for export or shall export any fish or shellfish subject to inspection under this Act, unless the requirements of this Act and of the regulations regarding inspection and marking have been complied with, and every person offering any fish or shellfish for export or exporting the same shall furnish such proof with respect to inspection and marking as is required by the regulations, whether the fish or shellfish so offered for export or exported are subject to inspection or not.

It would seem, from the reading of those two sections together, that all packed lobsters must be marked with the name of the packer, and a description of the contents, and, unless this is done, it is not lawful to export them. I do not think there can be any doubt that that is the meaning of the regulation, however, I may be wrong.

Mr. HAZEN: Subsection 4 of section 2 gives power to the Governor in Council—

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion before the House is that the House concur in the amendments made by the Senate to this Bill. It is not in order to discuss the Bill generally.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I may be out of order in referring to that matter, but it was brought up by the hon. member for Northumberland, and I thought it would be in order for me to make a few remarks in in reply to him. On the question as to what the quantity in the can shall be, I am not able to give the House any special advice. I regret that I was not present at the time this Bill was introduced. It was considered by a special committee. The minister will see that the trade ought to be notified as to legislation of this kind. I should like to know from the minister, when we come to deal with this question in committee, what notice has been given to the trade. It may be a matter of great interest to them to decide what quantity of fish may be in a can, and, while members of the House may not know much about it, they should put their constituents in touch with what is going on here, and give them an opportunity to be heard from. I have not had the opportunity to communicate with my constituents, I was not aware that these changes were being made with regard to the quantity that was to be placed in a can, and I should like to know from the minister, when we go into committee, what steps have been taken to acquaint the trade with the contents of this Bill. I have no objection to the Bill, but I think it would be perhaps easier to deal with it if the House were moved into committee, and we were allowed to discuss the question, in order to obtain the information we require.

Motion agreed to and amendments made by the Senate concurred in.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Department of Railways and Canals—To provide for increase in salary of Departmental Solicitor to $4,500, $500; to provide for increase in salary of Assistant Chief Engineer in First Division, Subdivision A, to $4,000, $500; to provide for promotion of G. W. Yates to First Division, Subdivision A, at $3,000, $200; to provide for promotion of E. R. Williams to Second Division, Subdivision A, $550; to provide for promotions from Subdivision A of the Third Division to Subdivision B of the Second Division to the following: B. C. Waddell $200, W. T. O'Regan $200, C. P. Buckley $100, J. W. Weir $100, F. W. Addy $100, C. E. Bleakney $100, $800—$2,550.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who is the departmental solicitor?

Mr. COCHRANE: Mr. Fairweather.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What salary is he getting now?

Mr. COCHRANE: $4,000. He is an extra good man, and I am afraid I would not be able to keep him unless I raised his salary. Of course the Railway Department is under a different system from most of the other departments. It did not come under the Civil Service Act originally.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as this particular item is concerned I have no objection. I quite agree that this officer is more than an ordinarily good man, and I doubt if the minister would be able to obtain the services of an equally efficient man for any less money. I know nothing about the other items, except that the salaries which civil servants in Ottawa are receiving are so tremendously large, compared with the amount ordinary people outside of Ottawa are receiving in the way of salaries, that when we commence to make a comparison we are rather surprised. However I realize, so far as the position of chief solicitor of a department is concerned, that you require a big enough man to command a salary anywhere, and I believe you have that man in Mr. Fairweather.

Mr. COCHRANE: I may say the same with reference to Mr. Sherwood, Assistant Chief Engineer. He is an exceptionally bright man, who, I am satisfied, could command more than the salary he is receiving, if he went outside. Then I am increasing the salary of my secretary to an amount equal to the salaries of most of the secretaries in the service.

I would not trade him for any of them. Mr. Williams entered the service in 1912, but he is on a very low salary now, and he has proved an exceptionally fine man. In my private business I acted on the principle of not being afraid to pay a good man what he was worth, and I believe in the same system in the department, because it is the only way to secure efficiency and good work. Most of these employees were in the department when I took charge, so that it is not a matter of politics in any shape or form that I am asking for these increases.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Was Mr. Williams appointed under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as Mr. Sherwood is concerned, I fully concur in what the minister states. I am inclined to agree with the minister that, if he has in his employment a good man, he should pay him as he would do in the ordinary business affairs of life. As I said before, the salaries at Ottawa are so much greater than they are in the rest of Canada that people are compelled to scrutinize them with perhaps a little more care than they would otherwise do.

Mr. COCHRANE: The salaries are not properly equalized.

Mr. CARVELL: If the minister would, as he says, equalize them, and would give proper salaries to the men who are doing the real work, that would be much better. We all know that in every department the real work is done by a very small number of expert officials.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is true.

Mr. CARVELL: Such men should receive salaries commensurate with their work and the importance of it. I recognize, of course, that with such an institution as the Civil Service, you have to take men at an average and put them in a class.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are these items providing for the promotion of different officials in accordance with the Civil Service Act or contrary to it? When you promote a man from one division to a higher division, should he not first pass an examination under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. COCHRANE: Mr. Williams, who was appointed in 1912, is now over age. He is capable of passing the examination; in fact, he coaches others for it. He is an exceptionally fine man, a man with a family, and, I think, very deserving.

Mr. CARVELL: Probably I have met the official, but I do not know him by sight. What is his occupation?

Mr. COCHRANE: He is Mr. Bell's secretary, and works in the comptroller's office.

Mr. CARVELL: I know now who he is.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How are these appointments made when the parties are over age?

Mr. COCHRANE: Mr. Williams was not over age when he was first appointed, but he is over age now. He was appointed under the Civil Service Act after passing the examination, but he is too old now to take the examination for promotion.

Mr. CARVELL: I feel that the Civil Service Act should be adhered to, especially in regard to appointments, but I agree with the view held by the minister, 5 p.m. that when you have a man who is rendering valuable services, I would not hesitate very much over the Civil Service Act in order to pay him the salary to which he is entitled. Of course, once you open the door to those promotions, it is pretty hard to know when to stop.

Mr. SINCLAIR: A good many appointments have been made under section 21 of the Civil Service Act. During the present session a return was brought down showing that no less than 74 appointments had been made by this Administration under section 21. I do not think, however, the Railway Department had any of them.

Mr. COCHRANE: Promotions cannot be made under that section.

Mr. SINCLAIR: A large number of appointments were made under that section which permits the appointment of men as experts. It appeared from the return that many of those who were called experts were, as a matter of fact, not experts at all.

Railways and canals—chargeable to capital —Canadian Government railways—to provide for building of two wooden ships, $600,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are those ships to be built?

Mr. COCHRANE: A contract was let in Vancouver, and the parties were to put up a bond of $50,000, but they could not do it. In fact, they would not go on with the work at any price on account of the increase in the cost of materials, wages, etc. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) asked me to lay the contracts on the Table, and I did so on Monday.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister will remember that some days ago when this matter was up, he assured me he would call for tenders so as to give builders in eastern Canada as well as builders in western Canada an opportunity of tendering.

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When were those contracts entered into?

Mr. COCHRANE: One in March and one in June of this year. The copies of the contracts have been laid on the Table.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When were the contractors released from their obligations?

Mr. COCHRANE: In August.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just a few weeks ago?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: What are these boats to be used for? Are they to be employed in connection with the Intercolonial railway or on what service are they to be used?

Mr. COCHRANE: They were to be employed on a route from Vancouver and Victoria through the Panama canal to St. John and Halifax and also to the West Indies.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are they to be used in connection with the government railways?

Mr. COCHRANE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is a pretty far off connection. The minister's jurisdiction in regard to the government railways extends only from Winnipeg to the Maritime Provinces. I do not see what purpose there could be in the Railway Department operating ships.

Mr. COCHRANE: They will not only take freight that the Intercolonial brings to Halifax and St. John, but bring freight from the West and deliver it to those ports. I hope the day will soon come when we shall have ships to run in connection with the government railways across the Atlantic to Liverpool and London.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is a pious wish that hon. gentlemen opposite declared a few years ago was impossible of fulfillment because of the alleged impossibility of constructing ships in Canada. We were told that was a dream that could be realized only after fifty years. I am glad the minister is coming to the view that it is possible a few years hence for ships to be constructed in Canada which will be able to carry on our transportation business.

[Mr. Cochrane.]

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not think I made a statement like that.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, the minister did not, but a good many other hon. gentlemen opposite did, including the minister who sits next to him (Sir George Foster) and the Prime Minister.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is quite hazy in his ideas.

Mr. MACDONALD: The committee ought to consider the question of the construction of ships for the purpose of supplying the wastage that is going on due to the destruction of vessels by submarines. This is one of the most important problems that can engage the attention of the House and the Government. Hon. members from the Maritime Provinces may probably understand better than hon. gentlemen who come from the central parts of Canada the unfortunate position in which Canada is as regards the transportation of our products across the ocean as a result of the lack of ships.

Day after day, week after week, during the last few months, ever since the submarine campaign commenced, ships of a tonnage of 1,600 and upwards have been sunk at the rate of from 18 to 40 a week. Millions of tons of shipping have been destroyed. Notwithstanding these facts, we in Canada are doing practically nothing with a view to making up that wastage. It is true that the Minister of Finance advanced to the Imperial Munitions Board $10,000,000 as part payment on account of money that is owing by Canada to the British Governnment. That $10,000,000 is being appropriated by the Imperial Munitions Board for the construction of ships of a certain type. Here and there steel ships are being constructed; the industry is being successfully carried on in British Columbia. But when we bring up the matter of the construction of steel ships in eastern Canada, we are told that it is very difficult to get steel plates. The very fact that we cannot get steel plates for the construction of these vessels is evidence of that lack of organization that has characterized all the operations of the Government in connection with the war. Why is it that steel plates can be obtained for the construction of steel ships at Vancouver by the Imperial Munitions Board, but cannot be obtained for the construction of ships in eastern Canada? As to the building of wooden ships, with all due justice to the Imperial Munitions Board, the plans which they submitted to the people engaged in the wooden shipbuilding industry in eastern Canada involved the introduction into the ships of certain non-essential things which were purely British in their character. These things are very difficult for our shipbuilders to obtain; consequently it is most difficult to live up to the specifications. In the old days more wooden ships were constructed in this country than were constructed in Great Britain, and I do not see why there should not be a reasonable departure from these specifications, which are peculiar in their character. Again, people engaged in the construction of mercantile ships in Canada get contracts from the Imperial Munitions Board for the construction of ships, according to their specifications, upon force account. In the county of Lunenburg wooden ships have been constructed for a great many years. Not long ago a complaint came from that district to the effect that under the Imperial Munitions Board contract for the construction of a ship in the town of Liverpool, all kinds of inducements were being offered in the way of wages and otherwise to attract men from the other shipbuilding industry into the works which were being carried on for the Imperial Munitions Board under force account. That ought not to be. There should be some organization on the part of this Government with a view to improving and extending the shipbuilding industry. When hon. gentlemen on this side suggest that the Government take some action in the matter, we are told that the Imperial Munitions Board are the people that we have to deal with. That may be technically correct, but why should the whole question of the construction of ships in Canada be committed into the hands of a body responsible entirely to the Imperial authorities? My hon. friend now proposes to build two ships. Why should not the Government devise some general policy of aid to the construction of ships at this time? When Mr. Balfour went to the United States, he was accompanied by a group of experts who held consultation with the proper official in the United States. These experts did not come to Canada. They had conferences with the United States Government; they laid down the lines upon which the United States could assist the Allies. They settled upon the number of men to be sent by the United States, the number of shells to be provided, the quantity of food to be sent forward, the number of ships to be constructed by the United States in order to make up in some degree the wastage on the sea. The same thing may be said about the delegations from France and Italy to the United States. But none of these gentlemen came to Canada, except Mr. Balfour and Mr. Viviani, who spent a pleasant hour or so with us before their return to their respective countries. Time after time the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and I have, in this House, urged upon the Government the necessity for action in this matter. We were told that some very mysterious arrangements had been made by which the Imperial Government was to act through the Munitions Board. All that has been done, however, has been the advance by the Minister of Finance of $10,000,000 in part payment of the debt that Canada owes Great Britain. Nothing has been done to assist the construction of ships in this country, with the exception of this small item in the estimates. There should be development of private enterprise under Government supervision; Government aid should be given along proper lines. The shell industry of Canada has been cut off; thousands of men are being dismissed from their employment. The men who invested their money in the making of shells are losing their investments; the men who have been employed in that work are being deprived of any means of earning their living.

There comes from every part of this country a demand that assistance should be given in the matter of shipbuilding. The transportation of food supplies to the other side is a matter of very serious importance. Then there is the problem of transporting across the ocean the unlimited quantities of fish that are to be found on the maritime coasts, and around Newfoundland. The apple crop of the Maritime Provinces, which is one of the best in years, cannot be sent across because of the lack of ships. The lumber trade of Canada is paralyzed because nothing has been done in the way of providing the necessary transportation. If you leave out of consideration the ships engaged in the transportation of men and of a small quantity of shells, you realize that there is an entire disappearance from the seas of Canadian merchant shipping. Is the Government going to do nothing to remedy this condition? Is the building of ships to be left entirely to Great Britain? Are the ships to be built by the Munitions Board in Canada to be the property of Great Britain? Are we to own no merchant marine in Canada? Why have we not done as the United States has done? Why has there not been an organization for the purpose of supplying the defects in our merchant shipping? These are problems of which the Government has not offered any solution. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose attention was directed to these matters some months ago, failed to appreciate the importance of the subject. Does he seriously think that the people will accept as the performance of the whole duty of the Government the payment of a certain amount of money to the Imperial Munitions Board?

What about the wage earners of this country, particularly those engaged in the steel industry? Where are they to get employment? Where are the ships to be found? Are we to sit here supinely watching the hundreds and thousands of tons of shipping go down day by day and, while every other nation interested in the war and in the maintenance of transportation is doing its duty, are we to be told that our Government is incapable of dealing with this problem in any way, and that the only solution that can be found is the suggestion that we are going to have those two ships costing $600,000? If this Government is doing anything else, I am sure the House and the country would like to know what it is. I submit this beggarly proposition of $600,000 to help towards the establishment of a merchant marine in Canada, with thousands of tons of shipping going down day by day, and our trade being paralyzed, and our shell manufacturing being absolutely stopped, is all the Government proposes to do in the way of meeting the existing conditions.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I agree fully with the remarks just made by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). I have had it brought home to me perhaps as strongly as to any member of this House how lamentably the Government has failed in the proper discharge of its duty towards Canada and towards the Empire in the matter of shipbuilding. As my hon. friend has said the subject has been brought before the House on a great many occasions. We have urged it upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who seems to have been entrusted more particularly with this matter, and who from the experience we have had with that hon. gentleman, so far as shipbuilding is concerned, must have been entrusted with it because to the knowledge of his colleagues he would not take any action along practical lines. The minister has told us that he had in view an elaborate scheme for the building of ships after the war. He did not seem to appreciate the fact that it is during the war and under the extraordinary conditions caused by the war that the Government should take action in the direction of shipbuilding. After the war, these questions will solve themselves very well. Since the outbreak of the war, the condition so far as transportation is concerned, not only across the Atlantic but along the coasts of Canada, has become more acute from year to year and from month to month. At the present time, we in the Maritime Provinces are in the deplorable condition that we—with thousands of miles of coast-line and great forests capable of supplying all the timber necessary for the building of ships, and with splendid sites for shipyards, and with our men having the instinct for shipbuilding—see our shipping practically disappeared from the seas, and even the coasting trade of Canada not being supplied with ships. There are no vessels capable of carrying on that trade, and the people of the Maritime Provinces are in the position that they are obliged to pay three times as much for coal as they did a few years ago. This is a deplorable condition of affairs, but it does not seem to appeal to the Government. After the third year of the war, they appointed a fuel controller. What is this fuel controller doing? He is simply telling the people that the price of coal is high because there are no ships to carry the coal from the points of production to the Maritime Provinces. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has been charged with this work, sits back supinely and says: Those are dreadful conditions, but they must go on, there seems to be no remedy for them. I think the Government ought to give some answer to the charge which has been laid by my hon. friend from Pictou.

Mr. COCHRANE: The election is not on yet. This is not the time to make campaign speeches.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not making a campaign speech. I am speaking for my constituency and my provinces, and I am speaking for the Maritime Provinces. I am endeavouring to depict as well as I can the unbearable conditions existing there because of the supineness, the indifference, the apathy, and the inaction of the Government in connection with shipbuilding. My hon. friend has pointed to the fact that the Imperial Munitions Board is building ships in Canada. It is quite true they are doing a little in that direction, but it is only very little. There are hundreds of shipyards in Canada where formerly wooden vessels were built, which are idle at the present time, and which this Government could easily utilize for the purpose of building ships. Surely this subject is of sufficient importance to excite the Government to action, once it is brought to their attention. However, the Government does not seem to pay any attention to it. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) says it is too early to speak of these things because the election is not on. If he will pardon me for saying it, we have had a very strong bit of evidence to-day that the election is to be on soon, because we have seen in the legislation brought down that the Government is in a state of desperation to win the election by any means, fair or foul. When we see this, we must see that the election is to come on soon. The words I have uttered have not been influenced at all by any feeling I have in regard to the election, because I can assure my hon. friend that I am quite prepared to meet my electors at any time the Government chooses to bring on the election.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Did I understand my hon. friend to say that the price of coal in Canada to-day is three times what it was before the war?

Mr. PUGSLEY: About three times.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: In the province of Ontario?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am speaking of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: You are entirely wrong as to Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The price of hard coal in Ontario is only two-thirds of what it is in the Maritime Provinces, although we have water connection between the Maritime Provinces and the points of production. The enormous price anthracite coal is bringing in the Maritime Provinces is caused by the lack of transportation facilities. That is what we complain of. When this war broke out, the Government should have known that the British authorities would commandeer all the shipping it could, because the British Government would need all the ships it could obtain. The Government of Canada should have known that the demand for transportation would therefore increase, whereas the ships would necessarily decrease. It is because of the high cost of transportation by water that coal costs 33⅓ per cent more in the Maritime Provinces than it does in Ontario, strange as it may seem to my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett). Coal costs less than $10 per ton in Ottawa, whereas, in the city of St. John, it costs $15 and upwards per ton. We have been three years in the war, and I make the assertion that this Government has done absolutely nothing with a view to assisting the transportation by water. It has done nothing to assist in maintaining the coasting trade of the country, and it has done nothing to assist in the transportation of our produce across the Atlantic. The fact that the Munitions Board has done something is no excuse for this Government for their entire want of action in reference to this most important question.

With regard to these two vessels which were to be built for the purpose of assisting trade by the two oceans between eastern and western Canada, why has no action been taken? I remember that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), a year or more ago, made the statement publicly—I am not quite sure but that he made it in Vancouver—that this great forward step was to be taken so as to cheapen, if possible, transportation between eastern and western Canada. What has the Minister of Railways and Canals done? Without getting any vote from Parliament, he went through the farce of letting a contract, without public tender, to firms in British Columbia for the building of two wooden vessels. He took no security, he required no deposit, but without parliamentary authority he bound this Government to pay these contractors for the building of two ships. They, apparently, were not bound at all. They put up no security, but they signed a contract—

Mr. COCHRANE: —which calls for security.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, if they did not give security the contract would be of no force or effect. These gentlemen waited for a considerable time and they found they could do better by getting contracts for building ships for the Imperial Munitions Board. They asked the minister to release them from the contract and their yards were taken over for the purpose of building vessels for the Imperial Munitions Board at actual cost, plus 10 or 15 per cent. That is all the minister has done towards building ships. He comes to-day asking for an appropriation of 20 or 30 per cent more than was the contract price of the vessels under the arrangement which he had entered into with these builders in Vancouver. This is the sorry result of the boastful words of the Minister of Customs, uttered publicly, for the encouragement of the people of Vancouver upwards of a year ago. However, I am glad that the minister is going to call for tenders from builders in eastern Canada as well as in western Canada. I know there are plenty of people in eastern Canada who would be delighted if they were afforded an opportunity of engaging in the building of wooden ships. But the fact that the minister proposes to take this step now is no excuse for the inaction of this Government during three whole years of war.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What are the dimensions and tonnage of these ships?

Mr. COCHRANE: 2,500 tons.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I notice they are to be 250 feet in length.

Mr. KYTE: I would like to say a word to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways about the desirability of encouraging shipbuilding in Nova Scotia. At the last session of the provincial legislature a commission was appointed for the purpose of looking into this whole question, and it will be in a position in a short time to report upon the most desirable location for a shipbuilding plant in that province. We have a very large and important iron and steel industry in Sydney with unlimited quantities of coal in the immediate vicinity. I am quite sure that if the Government would give the assistance to shipbuilding enterprise in Nova Scotia that it has given in British Columbia, something very substantial would result in the way of establishing that important industry in the province. It transpired a few evenings ago, when the estimates for dredging in British Columbia were under consideration by the Committee of Supply, that they are building ships in British Columbia some four miles up the Fraser river, and a grant of $100,000 was asked to dredge the channel, as I understand it, to enable them to get their ships floated to the ocean when they are constructed. No such handicap would obtain with respect to the location of a shipbuilding plant in Nova Scotia. At Sydney we have one of the very best harbours in the world and all the material necessary at hand to enter upon the construction of ships.

Mr. COCHRANE: Do you mean to say that you manufacture the steel to build ships?

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. KYTE: I have no doubt that those who are interested in the manufacture of steel would very readily undertake the construction of steel ships if the minister would give the same encouragement to the industry in Nova Scotia as is given in British Columbia. I understand the Munitions Board is furnishing the full amount of the cost of building these ships in British Columbia plus 15 per cent profit. I do not know that there would be very much difficulty in inducing the Dominion Iron and Steel Company to undertake the construction of ships in Sydney under the same conditions?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think this is any solution of the shipbuilding problem. I am sorry to see the minister embarking upon the policy of the building and ownership of wooden ships. The Government should go into the building of steel ships and not wooden ships. If private individuals wish to undertake the building of wooden ships, there should be every encouragement given to them, but it is a very backward step for the Dominion Government to undertake the building, ownership and sailing of wooden ships. The Government, a few months ago, with a great flourish, passed an Order in Council in which they made provision to give certain aid towards the construction of ships. But they provided that this aid would not apply to any ship of less than 500 tons. There is a class of wooden vessels built in Nova Scotia that is found very useful in the local trade, especially with the West Indies. These vessels are nearly all less than 500 tons. Most of them are between 200 and 400 tons. The provision which allows a rebate to vessels of over 500 tons does not apply to the class of ships that are being built in the Maritime Provinces. The provision is that the builders will receive back ninety-nine per cent of the duty paid on imported material going into construction of these vessels. It would be a very good step in the way of encouraging shipbuilding in the Maritime Provinces if it applied to the class of ships to which I refer.

Mr. COCHRANE: Do they build these ships of steel?

Mr. SINCLAIR: No, most of them are wooden vessels and they are used chiefly in the West Indian trade and trade to the River Plate and to South American ports. They are a very useful class of vessels and most of the coal that is used in the Maritime Provinces is carried from ports in the United States to the Maritime Provinces in these ships. Lumber exported to the United States is carried in this class of vessel. It is important we should promote the building of these vessels. It was a disappointment, especially to the people of the Maritime Provinces, when the Government fixed the tonnage limit at 500 tons because the vessels that I speak of are nearly all under that tonnage.

A score of articles that go into the construction of these wooden ships, sails, gear, rope, wire and so on, are imported under a very heavy duty. If the Government would refund 99 per cent of the duty paid in regard to ships from 200 tons up, they would be doing a great thing for the trade. I hope this matter will not be overlooked. I do not expect that very much will come from the construction of two wooden vessels. The minister has been very meagre in the information he has given us. We have learned that the ships are to be about 2,500 tons, and that, so far as I know, is the only fact he has told us in regard to them. It would be interesting to the committee and to the public to know what kind of ships the minister intends to build.

Mr. COCHRANE: The contracts were laid on the Table; you could find out yourself.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, but laying the contract on the Table and not placing the information on Hansard or giving it to the press does not give much information to the public. This is a new departure, it is the first time that the Government of Canada has entered upon commercial shipbuilding and the public should be informed of the minister's plans. Does he intend to build a fleet of ships, and where will they ply? We got one item of information, that they are expected to run between some port in British Columbia and eastern Canadian ports, via the Panama canal. In that case they will come in competition with his own railway. Are the people of Canada going to embark on the construction, ownership and operation of cargo steamers?

Mr. COCHRANE: I have said that it is intended to build two ships of so many tons, and where they are to run.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the length of the ships?

Mr. COCHRANE: 250 feet.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the beam to be?

Mr. COCHRANE: 45 feet.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What will the speed be?

Mr. COCHRANE: Ten knots.

Mr. MACDONALD: Sailing or steam?

Mr. COCHRANE: Both.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) waiting for more information? If so I am sure he will wait a considerable time, because the Minister of Railways has such confidence in his own judgment that he thinks all the rest of us ought to act upon that judgment without getting any information. The minister may be wise in that course when he cannot give any very satisfactory explanation. The minister said something about not being able to get steel in Canada. I had an interesting piece of information last night which I shall pass on to him. I met the President of the Port Arthur Dry Dock and Shipbuilding company who told me that his company is actively engaged in building ships at Port Arthur and employs about 1200 men. Those are steel ships. They have built the largest freighter which plys upon the Great Lakes, the Morden, a magnificent ship. This shows what can be done. It was a great pleasure to me to hear that, because it was my good fortune when I was minister to enter into a contract for the establishment of a dry dock and ship repairing plant at Port Arthur which resulted in the creation of a ship building plant as well, and it is very gratifying that the company has been able to do such splendid work since. So also with another company which the Liberal Government was the means of inducing to establish a ship building plant in Canada, the Vickers-Maxim Company of Montreal. They have been doing very satisfactory work in ship building during the last three or four years. I have no doubt that, had proper encouragement been given, quite a large number of steel ships would have been turned out in Canada before this. I am sorry that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) is not in his place, because I should like to take this opportunity of reminding him—and in his absence I shall remind the Government—of the splendid opportunity which was missed by Canada when this Government reversed the policy of the late Government and determined not to engage in the building of a Canadian navy in Canada.

I would remind the Minister of Marine that when he came into power he found in his office a tender from a firm, who were the lowest tenders for the work, engaging to build some ten war vessels, cruisers and destroyers, for the Government of Canada. They had plans for the building and equipping of a great ship yard with all the requisite plant, and if the contract had been let to them, there is no doubt that they could have followed the example, perhaps upon a larger scale, of the Vickers-Maxim people and also the Port Arthur Dry Dock and Ship Building Company. But, unfortunately, the Government determined that they would not build ships in Canada. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) read in this House, as a reason why they should not engage in shipbuilding in Canada, a report from that distinguished gentleman who was for a time First Lord of the Admiralty in Great Britain, in which it was stated that large ships could not be built in Canada because they required a very firm foundation on which to rest, and also because it would be necessary to have cranes which could lift 150 tons. Those were apparently two insuperable obstacles to the building of ships in Canada. It seems to me too bad that the Government became impressed with the idea that for those reasons, and I suppose there must have been some others, it was impracticable to engage in the building of ships on a large scale in Canada. What a splendid thing it would have been if we had had these shipyards established for the building of war vessels! It would have proved of enormous advantage in the present war, and it would have led necessarily to the building of a large number of commercial vessels as well.

We have lost five or six years in our national life along most important lines, but let me again express the hope that the Government will have the courage, in the face of their refusal in the past to do anything, to enter upon a vigorous policy, even at this late date. A great many of us are afraid the war will continue a considerable time longer, and the critical conditions which are existing to-day, so far as ocean tonnage and the tonnage requisite for our coasting trade are concerned, are becoming more acute, and will become more acute as the months go by. I hope the words which have been uttered to-day will not fall upon absolutely deaf ears, but that some really practical steps will be taken in order to relieve the present situation.

Mr. MACDONALD: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what is the policy of the Government with regard to assistance to shipbuilding in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Government is hard of hearing.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am glad that at the long last we have had the old story—whether this is the swan song or not I am not quite prepared to say—which has been retailed, I suppose, more than a score of times by the hon. gentleman from St. John, ably assisted by the hon. gentleman from Pictou, and which ended to-day with a little different note—a note of modified optimism. Based upon those two vessels, for which the vote is being asked by the Minister of Railways, at last the hon. gentleman thinks he sees signs of the commencement of a more vigorous policy, provided the Government does not again go to sleep on their oars, as he affirms they have done so often, and does not proceed with the construction of the vessels for which this vote has been asked. If either of my hon friends had said anything that they had not repeated a score of times in this House, they would have good grounds for expecting a reply from some member of the Government, but their statements have been answered time and again. We have discussed this matter on lines of policy, and on lines of practical economy, over and over again. All that can be said with reference to this matter at the present time has been said.

Mr. MACDONALD: What has been done?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member for Guysborough rather took issue with my hon. friend from St. John as regards the policy of a vigorous construction of wooden vessels. From his practical experience, he comes to the conclusion that small wooden vessels are not quite the class of vessel that will contribute very much to the commercial marine of this country. They may be good for near-by coasting work, but, as a large shipbuilding policy he thinks the construction of wooden vessels should not be entered upon, but that the construction should be of steel. I think he is absolutely right in that. Economically considered, the day of the small wooden vessels is past. They may do some work along the coast, but, even for extended coasting, the small wooden vesse' has economically passed its time. It is true that at the present moment, any vessel, or any tub that can float and carry something, is bound to find its freight, make its wage in the carriage of freight because of the peculiar conditions. But, as a policy which shall apply, not simply to war times, but to the times that succeed war times, the country which launches into a large system of shipbuilding of comparatively small wooden vessels, would, I think, go up against an economic problem which my hon. friend from Guysborough, from his practical experience, would scarcely endorse. The Government has considered the question of the reduction of the minimum tonnage which would be eligible for this 99 per cent rebate on important materials used in the construction of these ships, with a view of encouraging the building of vessels of less than 500 tons. I think the minimum that has been fixed probably goes down as low as any one would consider it profitable to go. But, so far as that is concerned, it will be confined to the schooners plying along our coasts, and I hope the results will be beneficial. The matter has been urged by small ship-builders, and by those who have been engaged in shipbuilding for some time, and their request has been acceded to, and the limit has been brought down to 200 or 100 tons, which is quite as low, I think, as is necessary to go. When you come to the construction of steel vessels of an economical size, as a general thing vessels anywhere between 6,000 and 10,000 tons are supposed to be economic freight carriers for the present. When you come to try to launch a system of state aid, or of shipbuilding aid by the State, or a system entirely carried on by the State, you meet conditions which make it absolutely impossible for Canada at the present time to engage in the business. We must recollect that this war brings other vast charges, and I doubt if many of us in this House to-day understand at all the exact situation which financially impends over this country in its effort to carry the burden of this war, in so far as its own effort is concerned, and the burden of the war across the sea, which, in part, for the time being, is assumed by Great Britain, but for which, of course, we have to pay in the end, and on which we are paying in this war by advancing to Great Britain on this side what she pays for us on the other side.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the Canadian Northern expenditure?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member for St. John said that all that had been done was to advance to Great Britain some ten million dollars to finance the construction of ships that were being built by the Imperial Munitions Board for the British Admiralty. We are advancing that money, and we are advancing money for very many other things.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are paying the British Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is true; we are paying the British Government; we are paying off a debt. We should pay it all off, but it does not make it any the less burdensome for us whether we pay it in that way, or whether we pay it by a draft, and Great Britain sends back the same money to this country to pay for the ships.

The burden is there, and the burden is tremendous. Whilst my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) on one occasion in this House, advocated putting $80,000,000 or $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 at work to build ships in this country, that is an easy thing to speak of and to broach, but it is a difficult thing to get the money. But, you say: You find the money for other things.

Mr. PUGSLEY: For the Canadian Northern.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister is mistaken; I do not think I advocated anything of the kind.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did the calculating for my hon. friend, if he will recollect the matter. He set the figures and I made the multiplication. He wanted so many vessels built, and I made a calculation as to what it would cost to build those vessels. The cost of the number of vessels he thought we ought to build would have run up between $100,000,000 and $150,000,000. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was delighted with his conversation with the Port Arthur shipbuilder. Some vessels were being built at Port Arthur. If he had gone a little deeper into that conversation, he would probably have found difficulties that beset the path of that or any other shipbuilder in this country building steel vessels, and depending, as he must depend, for every steel plate that he put into his vessel, upon United States sources. There is not a plate which has been put into a steel vessel built in Canada which has been rolled in this country. Those plates, if they come into Canada at all, must come from the United States. We cannot, for various reasons, get them from Great Britain.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister deny what I say, namely, that they are employing 1,200 men at Port Arthur?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They may be; I am not saying that they are not. But if they are employing 1,200 men and are building vessels and are using steel from the United States for that purpose, they are working on contracts which were placed for steel a year or two years ago.

Mr. REID: That work is nearly all in repairing vessels.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is impossible to-day and it has been impossible within the last year to make contracts for the delivery of plates for the building of steel vessels in this country, and to get those contracts filled for months and months and even years. I go further than that and state that, at the present time under the conditions as they exist to-day, it is impossible for men who undertake to build or who contemplate building steel vessels in this country to place a contract in the United States for steel plates for those vessels and get that contract filled.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are engaging in the manufacture of shells in this country and nine-tenths of all the machinery that is used in the manufacture of shells is bought in the United States.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is not the slightest doubt about that. The United States is allowing steel to come into Canada so far as she is under contract for materials of war for the Allies and for Canada, but she is not allowing steel to come into this country for purposes other than for war purposes, that is, for munitions and for the subsidiary processes of making munitions and other war material. That is the condition that exists to-day.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister say that the United States would not allow steel to come into this country for the construction of ships?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The United States to-day, under the steel shipbuilding programme which it is carrying out for itself in connection with the war, and under its obligations towards the Allies and the makers of munitions for the Allies here in Canada as well as elsewhere, is not allowing any steel plates, any steel of certain qualities and grades, to come into this country unless it receives a license upon a requisition certificated by the Department of Trade and Commerce that that steel is for war purposes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Could not ships be described as being for war purposes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Ships could be described as being for war purposes if they were war ships, but they do not come under the term of "war material" which is allowed to come into Canada under the present embargo placed upon steel by the United States.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister mean that an ordinary freight vessel to carry goods and munitions across the Atlantic would not be a vessel for war purposes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend, by a process of reasoning, can connect almost any industry or enterprise in this country more or less remotely with war industries, but steel for the construction of such vessels is not allowed to come into this country at present. Permits are not being given for steel of that description to come into this country unless it is for war purposes. What steel may come into this country for our basic industries depends entirely upon the demand and supply in the United States for those purposes which I have mentioned. If after those are properly cared for, there is a surplus over and above for processes of manufacture which are not directly connected with the war, then those United States' industries engaged in those processes will be cared for, and, after that, as much as there may be of a surplus may be allowed to be distributed to other countries.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister tell us after eight o'clock what he has done and what he is going to do in regard to shipbuilding?

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Minister of Trade and Commerce was giving us some information at six o'clock in regard to this item for the building of two wooden ships. I did not understand that he had finished his speech.

Mr. REID: He finished at six.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He stopped at six o'clock without giving us the information for which we were asking. I hope that some of the other ministers will be able to give us that information; otherwise we shall not be able properly to understand this item. I wish to correct the statement made by the minister in reference to certain remarks that I made in this House some weeks ago—I am sorry that he is not in his seat. He said that I made a proposal involving the expenditure of the enormous sum of $150,000,000 in the building of ships.

Mr. COCHRANE: He said from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Then I misunderstood him. I never made any such proposal as that. The discussion referred to was with regard to what could be done to overcome the submarine menace. The Germans had embarked upon the sinking of all shipping, and active measures had been taken in the United States to meet the situation. It was proposed in that country—at least this was the statement made in the press—to build 2,000 ships for the purpose of counteracting the destructive work of the Germans. If the Government had taken some steps along the line of what was proposed in the United States, they might have adopted a standard ship and either proceeded to build a number of such vessels or to induce private parties to do so. I think I did mention that it would be possible for Canada to build about one hundred such ships. I did not say whether they should be of wood or of steel—I thought that that was a matter for the Government to decide. The Minister of Railways proposes to build two wooden ships for $600,000. I assume that he is providing for a cost of $300,000 each. According to these figures, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce had accepted my proposal, the cost would have been only $30,000,000, which is a very different figure from $150,000,000. I do not know where the minister got the idea that I made such a proposal as he mentioned.

Mr. REID: When the hon. member was discussing the matter, did he mention the size and tonnage of the vessels proposed to be built?

Mr. SINCLAIR: They were to be vessels of 2,500 tons, of a standard type. If we can build a wooden ship of the class proposed by the minister for $300,000, we could build a steel ship for $450,000. Taking the minister's figures as a basis, therefore, the cost of the vessels proposed in the former discussion, if built of steel, would be only $45,000,000. So that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was away off in his figures when he said that I had suggested the expenditure of such a large sum of money as he mentioned. Since that discussion took place the Government has embarked on some very large ventures. They propose to incur a liability of at least $450,000,000 in connection with the Canadian Northern railway—ten times the liability that would be incurred by the construction of 100 steel vessels. A proposal for the building of ships under such a plan as I have suggested would be much more to the point of winning the war than the proposal to take over the Canadian Northern railway at such enormous cost. In asking for the money to build these two wooden ships, the minister enunciates no policy; the Government simply intends to build two wooden vessels. What they are going to do with them after they build them no one knows. What difference will the building of two wooden ships make in the trade of the Empire or of the world? If the Government do not manage this matter better than they have managed others, this expenditure will be of little benefit to the people of Canada or, indeed, to any one. The minister spoke of running these vessels between ports on the Pacific and ports on the Atlantic, through the Panama canal. What trade does he expect to get on that line, and what return cargoes would he carry from the eastern part of Canada to the Pacific through the Panama canal? I suppose there would be some lumber to carry from British Columbia to Eastern Canada. But I really think that the proposal is not a practicable one. There would be more sense in a proposal to build ships for the purpose of carrying our products to Great Britain. I repeat that this is not a shipbuilding policy, the minister does not say that he is going to build more ships. Then why should we embark on the building of these two wooden ships?

In 1879 the manufacturers of Canada came to Sir John Macdonald and asked for the inauguration of a policy to encourage manufacturing in Canada. Sir John, whether right or wrong, decided that a protective policy was the policy best adapted to build up a manufacturing industry in this country. We all know the history of that development. If, instead of introducing a protective policy on that occasion to enable the manufacturers to build mowing machines, reapers, and other manufactured articles, Sir John A. Macdonald had set up business for himself and decided to build two mowing machines, the Canadian people would have laughed at him. Yet, that is exactly what the Minister of Railways is doing. The people asked the Minister of Railways for a shipping policy, which would enable them to go on with the construction of wooden or steel vessels, and the minister rereplies by calling upon the people to contribute $600,000, saying he is going to build two wooden vessels himself. Yet he calls that a policy.

Mr. COCHRANE: You call it a policy, nobody else did.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is it?

Mr. COCHRANE: Two ships.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is some explanation.

Mr. COCHRANE: And no one will benefit more by them than will Nova Scotia.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I doubt it. We require ships in Nova Scotia, but we do not expect the Government to build them for us. If we did, we would be disappointed. Two wooden ships cannot be of very much use in the carrying on of the business of Nova Scotia. If that is all the minister is able to do in the way of assisting the shipbuilding industry, it is a very trifling way of dealing with a big question. The minister, of course, knows that it is possible for the Government to do something in the way of helping the shipbuilding industry. Two proposals have been mentioned in this House. One is that a bounty of so much per ton should be paid by the Government to overcome the excess cost resulting from the high tariff. No country with a high tariff has been successful in establishing a shipbuilding industry. You cannot become a great ship-owning country if you have a high protective tariff. Great Britain is the only country in the world which has made a complete success in shipbuilding. Nearly all the countries in Europe which have protective tariffs have failed to develop this industry. They have assisted shipbuilding, some of them to a very great extent. The United States also offered great help to the industry. They built a protective wall around the country and would not allow one of their citizens to buy a ship outside; every ship sailing under the American flag had to be built in the United States. That was the law up to three years ago. They now have a more intelligent system, and they permit the buying of ships abroad and the registration of those ships under the American flag, without the payment of duty. The second proposal is to reduce the tariff. That is the real cure, and the only way we can ever become a great shipbuilding country. Introduce free trade, and our maritime industry will do the rest. That has been the experience in Great Britain, and for thirty-five years Great Britain has outstripped the world in shipbuilding. Just before the war they had registered tonnage of about 20,000,000 tons, both sail and steam—more than one-half of the total tonnage of the world. It was only possible for England to achieve this result under a free trade policy. Not only was she able to build all the ships required for her own trade, but she built ships for the rest of the world as well. Nearly every foreign nation had its ships built in British yards, because it could be done there cheaper than anywhere else, for the reason that she had free raw material and freedom in every way. The Canadian people should follow the example of the Mother Country. I submit that the people of Canada will not approve of the venture the minister is now making. I see no purpose in going into the building of two wooden ships to be used for the carrying of freight from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast via the Panama canal.

Mr. REID: I hardly think it fair that the consideration of an item of this kind should develop into a discussion as to the policy of the Government in regard to building ships. I think that question is large enough to be discussed by itself. To say that the purchase of those two vessels is in any way connected with that policy is, of course, unfair. As I understand the situation it is that the people of British Columbia had been urging for some years that they should have water transportation between eastern Canada and western Canada. They claimed that eastern Canada had the advantage of water transportation. If the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were depending solely upon the railways, they would very soon make strong demands for water transportation, because there are many products that will not stand a high freight rate. Those three provinces have water transportation, and they have it at the expense of the Dominion, and British Columbia is paying a part of it. The very constituency my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) represents has water transportation at the expense of British Columbia.

Mr. CARROLL: Will the minister kindly point out how the province of Nova Scotia has more water communication than has British Columbia, through the intervention of this Government?

Mr. REID: Does my hon. friend say that the province of Nova Scotia, or any of the lower provinces, have no water communication at the expense of this Government?

Mr. CARROLL: They have. So has British Columbia.

Mr. REID: My hon. friend admits that so far as water transportation is concerned, they have assistance from this Government?

Mr. CARROLL: Yes.

Mr. REID: We agreed on that.

Mr. CARROLL: Were they subsidies?

Mr. REID: They were subsidies.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That means that they were exactly equal. Both of these subsidies were given to ships plying on the coast.

Mr. REID: They get assistance and the people of British Columbia are paying for getting freight from one province to another through expenditures or assistance from the Dominion Government. In British Columbia as I understand it, they have subsidies from one part of the province to another. From Montreal and away down to the lower provinces, they are assisted by subsidies. The people in British Columbia said: We have products that will not stand a heavy freight.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What?

Mr. REID: Lumber and timber, of which they ship in large quantities to eastern Canada. I investigated, and I know that that is so. Millions and millions of feet of timber were shipped to the Toronto harbour works, and they ship large quantities of shingles and lumber. They said: If we could get proper transportation facilities we would have a market that we do not have now in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, for many of these products.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What products does the minister expect to be shipped from eastern Canada to British Columbia?

Mr. REID: The people of British Columbia say that there are manufactured and agricultural products in eastern Canada that they want in British Columbia but which are of such a character that they will not bear heavy freight rates. Then they said: We want to go into shipbuilding, and we want plates and metal products.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) says that we have not got any plates.

Mr. REID: They say in British Columbia: If you will let us get these plates from Nova Scotia, where the iron is made, and nails and bolts from Montreal and other places where they are manufactured in the eastern provinces, at a cheap and reasonable rate, which can only be done by water transportation, we believe that the interchange of products will be advantageous to those parts of the country which are situated so far apart. They also say that the people from Port Arthur to the extreme eastern end of the Dominion have the advantage of water transportation while from Port Arthur west they have no possible way out unless they get water transportaiton through the Panama canal. They wanted a line of steamers between British Columbia and the Atlantic coast. It would also help them they claimed in other ways. There would be, in their opinion, no trouble at all about loading two vessels, one starting at an Atlantic and the other at a Pacific port. They had it in their minds that much more traffic would be offered than these vessels would be able to carry.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They wanted a customs officer at New York, did they not?

Mr. REID: Yes, and the hon. gentleman was in favour of that. The only trouble about that was that we were all anxious to keep the trade within our own territory, while the hon. gentleman wanted it to go through American territory. But I did not agree to that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the shipbuilding programme was favoured by the hon. gentleman as a way by which he could get over the request of the board of trade.

Mr. REID: All right; I will admit that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Tell us all about it.

Mr. REID: Yes, I will tell you all about it. The British Columbia people, having had no line of steamers, wanted the Government to allow them to ship their freight to New York on American vessels and not to go through Canadian territory at all. They wanted to take back goods manufactured in the United States in order to load the vessels on the return voyage and not get them from the Canadian side. I am free to admit that I was of the opinion, then, as I am now, that we should keep the traffic within ourselves and that if we could get Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to use British Columbia products. I considered it very good business, and I believe the people will be satisfied with such an arrangement. The people of British Columbia were satisfied, as far as my observations went, with such a proposal. The people of British Columbia also claimed that there were products that they required at times from the West Indies. We are working up a trade between Canada and the West Indies. These vessels, at some particular time, might possibly not have a full cargo for Halifax or St. John, and they could bring sugar and other products to eastern Canada. On the other hand, they could take a cargo to the West Indies and on to British Columbia and thus help at both ends in building up a trade between western and eastern Canada. That was my idea and my suggestion to my colleagues after I had discussed the matter fully with the British Columbia people.

Now, what was done about these vessels? For the last three or four years it has been almost impossible to get vessels built. To start in and build vessels now would cost three times as much as it would under normal conditions. What I recommended to he Minister of Railways and my colleagues was this: There is a transportation company called the Canada West Transportation Company, in which many of the heads of that large corporation, the Canada Steamship Company are interested. The Canada West Transportation Company gave an order for twelve vessels of exactly the same dimensions as these two vessels that were ordered in British Columbia. I recommended to the Minister of Railways and Canals and my other colleagues that a contract should be awarded for the construction of two vessels on exactly the same lines and on the same terms as those of the Canada West Company. In other words, we said: There is a contract that has been awarded by this company for a dozen vessels, and we will give you a contract on the same terms and at the same price. In that contract the terms were stated, a bond was to be given as to completion, and so on. The British Columbia people were complaining of the freight rates charged by the three great railway companies. They claimed that the freight rates between British Columbia and eastern Canada were almost prohibitive on products of a cheaper kind.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How long were you in British Columbia this time?

Mr. REID: I think I was there eight days. I gave them one answer which I am glad to say is, I believe, coming true. I said to those to whom I was speaking: If you will just have a little patience this Government will do two things; they will give you transportation by vessel between the Atlantic and the Pacific, and they will give you a government-owned and government-operated railway on which they will control the rates, and then you will get justice if you have not received it heretofore.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will call you a false prophet in a short while.

Mr. REID: Then you cannot have confidence in the Canadian Northern Railway Bill going through. I say it is going through, and when it does my prophecy that we would have a Government-owned and government-operated railway will come true.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By this Government?

Mr. REID: By this Government. It was not with the consent of the hon. member; it was by this Government and by the members sitting on this side, and they are entitled to the credit of the Canadian Northern Railway Bill going through and of the people of Canada having a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific owned by them.

Mr. CARROLL: But will not the Canadian Northern railway be subject to the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission just the same?

Mr. REID: Certainly.

Mr. CARROLL: They will make the laws regarding the freight rates.

Mr. REID: But the Railway Commission is under the jurisdiction of this Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You have always said not.

Mr. REID: The Railway Commission is under this Government, and they will do justice; if they do not we will remedy it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought they were appointed for ten years.

Mr. REID: The people of Canada will in a few days have a railway owned and operated by them—

Mr. PUGSLEY: For which they will pay mighty dearly.

Mr. REID: —in spite of the opposition of the hon. member for St. John, although he was throwing up both hands for it a few years ago when he believed we would not take it over.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all; you cannot prove that.

Mr. REID: I would not want anything better on which to meet the hon. gentleman on the platform than this very Canadian Northern Railway measure to show the people that we have now a railway that we operate ourselves. However, that is getting away from the item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is quite in order.

Mr. REID: No, I am going to ask the Chairman to rule me out of order when I get away from the question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. REID: I believe that in starting with a line of vessels between British Columbia and the Atlantic coast the Government will greatly benefit both the East and the West, and that the people on both coasts will appreciate the start which has been made.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why were not tenders called for, as this involves an amount over $5,000?

Mr. REID: We asked every shipbuilding yard in British Columbia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not in eastern Canada as well?

Mr. REID: Because there were contracts for a dozen vessels exactly the same awarded by a private company in British Columbia, after every effort had been made to have them built in eastern Canada. I do not believe that these vessels could be got for anything like the same price in the East, because in British Columbia they have the timber while they have not it in the East.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Minister of Customs chastised the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) for raising the issue of a shipbuilding policy for Canada, and said that this was not an appropriate time to raise such a question. Perhaps that criticism was fair. On this side of the House we think very highly of the Minister of Railways, and after the criticism by the Minister of Customs of the member for Guysborough I did feel, and I do now feel, that perhaps hon. members on this side were a little unfair to him this afternoon in discussing what is a matter of public policy upon an item to vote moneys for the purchasing of two boats which are not really to be operated as a part of the Intercolonial railway. Perhaps that was why the Minister of Railways was silent. I can understand his silence now. If this vote does not involve the question of the proper national policy for this country in respect of shipbuilding, then the question is, is it a proper thing for the Intercolonial railway to acquire two ships in the operation of the railway? Perhaps it is not that question either, as I think it really has nothing to do with the matter of the operation of the Intercolonial. This policy was inaugurated by the Minister of Customs and was the result of a visit by him to British Columbia. Now he has described his programme at great length—almost three-quarters of an hour—and has informed us very fully as to its origin and its purpose. We are asked to vote $600,000, not for the purpose of determining what our national policy shall be in respect to shipbuilding, not in respect to the Intercolonial, but upon another question altogether, the development of interprovincial trade between the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast.

Has this vote anything to do with the Intercolonial? If not, it should not be here, and the Minister of Railways should not be asking for this money. If it is for the purpose of the development of interprovincial trade, as the Minister of Customs says, it is a matter of trade and commerce, and must be discussed upon different lines altogether. If this belongs to the Intercolonial, let us inquire whether this is sound policy or not. Why attach this venture to the Intercolonial? The Minister of Customs informs us that it is not to be a part of that railway system. It is not possible to operate these two steamships as a part of that railroad; it is not thinkable that it could be done.

Mr. COCHRANE: Why?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How can you interchange traffic between the Intercolonial railway and these ships, with any degree of certainty?

Mr. REID: How are you going to get the traffic between Ontario and Halifax and St. John in the winter?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: By rail.

Mr. REID: Over the Intercolonial.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But the Minister of Customs had these two ships cavorting down to West India waters.

Mr. REID: No, I said Halifax and St. John.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And then going to the West Indies, to load up with sugar.

Mr. REID: That is on the route.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Let me adhere to the question whether these ships should or should not be a part of the Intercolonial railway. I say they should not. The question whether we should or should not encourage interprovincial trade between eastern and western Canada by means of subsidies, or building of boats for that special purpose is another question. I protest against the Intercolonial making an investment of $600,000, with grand opportunities for adding to that investment every month thereafter, to develop trade between eastern Canada and the Pacific coast, where the Intercolonial has no connections whatever. I know the Minister of Railways is too good a business man to believe in his heart that this expenditure is justified upon that ground. I can understand the Intercolonial engaging in the building and operation of ships between Maritime Province ports and British ports. I think the time is near at hand when the Intercolonial must do that, and if they were in the position to purchase fifteen or twenty steamships to-day, of from 5,000 to 10,000 tons capacity, I believe it would be a good policy, and a logical enterprise for the Intercolonial to embark on. The route followed by these steamships would be but a continuation of the Intercolonial system. But, I submit, the operation of two steamboats between the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast cannot in any sense be construed as a part of the operation of the Intercolonial.

The Minister of Railways justifies this vote on the ground that it is desirable to develop trade between the east and west coasts of Canada. That is a very interesting question. The proposal has merits, there is something to say in favour of it. But do not put it upon the Intercolonial; let it be a matter of national policy. Even if we were attempting to encourage trade between the east and west coasts of Canada, is this the right way to do it? Again I protest against Canada entering into the construction of wooden vessels for this purpose. In the first place, these vessels seem to be very expensive. You are asking us to vote $600,000 for two ships of 2,500 tons each, which would mean a cost of $125 per ton.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: The machinery would cost $110,000.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The total cost completed would be $125 per ton. I know of instances, within twelve months, where ships of a greater tonnage than this, more suitable for this trade, could have been purchased at about $125 per ton. It is true, they were boats engaged in the lake trade in the United States, and some changes would have to be made in them. A great deal of tonnage was available for purchase in the United States within the last eighteen months. During the last three or four years there was, perhaps, not the same amount of tonnage offered. I know that the Dominion Coal Company bought tonnage within fifteen months for about $80 per ton. The vessels were not very large but suited the company. You can enter into contracts to-day, I think, for steel boats for about $125 a ton.

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. CURRIE: Come off.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not admit that my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is an authority on these matters.

Mr. CURRIE: How many tons of plate and steel is there in a vessel of this size?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I could not tell you.

Mr. CURRIE: About 3,000 tons.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I could not tell you that, but within the last two months contracts have been entered into for the construction of steel ships in the United States for $155 to $160 per ton.

Mr. CURRIE: When were they to be completed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To be completed as soon as possible—within a year.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman said $160?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. REID: I may say that, within the last year, the lowest price of any contract I have heard of was $160 a ton. I have not heard of any within the last two years, either in the United States or in Canada, at $125.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You can enter into contracts to-day for the construction of steel ships somewhere between $155 and $160 a ton.

Mr. STEVENS: Within the last week the Japanese Government has offered $225 a ton for steel ships.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is quite true, and I know of the British Government paying nearly $200 a ton for shipping, at a time when tonnage could be purchased in the United States for $140 or $150. Those are exceptions which do not prove the rule. At the present moment the Government has not entered into any contract for the construction of wooden ships, as I understand. A contract was entered into, but the contractors failed to carry out the contract.

Mr. REID: And the contracts that were entered into were for less than $100 a ton.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The contractors could not carry out their contract, claiming that the price was too low, and now they want $125 a ton for wooden ships, and are unwilling to give a guarantee positively for construction within any reasonable period. Wooden shipping is not the kind of tonnage which this Government should purchase If they are going to operate a line of steamships between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, it would be far better to pay an additional initial cost of $50 or $60 a ton, than to buy wooden ships at $125 a ton, because the ships must pass through tropical waters, where their bottoms are subjected to attacks of all sorts of worms and insects which infest those waters, and which are more or less destructive to wooden shipping.

If a government owns wooden shipping, there is no end to the capital expenditures which commence the first year after construction. It would be infinitely cheaper, if we are going into this business at all, to enter into contracts for the construction of steel ships. I would not do even that; if we wish to encourage interprovincial trade via the Panama canal, it would be far better for us to pay a reasonable subsidy to some steamship company that was willing to make an investment and go into this work.

Mr. REID: That cannot be done because no one will undertake it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They may not do it at the present time, but it will be a long time before the Government receives delivery of these wooden ships, and there is no trade now between the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast.

Mr. REID: There is.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I doubt if there is at this time. I would like to see a steamship line operating between the Pacific coast and the eastern coast of Canada, but it would be better to have such a line owned and operated by a private company, because a private company could go where they liked for traffic. There is, however, no business for a line of steamships to-day between British Columbia and the Maritime Provinces. The Minister of Customs spent eight days in British Columbia amongst his political friends, and I have no doubt he was pressed quite strongly by them to do something of this nature. He confessed to us that what he was pressed to do was to appoint a customs officer at New York. The people of British Columbia have been wanting that for a long time. Personally, I have not been able to see any substantial objection to that.

Mr. REID: That is what I say.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To get out of it, the minister says he developed this theory about the building of wooden ships. It was a shame that he should have allowed the Minister of Railways, for two or three hours this afternoon, to battle with hon. members on this side in defence of his scheme. The Minister of Customs should have spoken before recess. He speaks about the traffic these two ships would get between the East and the West. It is true that some traffic might be developed between the eastern and the western ports of Canada by means of a steamship line of this nature—I would hardly be an authority on that point. The hon. gentleman speaks about wood. Very little wood would go to the Maritime Provinces from British Columbia, because in the Maritime Provinces we produce more than enough for ourselves; we are exporters. New Brunswick, for instance, is a very heavy exporter of lumber to the European markets. We frequently require heavy timber from British Columbia, but the total purchases during a year would not amount to very much and the shipments are usually brought to the Atlantic coast by rail. That would be much cheaper than bringing it by water, because one would never want to bring a whole shipload of timber from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic.

Mr. STEVENS: Shipload after shipload of timber has come from British Columbia to the Atlantic coast of Canada—35,000,000 feet was brought to Toronto on one order

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was the dimension of that timber?

Mr. STEVENS: Large dimensions. The same is true of Quebec, St. John and Halifax. During the last two years every port on the Atlantic coast has been buying millions and millions of feet of timber from British Columbia.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am referring to long timber, which I know comes to the eastern provinces by rail.

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring to shiploads of timber, whether you call it long, short, or any other kind.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: An occasional shipload may come from British Columbia to the Maritime Provinces, but not enough to justify the construction and operation of two steamships.

9 p.m.

This vote, which contemplates the construction and operation of two steamships, is not really a vote of the Intercolonial railway system, and we ought not to be asked to pass it upon that basis. If the Intercolonial railway are going into the steamship business they should not purchase wooden shipping at $125 per ton; they should wait until steel tonnage is available, because for the present and for possibly a year or two there will be very little traffic between the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast. If this vote is for developing trade between the Atlantic and the Pacific coast, and as it is the judgment of hon. members that that should be done in one form or another, it should be done by a subvention granted to a company experienced in the operation and management of steamships.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen opposite have referred very slightingly to the trade between the eastern part and the western part of Canada. I will enumerate, as far as I can, some of the things we want to buy from the East and some of the things we sell to the East. For instance, through my efforts, a large nail factory on the Coast changed its purchases of steel rods from Great Britain to Nova Scotia, and it is now buying from the Nova Scotia Steel Company about two or three carloads of steel rods per month.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When did that happen?

Mr. STEVENS: It is going on now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When did it start?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Within the last two years.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Pacific coast, of course, would be glad to buy steel rods from any place to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: This firm desired to buy them in Canada and it was through an arrangement made with the Intercolonial railway and the Nova Scotia Steel Company that the transaction was effected.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They could not get them in Great Britain.

Mr. NESBITT: Or in the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: We buy from Ontario large quantities of wire fencing and all manner of agricultural and milling machinery. Practically all our saw mill machinery comes from Ontario and Quebec. We have to transport that by vessel, or we have to pay a very high rate of freight for the long haul by rail. We buy a great deal of our hams, bacon and other produce of that kind from Ontario or from packers in Seattle and Portland. British Columbia buys large quantities of canned goods for use in the mining camps in the northern parts of British Columbia and in the Yukon. Hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of canned goods a year now brought from California, could be brought from eastern Canada—a considerable quantity is bought from eastern Canada now. When there was an occasional ship sailing from New York to the Pacific coast British Columbia dealers would buy the goods in eastern Canada, ship them to New York and from there to Seattle, pay the duty, and still manage to carry on the business. If we can buy in eastern Canada and bring these goods via the Panama canal direct to Vancouver of Victoria, that will eliminate the duty and will enable us to do business on what we consider a reasonable and fair basis. My hon. friend speaks slightingly of the timber business. We do not deprecate the timber business of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; we know there is a certain amount of it in those provinces. But for heavy construction, you have to get timber that is not produced in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. For years and years you have been importing southern pine from Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia. We can supply the finest of timber just as cheaply or more cheaply than you can get it from the southern states. Why then, in the name of Heaven, should not the western part of Canada serve the East with timber and the East supply the West with other goods? A British Columbia broker about a year ago last March went to Kingston, Jamaica, and in nine months he developed a trade between eastern Canada and Jamaica amounting to $180,000 for last year. He is trying to do business with the West. I had a letter from him only yesterday. We can export from the western coast oats, hay, lumber, shingles, fish, potatoes, and other such products and we can import the products of the West Indies. This line of ships is designed to do this trade between the ports of eastern Canada and of British Columbia via Jamaica and the Panama canal.

There you have a perfect trade route: part of your cargo from eastern Canada will be for the West Indies and part of it for British Columbia, and vice versa. I cannot see why hon. gentlemen opposite object to the construction of these two ships for the purpose of initiating that trade route. The member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said this afternoon that we wanted all the tonnage we could get on the Atlantic in order that the products of the Maritime Provinces might be taken to Europe. I would point out that scores of ships have been taken from the Pacific coast to carry on that trade between the Atlantic seaboard and Europe. I do not dispute the importance of that trade, but there should be no objection to the building of a couple of small and comparatively cheap wooden ships to keep up the trade between the two coasts of Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman tries to make it appear that I opposed any effort in the direction of developing the interprovincial trade to which he refers. I thought I made it clear that I was not against that, but I did say I would take other means to that end. I object to the purchase and operation by the Government of these wooden ships.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend may be perfectly sincere in what he says, but he ridiculed the idea of trade between eastern Canada and the West.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Just at present.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman is wrong; a very extensive trade is being carried on now, in spite of prevailing handicaps, between eastern and western Canada. Even to-day we purchase from the manufacturing concerns of Seattle, Portland, San Francisco and other western cities very large quantities of manufactured goods which we could buy in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. We feel that we would rather purchase those goods within Canadian territory, and we can do that if we get the transportation facilities.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would Ontario goods go over that route?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. NESBITT: Would it be cheaper to ship via Halifax and the Panama canal from western Ontario than to send the goods overland?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. The freight rate from Toronto in the winter time via Halifax around by the Panama canal to Vancouver is very much cheaper than the rate from Toronto overland. We secured reams of detail in this matter; the Board of Trade looked into it; a delegation came here and demonstrated beyond question the fact that transport by this proposed route would be infinitely cheaper than by rail. Even now we buy goods from the eastern States, take them to New York, ship them by an American line to Seattle, tranship to Vancouver, pay the duty, and beat out Canadian overland freight rate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have here a copy of the contract which the minister was good enough to lay on the Table, and I want to give a few particulars as to the specifications. The length of keel is set out as 225 feet; breadth of vessel, 44 feet; depth of hold, 19 feet. On the basis of $230,000, the cost of the machinery, and plans, etc., was to be $115,000; the rest would go for the hull. One half, therefore, would be for the hull and the other half for machinery and plans. It is proposed to pay $300,000 for each of these ships.

Mr. COCHRANE: Oh, no, it is not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what the minister is asking.

Mr. COCHRANE: That does not mean that he is going to pay it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would be at the rate of $120 a ton. As the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) pointed out, that is nearly the cost of a steel vessel. At all events, the owners of shipyards in the eastern provinces ought to have an opportunity of tendering for these ships. The Minister of Customs says that the reason why tenders were not invited from eastern Canada was because it would cost more to build the ships there; that they had not the timber in eastern Canada.

At present the construction of two ships is being proceeded with in St. John for the Imperial Munitions Board; I think each vessel is 2,500 tons, the same tonnage as that of the ships here contracted for by the minister.

Mr. REID: Captain Norcross, the head of the Canada West Coast Navigation Company, told me that there were some little extras that would probably have to be added to the amount of that contract. He told me also that the vessels could not be built as quickly for the price in eastern Canada; that is why the contract went to British Columbia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would assume that the contract of the Canada West Coast Navigation Company was at a somewhat lower rate. These specifications say that some additions are made in the schedule; I assume that they would be included in the $230,000.

Mr. REID: There were some others in addition to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Customs says that he advised the Minister of Railways to undertake this work. But the Minister of Customs himself, not the Minister of Railways, signed this contract. The signatures are as follows:

Wallace Shipyards, Limited,
(Signed) A. Wallace, Managing Director.
(Signed) J. D. Reid, Acting Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. REID: The Minister of Railways knew all about it; if I remember rightly, he signed the Order in Council. He happened to be away at the time, but it was all submitted to and confirmed by him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason why the Intercolonial railway is charged with the burden of these two ships is that the Minister of Customs was at Vancouver about a year ago. He got in touch with the enterprising gentlemen of Vancouver, and he promised this steamboat connection between the Atlantic and the Pacific. He had to carry out his promise when he came back, and that is why this burden is laid upon the Department of Railways rather than upon the Trade and Commerce Department, where the burden would be chargeable to the general revenue of Canada. I protest against this additional burden being laid upon the Intercolonial railway, with which this steamship line will not be in any way connected.

Of course I can understand why the Minister of Customs should take hold of it in the Railway Department, because he knew perfectly well if he left it to the Department of Trade and Commerce he would never get it. My hon. friend heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce reproached for not doing anything for the encouragement of shipbuilding in Canada, and saw that the minister simply told us in that dreamy style of his of the great ideas he had for the development of shipbuilding after the war. The Minister of Customs could not wait so long, because he had promised the people of Vancouver to deal with the matter more quickly. The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke this afternoon with reference to the charge that the Government had done nothing for the encouragement of shipbuilding. He admitted it, but he showed the difficulties in the way and said "You cannot get steel plates to-day." Well, if that is the case to-day it has not been the case during the three years since the war began, when if proper encouragement had been given the building of ships could have been undertaken most successfully in Canada. I want to read a newspaper extract showing what the United States Government is doing in the way of shipbuilding, and I would ask the committee and the people of this country to contrast it with the do-nothing policy of this Government during the last three years:

A Washington despatch says that contracts for the construction of three immense government-owned shipyards for building fabricated steel merchant vessels have been awarded to the Submarine Boat Corporation at Newark, N.J., the American International Corporation at Hog Island, Pa., and the Merchants Shipbuilding Company at Chester, Pa. Each yard will cost $35,000,000 and contracts have been let for 200 ships to be built in each.

Within comparatively few weeks of the United States becoming engaged in the war, they have provided for the creation of three great shipyards, and let contracts for the building of 600 steel ships. Such an example of the vigorous way in which the United States is engaged in shipbuilding ought to put this Government to shame.

Mr. CURRIE: How many ships have they built?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The contract is for 600.

Mr. CURRIE: They have not built one ship. It is only a week since they gave the contracts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They have only been in the war a few weeks. Although they have only been engaged in the war a short time, they have already made arrangements for these three shipbuilding plants, and have given contracts for 600 vessels. That is a record which puts this Government, which has done nothing in the direction of shipbuilding, in a position they ought to feel. In the past this Government has neglected their duty to the country, but even at this late day they ought to be encouraged to make a different course and engage without delay in the building of a reasonable number of ships in order to meet so far as possible the requirements of our country and of the Empire.

Mr. CURRIE: I have no desire to delay this item, but having some interest in the matter, it might be well for me to place certain facts before the Committee. A great deal of the time of the House this afternoon was spent in discussing the impossible. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been scolding the Government, and denouncing the Minister of Railways and everybody generally, because the Government has not taken up the question of shipbuilding, especially of steel shipbuilding. When the war broke out, there was very little business to be had by any of the shipbuilding firms. As a matter of fact, in 1915, there was no business. The only people who were building any ships were the Standard Oil Company, and they were getting them so cheaply, and had such foresight, that they gave certain contracts to some of the yards, at low prices. Since the submarine policy of the Germans has succeeded in destroying a large number of vessels, and freight tonnage has gone up on the Atlantic, shipbuilding in Canada has had a great boom. A steel ship that could have been bought for $40,000 in 1915 will easily sell to-day for $350,000. I am now speaking of second-hand twenty-year old ships. At the present moment there is not a steel shipbuilding yard in eastern Canada, that is, Collingwood, Kingston, Toronto, Montreal, or Levis, that would take a contract to build a ship inside of two years, because they are filled up with orders at remunerative prices for that time, and even longer. I know this to be a fact. If you want to build a ship, where are you going to get the material? There is absolutely no material available inside of two years. We cannot bring plate from Europe, and all the plate the American mills can produce for the next two years is sold or booked. The price of plate has gone up as high as $160 to $175 a ton, whereas before the war and during 1915 it could be purchased as low as $34 a ton. From this it will be apparent that the cost of shipbuilding has gone up enormously—over $100 a ton for the steel for the hulls alone. My hon. friend says you can get it for $80 a ton. Why, the added cost alone is over $100 a ton. A ship of 2,500 tons burden will take, roughly, about a similar quantity of structural steel and plate. The plate mill which was at Sydney was sold to the United States since the war began, exported out of Canada, and I understand is now employed making plate in the United States. At the time this mill was purchased it was impossible to sell any plate in Canada, and there was no work whatever for it to do. At the present time every plate mill in America is employed. Every pound of steel that can be got to a plate mill is sent there, because of the high price of plates. If a man were prepared to-morrow to supply the structural steel and plates for a ship, or two ships, or ten ships, he would not be one day with his books unfilled. The question then arises, what is the next best policy? They have a board in the United States, to which my hon. friend has referred, which was established with the idea of building ships for the United States Government. The first board was divided in its views as to whether the ships should be built of steel or of wood. Two of the members resigned because they held the view that some of the ships should be built of wood, whereas the president of the board would not agree to this view. The result was that the commission delayed action and was dismissed, and another appointed, and a certain number of wooden ships are to be built. If any one wants a ship built in this country inside of a year or so there is only one way to get it built, and that is to have it built of wood. There is only one place in Canada that I know of where there is plenty of cheap wood to be had, that is in British Columbia, so that the Government, in adopting the idea of building the ships could not do anything but have the ships built in British Columbia. Hon. gentlemen have stated it would be wrong to build wooden ships when you can build steel ships. I agree with that. But if you cannot build iron ships, and you want ships, you must take what you can get—the wooden ones. The tonnage of the world has been reduced to such an extent that I think the Government has been very modest, indeed, in placing orders for only two ships. I think they would have been amply justified in giving contracts for at least ten more of these wooden ships of, say, 2,500 tons burden, to assist in the carrying of freight from this country to Great Britain, as well as the other work of the Intercolonial. Those ships would be classed A-1 by Lloyds, and would have a life of about seven years. The freight charges from three voyages of one of those ships would more than pay for the ship. It is the freights that can be earned by ships that make ships valuable to-day. They are paying as high as $60 a ton across the Atlantic.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend is wrong because he would be competing against Canadian railways, and rates would have to be as low or lower than Canadian rail rates. My hon. friend is talking about transatlantic freights.

Mr. CURRIE: I am going to deal with the question of rates between East and West by and by. I am speaking of what it costs to ship goods abroad.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman was in error when he was talking about the excessive freight rates which these wooden ships would earn. He is referring to the case of transatlantic rates.

Mr. CURRIE: I am going to deal with that if the hon. gentleman will keep quiet for a few minutes. I am talking about transatlantic freight. The rate is as high as $60 a ton for transatlantic freight, this is because tonnage is not to be had. That is why there is such a demand for ships and material. For that reason the Government are absolutely justified in going into the building of ships, because there is going to be a great shortage of ships for the next six or seven years. Any kind of ships that will carry tonnage to any part of the world are sure to receive ample freight and high rates for that work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the trouble is that they have not built any ships yet.

Mr. CURRIE: I am going to come back to the United States to point out to the hon. member for St. John that in the United States for the past six or seven years——

Mr. PUGSLEY: Six or seven years?

Mr. CURRIE: Six or seven months, a crimp has occurred in tonnage on account of the tremendous losses caused by the submarines. That condition did not exist in the first half of the war. During the first half of the war the submarine damage did not amount to anything. But tonnage on the ocean has now become short. If we cannot get iron and steel plates—and everybody knows we cannot—it is absurd to talk about building steel ships. Ships now can only be built of wood.

Now, I come to the question of trade between East and West. The Panama canal was built for the purpose of carrying freight between the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of the United States. It is extremely fortunate for this country that we are able to utilize that canal for the carrying trade between the East and the West. Unlike the United States, we have a stopping place at Jamaica and other others of the the British West Indian islands which are British territory and many of which give a preference to Canadian trade. They are a great advantage to us, and the trade with them is going to be much more extensive when matters become settled again. Then, there are Mexico, Venezuela and other Central American countries which Canada has only recently been able to touch. I know from personal experience that trade is now going on between Canada and Colombia and other Central American countries, whereas we never got a dollar of it before. That trade can be built up into a vast business. We hear gentlemen from Nova Scotia always kicking about the trade of this country. They have been up in arms against the National Policy and they have set the eastern provinces back twenty-five years by the course which they have pursued. Iron is taken from Sydney to Toronto, made into stoves and sent back to Sydney and to other places in the East and sold or exported. In many other things a similar process takes place. Why should that be? The development of manufacturers in the Maritime Provinces has been discouraged by this free trade talk. Instead of encouraging the people to build up industries in their own towns and villages as Ontario has done, they became discouraged and have gone over to the New England States and carried on the industries there with their brains and ability. As a matter of fact if you enter any of the great shops in the New England States and are sent to the manager, to the man whose brains and energy are building up these large plants which are employing thousands of workmen, you will find that he is a Canadian, a native of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick who has left this country. Why? Because the public men, the men who rule the destinies of these provinces, are opposed to building up the industries of those provinces, and they are just as much opposed to any increase in the manufacturing industry to-day as they have been in the past.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are making stoves in Nova Scotia and selling them in British Columbia.

Mr. CURRIE: That is very lately.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, long years ago.

Mr. CURRIE: Only a few years. Most of the hardware has been made outside of Nova Scotia. It is only within a few years that there was such a thing as a slide rule in Nova Scotia. The educational system was along the line of the classics—Greek and Latin—and it was only when the industries were started at Amherst and Sydney that they began manufacturing hardware products. Then, to-day, we have the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) talking free trade in ships; and it is argued that the cost of ships is cheaper in England than in any other place in the world. That has been due to the fact that skilled mechanics in England and Scotland got such low wages. But that condition has changed and shipbuilding will never be carried on in any part of the world as cheaply as it has been in the past. There is no merit in low wages, and there is no merit in producing goods at a loss. The only thing that there is merit in is making a profit. What benefit is it to a man if he does not get a profit out of his employment?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that each country should manufacture within itself everything that it consumes?

Mr. CURRIE: That is a very primary question in political economy and every one in the lower grade—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Answer.

Mr. CURRIE: A student in the lower grade of political economy would know that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is my hon. friend's answer?

Mr. CURRIE: There is a certain country to-day that is carrying on a great war and that is Germany—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Answer the question.

Mr. CURRIE: It is manufacturing and doing all its own business within its own borders at the present time, and it still seems to be getting along famously with it. If we were to purchase less from abroad and if we did not purchase unnecessary things in the United States our credit might be better than it is to-day.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the hon. gentleman think the Germans are getting on better than Great Britain is?

Mr. CURRIE: Being a loyal British subject the hon. gentleman would not expect any answer from me to that question, but what I do say is that that country is not getting along better.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): I would request the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currie) to come back to the question of ship-building.

Mr. CURRIE: This is just a little digression. Hon. gentleman have been making political speeches all afternoon.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am correct then, am I not, in the understanding that it is the hon. gentleman's view that Canada and all the countries of the world should manufacture for themselves everything they require and that being the case there would be no need of shipping.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman is endeavouring to put an answer into my mouth which, he knows very well, I did not give, because it is our business and should be our business as a country which is undertaking great expenditures in this war to sell and export as much as possible and to buy as little as possible from other countries if we are going to pay our debts. That is an answer which my hon. friend might sleep over and figure out the meaning of in the morning.

Now, to come back to the question of ships; the time of the House was spent idly this afternoon in discussing the question of expanding the shipbuilding industry. The Government has done wonders. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) has assisted in placing contracts in every shipbuilding yard that is available in this country. To-day you cannot find ten feet of yard space that is not employed. Every machine shop, every engine-buiding concern, is filled with contracts for marine engines. So far as the policy of this Government in purchasing and having built wooden ships is concerned, I think it is a most excellent policy, and that the people of this country would justify the Government in building not only two ships but twenty, because they will be needed. Twenty wooden ships would not be too many, because you cannot get the steel plate to build steel vessels unless you wait for three or four years, and that would be too long to wait if we want to increase the export of the goods of this country. One thing that is militating against the increase of the munitions industry in this country and causing the closing down of munitions work, is that tonnage is not available to export shells. I have in mind one yard where I saw piled up from eight to ten thousand tons of steel shells and ingots for use in Great Britain, piled up and rusting for the reason that there is no tonnage. The hon. member says private capital should build the ships. But every dollar of private capital that can be got to go into ships is in shipbuilding at the present time, and the only thing to do is for the Government to get what tonnage they can for Canada, and to carry on in the way they are doing. It seems absurd for this House or any member to claim that the Government is not doing its duty so far as shipbuilding is concerned. The shipbuilding industry in this country is more flourishing than the shell-making or any other industry, even farming, and for that reason the claim that the Government is not doing its duty towards that industry is absurd. I repeat that it is absolutely necessary for this country to see that in trade the East and West are joined together. The United States Government, when it built the Panama canal only two years ago, passed a law that no railroad company would be allowed to carry on the business of steamship transportation through the Panama canal. The American people claimed that a line of steamers through the canal should be controlled by the United States Government. Thus we are going along the lines suggested by the Americans. Many of those ships that are now being built—the thousand ships that the hon. member has mentioned—are for this very trade. Are we going to be behind the Americans? Is it not necessary for us to carry on our business in the same way as they are doing? I repeat that the Government are amply justified in this course, and if we are to have a great railway system such as we have, we must have its complement in the ships, and I think the time of this House has perhaps been well spent in showing up the absolute ignorance of hon. gentlemen opposite of the business of shipbuilding in this country.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the hon. member tell us what kind of boats the Minister of Marine is building? It is news to us that the minister has a large number of ships under construction, and I feel interested. Are they steel or wooden ships?

Mr. CURRIE: I understand that the Minister of Marine will have his own estimates under consideration and then the House can get full information.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see why the hon. member should not give us all the information we want on any subject whatever.

Mr. CURRIE: He is building both wood and iron ships, so far as I can ascertain.

Mr. SINCLAIR: But the hon. member told us a minute ago that we could not build any steel ships.

Mr. CURRIE: The contracts were let before the rush period. You cannot have your cake and eat it.

To provide amount required to be paid for the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway, the Quebec and Saguenay railway and the Lotbinière and Megantic railway, and for the equipment, appurtenances and properties used in connection with such railways, to be acquired under the authority of a statute passed at the last session; and to provide for the cost of completing, equipping and operating the said railways—the operating expenses to be chargeable to revenue—revote, $3,667,745.07.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister explain how this amount of $3,667,745.07 is arrived at? It puzzles me to know how the minister could get it down right to the 7 cents. The amount is to be determined by the judge of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. COCHRANE: Four million dollars was put in last year and the difference between this amount and $4,000,000 was spent last year on construction.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to know how the minister came to arrive at $4,000,000. Under the statute, the amount to be paid was left to be settled by the Exchequer Court, and it was provided that the judge must be guided by the actual value based on the cost, deducting the amount of subsidies. In reading over the judgment of the judge of the Exchequer Court, I find that he leaves the amount very indefinite. In respect to one road, the Quebec and Montmorency, the claim being made that the value was some $2,000,000, I find it stated that the representative of my hon. friend, who would be the counsel for the Crown, stated that he was perfectly willing that this two million odd dollars should be taken as the cost of the road. The judge, however, says that he cannot accept that view. He says that it strikes him as utterly absurd that a road like that could have cost in the vicinity of $90,000 per mile, which this $2,000,000 would represent. He declines to accept that view, and concludes that a large portion of the alleged $2,000,000 never went into the road, that the road never cost anything like that money, and that hundreds and thousands of dollars which it was claimed had gone into the road in the opinion of the judge, had not gone into it. The judge leaves that and a number of other questions entirely unsettled and suggests that there should be an appeal, if anybody thinks he is wronged, to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to set him right if he is wrong. How did the minister come to put in the $4,000,000 last year?

Mr. REID: That was all explained last year at the time the Bill went through.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difficulty is that in these times the people are apt to forget the explanation. I notice a determined effort on the part of the Government now in its legislation to try to induce the people to forget all these things—to forget the Quebec and Saguenay, to forget the Canadian Northern railway, to forget a great many of the evil matters which this Government has perpetrated upon the people of this country; and it is well that their memory should be refreshed in reference to this Quebec and Saguenay deal. I do not think it out of place to ask how the minister arrived at $4,000,000. The Minister of Customs has such an imagination that I am rather afraid to let him explain.

Mr. COCHRANE: He put it through last year and explained it then.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If he will really keep down to facts and not draw too much on his imagination—

Mr. REID: I put this matter through the House last year, as the minister was ill and I was acting for him. At that time I gave a statement showing the estimated cost of the three different railways, first the Quebec and Montmorency, on which it was stated there were two and one-half million bonds, then the Megantic and Lotbinière, which I think it was stated, cost $332,000—I am trusting to my memory, in regard to these figures. I have not the figures of the Quebec and Saguenay, but there was a very large amount spent on that road, and bonds were issued to a large amount; I cannot recall the figures. But this company stated that they were willing to take, I think fifty cents on the dollar for the amount invested. At all events the whole three amounts were added together, and it was estimated the amount would be about $4,000,000, and in addition there were the $2,500,000 of bonds. It was provided that if it found that the Quebec and Montmorency did not cost the amount stated, the difference was to be taken out of the purchase price; and if the Megantic and Lotbiniere road, or the Quebec and Saguenay, did not cost the amount stated, the amounts to be allowed would be reduced accordingly. The whole matter was left entirely to the judge of the Exchequer Court. It has been before the judge, and on his judgment the Government must settle this matter. The judge, as I understand it has not come to a final decision; that is, the parties do not agree that his judgment is sufficient.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has there been an appeal by either side?

Mr. REID: No, but the matter is still before the judge. In the meantime, after this Bill had been passed, the Government started to finish the construction, and it was necessary to do so, because the work already done was fast deteriorating. The valuation, of course, as explained last year, was on the basis of what it was before the work was stopped, and any deterioration and any subsidies were to be deducted. The work was started. Contractors were put to work to complete the road, and three hundred and some odd thousand dollars have already been expended in building bridges and making grades and getting the road ready for the laying of rails. I understand that if the rails could be procured they would have that road in operation to Murray Bay this fall, but the difficulty has been to get new rails. That is the position, and all we are asking now is to have the matter in the Exchequer Court, where it now is, and leave the vote as it is, so that after the judge of the Exchequer Court gives his decision we may be in a position, with the amount voted last year and now revoted, to settle the transaction. If they do not come to any conclusion, the matter remains as it was, with this exception, that the road will be completed and in operation. Until the judge gives that decision, and the owners give the title, of course no payments can be made on the capital of the road. But the Government can use the small portion of this road, and put it in operation and let the public have the advantage of it, pending the final decision.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very glad of the explanation given just now by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. It shows that if the Government were to abandon part of this scheme and confine its efforts to completing the latter portion, it would be the best thing for Canada and the taxpayers. Last year the Department of Railways and Canals decided to purchase three different railways. First the Lotbinière and Megantic on the south shore, the Quebec and Montmorency, running from Quebec to St. Joachim, and the Quebec and Saguenay, running from the terminus of the Quebec and Montmorency to Nairn's Falls. Out of this third section about nine miles have been constructed at the tail-end of the line, from Murray Bay to Nairn's Falls. Parliament last year decided, at the same time, that the value of the three railways should be fixed by the Exchequer Court. The section of the statute, chapter 22 of 67 George V, reads:

> The consideration to be paid for each of the said railways and for any equipment appurtenances and properties that may be acquired as aforesaid, shall be the value thereof as determined by the Exchequer Court of Canada; said value to be the actual cost of said railways less subsidies and less depreciation, but not to exceed $4,349,000, exclusive of outstanding bonded indebtedness, which is to be assumed by the Government, but not to exceed in all $2,500,000.

Subsequently the Government put in the supplementary estimates of last year the sum of $4,000,000. The item reads:

> To provide amount required to be paid for the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway, the Quebec and Saguenay Railway and the Lotbinière and Megantic Railway, and for the equipment, appurtenances and properties used in connection with such railways, to be acquired under the authority of a statute passed at the present session; and to provide for the cost of completing, equipping and operating the said railway—the operating expenses to be chargeable to revenue—revote, $4,000,000.

This year the item reads as it did last year. But I must remind my hon. friend and the Minister of Railways and Canals that this item cannot be spent unless it is spent by virtue of the statute passed last year. I do not see how the Department of Railways and Canals could spend any sum out of that vote without the Exchequer Court having passed on and fixed the value. However, after Parliament was prorogued, the matter was referred to the Exchequer Court. The railway companies and the department were represented. The department meanwhile made an agreement which was signed by the parties, embodying the statute—the will of Parliament.

The question came up before the Exchequer Court. As I stated a moment ago, the companies were represented by very able counsel, and so was the Department of Railways and Canals. The railway companies filed a claim on which they did their best to make a case which would give them the right to obtain these amounts:

For the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix	$2,942,397.58
For the Lotbinière and Megantic	349,208.85
For the Quebec and Saguenay	5,543,867.32

But they were limited by the statute which had been passed a few months before by this Parliament. The maximum price agreed by Parliament to be paid was $4,349,000 plus the assuming by the Government of debentures of the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway amounting to $2,500,000, making a total of $6,849,000 as against $8,834,867.32 as claimed by the railway companies. I am pleased to say that the case came before Sir Walter Cassels who gave his attention to it, and throughout the many sittings of the Exchequer Court, as evidenced by the bulky documents which I have perused, Sir Walter Cassels protected the interests of the department and of the Dominion to a remarkable degree. Nobody need be surprised at that; he did his plain duty, but I am glad to pay him this compliment that he was the faithful protector of Canada in that case. What happened? It would take too long to go through the voluminous evidence which was unravelled before Sir Walter Cassels, but in the case of the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway, he deducted first $500,000 for one item and then $794,869.58 for another, making a total of $1,294,869.58.

10 p.m.

Mr. NESBITT: What were those items for?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will give that information in a moment. Those two items had been admitted by the counsel of the Government, but notwithstanding that admission, Sir Walter Cassels said: No, I will not accept them; the company is not entitled to those two items; and I will put them aside. The $500,000 was supposed to have gone into the construction of the railway, but according to the evidence, the judge found that amount had not gone into construction. The other item of $794,869.58 was floating liabilities. Let me read the reference by Sir Walter Cassels to the admission of the counsel. He says:

Now it is admitted that these two items of $500,000 referred to in schedule "A" and also the item of $794,869.58 floating liabilities, comprise part of this item of $2,038,149.40. Crown counsel in their statement were of opinion that these two items of $500,000 and $794,869.58 should be taken as the cost up to that date, namely, July 1, 1898. I do not agree with that contention. I fail to see how it can be assumed without further proof that the proceeds of these interim bonds, namely $500,000, went into the construction of the railway. They may or they may not. That is a question of proof.

But the judge said there had been no proof of that amount having entered into the construction of the road. That is as regards the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway.

We come now to the Lotbinière, Megantic railway which was the subject of a claim on the part of the railway company for $349,208.85. The evidence which I read did not satisfy Sir Walter Cassels, who said: Only one witness, a Mr. Robbins, was heard. He claims that that road cost $11,000 per mile; this is only a surmise; there is no positive evidence, and his evidence in any case is too airy; I cannot accept it until further evidence is given, and therefore, I put aside the amount claimed for the Lotbinière and Megantic.

Then he comes to the Quebec and Saguenay. The company claimed $5,543,867.32. Sir Walter Cassels puts aside, first, the discount on two flotations of bonds, amounting to $863,000; second, the fees for the listing of bonds, amounting to $63,465.09; third, interest on the bond issue, $1,012,950. So that for that third railway Sir Walter Cassels deducted from the claim made by the company $1,939,415.09. Sir Walter Cassels, after giving his reasons for his judgment, says that he anticipates an appeal from his judgment by the railway companies. The other day I stated to the committee that an appeal had been lodged, but I have since ascertained that I was mistaken; an appeal had been lodged by the same people in another case. Unless the company appeal from that judgment it will hold good, and the Minister of Railways cannot come to any settlement with the company unless he accepts the reductions made by Sir Walter Cassels, amounting, for the three railways, to $2,751,985. The counsel for the department recommended the payment of that large amount, but were met by the deductions of Judge Cassels. Last year the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), when this question came up before the House, used very strong language.

Mr. REID: With reference to the two items that the hon. gentleman says counsel agreed to accept; what were they for?

Mr. LEMIEUX: They were the item for $500,000, which was supposed to have been used towards the construction of the Quebec and Montmorency, and the other big item in connection with the floating liabilities. The judge rejected these.

Mr. REID: Was there any detail in respect of the floating liabilities?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Let me read again this paragraph from the judgment:

Now it is admitted that these two items of $500,000 referred to in schedule "A" and also the item of $794,869.58, floating liabilities, comprise part of this item of $2,038,149.40. Crown counsel in their statement were of opinion that these two items of $500,000 and $794,869.58 should be taken as the cost up to that date, namely, July 1, 1898. I do not agree with that contention. I fail to see how it can be assumed without further proof that the proceeds of these interim bonds, namely, $500,000, went into the construction of the railway. They may or may not. That is a question of proof. The bonds were held by the various parties shown on page 15 of schedule "A"; they were held as collateral security by the various parties. What the nature of the debts due to these various parties is I would have thought susceptible of proof—at all events, before such an item can be allowed further inquiry will be necessary, and so with regard to the liabilities. Unquestionably a considerable portion of them never went into the railway. Colonel Wurtele states as follows:

Colonel Wurtele was one of the witnesses as to cost of construction.

"Q. A lot of these items on their face do not appear to be items that went into the construction of the road, how is that? A. They may have gone into the operation of the road, we were operating the railway."

It would be impossible to accept Colonel Wurtele's evidence as proving the fact that these two particular items went into the construction of the railway. Other evidence would be required before I would be willing to accept those two sums of $500,000 and $794,869.50 as having been expended in the construction of this 21 miles of railway.

Further, he draws attention to the evidence given by Colonel Wurtele as to the cost of the railway. Colonel Wurtele said that it cost $92,000 a mile. It is proved by documents filed in the case that the cost of construction of a little extension of that railway a few years later, built with about the same material, when the cost of construction was higher, did not amount to more than $14,000 or $15,000 a mile.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is talking about the Quebec and Montmorency railway now?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. The judge makes these remarks about the striking evidence of Colonel Wurtele as to the cost of construction:

I may call the attention of counsel to the fact that in the trust deed, schedule "D," at page 19, there is the estimate of cost of constructing certain extensions. The total is 11 miles—and the total estimate is $149,947, which would be under $14,000 a mile—and while of course the main railway previously built may not have been built at that low figure, the contrast between the two figures, namely, $92,500 a mile and the $14,000 a mile, is striking.

And it is striking, indeed. Proceeding with the Quebec and Saguenay, the judge says:

To my mind to allow these charges for obtaining money—because they charged a large amount of money for the issue of bonds and for the borrowing of money——and the interest for a period of years might make the matter almost farcical. The railway might have laid dormant for a period of another twenty years. Meanwhile the interest on the bonds would have to be paid amounting to two or three million dollars, all of which, assuming the company paid the interest, would be charged up in their books to the shareholders, and if the argument put forward is correct in that case, the Crown when paying what is defined by the statute to be the actual cost of the railways, would be paying some three million dollars odd for interest, for which no value is given in return.

and the judge very naturally says, in concluding his reasons for the judgment:

It will be easy when the case is concluded, to arrive at the amount which, in my judgment, ought to be allowed. There will have to be deducted the allowance for depreciation, which has been settled. There will also have to be deducted the amounts received from the Dominion and provincial subsidies. These sums are not in dispute. There will also have to be deducted these items that I have just been referring to in connection with the Saguenay railway, and any amounts that should be deducted from the Montmorency and Charlevoix railway and the Megantic railway on a proper valuation being proved.

Mr. TAYLOR: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question with reference to the sum for interest of which he has just been speaking? Was that sum based upon money borrowed during the construction period of the railway?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No. In the first place, the railway has not been constructed.

Mr. TAYLOR: There is some construction.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I spend the summer at Murray Bay, and I know whereof I speak.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

The railway has not been constructed. There are no rails, there are no ties—nothing except the roadbed partly finished. Some years ago the company was exploiting another company, known as the Nairn Falls Pulp Company, at Nairn Falls. In order to exploit the pulp proposition to advantage, it built the terminus of the railway, starting from Murray Bay wharf to Nairn Falls, about seven miles. No passengers are carried. The road was only built to transport pulp from the mills of the Nairn Falls Pulp Company to Murray Bay wharf.

Mr. SEVIGNY: The Eastern Canada Pulp Company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Eastern Canada Pulp Company. It is an outside enterprise altogether, and has nothing to do with the railway. Nothing has been constructed.

Mr. CARVELL: What about the road from Nairn Falls westward? How much of the link has not been constructed?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There are no rails, and no ties.

Mr. REID: If my hon. friend would put it fairly, I think he would say the roadbed has been constructed, and is practically ready for laying the rails. In other words, if they had the rails ready to lay it would probably only take a month or two until they could be running trains right through to Murray Bay.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In all sincerity, I must say my hon. friend is entirely at sea. The Minister of Railways and Canals will tell him that this year, in order to maintain what little work had been done on the roadbed, he has been obliged to take, illegally in my judgment, $400,000 from the amount voted last year. He will remember that that amount was voted with a qualification.

Mr. NESBITT: Three hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend stated the other day that it was a revote from last year. The vote last year was for $4,000,000, and the difference between the two votes was spent on construction last year. They were trying to protect the road and putting in stone to prevent the current from washing out the ballast. Formerly a quantity of timber and other material was put in the sides for that purpose. The Minister of Inland Revenue and the Secretary of State visited the district last year and went over the road. They can tell us that there is practically no work done. True, there is a little roadbed, but it has been partially destroyed. The Minister of Railways took this amount of money out of the vote of $4,000,000 last year to do some cement work to protect what little had been done. In my judgment, he took this amount illegally. I was just going to say to my hon. friend that the Government has decided to buy that property, whatever there is to be purchased, and to construct the road——

Mr. SEVIGNY: I think the roadbed is practically complete between St. Joachim and Murray Bay, and if my information is correct over two million dollars was spent by the Quebec and Saguenay between those two points.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I may tell my hon. friend that the so-called roadbed was built at a small cost. The company had no money, and in order to get money they issued bonds, and they had to pay twice the amount in order to satisfy Mr. O'Brien, the contractor. It never cost $2,000,0000. Whatever was done had to be protected this year by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and I call his attention to the fact that he took that money out of the vote of last year, and in my judgment he could not spend one red cent out of that vote because it was conditional. The item in the appropriation made last year read as follows:

To provide amount required to be paid for the Quebec, Montmorency, and Charlevoix Railway, the Quebec and Saguenay Railway, and the Lotbiniere and Megantic Railway, and for the equipment, appurtenances and property used in connection with such railways, to be acquired under the authority of a statute passed at the present session, and to provide for the cost of completing, equipping, and operating the said railways, the operating expenses to be chargeable to revenue.

The statute enacts that the Exchequer Court shall fix the value, and the railways, of course could not be acquired until the Exchequer Court had passed on the actual cost. Therefore, any money spent by my hon. friend was illegally spent. I suppose he meant well when he did it, but nevertheless it was illegal. When this question came up last year, my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) used the following language, which applies this year as it applied last year.

But this I do want to say: in a time when the Empire is at war, when every dollar that Canada can raise is required for the legitimate purposes of the war—and as to this I have been deeply impressed by the speeches that the Minister of Finance has delivered in this House and elsewhere—I cannot bring myself to add anything to the burdens of the people of this country. If these were ordinary times I might not feel so strongly on the question, but being influenced by the judgment of the Minister of Finance—and I have great respect for his judgment—and realizing that a commission is about to be appointed to consider the whole railway problem in Canada. I cannot see my way clear to voting for the continuance of this amount in the Estimates.

The conditions to-day are the same as they were last year. We are at war spending large amounts to maintain our status at the front. We are taxed right and left. We are piling up a public debt which is simply appalling. We are borrowing at usurious rates of interest in the foreign markets, and this is no time to spend lavishly on a scheme which is simply nauseating. Every one who knows the origin of this scheme knows that it is nauseating. But, we discussed this matter last year when it came before the House.

I want to make a proposition to the Minister of Railways, and I think it is a fair one. The Lotbiniere and Megantic is a little bit of a road on the south shore of the river St. Lawrence in the counties of Megantic and Lotbiniere. It is a lumbering road. It has no relation whatsoever with the Quebec and Montmorency. It is several miles on the other side of the river and making towards Sherbrooke. It was intended to reach the United States boundary originally.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who owned the road when the Government bought it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It belonged to the same group of gentlemen. They launched an immense scheme on the European market. They advertised that scheme as being a semi-transcontinental railway. The road was to start at the United States boundary, cross the river St. Lawrence by the Quebec bridge, link up with the Quebec and Montmorency, which was a tramway originally designed to carry pilgrims to and from St. Anne's, and the Quebec and Saguenay railway, which, first of all, was to run to Nairn Falls, and which, it was afterwards announced, was to go as far as Cape Charles on the Labrador coast. That is how it was advertised in the very alluring prospectuses which were issued, and which captured the money of the innocent French investors on the other side of the Atlantic. But the Lotbiniere and Megantic had nothing to do with the Quebec and Montmorency and the Quebec and Saguenay. Let my hon. friend do away with that bit of railway. It is merely a lumbering road.

The people have never petitioned the Government to make it a government-owned railway. Then the Quebec and Montmorency is a paying proposition. It gives a good net income to the Quebec and Montmorency people. It is a system by itself The object of that road is to carry people from Quebec, and from different points in the province, to the famous shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupré. There is no reason why, at the present moment, the Government should acquire that road. Leave it to the Quebec and Montmorency Company. I admit that the people of Charlevoix are in need of transportation and that they are entitled, as are other parts of the country, to a railway, although the Government spend a large amount of money every year for the maintenance of a ferry across the St. Lawrence from River Ouelle to St. Irénée, Murray Bay, and Cap à l'Aigle, on the north shore, the ferry being operated in connection with the Intercolonial railway. This ferry is a credit to the department, and the train service, in the summer time especially when there are so many tourists, is excellent. I pay my compliments to the minister for that. If the Government will limit their acquisitive powers to the Quebec and Saguenay I have no objection, provided they follow the line of the judgment of Sir Walter Cassels and provided they press the sponge and squeeze out all the water that there is in that enterprise. The judgment is there. The policy is laid down by Sir Walter Cassels. He has heard the evidence and at one fell swoop he has discarded a very large amount from the claim which was made by the railway promoters. I believe I have explained to the committee exactly what the situation is. My hon. friend has spent $400,000 out of that vote of last year, but I contend he has done it illegally, because the amount voted last year was voted with a qualification, namely, that before acquiring the railway the department should get from the Exchequer Court its actual value. The judgment is not final, but we have from the judge an expression of opinion which reduces very materially the amount which is claimed by the company. The company has not appealed. The words used by Sir Walter Cassels are as follows:

> Since the conclusion of the hearing of these cases, I have carefully perused the evidence and exhibits produced before me, and I have also considered the questions to be determined. I think as the questions to be determined depend to such an extent upon the construction to be placed upon the statute as to the method by which the amounts payable are to be ascertained, and as the differences are so large between the method of valuation claimed by the railway companies, and the views I entertain, it may be better before any further evidence is taken, that an appeal, if such is proposed, (assuming the right of appeal exists) should be taken to the Supreme Court, in order that I may be set right, if I have taken an erroneous view.

No appeal has been lodged and I claim that not a cent can be spent until we have a final judgment in this matter.

Mr. REID: The Quebec and Montmorency road has been constructed for many years. The hon. member has stated that it is a paying road. It is a paying road, the railway returns show that. Were this transaction to go through, by the statements of the hon. member himself the Government would be acquiring a road that was a paying road, the Quebec and Montmorency. The Quebec and Saguenay road is practically completed except for the laying of the rails, and that road the hon. member has also said should be built as the people along the north shore are entitled to it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not stretch it too far.

Mr. REID: I am speaking of what the hon. member has said.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the department any report by any of its engineers as to the condition of the road? We would prefer a report from an engineer.

Mr. REID: I will come to that in a moment. The hon. member says that the amount spent last year on this road was spent illegally by the Minister of Railways. Let me say that on any payment by any department there is a double check. The Department of Justice must give a ruling that the moneys can be paid and the Auditor General must consent to their payment. Both the department and the Auditor General have passed this, so it has been done legally in the opinion of those two departments.

The policy of purchasing these roads was settled last year, and need not be discussed now. It was explained by the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) that the Government had protected itself in every way in respect to the purchase money being in accordance with the understanding, and it was left to the judge of the Exchequer court to fix the amount. The hon. member has laid great stress on the fact that the solicitor for the Government agreed to two amounts, one of $500,000 and the other of $789,000, and one would conclude from his remarks that in his opinion the solicitor who is acting for the Government either was doing that on account of his not having sufficient ability to give the necessary attention to the matter, or else that he had some motive in agreeing to those two amounts. The solicitor was Mr. Meredith, of Montreal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And Mr. Bernier, of Quebec.

Mr. REID: The admission was made by Mr. Meredith, the eminent counsel of Montreal, and he made it on his own responsibility and without any interference or suggestion from the Government. Mr. Meredith is one of the leading counsel in Montreal, and I do not think that the slightest reflection should be cast on him in connection with this or any other case. The Quebec and Montmorency is the road that has been built for many years and that is a good paying road.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then why do the owners not keep it if it is a paying concern?

Mr. REID: I will answer that point in a moment. This was protected by the judge of the Exchequer Court being directed to determine the value.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you help him to determine the value?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to say that whatever I said about counsel for the Government should not be taken as a reflection on Mr. Meredith or Mr. Alphonse Bernier. I simply quoted Mr. Justice Cassels. But the fact remains that the judge rejected two big items that they were ready to accept.

Mr. REID: There seems to be an insinuation that Mr. Meredith had some kind of hint or reason for deducting that amount.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I hope my hon. friend did not think I would be guilty of casting a reflection on Mr. Meredith.

Mr. REID: There were reasons for differences of opinion. I have not read any thing since the debate of last session. But, if I remember correctly, in that agreement or Bill of last year we inserted the provision that in purchasing each of these roads we would do so at the actual cost.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. REID: The word " actual " was put in, and there is a possibility that the judge of the Exchequer Court, in determining the value of the Quebec and Montmorency road, took into consideration the actual cost of the road when it was originally built. These items—I am only saying that this may be a possibility—may have been for construction since that time, and the judge could not allow them on account of the word "actual" having been put in the agreement.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman has not read the judgment.

Mr. REID: I admit I have not read it. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has said: " Why do not the owners want to keep this road?" So far as these gentlemen are concerned, they want to keep it. The hon. gentleman made the suggestion that if the Government would let the parties keep the Quebec and Montmorency, and the Megantic and Lotbiniere roads, he would not object to the Government taking over the Quebec and Saguenay.

Mr. MACDONALD: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. REID: I am speaking of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). The Minister of Railways and Canals made an arrangement with these owners to take over the Quebec and Saguenay roads, and if the Bill had been brought in as was intended this session, it would have provided only for the taking over of the Quebec and Saguenay, with running rights over the other roads. These owners were going to keep those two pieces of road, and they were only too willing to keep the Quebec and Montmorency. I have the feeling that the hon. gentleman knew exactly what these parties intended to ask for, and what had been arranged when he made that suggestion a few minutes ago. He knew that was going to be done, and he is willing to-night to agree that the part that he knew paid very well, which made $100,000 last year, and has paid every year, should be abandoned. If the Bill had been introduced as intended it would have eliminated from the agreement of last year these two roads, just as the hon. gentleman suggested, and running rights would have been obtained over these roads that he knew paid so well. That would have been carrying, out exactly the hon. gentleman's suggestion. So far as the judgment of the judge of the Exchequer Court goes, the Minister of Railways has stated that the Government will stand by that judgment, and nothing else; in fact, it cannot do otherwise. The hon. gentleman from Rouville is a lawyer of sufficient ability and standing to know that we cannot under the Act of last year take over the Quebec and Saguenay alone. This item is a revote for the purposes of that Act. So far as the condition of the road is concerned, the hon. gentleman had the report last year on that subject. If I remember rightly, about 80 per cent of the roadbed had been completed. The work of this year to put the road into proper shape and in running order was carried on under the supervision of Mr. Gordon Grant, Chief Engineer of the Transcontinental Railway. Every dollar of this three hundred and some odd thousand has been spent under the supervision of Mr. Grant, and he told me, I should think some two or three months ago, that the road bed was practically completed clear through to Murray Bay. There were a few bridges which had to be completed; they were under contract, and if we could get the rails we would have the trains running through to Murray Bay during the present season. But, being unable to get the rails, they could not possibly complete it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are you doing that to win the war?

Mr. REID: We are doing that right now. And I say to the hon. gentleman that if we had brought in a Bill to change the present condition, it would have been to eliminate the other two roads and to take the Quebec and Saguenay alone. And that I understand, would have been satisfactory to the hon. gentleman. No conditions can be changed until an Act of Parliament has been passed. Referring to the point raised as to the money being spent illegally, I say that the Minister of Railways and Canals did it on the advice of the Minister of Justice, and with the consent of the Auditor General; and it was done with the object of getting the road completed at the earliest possible moment, so that the people would have the benefit of it. The Government were protected in the matter, because they would not pay one dollar of the purchase money until the judge of the Exchequer Court had given his judgment, which, of course, would be final and to the satisfaction of the Justice Department and of this House.

Mr. MACDONALD: If I wanted to get an apologist for a rotten, miserable, weak case, that nobody could be found to defend, I would go to my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. It is true he has not been admitted to the bar, but I have seen him perform so often in this House, and in the committees of the House, within the last ten or fifteen years, that I really take off my hat to him as a member of the bar for ability in dodging, twisting, turning and scheming in the endeavour to put up a case when there was no case. He is an artist along those lines. I really do not think he has his proper place in the Administration. He would make a far better Minister of Justice than the gentleman who now occupies that position, because there are so many things that are laid to the door of this Government, things of which the country knows them to be guilty, and which none can defend with the same ease and grace as the hon. Minister of Customs. He would do far better than the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), with his laboured, prolonged and strained utterances that nobody ever cares to follow and that nobody ever understands when they do follow them. My hon. friend has told us, with his tortuous windings, that it is a good thing for this country to-day that the Government should take $3,667,745.07 out of the moneys that have been wrung from the people by direct taxation upon incomes and by various other methods that the Government have devised under the guise of winning the war and paying for war expenses, and hand it over to Rodolphe Forget for the purpose of enabling him to speculate in the stock of the Quebec and Saguenay. That is the true situation, no matter how the minister may sidestep or talk all around it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Sir Rodolphe Forget.

Mr. MACDONALD: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Titles are so numerous these days that one forgets to give these gentlemen who have acquired them the full name to which they are entitled.

Mr. CARVELL: The Government ought to tax them $10,000 apiece.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend from Carleton makes a good suggestion. We have found out that hon. gentlemen can get titles just the same as gentlemen can get titles in England, merely by buying them. That is one of the flatulent, silly, ridiculous things that hon. gentlemen opposite are perpetuating in this country for the purpose of patriotic performances under their Administration.

Mr. COCHRANE: Did Lord Shaughnessy buy his title?

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not know anything about Lord Shaughnessy. He is a good friend of the minister's. It was my hon. friend and his friends that interested themselves in making him a peer.

Mr. COCHRANE: I just wanted to know if you accused him of buying his title.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister knows whether he paid for it or not, and if he paid for it, the minister should tell us. There are some other gentlemen who have got titles under this Administration, and if the minister will give us the story of how they acquired them, I will sit down and let him tell us.

Mr. COCHRANE: I asked you a civil question. You made a statement, and I want you to back it up.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is one of the gentlemen who advise His Majesty as to the giving of titles, and he knows whether the gentleman paid for it or not. I do not know. If the minister knows whether he paid for it or not, he should tell us.

Mr. COCHRANE: You made an accusation, and I want you to back it up.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister knows whether I am right or not. The minister is not denying my statement; he is asking me a question about somebody about whom I know nothing.

Mr. COCHRANE: You made a broad statement; you said that they buy titles. I ask you if Lord Shaughnessy bought his.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the other people?

Mr. COCHRANE: I am only asking about one. You made a broad statement.

Mr. CARVELL: Are titles for sale?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend suggests that they are for sale. How much are they worth?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know. You made the statement. Be either a man or a mouse. Back up your statements.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Railways does not belong to the committee of council which has to do with the sale of titles. If he did, he would know all about the matter. Consequently he is asking me a question concerning which some of his colleagues, if he asked them, could tell him much more than I could.

Mr. COCHRANE: Do not make the statement if you cannot back it up.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was not referring to Lord Shaughnessy, who is well worthy of distinction. The minister knows to whom I refer.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What about honorary colonelcies?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend speaks about honorary colonelcies. So far as I am concerned, I was appointed an honorary colonel by the late administration on the recommendation of all the officers of the 78th Regiment of my county who passed a resolution requesting that I should be made one. I never asked for it, and I am not particular whether the hon. gentleman's Government who promoted me to be an honorary colonel take the whole thing away from me to-morrow. My hon. friend can ask the Minister of Militia to cancel my appointment. I shall have no regret.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dugald Stewart): Will the hon. member come back to the question under discussion?

Mr. MACDONALD: I will do so if my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) will refrain from asking me questions.

The CHAIRMAN: He has already been answered.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will you, Sir, restrain the minister and the hon. member from Annapolis?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Does the hon. member think that regiment would make such a recommendation now?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: If you, Sir, will keep the Minister of Railways and the hon. member from Annapolis in order, I will come back to the question under discussion. I have been diverted by these hon. gentlemen who have been asking me questions which I have been endeavouring to answer. Nobody knows better than the Minister of Customs that the reason for Canada acquiring those three railways in war time is so grotesque that you cannot state a more grotesque proposition at any time, let alone in war time. I can fancy that certain hon. gentlemen who support the minister, for instance the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny), would be willing to get the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix made a Government railway so that his confreres could go down to Ste. Anne de Beaupré and visit the shrine there and get cured.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It would be a very good thing for the hon. member to go down to Ste. Anne de Beaupré.

Mr. MACDONALD: I happen to worship at a Presbyterian shrine and not at the shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupré.

Mr. REID: Does the hon. member belong to my church?

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not know how some of my hon. friend's confreres from Quebec who are so terribly anti-French these days—

Mr. SEVIGNY: I do not think they are worse than the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister does not know my mentality.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I know it.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister knows that my ancestors and all my people and myself have been associates of the French race for three or four generations and we have no antipathy against them. He has associates behind him and men who support him, men who, I am surprised, would support a proposition that the Government of Canada should own and operate a railway for the purpose of carrying people to the shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupré. That is the only part of the railway which the Minister of Customs undertook to defend as being a commercial proposition. He said that part of the railway paid.

Mr. REID: It was the hon. member for Rouville who said that.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend defended that proposition. He did not say anything about the Lotbinière and Megantic or the Quebec and Saguenay. What I say is this: This whole proposition is a disgraceful perversion of public money in war time for the purpose of satisfying a political supporter from the province of Quebec. When you are taxing the people by the various methods adopted by this Government, when the Minister of Finance is speaking about economy, to divert this money for this purpose is absolutely defenceless.

11 p.m.

Mr. NICKLE: Last year when this question was before the House, I differed from my confreres on this side of the House as to the wisdom of the vote. The few remarks that I am now about to offer, let me assure the committee, shall not deal with my ancestors, nor the antagonism of any hon. member from Ontario to the province of Quebec. This is purely a business proposition, and surely it is possible to approach it as such without endeavouring to stir up either political or religious animosities. I think I know those parts of the country in which those railways are situated fairly well, and I know something about their history. I can appreciate the desire that the people have that they should have railway communication like people in the other parts of the country more favourably situated. I am not altogether blind to the fact that since the French settled on the northern bank of the St. Lawrence the winters have always been found tiresomely long, and the people have been more or less driven into isolation. If we were not at war, although the expenditure might be extravagant, I think I would be prepared to vote for the purchasing of those railways in the hope that they might give those people more adequate railway facilities. But, unfortunately, the country is at war, and our national resources are being taxed to their utmost, and, in my judgment ,the financial resources of this country are going to be taxed more in the future than they have been in the past.

Only a year or two ago Lloyd George said that this war would be won as much by the "silver bullet" as by any other means. If that was true two years ago, it is obvious to us and to the world at large that it is equally true to-day. Putting that idea into commonplace expression, it simply means that that nation is likely to win the war which can stand the financial strain the longest and make the best resistance to the inroads on its financial standing. What is the standing of this country to-day? We started out borrowing $100,000,000 and $150,000,000. as the case might be, at a rate in the neighbourhood of 5½ per cent. The next loan did not sell quite so well. Lately we borrowed a few millions in New York at a cost of 6 or 7 per cent. If we are to believe what we see in the papers to-day—I speak only from that information—the next loan of $100,000,000 will likely cost us 6 per cent. In other words, money is getting dearer; it is getting harder to get the money that is necessary to carry on the war. No one who has watched the situation can be blind to the fact that England's financial resources are being strained, and that we in Canada are being called upon to bear part of the burden that England would otherwise bear. Under these circumstances we are asked to spend $4,000,000 in the purchase of what I consider to be unnecessary railways at this time. When last year I saw the confusion that arose in the arbitration before Mr. Justice Cassels, I rather hoped that we had heard the last of this railway problem. The arbitration terms, as set out in chapter 22 of 6 and 7 George V, lay this down:

> Said value to be the actual cost of said railways, less subsidies and less depreciation.

When that Act was introduced into the House last year I thought that the dice were pretty well loaded against the country. The cost was to be the amount that it had cost the railway companies to construct, regardless of whether or not consideration had been given to economy. This country was to pay for these three railroads the amount of money that had been put into their construction, less depreciation and less subsidies. I certainly thought that the owners of the railroad would grasp with avidity what was offered to them, but I was amazed, when I read the proceedings before the arbitrator, to learn that the solicitors for the owners set up that they were entitled to interest on the moneys invested, not only during the time of construction, but also during all the time that the railway had lain idle—because it had never been carried to completion. That seems to me to be an extraordinary contention, but I thought, as they had set it up, that probably we had heard the last of the question. However, here we are to-night confronted with another vote. We are asked to vote $4,000,000 of the people's money to buy what I consider at the present time to be three unnecessary railroads. If some hon. gentleman opposite moves that this item be struck out, I shall, as I did a year ago, support the motion for the elimination of the item. I quite realize, after six years of parliamentary experience, that when an item of this kind is inserted in the estimates it is not very likely to be deleted. The Government put it there, and a majority of their followers will keep it there. But I direct the attention of the committee to this fact: I believe the time is coming—it may not be as far off as some of us think—when this nation may become war-weary. The people may become a bit weary of making sacrifices for this war, and if they do, it is purchases of this kind that will have helped to make them war-weary. If I judge aright the spirit of the Canadian people to-day, it is this: we are willing to sacrifice to the limit, but we want our Government to practice the same thrift, the same economy, that they ask us to practice. If the Government will give the example, I believe the people will follow; but it is the duty of the Government to give the example if they want the people to follow.

Mr. NESBITT: Last year when this vote of $4,000,000 was up, I took the liberty of moving that it be struck out. I thought it a great pity to use the people's money during the war to buy these three little railways, the purchases of which, to my mind, could not possibly be of any benefit to the people. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) says that the vote is being taken in order to purchase these railways for the relief of Sir Rodolphe Forget. I do not know whether or not that is true; I am not going to say that it is. But I do say just what the member for Kingston said: the nation that can stand out the longest will probably win this war. We have to do our share, and so far as I know, every man and woman in the country is willing to do his or her share towards the payment of the legitimate expenses of the country. But the Government should set the example. They lecture us—quite properly on the saving of food, and on the exercise of economy; but they do not set the example themselves. Last night we passed some votes that should not have been passed. To-night the Government ask us to pass this ridiculous vote of nearly $4,000,000. I agree with the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) that the money that was spent this year on this road should not have been spent. The Minister of Customs may be right in saying that legally the Government was within its rights in spending the money, but morally they had no right to do so until the Exchequer Court's judgment had been received and the road had been taken over. They had no right to spend any money on the road until they owned it, and certainly they do not own it yet, because the judgment of the Exchequer Court has not been accepted by the present owners. From a business standpoint, therefore, the Government should not have spent one dollar on that road, whether they were legally entitled to do so or not. However, they have spent the money. I have the greatest possible regard for the Minister of Railways, and I am surprised—because I have faith in his business judgment—that he should have been induced to spend money on this road before it was properly taken over. The fact that the company have not accepted the judgment of the Exchequer Court gives the Government a good excuse for not going any further and I think we should make that a reason for not voting money to-night for the purchase of this railway. We cannot afford to make any unnecessary expenditures.

As representatives of the people we should set an example to them of economy, but we are not doing that by any means in the votes that we are putting through. I hope the minister will apply his business sense and his good judgment to this matter and that he will agree not to press this vote. I move that the item be struck out.

Mr. PROULX: How much more does the Government intend to pay than the amount fixed by the Exchequer Court?

Mr. REID: The intention of the Government is to take only the Quebec and Saguenay road. There is no intention of taking the other two.

Mr. McKENZIE: How can the minister say that, with the statute of last year confronting him?

Mr. REID: The intention of the Bill passed last year was to take over the three roads. The judge of Exchequer Court, however, has refused to accept two items of $500,000 and $700,000 odd, claimed in respect of the Quebec and Montmorency. That is the road which is completed. But the owners of the road do not want to accept the judgment.

Mr. McKENZIE: This will go through, or it will all fall through.

Mr. REID: We would not go on only on the understanding that we would take the Quebec and Saguenay alone. The reason why the amount has been fixed, as I understand it, as to the value of the Quebec and Saguenay—I think the hon. member stated the judgment of the Exchequer Court was that the Quebec and Saguenay was valued at a certain amount.

Mr. McKENZIE: It did not fix anything.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The judgment deducted large amounts, but did not fix any value.

Mr. REID: As I understand it, if we wanted to take the Quebec and Saguenay alone, we could not do it under that Act, because the Bill provided for the taking of the three, and the Government will not take the three, but only the Quebec and Saguenay.

Mr. NESBITT: What authority have they for that?

Mr. REID: We are leaving it in the same position; we are leaving it to the new Parliament to decide. We cannot take any action under this Act because it provides for acquiring the three roads.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then, this item should not be before the Committee.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. REID: Yes, it should, and I will tell you why. When this Act was passed, there was an agreement made to take it over in accordance with the Act. Then the Government went on to complete the road and get it ready for operation, and $332,000 has been expended on it. I do not think there is any other way that it can be done except to leave the amount as it is.

Mr. CARVELL: I think the statement of the minister brings this matter up in such a way that I could not allow it to go by unchallenged, although up to the present time I had not intended speaking upon it. I was not in the House to any extent last year when this matter went through, as I was engaged elsewhere, and I have never given the matter any personal consideration. I have always made it a point not to discuss questions of this kind unless I have had an opportunity of studying them pretty carefully. During the last half hour I have gone over the statute, and over the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels, and I do not see how in the world the minister can pretend to take over one portion of the railway, and not take them all.

Mr. REID: That is what I said, I think.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, surely the item should be dropped. Let me point out the statute under which the minister is acting. I will not go into the reasons which actuated the Government. I do not believe sufficient reasons were given for the passing of the statute. Although I was not here, I have a general knowledge of what was going on, and it certainly is something that does not reflect credit upon the business judgment of the Government, and I know it does not appeal to the business judgment of the Minister of Railways. I am like my friend beside me (Mr. Lemieux)—and I am not saying this to throw bouquets at the Minister of Railways—but I do consider he is a good, straight business man.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: And I know he must abhor any such conduct as has been carried on. However, we have to take the matter as it is. The statute provides:

1. The Governor in Council may authorize and empower the Minister of Railways and Canals to acquire, under the provisions of an Act to amend the Government Railways Act, and to authorize the purchase of certain railways, chapter 16 of the Statutes of 1915, and upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, the railways described in the schedule hereto, together with such equipment, appurtenances, and properties used in connection with such railways as the Governor in Council may deem necessary for the operation thereof.

Not to buy one railway, but to buy all the railways mentioned in the schedule, which provides for the purchase of the three lines. Section 2 says:

2. The consideration to be paid for each of the said railways, and for any equipment, appurtenances and properties that may be acquired as aforesaid, shall be the value thereof as determined by the Exchequer Court of Canada; said value to be the actual cost of said railways, less subsidies and less depreciation, but not to exceed four million three hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars, exclusive of outstanding bonded indebtedness, which is to be assumed by the Government, but not to exceed in all two million five hundred thousand dollars.

They were treated there as one entity, and I see from the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels that there was an agreement prior to that by which these three railways were brought under one railway company, and we know that to be true. I think that company was called the Quebec Railway Company. The stock was listed upon the market.

Mr. REID: It is the Quebec Light, Heat and Power Company.

Mr. CARVELL: It is referred to in the newspapers and on the stock market as the Quebec railway. We know the stock was selling as low as 10, or 11, or 12, or 13, and the moment this legislation was passed it commenced to soar, and went up to 40 or 45, I think.

Mr. REID: I do not think it ever went as high as that.

Mr. CARVELL: It went up somewhere in the thirties, in any event. After the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels, it started to come down again. Considering the financial condition as pointed out so forcibly by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), it seems to me, before we pass this item we ought to have a pretty thorough discussion of the facts as they are. Notwithstanding the very late hour, I am going to take the responsibility of placing on Hansard a portion of the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels. I admit that I did not read it myself until this evening, and I doubt very much if many of the members of the House have read it. It does not require a lawyer to appreciate this judgment. A perusal of it must lead an ordinary man to the conclusion that the Government is not justified in forcing this thing through unless they are going to start out on an entirely new proposition—disregard the legislation of 1916; disregard the investigation which has been made into the cost of the road; disregard the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels; disregard everything they have done, and say: In the face of all these things we are going to come to the rescue of our political friend, Sir Rodolphe Forget, and are going to give him three or four million dollars simply as a present. I appreciate the necessity of railway communication on the north shore of the St. Lawrence just as well as any member in this House does, and I agree with my hon. friend from Kingston that were it under conditions other than those existing at the present time it might be considered. We must remember that after this Act was passed by which the railway was to be paid for according to the actual cost as found by the Exchequer Court, a long and expensive investigation was held, at which a large amount of evidence was taken. I have not read the evidence, but it is referred to in the judgment. Upon that evidence, Mr. Justice Cassels delivered a judgment on January 24 last. If the committee will pardon me I will read a portion of this judgment, in order that it may appear in Hansard, because I think the people of Canada should have an opportunity of reading it for themselves and forming their own conclusions as to whether or not this Government is justified in the course they are attempting to pursue. The judgment says:

Since the conclusion of the hearing of these cases, I have carefully perused the evidence and exhibits produced before me, and have also considered the questions to be determined. I think as the questions to be determined depend to such an extent upon the construction to be placed upon the statute as to the method by which the amounts payable are to be ascertained, and as the differences are so large between the method of valuation claimed by the railway companies and the views I entertain, it may be better before any further evidence is taken, that an appeal, if such is proposed (assuming the right of appeal exists), should be taken to the Supreme Court, in order that I may be set right, if I have taken an erroneous view.

I may say that I have given the matter a great deal of thought, and I must express my thanks to the counsel for all parties for the great assistance they have afforded me. The statute pursuant to which the matters come before the Exchequer Court of Canada, is Cap. 22, 6-7 Geo. V, assented to on the 18th May, 1916. This statute provides that the Governor in Council may authorize and empower the Minister of Railways and Canals to acquire upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, the railways described in the schedule hereto, together with such equipment, appurtenances and properties used in connection with such railways, as the Governor in Council may deem necessary for the operation thereof.

There are three railways mentioned in the schedule:

(a) The line of railway commonly known as the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway, extending from St. Paul street in the city of Quebec to St. Joachim a distance of about 43½ miles;

(b) The Quebec and Saguenay railway, extending from its junction with the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway at St. Joachim in the county of Montmorency to Nairn Falls, in the county of Charlevoix a distance of about 62 8/10 miles; and

(c) The Lotbiniere and Megantic railway, extending from Lyster in the county of Megantic to St. Jean des Chaillons in the county of Lotbiniere, a distance of about thirty miles.

The second section provides as follows:

"The consideration to be paid for each of the said railways and for any equipment, appurtenances and properties that may be acquired as aforesaid shall be the value thereof as determined by the Exchequer Court of Canada; said value to be the actual cost of said railways, less subsidies and less depreciation, but not to exceed four million, three hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars, exclusive of outstanding bonded indebtedness which is to be assumed by the Government, but not to exceed in all two million, five hundred thousand dollars."

It is agreed by counsel for the railways and for the Crown, that the maximum consideration of $4,349,000 and $2,500,000 is the maximum price to be paid for the three railways. Pursuant to the statute, an agreement was entered into between the Crown and the Saguenay company, the Quebec Railway, Light and Power company, the Lotbiniere and Megantic railway company, and the Quebec Railway, Light, Heat and Power Company. The different railways are referred to throughout the agreement, one as the "Saguenay Company"—two, "the Quebec Railway Company"—three, the "Megantic Railway Company" and, four, "The Quebec Power Company."

The railway referred to as (a) in the schedule to the statute, and commonly known as the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway, is what is referred to as "The Quebec Railway Company" in the agreement in question. The name was changed by statute.

You will see that these three separate railways were brought together by the agreement entered into between the respective companies. The agreement brought them all under one control and management and they were treated as one entity in the legislation passed a year ago. When the Government started out to purchase these railways they bought them as one whole and not as three portions. When the minister talks about separating them, saying that they are going to abandon two and purchase the third, I contend that they have no jurisdiction to do that. They may have jurisdiction under some other statute, under the statute of 1915, but they have no jurisdiction under the statute of 1916 to do that, because they only have the right to buy the three railways at a valuation to be fixed by a judge of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. MORPHY: I think the words of the statute were that the Government "may" buy the three. If that is so it covers them all and they may buy one.

Mr. CARVELL: The word "may" is the term which is practically always used in the statute and it means "shall".

Mr. MORPHY: Not always.

Mr. CARVELL: In the codification of the Railway Act, which we put through the House during the present session, we adhered to the word "may" in all cases and it was intended that the word "may" should mean "shall". I am going to go on a little further, for while this may be uninteresting I think it is of very great importance to the public:

The agreement requires a separate valuation for each of these three lines of railway. By the agreement the Crown assumes bonds of $2,500,000 secured by a trust mortgage. These bonds and the trust mortgage securing the same, in addition to being a charge on the Quebec railway, are also on other railways and properties not taken over by the Crown. By the terms of the agreement this bonded charge of $2,500,000, while it is assumed by the Crown, forms part of the purchase money payable by the Crown under the statute. If the value placed by the court on the Quebec Railway Company, known as the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway, exceeds the $2,500,000 only the excess over the $2,500,000 and the value so found is to be paid by the Crown, the $2,500,000 being treated practically as a payment on account. If on the other hand the value placed upon the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix railway is less than the $2,500,000 then the difference between the value as ascertained and the $2,500,000 is to be deducted from any sums that may be found due in respect of the other two railways.

The agreement refers to it in the following language:

"It is understood and agreed by and between all the parties hereto jointly and severally that in case the Exchequer Court of Canada fixes the value of the line of railway and other property set out in schedule C hereto at a sum less than $2,500,000, the difference between the sums so fixed and the sum of $2,500,000 shall be deducted from the aggregate amount of the purchase price to be paid for the lines of railway and other properties set out in schedule B and D hereto.

"The intention of this agreement being that in no event shall His Majesty be liable to pay for the said three lines of railway and other properties a greater amount than the value thereof as fixed by the Exchequer Court less the sum of $2,500,000 the amount of the bonds to be assumed by His Majesty as aforesaid."

That makes it very clear that the judge of the Exchequer Court was to fix the total value of the railways and in doing that he was to take from it the amount of $2,500,000 as represented by these bonds. There were other deductions to which I shall refer later on.

There are other provisions in the agreement in question which it is unnecessary for me to refer to at the present time. There are provisions protecting and guarding the Crown against any charges or encumbrances on the properties or any defect in regard to the titles to the right of way, etc.,—the intention of the agreement clearly being that His Majesty shall receive an absolute and clear title to all the properties in question.

On the opening of the case, I suggested that the duties of the Exchequer Court did not extend to an ascertainment of whether the various railways had good titles to the properties being transferred. These questions of title are questions provided for by the agreement, and it is a matter for the crown attorneys and counsel to be satisfied upon. This view was assented to by the counsel for the railway companies and for the Crown. The court assumes that the railways are deeding the various properties with good title thereto, and the valuation is based on that assumption.

The method of procedure was one of considerable moment. I came to the conclusion that the only practical way of arriving at a result would be to adopt the method adopted in the arbitration in which I acted as counsel for the C.P.R. company in regard to what was known as the Onderdonk sections of the railway in British Columbia. The same course of procedure used to be adopted in the administration of estates in Ontario. The counsel, both for the railways and for the Crown, asquiesced in my view as to the course of procedure to be adopted. I therefore directed the railway companies to file and furnish to the Crown accounts showing in detail what they claimed to be the amount to which they were entitled under the agreement in question. I also directed that upon counsel for the Crown being furnished with these accounts they should investigate them and such items as they were prepared to admit should be admitted and such items as they were not prepared to admit would then become the subject of inquiry, and evidence could be adduced in respect thereof. I also directed that the Crown counsel should furnish to the counsel for the railways a statement of the amount which the Crown claimed should be set off for depreciation in respect of each of the three railways. Pursuant to these directions the railway companies by their counsel filed and served a complete and detailed account of their claim.

Competent experts were employed by the Crown to make a minute examination of the three lines of railway, and to furnish in detail what they considered the proper amount to be deducted for depreciation. A large amount of time was occupied by these gentlemen in making this inquiry. Subsequently, the railway companies, by their counsel, accepted as correct the amounts as found by the experts for the Crown. The amounts of the depreciation to be offset against the value of the railways has therefore been settled. The figures I will deal with later.

From a cursory reading of this I do not think the actual figures of the deductions are referred to in the judgment. Of course, they may be found in the evidence, because it was admitted by all parties:

Another question of considerable importance is in regard to the offset referred to in the statute as subsidies. Before me it was conceded by Counsel for the Crown that the only subsidies in contemplation at the time of the Statute, were subsidies granted by the Dominion Government. This view is, in my judgment, untenable. I have to follow the Statute. The Statute say "less subsidies." There is nothing in the Statute which would limit the meaning of the word "subsidies" to subsidies granted by the Dominion Government only. The word "subsidy" as defined in Webster's International dictionary, page 2070, is as follows:

"A grant of funds or property from a Government as of the state or municipal corporation to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise deemed advantageous to the public, a suovention."

The manifest object of the statute is that any grants furnished by the public towards the construction of the railways should be deducted. If in point of fact the Statute and the agreement based upon the statute does not carry out what the parties intended, the only course in my judgment open to the parties is to have the statute amended. I must take the statute as I find it, and according to my view, subsidies include not merely Dominion but Provincial as well. This construction is of importance as the Quebec subsidies amount to something in the neighbourhood of $440,000, which according to the view I entertain must be deducted from the value as ascertained.

Inglis v. Buttery (1). In the Dominion Coal Co. v. Dominion Iron & Steel Co. (2). Judge Longley rejected evidence tendered as to the communings preceding the agreement, and this view was upheld in the appellate court in Nova Scotia, and also in the Privy Council (3). And in a late case the city of Toronto v. Consumers Gas Co. (4) decided by the Privy Council, Lord Shaw in delivering the judgment of the board uses the following language.

I shall not read that because it is the judgment of Lord Shaw and simply buttresses the opinion of the learned judge of of the Exchequer Court. Judge Cassels continues:

I come now to the consideration of the accounts as filed by the railways. I will deal first with that relating to the Montmorency division. The first item is dated July 1, 1898: road and equipment, real estate, buildings, etc., Montmorency division, $2,038,149.49. This starting point is assumed by the railways to have been the cost of construction up to that date. At the date in question, namely, the 1st July, 1898, according to Colonel Wurtele, the road had been constructed as far as Ste. Anne's. The mileage of this road was about 21 miles, and it may be that they were running a mile or two beyond. Even if it were granted that 22 miles instead of 21 miles of the railway had been constructed at that date, the cost would be in the neighbourhood of $92,500 a mile. Colonel Wurtele puts it about $100,000. It seems a high figure. It is stated by counsel for the railway company that a certain portion of the right of way beyond Ste. Anne's had been procured. This may or may not be so. The proof before me is lacking on this point. Here there is a distinct difference between the views put forward by the counsel for the railway company and the counsel for the Crown. The counsel for the railway company contend that what the court has to do, is to find the cost as if it were an accounting between the directors of the railway and its shareholders; and that this amount being shown by the books of the company as the amount expended at that date, should therefore be accepted as the cost. Numerous witnesses were called, gentlemen of good standing—accountants from Montreal—who gave evidence as to the custom in regard to the charging up of interest, etc., to capital account.

When I deal with the case of the Saguenay railway, the absurdity of this contention put forward on the part of the railway company will be apparent. The directors of a company might have to pay fifty per cent commission for obtaining a loan of a million dollars. It would undoubtedly be quite right as between themselves and their shareholders to charge this fifty per cent in their accounts. So also they might delay construction for a period of say 20 years, in the meanwhile paying interest on this bonded indebtedness. As between the directors and their shareholders, as a matter of book-keeping, it may be quite reasonable to charge up every item of expenditure. But the case before me is of a different character. I am not dealing with the accounts as between the shareholders and their directors. What I have to ascertain is the value as between the vendor and the purchaser and that value must be the actual cost of the railways, less subsidies and less depreciation.

The railway company contend that owing to the books kept by Mr. Beemer being destroyed, there is no other proof available. There is no suggestion that there was any intention of destroying these books with the view of preventing inquiry. Colonel Wurtele's evidence is to the effect that he was the executor of Mr. Beemer, that it turned out that Mr. Beemer's estate was insolvent. He advised the heirs next of kin to relinquish all claim to the estate. The books were retained by him for several years, and as he considered them of no value, and they were occupying space required, he destroyed them. This may render it more difficult to arrive at the value. I suggested at the trial that it did not seem to me so impossible as counsel seemed to think. Two or three times I pointed out to them that it would be easy to have competent valuators go over this line of railway from Quebec to St. Anne, and to value in detail the present railway. Of course it would not be by any means conclusive. The present values would probably be considerably higher than when the road was originally constructed. Under the agreement with the Crown made pursuant to the statute, a good title has to be made to the right of way, and I would imagine that the title deeds conveying this right of way would show the price paid.

By the Trust Deed which executed on the 11th day of June, 1898, entered into after the passing of the statute, Cap. 59, 58-59 Vic. dealing with the application of the proceeds of the stock and the bonds, it is provided that out of the proceeds of the bonds, the trustees shall pay off and redeem the present interim bonds, the whole as set forth in schedule "A" to the deed; and also to pay the floating debt detailed in schedule "B."

Now it is admitted that these two items of $500,000 referred to in schedule "A," and also the item of $794,869.58 floating liabilities, comprise part of this item of $2,038,149.40. Crown counsel in their statement were of opinion that these two items of $500,000 and $794,869.58 should be taken as the cost up to that date, namely July 1st 1898. I do not agree with that contention. I fail to see how it can be assumed without further proof that the proceeds of these interim bonds, namely $500,000, went into the construction of the railway. They may or may not. That is a question of proof. The bonds were held by the various parties shown on page 15 as Schedule "A." They were held as collateral security by the various parties. What the nature of the debts due to these various parties is I would have thought susceptible of proof—at all events before such an item can be allowed, further inquiry will be necessary, and so with regard to the liabilities.

Unquestionably a considerable portion of them never went into the railway. Colonel Wurtele states as follows:

Q. A lot of these items on their face do not appear to be items that went into the construction of the road, how is that?

A. They may have gone into the operation of the road, we were operating the railway.

It would be impossible to accept Colonel Wurtele's evidence as proving the fact that these two particular items went into the construction of the railway. Other evidence would be required before I would be willing to accept those two sums of $500,000 and $794,869.58 as having been expended in the construction of this 21 miles of railway.

I have to determine the value of the railways, the actual cost of them—and construing the statute as I think it must be construed, I would be unable upon the evidence as presented before me, to come to the conclusion that this item of two million odd dollars should be taken as being the actual cost of the railway to that date.

I do not think as I have stated before, that I am concerned with the manner in which as between the directors and their shareholders, the company kept their books. What I have to ascertain, as well as I can, is what the meaning of the words 'actual cost and value" is.

I pointed out during the progress of the trial the course which I thought might be followed. My remarks will be found at page 102, and the following pages, of the transcript of the evidence.

I may call the attention of counsel to the fact that in the trust deed, Schedule "D," at page 19, there is the estimate of cost of constructing certain extensions. The total is 11 miles—and the total estimate is $149,947, which would be under $14,000 a mile—and while of course the main railway previously built may not have been built at that low figure, the contrast between the two figures, namely, $92,500 a mile and the $14,000 a mile, is striking. There seems to be a little controversy as to the expenditure after July 1, 1898. At present it is unnecessary for me to deal with the expenditure between that time and November, 1916. It can be taken up later on. After careful examination the Crown is willing to concede the main part of this expenditure. There are one or two items objected to, not of very much moment, and I think the evidence adduced has satisfied Crown counsel that these items should be allowed, however, it will be a matter for later consideration.

The judge deals next with the Lotbinière and Megantic railway. He says:

Dealing with the Megantic Railway, the amount involved in this railway is comparatively speaking not very large, but I think that further proof of a similar nature to that suggested in regard to the Montmorency Railway should be forthcoming. The only evidence given is that of Mr. Robins, the manager of the railway, and it is a mere surmise. He may or may not be correct when he states that it would probably cost about $11,000 a mile. I think, however, some evidence by outside witnesses qualified to speak should be forthcoming.

He then deals with the Saguenay railway, and says:

Mr. Matthews, the manager of the railway, was called as a witness. He states that the construction of the Quebec and Saguenay railway was started in April or May, 1911. Previous to that he believes exploration surveys had been made. He points out that the main construction on this road stopped some time about September, 1912, but certain small constructions were continued for quite a while. He also states as a matter of fact, on what is known as the branch spur line, from Murray Bay wharf to Nairn Falls, very considerable work was done in 1915. That branch is 7.6 miles in length, he thinks. He goes further and explains that this spur line was constructed for the purpose of handling pulp from a pulp mill situate at Nairn Falls. Referring to the main construction he states as follows:

"Q. You say that it was financial trouble that stopped you?

A. Financial trouble that stopped us.

Q. How long has it been stopped—ever since?

A. Yes.

Q. Since 1912?

A. September or October, 1912."

No further work was done with the exception of repairing crib work on the spur line, but on the main part of the line from St. Joachim to Murray Bay nothing has been done since October, 1912, and the work had to be stopped on account of the lack of money.

It is well to bear this fact in mind when you come to consider the claim made by and on behalf of the Saguenay railway. There appears to have been two flotations of bonds, and to float these bonds a discount had to be allowed of $833,600. There were fees paid according to the statement in connection with the listing of the bond issue amounting to $63,465.09. Counsel on behalf of the Crown objected to those items. It would also appear that in making up their claim of $5,543,260.89, there is an item charged of interest on the bond issue of $1,012,950. This item is also objected to by counsel for the Crown. I think the objection taken by Crown counsel is well founded. I am of opinion that this item of $1,012,950 interest payable right up to 1917 is not a charge that can be allowed under the terms of the statute. The work of construction as I have pointed out, with the exception of that small spur line, so to speak, from Murray Bay to Nairn Falls, stopped in October, 1912, and has never been gone on with, so far as the company is concerned. While, as I have stated before, as between the directors and shareholders it may be right to put in all these items of cost I do not think that as between the vendor and purchaser having regard to the wording of the statute they are proper sums to be allowed. The statute, as I have pointed out, is precise and to my mind unambiguous. The consideration to be paid is the value of the railways, the said value to be the actual cost of the said railways less subsidies and less depreciation.

Then there are two or three pages of legal argument and citation of cases, giving the decisions of the court upon questions of actual value. I do not think I will trouble the committee with reading them, because, after all, we have to take up the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Justice Cassels. His conclusions are:

In Kirby & Stewart vs. The King (1) a case tried before me, I refused to allow the contractor interest which he had paid to the bank for moneys required for the purpose of the construction of the work. That case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada and my ruling sustained. There is a difference between that case and the present in this respect: the claim there made was by the contractor, and he had been allowed the usual contractors' profits. The words of the reference, by the Order in Council in that case, were that he was to be allowed the "actual and reasonable cost."

To my mind, to allow these charges for obtaining money and the interest for a period of years might make the matter almost farcical. The railway might have laid dormant for a period of another 20 years, meanwhile the interest on the bonds would have to be paid, amounting to two or three more million dollars, all of which, assuming the company paid the interest would be charged up in their books to the shareholders, and if the argument put forward is correct in that case, the Crown when paying what is defined by the statute to be the actual cost of the railways would be paying some three million dollars odd for interest for which no value is given in return.

The views of the various accountants seem to vary. Some of them apparently were rather shocked at the length to which their evidence would lead, and came to the conclusion that the interest could only be a proper charge during a reasonable period of construction.

It will be easy when the case is concluded to arrive at the amount which in my judgment ought to be allowed. There will have to be deducted the allowance for depreciation which has been settled. There will also have to be deducted the amounts received from the Dominion and provincial subsidies. These sums are not in dispute. There will also have to be deducted these items that I have just been referring to in connection with the Saguenay railway and any amounts that should be deducted from the Montmorency & Charlevoix railway, and the Megantic railway on a proper valuation being proved.

I have taken up some time, but I think it is well worth the time to have it on record. Just shortly, I want to give my deductions from this judgment—and I desire to state that I have gone over it very hurriedly since the discussion started, but I think I have correctly summarized the judgment as to the figures.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is it a judgment or statement?

Mr. CARVELL: I have read the judgment.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is it a judgment?

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is not a final judgment.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is a statement.

Mr. CARVELL: It is quite a statement.

Mr. COCHRANE: I agree with you.

Mr. CARVELL: If I started out to reargue the case with that statement before me I would have a very hard job. I am going to give the deductions which I drew from that statement so far as possible. I admit there are some things which are obscure.

Mr. NESBITT: It is his judgment.

Mr. CARVELL: It is his judgment.

Mr. COCHRANE: No, it is not his judgment.

Mr. CARVELL: You can have your views, and I will have mine. It is his judgment, and is headed "Judgment delivered 24th day of January, 1914," and it will go down to all time as the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels, and will be reported in the Exchequer Court Reports of Canada, and it provides that if they want to appeal from it they have the right to do so, and we are told they have not appealed. If they do appeal we will have another judgment in the Supreme Court of Canada Reports either confirming or disagreeing with this judgment. I have taken these three railways in the order in which Judge Cassels discusses them. I take the claim of the Quebec and Montmorency railway at $2,038,149, and I take the total of the two amounts of $500,000 and $749,869, which is $1,294,869, and subtract it from the $2,038,149, which leaves the value of the Quebec and Montmorency road at $743,280, less of course deductions. In the judgment there are no figures as to amounts expended upon construction since 1st July, 1898. I take it they are very inconsiderable and would play no important part whatever in the final statement of the case.

Mr. REID: Do I understand that the hon. member figures up the cost of the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix as $743,280?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. REID: You are making those deductions from what amount?

Mr. CARVELL: From $2,038,149. There may have been some amounts expended on construction after 1st July, 1898, but if there are any, Sir Walter Cassels makes no reference to them in his judgment.

I come next to the Lotbinière and Megantic, and we have so little evidence on this that I take the statement as I find it. Thirty miles at $11,000 a mile amounts to $330,000. I take next the Quebec and Saguenay. The total amount claimed by the company would be $5,543,260. Sir Walter Cassels says that from that should be deducted the three items:

Commissions, including commissions on bonds	$ 863,000
Commissions of other kinds	63,465
Interest	1,012,950
Total	$1,939,415

I subtract that from the total claim, and I have a balance left of $3,503,845. Add to that the other two amounts, namely, $743,280 and $330,000, and I have a total of $4,577,125 as the cost of the three lines of railway. I first take from that the $2,500,000 bond issue, because Sir Walter Cassels says that the bond indebtedness is a first charge and first payment. That brings the total down to $2,077,125. Then there must be deducted from that the amount of subsidies. I have no positive evidence, but I am assuming that there would be double subsidies. The Dominion subsidies would amount to $672,000 only on the Quebec and Saguenay and the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix. That is, the subsidies on the total line from Quebec to Murray Bay would be 105 miles at a double subsidy of $6,400 per mile, or $672,000. Adding that to the amount of $440,000 contributed by the province of Quebec, I have a total of $1,112,000 of subsidies. I have no knowledge of whether any subsidies were paid on the Lotbinière and Megantic, therefore, I have not taken that into the calculation, but it may be possible that I have charged too much for the subsidies on the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix, so that I think we shall find that the two items counteract each other, and that my figures are approximately correct. I have, then, subtracted the amount of the subsidies, namely, $1,112,000, from the total of $2,077,125, and I find that the actual value of the three lines, less depreciation, is only $965,125. I leave it to the minister and every member of the House who has listened to me—and I am obliged to hon. members for the great courtesy with which they have listened to my somewhat lengthy remarks—whether I am right in my figures and have made the proper deductions from Sir Walter Cassel's judgment. If so, the total value of the three lines of railway, less depreciation, is less than $1,000,000. Why on earth does the Minister of Railways, with his sense of justice, want to pay this company nearly $4,000,000 for three lines of railway which are worth, according to the findings of a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, less than $1,000,000?

Mr. REID: I stated a few moments ago that the Government intended dropping the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix and the Lotbinière and Megantic out of the item. Do I understand the hon. member to say that the judge had valued the Quebec and Saguenay at $3,503,845?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. REID: From that would be deducted any subsidies that had been paid. The only subsidy that has been paid is $248,000 so that the amount would be in the neighbourhood of $3,255,845. Am I right in that?

Mr. CARVELL: I think so.

Mr. REID: The bond issue of $2,500,000 would not come into the matter at all, because those bonds are on the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix. As we are abandoning the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix and the Lotbinière and Megantic railways, we have had to deal with only the Quebec and Saguenay. The Government therefore, would have to pay only $3,255,845. Am I right in that?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. Is the Minister of Customs willing to justify in this House the payment of $3,255,845, in this time of stress, for a railway that has not had a rail on it, that has not even all the grading done, when he can secure for a much smaller amount a line of railway which he admits paid over $100,000 last year? What earthly influence has Sir Rodolphe Forget over the Government?

Mr. COCHRANE: We have not paid anything yet.

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid—

Mr. COCHRANE: Why did we not pay last year?

Mr. CARVELL: Because you were waiting for the judgment of the judge of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. COCHRANE: And we will wait for it.

Mr. CARVELL: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. REID: And we will not pay anything until the next session of Parliament when the matter is decided.

Mr. CARVELL: We are getting along.

Mr. REID: I stated that a few minutes ago.

Mr. CARVELL: We are gradually getting the amount reduced. If we stay here till morning, we may get the whole of it. It would be worth sitting here all night to save $3,000,000 to the country in this time of stress. The minister has dropped the Lotbinière and Megantic out of the item. That is gone. I am glad the Government railways are not going into the portion of Quebec and repeating their telephone experience in the county of Dorchester. We come next to the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix, the road which, we all know, does pay. The minister, I think, claims that it was $100,000 to the good last year. By what reasoning does he justify refusing to take that portion of the road which would be of some value and taking that portion which has not been constructed yet, which is of no value and which is paying no money?

Mr. COCHRANE: In the first place it is a very expensive piece of road to build, and a great deal of expense has been put upon it.

Mr. CARVELL: What does the minister want it for in war time? The justification for going into this expenditure a year ago was this: Well, we are buying branch lines for the Intercolonial; we believe we should extend the Intercolonial, make it as big a concern as we can and reach out and accomodate the people. The Government argued that the Intercolonial, by means of a ferry and by a good deal of mythology was in the city of Quebec, and, therefore, when they bought this line from Quebec down to Murray Bay, it was simply an extension of the Intercolonial. Now they propose to drop the first thirty or forty miles of it running from Quebec eastward, which part is a paying proposition, and then they drop in behind that again and go from there to Murray Bay where the road will not pay and is not even constructed,—and they want to pay $3,255,845 for it.

Mr COCHRANE: We will pay what the judge says. I have made that statement several times in the House. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will bear me out in that.

Mr. CARVELL: I would oppose that with greater vehemence than I would any other scheme that has been proposed here for years, because that is the one thing for which there is no justification as a matter of principle. When they take that attitude they get away to some extent from the absolute position in which the judge places them. With that judgment staring them in the face, I do not see how they can possibly take over the whole system. Finding themselves up against that stone wall, they must stand by Sir Rodolphe Forget and get him out of the difficulty in which he is placed. They abandon the other part of the road because they cannot help themselves on account of the Cassels judgment, but they say: Notwithstanding the statute of 1916, notwithstanding the finding of Mr. Justice Cassels, we are going to pay Sir Rodolphe Forget for a road which has not yet been constructed.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Does my hon. friend not know that besides Sir Rodolphe Forget there are 60,000 people in that district who for two hundred years have been without railway accommodation?

Mr. CARVELL: I should not be surprised to know that. Along the river St. John in my province, the people were without railway facilities for 125 or 130 years.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Have they railway accommodation now?

Mr. CARVELL: We built a railway ourselves. We made a mess of it, but we built it just the same—we did not get it from this Government. I do not argue that a railway along the north shore of the St. Lawrence is not a necessity; a railway is a necessity wherever people live. I should be glad indeed to see the people on the north shore of the St. Lawrence have a railway. But I am pointing out the facts, the Government propose to buy this railway and to leave it to the Exchequer Court to assess the value. His decision makes it impossible for them to carry out their original intention. The minister now proposes to put through a vote to buy a roadbed, a right of way, which has not upon it even the proverbial two streaks of rust; he is going to spend perhaps $2,500,000 or $3,000,000 on it at a time, as set forth by the member for Kingston, when no unnecessary expenditure should be made. There is no doubt that the railway would be a convenience, but I cannot conceive upon what ground the Minister of Railways proposes to go on with an expenditure of this kind under present conditions. I have pleasure in seconding the motion of the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that this item be struck out.

Mr. COCHRANE: There is no question in the minds of members of the Committee who know anything about this railway that the line is absolutely necessary. I admit that this is a very inopportune time to take action in the matter, but I point out that the railway was pretty well constructed before the commencement of the war and the action of the waves along the shore has been gradually destroying the roadbed. Last year the Government, in its wisdom, made an agreement with Sir Rodolphe Forget and his company for the taking over of these three roads, leaving to the Exchequer Court the determination of the value. The member for Carleton has made a great deal of capital out of the findings of the Exchequer Court. I find no fault with the decisions that have been arrived at. I have several times made the statement that we do not propose to pay anything except what the Exchequer Court awards. If I had my way I would buy the Saguenay road only, and complete it. We did do some riprap work this year along where the contractors had built before; they had riprapped with earth and it was being washed away. The only fault I have to find with the Exchequer Court's decision is this: the judge might have allowed a reasonable amount of interest for construction time. The member for Carleton will admit, I think, that that is railway practice. If he reads the evidence taken before the judge, he will agree that this interest should have been allowed. More than three years' interest, however, could not be allowed, because three years is a reasonable time within which the company could complete the road. We do not propose to pay Sir Rodolphe Forget one dollar of this money until the new Parliament meets and a Bill is submitted for the taking over of the Quebec and Saguenay road, the value to be left to the decision of the Exchequer Court. I would not allow any discounts on bonds, or things like that, but I think it is only fair and reasonable that some reasonable amount, say 5 per cent for three years, should be paid by way of interest during construction.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister state why he would recommend taking over the Quebec and Saguenay road, and not the other two?

Mr. COCHRANE: Simply because I do not think we can buy the other road at what it is worth. The Quebec and Saguenay road is absolutely necessary; the people who will be served by it are closed out from communication with the outside world during seven months of the year. If so much money had not been spent on the road, I would not consider it so necessary to finish it now, but it is deteriorating fast and it is necessary that the work should be undertaken. I ask the committee to pass this vote, and I give my word of honour that no money will be paid for the road, except that in connection with construction, until a Bill is submitted giving authority to take over the Saguenay line, leaving to the Exchequer Court the determination of what it is worth.

Mr. PROULX: If the holders of the road were satisfied to take what the judgment of the Exchequer Court direct, would the minister pay the amount?

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know whether they were satisfied to do that; I have never asked them. I will say that if they will not take what the finding of the Exchequer Court sets forth, we will expropriate and take it over that way.

Mr. CARVELL: We understand, then, that nothing will be done at all until after another Parliament has met and legislation has been enacted?

Mr. REID: Quite so, because you could not even expropriate it. Nothing will be done, even in the way of expropriation, until after a new Bill is introduced.

Mr. McKENZIE: How does the minister know that Parliament will make the new bargain that he proposes? He came to this Parliament a year ago last May with a proposal to buy a group of four railways. An Act was put through enabling the Governor in Council to take it over. Money was expended in connection with the transaction; an Order in Council must have been passed; the road must have been taken over. I assume that the minister would not spend a dollar on the road until he had taken it over. We, as a committee, must take it for granted that the road is taken over. The whole Committee being anxious to help the situation, are we not entitled to see the Order in Council in virtue of which the minister acted upon the Statute of 1916? If that Order in Council took over those four roads, all that remains is to ascertain how much they are worth. The Order in Council tested the title of the road in the Crown, and it belongs to the Crown, and nothing remains but to find out how much we are to pay for it. Surely hon. gentlemen supporting the Government will admit that the Order in Council should be before us.

Mr. REID: All these documents have been laid on the table.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not want to be impolite to the minister, but this eternal telling us that something was laid on the table is not satisfactory. What information does it convey to me or to anyone else who has no notice of the fact? If the practice were followed by the Government that copies of those Orders in Council would be put in Members' post office boxes, it would be different, but to lay them on the Table and tell us months afterwards they were laid on the table, is no information to me at all events. Before I am asked to vote three or four million dollars of the people's money, I would like to see the deed to the property we are buying. If I understand this statute at all, it gives the Government power to pass an order vesting this property in the Government. I take it for granted that that Order in Council would duly vest the property in the Government. After that Order in Council was passed they started in with an array of counsel on both sides to ascertain the amount they were to pay for the railway. Now we are told the whole thing is off and that they are to begin over again on a new statute. If the minister will tell us we are going to clean the slate absolutely, and to start over again and see what Parliament will do, then, as a lawyer and trying to be of some use in this House, I would be prepared to say, all right. But I am not prepared to vote this money when we are told we are not getting the property at all. And I appeal to any sensible business man here to say if he is willing to provide money to pay for a property we did not get.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have stated we will not pay any money.

Mr. CARVELL: The very fact that the minister has stated he will not pay any money or do anything until there is a final finding of the judge of the Exchequer Court—

Mr. COCHRANE: Nothing, except operating the road.

Mr. CARVELL: —and that the Government will not take it over until a new Parliament passes legislation, is the very strongest reason I have for voting against this item. I take the minister's word absolutely when he tells the House that he will not do certain things. I take it without any reservation whatever. But if he is not going to do these things until the new Parliament assembles and new legislation is passed, then that new Parliament can provide the money to carry out this legislation.

Mr. COCHRANE: But we want to be paid for the moneys we have spent on it.

Mr. CARVELL: If the minister was foolish enough to spend money upon it before the finding of Judge Cassels, or if after the finding he has been foolish enough to spend money, then, much as I respect him. I cannot stand up in my place in Parliament and vote to reimburse him. I may not be here in the new Parliament. None of us know what is going to happen, but as I am here, and as I have the right, I want to try to leave the record as clear as I can, and I propose to vote against the item.

Mr. PROULX: Will the minister go on and spend more money under this resolution as was spent last year before the judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels and before there was an agreement made with the owners of the road? It seems to me the Government wants to provide money to go on now and spend it on the construction of the road previous to and during the election. Of course, that will help Sir Rodolphe Forget and some of the friends of the Government in the election. If a new statute is required to be passed by a new Parliament in order to expend the money, I do not see why we should vote the money now. I agree with my hon. friend from Kingston that the owners of the road should not have been too greedy. They should have accepted the amount fixed by the Exchequer Court, and if they were not satisfied with that they should have appealed to the Supreme Court, rather than come back to Parliament. They should have taken advantage of the statute passed last year. I do not feel disposed to go beyond what was done last year.

Motion (Mr. Nesbitt), to strike out, lost on division. Yeas, 14; nays, 29.

That the following gentlemen compose the board of selection to appoint members of local tribunals under section 6 of the Military Service Act, 1917:

Ontario: A. E. Fripp, M.P., Ottawa; W. A. Boys, M.P., Barrie; Sir John Gibson, Hamilton; A. B. Lowe, 41 Glenn Street, Ottawa.

Quebec: Joseph H. Rainville, M.P., St. Lambert; Romeo Langlois, K.C., Quebec; Hon. S. N. Parent, Montreal; Hon. Sydney Fisher, Knowlton.

Nova Scotia: George S. Campbell, Halifax; D. A. Cameron, Sydney, C.B.

New Brunswick: Mariner G. Teed, St. John; John McCaffery, Fredericton.

Manitoba: Senator W. H. Sharp, Manitou; Sir Donald MacMillan, Winnipeg.

Saskatchewan: Senator H. W. Laird, Regina; Arthur Hitchcock, Moosejaw.

Alberta: R. B. Bennett, M.P., Calgary; Alfred H. Clarke, K.C., Calgary.

British Columbia: R. F. Green, M.P., Victoria; Hon. James Horace King, Victoria.

Yukon: Lieut.-Col. A. Thompson, M.D., M.P., Ottawa; F. C. Wade, Vancouver.

Prince Edward Island: William L. Cotton, Charlottetown; James J. Johnston, K.C., Charlottetown.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is of course to be understood from the remarks I made on a previous occasion, that we on this side of the House offer no opposition to this motion. On the contrary, I intimated that I would consent to concur in the selection of the men who are to appoint the members of the tribunals which are to administer the Act.

I must say, however, once more that I deeply regret that the Government has thought it advisable to apply this law of conscription before the people have had occasion to pronounce upon it. I think, and my opinion is confirmed more and more, as time passes, that it would have been more in the interest of the country at large if at least the people had been consulted before the law was applied. I must say frankly that if I had followed my first inclination I would not have given countenance to any participation in the administration of the Act. But, on the whole, I believe that it is always better to minimize the evil effect of a bad law by the wisest administration of it so that effort may be directed to making the application of it fair to all parties and to getting out of it the largest possible measure of justice compatible with its provisions.

I have therefore given consideration to the selection of the members to compose the board of selection, and in so doing I have endeavoured to recommeend men whose standing in the community will be a guarantee that as far as they are concerned the Act will be applied with fairness, and a determination to do justice to all.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) how he would explain the further delay to be occasioned by his proposition in enforcing this Military Service Act? I doubt very much if, owing to the delay already occasioned there will be a battalion at the front under this Act before the war is over and peace concluded. If the right hon. gentleman were returned to power, how would he provide for meeting this emergency?

Sir WILFRED LAURIER: If the soldiers are not to get to the front till the war is over, better consult the people at once.

Motion agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved that a message be sent to the Senate to inform their honours that this House has passed the following resolution:

And requesting that their honours will unite with this House in the said resolution by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and."

Motion agreed to.

THE WAR TIMES ELECTION ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GLASS: I desire to bring to the attention of the House a misapprehension in reference to a question which I addressed to the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) when he was presenting the Franchise Bill yesterday. I asked if provision had been made for the taking of the votes of the wives and female relatives of soldiers who themselves were overseas. I did not mean the wives or relatives of soldiers who were in Canada but I referred to those who were themselves overseas and I desired to ask if provision had been made for their voting The answer given by my hon. friend the Secretary of State was apparently given under a misapprehension as to the meaning of my question. I would like to put the question now in its proper form and as I intended it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions such as this ought properly to go on the Order Paper because, if they did no mistake would arise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question as put referred to soldier's wives who, themselves, were overseas. It was intended to be a question as to the eligibility to vote of the female relatives who were overseas and in that latter form the answer is "no."

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE DEFERRED.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 117, to authorize the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes.—Sir Thomas White.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): This order involves the consideration of amendments by the Senate to Bill No. 117, being an Act to authorize the levying of a war tax upon certain incomes. The hon. the Senate has made certain amendments of which I shall now inform the House. In section 3 of the Bill, instead of the words "annual profit or gain," the Senate has inserted the word "net" before the word "profit," so that, for the purposes of the Act, "income" means the "annual net profit or gain or gratuity." That is the only change made in subsection 1 section 3 with the exception of striking out the following words:

—with the following exemptions and deductions:

(a) the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent;

(b) the proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured, or payments made or credited to the insured on life insurance endowment or annuity contracts upon the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract or upon the surrender of the contract:

Instead of those words, the Senate has substituted the following:

Including the income from but not the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent; and including the income from but not the proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured or payments made or credited to the insured on life insurance endowment or annuity contracts upon the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract or upon the surrender of the contract; with the following exemptions and deductions.

And then follow the exemptions and deductions included in subsections c, d, e, and f of section 3 of the Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the minister read the first part again?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Perhaps I had better explain it. As the Bill left the House of Commons, "income" meant the annual profit or gain or gratuity derived as stated in the Act, with among other exemptions, those which I have just read, a and b. The idea was to exempt from the income which a person derived during the year the amount of money or value which he might receive on a devise or bequest, or in respect of a life insurance policy. When we were debating the matter in the House, it seems clear to all here that what we were exempting was the principal, and if, by chance, that principal was invested, then the income derived from it would, of course be income under the Act. The Senate has endeavoured to make that clear so that while the principal of life insurance policies and of any devise or bequest is exempted, income derived in respect of that principal becomes income for the purposes of the Act.

Then, further, the Senate has inserted, after subsection 1 of section 3, the following:

Provided, however, that in determining the income the personal and living expenses shall not be taken into consideration.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Then, further, they have made an amendment to section 6. That section as it left this House provided that:

All persons in whatever capacity acting, having the control, receipt, disposal or payment of fixed or determinable annual periodical gains, profits, or income of any taxpayer..... shall, on behalf of such taxpayer, deduct and withhold an amount equal to the tax payable on the same under this Act.

The Senate has inserted before the word "tax" the word "normal," so that now those having control of the income of others shall deduct and forward to the minister only the normal tax. I think their reason for doing that was because they apprehended there would be difficulty in determining the amount of tax, normal and super-tax. But, of course, the party himself would be liable in respect of the super-tax upon his income as the Bill now reads.

Further, the Senate has inserted a rather important provision in section 19. I may say that section 19 is as follows:

No assessment shall be set aside by a Board or by the court upon the ground that there has been any error or omission in connection with any proceedings required to be taken under this Act or any regulation hereunder, but such Board or Court in any case that may come before it may determine the true and proper amount of the tax to be paid hereunder.

The Senate has added this proviso:

a. All the proceedings of the Board and of the Exchequer Court shall be held in camera if requested by the taxpayer.

I am aware that there is a difference of opinion as to the powers of the Senate under our constitutional usages in respect to a taxation measure; but we are near the end of this session, there is a great deal of business before both Houses, and this is an important enactment providing for the raising of moneys which we shall require in connection with the prosecution of the war, and in the circumstances I propose to move:

That the House do concur in the amendments made by the Senate.

But I should like to make this statement in connection with my motion, in order that it may appear upon Hansard: That as there are differences of opinion respecting the powers of the Senate in amending a taxation measure, our concurrence in these amendments is not to be regarded as a precedent binding upon this House in any future legislation. It seems to me that that leaves the question fairly as regards the privileges of this House, and not unfairly as respects the action taken by the Senate.

The amendments are not of great consequence, and neither the legislation nor its administration will, I think, be materially affected thereby.

Mr. GRAHAM: The amendment to subsection (f) is capable of two constructions:

Provided, however, that in determining the income, the personal and living expenses shall not be taken into consideration.

Which construction are we to put on it—that the living expenses will not be deducted before the net income is arrived at, or that they will?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am clear that it will be construed that they are not to be deducted. If we were not so close to the end of the session I would be disposed either to amend this amendment or to move to strike it out; but in the circumstances, by reason of the importance of the Bill, I think it preferable to move to concur. In administering the Act we shall undoubtedly interpret it that the personal and living expenses are not to be deducted, which is, I think, the meaning the Senate had in view.

Mr. GRAHAM: The uncertainty still exists.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do you think that is a sound proposition?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, because I think that is the true interpretation.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister think it is a proper principle that they should not be deducted?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend has an income of $10,000 I am certainly of the opinion that he should not be allowed to deduct his living and personal expenses from that amount, in order to ascertain the amount of his income which would be assessable under this Act. My hon. friend might have an income of $10,000 a year, and might spend $9,000 of it, perhaps part of it very luxuriously, and another hon. gentleman might have an income of $10,000 and might spend only $2,000 for personal and living expenses. According to my hon. friend's view, the latter gentleman would be taxed on an income of $8,000, whereas my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) would be assessed for only $1,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Bill provides that out of every income $3,000 is to be deducted. I suppose that would be for living expenses. Are a man's living expenses to be deducted in addition to that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the meaning of the amendment?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A person's living expenses shall not be taken into consideration. The intention of the Senate is, undoubtedly, that the living expenses are not to be deducted from the income. The $3,000 exemption still stands. The Senate has not touched that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But do you add to this the living expenses?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would not think that, as a matter of constitutional practice, my hon. friend can recognize the right of the Senate to amend taxation legislation passed by this House. As a matter of fact, under our constitution the Senate either has the power to amend a tax Bill which goes from this House to them, or it has not. If the Senate has not that right to amend then this House cannot waive its constitutional right by concurrence in these amendments as is proposed by the hon. Minister of Finance. My hon. friend is proceeding in a very peculiar manner in regard to a very important principle.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What would you do about it?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend gives as a reason for setting aside the constitution, if he thinks the constitution is being set aside, as I gather he does: that we are getting near the close of the session, and that therefore, we should concede the right of the Senate to amend a tax measure. There are many important measures before the Senate, and if the principle stated by my hon. friend is sound I presume he will follow it in regard to any other Bill that comes before us, no matter what it may be.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I desire to correct my hon. friend. I did not express any definite view on the question. I stated that there were differences of opinion, and, that being so, I thought that, in view of the importance of the situation, and considering the fact that the session is drawing to a close, we should concur in the amendment, placing, at the same time, upon Hansard the statement which I made that it would not be regarded as a precedent. I may say that in 1874 a similar course was followed.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then my hon. friend expresses no opinion as to the constitutionality of the question, whether taxation measures can be amended by the Senate. My hon. friend sets aside that point by saying: "We are getting near the close of the session, and I am going to content myself, so far as the constitutional rights of the other branch of Parliament are concerned, by saying something and placing it on Hansard." There is a number of important measures before the Senate, which may come back to us before prorogation, and I assume the Minister of Finance will follow that same principle whether it be opposed to the contitution or not. If the Senate has not the right to amend this measure, my hon. friend is not justified in the course he has adopted. I have not been able to gather, in the short statement made by the Minister of Finance, the whole effect of these amendments, but I say that the importance of this measure requires that full attention should be paid by this House to the amendments the Senate has made. I see no reason why there should be any proceedings in camera in determining the amount of income on which a man should be taxed. There is no reason why the whole question as to taxation should not be conducted openly and aboveboard. If certain people in this country who are in receipt of large incomes are to be permitted to have a hole-and-corner tribunal to hear their cases, and the public are not going to know anything about the investigation, it will be an unfortunate thing. I say this Bill has not gone far enough in dealing with the contribution to the expense of this war by people who are in position to pay. I think, by comparison with taxation measures in other countries, that, as pointed out by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) when the Bill was before the House sometime ago, we have not begun to take the course we should adopt in dealing with this question. When my hon. friend tells us, that this measure has been considered by this Parliament, that the man of very large income is to be protected, the public is debarred, from any knowledge as to whether or not he has been dealt with in a proper way by the tribunal, and this man is permitted to say: "I desire this investigation to be a private one," I say that my hon. friend is asserting a principal which is not sound. The public in this country have a right to know whether or not a man of large income has been properly dealt with, and whether the evidence given in regard to that income justifies the finding of the tribunal. It may be urged that it is not a pleasant thing for one's personal affairs to be investigated by the public, but that is no answer. The conditions to-day are such that these problems, so far as delicacy is concerned, have to be disregarded, and if we are to permit a stipulation in this Bill, under which a man of large income can escape liability without the public knowing whether an investigation has been held, I say it is a pernicious principle. I am opposed to permitting the Senate to introduce such a provision, and I am opposed to this House accepting it. I think the House should debate these questions fully. I only know the purport of two amendments, but we are not in such great haste that we cannot take full time to consider the effects of these amendments, and what our rights and position in Parliament are with reference to this whole question. What possible motive can there be for amending this Bill by inserting such a provision? Why should it be done?

The minister has given no good reason for the adoption of the course he suggests. This House is not going to rise to-morrow or on Monday. There are on the Order Paper a large number of important Bills which have occupied the attention of the House for many days; some of them are now engaging the attention of the other branch of Parliament. We should give this matter that attention which the people expect us to give to measures of such great importance. Moreover, it is understood that if this measure leaves Parliament in the terms proposed by the Minister of Finance the business profits war tax will be continued another year? We have two conflicting statements on that point. We were told at one time that the business profits war tax would cease at the end of this year.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the motion before the House is that certain amendments made by the Senate to a certain Bill be concurred in. It is not in order for the hon. member to now discuss the general principle of the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was not discussing the general principle of the Bill. With all due deference to you, Sir, I submit that the attitude of the Government with reference to the problem of taxation is involved in the matter that we are now discussing. I was pointing out that conflicting statements had been made in regard to the business profits war tax, and I was making inquiry as to the policy of the Government in the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Bill itself has been considered in this House and we are now considering certain amendments made by the Senate. I would point out to the House that we are not now in committee and so hon. members are limited to one speech. I have somewhat relaxed the rule in the case of the Minister of Finance, in order that a proper explanation might be made.

Mr. MACDONALD: If there is a discussion on the subject, I assume that the minister will reply. If he does not, I hope that some other member of the Government will do so, because I want the Government to tell us what their position is in regard to this matter. The question whether this House should accept certain amendments made by the Senate to this important measure is I submit, relevant to the matter that we are now considering. The principle involved in this amendment, that the personal expenses of the individual are not to be taken into consideration in determining his net income for the purposes of taxation is a matter closely related to the whole policy of the Government as to taxation; therefore an inquiry as to the Government's policy is germane to the discussion. As to the constitutionality of the action of the Senate, I object to the Minister of Finance binding this House by putting anything on Hansard on the subject, one way or the other. That is not the way constitutional assemblies deal with things of this kind. The last amendment made by the Senate was the only one that I had opportunity of understanding clearly. For myself I object to the proposal that appeals should be heard before these tribunals in camera in order that the amount of taxation to be paid by any wealthy person may be ascertained. As to the amendment regarding net income. I was not able to understand the ministers explanation. I do not think that members of this House are really seized of what the amendments are; it is difficult, therefore, for hon. gentlemen really to understand them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is a well-known principle that the Upper Chamber can reject any Bill, even though it deals with financial matters, that has been passed by this House. The Senate can reject the Supply Bill; it can reject a Bill adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, but it cannot amend such Bills. This principle has been affirmed over and over again. I submit that the motion of the Minister of Finance is out of order. Rule 78 says:

> All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all Bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

This rule covers all Bills passed by the House of Commons dealing with financial matters, including those Bills the purpose of which is the raising of revenue through taxation.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask the right hon. gentleman if he will deal with rule 87, page 44, while he is discussing this point of order?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I will come to that. A motion has been made that the House concur in amendments made by the Senate to a Bill the purpose of which is to impose taxation. I submit that, under the terms laid down in Rule 78, such a motion is out if order. I now come to rule 87, which is in these terms:

> In order to expedite the business of Parliament, the House will not insist on the privilege claimed and exercised by them, of laying aside Bills sent from the Senate because they impose pecuniary penalties;

That would not apply in this case, because the Bill in question is one which was passed by this House and sent to the Senate, not one which was passed by the Senate and sent to this House. The rule continues:

> nor of laying aside amendments made by the Senate because they introduce into or alter pecuniary penalties in Bills sent to them by this House;

This Bill does not impose or introduce any penalties; therefore it does not come within the purview of that part of the rule. (Reading):

> provided that all such penalties thereby imposed, are only to punish or prevent crimes and offences, and do not tend to lay a burden on the subject, either as aid or supply to His Majesty, or for any general or special purposes, by rates, tolls, assessments or otherwise.

Under rule 78 the Senate has no right to amend or to alter in any way a money Bill sent to them from this House. This House alone has the privilege of dealing with money Bills. The only right the Senate has is that of rejecting or assenting to such money Bills. That rule has been confirmed over and over again in England. The cases to which rule 87 applies have reference to Bills coming from the Senate which deal in some way not with charges upon the revenue, but with penalties imposed upon the subject. I think, therefore, that my point of order is well taken; that the House has no power to assent to any alteration made by the Senate in a money Bill sent from this House to the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was going to suggest that in any event consideration of the Senate amendments to this Bill might be postponed until to-morrow. Personally, I could not follow very well the amendments as they were read by the minister. The first, I think, is rather unimportant; I doubt whether it changes materially the effect of the section. I refer to the addition of the word "net" in section 3. The second amendment is rather involved, and it was impossible to follow the sense of it from the reading of it by the minister. The last amendment, having reference to the proceedings of the tribunals created under the statute to hear appeals in camera, is a very important one.

I think, therefore, the House should have time to consider the matter before giving or refusing assent. I agree with the view the minister has taken in regard to the Senate amendments. He was inclined to agree to the same, because any other course might delay the proceedings of the House. If we deem it wise not to assent to the Senate amendments, the procedure is very simple: We refuse to agree to them. If that does not meet with favour in the Senate, a conference is possible. I rise chiefly to suggest that the consideration of the Senate amendments to this Bill be postponed until to-morrow, so that we may have an opportunity to look into them. It is quite possible the minister himself has not had an opportunity to give due consideration to them, and these amendments may substantially affect other sections.

Mr. SPEAKER: In respect to the point of order raised by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, it would appear from the opportunity I have had of looking into the matter, that it would be competent for this House to make a reservation such as was proposed by the Minister of Finance, because apparently, in May, 1874, we have a precedent in this Parliament. In the Journals of 1874 this entry is to be found with respect to a Bill entitled "An Act respecting the appropriation of certain Dominion lands in Manitoba," to which the Senate made certain amendments:

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Dorion, resolved, that this House doth concur in the said amendments; while doing so, it does not think it necessary, at this late period of the session, to insist on its privileges in respect thereto, but that the waiver of the said privileges in this case be not, however, drawn into a precedent.

Ordered, that the Clerk do carry back the Bill to the Senate, and acquaint their honours that this House hath agreed to their amendments.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Your Honour is not giving a ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER: No. Without giving a ruling upon the main point, I consider it would be competent for this House, if it so desires, by making a reservation, to avoid a precedent being created.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It so happens—

Mr. SPEAKER: Before giving a ruling, I would prefer to give the main question much more consideration than I have had opportunity to give it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It so happens that in 1874, I was a member of this House. I was, of course, a very young member then, but I have a vague recollection of the discussion that took place. The Act was not an Appropriation Act; it was a Land Act. There was quite an important and lengthy debate as to whether or not the Act could be assimilated to the appropriation of money, and it was a dubious point whether or not a land grant came within the sole privilege of this House and it was on account of this uncertainty that the motion was passed reserving the rights of this House. It is forty years ago since that debate took place, but I think my recollection is correct, and if Your Honour will look into the matter, you will find that there was a discussion as to whether the land had been taken by appropriation or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a very important matter. I shall take the earliest opportunity of going into the question quite fully, but I still hold the view that this House can preserve all its rights and privileges by a special statement to that effect.

Mr. CURRIE: I quite agree with the remarks of the leader of the Opposition. This is one of the ancient privileges of the House of Commons and I do not think it has been violated during the last forty years. It is the undoubted right of this House to originate all money Bills, and the Senate cannot add to, subtract from or vary any money Bill. For that reason, I think, as the point is a very important one, we ought to adjourn the discussion so as to enable the Speaker to consult the authorities as is the custom in order that the rights of this House may be maintained. This is a very important right and, I do not think this House should agree to any change in its rights and privileges. We are putting up with a great deal from the Senate, and we shall have to put up with a great deal more if we give way in this case.

4 p.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have before me Bourinot, who deals with the decision in regard to the Land Act of 1874. It will be found by an examination of Bourinot that in this case there was very grave doubt among the leaders of the House of Commons as to whether or not the Land Bill was really in the nature of a money Bill and whether this was an infringement of the rule. What the Senate did was to increase the land grants to settlers, and there was an uncertainty as to whether or not that was an infringement of the rule. It will never be doubted that if it was a clear infringement of rule 78, as this is, the House would have taken the course which it did. The question is one of the very gravest importance, because what is determined upon to-day is a precedent for to-morrow. I should think the resolution should not be passed simply upon the statement of the Minister of Finance that, in his opinion, it should not be a precedent. The House should have something to say with regard to the matter. The House might give notice to suspend rule 78 in order to allow the action of the Senate to be concurred in. That, however, would be a very grave thing to do.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The considerations put forward here appealed to me, and I consulted the parliamentary counsel respecting them. It was drawn to my attention that in 1874 a Bill was returned from the Senate with an amendment providing for an increase in the quantity of land granted to settlers in the Northwest. That is the case which has been referred to. I quote from Bourinot, page 492:

> The Premier and other members doubted the right of the Senate to increase a grant of land—the public lands being, in the opinion of the House, in the same position as the public revenues. The amendment was only adopted with an entry in the Journals that the Commons did not think it "necessary, at that late period of the session, to insist on its privileges in respect thereto but that the waiver of the privileges was not to be drawn into a precedent."

It seemed to me, in view of the extreme importance of this Bill and the lateness of the session, as was the case in 1874, and as the amendments were not of vital importance, that we might adopt the same course that was then adopted, namely, concur in the amendments and reserve such privileges as the House has. As, however, the point of order has been raised, and as you, Sir, desire to have time to look up the authorities and give your ruling in respect of it, it would be a waste of time to continue the debate.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Sévigny, the debate was adjourned.

WAR CHARITIES ACT.

House again in Committee on Bill No 130, relating to War Charities—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 3—Prohibition against raising money for war charities unless registered:

Mr. NESBITT: Would this section apply to the ordinary Red Cross Societies throughout the country?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the object of the Bill?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The object of the Bill is to prevent frauds upon the public by people making appeals for real or alleged war charities. There has been considerable abuse along these lines, and this Bill is to remedy such abuse. I would point out to my hon. friend that no difficulty can arise in the case of well-established charities, because, by subsection 4 of section 3, the minister may exempt any war charity from registration under the Act. A well-established war charity would experience no difficulty under this measure.

Mr. NESBITT: I have not had an opportunity of reading the Bill, but it looks to me unnecessary to expose our Red Cross societies, which are in every village and hamlet in the country, to be prosecuted under an Act of Parliament. They are doing a great deal of good, and are generally carried on by the women. I suppose the Secretary of State may exempt Red Cross societies generally without particularizing them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would this Bill cover the case of tag days? Sometimes we read of the proceeds of tag days being looted, which would indicate that it is possible for people who had an ulterior object in view to institute a tag day under false pretenses, so to speak.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Those tag days must be authorized by the different municipalities.

Mr. NESBITT: No, not in all cases. There are hospital tag days, for instance—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But they have to get the permission of the municipal councils.

Mr. NESBITT: No.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They do in the cities.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This applies only to appeals for the purpose of raising or attempting to raise money for any war charity by promoting any bazaar, sale, entertainment or exhibition, or by any similar means. On the face of it, I should say it would not apply to a tag day, because that is not the raising of money by a bazaar, sale, entertainment, or exhibition.

Mr. OLIVER: It does not seem to me that it has been made altogether clear just what object the Government desires to attain by this legislation. Clause (a) of subsection 1 of section 3 provides that the war charity is either exempt from registration or is registered under the Act. What are the conditions that exempt a war charity from registration? I have read clause (b) of subsection 1 several times and I am unable to understand what it is there for or what is intended to be accomplished by it. I would like the minister to say definitely what is the object sought to be attained.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The purpose is to protect the public against appeals which, although purporting to be for war funds, may not as a matter of fact be for war funds but for the benefit of individuals. The Bill has a further object the placing of the organizations in this country which are appealing to the public for contributions in respect of war charities, within the knowledge of the Government. This, I think, is a very necessary step.

In Great Britain they have an Act similar to this. It has been necessary since the outbreak of the war to cause these war charities to be registered. Otherwise, my hon. friend will, I think, admit that it may be that we will have organizations purporting to be raising money for the war and in reality raising money for themselves. My remarks, of course, would not apply to a great fund such as the Patriotic Fund or the Red Cross Fund to whom the minister will, as a matter of course, grant exemption from registration. But it is thought advisable by the Government that it should be aware of these organizations making appeals for funds, and, secondly, that the public should be protected, in so far as it is possible to protect them by a legislative enactment such as this, from frauds which may be practised upon them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has it come to the knowledge of the minister that there have been any frauds practised to any extent in Canada since the war broke out?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not to my personal knowledge. There have been brought to my attention certain frauds in connection with the administration of a particular fund.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The objection I see to this is that it seems to interfere with those spontaneous efforts which are made by people all over the country by means of which large amounts have been raised since the war began. I take it that it would apply to fêtes where the people are invited to join together and contribute and where they do contribute. These innocent opportunities of raising money have resulted in very considerable sums being contributed. If it is proposed to prevent affairs of that kind without registering and obtaining the authority of the minister, it is going to interfere to a very considerable extent with those splendid spontaneous efforts which the people have been making since the war began.

Mr. NESBITT: I personally agree with the objects of the Bill because I think it is wise that there should be some regulation of these various charities that are gotten up. I suppose that organizations like the Daughters of the Empire and the Red Cross could be exempted as a whole and action would not be necessary for each particular section to secure exemption. Nearly all the charities are gotten up under the auspices of the Red Cross or the Daughters of the Empire. I suppose it will not interfere with any particular section acting under the association. It would appear to me as if the intent of the Bill is good if it does not interfere with that sort of organization. In reading it over, I do not see that it does.

Mr. MACDONALD: It must be conceded that since the war began there have been several instances where it would have been desirable if Government supervision or regulation had occurred. At the beginning of the war some very enthusiastic person started to raise a fund to buy hospital ships. After this movement had gone along for awhile it was discovered that it was all nonsense, that there was no necessity for a hospital ship. The whole thing was the inspiration of some very worthy person who thought it would be a good idea. Then we had the idea propagated all over the country of getting up a subscription for machine guns. The newspapers proceeded on this question, and demands were made upon the public. Everybody who suggested that this was a matter that the Government ought to deal with, just as much as the supply of rifles, was pilloried as disloyal and guilty of all sorts of crimes and misdemeanours. A tremendous amount of money was collected all over the country and sent in to Ottawa and every now and then you hear of some municipality which wants to know what has become of the money. These movements were promoted by a species of hysteria, and that is what actuates similar efforts in a great many cases. It is a step in the right direction if the Bill is intended to prevent things of that kind. But when you say that:

> It shall not be lawful to make any appeal to the public for donations or subscriptions in money or in kind for any war charity as hereinbefore defined, or to raise or attempt to raise money for any such war charity by promoting any bazaar, sale, entertainment or exhibition, or by any similar means——unless the charity is exempt from registration or registration takes place under the Act, you are going too far. In my own part of the country, where battalions have been formed we have had the wives and relatives of the boys holding entertainments and making appeals to provide comforts for them and help them along. There was a Highland battalion raised in our province, the distinctive mark of which was the wearing of a feather in the bonnet, and in consequence of that the Blue Feather Club was organized. In every hamlet and village from which a few boys had gone they had entertainments and gatherings for the purpose of raising money. That is a sentiment that you could not interfere with, but it will be an absolute prohibitive thing to say to a number of people in a small place who want to get together to do something for the men who have gone to the front that they would be liable to a penalty unless they registered. Are a few people in some distant part of the Dominion, who desire to meet together for that purpose, to be held up until they apply to Ottawa to be registered or to secure permission to hold their entertainments? I do not know who is responsible for the drafting of them, but a great many of the Bills which have been presented to this House in the last week or two are Bills which require a great deal of changing before they can be deemed to be fit or proper legislation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Might I call my hon. friend's attention to the definition of the word "charity" which I think he has overlooked?

Mr. MACDONALD: The remarks I made were made in view of the definition of "war charities."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It means any fund, institution or association.

Mr. MACDONALD: I will give you an illustration of the trouble we will have in Nova Scotia over the Blue Feather Club or the Red Feather Club. Technically, it would seem to be a club organized for the purpose of raising money, and it would come within the meaning of the Act. This measure is not well drafted. We know what the intention is in so far as it concerns the idea of regulating the inauguration of wholesale funds which are the development of some idea not based upon any proper consideration of the whole circumstances. That is one thing. That is what I think is the intent of the Act. But, we do not want every pie social and tea fight in the Dominion to be deemed illegal unless the promoters of those entertainments obtain registration under this Act. Yet, that is the way the Bill is drawn. Take the Bill in regard to the War-Time Elections Act which was introduced yesterday. I do not hesitate to say that that proposed legislation, in the way it is drafted and presented to the House, is a disgrace to the man who wrote it, considered as a piece of parliamentary drafting. It presents an elaboration of all the language which can be applied to create the greatest possible difficulty. The whole Bill ought to redrafted in order to get at the real intent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend that this Act applies to every local attempt to raise money, owing to the definition of war charities. The definition is:

> Any fund, institution or association, whether established before or after the commencement of this Act, having for its object or among its objects the relief of suffering or distress, or the supplying of needs or comforts to sufferers from the war, or to soldiers, returned soldiers or their families or dependents, or any other charitable purpose connected with the present European war.

By section 4, provision is made for local registration so that even in the case he mentions no difficulty would arise. The measure, I think, is in the public interest. I am informed that frauds have been perpetrated upon the public by appeals in aid of war charities, and there would seem to be no objection to the principle of the Bill. The minister is authorized to exempt any war charity from registration under the Act. That will save all the well-known funds and associations. Then a simple method is provided for registration locally so as to avoid difficulty to these associations of a minor character which are making local appeals in aid of war charities.

Mr. MARCIL: What does the minister mean by local registration? Is it registration with the registrar or municipal authorities? In my constituency there are ladies' clubs which hold entertainments and so on and send parcels to the boys at the front. Would an organization of that kind come under this Bill?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If it is an association having certain definite objects as mentioned in section 2, it would. No difficulty could arise, because the minister could exempt that organization from registration under the Act. By section 4, the minister can appoint a local committee to attend to local registration. I do not apprehend any serious difficulty in connection with these associations which are bona fide carrying on the work of raising money or rendering assistance to war charities. The object of the Bill is to protect the public against associations which are not bona fide appealing to public sympathy. In framing an Act to protect the public in this way it is necessary to deal generally with associations making such appeals.

Mr. PARDEE: Does the minister not think that the churches would come under the definition of association?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A church is not an association.

Mr. PARDEE: It is an institution. In fact I think it comes under both terms. Will it be necessary for each church to register or will the churches be subject to the penalty of $500 fine if they do not register? Supposing a church gives a large social purely for war purposes, under what section would it be exempt?

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because of the definition of war purposes.

Mr. PARDEE: That is it is not formed for that purpose?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Therefore it is not a charity.

Mr. PARDEE: I think that the framer of the Bill had something of this in mind, because on page 2 we have the section:

This section shall not apply to any collection at Divine service in a place of public worship.

Then what about the other collections of the church?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend, because certainly it is not the object of the church "to relieve suffering or distress——

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh yes it is.

Mr. McCRANEY: What church do you go to?

Sir THOMAS WHITE—"or the suffering of needs or comforts to sufferers from the war, or to returned soldiers and so on, or to any other charitable purpose connected with the present European war." That is not the object of the church.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The church does that incidentally, but that is not the object of the church; and if a church which is organized for other objects incidentally assists in connection with the war, I should say that this Act does not apply to it.

Mr. GLASS: Nothing can more generally discourage public charity than frauds perpetrated upon the public in connection with charity, and experience during this war has shown that there have been occasions when unscrupulous organizations and people have made collections to defraud the public. I rather agree with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that this Bill, as drafted, does not nearly cover the objects intended. I do not deny that the objects in view are desirable and in some senses necessary, but the point raised by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) was in my mind before he spoke, that the very fact that, in subsection 2 of section 3, provision is made to exempt collections made at divine service, would seem to indicate that other collections by the church would not be exempted. It speaks of any fund, and it would seem that a fund collected by a church and set aside especially for the purpose of war charity would be covered by the Act, and that registration would be necessary. My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has referred to such organizations as the Daughters of the Empire and others of a national character, which are recognized as responsible and whose energy throughout the whole of this war is greatly to be commended. Amendments might be made which would greatly improve the Bill in respect to such matters as have just been referred to, so that it should not apply to such organizations as the Daughters of the Empire, or to funds raised under the direction of a church organization.

I think it would put the churches to unnecessary trouble, and would, to some extent, retard voluntary efforts in charities, even if registration were necessary, or legal dispensation, or whatever might be provided. I think, generally speaking, organization for charities of this kind, where they are under the direct control of the church or under the direct control of some national organization such as the Daughters of the Empire, might be defined rigidly, and recognized branches of a national order of that kind might be properly defined. Notwithstanding that, I think we must admit that there is a real necessity for putting some curb on the efforts of unscrupulous individuals to collect funds from the public, presumably for purposes of war charities, and yet directly for the purpose of defrauding the public. I think the Bill, with the object it has in view is desirable, but I think it is crudely drawn to cover these objects, and would be a very troublesome Bill to administer. It might be amended in committee to cover the necessities of the case. In its present shape, I do not think it meets the requirements of the country.

Mr. GRAHAM: It may be that, in a measure, I should assume some responsibility for the introduction of this Bill, because in the discussion I think, of the taxation proposals I made the statement that there ought to be some regulation of the various appeals to the people. It appeared that too many people were passing the hat, and that all the good was not accomplished that might be accomplished by constant appeals to the people for a little subscription to this and a little subscription to that, some contributors who might give large amounts being satisfied with giving but very little to minor subscriptions. I agree with a good deal that has been said, and I do not know the legal effect of the Bill, but there should be some measure of this kind, because I think it is, perhaps, more necessary this year than in former years. All the money we can raise should be devoted to the exact purpose for which the people intended it, namely, to carry on our charities, as well as our taxation contribution. There is a class of people—and they flourish very well under present conditions—who make a living by proposing to some of the local organizations to get up an entertainment for some purpose. The promoter of the entertainment will perhaps get 50 per cent and the local people 50 per cent, but the local people will pay the expenses.

Mr. NESBITT: Sixty—forty.

Mr. GRAHAM: The whole population takes part day after day, and night after night, and spend a lot of money privately getting ready for these things, with the result that when the returns come in the promoter gets $500, the expenses are $300 and the charity receives perhaps $200. These things should be submitted to some authority to say what the terms are to be, and the conditions under which these entertainments are carried on, so that the people who contribute largely from the goodness of their heart, believing the money will go into some public good, will know that, outside of regular ordinary legitimate expenses, the money will go for the purposes to which they contributed it. I am in hearty accord with the purposes of the Bill, and I leave it to the legal gentlemen to get it in proper shape.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Subsection (b) of section 2 provides that any question as to whether a charity is a war charity shall be finally determined by the minister.

Mr. MACDONALD: I should like to find a precedent for putting in the interpretation clause the words "any question whether a charity is a charity shall be finally determined by the minister."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is in the Customs Act, and in certain of our taxation Acts. Such a question is often left to the minister, who is responsible to the Government, and the Government is responsible to the public, and no impropriety or irregularity is likely to result. It is difficult to specifically define by legislation what a war charity is. In order to prevent any hardship it is provided that the matter is finally left to the discretion of the minister. If a question arises as to whether a church is an association coming within subsection (b) of section 2, it is for the minister to determine. My own view would be that, so far as the ordinary denominations are concerned, no question can arise. The minister would determine whether or not they were organizations having for their object the matters mentioned in this subsection. It might occur that an association calling itself a church was collecting money improperly, and I think it should be for the minister to determine, in that case, whether it came under this Act or not. I think the House should assume that it would not be the object of the Government to make this Act an engine of oppression against these associations that are engaged in the laudable and most meritorious work of assisting sufferers in this war. But the Act would be administered in such a way as to prevent fraud, and at the same time not to retard the beneficial work of the Red Cross, Patriotic Fund, and the churches engaged in such charitable work and honestly administering any funds coming into their possession. If the House is to assume the minister will use this in some way oppressively, we could make an amendment to the Bill, but with the decision left in the hands of the minister, I think there would be no difficulty in working it out.

Mr. MACDONALD: This interpretation clause, which is the key note of the whole Act, is intended to deal with money which is used for the purpose of giving relief to those in suffering or in distress, or the supplying of needs or comforts to sufferers from the war, or to soldiers, returned soldiers, or their families or dependents, or any other charitable purpose connected with the present European war.

Moreover, the Bill leaves out of consideration the men who have enlisted in the Naval Service. Does the minister not think that the word "charity" is not a happy word to use in connection with work of this kind done for the soldiers?

Mr. NICKLE: "Benevolence" would be a better word.

Mr. MACDONALD: I object to the use of the word "charity" as descriptive of the work of organizations the object of which is to supply comforts to the soldiers. The people who do this work have not in their mind any idea of charity. This interpretation clause does not go far enough. It ought to provide that any fund organized in connection with war purposes should be subject to regulation and control. You do not need to regulate organizations whose members send socks and other comforts to the soldiers; you need to regulate the activities of men and women who decide to get up new funds for purposes alleged to be in connection with the war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think the word "fund" would cover that.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, it would not. The interpretation clause is intended to regulate the activities of people whose work does not need any regulation. The persons who need regulation are those who say: We want to get up a fund to build a ship, present a gun—something of that kind, which has nothing to do with supplying needs or comforts to soldiers on service or returned soldiers.

Mr. NESBITT: I agree with my hon. friend in so far as his remarks relate to the raising of funds for ships and that kind of thing, but I do not agree that we should not regulate the so-called charitable organizations operated by people who collect subscriptions from individuals. We ought to control their activities in some way; I think that this Bill does cover such cases.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Subsection 2 of section 3 of this Bill provides:

> This section shall not apply to any collection at divine service in a place of public worship.

This shows that all other work done by a church in the way of so-called war charities comes under the provisions of this Bill. The word "institution," therefore, as contained in the definition clause, is intended to include religious denominations.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Assuming that that is so—though I do not agree with my hon. friend—it does not appear to me that churches should be specially exempted. I stated some time ago that so far as ordinary denominations were concerned, I could not conceive how any question could arise; any fund that they would institute would be honestly and properly administered. But an association connected with some church might not so make its appeal or administer money raised; consequently I see no objection to bringing churches within the purview of the Act. The minister may exempt any war charity from registration under the Act. He may exempt, for example, the Presbyterian Church, the Methodist Church, the Roman Catholic Church, just as he can exempt the Red Cross or the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does the minister say about that very worthy body, the Salvation Army? Suppose they held a concert for the relief of returned soldiers; would they come within this definition?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no hesitation in saying that the minister would exempt them if necessary, because they are, as my hon. friend has said, a worthy body.

Mr. McKENZIE: They should not—nor should any religious body of that kind—be left open to prosecution.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will look at section 10, subsection 2, he will find the following:

> Proceedings for offences against this Act, other than offences against section nine, shall not be instituted except with the consent of the minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Surely you would not want a clergyman to be liable to imprisonment.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is raising many bogeys in connection with this legislation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is so absurd in some respects.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend. Nearly all legislation that is introduced is absurd to him, so that he may not be surprised if I do not take his view as to what is absurd or what is not absurd.

Mr PUGSLEY: An hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, who spoke very clearly on the subject, came pretty near to calling this Bill as drafted an absurd one.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. gentleman did not use the word "absurd." He argued the matter very temperately; I think that he had not read the Bill through.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should this Bill not be entitled: An Act relating to War Collections?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The whole Bill would have to be redrafted in that case.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think that the description "war charities" is unfortunate. Provision ought to be made in the definition clause for the application of the Act to sailors. The word "charitable" should be struck out. The minister would then have power to deal with organizations or individuals collecting money for any purpose connected with the European war. If the word "collection" were used, or some other appropriate word, the Bill would be in much better shape.

Mr. MARCIL: I support the view of the hon. member for Pictou. I have had an opportunity on certain occasions of addressing public meetings in support of the Patriotic Fund, and I have always impressed upon my hearers that anything we were giving to the soldier or his family was not to be considered in the light of charity, but that it was well earned and well deserved on account of the services the soldier was performing for his country. The soldiers themselves would not be pleased to hear that any organization was extending "charity" to them. The word is badly chosen.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is an objection to applying the word "charity" to assistance given to our soldiers. This Bill goes much further—it refers to the relief of suffering, of distress, or the supplying of needs or comforts to sufferers from the war. It applies to the raising of money, for sufferers in Belgium, and that is clearly a charity. This Bill applies to appeals of which there are many in this country. The Red Cross Fund——

Mr. MACDONALD: That is not charity.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would apply to the Red Cross Fund whose operations extend to all the countries of the Allies; it would apply, for instance, to appeals for the orphans of Serbia, Poland, or Russia.

Mr. MARCIL: The Armenians.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would apply to appeals on behalf of Armenians. Clearly, there is no better term than the word "charity" in that connection. The assistance we give to our soldiers from the Patriotic Fund, of course, should not be regarded as charity. The word "charity," however, is a good English word, properly applicable to an organization the object of which is to relieve sufferers in distress, let us say, in Belgium, Armenia, Poland, or any other country. It is only playing upon words to object to the term.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Finance took objection to the use of the word "absurd" by which I characterized a portion of this Bill. The minister will remember that I was dealing with the section which provides for a penalty, and it was intimated that a clergyman or the officer of a church, might be liable. The minister stated there would be no difficulty about that because there could be no prosecution without the consent of the Secretary of State. I said that it was absurd to say that would be a satisfactory provision. That is what I meant. When one takes the ground that a clergyman or the officers of a church might be liable under this measure because the organization not being registered some money was being solicited for the Red Cross work or for the Patriotic Fund or for any other work connected with the war, is it not absurd to say that no harm would be done because such persons could not be prosecuted without the consent of the Secretary of State? Under such circumstances a clergyman or the officers of the church might be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding three months. In other words, the man would become a criminal under the statute, but he could not be prosecuted without the consent of the Secretary of State. That would be an unenviable position in which to place a clergyman or an officer of a church who sought to do his part in regard to the collection of contributions for war purposes. I do not hesitate to repeat what I said, namely, that the Bill has not been properly drafted to meet the evil which it has been suggested is the reason for it. The Minister of Finance when he first spoke on the Bill, said that it was not intended to include churches——

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is my view.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —because, he said, a church was not an institution. Yet when we come to section 3 of the Bill, we find that the work a church may do without being registered is limited to one thing, that is to say, money may be collected at Divine service in a place of public worship and the church would not be liable because it was not registered, but all other war charity work which its members may carry on would be illegal and would render the clergymen and officers of the church liable to a penalty of $500 or imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding three months. That shows very clearly, no matter what the Minister of Finance may think, that the draughtsman had in mind that a church would be an institution within the meaning of paragraph (b) of section 2. That is absolutely clear by virtue of the limitation contained in section 3.

Mr. NICKLE: It was only a day or two ago that I was speaking to one of the leading representatives of the Great War Veterans Association, and he was urging upon me that steps should be taken by this House to pass some Bill along the line of the measure now under consideration. He said that certain people throughout this country were taking advantages of the sympathies the people had with returned soldiers to make collections under the guise or allegation that the money was to be spent on behalf of the men who had returned or who had been injured. He urged that steps should be taken immediately to prevent what he thought was a growing grievance. There are none of us who are not aware of the fact that from one end of the country to the other, there has been a great deal of money very unwisely collected, although I must readily admit that the spontaneous response of the people to requests that merit consideration has been most commendable. If I understand the object of this Bill, it does not purport to deal with collections on behalf of what one might call war purposes; it simply deals with collections for charitable purposes. It does not include collections for field kitchens or machine guns for our troops.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should it not?

Mr. NICKLE: The object of this Bill is to deal with war charities or war benevolence; it in no way deals with the collection of money for war purposes. I do not think my hon. friend opposite is sincere in his objection that under this Bill any honest person who collects without having the authority stipulated for in this Bill would be considered a criminal. Surely, if some minister, in his zeal, but without knowledge of this Bill assuming that it should become law, were to institute a collection, no one for a moment would think of considering him a criminal.

Mr. MACDONALD: Suppose a minister started a fund and he has certain members in his congregation who did not approve of it—that has often occurred and more hostility is aroused in churches that way than in anything else—an opportunity might be given to malcontents to have the minister prosecuted.

Mr. NICKLE: If my hon. friend were the Secretary of State he would say there should be no prosecution.

Mr. MACDONALD: At the same time the church would be torn asunder on the question as to whether the minister were guilty or innocent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Should a man's guilt or innocence depend on the whim of the Secretary of State?

Mr. NICKLE: His guilt or innocence does not depend upon the whim of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State decides whether there shall be a prosecution. Whether we can improve the Act by changing a word here and there is a matter for consideration. No man who has been close to war collections throughout this country can fail to appreciate that the time has come when there should be some regulation and control of those collections, and that the Government being the responsible authority should take cognizance of and give sanction to those collections before they are made.

Mr. OLIVER: I am very much in sympathy with the stated object of the Bill, and very much in sympathy with the statement just made by my hon. friend (Mr. Nickle). The difficulty is that the Bill is not in accordance with his statement. Either the Bill should require the registration of all effort towards war charity, or it should not require such registration. Subsection 1 provides for registration, and provides for no registration. I do not know at all what the next succeeding subsection provides for. If the Government thinks it wise to put a limitation upon collections for war charities, let them say so, and let them provide for that registration, but do not let them say in one breath "you must register," and in the next breath, or in fact in the same breath say "you need not register." Let us have an understanding that there will be a fair deal in this matter, so that there may not be two organizations of benevolent people in a certain place, one securing the authority of the minister, and the other failing to do so. I think we should have some definite statement of what the Government means.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Bill speaks for itself.

Mr. OLIVER: But, as I read the Bill, it does not give me any indication of what the Government is going to do in any particular case. I submit it is not legislation which is worthy of this House or of the Government. There is no reason why the time of the House should be taken up by the discussion of a Bill of this character. The Government has ample power under the War Measures Act to make regulations covering this point, and there is no reason why that should not be done. I cannot understand why the Government should come to Parliament with a Bill of this kind. I want to ask in regard to a specific matter. Some time ago I had the honour of bringing to the attention of the House the operations of a gentleman named Merritt, who is collecting ostensibly for the supplying of aeroplanes to the Imperial authorities. I would like to know if the Government has any knowledge of this gentleman's operations, and if they are such as would be subject to registration under this Bill, and if the Government would give them registration.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The question with reference to Colonel Merritt was asked yesterday. Colonel Merritt has certain views as to the advisability of building aeroplanes in Canada and presenting them to the Imperial Government. In conjunction with others who hold the same views he is attempting to raise money for the building of those aeroplanes. If he and others, men of wealth and of substance, consider it is a wise thing to do, and are willing to put their money into it, it is perfectly legitimate for them to do so. Colonel Merritt also had the idea that the Government might make a certain contribution towards this purpose, either by giving a number of aeroplanes, or in such other way as they might consider advisable. After discussing the matter with him, the Government came to the conclusion that their burdens in munitioning and equipping for war were quite as great as they could handle and they did not think it was their part to assist in helping to make this presentation of aeroplanes to the Imperial authorities. That is where the matter rests.

Mr. OLIVER: That is a very definite instance in point. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has made a very clear statement in regard to this matter, and I desire to ask the Minister of Finance if this enterprise of Colonel Merritt's is such as would require to be registered under this Bill.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, because it is not a war charity.

Mr. OLIVER: If the securing of aeroplanes for presentation to the Government is not a war charity, I am at a loss to understand the meaning of words.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A war charity has for its object or among its objects the relief of suffering or distress or the supplying of needs or comforts to sufferers from the war, or to soldiers, returned soldiers, or their families or dependents, or any other charitable purpose connected with the present European war. The object of Colonel Merritt does not come under the definition of "charitable" as set forth in the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: "Any other charitable purpose" would surely cover the contribution of aeroplanes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. There is a rule of law that would apply there.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister is legislating on the subject at all, does he not think he should legislate so that the Government would exercise some supervision over an enterprise such as colonel Merritt's which may be a very worthy one indeed. Colonel Merritt's scheme is a necessary and wise one, or forms part of the necessary preparation for the conduct of the war, why should not the Government itself take the initiative in it? The fact that nothing has been done is only an evidence of lack of understanding and neglect on the part of the Government in dealing with this whole war problem. The Government simply says: "If some gentleman outside wants to go ahead and do this thing, we do not propose to interfere with him." It simply stands aside with dilettante indifference, and does not regulate it or express any opinion about it, but if somebody wants to get up a pie social, away in the backwoods, in order to provide socks for the soldiers, the Government will regulate that. I instanced the case of the hospital ship. Every one knows it was a most tremendous farce that this whole country should be appealed to to give money for a hospital ship which was not needed and for which there was no place. The same thing applies to the machine guns. If aeroplanes are needed, why should not the Government undertake the supplying of them? This seems so elementary that I am surprised the Government does not see it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This Bill simply covers war charities. It does not go any further than that. Whether another Bill should be brought in dealing with the question to which my hon. friend refers, or whether that matter if dealt with at all should be dealt with under the War Measures Act, is not now before the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not familiar with the evils to the country which necessitated the bringing forward of this Bill. In the part of Canada from which I come we have very active associations in connection with matters which this Bill would call, I suppose, war charities. Everything that could be done in the way of Red Cross associations, and for the benefit of our soldiers, has engaged our attention from the commencement of the war. I never heard of any abuses in regard to the moneys so collected, and I am more or less at a loss to know why it was necessary to bring forward legislation of this kind.

Perhaps the minister has given some instances of abuse which this Parliament should legislate to curb and, if possible, to prevent. It is with a condition of this kind that we have to deal, I presume, when we enact a criminal law such as this is; if there are any abuses in connection with the moneys that are collected we have the criminal law. We are not confined to the Criminal Code but the criminal common law of England is in force here, we had it in force before the code was enacted and it is still in force where the code does not apply. If any person takes money collected for the purposes of the war, or for the soldiers, and applies it to something else, he must have received the money under false pretenses. Suppose he puts on an entertainment which he says is for the purpose of getting money for the soldiers and suppose, after he gets that money, he applies it to some purpose of his own; that is a criminal offence under the provision of our Criminal Code which says that if he receives money under false pretenses he is subject to be dealt with under the code. If he intended at the time he gave the entertainment to apply the money properly and afterwards changed his mind and used it for something else, he is guilty of theft. I make these statements as a lawyer of some age and experience. Any body of individuals engaging in a proceeding of that kind is open to prosecution if any person chooses to lay an information against it. When we have a condition of that kind, and when we have a law well understood, it seems to me that we are putting in an extra wheel here which rather complicates matters and makes it very difficult to deal with such a condition. It is almost impossible to make a safe definition. We have all these definitions in the law which have gone through the mill a thousand times, almost every word of which has received judicial interpretation, and it is rather dangerous to be starting out anew upon sidetracks of this kind. Under section 3, if any person gives an entertainment of any kind, he is liable. I attended a Sunday school entertainment not very long ago where the teachers and pupils got together and had lantern slides. That innocent entertainment of the Sunday school was for the purpose of getting money to buy boxes of stuff they were sending across to the soldiers. Under this law the Sunday school teachers who gave that innocent entertainment are subject to prosecution, and every person who took a hand in it may be imprisoned for three months in the county jail or may have to pay a fine not exceeding $500. It seems to me that we are putting a ponderous piece of machinery in motion to meet evils that are largely imaginary as far as I know, having regard to the province from which I come. I have not heard a murmur anywhere about the misapplication of any funds that were collected. I submit that this is introducing a new element that is capable of abuse. It will retard the holding of these useful entertainments and discourage the very proper efforts that are being put forth. You might frighten people by telling them that after this Act is passed, if they do anything of this kind, they are subject to prosecution. It is useless to say: They may start to prosecute you, but the Secretary of State can stop it. I think this is absolutely a work of supererogation, and that it is applying criminal legislation where there is no necessity for it and applying it in a dangerous way, the far-reaching effect of which has not been properly comprehended.

Mr. GLASS: I cannot agree with my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) that because the Criminal Code provides for the punishment of individuals who may defraud the public in this way, the Criminal Code can be entirely relied upon to meet the needs of every case that may arise. An organization may be promulgated to collect a certain fund for a purpose which might come under this Act. The collections might spread over considerable time. While the Criminal Code provides that punishment may be meted out to those who are responsible for a fraud, it certainly is a deterrent to voluntary charity to know that the law will permit such fraud to be perpetrated before it can be dealt with. We have discussed this Bill all afternoon, and I take it from the statements which have appeared in the press and otherwise that the general consensus of opinion is that it is desirable. We have had from the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) the opinion that under clause 2, churches may be exempt. I cannot see why it is necessary in so much legislation to adopt the cross-eyed method of not saying what you mean or meaning what you say. If the minister thinks that churches are exempt under this, why not remove the ambiguity and make it clear?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. GLASS: The minister does not think the Bill perfect. It comes from the Senate and from the discussion this afternoon it is evident that we are not all of the opinion that it is as it should be. In its present form it will be cumbersome and troublesome to the great church organizations of this country. I respectfully ask the minister why, if churches are not to be included, an exception in their case should not be inserted in subsection (b), perhaps by adding " excepting churches or church organizations." I presume that a church organization would cover the Salvation Army. Would that not meet many of the objections? The churches should not have to apply to the Secretary of State, and the minister should exempt the churches and such comprehensive organizations throughout Canada. Why can we not put that exemption right in the Bill, and so fix it once for all and avoid any ambiguity or doubt?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no objection to doing it. My own view is that the Bill does not apply to churches, for the reason I mentioned, but if there is any doubt the matter could be dealt with by inserting the words " other than churches " after the word " association." But just as soon as you begin to limit you raise difficulties. That is almost a maxim of drafting. I would suggest that section 2 be allowed to stand.

Mr. McKENZIE: I object to this. No doubt the minister is preparing for closure.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I am not; not on this Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: I object to allowing any basis for closure, and I think this section should be disposed of.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This motion to stand is a very dangerous motion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall consider whether it is necessary to make an amendment to exclude churches, which I think is the intention of the measure.

Mr. MACDONALD: I was going to suggest that the words " war contribution " should be used instead of " war charity," and that subsection (b) of section 2 should be amended by substituting " contribution " for " charity " in the 11th line, and that the 17th line should be amended by striking out the word " charitable " so as to give jurisdiction over associations formed for any other purpose. My hon. friend would get jurisdiction over all funds in that way.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it the intention that before commencing, say, a bazaar to collect money for war purposes, application should be made to the minister and a permit secured? It says that the final determination as to whether anything is for war purposes should be made by the minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Only a fund, institution or association established for the purposes mentioned in (b) would have to obtain registration before it could promote a bazaar. All promoters of bazaars or other entertainments would not be liable. Then by subsection 4 provision is made for local registration, so that no hardship could result in any case.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) suggests using the word "contribution" instead of "charity." He has not read the section carefully. Charity has two meanings; sometimes it is used as in this Act in the sense of the organization that is engaged in charitable work. You often speak of organizing a charity. That is derivative, because the objects of the association are charitable. But we call the organization itself a charity. It is the organization that is called a charity here.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister wants to define charity, Paul has given a very full definition, and I would warn the minister not to conflict with what is so well understood and so well defined by Paul.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does Paul say?

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister will learn.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Charity begins at home.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not exactly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We had better not introduce Paul into this assembly. I am afraid he would feel strangely out of place in association with the hon. member for Cape Breton. The suggestion of the hon. member for Pictou does not appeal to me, for the reason that the word "charity" is here used for the organization, and to substitute the word "contribution" would not meet the case, whereas the word "contribution" might in some cases be almost synonymous with "charity" in one sense of the meaning, it would not meet this case where the word applied to an organization. Personally, I think that most of the objections to the Bill are rather fanciful. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has referred to the criminal law. The criminal law is useful to obtain punishment of offenders after offences have been committed. The object of this legislation is to prevent the commission of the offence. My hon. friend's suggestion is to lock the door after the horse is stolen. Our object is to prevent the stealing of the horse.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the purpose to prevent the collection of the money, or to prevent the improper diversion of it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To prevent improper organizations attempting to collect, and also to prevent diversion of the money. In the first place, if application is made to the minister by an organization as to which he is dubious, he would make inquiries under the provisions of the Act, and probably, if he came to the conclusion the organization was not one which should be allowed to appeal for funds, he would not grant registration. It is entirely in the judgment of the minister to say whether he will grant registration or exemption from registration. It seems to me the Act is hedged about by every safeguard that can be suggested.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems to me there could be no improper organizations that collect for war charities. The only impropriety that could possibly occur is that the money might not be sent to the war charities. It is inconceivable that there could be any impropriety in collecting money for a war charity.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It depends upon the intention.

Mr. OLIVER: If the money is collected for a war charity there is by no possibility, any impropriety in that act. The only impropriety that can be connected with it is that the money, after being collected, is diverted from the charity. It seems to me that is a point the Government might very well have concentrated its attention upon; but in undertaking to pass judgment on the good intentions of any man or woman or set of men or women who are undertaking a project that of itself is essentially and necessarily good, he is certainly taking a very serious responsibility, and however much confidence my hon. friend has in the omniscience of the Secretary of State I have not the same confidence in his omniscience to foresee what the intent of any body of men or women is when they are undertaking to do what is a laudable and legitimate act.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend speaks of a laudable and legitimate act.

The question of intention is of importance in that connection. Let us assume that some person, designing fraud upon a community, forms an association to appeal to the public for the charitable purposes mentioned in this Act. Will my hon. friend say that enterprise is laudable? Does not the question of intention count. The purpose of this Bill is to prevent organizations of that character appealing to the public throughout Canada. In that way, if the Act is carried out, only those organizations that have official sanction through registration, in other words proper organization, will be allowed to appeal to the public, whose sympathies can be enlisted readily in any project that promises aid to sufferers during this war. If hon. gentlemen desire to take up time discussing the Bill, I am willing to sit and listen, but I must confess that the arguments put forward by hon. members do not appear to me to be well founded, if the principle of the Bill is sound, namely that it is the duty of the public in war time to protect the public from appeals to their sympathy that may be made by parties who are not disinterested, but who are seeking to promote their own advantage, and to divert funds which were raised for certain worthy purpose to other purposes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not know just how far the Act goes, and I desire information. I know that a great many lectures were given on the prairies this year, in towns where there was no Red Cross and no organization of any kind. I gave quite a number myself. Collections were taken up at these entertainments, and were sent to the nearest Red Cross or Patriotic Fund, or devoted to purposes as the local people thought fit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would be liable to a fine of $500, under this Bill if they were not registered.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister does not intend taking action against these people, and I am satisfied no person will make trouble for them. But it is not wise to enact laws that will, even in a good cause, be broken. It is quite a common thing for young people on the prairies to have their evening entertainment. They dance at these places, and charge a fee each evening to those who dance, and, after all the expenses are paid, the money goes to charitable purposes. They sometimes make $60 and $70 a night, and they send it to Moosejaw or Regina as the case may be. A large amount of money has been contributed in that way. I remember a Conservative candidate in the provincial election in Saskatchewan could not get an audience, and he announced that there would be a dance, and basket social for the Red Cross. They held the meeting, had the dance, held an auction, and sold off the baskets. They got $150, and they had the time of their lives getting the $150 from the Conservative gentleman, who held the bag with the money. However, that was not the fault of the association. Perhaps the hon. minister will make provision to prevent cases of that kind occurring. Will the minister say if these entertainments would be prohibited by the Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would say that is not an association having for its object the purposes mentioned in this Bill. This measure would not prevent parties getting up social or other entertainments, on certain occasions.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The difficulty is that the Bill does this extraordinary thing: it mixes up the money that is raised with the institution that raises it. Charity is defined to be a fund, an institution, or an association. Therefore, under this, a church organization is a charity within the meaning of the Act, and a temperance organization is a charity. The individual fund becomes a charity. It seems to me the Act ought to define charity to be the fund which is raised. Let that be the charity, and let the organization be entirely separate and distinct from that. One of the difficulties about this Bill is the confusion caused by the minister attempting to give one meaning both to the money which is raised and to the institution which raises it. You cannot do that, and make a satisfactory Bill. That is the reason why my hon. friend cannot accept the amendment of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that the title of the Bill should be "An Act relating to War Contributions." It would be very much better to use the words "War Charities," and to define war charities to mean the funds which are raised for the objects to which the money may be devoted. Let the institutions be an entirely different thing. Then I would exempt churches. and generally religious organizations. There is no reason in the world why they should be compelled to register.

It would be unwise to place the pastor or other officials of a church who raise money for the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross Fund, or for other war purposes, in the position of criminals simply because they fail to obtain registration. The member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) mentioned a case that has occurred frequently and that will occur very often in the future: people hold public meetings and collections are taken up for charitable purposes. If in such cases no registration is made, a criminal offence is committed and the persons in charge of the meeting are liable to a penalty not exceeding $500 or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with my hon. friend in that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The gentleman who drafted the Bill seemed to think that that would be the result, because he specially exempts collections made at churches during divine service. The fair inference is that the meaning of the draftsman was —I am satisfied that this would be the meaning attached to the Act by any court —that except in cases where collection was made during divine service, persons making collections for these purposes without registration would be criminally liable under this statute. It is true that they could not be prosecuted without the consent of the minister, but it is one thing to be amenable to the criminal law and another to be saved from prosecution through the kindness or the sympathy of the minister. I do not think that any person should become criminally liable for acts which are thoroughly laudable in their character and which should be praised instead of being punished. The minister ought to do as suggested by the amendment of the member for Pictou: make this Act relate to war contributions. Give a definition to war contributions; do not mix up the contribution with the organization which may be the means of collecting the money. I think also that the hon. gentleman should accept the reasonable suggestion of the member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass). All members of the committee will give full credit to the member for East Middlesex for a desire to make the Bill as perfect as possible. If the minister will accept these suggestions, I am sure that he will in the end have a statute which will bring about the desired object. If he insists on the Bill going through in its present form, a good deal of confusion will result; many people will find themselves in the class of criminal offenders, although their sole object may have been to do their best in the way of collecting money for charitable purposes connected with the war.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: One reason why I find myself unable to accept the suggestions of the member for Pictou and the member for St. John that the Act should apply to contributions and not to charities, is that such an amendment would change the entire purpose of the Act. This Act is not directed at contributions; it is to regulate organizations appealing for contributions, and to these organizations the general name "charities" is given, because their objects are charitable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the Bill is intended to apply to organizations, why is the word "fund" used? Surely a fund is very different from an organization.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is altogether too intelligent to be deceived for one moment by his own argument in that respect. He knows that the word "fund" has two meanings, just as the word "charity" has two meanings. A fund may relate to the money possessed by an organization; on the other hand, the organization may be called a fund. For example, The Patriotic Fund is the name of an organization; The Red Cross Fund is the name of an organization. Therefore there is no ambiguity in including the word "fund" in the term "War Charities." In this Act the organizations are dealt with, not the contributions which these organizations may obtain. We have had a wide, edifying, and somewhat desultory discussion of this Bill. One thing we have succeeded in doing: we have used up the time of the committee from 3.30 to 6—which may be a desirable thing to do at this time. It is not my intention to go on with this Bill this evening; I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. In the meantime, I shall be glad to consider whether the amendment suggested by the member for East Middlesex with regard to the matter of exemption to churches is necessary. Personally, I do not think it is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sorry, indeed, that the minister, in taking the very laudable step of asking the committee to rise in order that the amendments suggested, particularly that of the member for East Middlesex, may be considered, should have recurred to his habit of scolding the members of the committee. My hon. friend says that we have succeeded in occupying the time of the committee since half-past three. What are we consulted by the minister for? Why does he submit these Bills for our consideration? If my hon. friend feels that we are doing wrong in having any discussion of these matters, I suggest to him that he have the Rules of the House amended to provide that it shall not be necessary to submit Bills to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House; that they shall be passed at the pleasure and upon the dictum of the Government. In this way a great deal of time would be saved, and the will of the Government could be carried out to the satisfaction of my hon. friend.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is no doubt that time would be saved.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister should take that suggestion into consideration.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Committee of the Whole has its uses, and the member for St. John is able, as well as any member of the House, to bear an important and useful part in debate—when that is his object. Whether that was his object this afternoon when he was splitting hairs over the definition of the words "charities" and "fund," I leave to his own good judgment and to the judgment of the committee. Personally, I have no objection to any remarks that the hon. gentleman may make in regard to the Bill, but I do think a large portion of the afternoon was wasted in discussing matters that were not in the essence, so far as the Bill is concerned. On the other hand, some suggestions were made that are well worthy of consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand that section 2 is to stand, subject to the introduction of certain amendments?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Subject to consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: And some amendement is to be introduced, I understand?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Possibly.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then my hon. friend must have profited by the discussion this afternoon.

PRIVATE BILLS.

IMPERIAL ORDER DAUGHTERS OF THE EMPIRE AND THE CHILDREN OF THE EMPIRE (JUNIOR BRANCH).

The House resumed consideration of the message from the Senate disagreeing to the second amendment made by the House of Commons to Bill No. 95, to incorporate the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and the Children of the Empire (Junior Branch).—Mr. Steele.

Mr. STEELE: Perhaps a word of explanation regarding this Bill may be in order at the present time and necessary for a proper understanding of the situation. When this Bill first came before the Private Bills Committee we inserted in it an amendment such as we have, during the last two years, been putting into all similar Bills, an amendment calling for the taking over of all the property, assets, etc., of the former association or society before the new incorporation, which will supplant the old one, shall be allowed to do business. When the Bill went back to the Senate with that amendment and another included, the Senate refused to concur in the amendment. When the Bill came back to the House, the House referred it again to the Private Bills Committee. We deemed it of so much importance that we thought well to endeavour if possible to satisfy the Senate that this amendment was essential. I may point out that a similar clause is inserted in all charters issued under the Company's Act. After some consideration we adopted an amendment of the amendment which we believe and know is satisfactory to the promoters of the Bill and also to the Senate. I therefore move:

That this House doth insist on its second amendment to the Bill No. 95 (Letter C-2 of the Senate), intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and the Children of the Empire (Junior Branch)," for the reason: "That it is essential to provide that the provincial society, as such, shall cease to carry on its affairs when and so soon as this Bill becomes effective"; and doth amend the said amendment by inserting after the words "society," where it occurs the first time, the words "but nothing herein shall be deemed in any way to affect the rights in respect of any property, real or personal, of which any primary, municipal or provincial chapter may be possessed at the date of this Act," for the reason: "That it is desirable to avoid the possibility of any rights, as to property held by, or in trust for any of the subsidiary chapters being affected."

And that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

Mr. McCRANEY: Is the whole of the section which has been rejected by the Senate incorporated in the motion just moved?

Mr. STEELE: Yes, the whole amendment as we originally put it in the Bill is still in the Bill, but we amended it to clear up an objection of some of the members of the Daughters of the Empire representing local chapters. They thought the original amendment would permit the chief organization to interfere with property held by the local Chapters in trust.

Mr. McCRANEY: Then the additional amendment contained in my hon. friend's motion in addition to the section which was rejected by the Senate?

Mr. STEELE: Yes.

Mr. McCRANEY: Would my hon. friend be so good as to read the section rejected by the Senate as he now proposes amending it, because members have not before them the Bill as printed by the Commons.

Mr. STEELE: The section inserted in the Bill by the Private Bills Committee, to accomplish the purpose they had in view, was as follows:

> The Order shall acquire and take over all the existing assets, interests, rights, credits, effects and property, movable or immovable, held and enjoyed by the provincial society, and shall be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of the said provincial society, and except in so far as it may be necessary for the purposes of such transfer, the powers and authority vested in the Order under the provisions of this Act shall not be exercised or become effective until all the assets, interests, rights, credits, effects, property, obligations and liabilities of the said provincial society have been transferred to and assumed by the Order, and evidence of such transfer and assumption satisfactory to the Secretary of State of Canada has been filed with the said Secretary of State, and a statement to that effect has been published in the Canada Gazette by the said Secretary of State.

With the proposed amendment this section will read:

> The Order shall acquire and take over all the existing assets, interests, rights, credits, effects and property, movable and immovable, held and enjoyed by the provincial society, but nothing herein shall be deemed in any way to affect the rights in respect of any property real or personal, of which any primary, municipal or provincial chapter may be possessed at the date of this Act, and shall be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of the said provincial society,—

And so forth.

Mr. McCRANEY: Does that apply to provincial societies other than the one incorporated in the province of Ontario under the Revised Statutes?

Mr. STEELE: That will apply to all societies and all chapters. As a matter of fact, we believe the society incorporated under this Bill would have no right whatever to interfere with any of the properties held by the local chapters, but in order to satisfy some of the local chapters who object to this Bill, and to satisfy the Senate, we are willing to insert those words to make it perfectly clear that there would be no interference.

Mr. KNOWLES: Inasmuch as this is a new matter—I speak subject to correction—should it not go through the committee? As I understand the matter, in the Private Bills Committee, there was added to the Bill new matter which was not in the Bill as it received its second reading in this House. I do not know the exact wording of the rule, but one would think the principle of the rule would require that the additional matter inserted in the Bill by the Private Bills Committee should run the gauntlet of discussion in committee of the whole House.

I would therefore ask you if it should not first pass through committee so we may have an opportunity of exchanging views upon it in a more informal way than could be done in a Committee of the Whole. Of course, I want it to be understood that I am not in any way endeavouring to obstruct the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite proper for the House to order this amendment to be considered in Committee of the Whole, but it is not essential. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

GORDON DIVORCE BILL.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac) moved that the House go into Committee on Bill No. 126, for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon.

Mr. M. STEELE (South Perth): Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a matter in connection with this Bill which I think worthy of consideration. Since the Private Bills Committee considered this Bill, information has come to me regarding an irregularity in the procedure before the Divorce Committee. I had not this information when the committee met, or I would have drawn it to their attention, and I think it probable the committee would not have taken the Bill into consideration with that information before them. I desire to make a motion, but before doing so I wish to give my reasons. I think it is an established rule, supported by the authorities, that a Committee of the House cannot accept evidence taken by a committee at a former session, without that evidence being referred to the committee by the House. Bourinot makes this quite plain, I think. At page 474 he says:

—Neither can a committee report the evidence taken before a similar committee in a previous session except as a paper in the appendix, unless it receives authority from the House to consider it.

May also gives a very clear statement on the matter. In the footnote to page 418 he says:

When for any reason the evidence taken before committee has not been laid before the House, the committee re-appointed in a subsequent session cannot report it except as a paper in the appendix.

My information is, and I believe it to be quite accurate, that the Divorce Committee did not have the evidence taken in this case in 1915 referred to this year by the Senate. In support of my belief that this was not done, I may state that a search has been made of the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, and it fails to reveal any reference to the evidence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. member desires to rise to a point of order?

Mr. STEELE: No, I did not rise to a point of order. I wished to draw attention to an irregularity in the procedure, and to conclude by moving that the Bill be referred back to the Private Bills Committee for further consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a question as to whether it is competent for this House to go into the matter of procedure in another Chamber. I do not wish to make a ruling upon the point, but I shall follow the hon. gentleman carefully.

Mr. STEELE: I have no desire to depart from the rules of the House. I was merely bringing the matter to the attention of the House in order to substantiate the motion I proposed moving, and was giving the reasons why I moved it. Perhaps it would be sufficient for me to conclude by moving:

That the order for the House in Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 126, (Letter T2 of the Senate) intituled "An Act for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon" be discharged and that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings): If I understood the argument of the hon. member, it was that the evidence taken in a prior year, 1915 I think, had not been laid before the Committee of the Senate. I presume this House, as the highest judicial body in the land, wishes to do what is right between the parties. I have under my hand a copy of the evidence and proceedings in this case before the Senate, and I find it was expressly agreed between the parties, in the presence of the committee, that the evidence theretofore taken should be used with permission to either party to add anything thereto the party wished. It seems to me when the hon. gentleman rises to the point he does, he must be ignorant of the fact that there was a straight agreement made between the parties and the Senate. It is found on the first page of the Minutes of Evidence, and is as follows:

Hon. Sir James Lougheed: May we expect new evidence, or are we to be confined to the evidence produced on the hearing some two sessions ago?

Mr. Wilkie: There will be some evidence.

Hon. Sir James Lougheed: I think counsel might discuss this question between themselves, and perhaps they could agree to accept the evidence which has already been taken and printed.

(Counsel confer together.)

Mr. Wilkie: My learned friend and I have agreed, subject to the wishes of the committee, that the evidence taken on the former occasion and printed shall stand, with leave to either party to supplement or explain it.

Hon. Sir James Lougheed: Is there anything that you wish to add to Mr. Gordon's evidence? I think it would be well to indicate as you proceed what the new evidence is.

Mr. Wilkie: I desire that the evidence of Mr. Gordon should stand unchanged.

The chairman: What do you say, Mr. Mikel?

Mr. Mikel: I have a copy of the evidence. I may say that I am not as familiar with it as my learned friend whom I am representing.

Then witness after witness was named, and the parties agreed that his evidence should go in. It all follows out the agreement made at the beginning:

Mr. Wilkie: My learned friend and I have agreed, subject to the wishes of the Committee, that the evidence taken on the former occasion and printed shall stand, with leave to either party to supplement or explain it.

I submit, it is one of the rules of this House that when a matter is referred to a committee prima facie the finding of that committee governs the House. I do not say it is absolutely conclusive, but prima facie it governs. In this case, we find that a Committee of the Senate after hearing the evidence came to a certain decision, and a Committee of our House agreed with the Senate. This body to-night, composed of members who have not seen the evidence, is asked practically to override the opinions expressed by those two committees. I submit that it is our duty to sit here as judges in a matter of this kind, and whatever feelings of sympathy may exist towards the respondent, the petitioner has his rights, and if the evidence he has brought forward satisfied the Senate and the Private Bills Committee of this House, and if that evidence was put in by express agreement, the House can well proceed to give a third reading to the Bill.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): I rise to a point of order. If there is any merit in the objection to the third reading of the Bill, that evidence was taken before the committee without the consent of the House, that applies only to the Senate, and the point should be raised only in the Senate. The Senate having passed over that irregularity, have passed the measure over to us for our consideration and conclusion.

Obviously, we have no right to raise a question as to the irregularity of the proceedings of the Senate. For that reason I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give your ruling on that point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is, I have no doubt, well taken. It seems to me that when a measure comes to us from the other chamber, certified to by its proper officer as having been duly passed, and in regular form, we must be governed by that, and it is not for us to go back and make inquiry as to the regularity of the steps which were taken, or as to whether the proceedings were properly conducted by that body.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I speak to the point of order, before you give your decision?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no objection to the hon. member expressing his views, although I have my mind pretty well made up.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sure that no person would take any exception to the spirit which animates the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), namely, that we must show the utmost respect for the proceedings of the Senate. The Chairman of the Private Bills Committee is in his place. He believes that his motion is quite in order and quite proper, and he has supported it with certain observations in regard to what might have happened in the Senate. But the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee will excuse me, I am sure, if I speak for him to this extent when I say that there is no thought of casting any reflection on the Senate. I fancy that the Senate were desirous, just the same as we are, to do the correct thing, and we would respectfully bring that question up if it went back to the Private Bills Committee. Surely no offence could be taken by the other chamber. We try to treat one another with the utmost respect and we are all friends. I would submit that the motion is strictly in order, and that it is a perfectly proper procedure to send this Bill back to the Commons Private Bills Committee so that we may have the matter properly cleared up. From the record which is in our hands, it appears that an inaccuracy has crept in. I would refer the House to page 10 of the evidence, and it will see that the record contains 70 pages of evidence taken in 1915. That is bound up with the evidence taken this year. It is within these 70 pages that the evidence with regard to the alleged offence of adultery is contained. There was no doubt that it was by inadvertence that the evidence was admitted by the Senate. If we were to address an interrogation to the Senate or call their attention to the fact that the rule of the House seems to have been unintentionally controverted, I am sure that they would agree that such was the case and that they would take steps to see that the matter was properly rectified. If hon. gentlemen will look at page 10 of the evidence they will see that it reads:

> Evidence Taken on Petition of 1915.
> Minutes of Evidence.
> The Senate,
> Ottawa, March 15, 1915.

That evidence extends from page 10 to page 79.

I would support the motion that the report be referred back to the Private Bills Committee, because I think that if the Private Bills Committee had understood the position, the Bill would not have been reported until this matter was cleared up.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) must have misapprehended the point raised by the member for North Simcoe, which has nothing to do with the motion submitted by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). The point of order raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe had to be with the reasons assigned by the mover of this amendment. If his point of order is based upon that ground it is well taken, inasmuch as it calls in question the action of the Upper Chamber. But that does not vitiate the motion made by the hon. member for South Perth.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: That the Bill be referred back to the committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration.

Mr. CURRIE: The reason given by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) why this motion should be adopted was that the procedure with regard to this Bill was irregular and he wanted it referred back to the committee of this House. A committee of this House cannot cure that irregularity, which he said had taken place, and in consequence of which he asks that this Bill should go back to the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: He said it was not a point of order.

Mr. CURRIE: He said that the proceedings were irregular and that for that reason he wanted the Bill sent back. But the reasons which he advanced, in view of what the Speaker has said cannot possibly be an argument for referring it back. I think the hon. member for South Perth would be justified in withdrawing his motion after the statements made by Mr. Speaker. Let us proceed with this Bill because we have only a few days more. There will be only one or more occasions when this Bill can be taken up by the House. Can it be said that there is no attempt to block this Bill? It is whispered all around that every attempt has been made to block it. Let us proceed to the third reading. Withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion submitted by the hon. member (Mr. Steele) must be regarded as an amendment to the motion which was put: that I do now leave the Chair. Mr. Edwards moved:

> That I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 126, letter 2T of the Senate intituled "An Act for relief of Albert Edwin Gordon."

Mr. Steele moves in amendment, seconded by Mr. Bennett (Simcoe):

> That I do not now leave the Chair, but that the order of the House for the House to go into Committee on Bill No. 126, letter 2T of the Senate, intituled "An Act for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon" be discharged, and that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: As the seconder of the amendment that the Bill be referred back to the committee, I will not touch upon the point that has been raised by the Chairman of the Committee, but for other reasons I think that this Bill should be referred back. I have been a member of this House for a number of years, and for the first time in my life have I known an important divorce case to be brought down to the House and members absolutely forbidden to read the evidence. Why this departure from the old-established rule? My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) says: "Who says you must not read the evidence?" Who will tell me where to get copies of the evidence to read it? Copies of the evidence are always printed and they are always placed in the boxes, but for some extraordinary reasons the evidence in this case has not been brought down and handed to members. It is true that I have seen in the possession of some of the elderly members of the committee copies of the evidence, but to be allowed to lay hands, much less eyes, upon these holy things is utterly impossible. I see one now lying upon a table before me—I will not point out which table—ear-marked and thumb-marked at the top of every page where there may be something or wherever there may appear to be something against this unfortunate woman. I am a member of this committee, and I have heard the case discussed ad libitum. I was told that if I would wander up to the committee I would find out what the mysterious parts of the evidence were in this case. I wandered up and heard the evidence discussed. On that committee there are sixty members apparently interested in what goes on at that committee, but on the occasion when this matter was decided there were but only seventeen members sufficiently interested in it to be present. The committee was almost evenly divided—there was only one of a majority in favour of granting the divorce. Is it not absurd to ask that a divorce be granted when only seventeen members, or a third of the committee were prepared to go and hear the matter discussed, and when, after it was discussed to a certain degree, there was only a majority of one in favour of it? I heard enough of the evidence to convince me that I should not vote to permit this suppliant for a divorce to be cut loose to marry any decent woman, as I believe his present wife to be. The man knew it would never do to give a point-blank denial to the evidence of this woman who had presented herself, and whose evidence, according to the committee and from what I heard, was of such a nature and such a class that he did not dare to contradict it.

Let us take another phase of this estimable party who is applying for a divorce. I think that of this unhappy marriage there are two children—two or three. Will you believe that, although this is a man of very considerable means according to the evidence, so little parental love has he in his makeup or composition, so utter is his disregard for the common decencies of life, that he does not go before the courts to-day, if this woman has been guilty of adultery and he can prove it, to have it ordered that she shall be dispossessed of the custody of the children and they shall be remanded to his care. If the statements alleged by him are true, why does he not go to the courts and say: I, the father of those children, do not propose to allow this woman, who is an unworthy woman, to have charge of them; I will take them into my own charge. To make it even worse than that, after an arrangement had been made by which he was to pay her a certain amount of money for maintenance—

Mr. MORPHY: That has nothing to do with the case. The man is taking care of his own children.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: My hon. friend came late into the case. He did not hear the evidence.

Mr. NORTHUP: I hold in my hand the judgment of the court—Sir William Mulock—between these parties.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: An action for alimony was brought by her, as I understand, and she was adjudged a certain amount, and the complainant in this case failed to pay the amount; he has not paid her anything since November last.

Mr. NORTHUP: Not the case at all.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I happened to glance at one of the copies of the evidence to-night, and it is evident that they went all around the bush to beat this woman out; they even tried to make her out a thief when she was working hard at the occupation she took up as a milliner in Chicago; they tried to prove that she had been guilty of stealing. At every turn she took they had detectives on the track, or some evidence of that class to try and vilify her and beat down her reputation. We hear a great deal about detectives. We know that once you put a detective on the track to hunt down a woman, it is his business, in order to secure further occupation, to get a committal. Why, a case was reported in Toronto a few days ago; a detective was called in with some others to make an arrest, and while they were making the arrest he actually stole some $20 which he found lying around, and they had to arrest the detective. That is a fair sample of detective work, and all the evidence against this woman is, in the main, the evidence of detectives. This man comes here, not with clean hands, but with disgustingly filthy hands, the hands of a party to procuring an abortion, and he wants the House of Commons to grant him a divorce so that he may go out and marry again. I am not going to vote for any divorce of this kind, and I am willing to leave the parties where they are.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am in a rather peculiar position so far as this particular case is concerned, inasmuch as I must confess that I never heard of it until late this afternoon; in fact it was after six o'clock before I knew that such a case had been before the Senate and that my name was connected with it as sponsor for the Bill in this House. I do not know who takes it upon himself to attach the name of a member who is not even a member of the Private Bills Committee to a Bill to come before this House. I want to assure the committee that in this case it was done without my sanction and without my knowledge. As I said, I did not even know that such a case had been before the Senate until after six o'clock, when I was informed that the first hour to-night would be given up to Private Bills and that I was sponsor for one of the Bills. I understand that only a few members of the Senate committee gave attention to this Bill, only some eight or nine, and the Bill passed the Senate committee by a very small majority. We have been told that only a small proportion of the House of Commons committee gave consideration to the matter, and the time is very short for giving consideration to it now. I am disposed to favour the motion of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), because I certainly know, from a glance at one page of the evidence, that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett) was absolutely wrong in regard to this woman stealing, because the evidence shows that she admited that herself. That is, however, only one point, but I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not a reason for divorce.

Mr. EDWARDS: At page 156 of the evidence I find the following:

Q. When you were recently in Chicago did you take a situation?—A. Yes I did.
Q. With whom?—A. Marshall Field's.
Q. How long were you with them?—A. Well, I do not just know, I was with them several months.

Q. How did the employment terminate, or why?—A. Well, I left; I wanted to be with the children and I left.

Q. Was there any difficulty between you and Marshall Field & Co.?—A. No.

Q. Did you sign any documents before you left Marshall Field & Co.?—A. I do not know that I did.

Q. Oh, but yes, Mrs. Gordon, you would not forget that; did you sign any documents before you left Marshall Field & Co.?—A. Yes, I did.

Q. What was the purport of it?—A. If you have got the document you can look up and see.

Q. Tell me the purport of it.

Mr. Mikel: This is irrelevant.

Mr. Wilkie: It is a matter of credibility of the witness.

By Mr. Wilkie:

Q. Did that document have to do with the matter of your honesty?

Mr. Mikel: Surely we are not trying the witness' honesty.

The Chairman: Mr. Wilkie is dealing with the credibility of the witness. He may ask the question, but if she denies it that ends it.

By Mr. Wilkie:

Q. Then will you tell me, had that statement anything to do with your honesty?—A. Yes, it had.

Q. Had you been accused of stealing?—A. Yes.

Q. And did you, in writing, confess to the fact?—A. Well, of course, I would like to make an explanation in regard to that.

Q. I should like your answer first, and then your explanation may follow.—A. Yes, I will admit that.

Q. Then give me your explanation.—A. I was employed in the millinery department in Marshall Field's, and of course I handled the merchandise, and in handling the merchandise I came across different little articles which were badly damaged, and in fact they were no use at all, as far as selling them in the store was concerned. One of the articles was a flower, and I do not know what else, but at any rate I did, I must admit, I will have to admit that I took them, but the reason I took them was that they were so terribly badly damaged that they never could have been sold. Of course I should not have done that, even at that.

Q. There was a search made for the articles?—A. Yes.

Q. And where were they found?—A. After I told them, I was questioned regarding the matter, and I told the person who made the inquiries that I had—they asked me if I had them, and if I would return them—and I told them that I had them at the house, and they could have them and welcome—and I did return them.

Q. Was a search made of the house?—A. Yes.

Q. Whose house?—A. My brother's house.

Mr. CURRIE: What was the evidence as to the value?

Mr. EDWARDS: The evidence continues:

Q. That brother where your children are now?—A. Yes.

Q. In Chicago?—A. Yes.

Q. Can you give me an idea of the total value of the goods that were found there belonging to Marshall Field & Co.?—A. No, I could not.

Q. Am I wrongly instructed when I am told that they would approximate $1,000?—A. Yes, that is wrong, it would not be that much at all.

Q. Then about how much?—A. I haven't any idea.

If my hon. friend can produce any corroboration for the statement that the respondent was wrongfully accused of stealing, after what I have just read, he is a cleverer lawyer than I think he is.

Mr. STEELE: Is theft a ground for divorce?

Mr. EDWARDS: I am not saying that it is, but I am pointing to the fact that only a small number of the members of the Senate committee gave any attention to this matter, and that only a small number of the Commons committee attended the meetings of that committee. The misstatement of the hon. member for East Simcoe, as shown by the evidence, is, to my mind, strongly in favour of the motion moved by the hon. gentleman from South Perth (Mr. Steele). I do not know anything about it further than what I have read, but it appears to me to be a matter concerning the conduct of a man and a woman, and, inasmuch as these matters come before us for consideration, we should not deal with them lightly. And we should not fritter away time, when only one hour is allowed for consideration. It seems to me impossible to deal with it fairly in a few minutes' time, and, therefore, that this House would be acting properly in adopting the motion that this Bill be referred back to the committee, when we hope that a greater number of the members will attend, and that they will arrive at a proper conclusion.

Mr. GRAHAM: The severance of the marriage tie is a very serious matter. I have almost reached the conclusion that there seldom is a case so clear against one party, with no case against the other, that any divorce should be granted. Here is a case where the committees in both Houses were divided. The committee of the House of Commons certainly was divided, and the remarks we have heard to-night show the reason why. We are asked in this House to pass the third reading of a Bill which legally makes one party lily white, and relegates the other to the lower strata of society for the remainder of her life. Can we do that without having facts to substantiate our position thoroughly? Tonight is the first time I have heard this Bill discussed. We must not forget that we have in our hands the future of these two parties. I have always considered a divorce case one of the most serious matters that can be placed before a committee of this House. When these cases come to the House itself the committee is usually pretty unanimous, and we accept their finding. Only on two or three occasions has there been an exception to this in my time in this House, and I have been here several years. I make it a point to destroy all evidence in divorce cases, as soon as I see what it is, and never read it unless the case is celebrated, and there is a division of opinion in committee. In such a case I have always felt it my duty to scan the evidence to see what attitude I ought to take in the House, because then a great responsibility comes to every one of us. We are asked in this House solemnly to vote to-night to sever the marriage tie between two people who have three children, and we have not seen the evidence—

An hon. MEMBER: Two children.

Mr. GRAHAM: —much less have we had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses. The committee has accepted the evidence taken two years ago, as far as it goes, and I do not care anything about the technicalities, so far as my vote is concerned, as to whether this evidence was properly before that committee or not. This evidence has not been before this House, and I will not accept the responsibility of voting to sever the marriage tie between these two people, where such a divergence of opinion exists between the members who have read the evidence and considered the case, until I know what is in the evidence, because I feel that I have a responsibility which I cannot shirk. I am going to vote for the motion to refer this back to the committee, and when this Bill comes up again, unless the members of the House have been supplied with the evidence, I will vote against the third reading of the Bill. I will take no person's word in this case, after what I have heard. I desire to ask a question, and perhaps it may assume the proportions of a point of order: Can the Private Bills Committee ask this House to pass upon a question, when the rule which provides for giving us the evidence is violated? I do not know that I will put it as a point of order; but I believe that it is not fair to the members and the Private Bills Committee have no right, no matter what the Senate Committee did, to ask us to vote either yea or nay on this question unless we are provided with the evidence on which we can base an opinion.

Mr. WILLIAM THOBURN (North Lanark): For the information of the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), I may say that the reason given by the Senate Committee for not having the evidence published—it is, perhaps, the first time in the history of that committee that the evidence in a case of this kind has not been published—was that they thought that the evidence was of such a nature that it should not be sent broadcast over this Dominion. The evidence is now being printed, and it is expected that it will be in the boxes of all members of the House to-morrow morning.

Mr. GRAHAM: After we have been asked for the third reading of the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. THOBURN: Under the circumstances could not the matter stand without its being referred back to the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I was in attendance at the Private Bills Committee when this Bill first came before it, and I was one of those who took objection to the committee's proceeding further with the consideration of the matter, on the ground that no copy of the evidence had been furnished to any member of the committee at that time. A stenographic copy of the evidence lay on the chairman's table, and we were told that we might have the privilege of perusing it if we saw fit. I was supported in my objection by a number of members of the committee, and it was ordered that the Senate be requested to print and distribute the evidence in the usual way. I received a copy of the evidence in due course, and I was under the impression until this evening that every member of the House had received a copy of the evidence in accordance with the rule. I stated in the committee that I did not think any one could intelligently pass upon the question who had not access to the evidence. I am rather surprised to-night to find that members have not been so supplied. When I received the evidence I read it carefully and I founded my conclusions upon it. I voted in the committee in favour of the granting of this divorce, but I should not have voted at all had I not had access to the evidence. I think that the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has put the case fairly; before the Bill proceeds, the evidence should be received by the members. I understand that the evidence is being printed and will be distributed to-morrow. I do not see that any object will be accomplished by referring the matter back to the committee. Only 17 members of the committee met on the last occasion, but the matter was dealt with exhaustively, as is the case with all such Bills, and the committee reported the Bill to this House. Although the committee consists of about 30 or 35 members, we must remember that this House consists of 220 members. If we get the evidence to-morrow and the Bill is taken up in its regular course on Monday, I think all objections should be satisfied. I know that there is an evident intention on the part of some people, with the end of the session coming nearer, to delay the Bill. It is commonly whispered throughout the corridors—

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. gentleman name any person who pretends to do that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not propose to name anybody.

Mr. KNOWLES: You had better not assert it, then.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can say what I believe, notwithstanding the contradiction—

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend's remark includes all members.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say members; I said throughout the corridors.

Mr. KNOWLES: It could be done only by members.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that justice will be done and that the House will 9 p.m. be fully informed in the usual way if the matter stands until Monday, when the evidence will be in the hands of all the members.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for Private Bills is exhausted.

LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE.

The House on Committee on Bill No. 123, respecting live stock.—Mr. M. Burrell—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister given a explanation of this Bill to the House?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, I gave a full explanation on the introduction of the Bill. After it was read the second time it was referred to the Agricultural Committee, who had the Bill before them twice and discussed it pretty thoroughly. Such amendments as were made—they are all of a minor character—were unanimously adopted by the committee. There is an amendment to section 1. The old title was " The Live Stock and Produce Act." It was thought that the word "Produce" was rather confusing, so the title was changed to " The Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. NESBITT: Did not the minister insert some amendments in the Bill? If so, will he tell me what they are?

Mr. BURRELL: I have just explained that there were several amendments passed at a meeting of the committee. The first is in section 1, which has just been passed. The amendment is that the title, instead of being "The Live Stock and Produce Act," should be "The Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act." The next amendment is the addition of the following as paragraph (g) at the end of section 2:

> Live stock products means meat, poultry, eggs and wool.

That corresponds with section 9. The next amendment is by adding this subsection to section 3:

> Nothing in this Act or in any regulation made hereunder shall take away or in any manner limit the right of any farmer or drover to sell his live stock at any stock yard.

Mr. MORPHY: Should not the words "or other person" be inserted after the word "drover?"

Mr. BURRELL: It is assumed that such sellers would be farmers or drovers.

Mr. MORPHY: That is not a fair assumption. Many people who are neither farmers nor drovers have stock to sell.

Mr. BURRELL: I suppose a section could be inserted covering that. This was designed simply to differentiate the farmer or drover from the man who was selling on commission. There was some discussion on this amendment, but I do not know whether that point was raised or not. In section 7, after the words "and a schedule of the fees," the words "and charges" are added. In section 9, paragraph (a) the words "and operated" are added, so that the paragraph reads.

The manner in which stock yards are to be constructed, maintained, equipped and operated.

Those are the only amendments.

Section 2, as amended, agreed to.

On section 3—Live stock exchange at stock yards:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister explain the practical application of this phrase:

Unless he holds a special license from the minister.

Mr. BURRELL: That is explained in some of the sections following. If there was any dispute in any stock yard between the department and the stockyard, and it was clearly shown that an injustice was being done to the stock owner or farmer sending his stock there, and there was liable to be an interruption of business, we would have the right to issue a special license in order that the business should not be interrupted in the stock yard. Such a case is not likely to turn up, but this is provided in order that the selling may go on.

Mr. NESBITT: If there was trouble in the exchange, a special license would authorize the commission merchant to go on doing business?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it the intention that every stock yard as defined in paragraph f of section 2—

"Stock yard" means any area of land used as a public market for purchasing and selling live stock, with the buildings, fences, gates, chutes, weigh scales and other equipment situated thereon and used in connection therewith.

—can be required by the minister to have a stock exchange established in connection with it?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes. The term "stock yard" is used. There are only six stock yards in the whole of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I happen to know a place in New Brunswick in which there is an area of land where cattle are sold, so that it would come within the definition in paragraph f. It would strike the people who deal at that market as a most undesirable thing that they should be compelled to have a stock exchange in connection with it. No large operations are carried on there, but still it is a place where cattle are regularly sold, and this regulation would therefore cover it. That is not the intention?

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. BURRELL: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then why use language which would so clearly express that?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think it could be interpreted in that way although I quite admit that it might be, as my hon. friend states, in some people's minds. But there are in Canada only six stockyards as they are ordinarily understood in the trade.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What constitutes a stock yard?

Mr. BURRELL: That matter was gone over very carefully not with our department, but with the parliamentary counsel, and this is his wording of the whole section. A stock yard is a yard in which live stock is sold by commission men, bought by packers and butchers, and is a great centre of live stock business. There is one at Calgary, one at Edmonton, one at Winnipeg, one at Toronto and two at Montreal. They comprise the whole of the stock yards in Canada as stock yards are known amongst the live stock men of the country. There may be here and there some small places such as that to which the hon. member refers, but I do not think they would come under the ordinary term "stock yards" as used in the trade, and apparently this was satisfactory to the parliamentary committee and to the counsel. There was not the slightest intention of applying it to any place except to those recognized stock yards that I have named.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then some language should be used which would make that clear. What is ordinarily known as a stock yard might be a very different thing from a stock yard after Parliament has given a legislative definition. The definition is not limited to these big stock yards in the cities, but it would take in every little place where ordinarily, once a week we shall say, cattle are brought in and bought and sold.

Mr. NESBITT: Are they not sold by auction at the stock yards mentioned?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not necessarily by auction; some are private sales, and some are by auction. It is a place to which people bring their cattle on regular days, for the purpose of making sales, other people attending there to buy.

Mr. BURRELL:. Is that not more in the nature of what is known as a market? It is not called a stock yard in the ordinary sense of the word.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the minister is asking Parliament to give a definition to it. It will then become a stock yard within the meaning of this statute. That is not what the minister intends, and why can he not use language which would declare what he intends?

Mr. BURRELL: Although I may admit there is some force in what my hon. friend says, if we were to apply regulations in the strict legal definition, I can only repeat that every man in the country who deals in live stock at all, the farmers, drovers, butchers, abattoir men, and so on, mean only the great stock yards of the country by the term "stock yard." Apart from that, there would be absolutely no intention to apply this to any of the smaller organizations to which my hon. friend refers, which are not really stock yards at all. There would be no intention of applying it except to stock yards which are known as such. The place my hon. friend refers to is not ordinarily known as a stock yard.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the moment this Act passes it will become a stock yard.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister has mentioned the places where these stock yards exist. Could he not name them in the Bill?

Mr. BURRELL: One difficulty in the way would be that there might be stock yards of this kind established in some of the larger centres. It is not so long ago since the Edmonton stock yards were established —about a year ago, I think. Everybody knows what it means, and that is a stock yard to which stock is shipped in large numbers, and where there are commission merchants. If we name them we would perhaps shut out the creation of another stock yard in a very big centre. In spite of what my hon. friend says, there would be no likelihood, and certainly no intention, of it being interpreted as being applied in any shape or form except to those places which are recognized in the trade as stock yards.

Mr. NESBITT: Clause (f) says that a stockyard means any area of land used as a public market for purchasing and selling live-stock. Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that might include places where men are buying and selling privately, for instance, at our country fairs. Of course, you do not intend to include such places as those?

Mr. BURRELL: No.

Mr. NESBITT: Then why not say "stockyard means any area of land used as a public market for purchasing and selling live-stock on commission?"

Mr. BURRELL: That definition would not cover the case of a farmer selling his own stock, for a private owner may sell his own stock in a stockyard. I think it would be extremely difficult to get a definition that would entirely meet the point raised by the hon. member from St. John. At the same time, I do not think there would be the slightest difficulty in working it out as it is, because the term is known so well in the trade that there is not the slightest likelihood of confusion.

Mr. MORPHY: If there was no definition of "stockyard" at all, it seems to me it would be a good deal plainer. It is rather confusing as it is. The minister says a stock yard, under this Bill is a place where stock is sold on commission, but he does not say that in the definition of a stock yard. When you look at sections 3 and 4 confusion seems to arise in regard to the establishment of a stock exchange in a stock yard. The stock exchange idea seems to clear it up, if hon. members will look at it carefully:

3. There shall be a live stock exchange in connection with each stock yard operated under this Act, of which live stock exchange every commission merchant doing business at such stock yard shall be a member, unless he holds a special license from the minister.

4. A live stock exchange shall not be operated until the by-laws to regulate the management and business of such exchange have been duly approved by the minister, and a written notification of such approval has been sent by the minister to the secretary of such live stock exchange.

A public market which might be considered to be a stock yard would not be a "stock yard" under this Act, unless by-laws, etc., were prepared and sanctioned by the minister, and a stock exchange established which would be regulated by these rules, regulations and by-laws.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will look at section 8, he will see that the minister is obliged within a delay of not more than three months, to cause a stock exchange to be established in connection with each stockyard. The minister's difficulty is, I think, that he is under the impression that although Parliament may give a definition to the term "stock yard" it would not mean anything more than it means now. That is not the case. The moment Parliament declares that any area of land used as a public market for purchasing and selling live stock shall be deemed a stock yard within the meaning of this Act, the difficulty will arise, and it will be the duty of the minister to order a stock exchange, even in connection with those smaller markets.

Would the minister not agree to put it in this way?—

Stock yard means any area of land used as a public market for purchasing and selling live stock, and designated by the minister as being a stock yard, which should be brought under the provisions of this Act?

It seems to me that would make it clear.

Mr BURRELL: I would have no objection to that. Of course, there is a little confusion in this way; there are two elements in the stock yard business. We are dealing in one case with the live stock exchange, so far as it affects the buying and selling operations. The rest of the Bill, so far as it affects stock yards, deals with the ownership and management of the stock yards, apart from the buying and selling. If the amendment suggested by my hon. friend makes it any clearer, I have no objection to adopting it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will draft something and send it to the minister.

Mr. OLIVER: I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy). The essential thing is the establishment of an exchange. It is the establishment of the exchange that brings the stock yard under the regulations of the Act. Therefore I do not see any purpose in having a separate definition of what constitutes a stock yard. Wherever a stock exchange has been authorized by the minister, it is a stock yard. That absolutely settles the point, and the confusion that arises by reason of the definition would disappear if the definition were simply stricken out.

Mr. BURRELL: All those points were placed before the Parliamentary Counsel. Of course, I do not pretend to say what should or should not be included in the Bill in the way of definitions. There is, however this feature which must be borne in mind, that a stock yard is a dual business, the live stock exchange being one phase of it, and the stock yard management being another. There may be things about the stock yards, in regard to the buying and selling which it might be desirable to touch in connection with this Bill. I do not see any objection to including a definition of the stock yard, and it seems to me that the addition of something such as suggested by my hon. friend from St. John would absolutely clear it up. If we say that it is such a place as is designated by the minister, I think that would cover all the points.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. OLIVER: What authority goes with the live stock exchange, and how it is constituted?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What are the conditions precedent to its establishment?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. BURRELL: Some stock yards operate, as far as the buying and selling operations go, under live stock exchanges. I think that Toronto does so, and I fancy Montreal also. Two or three of them operate through the live stock exchange in so far as the buying, selling and handling by the commission men go. The live stock exchange operates in an analogous way to the Grain Exchange of Winnipeg. It conducts the actual buying and selling operations, but it does not have to do anything with the management of the stock yards.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister allow me to suggest an amendment? I think it might be well to amend paragraph (f) by inserting after the word "market" the words "designated by the minister as suitable to be brought under the provisions of this Act."

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is not that a little dangerous? What the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has spoken of is the only important matter as far as we are concerned. The stock dealers in the West are very apprehensive of the word "exchange," and that is the reason, I take it, why my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was laying such stress upon the conditions precedent to the establishment of the exchange. I think he is absolutely right in that. The explanation of the minister is that it is an innocuous and harmless thing, but, unfortunately, the word "exchange" has a meaning to the ordinary man, producing from four to seven head of cattle, which is not innocuous and not harmless. It is to meet any possible difficulty that might occur that, I take it, my hon. friend from Edmonton is interposing his observations. We have in Calgary a stock exchange the majority of the shares of which are held by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There is one in Winnipeg where the railways and the city have united in a scheme that enables it to be operated with some degree of fairness. For the reasons that the public have so strongly criticised the grain exchanges, there is always the danger that the same conditions will arise in the cattle exchanges. If the minister makes it clear that the Government can exercise sufficient control, if necessary, as to the conditions under which such institutions shall be operated, and that there shall be some form of a control in the shape of a license, perhaps the people will have more confidence in it.

Mr. BURRELL: That is provided for in the Bill.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have not read the section, but, that being so, it would meet very considerable difficulties which my hon. friend has referred to. We cannot get away from the fact that there is a measure of suspicion and doubt among people who have a small number of cattle with regard to anything called an exchange, because it will not be possible to disassociate the cattle exchange from the grain exchange in the public mind. People will not be quite sure. I do not quite see that the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) would advance it very much. He says that you should leave open to the minister the power to say that this is a stock exchange.

Mr. MORPHY: No, stock yard.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I do not think that the Act was intended to operate in that way. I understood that, provided a stock yard complied with certain conditions, the minister would say in his certificate that the conditions met the demand. If those conditions were complied with the certificate should be given as a matter of course. This is a legal matter. Perhaps my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Pugsley) will remember that Mr. Fulton, when he was provincial secretary of British Columbia, let some papers lie in his office for an undue time and failed to give a certificate at the time he should have given it. They brought action against him, and the Privy Council held that the action would properly lie against him, although he was a public officer, because the law imposed upon him the duty of sending out these papers within a certain time. I take it that the draftsmen of this Bill proceeded upon that principle. With respect to the amendment, I think it should not prevail, because the minister should not have imposed upon him the duty of saying if the certificate should issue. The Act should determine what a stock yard is, and then his certificate could issue when the conditions provided for exist.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The object I had in view in suggesting the amendment was to prevent small stock yards throughout the country from coming within the provisions of this Act. At St. John there is a place where cattle, sheep and hogs are regularly brought and offered for sale. Under this definition of a stock yard such places would be included.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I see the point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the point I want to cover and if the language I propose is not sufficient for that purpose it ought to be possible to use some language that would cover it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: If my hon. friend cannot use language that is sufficient to effect that purpose it cannot be used in this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not proud of it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: We do not want this Bill to apply to the hundred and one little stock yards that exist all over the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not my hon. friend think that under the language of paragraph (f) it would apply?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: If you really think the danger is a real one we should remedy it, because there are little institutions all over the country where live stock is bought and sold. In Edmonton there are three or four, and in Calgary there are three or four besides the big stock yards. That, I apprehend, is what we want to prevent. You would not want it to apply to the smaller institutions?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. MORPHY: I have a suggestion that I think will meet the idea pretty well. I would say:

"Stock yard" means any area of land used as a public market and operated under the provisions of this Act for purchasing and selling live stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That covers it I think.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, that would be quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. ROBB: I was not present at the Committee on Agriculture when this Bill was discussed, and I am not positive that I know what the purpose of the minister is in introducing it. Does he hope that this will assist stock raisers to get larger prices for their products? It looks as if it might permit a group of men to get together and fix prices, crowding out the average buyer who has been doing business for many years fairly well and who, by competition, gives the stock raiser all that the market will stand.

Mr. BURRELL: I explained the purpose of the Bill when I introduced it, and it was also discussed fully in the Agricultural Committee. The purpose is precisely the opposite of what my hon. friend seems to fear. The department have been looking into the stock yards feature for two years, and this Bill is the result of a widespread and insistent demand of the stock raisers, owing to abuses in stock yards which they wish to have remedied by governmental regulation. They have felt that commission men occasionally were not to be relied upon, that their charges were too high, that they acted in collusion, and that, in the management of the stockyards, there was sometimes discrimination in such things as the allocation of space. There were also long-standing grievances in regard to the charging of exorbitant prices for feed for stock and the furnishing of poor feed and complaints respecting weighing etc. There was a great deal of dissatisfaction, especially in the West. The purpose of the Bill is two-fold, to exercise control over the owners and managers of stock yards, and to make all commission men belong to a live stock exchange whose constitution and by-laws shall be submitted to the approval of the minister, in order that control may be exercised over the operations of the exchange. There is, however, nothing to prevent a private owner going to any stockyard and selling his own cattle. Our whole object is to improve the conditions as they affect the raiser of live stock, by giving him a fairer deal in his market than in the past. Some of the strongest demands have come from the Western Live Stock Union, and we have had telegrams saying they are heartily in sympathy with the Bill. After the first meeting of the Agricultural Committee, a personal letter, with the Bill, was sent to every live stock yard management and to every live stock association, and suggestions were invited. We have received no adverse comment, but we have had approval of the object of the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: Following what the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) has said, the term "exchange" has a sinister sound to our people in the West. We have had very serious experiences which we believe have grown out of the power and the authority of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. It is many years since the grain producers of the West became convinced that the Winnipeg Grain Exchange was, in its operations, a detriment to the welfare of the people of that country. The Government has practically eliminated the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, and to-day it is out of business—and I think there are no mourners except those who were members of it. That being the experience of the West in regard to the Grain Exchange, the minister will have to pardon us if we are somewhat timorous about the establishment of a live-stock exchange. We have at Edmonton a stock yard which was started last fall by a number of enterprising local men and is operated simply as a stock yard proposition—that is, the owners are not dealers in live-stock. That has been of great benefit to the stock producers of that part of the country.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH: Has that stock yard been a financial success?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know whether it has been beneficial to the investors, but it has been of great advantage to the producers of live-stock throughout the country, a vast benefit to the live-stock producers of Northern Alberta in ways not thought of when the stock yards were established.

It has been, for instance, a means of exchange between the parts of the country that were perhaps short of feed and the parts of the country that had abundance of feed. A great deal of trade was done last fall in cattle through the stock yards in that line, which was of vast benefit to the stock interests of the country. Buyers have come from Toronto to buy at those stock yards. So far as the business end of the stock yards is concerned, they have been of very great benefit to the stock industry, and, as far as we can see, will continue to be a benefit. There has been, I take it, no stock exchange there, up to the present time. For my part, I would be very desirous of seeing the present conditions continue. I do not want to see any legalized combination amongst the men who are buying on commission at that stock yard.

Mr. MORPHY: Is there no association?

Mr. OLIVER: No, not so far as I am aware at present. The men are there acting individually. The United Farmers of Alberta has one commission buyer there. I forget the name of the other association, but there are two that I know of, and I believe several others.

Mr. MORPHY: Are there no regulations or rules?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not say anything about that. There may be regulations or rules of the stock yard company. Everything is now operated under the control and rule of the stock yard company, and, so far, it is entirely satisfactory as far as I know. What I want to see—and what I am satisfied the people of the West want to see—is that the supervision of the stock yards and of the business of the stock yards shall be carried out by the Government, and that no part of that responsibility shall be delegated to an association of the commission buyers who are operating on that market. As a western man, I take alarm at that feature of the proposal. It is necessary for the proper working of the Bill, which I certainly consider very desirable, that there should be government supervision over and above the supervision of the owners of the stock yard—a dominant supervision to see that conditions are as they ought to be, and to see that those who desire to use the stock yards get an even deal, and to ensure that those who purport to buy and sell on commission shall be responsible men, duly licensed and under penalty if they fail in their obligations. That all, as I maintain, should be carried out under supervision, according to the terms of this Bill or some similar Bill. With regard to the provision that sets up those parties who are buying on commission as a separate authority, giving them control which should not be exercised except by the Government, I shall certainly have to hear from the minister very much more complete and satisfactory explanation than he has yet given us. I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose of the Bill, so far as it relates to government supervision of the yards and of the trade, and of those who are carrying on the trade, but I am absolutely against any delegation of authority to an association of men who are carrying on the trade.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Would the hon. gentleman show us the section he is referring to when he says that the minister delegates certain powers to others?

Mr. OLIVER: If I understand correctly sections 3 and 4 provide for the constitution of a live stock exchange under authority from the minister, to provide its own by-laws and regulations. That is the provision to which I object.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What the hon. member for Edmonton has stated with respect to the matter generally is unquestionably correct, so far as the West is concerned. There is no argument about it, they simply feel there is a measure of suspicion attaching to any body of men who do business under the name of exchange. That is the story in a nutshell. Litigation took place in Manitoba in connection with the Winnipeg Grain Exchange under the Criminal Code, which resulted in the acquittal of one of the members, and subsequently resulted in legislation which changed the whole character of the operations of that exchange. That litigation has had such an effect on the public mind that the United Farmers and the Grain Growers have been endeavouring to establish exchanges for all kinds of agricultural products and commodities of their own. It is the word "exchange" that causes the trouble in this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: Not that word only.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I think my hon. friend attaches perhaps a great deal of importance to the word "exchange" but on looking at the Bill carefully, he will find that the difficulties which arose in Manitoba, and which were the subject matter of litigations, have been provided for here by vesting a general authority in the minister, which did not exist in Manitoba. It was felt that they had there an Act of incorporation and a constitution that put them, as my hon. friend said, entirely beyond the law, and they arrogated to themselves the right to do what they pleased, when they pleased, and how they pleased, and do every other sort of business just as they pleased, which was detrimental to the interests of the community. The live stock exchanges, as I understand it, if we can eliminate our pre-conceived notions, are much sought after by the farmer, as well as by the dealer, using the very word "exchange" as indicating a body of certificated or licensed commission men, who will be able to maintain a certain general reputation for the institution and to see that the business is conducted in a decent and a proper manner. If that idea were lived up to instead of the idea that attaches by reason of the dealings in Manitoba in relation to other things we should not have so much trouble. The hon. member for Edmonton properly remarked that on account of the free entry of cattle into the United States considerable number of buyers from that country have come to Edmonton, Calgary and other points and I believe there has been a very general disposition on the part of all those interested in the live stock industry in those provinces to build these live stock yards, and the corollary of that, so they tell me, is some sort of exchange—not the sort of exchange that my hon. friend has referred to which is obnoxious to everybody, but a body that might be able to deal with the situation and yet be under such control as to prevent the possibility of injury being done to the farmer. That is the story, and I think, if my hon. friend will look at the section he will see that the Government must assume the whole responsibility for it. I think this provision will probably meet the difficulty that I have always felt in connection with these exchanges, and which my hon. friend has just referred to. Section 3 reads:

3. There shall be a live stock exchange in connection with each stock yard operated under this Act, of which live stock exchange every commission merchant doing business at such stock yard shall be a member, unless he holds a special license from the minister.

I am not sure that the provision "unless he holds a special license from the minister" is useful. Section 4 says:

(1) A live stock exchange shall not be operated until the by-laws to regulate the management and business of such exchange have been duly approved by the minister, and a written notification of such approval has been sent by the minister to the secretary of such live stock exchange.

I am not so sure that that language is calculated to overcome the difficulty to which the member for Edmonton referred. Probably it would be better to have some other tribunal than the men themselves to decide upon their own integrity. It was in connection with that very point that the difficulty in Winnipeg arose. The section continues:

(2) Such by-laws shall provide for the admission as members of such live stock exchange of such persons as desire to carry on the business of commission merchants, and who furnish evidence of integrity and financial standing satisfactory to the executive of the exchange, and such by-laws shall require every commission merchant becoming a member of the exchange to furnish sufficient and satisfactory security for the proper accounting by such commission merchant of the proceeds of any sales received by him, and of any money paid to him to effect any purchase.

That is nothing more than the provisions that obtain in the Grain Act with respect to elevator licenses. As to the general principle of the establishment of an exchange, I am advised by the men who frequent these exchanges, not as buyers, but as sellers, that it conduces to the proper carrying on of the business to have a secretary there to whom a man with a dozen cattle may go and say: I have a dozen cattle; who is buying to-day? The secretary may say: Smith is buying, from Chicago; Burns, from Calgary; Gallagher, from Edmonton. The all-important point to which the member for Edmonton referred as to the conditions precedent to the establishment of the exchange is one to which this committee should give serious consideration. After the exchange is established the regulations will be sufficient; but too much care cannot be exercised in controlling the conditions precedent to the establishment of the exchange. But we should not, in my judgment, permit these men to be the judges of their own integrity. I desire to place myself on record as favouring the idea of the exchange; of control by the Government, of supervision of the feeding, accommodation and care of the stock—because sometimes the stock does not receive the attention that it should; we all know that the animals sometimes go without water for a considerable length of time. After all, this matter is of as much public importance as the grain business; it touches what you might call the suffering of the animals, and in that respect it is important. The people with whom I have communicated are entirely in sympathy with this legislation; they are not anxious that the difficulties that were experienced in Winnipeg shall arise again. I repeat that we must eliminate that section which permits the men themselves to govern their own conduct and to determine their own integrity. Some other tribunal should determine whether a man who furnishes the necessary evidence should become a member of the organization—because once you get the monopolistic tendency developed; once you get a tendency to exclusiveness, a desire not to let in a man who wants to go into business, then you have trouble.

Mr. ROBB: Last fall throughout Southern Alberta the hotels were filled with buyers of sheep; they were simply tumbling over one another. Are we now going to change the conditions and compel all those men to go to certain stock yards and buy from commission merchants?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No; I am glad to assure the hon. member that such is not the case. This legislation does not in the slightest degree impede the free movement of those who desire to go out and buy sheep, horses, cattl , or anything else. If, on the other hand, men take their stock to the yards, as they do in Chicago, for instance, it is desirable that there should be an exchange, representing the controlling authority with respect to buyers and sellers as distinguished from the stock yards company itself. I agree that we should not by legislation encourage or compel the lessening of the activities of those who desire to purchase live stock in competition with one another. The condition to which my hon. friend has alluded is one that obtained with reference to steers and beef cattle at a time when there was a shortage in the United States. You can buy where you like—in the field, in the hotel, in the village store;—but when the animals stop over night in the stock yards, as they often do, then the regulations with respect to stock yards obtain, and Government supervision is had. The animals must be adequately fed, properly cared for, sufficiently watered; and if there is buying and selling in that stock yard, it takes place under Government supervision and regulation. It is desirable, for that reason, that those who hold themselves out as commission merchants should not be permitted to exercise that business to the detriment of the farmer who trusts them. It is advisable that there should be some responsible body, such as an exchange, of which the commission merchant should become a member, thus ensuring that the money due to the farmer will be paid to him—because the exchange stands behind the farmer as a licensed buying and selling organization. That, and that only, is the intention of this Act.

10 p.m.

Mr. BURRELL: The purpose of the Bill, which was gone over very carefully after a long discussion with men interested, both from the East and from the West, is to try and prevent the very abuses to which reference has been made. I am aware that there is some feeling in the West in regard to the matter of an exchange. There is a live stock exchange in the United Stock Yards, Winnipeg; there is another at Toronto. In the United States business is done in the stock yards through the medium of an exchange, but there is no Government control. The simplest machinery to establish in respect to the buying and selling activities seems to be a live stock exchange. In encouraging or compelling its establishment, it was desirable to have thorough and complete control over its operations. In providing that they themselves should guarantee the integrity of a member of their exchange and supervise their own activities, it is thought that that would be the simplest and most efficient way of conducting the business. We allow them to take good deal of the responsibililty themselves, always with the understanding that, besides approving their by-laws, we maintain supervision over their operations. In this way we relieve ourselves of a good deal of work in connection with running the exchange. I do not think we could get away from the establishment of an exchange, association, or whatever you like to call it. I think the committee may be absolutely confident that the department will have full power to supervise the operations of the exchanges at all times and to prevent any abuses. In short, if there are any abuses, we can have quick investigation and, if necessary, suspend the exchange. This section which provides for the special licensing of commission men is inserted for the purpose of preventing a possible difficulty such as my hon. friend suggests. If any trouble or abuse by these live stock exchanges or groups of men arises, we can suspend the whole thing and issue a special license to such commission men as we think fit. I think we can cover the point brought forward by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) who is not now in his place, by adding a subsection to section 8. There would be no objection to inserting an amendment to section 3, but when we come to section 8, the whole point will be very clearly covered.

Mr. OLIVER: The minister apparently has made up his mind to the establishment of these exchanges. In my judgment, sections 3 and 4, if they have any meaning at all, mean the establishment of a close corporation of commission buyers at each of these stock yards. That is wrong in principle and detrimental in practice, just as in the case of the Grain Exchange at Winnipeg. It will be accentuated in the case of live stock exchanges, and the smaller the exchange the greater the evil of this creation of close corporations. The minister says that it will relieve the Government of some measure of detail in looking after the business of the stock yard. That is true, but it will do so to the very great advantage of the men who are doing the relieving. They are not philanthropists, and if they are going to exert themselves along those lines, they are going to do it for their own benefit, and that benefit must come out of the pockets of the producers. If sections 3 and 4 were struck out, the rest of the Bill would stand perfectly complete with the operations of the stock yards and the transactions of the commission men directly under the control of the Government, and that is exactly where they ought to be. That being the case, I consider that sections 3 and 4 are not only superfluous, but detrimental. While the minister, I suppose, has made up his mind on this subject, I wish to make my most emphatic protest against those sections establishing live stock exchanges at those stock yards, as they will be close corporations, the purpose of which, in the nature of things, will be to work in the interest of those who comprise them and against the interest of the producers.

Mr. WRIGHT: The other evening when the Minister Agriculture introduced this Bill, I suggested that it should be turned over to the Agricultural Committee for consideration. I believe to-day the suggestion was a wise one, and I understand the Bill was fully threshed out before that committee—unfortunately I was unable to be present. The live stock interests in this country are to-day so great that they deserve and should receive every attention from the Government. The Bill as introduced by the minister is in the right direction. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) asks that sections 3 and 4 should be struck out. I would draw his attention to one fact;—had this Bill been in force, I believe it would have been unnecessary to say what I am about to say. That exchange is to-day financially bankrupt and is appealing for funds. Had this Bill been in force, had the department been able to exercise their rights, this would not have happened. Whilst hon. gentlemen opposite have every right to criticise and it is their province to criticise, I think they should withdraw all opposition to this Bill and allow it to go through as printed, with the addition of the amendments suggested by the minister.

Mr. OLIVER: I have stated my objections and do not intend to press them further. There was just one other thing I wished to point out, namely, that as the Bill stands there is no security provided to the producer of cattle, the man who sells cattle to the commission merchant. All the security that any body has is the provision that the stock association shall be satisfied that the commission merchant is reliable. That is to some extent a safeguard, but it is not security. There would be no less security if only such buyers operated on the stock yards as the minister saw fit to license, as provided under section 5, and we would be just as well satisfied that the commission merchants licensed by the minister directly would meet their obligations as we would in regard to those who are admitted to membership in a live stock exchange as being men of character and repute. There is no guarantee to the seller in the provisions of this Bill as there is in the provisions of the Grain Act under similar circumstances.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend has pointed out a weakness in the Bill. I do not like section 5, because really the exchanges ought to be held responsible in some way. Nobody should be specially licensed by the minister as a commission merchant on an exchange without the consent of the exchange, and the exchange should be held responsible for such commission merchant.

Mr. BURRELL: While I quite appreciate what the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says, I am sorry I cannot agree with him, for this reason: I think we have absolute control, and there is entire safety provided under these sections for the producers and sellers of live stock, because of the evidence of integrity and the security which has to be offered to the exchanges who will run this business under our supervision. Before a live stock exchange can do any of these things, we have to be absolutely satisfied with their constitution and by-laws, to ensure that they will carry on their business properly.

Our regulations cover all these points, and if there is any trouble or any difficulty, or if there is any complaint made of abuses such as my hon. friend anticipates we would have the right to close up that exchange and issue special licenses to commission men to do business notwithstanding the fact that the live stock exchange was closed. I do not think that sections 4 and 5 can be withdrawn. I may say this Bill was gone over very carefully with men who are very keenly appreciative of difficulties such as my hon. friend suggests. One of the men who most strongly urged this feature of the Bill was Dr. Rutherford, whom my hon. friend knows well. Dr. Rutherford is President of the Western Live Stock Union and was formerly Veterinary Director General. I feel certain he is as familiar as any man living with stock conditions in the West. The Saskatchewn Government appointed a live sock commission to examine these conditions, and they laid very great stress on the same points. These clauses were drafted after consultation with various people who know the conditions thoroughly, and after consultation with our own officers. I therefore think I should hardly be justified in amending them or altering them at this time. I do not really anticipate the difficulties my hon. friend fears, and I can assure him that every precaution will be taken by the department to see that the public is protected to the very limit.

Mr. NESBITT: I think this Bill is a great step in the right direction. Subsection 2 of section 4 will have a tendency not only to regulate the exchanges, but to make them more reliable. At the same time, it does not provide for the complete financial responsibility of a commission man who has a right to operate on the exchange. For instance, if I ship a carload of steers to a commission man to sell, there is nothing in this subsection making the exchange responsible for that commission man in regard to the price of the stock. That is what I meant by not allowing anybody to operate except such commission men as were permitted to do so by the exchange, and then making the exchange financially responsible for them. I do not mean as to the charges, the weighing, the feed, etc—I mean responsibility for the price of the stock.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not quite agree with my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) wished section 4 to be struck out. To my mind that section contains the very thing he desires. The section reads as follows:

(2) Such by-laws shall provide for the admission as members of such live stock exchange of such persons as desire to carry on the business of commission merchants, and who furnish evidence of integrity and financial standing satisfactory to the executive of the exchange, and such by-laws shall require every commission merchant becoming a member of the exchange to furnish sufficient and satisfactory security for the proper accounting by such commission merchant of the proceeds of any sales received by him, and of any money paid to him to effect any purchase.

What language could be stronger? Of course, it all depends upon the nature of the security they take, but the presumption is they will insist upon security that will be sufficient, to cover the operations of any members of the exchange, and I would assume that if they could not get personal security which is absolutely gilt-edged they would get other security which would guarantee the purchasers. That section is about as strong as language can make it.

Mr. GLASS: The criticism offered by the hon. member for North Oxford was duly considered by the committee. Subsection 2 of section 4 was explained by the minister, and seemed to offer sufficient security to the drover who might have cattle to sell on the exchange. The details as to what that security shall be, or what the character of the responsibility shall be are not embodied in the Bill, but the primary object is to give the security the hon. member seeks, and this clause supplemented, by the regulations of the minister and the department and the by-laws of the exchange, which must be approved by the minister, seems to me to furnish that security. Of course, it all depends on the stringency of the regulations which the minister imposes. I am sure the committee had confidence that the minister would impose conditions that would give absolute security, knowing the necessity for it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: After considering the matter with practical men, and hearing what my hon. friend from Edmonton had to say, I would suggest to the minister that after the word "merchants," in the third line of subsection 2 of section 4, we add the words "on such terms and conditions as may be fixed by the by-laws." This change would meet the difficulty referred to by my hon. friend from Edmonton, and instead of leaving it open to the executive to do as they pleased would provide that any man who complies with the by-laws would be a member. Does not my hon. friend from Edmonton think that would get over the difficulty?

Mr. OLIVER: Of course, they frame the by-laws.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But the minister has to approve of them. Then the responsibility is on the Government.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that would be an improvement.

Mr. BURRELL: I have no objection at all to that amendment. I really thought we were achieving the purpose with the subsection as it was, but on further consideration, I agree, it might sound as if these men were judging of the integrity of their own members. I therefore move:

That subsection 2 of section 4 be amended by striking out all the words in line 4 and the words in line 5, to and including the word "exchange," and inserting in lieu thereof "on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the by-laws."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Tariff of fees and by-laws must be approved before stock yard is used:

Mr. BURRELL moved that the words "and charges" be inserted after the word "fees" in the third line of the clause and the words "and charges" after the word "fees" in the eighth line.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 7, subsection 2—Stock yard may be closed when not operated in accordance with regulations:

Mr. MORPHY: I think the wording of this subsection is rather restrictive. There might be a stock yard in charge of some one who was not the "owner" or "operator." I could imagine a case where a stock yard might have gone into disuse for a little while and there would be no person on whom notice could be served who might be called the owner or operator. I would suggest that the word "owner," "lessee, occupier or operator" should be used.

Mr. BURRELL: There would be no objection to putting that in. I therefore move that the section be amended by inserting after the word "owner" in the first line the words "lessee, occupier or operator;" that the words "lessee, occupier" be inserted after the word "owner" in the 34th line and that the words "lessee, occupier or operator" be inserted after the word "owner" in the 38th line.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—How Act may be made applicable to stock yards now in existence:

Mr. BURRELL: To meet the point raised by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), I beg to move that the following subsection be added:

The minister shall have power to decide whether any public market where live stock is purchased and sold, hereafter established, as a stock yard is to be operated under this Act.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood an amendment was inserted after section 3 to provide that any owner of stock could sell his own stock at any stock yard. Is there any restriction on any person coming to the stock yard to buy?

Mr. BURRELL: No, I should think not.

Mr. OLIVER: Last winter buyers came from Seattle.

Mr. BURRELL: I should think there would be absolutely no restriction.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. OLIVER: The establishment of a stock exchange would not prevent outside buyers coming to the stock yards and buying?

Mr. BURRELL: No. The intention was to control only the commission side of it.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 121, an Act to amend an Act in aid of provincial legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquors.—Mr. Doherty.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a funny Government. I mean it is made up of funny members. They tell us at six o'clock what they are going to take up at eight o'clock, and then they take up something else. We were told at six that we would take up to-night the Live stock Bill and then Estimates, and now the Minister of Justice comes along with a temperance measure. Perhaps it is inoffensive and we may let him go; but I call attention to the fact that about four times a week the Government take up business other than that of which they have given notice.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am sorry if my hon. friend finds this measure offensive. I shall explain it briefly and then he can get to his Estimates. This is a measure that has come back from the Senate with amendments that, I may be pardoned for saying, do not, in my judgment, improve it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: About the papers?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member says, "about the papers." The hon. gentlemen in the place which perhaps I should not discuss seemed to be under the same misapprehension as the hon. member for Rouville, that this is a Bill about the papers; and so they have struck out a provision in section 2 of the Bill which simply provided that it should be an offence to use the post office as a means of violating constitutionally enacted provincial laws. As I am informed, they have interpreted that as being legislation by this Parliament to prohibit the circulation of newspapers containing liquor advertisements, because it was possible that a province might prohibit that. The section in question simply declared that it should be an offence to use the post office as a messenger for the violation of properly enacted provincial law. The Senate have struck that out because, I presume, in their judgment it is a proper thing that His Majesty's mails should be used as a means of the violation of properly enacted provincial law. The prohibition of such use was the full extent of the offending section.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did not the Senate give the right interpretation to that penalty clause? I think that in this House I called attention to the fact that it would be hard to keep the papers in line, that papers like the Montreal Gazette, the Montreal Star, and all the large dailies published in Montreal could by that legislation be prevented from circulating in the province of Ontario, for instance, unless they gave up the advertising of famous brands. It might be that the provinces would not prohibit the circulation of papers containing such advertisements; but, on the other hand, they might. But now the Senate, full of apprehension, thought, in its wisdom, that such a cruel clause should not be inserted in the Bill. I do not say that I would like to curtail the power of the provinces to prohibit.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty) has the floor; we are not in committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the hon. minister explain the amendment?

Mr. DOHERTY: It simply strikes out the clause which made it an offence for anyone to use His Majesty's mail as an instrument for the violation of provincial laws. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman, when the Bill was before this House, pointed out that, if the provinces prohibited a newspaper circulating within the province on the ground that it contained a liquor advertisement, the effect of this legislation would be to make it an offence to use the post office to circulate that newspaper. That would be true, and the circulation would be prevented, not by means of this legislation, but by means of the legislation of the province enacted within its constitutional right. All that this legislation would have done, if it had taken effect, would be to deprive people of the right of using the post office to violate the provincial laws. The effect of striking this section out of this Bill would be this: Suppose a province passes legislation prohibiting the distribution of circulars advertising the sale of liquor, any person will be guilty of an offence who himself circulates, or hires a messenger to circulate, such advertisement, but provided he puts it in an envelope, puts a stamp on it, and hires the post office to circulate it, he will be an innocent man. That is the effect of the refusal of the Senate to enact this legislation. I cannot say I am prepared to accept that amendment. On the other hand, the Senate has left in this Bill two provisions which are valuable, and, for that reason, I do not propose to ask the House to reject these amendments. Sooner than lose the benefit of these provisions left in the measure, I do not purpose to endeavour—which endeavour I have no reason to suppose would be successful—to induce the Senate to reconsider its action with regard to the amendment nor with regard to another which I will mention later. I purpose to ask this House rather to concur in these amendments. If I should have the opportunity, I shall certainly make a further endeavour to have so reasonable an enactment as was contained in the struck-out clause re-enacted, and give the Senate some future opportunity of reconsidering their action in the matter.

Mr. GRAHAM: Supposing these circulars were mailed in the United States to people in Canada, would the law, as contemplated by the minister, reach the case?

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, it is not possible for us to enact a law to make it an offence for a man to do anything in the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM: But when it came over here?

Mr. DOHERTY: The law was enacted against the person who used the post office. It was not proposed—and I do not think it would be wise—to exercise a censorship over letters, and have the post office authorities open every letter, on the chance of finding a circular in it. We made it an offence to use the post office for the circulation of liquor advertisements when such circulation is prohibited in a province. In the nature of things, we cannot make it an offence for a man to do certain things in the United States; we cannot reach him. I believe this legislation would have reached a man who, through the medium of people in the United States, used our post office for that purpose, and I understand abuses are perpetrated in that way, to evade the war stamp. Representations were made that people sent in immense bundles of liquor advertisements, and posted them in the United States, because they could be sent for 2 cents instead of 3 cents. The other amendment is also by way of striking out the provision which enabled the prosecution of any one who violated this law, by sending liquor into a prohibition province from an outside province, to be instituted at the place whence the liquor was sent. It is the second time this House has enacted that provision. Last year the Senate struck it out in the same way. That, too, is an amendment which, I must confess, I would describe myself as submitting to, rather than accepting. I think the section was essential to the proper enforcement of the law. But, for the same reason, I do not propose to ask the House to reject it. I do not look upon the third amendment as open to criticism. I refer to section 4 B. The section as it passed this House gave a right of search for liquor in cases where a violation of the law was suspected, to any constable or other peace officer who had reason to believe that any intoxicating liquor was in any premises or place, in violation of the provisions of the Act. The Senate has thought it wise—and I do not purpose to offer any observation on that amendment—to make that right of search subject to information being laid, and to it being established before any judge of the sessions of the peace, recorder, police magistrate, stipendiary magistrate, two justices of the peace, or any magistrate having the power or authority of two or more justices of the peace, that there is reasonable cause to suspect that the liquor is within the premises. I do not desire to offer any criticism of that, but will be prepared to accept it.

I move that the amendments be concurred in, without withdrawing the observations I have made with regard to the first two amendments.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The amendments seem to be so important and so contrary to the views of the temperance people throughout the county, that I should think the minister, entertaining the strong views he does upon the question, would prefer to avail himself of the power which is conferred by the rules and practice of Parliament, of having a conference between members of this House, to be appointed for the purpose, and a committee of the Senate, for the purpose of fully discussing the matter with a view to seeing if the section could not be agreed to as it was passed by the House, or at all events, if a section substantially to the same effect could not be adopted, which might, to a reasonable extent, accomplish the object the Government had in framing the section. It seems to me that my hon. friend ought not to abandon the matter just now by concurring in the amendment which has been made by the Senate in the striking out of this section.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I had any ground for believing that the conference—

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend does not know what his persuasive powers might accomplish.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have endeavoured to exercise them so often on the member for St. John with so little success that I have almost begun to lose faith in them. Speaking seriously, if I had hoped that the desired result would be obtained, I certainly would have followed the course which the hon. member suggests. But I have excellent reasons for believing that it would not produce the effect which my hon. friend, and I with him, would like to see produced. On the other hand, we have by this legislation, even as it stands, a clause with regard to search which is a great improvement on the law as it stood. We have furthermore a clause which is a great improvement and which has been urged on me by the temperance people in different provinces. This clause makes possible the suspension of the Canada Temperance Act, without resorting to another election, in counties where it is now in force and where the prohibitory law of the province is, in the judgment of the Governor in Council, as restrictive as the Canada Temperance Act. I think that the probability of concurrence by the Senate in the clause that they have struck out is so remote as not to justify our running any risk of losing what they have left to us of the Bill—which, I think, is of value.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There would be no risk of losing what has been enacted. If nothing resulted from the conference, we should still have the other features of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, if we got it through in sufficient time to deal with the matter again in this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is quite enough time.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are other things to do.

Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the order being called: House again in Committee of Supply:

Mr. GRAHAM: It is eleven o'clock, and we sat late last night. I suggest that we do not go on with Supply.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to insist upon our proceeding, if hon. gentlemen are very desirous of getting away, I simply wished to deal with a few supplementary estimates for the Department of Justice and the Post Office Department.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will put them through quickly some other time.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is that a promise?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a threat.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. GRAHAM: What business will be taken up to-morrow? It has been rumoured that the Government intend to ask the House to sit to-morrow night. Several gentlemen from both sides of the House have made engagements for to-morrow night, and I would ask the minister if the Government have decided as to an evening a sitting.

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to the first question, I understand that we shall take up the Franchise Act to-morrow. It has been the desire to sit to-morrow evening; perhaps I might undertake to consult with those who are in higher authority than myself and to give the hon. gentlemen an answer early in the morning.

Mr. LEMIEUX: While the minister is in his place, I may say that when I was last in Montreal several people—

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon: gentlemen is not going to introduce a new subject. The motion for the adjournment of the House does not permit a word of debate. The practice has grown up in the House of permitting a question upon the motion for adjournment as to what business will be taken up the next day. I hope that the hon. gentlemen is not going to introduce a new matter; he would be entirely out of order in doing so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will see the Minister of Justice personally.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.02 p.m.

Saturday, September 8, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS.

MOTION TO ADJOURN THE HOUSE ON A DEFINITE MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Marcil, for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance: The necessity of supplying munitions to Great Britain during the continuance of the war in view of the fact that they are being decreased and stoppage of the same is threatened.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) desires to move, seconded by Mr. Marcil, for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance: The necessity of supplying munitions to Great Britain during the continuance of the war in view of the fact that they are being decreased and stoppage of the same is threatened.

I may say with reference to this proposed motion, that it is competent for me to rule that it is not a matter of such importance as to properly be discussed under rule 39. On the other hand, when I have a doubt in my mind, it is my duty to submit the motion to the consideration of the House. Many considerations present themselves to me. One is that the subject of munitions has been discussed at various times during the present session. The one feature of the case that leaves a doubt in my mind is that the supply of munitions has recently been curtailed. The interpretation which has been placed upon the rule is that a definite matter of urgent public importance must be one of recent occurrence. The circumstance that the decrease in munition supplies has been recent leaves a doubt in my mind as to whether the hon. gentleman ought not properly to have the right to present his motion to the House. Having that doubt in my mind, I think I should give the benefit of the doubt to the hon. member and afford him the opportunity of presenting his motion. That being the case I purpose submitting the question to the House as to whether the hon. member shall have leave to move this motion.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances, I would not make any objection to a motion of this kind although there is a doubt in my mind as to whether this constitutes such a question of urgent public importance as to justify the House in interrupting its course of necessary business in order to give up the time which will be consumed by this discussion. The matter referred to in the hon. gentleman's motion is:

> The necessity of supplying munitions to Great Britain during the continuance of the war in view of the fact that they are being decreased and the stoppage of the same is threatened.

There is no doubt that this is an important question to various interests in the Dominion of Canada. If the decrease in munitions as manufactured and supplied from Canada, does not result in a decrease of effective and aggressive power at the front there is no Imperial menace and no menace to the Allies or to the Empire. There is no doubt in my mind—I do not imagine that there is any in the mind of any hon. member of this House—that whatever variation or restriction in kinds of munitions which have heretofore been made in Canada and the manufacture of which will be gradually decreased is well within the ken of the British Government and will be decided with absolute regard to the necessity for these munitions of war at the front. Therefore, it is a matter only of comparative urgency, simply to certain interests in the Dominion of Canada—

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that under the rule of procedure, it is open to my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) to take objection, but not to argue the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understand, the right hon. member who is leading the House (Sir George Foster) purposes making an objection, and he is laying the groundwork for that objection. Otherwise he would not be in order in speaking at this stage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under the recently applied closure rule the discussion of this motion is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not the closure.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the closure rules apply.

Mr. SPEAKER: A certain amount of latitude will always be allowed by me to the leader of the Government or to the leader of the Opposition in addressing the House or in giving reasons for taking a certain position. While the right hon. the leader of the House, as I understand, proposes to make an objection, I think it is but right that he should have opportunity to lay the basis for it.

[The Speaker.]

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I had no other idea than to make an objection but I wish to give point to my objection by laying the groundwork. I have given one reason why I make objection, but there is another and a still more urgent one. This House has been in session for six months; we are approaching within four weeks of the time when the term of Parliament will expire by effluxion. We have very important business now on the Order Paper which we proposed to go on with this day. This motion is interposed. I think it is a matter of relative urgency, which the House should take into consideration, as between this motion and the measure which is before the House taking into account that it has to be passed through this House, and through the Senate, and that the time is very short in which to do that. I think the relative urgency is altogether in favour of going on with the regularly proposed business of the House. Furthermore, and stronger still, it is the wish of this House, and it has so been expressed that as soon as possible the country may come to a decision as to the point at issue. It is impossible for the country to have a basis of coming to a decision, unless we have a franchise measure and provision for the preparation of the lists passed by both Houses, for the country to give its decision upon. That is absolutely necessary. When these great matters absolutely necessary to the decision of the country are pending, why should we interpose with a subsidiary matter and one of less relative urgency? It is on these grounds, which might be amplified if it were necessary for me to do it—hon. gentlemen can see the point for themselves—that I object to the time and business of this House being broken into by the discussion of a question, the discussion of which cannot come to any final issue and which precludes the attention of the House being given to matters of infinitely greater urgency and more essential importance.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As to the latter objection which my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) takes, that it is important to proceed with the consideration of the Franchise Bill which is now before the House, I have only to say that we have a Franchise Act already and that we do not require any Franchise Bill at all. The measure which has been introduced is not at all an improvement in the Franchise Act which we have on the statute book. I think it is a distinctly retrograde step to interfere with the Franchise Act which we already have. However, that is only by the way. As to the motion of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) you, Sir, have taken the objection that the matter of munitions has been very often discussed during the present sessions. It has, but it has never been discussed from the point of view that is now raised by my hon. friend from Pictou. We have discussed this matter from different points of view but it now takes on an entirely new aspect from the fact that we are threatened with a suspension or cessation of the manufacture of munitions. That is the point to which my hon. friend wants to call the attention of the House. If it be true that the manufacture of munitions is about to cease in Canada, may I not suggest to you, Sir, that there is no subject of more importance to-day not only to the Imperial forces and the Imperial cause but to the Canadian people themselves than the matter which has been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend. Everybody knows that the manufacture of munitions is about the only industry living and prospering at the present time in Canada and if it ceases altogether economic questions of the greatest importance must be taken into consideration. It is for these reasons that I say that the motion of my hon. friend is perfectly in order. It directs the attention of the House to the question of munitions from a point of view from which it has not been considered before and it is highly desirable that we should have the consensus of the House on this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Objection is taken by the right hon. the leader of the House (Sir George Foster) to the motion presented by the hon. member for Pictou. It is my duty to ask the House to decide whether it will accept the objection taken by the right hon. the leader of the House or whether it will permit the hon. member to proceed. Objection having been taken, I will ask those hon. members who support the motion to rise in their places.

And more than twenty members having risen in their places:

Mr. SPEAKER: I call upon the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to proceed with the motion.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, I have no apology to make to the House or the country for directing the attention of Parliament this afternoon to this important matter. We have on various occasions in the past, when questions of this kind have come up for discussion, been told that they were not proper matters for the consideration of Parliament. I do not know upon what ground that suggestion is made because any one who follows the deliberations of the Imperial Parliament has seen that the methods of producing munitions and the arrangements for their supply are subjects often discussed in that Parliament. No subject has engaged the attention of the British Parliament to the same extent as this question of the organization of the nation for the purpose of obtaining its munition supply. In every nation which has engaged in this war, in every overseas dominion that has played its part at the front and has had anything to do with furnishing supplies, either food supplies or munitions for the purpose of enabling the fight to be effectively carried on, the problems of this service have always been regarded as of the first importance. In view of the fact, Sir, that we have been told that this country should be congratulated upon the wonderful part it has played in providing munitions of war in the past, when we are reaching a stage when the industry and the production are being absolutely menaced, if not actually and completely effaced, I am surprised that the leader of the House should venture to say that this is not a matter of prime importance.

My right hon. friend the leader of the House seems to be one of those gentlemen who, after they have expressed themselves with regard to the war, with that broad Tory spirit which has always been characteristic of him, think that, no matter what the views of other hon. gentlemen may be as to what Canada should do in the war, they have no right to open their mouths. I have as much right to express my opinion as to what Canada should do in this war as has the right hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman.

What are the facts in regard to this matter? Shortly after the war began this country was supposed to be in no position to produce munitions. There arose this great industry at a time of the great depression in Canada in the fall of 1914, which has given employment to thousands of men and women throughout the country. As the result of that industry, we have been able to send to Great Britain thousands of shells of the most effective type and of the best possible construction, which have been of the most material assistance to the Allies and to the homeland in the fight in Flanders and elsewhere. Now we find that within the last two weeks the intimation has gone abroad that those industries have in a great many cases absolutely discontinued the manufacture of shells. Great numbers of men and women have been discharged from employment. Many of these men are not of military age, but they were giving their best service to the country in the war. The women also were playing a great part by helping to produce munitions. Under those conditions I am astonished at the right hon. gentleman having the audacity to say to the House and the country that we have no right to discuss the question of the stoppage of that production. Not only have we been sending shells of different varieties, but we have been sending steel ingots from which the shells were being forged on the other side of the Atlantic. I understand the situation in Canada to be that a great number of the industries which have been producing certain types of shells have been notified that they must stop altogether. This notification comes without the slightest preliminary warning. Large amounts of capital have been invested in these industries, and machines of all kinds have been obtained and put to work. People who were dependent upon these industries for employment and for their livelihood have been laid aside without any notice whatever. There is no suggestion of compensation either to the people who have their capital invested or to the workers who have been depending upon the industry for their livelihood. Without a word of warning they are notified that no more shells will be produced.

What is the reason of this? There has been no large discussion upon this shell question during this session of Parliament. Whenever hon. gentlemen on this side of the House ventured to mention the matter we were told it was a matter of Imperial concern, which is not correct for it is largely a question of Canadian concern. On 25th August last I asked the right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Sir George Foster) for some information in regard to the matter, and he said:

Sir George Foster: I should prefer that the full answer be given by the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister, but if there be any stoppage of the manufacture of shells in this country or any diminution, as I believe there is to be, it is because the variety of shell whose manufacture will be diminished or discontinued is not now needed from Canada, as they are able to produce them in sufficient quantities in Great Britain.

That is all the hon. gentleman knew of this important question two weeks ago. Has he learned anything further about it since? The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), on the following Monday, made a further statement in regard to the matter, and in the course of that statement, he said, as reported in Hansard of that day:

The minister—

That is, the Imperial Minister of Munitions.

—has now advised that it is unnecessary to continue production in Canada on the present scale. He has directed that certain lines shall be discontinued; that other lines shall be produced in lessened quantities; while some lines are to be continued as at present.

The effect of this will be to stop the production of shells and components at some plants which are now producing sizes no longer required.

The manufacture of the larger shells has been discontinued. The orders for these small shells have been coming in, but it is impossible to maintain these industries, or to continue their organization, under these conditions. The result is that the production of shells in Canada is to be stopped altogether. The Minister of Finance went further and said:

These changes have been anticipated by several important firms, who have already resumed, or are planning to resume, their pre-war activities in their own lines.

In all these steel industries there were no pre-war activities. Under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite, in the summer of 1914, the steel industries of this country were closing their doors. Perhaps my hon. friend's policy will bring about the same condition again. He does not care whether shells are produced in Canada and sent to Great Britain, as long as he gets his Franchise Bill put through. The Government, through its inaction, is bringing back the pre-war condition, the pre-war lack of work and bread, which existed in this country previous to 1914, without attempting to provide a remedy. My hon. friend went on to say:

During July, we advanced $35,000,000; during August we are advancing $35,000,000, and we have arranged to continue the advances of $25,000,000 a month, during September, October, November and December, so that the Dominion Government will continue to make the advances which we have been making in the past.

If hon. gentlemen in this House or any gentleman in the country can tell us, from these two explanations, what the attitude of the Government is in regard to this business, I hope he will do so. For myself I confess an inability to gather it. The situation is that the shell industry in Canada has been stopped, and why? Is it because shells are not needed across the ocean, where the war, in all its cruelty and fierceness, is proceeding with greater intensity than in previous times? The demand for shells is just as great now as ever. Are we in Canada going to stop supplying shells? If so, why? We must remember that the history of this whole question of shell production in Canada is this: The Government, through the original committee, proceeded to form an organization which allotted contracts and initiated the shell production. That was carried on for some time. Then we had the Imperial Munitions Board. But nothing has been initiated by this Government in any way in connection with shell production. Why should we not ascertain where we are in regard to this matter? Is the Government going to move in it, or is it not? What course was pursued in Great Britain? There they had a registration of the man-power of the nation, and they nationalized the shell industry. Every shell manufactory was taken over by the Government, and operated by them. It is a well-known fact that a great number of men were brought back from the front in order to engage in the shell industry in Great Britain, while a large number of women of the old land were engaged in these industries. Is it because there are plenty of shells being made in Great Britain, that they do not require assistance from outside? If that is the reason, the country should know it. If there is any other reason the country should know it. Is it because of any financial reason? In this connection I would call the attention of the House to a speech made by Mr. Rowell, as reported in the press, in which he gives a financial reason for the stoppage of the manufacture of shells.

> Britain is giving her orders for munitions to the United States and our workers are threatened with closing down, for why? Because Great Britain has now come to the point where she cannot possibly pay in gold, after the great assistance she has given to the allies and she must purchase on credit. The United States can sell her on these conditions, and why should not Canada be able to do likewise?

I think the question asked by Mr. Rowell is a very pertinent one. The discussion to ascertain where we stand on this matter was absolutely necessary. Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or will the Minister of Finance, tell us that the situation is that, by reason of financial arrangements by Great Britain, she is now purchasing shells in the United States, while, by reason of no financial arrangement having been made by Canada, Britain is not going to purchase them in Canada? If these are the reasons we ought to know it; because if financial arrangements can be made under which this industry can be continued, such arrangements ought to be made, for Canada, and our people should be called upon, if necessary, to make sacrifices to that end. What has been the position for the last three years? All over this country, by reason of the shell industry, and the tremendous amounts of money that have been paid to those who work in that industry, we have had prosperity in every industrial centre, which prosperity has helped the Minister of Finance to swell his revenues and has provided the money with which his loans were taken up and our patriotic funds maintained. All these things were largely due to the shell manufacture and its correlative industries. Every iron and steel industry in this country that could produce shells has been working overtime; they have been disregarding the production of staple articles in order to engage in the manufacture of shells. Are these activities to be stopped? Is this country to be thrown back to where it was in 1914?

Is the question one of transportation? Tremendous injury has been inflicted upon the shipping of allied and neutral nations by the German submarine campaign, and the suggestion has been made in some quarters that that accounts for the difficulty experienced in transporting shells. While the shell itself is not being exported, I understand that Great Britain is still importing from the United States and Canada large quantities of steel ingots, out of which the shell is bored. If this raw material can be transported in large quantities, there is no reason why the shell itself cannot be transported. It does not weigh as much as the ingot, and it does not take up as much room; so that the argument made with regard to the difficulty of transportation does not prevail. If shells are needed at the front and if they can be transported as easily as shell steel can be transported, what justification is there for the present condition in respect of the manufacture of shells in Canada?

I have referred to the advantages which have come to Canada as a result of this industry. Those advantages are well known; why should they be swept away?

If the question of finance is not at the bottom of it, why has the Minister of Finance made the statement that he has made? Why have we had the statements that have been made in the matter by Mr. Rowell? Is it a fact that this country is not in a position to supply the money for the production of shells in Canada? Great Britain is paying the cost of the maintenance of our troops overseas. Instead of sending money across to pay those bills, we have been paying for the production of shells sent across the ocean. Is that practice to be discontinued? If Canada is in this way to stop paying what she owes to Great Britain, the people ought to know it; such a course would be a grave mistake on the part of the financial people of Canada. Is the shell industry of Canada to be allowed to become extinct? Men over military age have mortgaged their properties in order that they might engage in the shell business; are they to be told, upon a week's notice, that the whole of the product of their capital is worth nothing? Are the machines that have been used in the shell industry all over Canada to be scrapped? What is going to happen to my hon. friend's business profits tax? He will have to revise his estimate of the amount of money that he will receive during the year 1917 if the business profits of the men who have been engaged in the shell industry are to be swept away for the remainder of the year.

The method adopted of dealing with the production of shells in Canada is not satisfactory. There should be no Imperial Munitions Board in this country; Canada should herself deal with the problem of manufacturing shells. Canada should do what Great Britain did: take over and operate the shell factories. If the shell industry is to be destroyed it is not because shells are not required at the front; there must be some other reason. I represent a constituency in which 2,000 men are thrown out of employment, a great number of them men over military age, who now have no means of livelihood—and we are on the threshold of another winter. This matter is one of most urgent importance. I want to know, first, whether this country is to have its hands tied; whether it is to go out of the business of helping the Allies in the war through the production of shells. I want to know, secondly, why it is that men who have invested capital in this industry are to lose their money; that workmen who have been dependent upon this industry for their livelihood are to be thrown out of employment. I want to know whether Mr. Rowell was right when he said yesterday in Toronto that Great Britain had made an arrangement with the United States under which Great Britain should purchase supplies in that country, not by payment in gold, but through the medium of credit. If the United States can sell to Great Britain under these conditions, why should Canada not be able to do so? It was in order that this important matter might be discussed that I moved the adjournment of the House. The men who have invested capital in this industry want to know why they should be struck down at one blow; the men who have been employed in the making of shells want to know why they should be put out of work when there is great need for shells across the ocean. Hon. gentlemen opposite, during the last two and a half years, have been laying the flattering unction to their souls that prosperity has come to Canada through the war, particularly through the manufacture of shells, and have claimed unlimited credit from the people. Yet when the shell industry is discontinued the matter is not of importance to them; Parliament, in their view, should not devote an hour and a half to its consideration.

Parliament has a right to know frankly and fully from this Government what they are going to do in regard to this matter. Are there difficulties which cannot be solved? Are the conditions insurmountable? Is Canada not to play her full part through the production of munitions in assisting Great Britain and the Allies to the utmost of her industrial ability? Is she not to provide employment for the older men and for the women who are compelled to remain at home?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, although I am of opinion that it was entirely unnecessary for my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) to bring this matter to the attention of the House, a full statement having previously been made respecting it, I desire to make a very brief reply. On August 27, I stated, in reply to a question by the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) with reference to this matter, that the Imperial Munitions Board, which represents the British Government in the placing of munition orders in Canada, had handed out to the press the following explanation with regard to the production of munitions in this country on a slightly different scale from what had prevailed hitherto:

Ottawa, 21st August, 1917.

Towards the close of 1916 the capacity for producing munitions in Great Britain had so increased that the Minister of Munitions advised that it was unnecessary to continue the production of munitions in the United States for British account, except for a few special lines. The production in Canada, however, was continued as before.

The minister has now advised that it is unnecessary to continue production in Canada on the present scale. He has directed that certain lines shall be discontinued; that other lines shall be produced in lessened quantities; while some lines are to be continued as at present.

The effect of this will be to stop the production of shells and components at some plants which are now producing sizes no longer required. In other plants, where shells are made of sizes of which a reduced output only is required, it will mean working during the day only, thus stopping night work. In other plants, however, where sustained production is required, operations will be continued night as well as day.

These changes have been anticipated by several important firms, who have already resumed, or are planning to resume, their prewar activities in their own lines, while others are engaged in the production or preparation for production, of equipment needed for ships now under construction or to be built during 1918.

The reasons for the diminution of shell orders is clearly set forth in that statement. It is no doubt within the knowledge of the House that, by reason of the exchange situation which prevails between Great Britain and the United States, it is an object to Great Britain, from a financial standpoint, to manufacture as much of her own requirements as possible on the other side of the Atlantic. She is continuing to order in this country the shells which she specially requires, and my hon. friend is entirely mistaken in his statement that the shell industry of Canada is to be effaced. He had the information in the answer which I gave him, which would have told him that that conclusion was entirely unfounded, as I know he believes, because, instead of the Dominion Government decreasing the amount which we have supplied to the Imperial Government for the production of shells in Canada, we have, during the last two or three months, greatly increased that amount. I pointed out to my hon. friend, upon the occasion to which I have referred, that we had been paying $25,000,000 per month to the Imperial treasury for the purpose of paying for munitions in the Dominion of Canada. I may say that in July and August we paid out much more than $25,000,000 each month for that purpose. I may say further that we have arranged, as my hon. friend has stated, to pay the sum of $25,000,000 per month for September, October, November and December for shells, and it is our intention to continue such payments as long as the war lasts. Let us consider for a moment what that means. $25,000,000 per month is easily said, but $25,000,000 per month means $300,000,000 per year. That is equal to two loans of $150,000,000, one every six months

In order that this House may see how the Dominion Government has risen to the occasion so far as supplying funds to the Imperial Government is concerned, I desire to submit just a few figures, promising not to take up too much of the time of the House. In round figures we have supplied the following amounts to the Imperial treasury during this year: January, $20,000,000; February, $25,000,000; March, $34,000,000; April, $25,000,000; May, $26,000,000; June, $36,000,000; July, $48,000,000; August, $37,000,000; and the estimate for the month of September is $40,000,000. Not only is the Dominion Government supplying money to the Imperial treasury for the production of munitions in Canada, but it is by reason of the action of the Dominion treasury in financing the Imperial treasury that the dairymen of Canada today are able to sell their cheese to the British Cheese Commission. For many years the cheese industry of Canada has been built up by reason of the export market which existed in Great Britain. If the Dominion Government had not undertaken to supply the $40,000,000 which represents the value of Canada's export cheese, the dairy farmers of this country would not today be able to sell their cheese in Great Britain, and there is no market to-day for that cheese in the United States. The dairy farmers of Canada, by reason of the action of the Dominion Government in furnishing that $40,000,000, are deriving over 21 cents per pound for their cheese. The Dominion treasury, therefore, since July, has undertaken to furnish $25,000,000 per month and more for munitions, and in addition has undertaken to supply $40,000,000 for the purchase of cheese by the British Cheese Commission in Canada, and some $10,000,000 additional for purchases made for the War Office account by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Have any arrangements been made with relation to the purchase of wheat?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No arrangements have been made as to the purchase of wheat. That in the past has always been carried out, as my hon. friend knows, through the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the minister mention what is the condition in regard to bacon?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was coming to that in a moment—I am glad my hon. friend reminded me, although I do not think I would have forgotteen it. At present Canada's bacon is going forward to Great Britain, but it has been drawn to my attention that the British Government may require some assistance in connection with the purchase of Canada's bacon, which means so much, as my hon. friend from Edmonton knows, to the hog industry of Canada. Nobody knows that better than my hon. friend. The only reason I mention these things is that I desire the House to know that the problem is a large one and not confined to munitions. It touches the farmer in his production of cheese, hogs and cattle, so that the financial question is a large one, and the point I desire to draw to the attention of the House is that the Dominion Government has been supplying the Imperial treasury, for the purposes which I have mentioned, with vast sums of money, sums which it would in the period preceding this war have been deemed absolutely impossible for us to supply. I venture to say that no member of this House, and no citizen of this country, would have predicted that it was possible for the Dominion Government to assist the Imperial treasury to the extent that I have indicated since the outbreak of this war.

I desire the House to know in connection with this debate, although it has been placed in Hansard before, the magnitude of the financial operations which the Dominion Government has carried on for the Imperial treasury. It is not sufficient to say that these operations are a set-off to the expenditures made by Great Britain for Canada in respect of our troops overseas. The fact of the matter is that Canada has been able since the beginning of this war not only to pay her own way, but to give Great Britain a sum exceeding $100,000,000 towards the prosecution of the war, through the purchase of munitions and supplies in this country. Since the outbreak of this war the Dominion Government has advanced in cash and securities, which securities were pledged in New York and furnished the basis of an Imperial credit there, no less a sum than $443,000,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister explain the nature of those securities?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We issued to the Imperial treasury about $112,000,000 of 3½ and 4 per cent securities maturing in 1928 and 1945, in liquidation of advances made by the Imperial Government. The Imperial Government pledged those securities in New York and used them along with other securities as the basis of a large loan which they raised there in the period preceding the entry of the United States into the war.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the Imperial Government have to pay interest?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, we pay it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not the Imperial Government pay interest to this Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. We have given them the securities, and we pay the interest because the securities are given.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wanted to know whether or not the Imperial Government pays interest to Canada upon the advances that Canada makes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is an adjustment of interest on both sides. We charge interest here, and they charge interest there. The point I was making was that Canada has advanced in cash and securities $100,000,000 more to Great Britain than Great Britain has advanced to Canada since the outbreak of this war. So far as the munitions industry is concerned, the Dominion Government is furnishing more money now per month than it has furnished since the war began. I have stated that it is our intention to continue the payments of $25,000,000 per month until the end of the year, and it is our expectation that we shall be able to continue them until the end of the war. Further, the Dominion Government has financed for the Imperial Government the purchase of Canada's export cheese production, which otherwise would not have been able to find a market, and we have been approached and are now considering the question of furnishing credits which will enable the Imperial treasury to buy other foodstuffs in Canada.

This financial question is a large one, and we have met it in a large way. The only objection I have to make, although I do not desire to be controversial, is this: When I was faced in July last with the problem of raising over $100,000,000 within a period of two months to meet the requirements of the Imperial treasury in its purchase of munitions and supplies in this country, and when, in order to do that, I went to New York and faced the interest conditions which I was obliged to face there, and floated a loan of $100,000,000, I was never criticised more severely by the hon. member for Pictou and other hon. gentlemen opposite. That was done in order that the Imperial Government might be supplied with money for the purchase of munitions, cheese and other supplies from this country. In war time you face war conditions, pay war rates of interest, and war rates of commissions. The Dominion Government has used every effort in order to meet the huge financial requirements of the Imperial treasury in making purchases of munitions and other supplies in this country. That has been our policy, and that will be our policy.

4 p.m.

There was no reason why this motion should be put forward, because the munitions industry is not by any means threatened with effacement. The Dominion Government is paying to the Imperial Munitions Board every month more than it has ever paid in preceding months, and we propose to continue the policy which will give to Great Britain the shells which it requires and which can be made in this country. But it must be borne in mind that the Dominion Government and this Parliament have a large family. There is not only the manufacturer of munitions to be considered, but the farmer, with his cheese, and hogs and other foodstuffs. All these things must be considered in connection with the financial programme of the Imperial treasury and the assistance which will be afforded by the Dominion Government.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): I have not very much to say on the question now before the House, but it does seem to me that the remarks of the Minister of Finance amply justify the motion of my hon. friend from Pictou. If the only result of this discussion were to clear up the situation and give to the people of this country the information which they desire on this matter, my hon. friend would have been more than justified in making his motion.

I cannot quite appreciate the argument of the Minister of Finance. He has stated that Canada is continually paying out hundreds of millions of dollars to aid the British treasury. But we all know that Great Britain is paying out hundreds of millions of dollars continually for the upkeep of our troops in France and Flanders and Great Britain, and we, therefore, are simply discharging a debt which we owe to Great Britain for the upkeep of our soldiers. The question resolves itself into this: It is stated that the manufacture of munitions in Canada is to be stopped, and that the manufacture of munitions in the United States is to be continued, because the British Government can get munitions in the United States on credit, but cannot get them here on credit, as apparently Canada is not able to finance the munitions industry. Canada up to the present time has done nothing more than meet its obligations to Great Britain for the upkeep of our army in Great Britain and France, and has hardly done that. The minister has not yet explained to the House, on this or any other occasion, whether our munitions factories are to be maintained in the position which they have occupied in the past, and which we hope they will maintain in the future. As was stated at the opening of this discussion by the leader of the Opposition, the munitions factories in Canada are about the only factories that are really profit-earning institutions at the present time. So far as the Niagara district is concerned, in the town of Welland we have four large munitions factories, all of which are on an excellent financial basis. These factories have all expended large sums in extending their plant and putting in new machinery, and up to the present they have not made enormous profits, even though prices have been high.

If the manufacture of munitions is shut off in Canada, these institutions instead of being profit-earning institutions, will practically be operating at a loss. It will be a very great disaster to Canada, not only in that particular section, but all over Canada, if the manufacture of munitions is cut down. As far as I am able to judge, there is no reason why munitions should not be manufactured in Canada as well as in the United States. There is no reason why they should not all be manufactured in Canada instead of any of them being manufactured in the United States, inasmuch as it is a question of the credit that can be given by the Canadian or the United States Governments. Our Government is very expert in preparing legislation for franchise, and voters' lists Acts for winning elections, apparently, but they are not so astute in preparing legislation to protect the industries of this country in this time of strife and trouble. The minister should have given us very much more information than he has given and he should have assured the people of Canada that the manufacture of munitions would not be curtailed, much less put an end to, and that all the munitions which are to be made on this side of the Atlantic for the British Government would be made in Canada instead of being made in the United States.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has twice made the statement that whilst the order has gone forth that the manufacture of munitions for the British army would not be continued in Canada, they are continuing to purchase similar munitions in the United States. Is my hon. friend sure of his ground? My information is absolutely to the contrary.

Mr. GERMAN: The report which goes forth to the country, whether correct or incorrect, is that the British Government will purchase their munitions in the United States and that the manufacture of munitions in Canada, if not wholly done away with, will be curtailed to a practically infinitesimal amount.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: By taking up that report and taking it as true, if he does not know that it is true, my hon. friend puts behind it the responsibility of a member of Parliament. Perhaps I might go a little farther and say to my hon. friend that if there be any such report as that it is absolutely unfounded.

Mr. GERMAN: The circumstances of the situation do not appear to show that it is unfounded, because the manufacture of munitions in Canada is being very largely curtailed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The manufacture of similar munitions for the British Government in the United States was curtailed months ago. Contracts that were entered into were dissolved and no new contracts have been entered into.

Mr. GERMAN: Whether or not the statement which my right hon. friend makes is correct—and I will not deny that it is correct—we know that the manufacturers of munitions in Canada are being told that they will not have an opportunity of supplying these munitions in the future as in the past, whereas, at the same time, the manufacture of munitions in the United States is being carried on to a very large extent. Whether correct or incorrect, the report is that the British Government will be purchasing more munitions in the United States, because they can get credit there and they cannot get credit in Canada.

If that report is incorrect, then this discussion is well brought before us to-day, because it will be a very excellent opportunity for the Government to explain the whole situation, that the people may know just where they stand and what is likely to happen. We cannot afford to allow the industries which since the war broke out have been really the back-bone of this country, to be cut down or curtailed, if it is at all possible to maintain them by any action of this Government in supplying larger credits to Great Britain. That is the whole question. If we can provide the credit up to the extent that munitions can be supplied in Canada as well as they are being supplied in the United States, then our industries will get the benefit. It behooves the Government at this time to take great care that our financial situation is such that we can maintain a credit here which will result in the maintenance of those industries which have been in existence during these years, and which we hope will continue during the remainder of the war.

Mr. G. W. KYTE, (Richmond): I desire to say a word or two upon this subject, because a very considerable—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, Oh.

Mr. KYTE: I am sorry to see that some of my hon. friends on the other side are like the Minister of Trade and Commerce in not considering this a very important question.

An hon. MEMBER: You do not, either.

Mr. KYTE: It is a very important question. A large proportion of the population in eastern Nova Scotia has been engaged in the manufacture of munitions during the last three years. I might recall to the House the condition of affairs which existed as regards unemployment in Canada previous to the outbreak of the war. We know that in the large cities, from 1912 to 1914 there was a very severe condition of unemployment. We also know that in the city of Ottawa, in the very shadow of the Parliament Buildings, a procession of 500 unemployed men walked to the City Hall and demanded that provision be made by the city for the support and maintenance of their families, as a result of their inability to secure remunerative work. At the outbreak of the war large industries were established which relieved to a very great extent the situation. Recently notice has been given by certain manufacturers of munitions, in eastern Canada particularly, that the contracts are to be discontinued hereafter, and a great deal of unemployment has resulted. In the town of New Glasgow, for instance, two thousand men were thrown out of employment without a moment's notice. Naturally they are concerned in knowing what is to be provided as a substitute for the employment which had heretofore given them a livelihood and which is no longer available. The Minister of Finance referred to the unfavourable condition of exchange, which he said made it impossible for the British Government to place any further contracts with the manufacturers of munitions in Canada. We know that some months ago the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour and others associated with him came to the United States as a commission, to go into the question of the placing of contracts with the United States Government in respect of war munitions. We are also aware of the fact that the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) visited Washington at that time, and it was presumed he was more especially the representative of the Canadian Government.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Will my hon. friend allow me? Did I understand him to say that Mr. Balfour came to the United States for the purpose of making contracts with the United States for war munitions?

Mr. KYTE: No, he came for the purpose of discussing with the United States certain matters of interest on behalf of the Imperial Government, which had relation to financial questions in regard to the carrying out of war contracts.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is a very different thing.

Mr. KYTE: The Minister of Trade and Commerce visited Washington at that time, and while we have had no official information on the subject so far as I am aware, I presume his object is to associate himself, as the special representative of the Government of Canada, with the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour. With regard to the question of finances, I have only to say this: For the last four or five days we have been engaged in discussing certain estimates which have been submitted to Parliament. It was pointed out on several occasions by hon. members on this side of the House, that at this particular time when the question of finances so largely entered into the carrying on of our obligations in respect of munitions as well as other contributions to the British Government, it would be well for the Finance Minister to pare down these estimates and reduce the expenditures as much as possible. We have had estimates totalling $254,000,000, of which some $50,000,000 odd were supplementary estimates, placed before Parliament at this session. If there is any question as regards the subject of exchange or the difficulty of supplying money for the purpose of carrying out these contracts, I really think the Finance Minister would have acted very much more wisely if he had provided against that emergency and stricken from those estimates a very large amount which could very properly be classed as unnecessary expenditure. For instance, there was an item of some $269,000 for telephones in British Columbia, as well as many other items to which reference might be made. The fact is the Government appears to be as helpless in respect of meeting this situation as they are in every other situation which has been presented to them. I think it is the duty of the Government to make some effort to provide employment for the working people of Canada to replace the employment which has ceased in respect of the manufacture of munitions. There is great necessity for shipbuilding in Canada, particularly in eastern Canada. This industry would provide employment for a great number of men. It is impossible for the Government under present conditions to continue the manufacture of munitions, I feel it would be desirable for them to open up some other means of employment, so as to relieve the very serious condition which is likely to result during the coming months.

Mr. PUGSLEY (St. John, N.B.): I wish to say a few words upon this subject, because it is one which is not only of very general interest but is of especial interest to the constituency I represent, as we have two large munition factories in St. John. I am sure that any sudden stoppage of the manufacture of munitions would result in very great hardship in a large number of cases, not only from a financial standpoint but to many workpeople who would be thrown out of employment. I have in mind one factory which was recently erected more especially for the manufacture of shells in which, I believe, about $750,000 to $1,000,000 is invested. I am sure that factory was erected with the confident expectation that the manufacture of shells in Canada would be continued upon the same scale as previously until the close of the war, or until some decisive victory at all events, had been won. I would not for a moment attempt to disparage what this Government has done towards assisting Great Britain in connection with the purchase of war supplies. I think the Government has done well. At the same time it must not be forgotten that were it not for the wonderful response the people of Canada made to the requirements of the Government nothing could have been accomplished. While my hon. friend takes great credit to the Government and to the Minister of Finance——

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I give all the credit to the people.

Mr. PUGSLEY—he must not forget that Canada has willingly and cheerfully responded to the demands made since the opening of the war. I hope my hon. friend will give all the credit to the people, because it is the people who have been paying out these enormous sums of money which have enabled the Government to give such assistance to the Empire. But, Mr. Speaker, would it not occur to you that the very fact that Canada has done so well and that she has been able to finance so largely for Great Britain is the very best possible reason why the Government should insist upon the manufacture of shells being continued in Canada? My hon. friend has given the very best of reasons why the manufacture of shells should not cease. I think the minister ought to have informed the House—because I think the country has a right to know—what report has been made to the British Government as a result of the notices which have gone out that the production of shells is to be lessened if not discontinued in Canada. Indeed, we know that the manufacture of some descriptions of shells is to be entirely discontinued. Let me refer for a moment to the letter from the chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, which my hon. friend read to the House. It will bear reading again, because it shows a state of affairs which, I think, is deserving of the most earnest consideration of the Government. The letter reads:

Ottawa, 21st August, 1917.

Towards the close of 1916 the capacity for producing munitions in Great Britain had so increased that the Minister of Munitions advised that it was not necessary to continue the production of munitions in the United States for British account, except for a few special lines. The production in Canada, however, was continued as before.

The minister has now advised that it is unnecessary to continue production in Canada on the present scale. He has directed that certain lines shall be discontinued; that other lines shall be produced in lessened quantities; while some lines are to be continued as at present.

If language means what it says, the people of Canada must clearly understand that the manufacture of certain lines of shells is to be discontinued. If the intention of the British Government is as expressed in the letter of the chairman of the Munitions Board, it must mean a very great decrease in production, and must mean turning thousands of people in Canada, men and women, out of employment, which will produce a condition of distress in this country during the coming winter. Is not that a subject which ought to engage the attention of this Government? Is not that a matter on which representations should have been made by this Government to the British Government? There is no statement—and it is inconceivable that there would be a statement—that the British Government do not want munitions. The explanation is, either that Great Britain intends to continue upon the same extensive scale, or to engage upon a larger scale than heretofore, the manufacture of munitions in England, or that she is going to obtain munitions upon a larger scale from the United States. The time has not arrived when the demand for munitions at the front is any less than it has been in the past. Surely the Minister of Finance should give the House some explanation in regard to the matter, some reason why the British Government is determined to reduce the manufacture of munitions in this country. The question surely is of sufficient importance to warrant correspondence between the Canadian and Imperial Governments. And yet upon that question the minister gives us no explanation. He apparently is content to allow the closing of the factories in Canada, and the throwing of thousands of people out of employment, without endeavouring to ascertain the cause, and without endeavouring to give any information to the people of Canada on this important subject. The minister says that Canada has financed Great Britain to such a degree that Great Britain is owing to this country at least one hundred millions more than Canada owes the Mother Country in connection with the prosecution of the war. If that is the case, does it not show what a splendid part Canada has taken in this war of the Empire, and that our people are entitled to the utmost consideration? Does it not show the strongest possible reason why, so far as possible, the manufacture of munitions should be continued in Canada? I think that this House and the people should be informed as to what effort the Dominion Government has made to induce the British Government adequately, so far as the manufacture of munitions and purchase of supplies is concerned, to recognize the splendid efforts which Canada has put forward, not only in finance but in sending troops to the front. Canada has done her part, and, so far as financing is concerned, has done more than her part; and I repeat that instead of there being any reason why this extraordinary order should have been given out by the chairman of the Munitions Board, there are the strongest possible reasons why the manufacture of munitions should continue on as large, if not larger, scale than in the past. I wish to emphasize the position taken by myself and other members of this House since the manufacture of shells in Canada began, that the work should have been undertaken by the Government as a government work. Shells should have been manufactured under the direction of the Government, and should have been supplied at actual cost. Reasonable wages should have been paid to the workmen engaged in the manufacture, but no such large profits should have been given as have been given to the manufacturers of munitions. We know—because the facts cannot be controverted—that early in this war, and in the early stages of the manufacture of shells, upwards of one hundred million dollars was wasted by the Shell Committee appointed by this Government under the direction of the late Minister of Militia. If good fair business methods had been adopted that amount of money could have been saved to the country and the Empire, and it would have represented, and represents to-day, all the surplus which the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) boastingly says this Government has provided for the Imperial Government. Up to that period this enormous sum of money was wasted, and we have every reason to believe that, even since the Imperial Munitions Board has taken charge, very large profits have gone to manufacturers which might have been saved if the Government had undertaken the production of shells as a Government work, and with a determination to supply the shells and other munitions of war to the Allies at actual cost, instead of having the work carried on by private parties, in many cases at enormous profit.

In conclusion, I desire to ask the Government to inform the House whether or not they have, as a Government, taken up this communication from the Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board; whether they have communicated with the British Government and endeavoured to ascertain the reason why this notice has been sent out, and why it is proposed to discontinue, or greatly reduce, the manufacture of shells in Canada? If the Government has any information on the subject; if any correspondence has taken place between the two Governments, that information should be placed before the House in order that Parliament and the country may be fully informed in the matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not wish to prolong the debate, but it seems to me to be necessary to make a few comments upon the discussion which has taken place. I wish to point out the peculiarity of the position that some hon. gentlemen on the other side have taken and the inconsistency of that position as compared with that heretofore taken by them. I shall refer only to the chief of these inconsistencies; my remarks will be brief.

The member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) suddenly becomes a champion of the munition industry in this country. He asks questions as to what has taken place, what will take place, and why. He says: why should the shell industry be stopped; should we not assist in the war by going on with the shell industry to the same extent that it has hitherto been proceeded with in Canada? He was brim full of enthusiasm, energy, vigour, insistence, when he urged that we must do our part in assisting in the war by making shells. I thought to myself that if he had only shown the same insistency, the same vigour, the same strength in an effort to assist in some other way in the prosecution of the war, he would be further ahead and this country would be further ahead than at present. Does my hon. friend not see that in this new born zeal for the munition industry he and his friends are becoming the champions of what they have hitherto denounced as a profiteering industry? He made a most plaintive appeal to the Minister of Finance to keep up the munitions business in order that profits might be obtained therefrom and in order that the minister might get from that source a portion of the necessary revenue. If ever there was an example of a man straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, the member for Pictou was such an example this afternoon—and I never knew him to strain more strenuously or swallow more successfully.

Is the munitions industry, my hon. friend says, to become extinct in this country? If he wants a straight answer to that question, I say, yes: I hope it is to become extinct; I hope that it will become extinct very quickly by the conclusion of this monstrous war which has made the manufacture of munitions in Canada necessary for so long a period. Can we contemplate the end of the war and yet make the demand that the same explosives shall be manufactured, the same munitions ordered, the same tremendous expense incurred as hitherto? These are the engines of war; they are destructive from A to Z, and when they cease because war ceases, a feeling of relief will be experienced in all parts of the world. The argument of the member for Pictou was that you must keep the war going for the sake of keeping up the manufacture of munitions in Canada, and of employing labour and capital and securing profits. Is Canada, the member for Pictou says, to have her hands tied in the manufacture of munitions? Why, he asks, should capital invested in the manufacture of munitions be struck down? Again I press my point against my hon. friend's argument. It is a vicious argument which, pressed to its logical conclusion, is nothing more or less than this: Do not restrict the output of munitions; do not strike down capital; do not restrain wages; keep up the war in order to keep all those things going. No other logical conclusion can be drawn from his argument.

I now come to the argument of the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). He, too, is deeply interested in the keeping up of the manufacture of munitions at the old rate in Canada. He, however, falls foul of the chief reasons given by the member for Pictou for his contentions. He (Mr. Pugsley) says that if he had his way he would have these manufactures of munitions so carried out by the Government that there would be no profits. Therefore the argument of the member for Pictou, as to keeping up the manufacture of munitions so that revenue may be obtained from the profits, falls to the ground. The two hon. gentlemen are not in agreement.

In all frankness and candour, what does the member for St. John mean? What does he argue for? What does he insist upon?

He says that Great Britain should continue to buy munitions in Canada and we to manufacture them. Let me once more revert to his intimation that while the manufacture of munitions is being restricted to a certain extent in Canada, shells are being purchased by Great Britain in the United States. This is absolutely not the fact. I have stated that before, there is no need of my reiterating it; I gave the information to the member for Welland (Mr. German). But here is the important thing: Why, the hon. gentleman asks, does Great Britain restrict or discontinue the manufacture of munitions in Canada? A straight answer to that is this: Because she is now able to supply in her own country all that she needs. Does my hon. friend argue that if Great Britain needs numberless and tremendously expensive supplies, she shall continue to obtain outside of her own territory what she can make to excess within her own borders? That is exactly what my hon. friend's argument amounts to. To demand that is to make a vicious demand, one not in the interests of Canada or of the Empire; one not in the interests of the war or of the conclusion of peace.

Does my hon. friend seriously argue that, because we in Canada would get wages and find employment by Great Britain coming here for munitions in excess of what she can make in her own country, therefore we ought selfishly to ask her to make that sacrifice and she ought to make that sacrifice in order that we might have that employment and those wages? Canada does not take that position. I am willing to leave that position to my hon. friend from St. John. There are things that Great Britain cannot produce in her own country and that we can produce in Canada, and there is peril to-day that Great Britain, owing to her financial position, will not be able to purchase from Canada what she absolutely needs of the beneficent production of this country. Yet my hon. friend from St. John would have this Government insist upon the British Government spending hundreds of millions of dollars in this country for munitions which can be made in Britain, to the detriment of the purchase in this country of the agricultural products which we can raise and which Great Britain cannot raise. There is no ground for such an argument as that or for insisting upon it. So far as this Government is concerned, we do not intend to insist upon that thing being done. We do not intend to take the vicious ground of demanding that Great Britain shall spend her millions in Canada getting made here what she can better and more cheaply make in Great Britain for the prosecution of the war, and thereby leave herself without funds to buy what is absolutely necessary, food for the British people, from Canada, which can and does raise that food and wishes to supply it. If this Government is going to urge the British Government to purchase anything in this country, it will be not munitions, but the fruits of the earth, the products of the soil, the farmer's increment, which Great Britain cannot supply and which we can supply in abundance. I leave my hon. friend from St. John to his argument that this Government shall make a plea to the Government of Great Britain that Great Britain shall continue to make her expenditures in this country in such a way that we may carry on the manufacture of munitions to the same extent as before. Great Britain has bought munitions in Canada to a tremendous extent. During the last two years and a half she has expended nearly $400,000,000 on munitions in this country. perhaps more than that, I have not the exact figures. She has done that because she has needed those things, because she was not then fully equipped for making them, and also because we financed the purchases for her. But as soon as she became thoroughly equipped to make all those munitions that she needed and has a surplus from which to supply her Allies, was it not wise and right that she should give that work to her own people, keep that money in her own country, and thereby more economically and cheaply throw her resources into the field for the successful prosecution of the war?

My colleague the Minister of Finance has very frankly laid before this House some phases of the financial question, about which we probably do not think as much as we might and which it is very difficult for us adequately to sense. It may very well be thought that Great Britain is the richest country in the world; that she has interminable resources. To a certain extent it is true that she is rich and has great resources; but the financial burdens imposed upon Great Britain from the beginning of the war are also beyond the power of the human mind to grasp. She has upon her shoulders the financial burden of maintaining the greatest fleet in the world, a fleet now almost double what it was at the beginning of the war. Instead of an army of 150,000 men which she had trained when the war began, she is maintaining an army of well up to four or five millions of men which she is maintaining. She carries on operations in every continent and in almost every quarter of the globe. She has her military expeditions in South Africa, Asia, Italy, the Balkans, Mesopotamia and at the front in France. She has contingents of her forces everywhere. She shoulders that whole work. Her Allies, France, Italy, Russia, Belgium and the Balkan States have depended upon Great Britain, and generously she has given them the support without which they could not have done what they have done. All that comes upon Great Britain and any one who will carefully think that over and try to realize what it means will come to the conclusion that there are not immeasurable depths of resources in Great Britain. To make a long story short, Great Britain to-day finds the very greatest difficulty in financing her needs and the needs of the war. Canada has stood behind her as no other outside dominions has done or has been able to do, not that others have not had as good a will, but they have not had the resources and therefore, they have not been able to do as much as Canada has done. But Canada has tried to do her share in that respect. Why do hon. gentlemen opposite continually minimize and scout at what Canada has done in this war? I am willing to make this proposition. If you will put before a committee of the first men of the world, versed in these affairs, Canada's effort and what she has done in these three years of war, their verdict would be that it was simply astounding that a country, with a population of 7,000,000, had done what Canada has done during this great and terrible struggle. But to hear some hon. gentlemen speak, one would think that Canada had done nothing; that she was absolutely useless in this whole war, wholly without effort, vigour, capacity or efficiency. Do not let us, for the sake of a personal or party advantage, disparage altogether the work, worth and effort—of the Government, do you say?—no, but of the people of Canada who alone have enabled the Government to do what they have done.

So the matter of financing for the future is a very difficult problem. Here was your cheese industry in Canada running up to $40,000,000, or $50,000,000, or $60,000,000. Britain was not able to finance for that cheese. So Canada came in and financed for it, and is doing it to this day. There is also your bacon and hog industry, and the live stock industry. Great Britain needed that chesse, but Great Britain is not able to-day to finance for what she absolutely needs from this country in the way of these products, and if it is to be done Canada must do it. Canada is prepared to do it to the utmost of her power—is doing it to-day and is organizing to do it in the future. Yonder in the West is a possible wheat crop with a surplus of anywhere between 100,000,000 and 200,000,000 bushels. If Great Britain does not buy that wheat, who will? If Great Britain does buy that wheat Great Britain must finance, and perhaps very largely through Canada herself. And yet here are gentlemen who plead with tears in their voices that we should keep up the munitions factories, and let our wheat lie in the elevators or on the prairies of the West. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) smiles. Well, a smile often betokens—but I will not characterize it. I say that no man who knows the facts of the whole financial situation so far as Canada is concerned, and its bearing upon this war, will smile when a minister makes the statements I have made here to-day. They are statements of the utmost gravity, which must sink into the hearts of the Canadian people, and which one day will make them feel very differently towards this matter than they do even at the present time. I am sorry I have been led into making these extended remarks. I do not pretend to convince these gentlemen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You omitted the Canadian Northern obligations.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the Quebec and Saguenay railway.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I did that very largely out of sympathy—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not forgetfulness.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: —with my hon. friends opposite. Yet they occupy the fortunate position of having led this country into a cul de sac, and then sit back and laugh at those who must make their way out.

Mr. OLIVER: Whatever question there might have been in the mind of any one in the House as to the importance of the discussion precipitated by the hon. member for Pictou, there can be no question whatever as to its importance now, after the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The question of the ability of the British Empire to finance this war is surely big enough to engross the attention of the Canadian Parliament for an hour or two, and if that is properly a part of this discussion, then surely this discussion is more than justified. Even the Canadian Parliament can afford to take a little time in discussing a matter of such stupendous importance and interest. But, as a matter of fact, what the Canadian Parliament is here for is to take care of the finances of Canada, and of the business and industry of Canada; to take care that Canada does not lose her place in the race of progress, whether there is war or whether there is peace. And if the burden is all the greater when war is on, that only means that the Government and Parliament of Canada are charged with greater responsibility now than when peace prevails. Their business is to see that the best is done that can be done on behalf of Canada in her war operations, and in those peace operations which must necessarily succeed, if war is to be successfully maintained. Our efforts in active warfare are absolutely dependent upon our conditions of industry and production and taxpaying power at home, and the member of the Government who presumes to lead the consideration of Parliament away from that patent fact in describing the glories and the responsibilities of the British Empire is simply trying to avoid the question at issue.

5 p.m.

The question at issue is a very simple one. A great industry in Canada is being shut down in part. The hon. member for Pictou has stated that several hundreds, if not thousands, of his constituents have been thrown out of employment in the last few weeks, as a result of authority issued by the Imperial Munitions Board. That, I submit, is a matter of most supreme importance to the hon. member for Pictou, and if it is an indication of what is to take place throughout the Dominion, it is a matter of supreme importance to this Parliament and is entitled to the very best consideration that Parliament can give it. The country, I submit, is entitled to the very fullest information that can be given on this question—entitled to something entirely different from the broad generalizations, the glittering generalities that have been handed out to the House and the country by the two ministers who have already spoken.

It is a fact that several munitions plants in Canada have been shut down, and it is a fact that the announcement from the Imperial Munitions Board is to the effect that we must expect further shutting down of munitions plants in Canada. Now, whether or not we on this side of the House have spoken disparagingly of the men who have been carrying on these munitions enterprises because of the vast and unreasonable profit they have been permitted to make, has nothing whatever to do with the question of the investment of legitimate capital or the employment of legitimate industry in the conduct of those enterprises. We are entitled to pay heed to the question whether the enormous flow of money that has kept these industries in Canada going during the past year or two is to be stopped or whether it is to continue. If I gathered correctly what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) said, that flow of money is going to stop.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What made my hon. friend think that?

Mr. OLIVER: I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I meant the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster).

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I made the express statement that we were paying now more per month than we had ever done in the past, and that we had arranged to pay $25,000,000 a month to the Imperial treasury for munitions during October, November and December, and hoped to continue during the war.

Mr. OLIVER: That being the case, the question of financing does not enter into the matter of the withdrawal of the orders for munitions.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It does enter into it.

Mr. OLIVER: I gather from the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the withdrawal of munitions orders from Canada had much to do with the question of finance—British finance and Canadian finance.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: For larger amount, yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I am unable to correlate the arguments of my two hon. friends. I am to understand that we have the statement of the Minister of Finance that the orders are not being withdrawn because of any failure to finance on the part of Canada?

Mr. THOMAS WHITE: The statement I made was that we are continuing the payments which we have made monthly and that they have even been increased during July, August and September. But the point I was making when I interrupted my hon. friend was that if you had a fifty-million-a-month situation and Great Britain had to consider the purchase not only of munitions but of cheese, hogs and wheat, of course, there would be financial considerations entering into it.

Mr. OLIVER: As Great Britain has to purchase wheat, cheese and bacon as well as munitions—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Where would she get the money?

Mr. OLIVER: I say that as she has to purchase wheat, cheese and bacon as well the question of finance does enter into it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It does enter into it in regard to all her purchases, of course.

Mr. OLIVER: I gathered from what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that owing to the tremendous burden carried by the British Empire because of the war her financial resources were becoming diminished to such an extent that her purchases in Canada depended upon the ability of the Canadian Government to finance these purchases.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To a certain extent.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make that statement. If I am not right in that I wish to be corrected because all I want to get out of this discussion is the facts of the case. These facts are pressing; they are important. I desire in a moment to say something on another matter which comes very much more closely home to my part of the country. But as far as munitions are concerned it all rests upon the point that the business done by the British Government in Canada depends on the ability of Canada to finance that business.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Partly.

Mr. OLIVER: If it does, and if this business is being withdrawn from Canada, it is not because the munitions are not needed. Munitions are needed as much as they ever were and as far as I can see there is no reasonable prospect that they will not be needed for an indefinite period. The British Government must get munitions from somewhere and they must get food from somewhere. The financial condition being as it is, if Canada cannot finance the British Government for the food and munitions required from Canada, then Canada cannot supply that food and those munitions. I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce to intimate that the British Government was now able to produce all the munitions it required within its own territory. I am afraid my right hon. friend will have to admit that that is not correct. The British Government is purchasing munitions very largely in the United States at the present time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It will depend, as my hon. friend knows, on the definition of "munitions." We are discussing the munitions supplied in Canada for the British Government. There are types and varieties. Of those types and varieties Great Britain is not purchasing in other countries but there are other munitions of war which Canada cannot supply, which Great Britain cannot supply to the extent needed, and which she does get from other countries, notably from the United States. But our argument here is in reference to munitions of the types and varieties that have been made in this country. That is plain ground upon which we can approach the discussion of the question.

Mr. OLIVER: Precisely. We want to know what the facts are. It narrows down to this: Given Canadian ability to finance the purchase of munitions in Canada and given adaptability on the part of the Canadian manufacturers to produce the kind of munitions the British Government requires and to adapt their present plants and facilities to the production of these munitions, there is no necessity for the shutting down of these munition factories in Canada. If that is the fact, I submit it is up to the Government to see that Canada does finance the British Government to the extent of the purchases of these munitions, and it is up to the manufacturers of Canada to make such alterations in their plants as would enable them to supply the kinds of munitions that the British Government want.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I want to put this consideration to my honourable friend. If Great Britain is so situated that by keeping her own capital within her own borders and by employing her own people in her own industries, she can make all that is necessary, and more, of these munitions for the conduct of the war, is it economically a good thing to come to Canada, have these made here and distribute the money from her own country for that purpose in the present condition of the world's finances?

[Mr. Oliver.]

Or is it better that as she is in a position to make more than is necessary of those kinds of munitions required for the war, she should conserve her financial resources, and ours in co-operation with her, for the supply to her of what is absolutely necessary but what she cannot supply and of which Canada produces a surplus? I think there is an argument that my hon. friend will be inclined to take up.

Mr. OLIVER: I would be quite willing to accept it if that were the position, but it does not happen to be the position. The British Government, as I understand it, is buying a large quantity of munitions from the United States. My right hon. friend has admitted that, but he says they are of a different class from those manufactured by Canada. Well, then it is up to us to manufacture in Canada what the British Government wants.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend takes that position, will he go to the practical men in steel, in iron and other industries and ask them whether they are prepared to put capital into their establishments and machinery necessary to equip these establishments to make the kind of munitions of war which are being made in the United States and which Great Britain gets there—great guns and that kind of machinery? My hon. friend would find that there is no shadow of a chance of initiating such industries as these in Canada at this time.

Mr. OLIVER: I think there is every chance, if we have an enterprising and capable lot of people engaged in the manufacture of munitions. They were able, in the earlier stages of the war, to change from the manufacture of one kind of shell to another, which they did, and if they made that change I do not see why they could not make still another if it were necessary to keep the business in this country so that we would get the benefit of it. My right hon. friend must know from the reports in the press that many of the men who have been discharged from the closed-down munition factories in Canada have gone across the line and are making munitions in the munition plants in the United States, and, I presume, making the same identical class of munitions.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will allow me to get at the facts of the case. He knows, too, that within six months the United States has embarked in the great war, and she is equipping two million men to go to the front, and is spending billions of dollars to fit out those men with just this kind of material, and there never was, and probably never will be, such a scene of activity as is in the United States now—which will probably continue for the next two years—in the manufacture of equipment of war. If men do not find employment here they can go over there and find employment in the very same kind of work where they are multiplying their establishments by millions and billions of dollars for these purposes.

Mr. OLIVER: That explains how the men are able to get work on the other side, but it does not fill the vacuum in our business enterprises in this country.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Does he suggest that the Dominion Government could raise more money than it has raised for Imperial purposes, on the figures I gave? And, another question: if Canada is raising the money it can raise for Imperial purposes, and the Imperial Government requires munitions and foodstuffs, are foodstuffs to be put altogether to one side and munitions only regarded?

Mr. OLIVER: No. I do not know whether Canada has been raising to the limit of what she could raise.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend knows the figures well.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know whether she has been raising up to the limit of her possibilities in support of the carrying on of this war. Let me suggest this. My hon. friend speaks of Canada financing the British Government in the purchase of munitions and foodstuffs in the past. Canada has not been doing anything of the kind.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: She has been raising the money here.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend spoke of a balance of about $100,000,000—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We raised the money here.

Mr. OLIVER: But we would have had to raise the money to maintain our troops in the Old Country, if we had not had that arrangement with the British Government. It was just as much to our advantage as it was to the advantage of the British Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But, the money has been raised.

Mr. OLIVER: That is true. Let us take credit for doing what we have done in the financing of our part in the war, but let us not take credit for financing the Government of Great Britain, when we are not doing it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let me ask my hon. friend another question. No matter for what purpose it is, could more money have properly been raised than has been raised according to my statement, having regard to the conditions in this country?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not able to answer that. I am not in touch with the finances of Canada, as my hon. friend is. If he says we have raised up to the limit of what was possible, I am quite willing to take his word for it, and I am compelled then to accept the situation as it is, namely, that instead of our Canadian Government being able to finance the British Government in its purchases in Canada, we have only been able to maintain our forces in the field, plus $100,000,000 which we have advanced to Britain. That is the statement of the case. All I ask is that we should know where we stand, and that we should not claim credit for doing something that we are not doing. We are not financing the British Empire any more than we are winning this war. We are doing our part, I hope, loyally and truly. If we are doing the best we possibly can do, that is all we ask of the Government. But, we contend, when they are merely paying on this side of the water money they owe on the other side, they have no right to say they are financing the Government of Great Britain in carrying on the war. Our munitions plants are being shut down because of the financial exigencies of the British Government, which exigencies we in this Dominion are not now able to meet. That is as I gather the situation from what has been said.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot make anything else out of it. If that is the case in regard to munitions, I wish to draw attention to the fact that the same condition exists in regard to the supplying of bacon. So far as I have been able to gather from the press, the price of hogs fell two cents a pound on the announcement that the British Government would not buy any more bacon in Canada. Two cents a pound is a very serious matter to the producers of hogs in Canada, and it is a matter of sufficient importance to claim the consideration of this Parliament and of this Government. If it is a fact that the price of hogs has fallen two cents a pound because of the inability of this Government to finance the purchases by Great Britain in Canada, it is a serious situation, and the people of Canada should understand it. They should know why it is so. If it can be avoided, it should be avoided. If it cannot be avoided the public should understand it thoroughly. Let us know exactly where we are.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let me interrupt my hon. friend. The regulation in Great Britain to which he refers has not yet become effectual against Canadian bacon, which is still going forward. The drop in the price of hogs had no relation to immediate financing. The question may arise in the future, but it does not arise immediately.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no doubt of the fact that the announcement and the drop in price absolutely synchronized, my hon. friend will admit that; and I am prepared to believe there was an absolute and direct connection between the two events.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What about the Chicago price and the Buffalo price?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not able to answer that question. I am not familiar with those prices. I am prepared also to believe that, although my hon. friend is able at the moment and for several months to come to finance in regard to munitions, it is understood that he will not be able to continue to do so, and therefore munitions plants are going out of business in expectation of the time when that condition will arise. As I understand it, the position in regard to bacon is that from this time forward the demands of Great Britain for bacon will be filled by the United States, and our Canadian hogs will find their market in the United States instead of going directly to Great Britain, and the profit in the handling will go to the United States instead of remaining in Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not if we can finance it, and we shall certainly endeavour to do so.

Mr. OLIVER: If we can finance it, that will not occur; but if we cannot, it is bound to happen. This is a serious matter to the people of Canada, and it is something they should not be deceived about. They should not have any misunderstanding about it. They should know what their position is in regard to these questions. The conclusion of what I desire to say is, that since the war began we have not been in an absolutely sane condition in regard to matters of finance in the Dominion of Canada. It has been necessary to incur obligations, as the members of the Government have said, undreamed of at any previous time, obligations never contemplated and which possibly would never have been undertaken under any other circumstances. We have become accustomed in this House to voting money not by the millions, or tens of millions, but by the hundreds of millions, and all under the inspiration of the needs of the war.

As long as it only meant the voting of the money, and as long as it meant the expenditure of the money in Canada, with high prices for munitions, munitions plants running night and day, enormous wages to employees, high prices for farm produce, and everything going splendidly, it was only a matter of voting more and more millions. But it is perfectly clear, from what has been said here to-day, that a condition has been reached when this performance cannot go on. We have come to a crisis in our national affairs. My hon. friend said that the British Empire had come to a crisis in its Imperial affairs connected with this war. We, in Canada, have come to a crisis in our national affairs, and we cannot continue the expenditures that we have hitherto been making. It is not possible. Our credit, so far as I can see, is becoming exhausted, and we have the evidence of that in the shutting down of the munitions plant, and the purchase of bacon through the United States. We have changed our financial position within the last few months, and the people of Canada should know it. The Government should take the people into their confidence in regard to this matter, so that we would know exactly where we were. At this time, and under these circumstances, I want to hold the Government of Canada, the gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches, and above every one else the Minister of Finance responsible for the fact that we are in this position at the present time. Since my hon. friend took office, and since this war broke out, there has been no brake placed upon the expenditure of the Dominion of Canada. The same idea of extravagance that prevailed in the purchase of war supplies has prevailed in the conduct of all government affairs from the day our friends opposite took office. The civil government of Canada costs millions and tens of millions more to-day than it did before they took office, and they have less business to transact in every line relating to civil government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is not correct.

Mr. OLIVER: The books will show.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, they will show.

Mr. OLIVER: The Government failed to recognize those tremendous obligations that we were assuming on our entry into the war, that we must assume when we enter the war if we are going to do ourselves credit. If we are going to support the Allies with the sacrifice of men, we are surely going to support them with the sacrifice of money, and it was our business to see that every resource of the Dominion of Canada was husbanded to the last cent in order that Canada might play her part in the war, in finance, as well as in men. But it has been as though no such thing occurred. It has been as though a river of wealth were running by, and it was just a matter of how much we could dip out and scatter. The financing of Canada has been conducted on these principles, and, instead of the condition changing for the better from day to day or from year to year, never before in the history of Canada has Parliament witnessed such tremendous extravagance and such unreasonable action as have occurred during the present session. We are going to win the war by burdening our credit with a possible award of $60,000,000 for absolutely nothing; by taking over obligations running up in the neighbourhood of $600,000,000, interest charges that we will never get out of the earnings of the railroad, that will have to come out of the Canadian treasury, at a time when every atom in us should have been concentrated on the idea of saving money, so that we could bear our proper part in the war. We have thrown our money away, wasted it, and depleted our credit, and to-day we must see our industries shut down, and, the profits of our farmers cut off, because of the extravagance with which our affairs have been conducted and the disregard which has been paid to the maintenance of our credit.

Mr. McKENZIE: The motion which was made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) this afternoon deals with a matter of the greatest possible importance, or, at least, of great importance to some parts of Canada. It is important for myself and for the people whom I represent in this House because, directly and indirectly, they are concerned in the employment which the manufacture of shells and the production of steel for the shells afforded to the people. It was important because thousands of men were employed in the production of coal, which is the great power which puts the machinery in motion for the making of steel and whatever enters into the production of shells in this country. I think that if the Government were in possession of the facts which led to the lessening of the production of shells they should have given it to this House long before now. If they could have prevented the condition of things in this country which has thrown thousands of men out of employment, we have a right to ask that they should do so, and that they should endeavour to create a condition that would ensure employment for our men. With winter not very far off, the Government should strive to improve conditions which, from the present outlook, promise to be very distressing. I imagine the Minister of Trade and Commerce, by reason of the department which he represents, would be deeply interested in this question. I admit at once that the manufacture of shells was not, before the war, one of the industries of this country, and not an industry which had much to do with the prosperity of Canada, or one which would naturally call for the ingenuity and wisdom of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is, perhaps a phrase of the trade and business in this country upon which he had no training and for which, perhaps, he has no predilections or liking. But it so happens that, in the last three years, it has been a trade in this country, providing a livelihood for thousands of people and has created a condition with which we have to cope.

The cutting off of that industry seriously affects the whole community; it affects those directly as well as those indirectly interested. The Department of Trade and Commerce is particularly concerned with this kind of business, and I was surprised that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of all members of the Government, should obstruct the giving of information asked for by the member for Pictou and desired so urgently by the whole people. I am surprised that the minister should take such a narrow view of this question. He spoke with a view to shutting us off from the discussion and of denying to the people an opportunity of hearing what should be said on the subject by the Minister of Finance, who is particularly concerned in supplying one of the sinews of war. The reason given by the minister for his attitude is not a sufficient one for the Government to give to the thousands of workmen who are affected by the conditions referred to by the member for Pictou; it is not a sufficient reason to give to thousands of families, the heads of which are unable to find the money to buy coal and food and protect their children from the chill of winter. We were told, forsooth, that we should not discuss this question in the House because the Minister of Trade and Commerce had under his hand a Bill for the decapitating and disfranchisement of 50,000 of the Canadian people. That is not a sufficient reason for the Government's attitude; yet that is the only answer that was given from the other side of the House. In the forthcoming election I need no better argument than this to submit to the thousands of people in my constituency who depend for their livelihood upon their daily or weekly wage; when a question of vital importance to them was brought up in this House, the Government, led by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, put every obstacle in the way of the discussion of the matter. The minister says: to the dogs with food for the children; to the winds with the discussion of these matters; we have a decapitating axe to grind; we must cut off every power in this country that will criticise our misdoings; we cannot give you time to discuss this matter, because fifty thousand people have to be disfranchised, gagged, muzzled, we must have the time of the House for the discussion of that matter, not for the discussion of the matter brought up by the member for Pictou. Although I am accused of speaking frequently in this House, it is not often that I am thoroughly roused and stirred in expressing the views of the people. But when an old and respected parliamentarian like the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that we should not have an hour or two of the time of the House to discuss a matter of vital importance to the people, I feel that it is time the common people asserted themselves and contended that they should be heard in this House as well as the millionaires, the knights, the lords. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk in millions; they have more regard for the large amounts made by the lords and dukes who support the Government than they have for the needs of the workingman. But the time is not far off when the people will have an opportunity of passing judgment upon the conduct of this Government. No disfranchising Act that can be passed through this House will save the Government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce from the Bay-of-Fundy avalanche and tide that is approaching too rapidly for their own safety.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What kind of an avalanche is that?

Mr. McKENZIE: It will come from both sides—there will be an avalanche from the land and a tidal bore from the sea.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The bore is already here.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will it be a smooth-bore?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hear the piping voice of the sworn statesman. If he is looking for smooth things he had better consult his constituents on the question whether he will secure the nomination in Annapolis.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that we should be very careful not to encroach upon the rights of Great Britain in a matter of this kind. When the question of spending money over here is raised, regard must be had to Great Britain, but Great Britain is the whole Empire and the whole universe when we have to send men over there. We do not draw any line in this war; we are under the fold of the grand old flag—in Scotland, Ireland, England, Australia, New Zealand; it is all one Empire, one people. We have contributed, to the best of our ability, of the blood and wealth of this country, and we are still doing so. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says, with a flourish of trumpets and with that rhetoric which has made him famous: do you dare to suggest that Great Britain, although thousands of our men are fighting for her protection, should continue spending money in Canada in order to keep going the industries which the necessities of the war have produced and still call for? If that is the argument, then we must not ask any consideration at all from the authorities in Great Britain. All the sacrifices must come from our side; we must expect nothing in return.

The Minister of Finance has told us that what was to be cut off in the way of the manufacture of munitions was a mere trifle; that we had plenty of money to keep these industries going.

He had hardly sat down when the Minister of Trade and Commerce took the floor and told us that the money we had to spend had better be spent in another way, namely, in purchasing food that was to be sent over to the other side, and that the cutting down of the production of munitions was not because they were not required, but because we did not have the money with which to buy them. We have reached a point at which the people of this country who have been engaged in the production of shells, which are so much needed for the Empire, must stop that work because the moneys of this country have been so squandered in other directions that we have not the capacity to come to the assistance of Great Britain in this connection. That is the conclusion and the argument made by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and not contradicted by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me remind the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that if we are hard up for money, or if we need to economize in the expenditure of money, there is nothing which would give such a black eye to this country as to fall short in anything that is necessary for the carrying on of the war. We are told that we must purchase the Canadian Northern railway because to do otherwise might destroy the credit of this country. Anything that might happen to the Canadian Northern in the way of financing is a mere drop in the bucket, as compared with the great disaster to the reputation of this country that would follow our not doing everything we can in the prosecution of the war. If the choice is between putting $600,000,000 into buying munitions of war, bacon, cheese, wheat and everything else necessary to carry on the war properly and support our men at the front and supply our Allies with food and other things they want, and putting $600,000,000 into the Canadian Northern, I say: let us drop the Canadian Northern; let it get along the best way it can, and if it must go into the hands of a receiver, it is not the first enterprise of that kind that has found its way there; and let us pledge the country to that extent towards the carrying on of the war and furnishing the munitions and other supplies necessary to support the Mother Country in this desperate struggle.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that we on this side of the House belittled the efforts of Canada. I have not heard anybody on this side of the House belittling those efforts. I do not remember any one doing so. The financial effort of Canada has been magnificent. We are proud of the financial position we have taken and sustained. We hope we shall be able to continue to finance for the war and for the necessities of the Mother Country as we have done in the past. There is no man on this side of the House who has raised a finger against small effort, or great effort or any effort, put forward by the Minister of Finance to secure the requisite moneys for the part that we have taken in this war. Where is the truth in the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that we belittled those efforts or that we obstructed and impeded the measures taken to sustain this great country of ours in the war? Nothing could be further from the facts than the statement made by the minister. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has to-day made statements which are quite capable of giving comfort to the enemy in regard to the financial condition of this country. He told the world—and I do not think there was any necessity for it—that Great Britain was at the breaking point and strained to the last inch in connection with the financing of the war. I do not believe that. I do not believe that Canada is at or near the breaking point. There are in the banks of this country hundreds of millions of dollars owned by the people of this country, and if the requirements call for taking it out of the banks and giving it to the Minister of Finance in order to put it into the war, the people of Canada will rise in their might and hand over the money rather than that the status of this country should suffer for one moment on account of the need for money. We in Canada have scarcely been touched in regard to our true capacity in connection with the war, and it is not necessary for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give comfort to our enemies to-day. It will be stated, I suppose, in Germany to-morrow that the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada, a knight, the Right Hon. Sir George Foster, said in the Canadian House of Commons that England was strained to the last inch and casting about perplexed as to how she could finance the war. That will be the encouraging news our enemies will receive to-morrow from a speech made in this House of Commons by a member of this Government. If anybody on this side of the House were to make such a statement there would be loud cries of "Shame" from the other side. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says—and I agree with him—that the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific have behaved nobly. The person born in Canada, the person who came to Canada as an infant—the people of Canada generally of all classes and creeds—have done everything for the successful prosecution of the war that a true, loyal, capable people could do. If that be so—and it is so—there is not one instance of a disloyal act in this country on record to-day against anybody. And what is the reward that the Government gives to this loyal people who have stood to their guns, who have given of their money, of their children, of their blood, of their very life, for the maintenance of the flag under which they live? Their reward is to be cut off as aliens and strangers and traitors.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is speaking beside the question.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am simply following the trail blazed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. member is following it very badly.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have pointed out that he has stated that the people have been doing very well. If the people are doing well, he is not rewarding them properly; that is, every one of the people of this country has stood by us loyally, there is no justification at all for cutting them off as is intended to be done.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is strictly out of order in discussing the Franchise Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I am out of order in discussing it, of course, I shall not discuss it. I simply wish to say to the minister—and that is not discussing the Franchise Act—that if three years ago his Government had told the people of this country what was going to happen, and the different Acts that were to be enacted by this Parliament and the course that was to be taken in respect to the rights of the people——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks approximately to the subject before the House. He is going very far afield.

Mr. McKENZIE: Thank you. Your Honour will not permit me to finish my sentence, but there may be other opportunities for pointing out what I was about to say. As far as the real question before the House is concerned, I do trust the Government will take the matter seriously in hand, and if those industries can be kept going by proper management, and the people of this country who are engaged in the production of shells can be kept at that production; and the finances of this country can be so husbanded and so marshalled that, while we may be obliged to drop other enterprises; while we may be obliged to drop the expenditure of some $20,000,000 or so on public works which I think can stand over; while we may be obliged to give up an expenditure of $4,000,000 or $6,000,000 on this old railroad in Quebec which I think we can dispense with; while we may be obliged to let the Canadian Northern, with the expenditure of $600,000,000 that it involves look after itself;—I do trust that the Government will finance every line of supplies that is required to keep up our present standing in support of this war, and that we shall have money for the wheat, and the cheese, and the hogs, and the munitons, that will be necessary in order to keep everything going at full blast as at present. We did something this afternoon to stir up the Government on these things, and if the motion of the hon. member from Pictou has resulted in stirring up the Government and giving to the world an idea of how we stand and what can be done in order to carry forward the affairs of this country and our share in the war in a way that will be satisfactory to the Canadian people, the afternoon will have been well spent.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THE GORDON DIVORCE BILL.

On the order for resuming the debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Edwards "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole House on Bill No. 126 (Letter T of the Senate) intituled: 'An Act for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon'" and the proposed motion of Mr. Steele in amendment thereto:

Mr. KYTE: Mr. Speaker, I think the understanding last evening was that this Bill would not be gone on with until Monday. My hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr.

Knowles) had intended to speak on it, and being compelled to leave last evening, he did so with the understanding that the Bill was not to go on until Monday. The printed evidence has only been distributed and members have not had an opportunity of reading it, as it is somewhat voluminous. I think, in view of the suggestion last evening, that it should go over until Monday, it would be rather unfair to hon. members who are interested in this Bill if it should be taken up to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is no objection, the order can stand.

Order stands.

SECOND READING.

Bill No. 131, to incorporate the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.—Mr. Bradbury.

MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS.

MOTION TO ADJOURN HOUSE ON A DEFINITE MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE.

House resumed the debate on the motion of Mr. Macdonald for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. D. A. LAFORTUNE (Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the arguments advanced by both sides upon the motion submitted to the House by the learned member from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). This motion is certainly a most important one, if we may judge by the opposition offered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) to this motion being discussed, you have examined this motion, Mr. Speaker; you have paid a religions attention to the arguments brought forward by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and, in full justice, Your Honour has approved of the proposition submitted by the hon. member for Pictou and allowed the debate upon that question.

I fully concur in the remarks made by the hon. members on this side of the House. My hon. colleagues who have spoken upon this motion have perfectly satisfied me that they were absolutely right in presenting and in supporting this motion, I have likewise attentively listened to the arguments offered by the hon. members opposite; but however, they have not succeeded to change, in my mind, the opinion I have entertained on that question, from the very outset. The learned member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has brought forward in support of his thesis the most cogent and the most serious arguments and he has surely succeeded in convincing his friends of the propriety of discussing this question. In my view, the hon. members sitting on this side and who, naturally, do not share the views held by the hon. members opposite, have successfully confuted the objections raised by these gentlemen.

From the very inception of this war which broke out in August, 1914, our whole population felt plunged in the greatest anxiety; consternation because general and all were wondering if this war would not be of long duration; opinions were divided then as they still are to-day. Some were asking themselves, from the very start, whether we, the native born Canadians, should participate in this war and if it was Canada's duty to take part in it. A great number were of the opinion that it was her duty to assist in this war, and others held a contrary view. Opinions are not yet agreed on this point, Mr. Speaker. Even at the present moment, a discussion is going on in the press as to the wisdom of the present Government's decision to the effect that it was Canada's duty to participate in this war. That decision was censured by serious and distinguished men, by great speakers who cut a figure in the political spheres and by-the-way, with a decided advantage, who have held contrary views. The view which I held and still entertain to-day, is that Canada had done her duty and that we were not obliged, in any way, to participate in this war; that under the constitution which governs us, we are not bound to take up the Empire's quarrels, in the wars it may have to stand. We have done it; so much the better. I still contend to-day that it was not Canada's duty to do what has been done, but since it was thought proper, I shall not discuss the wisdom of that measure, and everywhere I have had the opportunity to give my opinion, here as elsewhere, I have made no secret of saying what I say to-night.

It was then contended that Canada should, as a colony, put forth a war effort. If that so, it brings me to another consideration. Has Canada done her duty? Upon this point, Mr. Speaker, I have no better evidence to produce than to use the expression fallen from the very lips of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has emphatically declared in this House, to-day, that Canada had nobly done her duty and, for the first time, I agree with him: In making such a statement, he certainly did justice to the situation, to the sacrifices of every kind made by our country and I may immediately add that we have done enough. Everywhere I have been, I did declare and repeat that Canada had done her full duty and made ample sacrifices in men and in money, and I may repeat here to-night that, in my view, we have done all and more than we should have done.

From the very inception of this war, Mr. Speaker, a large number of munition shops and mills sprang up through the country, even factories which were previously running along different industrial lines were converted into munition workshops. We have made heavy sacrifices in order to provide as properly as possible for the operating of these manufactories so that they might supply, as much as possible, the ammunition required by our Allies.

In the county where I have the honour to reside, Mr. Speaker, there are several manufactories, several workshops, where munitions are produced. In St. Laurent, especially, we have an important factory, which employs a large number of hands.

In Lachine, the residential city of the member for Jacques-Cartier—I regret he is not in his seat to-night, for he might perhaps have given us more details and more information—in the city of Lachine, there are several munition factories. Considerable capital has been invested in the construction and operation of these factories. From personal knowledge, I may state that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been invested in the installation of such shops in the county of Jacques-Cartier and elsewhere.

There are hundreds of thousands of people employed in those mills. Young men and others of mature age, women and girls have been employed in large numbers, by thousands, in the manufacture of these munitions.

In several towns, even, the trade, occupation or work which these persons habitually followed were put aside so that they might devote themselves exclusively to the making of munitions. Workmen, painters, carpenters, blacksmiths, shoemakers, bakers, in a word every kind of working men gave up their ordinary labour, their habitual trade, to go and work in those shops. In the first place through devotion, then by patriotism and, thirdly, because the wages were larger. They found a more ample return for such a labour in those workshops. I have ascertained that a very large number of men employed in every line of trades and labour undertook this new occupation.

We were told, Mr. Speaker, that it was necessary, in the Empire's interest as well as for Canada's own interest, to perform that labour, to do what has been done. That's my opinion. There is no doubt that those who have taken up that work gave evidence of real devotion and of true patriotism, and it was necessary for them to do so in order to meet the requirements of the painful situation in which we found ourselves, and we can only praise and congratulate the people who so willingly undertook that kind of work, which was necessary and of interest to Canada.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the population have made enormous sacrifices, both in men and in money. In the first place, it has been established that the number of those who have voluntarily enlisted exceeds 450,000.

France alone excepted, Canada has furnished more men than all the other countries of the world, in proportion to population. Canada occupies the second place on the list, coming immediately after France. Now, for a country that was not obliged to participate in the war; for a country whose constitution protected to the extent of allowing her to refuse even enlistment, it seems to me that a tribute of praise is due to the population who have been so anxious to efficiently enlist; in fact, as I have said, it is proven that 450,000 men have rushed to the colours voluntarily.

We have, moreover, subscribed millions and millions, Canada has made all kinds of sacrifices.

When I consider the sacrifices of all kinds, the sacrifices of every nature, the sacrifices of all sorts made by our people, I am asking myself whether the remarks made by the party in power, or by the papers supporting it, are really justified.

When some have stated that the province of Quebec was not generous, that the province of Quebec was not patriotic, when the people of Quebec have been blamed, censured, condemned and told most regrettable things, I reply to such gentlemen; you are wrong, you know nothing of the sacrifices which have been made by the population of Quebec in particular and of Canada in general.

We have given millions and millions, over and above what the country could well afford. We do not regret it, for a good deed should never cause regret—that may perhaps bring us good luck later on; but I must say that the millions which have been given were paid generously, and no one could demand any more.

All the provinces of the country, from North to South, from East to West, all the provinces have been anxious to subscribe most generously, very willingly, millions and millions which have been sent oversea. The province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, has not been the last one. From the very outset, our province has generously done it seems to me, her full duty, be it said to the praise of the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec who has been in power for many years past. We surely have nothing to find fault with him; to the contrary, we should congratulate him for his generous acts towards the Allies.

Many associations have been organized. In every corner of the country, societies have been formed, all collecting and working night and day in order to increase the subcriptions solicited, and they have certainly succeeded.

A large number of nurses, most generous women, most distinguished ladies, entered the fray and led the movement; we have seen nurses leave our country to go to the front; they left their families, their homes, their relatives; they left their country and crossed the seas to go and care for the soldiers on the battle fields. Those women deserve our sincere gratitude and our heartiest thanks for the devotion and the patriotism they displayed in the Allies' interests.

There have been organized in Montreal, among other cities, and throughout the country, concerts, theatrical representations, meetings of all kinds, shows, tombolas, receptions, afternoon teas, soirees matinées, levees, excursions, picnics, races, public and political gatherings. In fine, Mr. Speaker, every kind of things was done, all sorts of means were taken in order to relieve the soldiers at the front, thus it was that large sums of money were collected by all sorts of legitimate means; thus it was, I say, that they succeeded in raising very large amounts.

Work competitions were also organized. In my village, in my town and in the neighbouring parishes, they held sewing competitions to fit and clothe the soldiers on the battlefields. Bundles of clothing were sent overseas by the thousands. It was a consolation to see those devoted women, working day in and day out for the brave soldiers whose comfort was their sole inspiration.

I must say, in praise of all those ladies I know in my own town of Saint-Laurent, that their zeal was indefatigable. They worked in the evening, whole nights at a time, to sew and make all sorts of goods which could be useful to the boys at the front. Collections were made in the streets, from door to door, and even in the churches.

I must add here, Mr. Speaker, that our clergy answered the call most eagerly, When I see a certain press print and publish unpleasant articles against these gentlemen of the clergy, I have no hesitation in saying that those who so speak or write do not know our clergy, that they do not know the mentality of the province of Quebec. To say such things is evidence of the most complete ignorance of our clergy, for if there ever were people devoted to charitable works, to deeds of relief and protection, these are certainly the members of the clergy of Quebec. Yes, we have done all that was possible in the Allies' interest and, more especially for the Canadians fighting in France.

And if we consider the sacrifices made by Canada, is it necessary to add, Mr. Speaker, that the labour done in the munition shops, although the workmen were paid good wages for it, occupies a high standing on this list of honour? I have just said it the working men quickly left their regular occupations to devote themselves to the making of munitions and I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, that in so doing, they were moved by patriotism, by the hope of aiding the Allied armies and very few of them by the fact that their new wages were a little higher than those they were previously receiving.

As early as 1912, scarcely a year after the advent of the present Government into power, a serious crisis began to prevail; the working men complained of lack of work and I understand there was some reason for alarm. Every one wondered what was going to happen. Would these unemployed have to go to the United States for the bread and protection Canada was denying them?

As everybody knows, many of them did cross the forty-fifth boundary line and still a larger number were preparing to follow suit. In 1913, 1914, and up to the declaration of war, things were far from being bright. A large portion of our people were complaining and justly so. The war changed this condition of affairs. Labour has greatly increased and wages have been more remunerative. The working men's conditions have improved; they have been able to support their families properly, to meet their obligations and, moreover, to lay a little in store for the future. The workmen therefore have until now improved their position. It has just been learnt, as shown by the motion of the hon. member for Pictou, and with much apprehension, that this munition labour is on the point of ceasing. For some time I have had a personal knowledge of the fact, for in the country-place where I live, which is close to the town of Saint-Laurent, the Canada Store Co., which have, since 1914, been producing munitions and employing quite a number of hands, have begun discharging them. It is the same with the Dominion Bridge Co., in Lachine, and it is generally rumoured that this war industry may fully cease ere long. If that be so, it is a most regrettable affair. It is said that necessity knows no law, and the axiom is well known; but it seems to me that this work should not be discontinued, seeing that the war is still on and that it must unfortunately last too long, and seeing also that the munitions are absolutely indispensable for the war. I am asking myself Mr. Speaker, whether it is fair that Canada pay millions and millions to assist the Empire, the mother-country; whether it is fair to take our own country's money and send it over to London for the making of munitions to be used by those who are fighting for our country. Humbly I say: no. If it is necessary that we still contribute to help England financially, it seems to me that, at least, the millions we are to subscribe should be spent here, if possible. Is it right to take our money and send it oversea to manufacture the necessary fighting weapons which will be put into the hands of our boys from Canada? No, Mr. Speaker, justice demands that the money we advance, the money we subscribe for the manufacture of munitions, be spent in Canatda; if we do not do that, we are recreant to duty of justice. What will those workmen employed in munition shops say when they see themselves thrown on the streets, just before the bad weather, Autumn is close upon us and winter will soon follow. Where will these workmen find any work? In summer time, one can find something to do almost anywhere, as in navigation, in construction, for instance, and in a lot of other occupations, but such is not the case in winter, and hundreds and thousands of men, women and children will be given up to the greatest want, if we discharge them from the munition factories. I repeat it, if it is necessary to continue subcribing and advancing millions to the mother-country, let us see to it that, at least, the money we so advance remains in Canada, that the materials needed for the making of those munitions, such as iron, steel, copper, wood, etc., be materials taken from Canada. It seems to me only fair and just.

I was glad, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce state that Canada had done her duty. Very well! I agree with him, but he has been saying this only recently. The hon. minister and his friends have always declared, always maintained that Canada had not done her duty, and that it was therefore, necessary to impose—compulsory military service—to force those who had not contributed adequately, to discharge the duty they had neglected.

When I hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce reproaching the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) with being inconsistent, because he asked that the shell manufacture be continued in the country; when I hear the learned minister say: Don't you see how illogical and inconsistent, you are now, in asking that munitions continue to be manufactured in Canada, you who did not want to have anything to do with the war, who did not want to consent to the imposition of compulsory military service. And he tried to prove the inconsistency of the hon. member for Pictou.

I may say to the hon. minister that he is not more logical, and in my humble opinion, he is less consistent because the hon. member for Pictou did not contradict himself, did not show any lack of logic in asking that, inasmuch as it was necessary, if any munutions were to be made for the war, such munitions, at least, should be made in Canada. There is no contracdiction in that.

I, myself, have voted and I shall again vote most heartily against compulsory military service; but I believe that, inasmuch as it is necessary to help, we should do so; but that the work to be done should be performed in our country, in our own people's interest.

The learned minister also said: England would not consent to have the work done anywhere but at home, to have her children deprived of it.

Well, I may reply to the learned minister; If England will not consent to have the work done outside her own territory, what about the children of the land?

England may do what she pleases at home, as long as she does it with her own money, her own resources, her own funds, very well; but when she takes Canada's money and resources, when she accepts the millions we are sending her, have we not the right to impose our conditions? When one gives, has he not the right to say: "Very well, I shall give you one hundred millions, two or three hundred millions, if necessary, but to my donations I put one condition: that that money be spent in my country, that the work be done by my children; if you think the donation is too onerous, don't accept it."

When in a donation a condition too onerous for the donee is put, the donee has only to answer your donation does not please me, it is not remunerative enough, it is not gratuitous enough, I will not accept it.

If England finds that the obligation we mean to impose, that of spending in our country the money we are giving her, does not suit her, she has only to say; I don't want it. There is no question but that the donor has the right to impose whatever conditions he please, when he makes a donation.

Let England accept the donations, the loans, the advances—call them as you please—under any form whatsoever, let her accept the money she receives from Canada, but, in return, let her show her generosity, let her be charitable enough—yes, I say charitable enough—to aid the children of the land, who are crying for bread and whom they are about to turn into the streets, just before winter.

The hon. Minister has made a remark which I have not quite understood. The learned member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has told him so. I wish to offer a remark on the same point. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated that the Opposition members were trying to belittle, to minimize what Canada has done for the Empire.

I beg the learned minister's pardon, he must have said that himself, in another flight of imagination. Without wishing to say anything disagreeable, or improper, let him allow me to tell him that when he stated that the Opposition members were trying and had tried to minimize, to lessen Canada's effort, attempting thereby to show that we have been recreant to our duty, I beg leave to tell him that he has made a blunder. Nothing of the sort has taken place, absolutely nothing.

I have followed the debates of this House, I have carefully listened to all that has been said; I have, as representative of my county, attended regularly enough the sittings of the House, and nothing has ever been said, nothing has ever been written in the Liberal papers, not even in the Conservative press which is opposing us, nothing has ever been said upon the subject; it has never been pretended that the members sitting on this side of this House had tried to minimize the efforts put forth by Canada, but it is the contrary that is true, and the truth of it is this: we have never tried to belittle the merit of the war efforts of Canada, but it has always been said, as I now declare it, as all my friends on this side have declared, that Canada had nobly done her duty, but we pretended that we had done enough, and never has it entered the mind of any one to criticize the common efforts put forth by the country, and especially by that part of the country where I live in. Nothing of the sort has been said.

Mr .Speaker, I cannot insist too much upon this fact; that if England has the munitions she needs made at home with the moneys we are giving her, in my humble opinion, she will commit towards us a serious injustice; the expression may be severe, I should like to find a more acceptable one, but I say so without any animus, without any mental reservation, or out of any feeling of disrespect for the Empire in which I live, but I do declare it would be committing a serious injustice to our country, if England took our funds and had the shells, the war ammunition, made over there, by her sons. Ours, first!

A country as powerful as England, the Queen of the world, cannot maintain itself without having to resort to Canada's money, so the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated. I regret he has made such a statement; yes, Mr. Speaker, I do regret that the hon. minister has gone so far as pretend that England is passing through a most difficult financial crisis and I particularly regret that he should have stated that England might perhaps be on the brink of a precipice. Is it not an insult to the British Crown to so speak of a crisis which might menace England, the Queen of the world? I beg my learned friend's pardon, but I think he has committed a serious error and that never, either as a member or as a minister, should he put on record here such a statement. I ask the newspaper representatives here present not to make any mention in their columns of that statement from the hon. minister. That England is embarrassed by the war, I quite anderstand; but that she is passing through a crisis which threatens her existence, I think that such a statement is not warranted under the circumstances nor borne out by the facts, and that it should not have been made.

Mr. Speaker, there is a reason why I so earnestly ask that the greatest intelligence should preside over the use of the funds we are contributing. When the breaking up comes, when the partition is done, England as a belligerent on the first part, will preside over the division; the other great Allied Powers, who are now fighting with England, such as France, Russia, Italy, etc., will also come in for their shares. For them there will come a day for the rendering of accounts; they will perhaps be indemnified in a proportion more or less generous for the sacrifices they have made and for the losses of all kinds they have suffered. Will such be the case for Canada, a simple colony?

Is there a man in this House or throughout the country who would dare contend that, when the division ol the spoils takes place, Canada will be called upon to take her share in proportion to the sacrifices we have imposed upon ourselves? I say, no. We shall stay bowed down under the weight of the enormous debts we are piling up and under the burden of the taxes we shall have to pay for centuries to come; it will be utter ruin. You Mr. Speaker, myself and a great number of others around us, we shall see those things. But those who will come after us, who will have to pay those taxes, from generation to generation they will feel the weight of the burden we shall have imposed upon them. They will have to work like mercenaries; our children, our grand-children and our great grandchildren will have to bleed themselves, so to speak, to reimburse the millions we are spending in this nefarious war. Now, Mr. Speaker, does not that give us the right to say to our rulers today, who have in their hands our lives, all we hold most precious, have we not the right to say to these gentlemen that they must, in all fairness, give us the greatest sum of protection of sunshine and of liberty we are entitled to expect under the circumstances?

I cannot bear to hear the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce lecturing those who, more or less, do not share his views. I may reply to this hon. gentleman that we also have a bit of land as big as his own, that we love our wives and our children as much as he can love his own, that our interests are just as precious to us as his own can be to him. Why suspect our disinterestedness and our patriotism? Why does he turn to his colleagues and to his friends, saying: See, the hon, leader of the Opposition has a smile on his face! Why should a man of the learned minister's standing, a man of mature age, a contemporary of the hon. leader of the Opposition, why should he utter such words? Why ask his friends to look at the leader of the Opposition because the latter smiles? I might ask the hon. minister if he ever saw on Sir Wilfrid Laurier's face anything but that air of simplicity, of justice, of broadmindedness which is a distinctive characteristic of great men? I wish my learned friend's face as well as mine could have that good smile which brightens the face of the leader of the Opposition, both he and myself would only be better looking fellows.

Mr. Speaker, I say that we cannot demand too much from those who rule us, under the circumstances, for every dollar we are giving, every dollar we are contributing, costs much to those who labour, to those who toil from morn till night time, to meet their obligatons.

The learned minister, as I have just said, has reputation, capacity, knowledge, probity, but does not the hon. member for Pictou have as much? Is not the reputation of the learned member for Pictou widely known? Is he not a distinguished orator, a most able man, an upright man who does honour to the mandate he fills in this House? Is he not an honour to his country? Does the learned minister doubt his sincerity? I should like to see in this House, several men as valuable as the member for Pictou. There is a large number of distinguished men on either side of this House, and it ill becomes the Minister of Trade and Commerce to try and belittle the reputation of those who are here with him and who make a figure quite to their advantage.

The learned minister grows indignant and gets somewhat out of temper when he cannot subscribe to the conclusions arrived at by his opponents or accede to their views. It seems to me that the members on this side of the House have the same power, the same right as himself, as long as they act properly; it seems to me, I say, that the hon. minister does not need to become indignant, if our views do not coincide with his own, for his opinions have not always been in accord with our own. We have the same power he has, the same right, and if we do not subscribe to his opinion, he should not get out of temper.

We do not want, as stated by the learned minister, that this war keeps on, we desire, all and every one of us, that it end as early as possible, but as long as it does last, as the member for Pictou has so well expressed it, let us protect ourselves the best we can. No, we do not want this war to last. We are all anxious to see it over, but as long as it does last, it seems to me that we should do the best we can to improve as much as possible the situation. That is what the hon. member for Pictou asks, and the hon. minister says: You are lacking in logic, you want to prolong the war.

No, I beg the hon. minister's pardon. Neither the member for Pictou nor the other members on this side of the House want this war to last; on the contrary, our wish is that it may end as soon as possible; but as long as it lasts, let us protect ourselves, let us try and take advantage of the situation, the best we can, by demanding that the money we subscribe be spent in our own country.

Mr. Speaker, should the hon. members on this side of the House attempt to make a reflection such as that cast upon us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. gentlemen opposite would be the first to say: You are fomenting sedition, you are preaching treason, you are making a conspiration. Should we take the liberty to pass a remark such as the learned minister has himself made from his own seat, this afternoon, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, we should have a bad time of it. The hon. minister has made a reflection which we shall not make. We enter our protest and we say to the contrary; England is most powerful, she occupies a formidable position; England does not need Canada to save herself, she readily accepts whatever we are willing to offer her, but she is certainly not in such a financial state as represented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I have said and I repeat that we have done our duty nobly. The reason why Canada has not done more has already been explained in this House. We have done more than we should have done; we have done, as far as possible, what had to be done, and I do not fear to assert that this is the general consensus of opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I resume my seat, in asking and asserting that the motion offered by the hon. member for Pictou is justifiable and that it should be favourably accepted by this honourable House.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN, (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): A definite matter of urgent public importance, for the purpose of discussing which my hon. friend from Pictou moved the adjournment of the House this afternoon, has now been considered and debated for a number of hours. I therefore beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. Mr. Cochrane, that this House now pass to the Orders of the Day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion. My point of order is—

Mr. SPEAKER: I will put the motion, then the hon. member may raise his point of order. It is moved by Hon. Mr. Hazen, seconded by Hon. Mr. Cochrane, that the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion? I may say this motion is not debatable, but I will permit the hon. member to rise to a point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The point of order which I desire to take is that the motion for the adjournment of the House cannot be amended. This motion must be disposed of. The motion is made in virtue of Rule 39 and must be disposed of before the House can take up any other order of business. Bourinot says, at page 324, fourth edition:

> . . . . and it is the wish of the House to adjourn, it is necessary to move an adjournment of the debate in the first place, unless indeed it is desired to supersede it. But the adjournment of the debate obviously cannot be moved to the adjournment of the House, when it is a substantive question.

He cites 144 English Hansard 1906, and May, page 281. Then, at page 349 of the same edition, he says:

Motions for adjournment of House; of debate—

A motion to adjourn is not debatable except in the case of a special motion to adjourn, under Rule 39, made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. An ordinary motion to adjourn is always in order, but no second motion to adjourn may be made until after some intermediate proceeding has been had. An intermediate proceeding is one that may properly be entered on the Votes.

The special motion to adjourn under the above-mentioned rule is preceded by the member's asking leave to make the motion. This rule has already been fully quoted in Chapter IX, and it is unnecessary to repeat here.

The Speaker first decides as to whether the motion is in order, and the House decides as to whether it desires that the subject be discussed. In Great Britain, where a similar rule is in force, it has been held that the motion must be restricted to a single specific matter of recent occurrence, and if the matter, submitted to the House in pursuance of the rule, fails to obtain the requisite support, it cannot, during the same session, be again brought forward in the same manner.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not wish to unduly curtail the hon. member in rising to a point of order, but his last citation has absolutely no reference to the subject before us.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a substantive motion, and I simply quoted from Bourinot for the purpose of proving the correctness of what I said. I have already stated to your Honour that the adjournment of the debate cannot be moved to a special motion for the adjournment of the House. Would my hon. friend be good enough to state under what rule he makes the motion?

Mr. HAZEN: Under Rule 35.

Mr. PUGSLEY: (Reading):

A motion for reading the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House.

Of course it would not have preference over a special motion to adjourn, under the spirit of the rule and under the clear reading of the rule, because that would entirely supersede and defeat the object of Rule 39, which is for the purpose of allowing discussion, and which has been introduced into the rules in face of the closure proceedings and in face of all those restrictive rules which were passed by the House in 1913. The object of this rule is to preserve to Parliament the right of discussion of important public matters. If an hon. member can rise in his place any time during that discussion after one speech has been made, or indeed even before one speech has been made, and avail himself of Rule 35, it is simply shutting off discussion and preventing an opportunity for discussion on a matter of grave public importance, which under Rule 39 has been permitted. Therefore, I say that rule is not applicable to a motion to adjourn under Rule 39 and cannot be resorted to; if it could, it would defeat the very purpose which the House of Commons had in view in providing for the discussion of matters of great public importance under Rule 39.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), I would point out to him that his first citation has absolutely no bearing on the case: that is, with respect to the motion for the adjournment of the debate. This is not a question of the adjournment of the debate. It is a question of a superseding motion under rule 35. As I have pointed out, his second citation from page 349 of Bourinot has no reference to the point of order, because, while debate is provided for, it is subject to the rules of the House. Rule 35 is a specific rule, which reads:

A motion for reading the orders of the day shall have preference to any motion before the House.

That rule must be read in connection with rule 36, which I will read, as applying to this case.

When a question is under debate, no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it, to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day.

So that it is specifically provided in rule 36 that it is competent to move this motion in the midst of another discussion. The motion before the House is that the House do adjourn, but it is made under a specific rule, namely rule 39, which enables a discussion to take place, so that it is analogous to a substantive motion. I have given mature consideration to the matter, and I have no doubt in my own mind that the motion of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) is in order, and is not subject to debate, and it is my duty to put it to the House forthwith.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to appeal to the House from your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided on the question, "Shall the ruling of Mr. Speaker be sustained"?

THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 133, the War-time Elections Act.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): I rise to a point of order. Rule 73 says:

> All Bills shall be printed before the second reading in the English and French languages.

On referring to the Order Paper, I notice that Order No. 21 reads as follows:

> September 6—Second reading of Bill No. 133, the War-Time Elections Act.—Sir Robert Borden.—E.

The Bill, therefore, is printed in English only

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Secretary of State): The Bill is printed in English and in French. It was printed in English the night before last and this morning copies of the Bill printed in French were sent to the distribution office at 11 or 11.30 o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that the Bill has not been printed and distributed in the French language. It may have been printed, and kept in secret—I do not know about that. All we have to go by is the Order Paper; if the hon. gentleman will look at the Order Paper he will see that the Bill is printed only in the English language.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The rule that my hon. friend has read simply says that the Bill shall be printed before the second reading in the English and French languages. It does not say that that fact shall be indicated by letters here, there or anywhere else. The fact is that the Bill shall be printed in both languages. As I understand it, that has been done.

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to consult the Clerk of the House as to what has been the practice in that respect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I call Your Honour's attention to page 226 of Bourinot, edition of 1916:

> The rule which requires a strict adherence to the order paper is absolutely necessary to prevent surprise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It would please the Tories to surprise.

Mr. BOIVIN: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say one word on the point of order. I draw Your Honour's attention to page 508 of the 1916 edition of Bourinot, which contradicts the statement just made by the hon. gentleman who is leading the Government (Sir George Foster) that it is unnecessary that the letters E and F shall appear on the Order Paper. Bourinot says:

> The letters E. F. on the order paper will show whether that has been done. If any objection be made on that ground, it will prevent the Bill being taken up for its second reading on that day.

That is very emphatic. As a matter of justice to the French Canadians in this country and to the French Canadians in this House, I may say that I applied for a copy of the Bill at the Distribution Office to-day at noon after I had seen the Order Paper, to make sure whether or not it had been printed in French. I was told by Mr. Boivin in the Distribution Office that the Bill had not arrived there at noon to-day. It would be absolutely unfair to go on with the Bill, especially in view of this remark of Bourinot's. I would ask that the matter be left over until Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a question of fairness or unfairness; the Speaker is limited to a direct interpretation of the rules and to the past practice of the House. The rule says that all Bills shall be printed before the second readings in the English and French languages. There is no rule anywhere which says that the letters E and F must appear on the Order Paper, which is merely for the guidance of members of the House. I am informed by the Clerk that the practice in the past has been to be governed by the question of fact whether or not the Bills are printed in English and French before their second reading.

I hold in my hand Bill No. 133, printed in both French and English. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the requirements of the rule have been complied with, and I so rule.

Mr. BOIVIN: In view of the citation which I have just made to Your Honour, and which, I think, should be taken into consideration, as Bourinot is a recognized authority—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BOIVIN: —I appeal to the House from your ruling.

The House divided on the question, "Shall the ruling of Mr. Speaker be sustained?" And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I move that the House do now adjourn. I make this motion particularly because the Bill has not been distributed in French, and hon. members have a right to see the Bill in French.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will do that immediately.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If hon. members insist upon speaking while the vote is being taken, I will certainly name them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On both sides?

Mr. SPEAKER: On both sides.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No yellings.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have just received, thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, a French version of the Bill now under discussion. Under ordinary circumstances, I think that the Government ought not to proceed with this Bill—

Mr. BRADBURY: These are extraordinary circumstances.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think it is only fair to the French members of the House that they should be given time in which to read the Bill at least, which is a very bulky one. If I can appeal to the chivalry of my hon. friend to yield to my request, I will not make the motion which I am allowed to make under the rules. Otherwise, I shall move that we proceed to another order, under rule 36.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It is likely enough that some people would try to make a race question out of the alleged fact of this Bill not being printed in French. At twelve o'clock to-day I telephoned to the distribution office myself to inquire about this Bill, and was told that the French version had been distributed before twelve o'clock to-day.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Better bring your man and we will tell him that is a lie.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have a file of all the Bills printed in both English and French, and I can assure my hon. friend that this copy of the Bill which I have received from Mr. Speaker is the first one I have seen printed in French.

Mr. SEVIGNY: It was from me.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I thank my hon. friend for it. Will not my hon. friend accept the word of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon), of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Brouillard), and of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortier), all of whom say that this is the first time they have seen the Bill printed in French? It seems to me only fair that no surprise should be sprung on the members of the minority, and I would appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) to yield with good grace to my request. Besides, we are close to Sunday, and surely this is not a time to quarrel. May I expect a favourable answer from the Government?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think my hon. friend may proceed with his motion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I beg to move that the House do proceed to another Order, under Rule 36.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I submit that this motion is not in order. It is the opposite to the motion which has passed the House, which was that we should proceed to the Orders of the Day. This gives the Government the right to name the orders to which we shall proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member for Rouville is in order in making his motion. Under rule 35 a motion for reading the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House. We are now in the Orders of the Day and are considering a subsidiary order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Read rule 36.

Mr. SPEAKER: Rule 36 has to be read in conjunction with rule 35. I still adhere to my decision, that the hon. member's motion is not in order, because we are now considering the Orders of the Day. The motion now before the House is for the second reading of Bill No. 133.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER: If the Bill is not worthy of any further explanation to the House on its second reading, it will be incumbent upon me to give my views in regard to it. I notice that the title of the Bill is the "War Time Election Act." We are reminded of the fact that this country is at war, and it may be as well at this particular juncture to consider for a moment why this country is at war. If I understand the issues correctly, we are fighting for the maintenance of free institutions and of human liberty, in Europe and throughout the world. It is generally recognized that at the head and in the forefront of that influence, of that power, of that principle against which we are fighting, stands Prussia and the principle of Prussianism. At the head of Prussia, as at the head of Germany, as the head of the Central Powers, as at the head of this world-war, stands the Kaiser, the representative on earth to-day of autocratic authority. But the Kaiser is only a part of the institution of autocracy which we speak of as Prussianism. Behind the Kaiser, supporting the Kaiser, forcing the Kaiser, if you like, is the junker aristocracy of Prussia supported by a military caste which is given an undue proportion of influence by a peculiar franchise Act. It is a notable fact that we who are fighting and giving of our resources to the limit, whose sons are dying to break down that condition as it prevails in Europe and which proposes to dominate the world, are to-day facing the introduction of an identically similar condition in this our own country, the introduction taking place under the name of patriotism, loyalty, and the maintenance of the principles for which we are fighting. The kaiser in our country is our Government, an oligarchy self-elected. It is supported, as it was created, by an aristocracy of wealth, an aristocracy which includes the munitions profiteers, the men who corner the food of the people, the manufacturing monopolists, the railroad exploiters, and the boa-constrictors of high finance. This is the junker aristocracy in our country. This is the organization that our kaisers across the floor represent, and this Bill, as its predecessor, the Military Voters Act, is for the purpose of establishing in this country a military caste with special voting powers and authority, to be depended upon by this junker aristocracy and this oligarchic kaiserism, who are proposing to give special voting privileges to special classes of people. It has usually been supposed that the institutions of government were for the benefit of the citizens, and that the climax of free government was control by the citizens. But we have it provided in the Military Voters Act, and in the War-Time Elections Act, that citizenship shall not constitute the right to vote, that there shall be a division between the right of military service and the right of citizenship. It is established that because a man is a soldier, though he never was a citizen of Canada, though he never intends to be a citizen of Canada, he still shall be a voter of Canada, and his vote shall be cast wherever it pleases himself, or those from whom he takes his direction, to cast that vote. In the War-Time Elections Act it is provided that our soldiers shall vote, that their wives and their relatives shall vote, but that other women of the community shall not be entitled to vote. In order to create that special military class in this country we are to disfranchise the women of five of the great provinces of Canada just as, in order to establish a military class, we give the franchise to men who never saw Canada and probably never will see it. There is no argument, then, as to what the purpose, the intent and the necessary effect, of the legislation of these two Bills is and is to be. Frankly, the Government has proclaimed its policy in other matters along these same lines. We all recall that when the Prime Minister made his announcement of the introduction of the principle of conscription for military service into this country from his place in the House, he threatened with violence at the hands of the soldiery any man who, in this free Parliament and in this free country, dared to express his opinion against that measure.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Will my hon. friend say that that is a literal translation of the statement made by the Prime Minister?

Mr. OLIVER: No, I do not say it is a literal translation, but I say it is certainly a correct translation beyond any argument. Further, I will say that the word of the Prime Minister has been taken up, and the right hon. gentleman can read it any day in the columns of the special newspaper organs of the Prime Minister throughout this country—this hitherto free country of Canada. I do not know how far the Prime Minister and the oligarchy that sits with him are under the impression that they can terrorize the people of Canada. I do not know how many they can terrorize, but there are some whom they cannot terrorize. We still believe in right and liberty, we still believe in a free country. We who have sent our sons to fight for liberty in Europe intend to stand for liberty in Canada.

One of the great features of this Bill is its measure of disfranchisement of citizens of Canada. Although men shall have been entitled by the law of Canada, and under the authority of Britain, to the rights, privileges, immunities and liabilities of citizenship for a period of fifteen years, it pleases the kaiser, his oligarchy and his junker support, because he hopes thereby to secure the militarist support, to break faith—to break the faith of Canada—with these people and to deprive them of their rights as citizens. What are these men guilty of that they should be deprived of their citizenship? What have they done or what have they left undone that they should be singled out to be deprived of that right of which they became possessed in due and legal form and to which the faith of Canada and of the Empire was pledged at the time that right was granted them? What have they done? Have they committed a breach of the law? Have they in any degree acted against the best interests of this country? Have they refused to take part in this war with Canada on behalf of Britain and her Allies? Not so Mr. Speaker. We had it on the authority of the Prime Minister that the services of these men had not been accepted as a matter of Government policy since this war began. I ask you, Sir, on what ground have these men been disfranchised, except the ground that they stand accused, in the minds of our Government and its supporters, of the high crime and misdemeanor of being liable to vote Liberal at the next election.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: That is their crime.

Mr. OLIVER: That, and only that. Who are those people who are to be disfranchised? To be as brief as possible, and to avoid going into too many details, I would say they belong chiefly to two classes, men of German descent, and men of Russian descent.

An hon. MEMBER: Austrian.

Mr. OLIVER: If these people of German descent had come from Germany imbued with the ideas that are part of the education of every man in Germany, I could understand that there might be some question as to their attitude towards this country and our cause in this war. So far as my knowledge goes, and I have considerable knowledge on the subject, the great majority of the people who are spoken of as Germans in the Prairie Provinces, never saw Germany, their fathers never saw Germany, and their grandfathers never saw Germany, except it might have been in passing through Germany to come to Canada. Speaking of the large majority of those with whom I am familiar, their ancestors were Germans, but more than one hundred years ago they left Germany as colonists under the auspices of the empire of Austria, to occupy lands allotted to them in the Austrian province of Galicia, where they were given certain privileges and certain opportunities. It seemed good to them to go there, and one of the reasons they went was because they wished to escape from, or because they objected to, the establishment of German militarism which was then being established in their home country. They removed to Galicia and established themselves there. They grew, and prospered in a moderate degree, from generation to generation. When militarism became established thoroughly in Austria, those people found military service irksome, they found the economic conditions undesirable, and they emigrated to Canada. They came here on the promise by the Canadian Government, held out to every man who came, that if they came with good intent and with honest purpose to help build up our Canadian country, they would be entitled to and would receive all the rights of Canadian citizenship. They have done their part towards building up the country. They have fulfilled in letter and in spirit their part of the bargain; and because, for some reason unknown to me this Government believes that at the coming election they are likely to vote Liberal, these people are disfranchised. I care not on their account that they are disfranchised; it makes little difference to them, or, I may say to the Liberal party of Canada, or the prairie West. But it makes a stupendous difference to Canada that we shall have within our borders men of good faith, who have come in good faith, who have fulfilled every obligation laid upon them by the state in good faith, and with whom we break faith without cause or provocation. How can we expect to build up a sound and solid citizenship in this country under such circumstances? I consider that this so-called War-Time Elections Act will set this country back an untold number of years in the process of building up a united and progressive Canada. It is in the same class as the campaign which has been carried on persistently by those same gentlemen against the French-speaking population of the province of Quebec, a campaign intended to establish, and unfortunately only too successful in establishing, a division between the two great races in this country, a division that tends to weakness, because it tends to disunion at the very time when above everything else we need unity in order that we may have strength. What this Government has done persistently, has done through its organizations, through its orators and through its newspapers for the last eight or ten years, it is proposing to repeat now in the prairie West; attacking a different class of people, but attacking them with as little provocation and as little reason, and I am afraid with as deplorable results.

There is another class of people in the prairie West who will be subject to this disfranchisement. I speak of those who are generally known as Galicians. They also come in large measure from the province of Galicia, a province which is now Austrian, but which at one time was a province of Poland, and before that was a part of the country which was known as Little Russia.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There are also some from Bukowina.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, I know some come from Bukowina. I do not wish to go into all the details. The conditions are somewhat different, the people, however, are identical in race. From the Carpathian mountains eastward, and from the Black sea northward, lies the country of the Little Russian people.

In ancient days there was a kingdom in that country, the capital being the city of Kief, now in Russia. At a certain period in history that part of Little Russia which is now Galicia became part of Poland by conquest, and the native people were made subject to the dominance of Poland. Later on, when Poland was partitioned, this section of Poland became a part of the Empire of Austria. So that in nationality these people are Austrians, but in race they are Russians; and, so far as this war is concerned, their sympathy is not with Austria but with Russia.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is it not the fact that their sympathy is neither with Austria nor with Russia, but rather towards the establishment of another kingdom of the character of Little Russia, such as they had in days of yore?

Mr. OLIVER: It was very natural that, from time to time, these people should revert, in their minds, to the condition of their former greatness, and there is a proposition for the establishment of a Ukraine —that is, of a southern Russia kingdom independent of Russia at large. But that only establishes the point I make that their sympathies have not been with Austria or the Central Powers.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is it not a fact that during the last six or eight months, a propaganda has been carried on by the Central Powers, on the promise given these people that they would establish them as an independent kingdom, and that their sympathies have found direct expression in favour of Austria and Germany, by reason of the propaganda carried on in Canada directly from those countries and also from the United States.

Mr. OLIVER: I can quite appreciate that these people would be very receptive to a propaganda that would look to the re-establishment of their race and kingdom, but I have yet to learn that the propaganda has been carried on in the name of Germany or Austria. I have no doubt it was financed by Germany and Austria, but never carried on in their name, so that the people have no reason to look with gratitude to Germany or Austria because of that propaganda. Those who are not entirely pro-Russian are looking to an independent state of Ukraine or Little Russia, and in no case is their sympathy in any degree with the Central Powers, either Germany or Austria, although they were citizens of Austria.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is it not the fact—and I know it from personal inquiry—that among the Galicians, who are of Austrian descent, settled in Alberta, there is a very considerable number who have relatives, some holding the rank of general, fighting in the Austrian army, and that the ties of blood are very, very strong with them, and these ties are manifested very frequently?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to argue the point, but if that is to be a reason for disfranchising these people in Canada, what is to be said of the royal family of England, many of whose close relatives are fighting with the Germans? As a matter of fact, the people referred to are citizens of Austria, and being in Austria they are subject to the military rules of Austria and must fight, of course, with the Austrian army. But I am speaking of these people as a race, and particularly of those of that race who are in Canada. Their sympathies, beyond any question, are not with Austria; they are either with the prospective Little Russia, or with Russia as she stands to-day. The loyalty of these people to Canada has never been questioned, except by the Government in so far as it has refused to accept their offers of military service. I want to say to this House that when the war broke out there were specific offers of military service made by people of the Russian race—Ruthenians, Galicians, or whatever you are pleased to call them, offers to raise military forces to join the Canadian Expeditionary Force. For good or bad reasons, these offers were refused. But I know that in many individual cases members of that race are to-day members of the expeditionary force, and are serving overseas. I should think that fully half of the 218th Battalion, with Colonel Cornwall in command, is made up of men of this Little Russian race. I do not know how they got by the policy of the Government which prohibited their enlistment, but, at any rate, it is a fact that the 218th Battalion went away from Canada with fully half of their members of that particular race, and there never has been any reason to question the loyalty of those people to Canada.

There is another class of people mentioned here, people of German speech, who were residents of Russia before they came to Canada. These people were in much the same position as those I have spoken of, residents of Galicia. They were colonists from Germany over a hundred years ago. Many of them colonized under Catherine II. They have lived there for generations, and have maintained their German speech. They enjoy certain special privileges, but not knowing Germany, except as a matter of memory or tradition, and having no part in kaiserism or junkerdom. They came to Canada. They have been good citizens of Canada, and ready and willing to do their part in everything connected with the war, or with the maintenance of the rights of Canada or the citizenship of Canada. I am sorry my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. White) is not present, but I heard him say that, in all his constituency a certain settlement of German Moravians from Russia—if I do not mix the conditions up too much—were the most liberal contributors to the Patriotic Fund in that district.

Under these circumstances, I consider this Bill is without excuse and without reason. If there were any suggestion of bad citizenship, of disloyalty under conditions of war, if there were any circumstances that would make an excuse for this enactment, they should be known; but I say there are none, speaking of these people as a whole—and if there are any individual cases, then I say those individual cases are to be dealt with just as others would be. That is what a government is for. There has been a great deal of provocation given those people in the early stages of the war; I am not blaming anybody for it but I merely state the fact that, in the early stages of the war, the Mounted Police were ordered to collect all firearms from these people.

Suppose a man has been a citizen of Canada for fifteen or twenty years and his stake in the country, as is the case with some of these people, runs into tens of thousands of dollars. If a mounted policeman goes into his house and demands the shotgun that he uses for shooting rabbits or partridges, he would not be very favourably impressed with the conditions of the country in which he lives. I have yet to hear of any disturbance or of any objection to this procedure; the people recognized that there was a war on; that difficulties had to be met. So far as I am aware, they submitted to that condition without a murmur, although they did consider that it was an unnecessary hardship—and I consider so, too. In the light of these facts, when the Government of Canada comes forward with an Act like this—breaking the faith of the Dominion with these people; declaring that their citizenship is no good, telling them in effect that they are not wanted in this country on terms of equality with other citizens—a blow is being struck at the progress and unity of this country that this Government will be answerable for and that will do this country more harm than the Government can ever do it good.

As I said in the beginning of my remarks: what is the offence of which these people are guilty, or of which they are expected to be guilty? There is only one thing that they can do in the case of an election; they can vote; that is all. They must vote for the candidates represented at the polls; presumably they must vote either Conservative or Liberal. If they are being disfranchised, it must be because it is expected that they will vote Liberal. Because, therefore, a citizen of Canada is suspected of an intention to vote Liberal, he is to be disfranchised by the act of this Government, which holds authority not from the people of Canada, but by the vote of this Parliament. Is it the intention of this Government to attempt to make the world believe that the Liberals of Canada have less heart in the prosecution of this war than the Conservatives have? If that is the intention, it is an attempt to brand within a fraction of half the people of this country as being disloyal. Is that a good way to strengthen Canada as one of the forces of the Empire? Is it true, Mr. Speaker? The place to find out whether or not that is true is in the casualty lists, not in the numbers of the safety-first brigade. If the casualty lists from one end of this country to the other are examined it will be found, if loyalty is measured by service and sacrifice, that the Liberals of Canada have done as much as our friends on the other side. I will go further, and say that the time has gone by when the putting on of a military uniform is an evidence of service. The men who are fit for service in this war and have not offered themselves for such service are subject to rebuke. But what is to be said of the men and the officers in thousands who are wearing the uniform and drawing the pay without rendering the service? These are found in the ranks not of the Liberal party, but of the Conservative party.

I do not know upon what information the Government founded their idea that they were going to secure an advantage by passing this legislation. But I say to them that if I know the English-speaking people of the West—and I think I do—this legislation will not appeal to them. They are in that country to build it up, with the assistance of those who are established alongside of them, who have been given the same rights of citizenship; and they realize that the only way in which a united country can be built up is by giving equality of rights. They will realize, when this legislation is introduced, and the rights which they enjoy are withdrawn from their neighbours, that permanent injury is done to them in every capacity as settlers and builders of the country. No party bickering in the election that is to come would ever compensate for that unfortunate condition. While the Government may, as a result of this legislation, disfranchise thousands of the persons whom they are pleased to call enemy aliens, they will establish in the minds of the fair-minded and right-thinking English-speaking people of the West an absolute belief in their injustice, their unfairness, and their unfitness to carry on the government of this country.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on the Bill now before the House, I am not actuated by selfish motives. As far as I am concerned, the Bill in question will have no prejudicial effect in the county which I have the honour to represent. In New Brunswick, particularly in the county of Gloucester, the only change affected by this measure will be in respect of the female vote of relatives of soldiers who have gone to the front. Of course, the greater the number of voters who go to the polls, the larger the majority will be.

I protest most earnestly against some of the principles involved in this Bill, particularly the disfranchisement of so-called alien enemies. We have boasted during the past twenty-five or thirty years of the immigration to Canada from the countries of central Europe. The people who have come from those countries have been among our best citizens; they have shown loyalty and devotion to the institutions of Canada and of the British Empire. Most of them left their native land in order to free themselves from the yoke of European rulers and they admit to the world the advantages they enjoy in this new country. They are amongst our best citizens, in regard to not only loyalty, but work. They have raised the greatest crops and have shown an example to the Canadian farmers who have settled around them. It has been my privilege to meet some of them on different occasions, and to travel amongst them for days and days at a time. I have met them as I have met other Canadians. When they mingled together with the English Canadians and French Canadians, you would not know, were it not for their pronunciation, that they were foreigners. From their views and aspirations, you would consider them, not as strangers, but as brothers living under the same flag and the same institutions. It has been my privilege, on a few occasions, to address meetings largely composed of Austrian and German settlers in Saskatchewan and Alberta. On one particular occasion I attended a large convention of farmers in the riding of Red Deer, Alberta. The convention was held in the town of Prevost, where farmers of Austrian, German and other European nationalities had gathered together. I was able to judge of their aspirations and of their love for the country in which they were living, and I remember the hearty applause with which my words were received when I spoke of the liberties which they, together with other Canadian citizens, were enjoying under the British flag on this side of the Atlantic. That was about eight or ten days before the declaration of war, and their conduct ever since has been worthy of true British citizens. We induced those people to come here under the promises we made to them. We promised them, that when they came to Canada, they would enjoy all he privileges given to British subjects on this side of the Atlantic, and they have come here under those promises. Those promises have been made to the world at large. We expect more immigrants to come to Canada after the war is over. They may not come from Germany or Austria—I presume we shall not receive them for a number of years—but they may come from Russia, France and Belgium. If the people of Canada do not remain faithful to the pledges and promises made to the immigrants who came to Canada before the war, how can the world at large depend upon the promises of Canada in the future? We want immigrants to come to Canada; we shall need them by the thousands, and we must to-day give the same guarantee to the world for the future as we have given for the last thirty years. It is on account of those promises that those people have come to Canada. Pledges should be maintained, should be respected. We have given guarantees to certain classes of immigrants who have come to Canada. I refer to the Mennonites and Doukhobors, who have been guaranteed that they will not be called upon to perform military services, and this Bill respects those guarantees. Why then not respect the guarantee given to those other people who have come here and have enjoyed the privilege of citizenship and have shown themselves worthy of it? The statement has been spread broadcast throughout Canada that those people in the western provinces have been most generous to the Patriotic Fund. It has also been stated that some of those men are in the field today risking their lives in defence of Canada. Yet by disfranchising men of German or Austrian birth in this country, we are putting into the minds of the younger men of those nationalities, who in a few years will be of age to exercice their franchise, resentment against Canada on account of the pledges made to them being broken. I trust the Solicitor General or Minister of Mines—when I look at him I am more apt to call him the Solicitor General, because I believe the duties of that position are more in accord with his natural proclivities—will again consider the matter and exercise his legal acumen as well as his patriotic proclivities in the direction in which he should have exercised them when he framed this Bill. This is a question of principle; it is a question of pledges to the world, of pledges to those people who have come here and the prosperity that the West has enjoyed during the past number of years has been, to a certain extent due to the flow of immigration to Canada as a result of those pledges. After the war is over, we shall require perfect accord and harmony amongst all our population, and we shall not have immediate harmony in this country after the war is over if this Bill goes into effect and inspires distrust of the pledges of Canada.

I have always been in favour of giving the vote to our soldiers. It has been my privilege to say in this House before that I am willing to give the vote to soldiers of the age of eighteen years who have enlisted voluntarily, because in that manner they have testified to the world, and more particularly to Canada that they have studied the questions of the day and have felt it to be their duty to fight in defence of the liberties they enjoy under our constitution. It should, therefore, be the privilege of Canada to endow those soldiers with the franchise. I have no objection to the relatives of soldiers being permitted to vote. But if the Government desire to extend the franchise to the female relatives of the soldiers, why not extend it to the women of Canada at large? By this Bill, an injustice is done to the women of five provinces of Canada, namely, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, who have the right to vote under the present law. Those women have acquired that right, and have shown themselves worthy of it, and this Bill limits the women suffrage to the female members of the families of our soldiers. While the wives and sisters of our soldiers deserve the vote, many of the women in those five provinces are just as worthy of having the franchise as members of the families of our soldiers.

How many young men have offered their services and been rejected by the medical officers, and have gone home with tears in their eyes? I have seen them myself in my home town of Bathurst, in Gloucester county, where about twenty-five per cent of the men who offered their services were rejected by the medical authorities. Is not the mother or sister of a rejected volunteer just as worthy of a vote as the mother or sister of the young man who has been accepted and gone to the front? There is no difference between the two families at all. Why not extend the vote to all the women of Canada? While the women of the eastern provinces have never agitated very much for the franchise, they are just as capable of exercising it with intelligence and loyalty as the women of the West. I admit that the women of the West, related to the young men who have gone out there, have made a special contribution to the development of the country by helping to colonize and build up new territory. At the same time the women of the East are just as well able to exercise the franchise as those of the West. Why should not the franchise be given to the women of all the provinces?

I rose merely for the purpose of offering these few remarks. I trust that the Government will still further cogitate over the provisions of this Act. I trust that they will not take away the franchise from the people of the West, and that they will extend the franchise to the women of every province in this country.

Hon. ALBERT SEVIGNY (Minister of Inland Revenue): I should like to say just a few words on a point that was raised a few minutes ago, when it was contended that the Bill now under discussion was not printed in English and French. As I said before, I made inquiry about twelve o'clock to-day at the distribution office to see if the Bill had been printed in French, and was assured that it had been printed in English and French and had been distributed. Let me read to the House a declaration by Mr. T. W. Alexander, assistant distributor:

> Ottawa, September 8, 1917. Bill 133 was received at 12.15 and immediately distributed. Hon. Mr. Sevigny telephoned at 12.30 and I assured him that the Bill, French and English, was distributed to all the officials. I have personally investigated and have seen that the Bills were distributed in the boxes of the French members.
> (Sgd.) T. W. Alexander.

I have also the following declaration by Mr. Boulet, Chief of Pages:

> Mr. Alexander of the Distribution Office notified me about twelve that the Bill was ready in French, and in accordance I notified the pages to file the same, and the Bill was filed as usual.
> (Sgd.) E. Boulet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the proper time to discuss this would be before the Orders of the Day are called on Monday, when the hon. member for Shefford, who is now absent, would probably be present. My hon. friend must know that he is out of order. The question is on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no doubt at all that the question before the Chair is the second reading of the Bill. Now that the hon. member for St. John has raised the point of order, I must rule that the hon. member cannot proceed. The reason I did not interpose before was that I thought that the House would like to be seized of the facts on this point.

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): This Bill, which is described as the War-Time Elections Act, has some features about it of special interest to the public. It enfranchises women, with certain restrictions, in the eastern provinces, and with certain exceptions it disfranchises the women of Ontario and the western provinces. We have been led to believe by discussions in the public press that the Government was going to revert to the old plan of having a Dominion franchise, as apart from a provincial franchise. If that had been done the question would have come to us in this Parliament as a new one altogether, whether or not we should enfranchise women. It was, however, made very clear by the Solicitor General in introducing this Bill that the provincial franchise in the various provinces was to be adopted with certain exceptions. The Solicitor General said:

> By this Bill the provincial franchise is adopted in every province of Canada, including Alberta and Saskatchewan. It cannot of course be adopted in the Yukon as there is no Yukon franchise. The provincial franchise, subject to the operation of the two principles I have described in the foregoing part of my address, is adopted in every province, including Alberta and Saskatchewan.

We are now considering whether we shall disfranchise a great many women and leave only a comparatively few with the vote in their possession. This 11 p.m. Bill also disfranchises large classes of male electors especially in western Canada. Of the enfranchisement of women who are the next of kin of soldiers, I heartily approve. It is a measure of enfranchisement; it is class legislation; it is not based on any principle except relationship, although in introducing the Bill the Solicitor General did put forward the proposition that the franchise was being given in virtue of the services and sacrifices of the women on whom it is conferred. As a matter of fact, it falls very far short indeed of conferring upon all those women who have given services and made sacrifices the franchise to which they are entitled.

If we had never before had manhood suffrage and at this time we were considering the question anew, we might make alterations in the manhood suffrage law and might prescribe qualifications, general in their character, which we have not done. But in regard to manhood suffrage, we have laid down certain qualifications, and it becomes most difficult at this time in our political history to restrict those qualifications. In the eastern provinces the Government propose to enfranchise only women who are next of kin of soldiers, and they pass judgment upon the good works of that great body of British and Canadian-born women who have been spending their days, since the commencement of this war, in patriotic service, in Red Cross work, and in all those activities in which women can take part and by which they can show their loyalty to the soldiers at the front and the Empire. In regard to the women of the western provinces and Ontario, the case is stronger, because the franchise is general as to women. In Manitoba a registration has taken place. Women have already taken their share in the provincial elections in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and in British Columbia the vote has been given to them. With discrimination against British-born and Canadian-born women, this Government declares that all the work they have done day after day is not sufficient to qualify them to vote for members of Parliament, that they shall stand aside from that class in which they have been placed under provincial statutes, and that only those shall vote who vote by virtue of their relationship.

It is said that women hesitate, that they do not register and vote readily. In the city of Saskatoon a year ago there was a registration of voters under our provincial Act. At that time we had a visit from the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he was a witness to the efforts we were making to secure a complete registration. He lent us the aid of his eloquence in pointing out the obligations of citizenship, and I am sure that his appeals both to men and women were successful in assisting us in getting the fullest possible registration. The result was that over 6,700 men and women in that one city were registered, and there were 50 more women than men. I understand that in the recent registration in Winnipeg there were more women than men registered. We have found throughout the cities of the West that the women are willing to take their part in public affairs; that they will not only register but that they will vote as the occasion comes. It will surprise me very much if, in view of the declaration of the Government that this franchise which is now given is based on the provincial franchise, women will without protest be disfranchised and be put alongside of the foreigners of alien enemy birth in their disfranchisement.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend speaks about the proposal of the Bill to disfranchise women in the five western provinces of Canada. Will he be kind enough to tell us when and where women in Canada have ever been entitled to vote for members of this House? I may be mistaken, but I have the idea that we are not disfranchising them. To disfranchise women is to take something from them that they have already. We are not proposing to take anything from them which they already have, because they have never been entitled to vote so far as I am aware.

Mr. McCRANEY: My hon. friend is telling me and telling the House something that is not new to us.

Mr. CROTHERS: You speak of disfranchising them.

Mr. McCRANEY: Yes.

Mr. CROTHERS: We are not doing that.

Mr. McCRANEY: I am speaking of it in reference to the provincial franchise and in reference to the declaration of the Solicitor General that they were adopting the provincial franchise with the exceptions that he mentioned.

Mr. CROTHERS: We cannot disfranchise them as far as the province is concerned, if we would.

Mr. McCRANEY: My hon. friend will have to follow his own logic.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Prime Minister promised them the franchise.

Mr. CROTHERS: No.

Mr. McCRANEY: My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) reminds me of the pledge the Prime Minister made to them a few days after his return from England, in which he promised a measure of woman suffrage with some restrictions. It appears that this is the measure which is given to the women of this country in fulfilment of the pledge of the Prime Minister, and according to the words of the Solicitor General this is the provincial franchise with certain restrictions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say "restrictions."

Mr. McCRANEY: I have already quoted the Solicitor General's language and I shall not misrepresent him. If the Prime Minister had said nothing about it his position would not have been so difficult, but it is certainly misleading to the women of this country, in view of the fact that five of our provinces had given as wide a measure of franchise to women as to men, to assure them that there would be an enfranchisement of women with restrictions, when the vote is only given to the near relatives of the soldiers who are overseas.

With regard to the disfranchisement of the male population, there is no doubt that, while this is described as the War-Time Election Act, the very evident purpose of it is to re-elect the Government party.

The two parties must take care of themselves and this Government understands the principle of "safety first." I must say, it seems to me that there will be, in the Western Provinces at any rate, very little result to the Conservative party. If it were only political results that we were dealing with at this time, I would say it matters very little whether one party or another attains a political result. I am speaking now apart from the promotion of the war. Whether the Liberal party or the Conservative party holds power for the next five years and takes a political advantage of an Act, any effect of that kind will soon pass away. But there are facts which will not pass away in the years after this Government passes out and another government comes in. Those are the permanent results, especially in western Canada, which arise from the fact that we have invited into our country some hundreds of thousands of immigrants from Europe and from the United States, that we have offered to them a part of our natural heritage, that we have invited them to partake of the civil rights which we possess, and that upon their good citizenship and their residence for a certain length of time among us, they will have all the privileges of electors which we ourselves had. Out of those hundreds of thousands we now propose to select certain of them and say, "Notwithstanding the fact that you have behaved yourselves, that you have committed no disloyal act, step aside, you shall not come near when we elect a new Parliament." The danger of this is the stigma of disloyalty which is cast upon a comparatively small body of our immigrants, and I think it is much smaller than the Government imagines. We put this before the whole class of people who have come in from all the countries of Europe, and we give them notice that some day it will be their turn, and that some other class may be dealt with as we now propose dealing with those of alien enemy origin. We are going to say to those people, now being disfranchised: "We shall put you in the same position as are the negroes of the southern portion of the United States." And when our people in western Canada are put by the Conservative party in the position of the negroes in the South, and are disfranchised in this way, I think they will remember it for many years to come.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say they will be in the same position as the negroes have been in for the last fifty years and that during all that time the negroes have been denied the franchise?

Mr. McCRANEY: I understand the negroes of the South were enfranchised for quite a number of years, but that by laws of the various legislatures the Democrat party has taken away from the negroes the rights they had. If my memory serves me, they have, for instance, made certain provisions in the State of Virginia, under which no negro can vote whose grandfather did not have the right to vote, or something like that—at any rate, they have got them out of voting. That is what the Government proposes to do with this class of immigrants. The result is the same, and the stigma is the same. In western Canada, we have large numbers of foreigners who will be affected by this Bill. I have before me a phamplet entitled "Immigration Facts and Figures" issued by the direction of Hon. W. J. Roche, Minister of the Interior, 1917, giving the immigration into Canada, and containing a statement of the total immigration to Canada by nationalities from July 1st, 1900 to March 31st, 1917. I have selected from this list those who are of alien enemy origin, namely, Austro-Hungarian, Bulgarian, German, and Turkish. I will give the House the result of my investigations. In the period from June 30th, 1900, to March 31st, 1911, there came into this country from Austro-Hungary, 200,016 persons; from Bulgaria, 32,267 persons; from Germany, 38,807 persons; from Turkey 4,552 persons, a total of 275,642. In determining the number who came in from Turkey, there are four classes mentioned, Turkish-Arabian, Armenian, Egyptian, and Syrian. I have only included in these figures of 4,552 the Turkish and the Arabian. Under the Bill which we are considering, the Government gives the franchise to Armenians and Syrians, so I have not included them. neither have I included Egyptians, because, while nominally Egypt is under Turkey, it is so under British rule that I would not regard any Egyptians as being of alien enemy birth. My recollection is that with regard to the Syrians and Armenians, if they are Christians they are given the vote. I do not know what standards this Government is going to use, whether they will use the Shorter Catechism and the Westminister Confession, or the Thirty-Nine Articles, or the Canons of Roman Catholicism—and I do not know to what tests they would subject themselves if they proposed to qualify in this way. It is proposed by this Bill to disfranchise those who had not taken out their citizenship before 31st December, 1902. I am including now, for the purpose of ascertaining the population against which this disfranchisement would operate, those who came into the country from 1900 to 31st March, 1911, and I do that because those who came in after 31st March, 1911, would not be able to take out naturalization papers, because their term would be up during the war, and my understanding is that no certificates of naturalization have been issued since the war began up to the present time. Consequently I find that the total immigration which has come into Canada from 1900 to 1911 is as follows: Austria-Hungary, 121,001; Bulgaria, 12,124; Germany, 21,145; Turkey, 2,997—a total of 157,267. I said a moment ago that I thought the political result would be much less than the Government anticipated. Out of that total of 157,000, nearly one-half would be women. There would be, and still are a large proportion of minors. There would be the removals which have taken place from this country, say to the United States; there would be some who returned to Europe again; and there would be a good many deaths in the population. I should be surprised if the number who would be actually disfranchised by this Bill would run over 30,000. If only such a small political result could be got out of it by this Government, with such tremendous consequences in this country, the result would not appear to justify the measure. This population is scattered chiefly through the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. They are mostly a farming population. I have been in western Canada for over fifteen years. When I first went West I went to Rosthern, fifty miles south of Prince Albert, which was almost wholly a foreign population. If I owe my entry into political life to any one thing more than to another, it is to the fact that I had gained the confidence of people of the very class that this Bill proposes to disfranchise. Not one of those who were there at that time would be entitled to the franchise, because they all came in after 1900. But I must say, from my intimacy with them, having seen the progress which they have made in their social life, having seen the success with which they have carried on their business, having observed with a good deal of interest their progress in Canadianism and their attempts at understanding the problems which we have, I want to protest as strongly as I can against the treatment which this Conservative Government proposes to give to these Galicians, Bukowinians and various people from Austria. The Mennonites are somewhat like the Quakers, and this Bill disfranchises them. Quakers and others of similar belief in England may hold their objections and vote. These people in the province of Saskatchewan have no representative of their own in our legislature, which is little short of sixty members. In the province of Manitoba they have one representative, Mr. T. D. Ferley representing Gimli. I am not sure whether there is another, but at most there are not more than two. In Alberta they have only one representative. The result is that they trust the Canadians, and that is why I am here, and that is why the other members from Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, all of British origin, are here. We have their confidence and the confidence is mutual, and if they trust us we trust them, and that is the way to get along. If that population in western Canada were represented, either by their own people, or by a class of representatives which was not endeavouring to lead them into the best lines of Canadian citizenship, I could understand why it might be thought by Parliament that the franchise given to these people was a pernicious influence in public life. The great question which has been before Parliament during this session was the question of conscription. All the members in the province of Saskatchewan were for conscription; in Manitoba all save one, and in Alberta all save one. What does that mean? It means that the Liberals, who are in this House because of the support of the very people whom we propose to disfranchise, have not been influenced, as the Conservative party would suspect, by the alien enemy, but have taken the position which they believed to be right. They have supported conscription. They are willing to go back to their people and make what effort they can to educate them to their duties of citizenship, and whether successful or not, at any rate they will take the consequences of what they have done. I should be surprised if the Galicians and Bukowinians were in favour of conscription. They left the country from which they came in order to get away from war. I do believe, however, that an appeal to them upon grounds of Canadian patriotism and citizenship would be worth while. If they were not brought to the conscription side, in which the Liberal representatives who are here speaking for them believe, they would at least be brought to a neutral position in the matter.

While speaking of the position of the western Liberal who represents them and of his willingness to take a chance, to accept responsibility for their political education, I may point out that there is one party in this House that will not take a chance, and that is the Conservative party. What is the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite towards those members of the Liberal party who are willing to take that chance? I probably can speak of this as other members from the West cannot, because I do not expect to be a member of this House again. I do feel, however, that in placing this measure of disfranchisement before Parliament—a measure against which we protest; a measure in respect of which we must accuse the Government of the most partisan conduct—the Government by their own Act are throwing the gravest doubt upon the judgment that we have exercised in supporting their measure of conscription. I was elected by a considerable number of Mennonites, Galicians, Doukhobors, Ruthenians, Hungarians, Norwegians, Slovaks—possibly as cosmopolitan a rural population as there is in western Canada. Without going back to them for their opinion, I voted for an extension of Parliament. During the six-year term the last year of which was the result of my own vote, am I to disfranchise the very people by whose authority I was sent here, and whose authority I respect? Am I to tell them that although I have overstepped one year of my term, they are not fit to re-elect me as their representative?

It was argued that they will be exempt from military service, and that that is one reason why they should be disfranchised. I do not think that is a good reason for disfranchising them. If the reason put forward for their disfranchisement is that, being conscientious objectors, they are not subject to military service, then it would follow that none should have the vote except soldiers and those unable to serve as soldiers—those over age, for instance. I am sure that the Government does not intend anything of the kind.

The Prime Minister is at the head of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. He has frequent conferences with its officials; he is more familiar than most of us are with the police records of the country and with the conduct of those who live in western Canada and who come under the supervision of the mounted police, including those of enemy alien birth. As one in public life, I hear a good deal that goes on, and I have never heard the suggestion that there have been any disloyal movements among these people of alien enemy birth in western Canada. I have always understood that they were a law-abiding people. The Solicitor General pays a tribute to them. I say that if without discrimination this Government should put them all in the same position, it is wrong; they should not place upon them the stigma of disloyalty to the country to which they have come and in which they are taking a full share of citizenship. To do that is not only unfair, it is cruel; it is unjust to many well-meaning people. If there were some instances in which men of enemy alien birth had disobeyed the law, evidenced unpatriotic tendencies, or proved traitors, that would be no worse than what has happened in Montreal. We have been horrified to find that so near the capital there are persons who dynamite, who commit murder, who have assassination on their programme. It is not proposed to disfranchise French Canadians simply because Lalumière and some of his friends have got into trouble. The fact is that this question, like many others that come before us, is not distinctly a western question. I find that the people of Ontario are more worked up over the disfranchisement of foreigners in the West than the people of the West are. The speeches that have been made in this House demanding the disfranchisement of foreigners have, with the exception of the speech of the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), and of the Secretary of State, who introduced the Bill, been made by Ontario men. I was in the East in 1896 when the Manitoba School question was an issue. We were very much stirred up in Ontario and Quebec over the Manitoba School question, and on election day Manitoba was the only province that gave a majority for the Conservative Government, indicating that they took very little interest in the school question compared with the East. In 1905 I was in the West when the Northwest School question was up, under the terms of the Autonomy Act. We were not very much disturbed about it out there; we knew all about it. But when I came down to Ontario I found that the question was deemed to be a most serious one. Most of the troubles that we get into in western Canada are fomented in Ontario and Quebec; I am glad that we live 1,500 miles away from both of those provinces. Ontario and Quebec have fattened on their religious differences and racial strifes. A year ago the bilingual question was up in this House. What was the attitude of the western men? We voted against the provincial resolution. We did not want to express an opinion on the matter; we did not want a racial question entering into our politics in western Canada. We have troubles enough out there, and we settle them. I venture to say that the matter we are now considering, like the most of the trouble that we now have, has been worked up here amongst the soldiers. If the Conservative party could only settle with our Ontario friends, they would not have much trouble over this matter.

A word with regard to the machinery of the Bill. In the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta we have always been under the law of the Dominion of Canada, which has, I think, originated in 1887: Registration by enumeration is familiar to us, and so it will not give us very much trouble. In Saskatchewan we abandoned the system of the tied ballot which is preserved in Alberta and which is adopted in this Bill. We did away with it for the reason that it was very open to fraud. The tied ballot is a temptation to unscrupulous people to open the envelope and substitute another ballot. That was the reason why we did away with that system in Saskatchewan. I do not know what the experience of Alberta has been, but to me it seems that, in this legislation, one of the worst features of that old system which was carried on in the Northwest Territories has been preserved. In Saskatchewan we had enumeration under the Dominion Act, and we used it in our provincial elections of 1905 and also of 1908. Before 1912, the Liberal Government of Saskatchewan thought it would be a good thing to have lists, and we had lists. We found that the temptation was too strong; that the registrars usually wanted to put on their own partisans and leave off the other fellows. We, therefore, did away with lists, and we have no lists in our rural districts. But in our four cities of Regina, Saskatoon, Moosejaw and Prince Albert we have a registration, and a new list is prepared every time. We take no old list as a basis. The registration to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks was the registration upon which the election in the city of Saskatoon was conducted recently. I want to suggest this point to the Government—that the practice to which people are subject and with which they are familiar is a desirable practice to continue; and I would suggest that, in place of enumeration, in the cities of Saskatchewan at any rate, the Bill should provide for a registration in which everybody appears—and in which there is a proper appeal and the whole question of the right of a man to vote is settled before election day. My objection to the tied ballot, apart from the question of fraud, is that the voter has to be kept near the poll until his right to vote is settled. Adjournments may take place from time to time, and it is not often convenient for a voter to have to stay around day after day in order to find out whether the ballot he has cast shall be counted. I believe it will be very much to the satisfaction of the people in our cities that the voters' lists shall be settled before election day. If that is done, people can go about their business, and there is not the uncertainty which there is bound to be if perhaps some hundreds of ballots are tied up and the result is not known, and for days and days people must be kept about the cities until their qualification is settled.

Another suggestion I would like to make to the Government is that they should have a special provision for voting by commercial travellers and railway men. We have that in Saskatchewan. The voting takes place covering two or three days, if I remember rightly, before the actual polling day. In our last provincial election, the system worked out most satisfactorily. We want to get away from railway influence. It has been customary for railways which take an interest in elections to send out on long runs men who are not of the proper stripe so that they will not get back by election day. All that kind of thing is avoided by the system I have suggested. I hope the Government will take into consideration the suggestions I have made in regard to registration in our cities and also as to the addition of railway men and commercial travellers to the voters' list.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My right hon. friend who leads the House (Sir George Foster) looks tired; it is now within ten minutes of the Sabbath Day, and even with all the bad legislation that we have passed the Fourth Commandment still stands. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Before the adjournment of debate, I beg leave to give notice that immediately before the Order of the Day is next called for resuming this debate, I will move that the same be not further adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and the debate adjourned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You are taking the closure over Sunday.

On the motion of Sir George Foster, the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Monday, September 10, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WAR TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the orders of the day be now read.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the right hon. gentleman state the reason for the motion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The reason is that we desire to proceed to Order No. 22 on Government orders.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Franchise Act?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is a very important measure. We have no objection on this side.

Motion agreed to, and Orders of the day read.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the House do now proceed to Order No. 22 on Government Orders, resuming adjourned debate on the motion of Sir George Foster for the second reading of Bill No. 133, the War Time Elections Act.

Mr. KNOWLES: I beg to—

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable.

Mr. KNOWLES: By the unanimous consent of the House, I might briefly state my position in regard to the Private Bill which appears on the Order Paper, for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion does not afford debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER moved:

That the debate upon the second reading of Bill No. 133, the War Time Elections Act, shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. GREEN: I was paired with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll). Had I voted I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was paired with the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Stewart). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. KAY: I was paired with the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. THOBURN: I was paired with the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce) for the second reading of Bill 133, The War-Time Elections Act.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): This Bill if passed will not do me any harm. I stand to gain by it. The proposal to enfranchise the female relatives of the soldiers will probably increase my majority by a considerable amount. I have no alien citizens in my constituency, but there are Conservatives there who are fair-minded and who like to see fair play, and, if I judge them rightly, they will resent this measure. It is not giving away any secret to say that that is the feeling generally on this side of the House. We on this side of the Chamber feel that, in the step that is being taken now, the Government have over-reached themselves. There is a feeling in this country that a man should take a fighting chance. He takes it in western Canada, and he takes it in eastern Canada. Among the school boys in the province from which I come the desire for fair play is almost a passion, and there is always a feeling of contempt for the man who takes a mean advantage, the man who hits below the belt.

The danger of this measure is that it lends itself to fraud. While our party stand to gain in some particulars, we stand to lose in others. The administration of this measure in some cases, no doubt, will fall into the hands of dishonest officials. The provisions of the Bill, so far as I have been able to learn, are complicated and intricate. Permit me to make a proposal, Mr. Speaker, that you should scrutinize this Bill from first to last and give me your honest opinion about it. I confess when I read it, and when I discovered the complicated provisions relating to the tied ballot which has been abandoned in western Canada, I believe, for some years, because it was notorious for the frauds brought about under it. When I saw the extraordinary power that was given to irresponsible local enumerators, and the provisions relating to the soldiers' grandfathers and the Syrian Christians, I felt in my own mind: for God's sake, what kind of franchise are we going to have in this country if the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) continues to tamper with it, twist it and bedevil it, as he has been doing for the last two or three weeks. It reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of the German buccaneers in Southwest Africa, whose plan was to fight the British forces in the present war by poisoning all the wells. The title of the Bill is "The War-Times Elections Act." Let me suggest to the Secretary of State that he change the name, and call it "The War-Times Prussian Junker Act." The idea behind this measure is military autocracy. We, on this side of the House, I am proud to say, stand for democracy. If hon. gentlemen opposite want autocracy, why go to all this trouble to get it. They can get it without resorting to such a measure as this. All they have to do is to hold up their hands, lay down their arms, and the Kaiser will give it to them. Military autocracy is the same wherever you find it. British military rule or Canadian military rule is not one whit better in its aim than German military rule.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is only a question of degree. We had military rule in Britain long ago. We had it in Ireland in the days of Oliver Cromwell; the memory of it exists in Ireland yet.

Mr. MURPHY: They have it there yet.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We had it in Scotland in the days of the "big killing," when my countrymen and the countrymen of other gentlemen in this House were shot like wild beasts in the glens and hills because they insisted on their right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience. Thank God these days are past in the old land, and they are also past here, and, notwithstanding the puny efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite, they will never return. But it becomes necessary for us at this late date, 1917, to reassert the doctrine that every man has a right to have a say in the election of the representatives of the people; to have a voice in the determination of who shall govern the country in which he lives.

This Bill contains three main provisions. First, it disfranchises about a million women who live between the Ottawa river and the Pacific coast. The women of these five provinces are now entitled to vote. That is in direct violation of a resolution of this House, moved by the Prime Minister; it is in direct violation of what every man in this House and in this country understood to be the pledge of the Prime Minister. Why was it done, Mr. Speaker? It would not have been done if the Government could profit by abstaining from it. This Government have scoured the world for votes; they have given votes to men who never saw Canada, who never set foot in Canada, and probably never will. The only explanation of their conduct in disfranchising the women of Canada in these five provinces is that they believe they will vote against the Government. I do not need to refer to the self-denial and fortitude of the women of Canada and the way that they have helped to carry on this war. I do not need to say that the women of Canada deserve better treatment at the hands of this Government.

The second provision of the Bill enfranchises the female relations of soldiers, both East and West. I heartily agree with that provision of the Bill. The only objection that can be made to that provision is that it is class legislation; it is not fair to those who have been left out, practically all of whom have made great sacrifices for the cause for which we all stand.

The third provision of the Bill is the most important one; it disfranchises men of alien birth. I submit that this provision is a vicious one; it is a breach of faith on the part of the Government of this country. We invited these people from northern Europe to come to Canada. We promised them land; we promised them the rights of citizenship; we promised them protection under the flag. We boasted that we had such a thing in this country as British fair play. We assured them that Canada was the home of liberty and the refuge of the oppressed from every land. They took us at our word—and what are we doing now? We are branding them as outlaws and as perjured traitors. After three years residence and good behaviour, they came forward to take the oath of allegiance in order that they might become naturalized British subjects. This is what they promised:

> I do sincerely promise and swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George V as lawful sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the Dominion of Canada, dependent on and belonging to said kingdom, and that I will defend him to the utmost of my power against all traitorous conspiracies or attempts whatsoever which shall be made against his person, crown and dignity, and that I will do my utmost endeavours to disclose and make known to His Majesty, his heirs or successors, all treasons or traitorous conspiracies or attempts which I shall know to be against him or any of them, and all this I do swear without any equivocation, mental evasion or secret reservation. So help me, God.

They took that oath, and we have the testimony of hon. gentlemen who have lived among them that they have kept it faithfully. We are now preparing to break our promise to them, and in doing so we put ourselves in the same position as that taken by the German Kaiser. What will President Wilson say about this action on the part of the Canadian Government? He has sent out a clear call to the young men of the United States. He has taken high ground; he has summoned half a million men to the colours. What for? To establish the great principle that every free man has the right to help select the government under which he is to live. He refuses even to negotiate with a government that does not hold office by the voice of the people.

I object to this measure, first, because it is designed to serve party and not public ends; second, because it is despotic and unjust in so far as the disfranchisement is concerned. If the Government of this country, assisted by closure and backed up by a political machine called the Senate, can disfranchise one class of the people, what is to prevent them from taking a like step in regard to any other class that is suspected of being hostile to the Government? Why not, Sir, disfranchise every man who joins a labour union in this country? There is no reason why the Government should not do that. That is what is in their hearts and minds; they only lack the courage to do it. They have not done it because they dare not do it. Do the gentlemen composing this moribund Government think that the Galicians and the Moravians have no friends? Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the hatred of tyranny is in the heart of every free man, and, once kindled, it has to be reckoned with. It was to vindicate this principle that we fought the South African war.

Going back to the history of that event, you will find that British intervention was justified on one ground, and on one ground alone. That ground was that British settlers in South Africa were not allowed to have a say in the election of representatives of the people. President Paul Kruger, in 1899, did what our modern—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Kruger.

Mr. SINCLAIR: —Paul Kruger of Portage la Prairie is attempting to do in 1917. Kruger denied to British subjects in South Africa the right to vote until they had been in the country a period of twelve years. In the year 1899 he introduced the Transvaal Franchise Act, which was on all fours with this measure. You would suppose from reading this Bill that the Secretary of State had obtained his inspiration from Kruger's Franchise Act; The only difference is that this Bill is more oppressive. Kruger required a residence of twelve years; this Bill requires a residence of fifteen years—indeed, eighteen years, because a man has to be three years in the country before he can take the oath of allegiance. The Transvaal Franchise Act denied to all citizens who were not burghers or Boers the right to vote. The enfranchised Englishmen, or Uitlander, as he was called, could become a burgher after twelve years' residence. The Government of Great Britain protested against this long period of probation. The Uitlanders themselves protested. There was great excitement in the Transvaal, in the Cape and in England. Great indignation was expressed at the injustice that had been perpetrated. Large meetings were held in the mining districts of South Africa; an immense delegation was appointed to wait on President Kruger. They put forward every possible argument; They appealed to him as a Christian and as a statesman and as a man. But he was immovable. The London Times published at the time the short, defiant speech that Kruger made on that occasion in reply to the delegation. It was as follows:

> Burghers, friends, thieves, murderers, newcomers, and others: Go back and tell your people that I shall never give them anything. I shall never change my policy; now let the storm burst.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does the Kruger from Manitoba say?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am glad to say that the burghers were not all of one mind. A party in South Africa led by Joubert stood for moderation and fair play. In an eloquent speech, he opposed the Franchise measure.

He said:

> If you pass this you might as well obliterate from the arms of the republic the motto that unity makes strength.

But Kruger had his way; the law passed; the storm burst, and it broke against the shores of Canada. My right hon. leader who was at that time the Prime Minister of this country sent out a call to the young men of Canada, and 8,000 of them answered the call and went to that distant part of the Empire to fight for the flag. Some of them never came back. At Paardeburg, the Modder river and other places on the lonely veldt of South Africa you will today see little wooden crosses marking the graves of some 200 Canadians who perished in that struggle. They gave their lives in defence of the principles for which we stand here to-day. Did they throw away their lives? Will any man say that those men died in vain? I make the statement, Mr. Speaker, without fear of successful contradiction, that this Bill is a direct insult to their memories. This House of Commons at that time, by a solemn resolution, unanimously condemned in anticipation the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. This resolution, which was moved by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, seconded by Mr. Foster and unanimously adopted, read:

> 1. Resolved, that this House has viewed with regret the complications which have arisen in the Transvaal Republic, of which Her Majesty is suzerain, from the refusal to accord to Her Majesty's subjects now settled in that region, any adequate participation in its government;
> 2. Resolved, that this House has learned with still greater regret that the condition of things there existing has resulted in intolerable oppression, and has produced great and dangerous excitement among several classes of Her Majesty's subjects in her South African possessions;
> 3. Resolved, that this House, representing a people which has largely succeeded, by the adoption of the principle of conceding equal political rights to every portion of the population, in harmonizing estrangements and in producing general content with the existing system of government, desires to express its sympathy with the efforts of Her Majesty's Imperial authorities to obtain for the subjects of

Her Majesty who have taken up their abode in the Transvaal such measures of justice and political recognition as may be found necessary to secure them in the full possession of equal rights and liberties.

The members of the House stood up and gave three cheers and passed this resolution unanimously and sang God save the King.

Sir Charles Tupper who was at that time leader of the Opposition wrote a letter giving his assent to the resolution. My right hon. leader made a speech in which I find this extract:

We can appeal for protection to the Uitlanders in the Transvaal, not only upon the grounds of British citizenship and suzerainty, but upon rights which must appeal to the conscience of all men. If there is any country in the world it is this country of ours, Canada, where we can proclaim this principle, that wherever men of different races, but races of equal rank, are found to live together under the same Government, the only policy which can give adequate justice to all, which can give satisfaction to all, which can insure harmony, is a policy of equal rights and equal justice, a policy which will give to every citizen, without any question of birth or origin, the same rights, the same liberties, the same privileges, the same aspirations. This is the policy which we have adopted in this country, and I think we can fairly claim with some pride, that it has proved eminently successful.

Now let me read this short extract from the speech of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster):

Nothing strikes us more strongly than the attempt—which may be based on grounds of self-preservation and limited patriotism—of President Kruger to keep for himself and the Dutch citizens of that republic the rights, the privileges, the power which they have hitherto had. But every one sees that it is a contest which can have only one termination; that to-day the civilized world is hostile to such a policy as that; and that all that is required, as I believe, is a continuation of that patience and the focussing of the attention of the civilized world upon that point to bring about an amicable solution in the end. Great Britain's efforts have always been marked by the free giving of equal rights to men of every nationality who choose to become citizens of her own country or of any of her dependencies.

The Prime Minister himself was at that time a member of this House, and although the record does not say so, I presume he stood up and voted for that resolution and sang God Save the King.

One thing that I am proud of is this, namely, that my honoured leader, after eighteen years of change, worry and the turmoil of a stormy public career, is standing to-day for the same high principles of freedom, fair play and justice for which he stood in 1899. What about hon. gentlemen opposite? Where does the Minister of Trade and Commerce stand? I feel sure that my right hon. friend, if left to his better judgment, would repudiate this measure. There is not the slightest doubt that he would like to do so. The spirit, I have no doubt, is willing, but the flesh, I am afraid, is weak. In 1899 he declared that the civilized world was hostile to such a policy as this, but the civilized world, and all its works, must be ignored when it conflicts with the re-election of the Tory party. That is all thrown to the winds now. My right hon. friend's good intentions of 1899, I fear, have become another paving stone in the road to that place that I would not care to mention. The trouble with the Government is that they are stampeded for fear of defeat in the coming election. They have grown chicken-hearted. They are grasping at every straw within their reach. They are afraid to face their opponents in a fair fight. The Canadian soldier exhibits no such craven spirit. Can any one imagine a Canadian soldier making plans to disarm his antagonist and hamstring him—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: —and bind him hand and foot before venturing to attack him?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman's time has fully expired.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy more than a very few minutes in regard to the question now before the House. This matter divides itself into two parts, namely, the giving of the franchise to certain women in the country and the disfranchising of certain men in the country. I do not agree with the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) when he says that this Bill disfranchises one million women in this country. We cannot disfranchise those who do not possess the franchise. We cannot take away from them that which they do not possess. Therefore, I say that his remark in that regard is entirely erroneous. The hon. gentleman saw fit to draw attention in his remarks to the fact that the vote was being given to certain men who, he said never lived in Canada and perhaps never will live in Canada. In that, he referred to those British subjects, who, living in the United States, saw fit to don the uniform and go overseas to fight in this great war in our behalf. I think the hon. gentleman's opposition to the extension of the franchise to those men will not be received with acclaim by many people in this country. Even in his own constituency, I doubt very much if he will find many to agree with him in his opposition to the granting of the franchise to those brave men who have gone overseas to do for us what a number of people in this country have shown no disposition to do for themselves. The hon. gentleman has referred to Krugerism, Kaiserism, Prussianism and the Boer war. He was very strong in his expression of disapproval of Krugerism. Might I remind the hon. member that his attitude to-day is somewhat different from the attitude of his party at the time Kruger defied Britain in South Africa? The attitude of his party at that time was one of standing still until the sentiment of this country forced them to take action, and it was only under that compulsion that they sent some troops to South Africa to put down Krugerism, and even then they sent them on the C.O.D. principle. The hon. gentleman says that the men who gave their lives in South Africa died for principles for which they on that side of the House stand. He might have added to that that they died for the principles for which we on this side of the House move. That is the distinction between the two parties: They "stand" and we "move." They stood in the matter of the war in South Africa until the people made them move. They have stood in the matter of this war; and so far as they are concerned, if we are to judge from their present attitude, there would have been very few Canadians overseas, had hon. gentlemen opposite been in power in this country instead of the party which is in power.

As to the granting of votes to women, might I remind hon. gentlemen opposite of what took place in this House away back in 1895, when Mr. Davin, then member for Assiniboia, moved, on the 8th of May:

> That in the opinion of this House, the privilege of voting for candidates for membership thereof should be extended to women possessing the qualifications which now entitle men to the electoral franchise.

That motion was opposed by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition, who moved in amendment that:

> The question of woman suffrage is one which, like other questions concerning the suffrage, more properly belongs to provincial jurisdiction.

In other words, he shifted the whole responsibility to the provinces, and raised the issue whether there should be a provincial or Dominion franchise for Federal purposes. In the course of his remarks on that occasion, he said that so far as the province of Quebec was concerned, there was no sentiment in favour of granting the franchise to women; the sentiment, on the contrary, was just the other way. He said:

> I am not sure that the granting of the franchise to women would be altogether an unmixed evil. I am not sure that it would tend to the harmony or to the improvement of domestic life which after all is the proper centre of woman's influence. . . . Whether the suffrage is applied to women or to any other class, it is largely a question of education, largely a question of social disposition, largely a question of habit. Let the provinces decide the question. There may be provinces where from the education of the people, from their social habits, it might be conducive to the general good of the country that women should be admitted to the franchise. As to the province from which I come, I must say that it is not prepared for woman suffrage. . . . If the proposition were made in the local Legislature of Quebec to confer the suffrage on women, I am quite sure it would be voted down at once. Speaking for the province of Quebec, I am certainly right in saying that women do not feel it an injustice that they have no right to vote on any political question.

If, therefore, this Bill went the length the hon. member for Guysborough says it should go, and granted the franchise to all women, it would be disapproved of more heartily by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition than if it granted only a partial franchise to women. In other words, if all the women of the province of Quebec and other provinces were to be enfranchised, instead of only some of them, as under this Bill, the grievance of that province, if it is a grievance at all, would certainly be much greater.

This measure proposes to give to certain women in this country a voice in the selecting of the next Government of this Dominion. Why should the franchise be extended to these particular women, rather than to all women in this country? Will any person say that the women who have worked for the Red Cross and other patriotic societies, making comforts for the soldiers, should be put on the same footing, even though some of them have worked night and day almost, with the women whose relatives are overseas? I believe there will be no outcry from these women themselves, because their sisters whose relatives are overseas are to be given the right to vote.

But there is another reason why these women whose husbands and sons and brothers are overseas should be selected for this honour on this occasion. They have an especial interest in the selecting of the next Government which will control the destinies of this country for the next four or five years. They have an especial interest in seeing that the honour their men have won for this country is not put to shame by a Government which would be controlled by the anti-British and foreign element in this Dominion. That, I say, is their right on this occasion. What injustice is being done to the foreign element, the alien enemies in this country, in excluding them from the franchise? One can understand that men of Austrian or German birth might feel very diffident about enlisting and going to the front, possibly to fight against their own cousins and brothers in this great struggle. But if these men of alien enemy birth are not prepared to assume their full share of responsibility as citizens of this country, they certainly should not ask for all the privileges that go with citizenship in this country. Citizenship is not a one-sided affair. It grants certain privileges to a man, but it also entails the assumption of certain responsibilities, and it seems to me that in view of the struggle that is going on in Europe at the present time, no injustice is being done to those men who have so far shown little or no disposition to take part in that great struggle, by excluding them from the franchise. What right have men to call out in the name of liberty, who have made no effort to maintain that liberty? What right have men to call out in the name of democracy and democratic government who are not prepared to fight to maintain democratic government and democratic principles? What injustice is being done to any man who has shown no disposition to uphold the principles of democracy on which the government of this country is founded, by refusing him a say in the election of a government in this democratic country?

The next election will be entirely different from any other election ever held in this country. There will be no fiscal issue before the people. The only issue will be: Shall we place in power in the Dominion of Canada for the next four or five years a government that is in sympathy with British institutions and prepared to keep faith with the boys who have gone overseas, or a government chosen from a party who have shown by their conduct that they are not in sympathy with British institutions, and that they are not prepared to keep faith with the boys overseas and back them up with the reserves that are required? That is the question for the people of Canada to decide in the next election. It will not be a question of tariff or of fiscal policy. The question will be: Shall this country be controlled for the next four or five years by men who are in sympathy with British institutions and democratic principles and prepared to do their part in maintaining them, or shall it be controlled by men backed up by the anti-British and foreign element in this country who so far have shown, not only no disposition to maintain the principles which hon. gentlemen opposite so loudly acclaim in this Chamber, but in many cases have shown a disposition to block all progress along the line of maintaining those principles as they should be maintained, and a disposition not to back up our men at the front. Therefore, for these reason, I give my hearty support to this measure.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Right Hon. Sir WILFRED LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, in all federated countries it was for a long time a much discussed question as to what power should regulate the franchise. Two ideas were advanced, one that the franchise should be regulated by each legislative body, whether it was the local body or the central body. The other that there should be only one franchise, as there was only one country to be represented, and what division there was, was not in the people but in the nature of the power which was entrusted either to the local body or to the central body. After long discussion, the prevailing idea was that there should be only one franchise, and that whether the people were represented in the local legislatures or in the central Parliament it should be only the same electorate that should act. The American constitution, indeed, on this point is very definite. The second article reads:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states, and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

So, in the United States, the franchise is regulated by each of the 45 States of the Union. There is no franchise for Congress, but the members of the Congress are elected by this franchise which exists in the several states of the Union. Our Constitution did not go that far, but it provided, by article 41, that until the Parliament of Canada had otherwise legislated, the franchise as it existed in the year 1867 in each one of the provinces, should be the franchise upon which the House of Commons would be elected. That state of thing continued until the year 1885,

4 p.m. when this Parliament enacted a franchise for itself, which franchise existed until the year 1897; and I ask the judgment of every man in this House, either on this side or on the other side, as to whether the Dominion franchise which existed from 1885 to 1897 ever gave the same satisfaction as the provincial franchises had given before the year 1885. From the year 1897 up to the present time, the franchise for this Federal House has been the provincial franchise, and I think I may say, again placing myself under the judgment of every man in this House, that the provincial franchise has given full satisfaction.

If I understood aright the speech delivered by the Secretary of State the other day, when he moved the second reading of this Bill—and I think I did understand it aright—he rather agreed with the principle of maintaining the provincial franchises for election to this House of Commons. But though he agreed in principle that the members of this House should be elected under the franchises in each province, he proceeded to stab the provincial franchises in three particulars.

In the first place the franchise which exists in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and British Columbia, make no distinction at all between class and class—it gives the franchise to every British subject. My hon. friend by this Bill, however, provides that an important class of His Majesty's subjects shall be denied the privilege which they are now enjoying in each of those provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my right hon. friend permit me? I know he does not wish to mis-state the case. It is not at all true that the provincial franchise laws in the West make no distinction of race, and that all British subjects have the right to vote. As a matter of fact, they do make distinctions of race, and all British subjects have not the right to vote.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In Manitoba, there is no distinction whatever. Every man who is a British subject is a voter. If that is not the case, what is the use of this Bill? Why does it provide that British subjects, who have become British subjects after the 31st day of March, 1902, shall no longer be electors after this Bill becomes law? That is one thing to which I object.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the province of Saskatchewan, Chinese subjects have not the right to vote.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If my hon. friend will permit me I will say: that is very specious reasoning. Chinese and Japanese are not voters, but the Germans and Austrians are voters, and they have been voters from the time they were naturalized. The object of my hon. friend is to take away from these men of foreign origin the rights and privileges of British subjects, which have been freely granted to them by the provinces I have mentioned.

That is what I blame my hon. friend for to-day. He is introducing a new principle and violating the franchise granted by his own province of Manitoba to these men. And, for what reason? Because, forsooth, they are of foreign origin. Because they may have been born in Germany, or Austria, or Turkey, they are not supposed to be able to give an unbiased verdict upon the questions before the country. Well, for my part, and I speak frankly, I do not admit that doctrine. I do not admit the doctrine that when a man leaves Europe—whatever may be the part of Europe whence he comes—and comes to this country, when he swears allegiance to His Majesty the King, when he becomes a citizen of Canada, when he builds a home for himself and for his family, I am not prepared to believe that if a conflict arises between the land of that man's birth and the land of his adoption, that he will go back upon the country to which he as sworn allegiance.

I can well believe that if there be men of German origin who have forsaken Germany and who have become British subjects in this country—having made their homes here and established their families here—that they may be suffering agony at this time, but I am not prepared to believe that they will turn traitor to the land of their adoption in favour of the land of their birth. They have given up the land of their birth because conditions were not satisfactory to them, because they were living under tyranny, because their Government would not respect its pledges; and they came to a land which they were taught and were told would hold sacred whatever promises or pledges it made to them. If you tell me that in a conflict between Germany and Great Britain these men will turn traitor to the land in which they have enjoyed freedom and happiness, I am not prepared to believe it. There may be cases here and there of men who will do so, but that the great mass of such people would, is something I do not believe. The men who came to Canada from Germany are very few. The great bulk of immigration did not come from the Empire of Germany. There are some German settlers in the western provinces who have come since March 31, 1902, and I have never heard a single word in this Parliament or outside of it to say that they have not behaved as true British citizens.

Not only that, but for every German settler in Canada to-day there are in the United States one hundred, one thousand, settlers of German origin. Do we hear that in the United States they have taken this drastic, this humiliating course, which we are now asked to take by this legislation? No. The American Government, to their honour be it said, have trusted every man who has sworn allegiance to American institutions. It is reserved for this Parliament to be asked to deny everything which up to this time has been held sacred, that is to say, the honour of the British Crown given to these men, the promise made to them, every one of them, that they would be respected in all the privileges of a British subject. My hon. friend who preceded me quoted to-day the oath which is taken by every foreigner who becomes a British subject. Let me quote the pledge which is given on behalf of His Majesty the King:

> This is therefore to certify to all whom it may concern, that under and by virtue of the said Act so and so who has become naturalized as a British subject, and is, within Canada, entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject.

This is the pledge which was given to these men, whoever they may be, who have become naturalized since the 31st of March, 1902, and to-day we are asked to violate that pledge, to repudiate it, and to set it at nought. Well, Sir, that is not the way I understood British institutions. I heard a moment ago that we on this side are not proper British subjects, and have not the spirit of British institutions. I have only to say on this point that I claim that I understand and appreciate my liberties and my privileges as a British subject much better than many men who sit on the other side of the House.

And who are those who are to be disfranchised under this Act? Are they of German origin? Yes, a few of them who can be counted perhaps on the fingers of my two hands? These men who are to be disfranchised under this Bill are not Germans, but are those who have come to this country from Austria. Few are of German origin. Most of them are Slavs—Moravians, Galicians, Ruthenians and Bukowinians, all men of Slav origin who have for years and centuries been tossed about in their allegiance, now to the Turks, now to the Austrians, and who, to-day are Austrians by force of law, but whose heart is not with the Empire of Austria. These men are rather looking towards Russia in the hope, perhaps, not that they will become Russians, but that their States will become independent. These men are not Germans, and the principles of the Bill as expounded by the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) do not apply to them.

It is said that these men, on account of their origin or their allegiance, are not supposed to be able to give a fair verdict upon the issues before the Canadian people. I say, on the contrary, that these men, by their allegiance, are in full sympathy with the cause for which we have been fighting for the last three years. The object of this Bill, therefore, is not to be found in the speech of the Secretary of State—there is something behind it all. I repeat that if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister were to trust to these men in the same way as they have been trusted in every election since they came to this country, he would find that upon all the issues which are now pending before the Canadian people, their hearts are in full sympathy with the cause of freedom which we are defending in this war.

But there is something else. My right hon. friend is not satisfied with taking away the franchise from those British subjects by naturalization; he equally takes away the franchise from the women of Canada in five provinces. I heard a moment ago the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) say that we took away no rights from the women of Canada. The law to-day, and the condition that exists, is that in five of the provinces of this Dominion, by Acts passed by the local legislatures in the full enjoyment of their provincial rights, the women have been enfranchised and have a right to vote. These are the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and, according to the law which I shall read to my right hon. friend, these women to-day have the right to vote in Dominion elections. Here is the law (revised statutes of Canada, chapter 6, section 10):

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such persons to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

According to my interpretation of this law, the women of Ontario, the women of Manitoba who are to-day on the electoral lists, have a right to vote in Dominion elections. I know that this point is controverted. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), on a previous occasion, speaking on this subject, expressed the opinion that this provision did not give the women of those provinces the right to vote in a federal election. I cannot, for my part, admit this interpretation. I have nothing to say in disparagement of the legal ability of the Minister of Justice; on the contrary. I have nothing but praise for it. But the best men can err, and it seems to me, that with the law as it is to-day, it is impossible to maintain any other opinion than that the women in any province where they have the right to vote in the provincial elections have also the right to vote for members of the House of Commons. But I have to say more than this, and this is my answer to the hon. member for Frontenac: If the women of those provinces have not, by the existing Dominion law, the right to vote in the coming election for the House of Commons, it will be the duty of the House of Commons to give them that right.

This Bill is based upon one idea, so far as it is not a negative idea, that is to give to the women who happen to be relatives of soldiers who have enlisted, the right of the franchise to a certain degree. To this I have no objection. But there is a better way of doing it than that chosen by the Government, who have given the franchise only to certain women. The only proper way would be to give it to all women. I am told that there is a special degree of merit in the women who happen to have relatives at the front, that they are better entitled to the franchise than those who have not relatives there.

Is that principle to be accepted? Are we to weigh their actions, in order to ascertain who among them may have more or less merit? I am willing to give them all the credit which is due to them, but there are thousands and thousands of women who may have no relatives at the front, but who have done all that it was possible for them to do, to help the allied cause. Where is the town or village in Canada where the women have not done the very best in their power to assist the Allies in this war? They have worked by night and by day to minister to the wants of the soldiers at the front who are fighting our battles. The only thing they have not done is this: they have not gone to the trenches, but they have gone as near to the trenches as it was possible for them to go. Many of them have ventured far, in order to render assistance and comforts to those who have been wounded on the battlefield, and will you tell me that those, though they may not have relatives at the front, should not have the same rights and privileges as those who may have a brother or a member of their family fighting for the Empire? For all these reasons, Sir, I say that the measure which has been presented to us is one which cannot be accepted by a free parliament.

We are in favour of advancing, and not in favour of retrograding. If it be thought advisable to extend the franchise to those women who have relatives at the front, should we not give it to all women in this country who have done their part in assisting in the cause. Let not this franchise be extended in the manner proposed, at the expense of removing it from those who have it already. Let that not be done at the expense of removing the franchise from those who now have it. Let it not be done by depriving any of our people of rights and privileges which have always been held sacred under the British constitution.

Sir, in this war, we are giving generously of our money, and, indeed, we have been piling up an expenditure which would become very dangerous were it not for the vast resources of this country. But for my part, at the present time I have not been disturbed by this, because I have full confidence in the resources of the Canadian people. Sir, it must be remembered that the resources of our country are of no avail unless we have men to exploit them, and if we are to bear the load which is being imposed upon us, simply with the present population, the problem is one which may well cause any man to pause. We want more people, we want more help and more assistance, and where are we to get it? Do you believe, Sir, that when the war is over, when peace is restored, and when we come to normal life, when we shall send our immigration agents to Europe again, as we did before, to bring immigrants to this country, that we can send them to the Balkans? If we cannot send them to the Balkans, where shall we send them? Can we expect a large immigration from the British Isles? I am afraid it is not to be expected. We cannot expect any immigration from France or Belgium. Our field will be mostly in the Balkans. Do you believe that when our Canadian immigration agents will go to the Balkan States, among the Galicians, Bukowinians, and Rumanians, that these different races will be disposed to come to this country, when they know that Canada has not kept its pledges and promises to the people from foreign countries who have settled in our midst, and when they know that in the United States there was never any attempt to curtail or interfere with the rights as American citizens which immigrants to that country were granted. It seems to me that in this condition of things there is a thought which will make Parliament pause before proceeding further with this Bill. This is not a Liberal measure, it is not a Canadian measure, and it is not a British measure. It is a retrograde measure and a German measure. The position taken by the Government cannot be justified. If you want to have the true intent and meaning of this Bill, you must go beyond the Bill itself, because within the four corners of the Bill there is no justification which could induce any man on the other side of the House to vote for it For my part I hope that it is not too late to ask Parliament to pause, and to consider the bad precedent which it is establishing, which must be far-reaching in its consequences. I ask my hon. friend to reflect upon this. The measure is such that it must have serious consequence. If it be said in Canada that the pledges which we have given to immigrants when inviting them to come to this country to settle with us, can be broken with impunity, that we will not trust these men, and that we will not be true to the promises which we made to them, then I despair of the future of this country. I could not expect that in future we shall have the same measure of satisfaction that we have had in the past in our efforts to induce immigration, if we follow such a principle.

I again call to the attention of my hon. friends on the other side the comparison which will be made between the treatment which is accorded to immigrants in the United States, and the treatment which is accorded them by the Canadian authorities. Look at the action of the American Congress, when that country came into the war. The Congress made more preparation for war in six months than we did perhaps, in three years. They looked over the whole field and covered it, but they never thought of disfranchising anybody, even when the country was overrun by German spies, when German spies were engaged in treachery and trickery, when they were trying to dislocate even the production of munitions. When such were to be found everywhere and anywhere, the American Congress did not, for a single moment, think of depriving the German settler of the rights and privileges which he had received as an American citizen. Is that not the course which we ourselves should pursue? Should we not follow the example of the United States in this regard, rather than introduce legislation of such a retrograde character as this?

I am sorry to have to take the position which I have taken on this point. I have been supporting the Government on the war policy up to the present session. I am sorry that the occasion arose during this session when I had to discontinue my support of the Government on a measure of great importance. I am sorry that I have to again dissent with the Government on this measure. But I believe—and we shall all be judged some day by our actions here—that in this instance the Government is taking a step which will cause serious injury to the country, and, therefore, Sir, actuated by these sentiments I beg to move:

That this Bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that the abridgment by this Parliament of the electoral franchise now enjoyed in any province of the Dominion by any class of His Majesty's subjects would be contrary to the peace, order, and good government of Canada.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the limited time at my disposal I shall not be able to follow my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in all that he has said. It may, however, be worth while to point out that he is seriously astray in some of his assertions. It is not true, although he asserted that it was, that all naturalized British subjects in the four western provinces have the right to vote; that can be demonstrated to him by the production of the provincial statutes bearing upon the question. He seemed to be under the impression, also, that women who have gone overseas as nurses with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces have not the right to vote. He emphasized this by declaring that in some cases they have been under fire. I beg to assure him that all members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, whether men or women, have the right to vote at the forthcoming election. Not only is that the case, but, as I am reminded by the Secretary of State (Hon. Arthur Meighen), the female relatives in this country of such women also have the right to vote at the election to be held in the early future.

My right hon. friend has taken issue with the opinion of the law officers of the Crown as to the construction of the Dominion Elections Act. He asserts that all women on the provincial lists have the right to vote at Dominion elections. I can only say to him that the Minister of Justice (Hon. C. J. Doherty), the Solicitor General, and all the legal authorities whom the Government consulted on this question, entertain an opinion directly opposite to that for which my right hon. friend stands sponsor. He will realize that under the circumstances we are bound to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and of other eminent legal authorities to whom I have alluded, rather than his own.

My right hon. friend has called to his aid the example of the United States. No federal election has been held in the United States since that country became a belligerent; therefore he has nothing to offer to us from the example of the United States. Nor can he offer anything to us from the example of the United States until he is able to point to their action under conditions similar to those which confront this country at present. He omitted altogether in his statement any reference to the well known fact that Australia has given us an example of legislation of precisely the same character as this, except that here we have not gone as far as Australia has.

My right hon. friend has seen fit, for what reason I do not know, to disparage this country by stating that the United States have done more in four or five months—I suppose he meant proportionately—than this country has done in three years. I desire to take the most emphatic issue with my right hon. friend on that point. I do not understand the motive which led him to make such an assertion, having regard to his responsibility as a public man and to the position that he occupies in this House and in this country. I desire to draw no comparisons. I fully realize the splendid effort that the United States is making in this war; I have heard many accounts of it in recent days. There is no doubt about the fact that they are making a magnificent effort; they are going into the war in a splendid, whole-hearted way, with a view to achieving the victory which we all desire. But I should like to tell my hon. friend—if he does not know it, he ought to know it—that if the United States had made proportionately the same effort in this war that Canada made in the first two months after the war broke out in 1914, she would have raised within six weeks after she entered the war an army of 500,000 men, and within two months she would have had that army on the ocean en route to France.

With regard to the whole question, I should like my right hon. friend to realize that this is a war-time election which he has forced on this country. So far as the disqualification of aliens of enemy nationality is concerned, there are some considerations that he has not taken into account. Does my right hon. friend seriously propose that we should put aliens of enemy nationality under the Military Service Act and send them to the front line of trenches in France and Flanders to fight men of their own kin, men of their own blood, men, perhaps, with whom they were brought up in the days gone by? If my right hon. friend says that we should call upon them to pronounce judgment upon the issue of this war in this election, will he shrink from declaring that they ought to be subject to the same military service as other citizens of Canada? If he takes the one position, it seems to me that he must take the other. He has taken care, however, not to put that forward, for reasons which are very obvious. It would be unnatural to send these men to the front to fight those of their own flesh and blood. Indeed, it would be cruel to do so, because the naturalization which they have obtained in Canada does not follow them after they leave the limits of this country, and if they were sent to the front line trenches and were captured by the German or Austrian troops, they might be shot. Would any man say that under those circumstances we should force these men into combatant military service; that we should send them into the front line of battle to fight against their own flesh and blood? Moreover, if we were disposed to take that extraordinary course, what result would follow? The military authorities at the front would not permit us to do so. I have not one word to say against the loyalty to Canada of these men. Throughout this war they have conducted themselves, on the whole, in a reasonable and orderly manner. But no one can doubt that the ties of blood mean something to them, as they do to us. No one can doubt that these men do have a certain sympathy with those of their own kin who are fighting against our troops in the trenches beyond the seas. While on the whole there might not be the danger which is apprehended by the military authorities, who would undertake to say that in some individual instance a man's intense sympathy for his own flesh and blood might not overcome his loyalty to his adopted country? If that occurred in one, two, or three instances, what would be the result? If my right hon. friend had seen some of the telegrams that I have read in regard to what happened to some of the New Zealand troops overseas eighteen months ago, he would, perhaps, realize that considerations of this kind are entitled to more weight than he has been disposed to give them.

If I have made good my point that it is absolutely impracticable for us to force these men into combatant service, to send them into the front line trenches to fight against their own flesh and blood, what follows? What is to be the issue in this election? The issue in this election is to be upon Canada's part in this war, upon the necessity of sending reinforcements to our men overseas who are holding there the first battle line of Canada. The question is as to maintaining Canada's effort. If these citizens, by their origin, by their early environment, by the ties of kinship, by their natural sympathies, cannot be forced into the front line to fight, for precisely the same reason they ought not to be called upon to pronounce judgment upon the issues which will be to the fore in this election. They do not want to be forced into combatant service; more than that, I have reason to believe, from statements that have come to me from most reliable sources, that a large number of these men will be grateful for exemption from compulsory military service on the one hand and for not being called upon to pronounce their judgment in this election on the other. For the same reason that they do not wish to be sent to the front line to fight against their own kindred, they do not wish to be forced into the disagreeable alternative of pronouncing a judgment in which, on the one hand, there is a question of their devotion to their adopted country and to its national purposes, and on the other hand, there is the force of ties of kinship and sympathy towards those who are fighting against us. These considerations apply equally to German-speaking citizens from Russia, whose origin, kinship and sympathies are subject to the same observations, although technically they were citizens of an Allied nation.

My right hon. friend has developed a very deep and sudden sympathy for granting the franchise to the women of this country. I had understood, even until the middle of the present session, that my right hon. friend was not very sympathetic to that proposal, and that some of his followers had much difficulty in persuading my right hon. friend that he should come to their view. He starts out on the assumption that the women of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia are entitled to vote at federal elections. I take direct issue with him on that point. I say they are not entitled, under the present law, to vote at federal elections. Therefore, when my right hon. friend argues that we are depriving those women of a vote to which they are presently entitled, he is speaking without the book, if we rely, as we are entitled to rely, upon the opinions of the law officers of the Crown and of all authorities whom we have consulted on that question. I should further like to point out to my right hon. friend and to those on the other side of the House that the question of conferring the franchise on all the women of Canada is surrounded with certain difficulties and complexities which, in my judgment, cannot be solved within the four remaining weeks which comprise the lifetime of this Parliament. In receiving the franchise, women assume an equal status with men in directing and controlling the Government of this country. That is the logical and inevitable consequence of their gradual emancipation from the days when the personality of a woman was absolutely merged in that of her husband, and when women were regarded as not entitled to any voice either in the affairs of the country, or even with regard to their own property. They were denied the right to make contracts. They were not looked upon in the same light as were men in the direction of the affairs of the State, or even in the direction of their own personal affairs. We have emerged from all that. We are emerging now to the point at which the women of this country must be entitled to the same voice in directing the affairs of the country as men, and so far as I am concerned, I commit myself absolutely to that proposal: But I say, that in working it out, it is necessary to take into account certain considerations. I happen to know that the women of this country themselves are very much alive to those considerations. The consideration is this: that the citizenship of a married woman is not dependent, under the law of this country, upon any individual application on her behalf for naturalization, but her citizenship—with one trifling exception which became law for the first time in 1914—is dependent upon the citizenship of her husband. The result of that is this: After the 1st day of January next no man is entitled to naturalization in this country unless he shall have resided in this country for five years. The law up to the present time has required a residence of three years. But if a woman from the Balkan states or elsewhere comes into this country, and after a three weeks' or three months' residence, marries a man who is a native-born or naturalized British subject, she at once becomes a British subject herself. Therefore, unless some safeguard is provided, the alien woman who marries a native-born or naturalized British subject would become entitled to the franchise with no residence at all, or with a residence very far short of that required of men. Every hon. gentleman will realize that such a result would require pretty careful examination and study by Parliament. I say again that the women of this country are very much alive to that consideration, and delegations of women from both East and West have pressed it upon my attention. What is the remedy for that condition? The remedy, it seems to me, is this: If a woman is to have an equal status with a man in the franchise and in determining the direction of public affairs in this country, is it not reasonable that a woman shall have an equal voice in determining what her citizenship shall be? If she is entitled to a full voice in the direction of public affairs she is entitled to an equally full voice in deciding what her citizenship shall be. What is the law at the present time? A woman who has resided in Canada all her life marries an alien in this country, and what happens? She loses her British citizenship. That is not a fair result if we are to grant the franchise to women. Suppose we should grant the franchise to all the women of Canada to-morrow and leave the naturalization law as it is at present. Then any British-born woman, any woman born within the limits of this Empire, resident in Canada, who might marry an alien, would immediately lose her right to vote because her citizenship would become the citizenship of her husband. Therefore, we must consider the provisions of the naturalization law, and we must give to alien women who come into Canada a right to individual naturalization, which they cannot have under the law as it is to-day.

My right hon. friend will say: Why not do that at the present session? I say: It is impossible, in view of the brevity of the time remaining at our disposal, to give that question the attention and to surround the measure with the safeguards necessary for that purpose. Let us remember that in 1914 a very earnest, and, I think, an effective attempt was made for two purposes. One was to have a uniform naturalization law passed in the Mother Country and in every great Dominion of the Empire. The other was to increase the length of residence in various Dominions of the Empire for the purpose of naturalization and to make such naturalization effective throughout the Empire. The law which was passed in 1914 in Great Britain was passed by this Parliament as well. It was passed, also, by the legislature of the colony of Newfoundland. I am not sure whether it was enacted in any of the other self-governing Dominions. I think it was passed by one other, but I am not certain. It is not apparent that if we are to amend our naturalization law, as seems to be necessary, in order that women may have the right individually to determine their citizenship, we must have some negotiation, we must give careful consideration to the purpose of uniformity which inspired the Imperial Conference of 1911, to take steps along this line? We have a naturalization law which is in precisely the same terms as that in force in the British Islands and in Newfoundland, and possibly in some other Dominions. The purpose is to have that Naturalization Act uniform throughout the whole Empire and to make it effective throughout. It is impossible for us to accomplish the purpose which, I think, is necessary, and which, I believe, the women of Canada consider necessary, in the few weeks yet remaining in the life of this Parliament.

What have we done under the circumstances? We have determined that we shall give to all the women of Canada who have immediate relatives serving in the Canadian Expeditionary Force the right to a voice in this election. Who shall deny them that right? It is based upon precisely the same principle as that which guided this Parliament in determining the qualifications under the Military Voters' Act, because men to-day serving in the Canadian Expeditionary Force have a right to vote at the impending election who would not have that right if they had not joined that force. The principle upon which we have proceeded is, as the Secretary of State properly expressed it the other day, the principle of service and of sacrifice.

There are other and additional considerations. Three hundred thousand men of the best that Canada can produce have joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force and gone overseas to fight for our liberties and our institutions. Is any hon. gentleman in this House inclined to minimize the influence which those men could exert during the coming election if they were personally present in Canada? Is not some regard and some importance to be attached to that consideration? But there is more than that. It will depend entirely upon the military operations as to how many of these men will have the opportunity to vote, and it is beyond question that many thousands of them by reason of the service in which they are offering themselves for the supreme sacrifice will not have that opportunity. But there is more than that. Thirty thousand of them lie buried in France and Flanders, and is it not right that the immediate relatives of these men should have some voice to speak on their behalf when the issues at the next election come to be determined? There are also some thousands of them prisoners in Germany, undergoing hardship and privation, to whom it is impossible to give the opportunity to vote at the impending election. Is it not right that some one in this country should have the opportunity to speak on their behalf? There are thousands of these men in the British or allied forces who were residents of Canada and would have had the right to vote at the next election except for this war and the service they are giving. I deem it right that some person in this country should have the right to speak in their behalf.

I say that this proposal to extend the franchise to the immediate relatives of soldiers at the front is not only a fair and reasonable proposal, but I go further and say that it would be most unfair and unjust if some one did not have the right to speak on their behalf. These are the reasons and the considerations which have impelled the Government to propose this measure to Parliament. The voice of those who are serving Canada overseas, of those who have fallen, of those who have died in order that Canada might live, of those who lie in German prisons, that voice we are endeavouring to preserve and give effect to by this measure.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I understand the Prime Minister to say that the introduction of this Bill was largely brought about by the refusal to extend the life of Parliament. I was one of those who voted against the extension of the life of this Parliament, and also one of those who voted in favour of the Military Service Act. I also represent a constituency where there are a number of people who belong to the nationalities that will be deprived of the franchise by this measure. When I voted for conscription, when I voted against the extension of the life of Parliament, I realized that I would have to face these people and explain my position. But I was satisfied and I am satisfied still that I could appeal to them and present reasons for the attitude I took and get their support. But now, with a measure of this character before the House, I cannot go to them and appeal for their support. I have appealed to them ever since this war commenced on behalf of the Patriotic Fund and other patriotic causes; I have explained to them why we are engaged in this war; I have pointed out to them that we were fighting for freedom, liberty and justice, fighting for the national honour and for the pledged word. Now I cannot go back to them and say: "I have urged you to support this cause and to be loyal to this country," and then defend a course that would mean that I, a member of this Parliament, had broken the pledged word of Canada to these people when they became citizens of this country. That is my position. I do not think it is fair for this Parliament to charge that every man of German or Austrian birth in this country is disloyal. I know men who are not of those nationalities; some of them are Canadian-born; yes, and some of them are British-born, and they have not displayed any great loyalty to this country or to our Allies since this war commenced. Why should they also not be deprived of the franchise?

I read a certain paper day in and day out, and have done so since this war commenced. It is the greatest exponent of the cause of the Allies on the American continent, if not in the whole world, and it is published by a man who was born in Germany; I refer to the New York Times. There is another paper published in the city of New York, the New York World, founded, I think, by a man of Austrian birth, and published to-day by his son, which is also an exponent of the cause of the Allies. And who did the President of the United States depend upon to carry his selective draft measure through the House of Representatives at Washington? When the Democratic leader in that body, a man,

I think, not of foreign birth at any rate, refused to promote that measure in the House of Representatives, the ranking Republican, a man of German extraction, if not a German-born, a Congressman from California, directed the measure through that House. And is it fair in this Parliament of Canada, where we maintain we are fighting for freedom, liberty and justice, and where we have given these people the rights of citizenship, that we should stamp upon every one of them who came to this country and became citizens since 1902 the mark of disloyalty, and say that they are not prepared to do their part as citizens of this country? I say, no.

This measure is largely directed against the people who are living in western Canada, against the people who have become citizens since 1902. The settlers of German birth in Ontario who came prior to that are left with the franchise. Now if I remember rightly there have been more expressions of disloyalty amongst some of these people in the province of Ontario than there have been throughout the whole West since this war commenced, and still you are leaving these people in Ontario and the older parts of eastern Canada with a vote, and taking away from the new settlers in western Canada the rights we guaranteed them as citizens. These people have been urged to remain loyal and respect our laws from the commencement of this war, and most of them have done so.

I publish a newspaper in the southern part of the province of Alberta. My ambition has been to create a national sentiment amongst all our new citizens. In my newspaper and during the opportunities I have had as a public man I have done all that I could to promote a virile Canadian sentiment. I was today looking over the report of the Commissioners of the Royal Northwest Mounted police for the year 1916, and in nearly every instance the officials connected with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police say they have had practically no trouble whatever with the foreign-born element in western Canada.

I was speaking at the commencement of my remarks of the attitude taken by myself as a western member on the question of conscription, but my position is far easier than that of many men from western Canada who voted for the Military Service Bill. Compared with some western members who voted for conscription, I have very few of the foreign element in my constituency. These hon. members knew they had these people in their constituencies, but they voted for conscription nevertheless. It was a very drastic war measure, but these men broke with their party and supported it, although they knew that back in their constituencies there were hundreds and thousands of foreign-born citizens. I would refer to the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely), the member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt), and the members for many other constituencies, who are in a far different position from myself.

Still, this Government practically repudiates the independence of the western Liberal members who stood up for the Selective Military Measure in this House, and who broke with their party on that question, and they introduce a measure which practically says they have no confidence in many of our constituents. I want to say that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who voted for this measure have confidence in their constituents, no matter to what race they may belong. So far as I am concerned, as a member of this House who supported conscription, if I am to go before my constituents again, I will tell them, whether they are foreign-born, Canadian-born or British-born, that I supported conscription because I thought it was right, and that they can only elect me on the understanding that I will continue to support conscription and maintain the law in force until the completion of the war. That is my position. The attitude the Government is taking at this time is most unfair, and it is a slap in the face to every western Liberal member who supported this Government on conscription.

We left our party and we took the position we did for the national advantage, because we looked upon the measure as a war measure. This Government is adopting the present measure not as a war measure and not for the national advantage, but for the advantage of the party they represent. I would like to say, that, if we are going to build up a united Canada, if we are going to bring people into this country and promise them the rights of citizenship, we must adhere to the pledged word we have given them. We must let them know that while we are fighting autocracy, while we are fighting a nation that broke its word to another nation, we as Canadians, living under the British flag, are going to adhere to our word. If we trust these people, and if we let them understand the position of Canada and the position of the Allies, I think we can appeal to them and that they will stand loyally by us. Hundreds and thousands of them came away from their home countries because they objected to the form of Government, and because they were oppressed. Seeking relief, they came to Canada. They may not be anxious to support militarism of any kind in this country—as a matter of fact, many of them are opposed to war—but at the same time, many of them are opposed to the position taken in this war by the countries from which they came, and to the part those countries are taking in the war.

There is another feature of the Act to which I wish to refer briefly. The right to vote has been given to women, on the ground of war service or war sacrifice. I heartily approve of that feature of the Act, but I agree with many others who have spoken, from this side of the House at any rate, that war service or war sacrifice has not been confined solely to the women who allowed their loved ones to go across the sea and participate in the war, and probably sacrifice their lives for us. There are many women throughout the length and breadth of the country, in the cities, in the towns, in the villages, and in the farm homes, who have sacrificed much of their time, who have sewed and knitted and contributed for patriotic causes. In my judgment that element of our population should have been included in this Act, and they could very well have been included. If it is war service the Government is anxious to recognize, and if it is the friends of the Allies they want to recognize, why do not our friends from the province of British Columbia advocate that the franchise should be given to the Japanese and the Chinese there? They are our allies. They are fighting for us at the present time. If you are going to deprive a certain element of our population of their franchise—

5 p.m.

Mr. GLASS: Does my hon. friend recommend that the franchise should be given to the Japanese?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BUCHANAN: The Government would have as much right to do that as they have to disfranchise those citizens of Canada who took the oath of allegiance to this country, and who promised to be loyal and obedient citizens. If this were a question of war service, I believe, so far as the provisions relating to the franchise for women are concerned, the Government should have been more generous, and should have included all the war workers. What have we to say about those women who have been working in the munition factories since the war commenced? What have we to say about the young women who are giving their time driving automobile trucks around the city of Ottawa, for instance, for patriotic purposes? Are they not serving their country, and are they not making sacrifices? Why should they not be recognized? To my mind it is only absolutely fair that they should have recognition.

Certainly the next of kin of our soldiers have a right to be recognized, but it would have been a happy thing for this Parliament to have extended the privilege to every woman who has played her part as a patriotic citizen since the war started. I believe we can only create a proper spirit of unity throughout this country by placing trust in the people we have brought here and to whom we have given the rights of citizenship. We cannot create unity by looking upon them with suspicion, and by depriving them of the rights we guaranteed them when they became citizens, because in doing so we practically contradict the position we have taken as a participant in this war. We have always held the ground that Canada was in the war for great principles, one of which was respect for the pledged word and the maintenance of national honour. We cannot expect to have the loyal support of our citizens if we abandon that principle, and refuse to recognize our pledged word. I also object to the measure because it does not give a sufficiently broad franchise to the women of this country, and I will oppose it on those grounds.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Secretary of State): There is a disposition on the part of opponents of this measure to describe it as a disfranchisement measure, and to ascribe to it peculiarities which they seem to think are traditional with the Tory party. It is no disfranchisement measure, except in a very small and limited sense. On the contrary its enfranchisement features so far transcend its disfranchisement features that, taken in all, it is in comparison to our population, the widest extension of the franchise ever passed by a British community.

The hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Buchanan), for the sincerity of whose opinions I have the most profound respect, appears to be labouring under the apprehension that in this measure there is some rebuke to those hon. gentlemen opposite who supported the Government on the question of conscription. For the life of me I do not understand by what process of reasoning he arrives at that conclusion. The vote of no hon. member in this House would have been more welcome to the Administration of the day than that of the hon. member for Lethbridge, if he could have brought himself to the conclusion that this measure was right. Our only motive in introducing this measure is to safeguard the franchise of this country in a perilous crisis, in the interests of the Canadian people, and for no party advantage at all. I would like to know what party advantage can come to members on this side of the House by the passing of this measure which would not accrue to the hon. member for Lethbridge on exactly the same score. If it hurts us, it hurts him if he goes to his electors as a conscriptionist. If it benefits us, it benefits him, if he submits himeslf to his constituents on that subject. His views differ from ours as to the merits of the measure. For his views I have respect. But I would ask him to review the sentence in which he ascribed to us motives of animosity and of repudiating or rebuking conscriptionist Liberals on the other side.

I opened with the assertion that this was the widest measure of enfranchisement proportionate to population ever passed by a British community since the first Reform Bill. We disfranchise, it is true, a number of citizens. That is quite correct. We disfranchise them temporarily while this war lasts. The number of disfranchised is estimated by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) as about thirty thousand; my own judgment would place it higher, but there is no way of getting at anything like the exact figures. But we enfranchise, of those who would not get the vote at all if this measure were not passed, not less, in my judgment, than 400,000, perhaps 500,000 or more of the population of this country. Thus an estimate of 470,000 net addition to the electorate as a result of this measure if it passes Parliament is not far out of the way.

The Bill has two features. I take the first feature in my initial argument, the enfranchising feature, which gives the franchise to the near female relatives of the soldiers overseas. That is objected to by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) on the ground that it is not strictly the line of service that is recognized, that there is a service on the part of womankind beyond the service of the woman whose husband, or brother, or father is fighting overseas. I agree that there is such a service, but the extent of service and the character of the sacrifice which the woman makes who works in a munitions factory, or knits, or sews, is not the same as that of the woman whose husband's, or whose brother's, life is in peril. The hon. member for Lethbridge takes very good care—and he does so advisedly and wisely, in my judgment—to speak no word that could be construed as committing him to the unlimited enfranchisement of women in this country at the present time. He wants to make the line of all service the line of franchise. How are we to tell, how could it be made practicable, to add to those whose near relatives are overseas those who knit and sew and attend Red Cross meetings and visit the afflicted? Could we ever draw such a line and establish it by legislation? He knows it is impracticable. He knows that we have to take a broad and general line, even although cases of individual injustice arise. We cannot enfranchise by individuals; we must enfranchise by classes. We draw the line where it can easily and clearly be drawn, at those who make the greatest and the highest sacrifice, and we say that, for the purposes of this war, that line is the most logical, the most defensible. Some line has to be drawn; no better line than that can be drawn.

It is argued as well that we throw a slur or cast some ignominy on those who do not enjoy the franchise under this Bill. I cannot agree with this reasoning. They were compared, in the language of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), to the negroes of the southern states. Why, it is only two or three months since, in this House, we were favoured with a resolution moved by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that for the franchise of Canada we should adopt the provincial franchise, with female voters, which would have enfranchised the women of five provinces and refused the franchise to those of the other four! Were the women of the other four under his proposal to be likened to the negroes of the southern states? Not at all; but they would have been, if the reasoning of the hon. member for Saskatoon is correct.

We said at that time that whatever franchise was adopted for women should be Canada-wide, and should be enjoyed through all the provinces; and that principle is embodied in this Bill. We favoured that motion, provided there were such limitations as Parliament should afterwards deem to be fitting. These are the limitations, and let those who dispute the justice or logic of these limitations suggest others to the members of this House. The reasoning of the Prime Minister this afternoon is conclusive. We could not go to the extent, under existing conditions, of enfranchising all the women of Canada. To do so would give no special representative vote to the overseas soldiers—in lieu of what an election now denies them. The women of Canada did not ask for the enfranchisement at this time of all the women. They have approached members of this Government and have protested against such a wide enfranchisement, because they felt that under the conditions of this war, with our heterogeneous population, the votes of those foremost in the women's suffrage movement would be defeated by the votes of those scattered throughout our country who are affected by sympathies not at all the same as those which actuate the great bulk of the women of this country.

The Bill denies qualification for the period of this war to those of alien enemy birth who have been naturalized since March 31, 1902, and to those of alien enemy blood, born in other countries and speaking the language of an alien enemy. It is contended vigorously on the part of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that this is un-British, that it is a breach of a pledge given by this country, and that, whatever the consequence, we must not do this thing. I should like to know where that pledge is printed, where it was given. I have never seen it. I have seen pledges given to immigrants; they are embodied in Orders in Council. There have been pledges given exempting certain immigrants from military service in this country. Those pledges we respect. Any pledge given we respect. But no pledge has ever been given to immigrants in this country that is repudiated by this Bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: When any man is naturalized and becomes a naturalized British subject, is he not given a pledge to the effect that "he is, within Canada, entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges to which a natural-born British subject is entitled?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but it adds that at the same time they must assume all our obligations. Does the hon. member say that, under that, there cannot be a limitation of the franchise? If so, how does he justify the Government of Saskatchewan, which he supports, and which disfranchised British subjects, naturalized, coming from China?

Mr. KNOWLES: What has that to do with this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there is a pledge, is not that pledge violated by that Act?

Mr. KNOWLES: Let us grant, for the sake of argument, that the legislature did very wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not heard the hon. member complain of that legislature doing wrong in this matter. Why? Because he never until to-day interpreted naturalization in such a way.

Mr. KNOWLES: A pretty weak argument.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The rights of British subjects here are rights given under the law of Canada. The law of Canada must be dictated by the needs of the hour, for the safety of Canada. Does the hon. member say that in British Columbia there has been a breach of faith because for years past, if not since the birth of that province, they have refused the franchise to British subjects naturalized by the very same certificate, the Japanese and men of alien birth? Is it a breach of faith that those two provinces have done this for years? There is not a shadow of a breach of faith.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand we were discussing whether Canada was breaking its pledged word, and I read the naturalization form from the Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let the hon. member say that two provinces of Canada have dishonoured their pledged word since those two provinces were created. He will not say it; he knows it is not true.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Were those people naturalized?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. NEELY: By the provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: By the Dominion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They had no political rights.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now we have a beautiful political distinction drawn by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), and approved by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Graham), that the pledged word of this country given to immigrants in Canada may not be violated by the Dominion Parliament, but may be violated by provincial legislatures. Is the pledged word of Canada not of any moment to provincial legislatures? Does it mean nothing to them? The pledged word of this country is not violated any more by their legislation than it is by this Parliament now? There are others who were disfranchised in this country. They had not been likened to negroes before. Judges have no vote. Many British-born people have no vote. It is true this is the widest measure of the kind that has yet been placed on the statue book. It is abnormal. But we live in abnormal times. Hon. gentlemen opposite say these people have obeyed the law, and are all right. It is true that, in the main, they obey the law, and there has been little exception, all things considered, to the manner in which they have lived up to their obligations as citizens, but is it seriously argued by those who know these men coming from Germany and Austria, naturalized within the last fifteen years in Canada, are animated by the same sympathy in this war, as animates us, that, as a class, are anxious for Britain to win this war, and that they look upon the dread issue of this struggle in the same light as we? Let me put a case to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Let me assume that one of the hon. gentlemen opposite goes abroad, in order to better his condition in the world. He goes to some European land. He takes up his abode there, and enters on a homestead. In order to get his patent, he has to take out naturalization papers in three years. After he is there a few years, a war breaks out between that country and his native land. He looks across, and finds his own brothers, and perhaps his own children, perhaps his father, his very next of kin, fighting in the armies of his native land, against that of his adopted country. Does any one want to seriously state to this Parliament that such a man would look upon the issue of that struggle as would his neighbours of the blood of his adopted land? Does any one suggest he would be animated by the same desire for the triumph of the army of his adopted country, as would those next door to him, who were of the blood of that adopted land? Human nature is human nature in us all, and is human nature in the German and Austrian in Canada. Would the right hon. gentleman want to be conscripted in that country to fight against his sons at home? Would he expect to be loaded down with the obligations of that war, as would his brothers fighting on the other side? I do not think he would. I do not think he would complain if relieved of those obligations in that country, he was refused a say in the direction of that war.

Is it true that in South Africa there were complaints, because at no time, though they took a large measure in the obligations of the country, were British subjects entitled to the franchise. But who that wants to be reasonable, would contend for a moment that, if the Transvaal had been at war with Great Britain, and if, during that war, and for the purposes of that war alone British subjects by birth naturalized in the Transvaal had been refused the franchise, that that would have been looked on as a breach of faith by us? Does any one conceive such an argument? Not at all. The franchise of peace time is founded on peace service and the franchise of war times is founded on war service. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite, "Oh, we are as anxious to win this war as you are. This election is only being fought on the question of the best method to pursue to win the war." If the election has to be fought on the best method to pursue to win the war, why does the leader of the Opposition express so keen a desire to get the opinion of those who do not want to win the war at all, who cannot be expected by all principles of human nature to welcome the prospect of their brothers being slaughtered that our sons and brothers may triumph.

It is strenuously argued that this is a breach of faith? Did Australia commit a breach of faith? Is Australia blackened by the crime of Germany, because Australia deemed, under the circumstances of this war, that, as the obligations of war were lifted from the immigrants of alien enemy birth in that country, the privileges of the franchise must be lifted as well? Does any one say that the crime of the "scrap of paper" must be laid at the door of Australia? Such a thing never was suggested in the Australian House. A similar measure wider in its terms than this Bill, passed the Australian Parliament, almost without protest at all, and they disfranchised every man of alien enemy birth, no matter when he came to the country.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Why do you start with 1902 in dealing with these people?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unless we went back indefinitely, unless we disqualified those who—

Mr. MARCIL: Is that what Australia did?

Mr. MEIGHEN: She went back indefinitely.

Mr. MARCIL: If you followed the Australian precedent in one respect, why not follow it right through?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because we think they went too far. Would the hon. gentleman go as far as they went? We strike a middle line. Australia disfranchised those who came to that country, no matter when they came. We say that if men have been in this country so long that one can reasonably expect that they have become, as it were, engrafted in the tree of Canada, that they feel as we feel, though perhaps not to the same degree, still to some safe degree, then we believe they are entitled to assume the war obligations of this country, and entitled to assume the franchise in war time.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any precedent in England for war-time franchise?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have had no war-time election—there is no precedent in England of a party forcing a war-time election.

Mr. MARCIL: Are elections not being held continually, all through the war, in England?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A few by-elections, but no general elections, and Great Britain is 95 to 98 per cent British-born, while we have a very substantial proportion of alien enemy birth.

It has also been vigorously asserted—although I do not know that we should be troubled by it, because there has never been an important measure introduced in Parliament with regard to which the same thing has not been asserted—that this is a partisan measure, designed to re-elect this Government. I desire to remind particularly the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) that the same thing has been asserted just as vigorously, just as consistently, and indeed, infinitely more strenuously with regard to the conscription measure of this Government. From one end of Canada to the other, those who do not want to further help the soldiers in France state that the reason we desired to pass such a measure was that we wanted to get back to power.

The argument now is based on the theory laid down by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), that those we enfranchise will support us, and that those we disqualified will oppose us. They charge repeatedly against us that such is our belief. If it is true—and apparently it is true, if hon. gentlemen opposite are right—that the majority of the women of this country whose near relatives are overseas, those who spend their days in anxiety and their nights in tears, will support us, and that those who, of all our population, are likely to favour the enemy, will reject us, then, in the name of the Government which has been striving for three years to fight that enemy, I accept the compliment.

I do believe that the majority of those in the trenches will support the Administration. I do believe also that the majority of those whose near relatives are overseas fighting the foe would rather support this Administration than support one formed by the leader of the Opposition. I further believe that those at the other end of the electoral thermometer, those whose sympathies, whose very heart-strings, are by nature tied to the enemy, are much more likely to support the leader of the Opposition than to support us. But I do not believe that that is an argument against this Bill; I do not believe that Liberals and Conservatives generally throughout Canada, or even those who are disqualified temporarily during war time, will so regard this measure. I have received communications from men who will be disqualified by this Bill—from men with whom I had had not the slightest communication on the subject until the Bill was brought down. I have received a communication from one of the leading members of a disfranchised community in the western country, in which he commended the Government for the action taken, saying that it removed the whole community from the embarrassing position in which it was placed by reason of the war We have been waited upon by representatives of communities of aliens; the Government has been urged that this step be taken. Representations to this end have been made by Liberals who want to see this war carried on; who do not want to see Canada slink from the field. I know that instinctively the Liberal mind—and instinctively our own mind, because our own mind in the best sense is liberal—does not like the idea of disfranchisement. We should be glad if it were not necessary; yet I know scores of persons, who though at first resisting this measure or any measure of this kind, have since made the declaration that they believe the measure essential and right, and that they will support it. These words apply particularly to Liberals; if any hon. gentleman opposite desires me to name them, I shall be glad to do so at any time. I think that the great bulk of Liberals in this country who are anxious to go on and not to go back will support the measure that is now before the House.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I should be failing in my duty if I did not resent with every particle of strength in my being the uncalled for, unjustifiable, unrighteous insult offered to a large number of the people whom I represent by the proposals embodied in this Bill and by the statements made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) upon its introduction. Like other members of this House, I recognize the ability as a debater of the Secretary of State—some say he is a hair-splitter—but I never saw him make such a shamefaced performance as he did when he introduced this Franchise Bill the other day. It was the utterance of a man who was ashamed, Sir, of what he was doing. I give him credit—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should resume his seat when the Speaker rises. The hon. member is certainly exceeding the rules of debate; I would ask him to take more cognizance of them.

Mr. NEELY: I shall have to keep myself within the rules, but I may tell you frankly, Mr. Speaker, that when several hundreds of my constituents, as loyal a people as there are in Canada, are being insulted by the Secretary of State, I find it very difficult to observe the rules of debate and of parliamentary procedure. I should like to know wherein I make an unfair comment when I say that in my judgment the performance of the Secretary of State when he introduced this measure was that of a man who was ashamed of what he was doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member uses unparliamentary language when he addresses that remark to the Secretary of State. He is at liberty to characterize the measure as he wishes, provided he uses parliamentary language. But he is not in order when he applies such a remark to the Secretary of State.

Mr. NEELY: Well, I have said what I had to say on that point, anyway. If you are willing, Mr. Speaker, I will pass on to the next.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think that my hon. friend, having said something of a member that he should not have said, and having been called to order for doing so, should have withdrawn the assertion.

Mr. NEELY: Mr. Speaker, while I am willing to accept your ruling in respect to anything that I have said, I do not want any lecture from the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to what is right and what is wrong in parliamentary procedure.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I took the statement of the hon. member for Humboldt as a withdrawal, and consequently I did not ask for a retraction in terms.

Mr. NEELY: One of the chief reasons put forward by the Secretary of State, for the disfranchisement of a certain class of people in this country was that it was in the interests of the safety of the State. that such a course should be taken. Does that not mean that a certain class of citizens in Canada are not to be trusted with the franchise? If a certain class of the citizens of this country cannot be trusted with the franchise at this time, then my hon. friend had better include in that class—after all, the election is to be held upon the question of method as to winning the war—the thousands of British, English, French, Scotch, Canadian-born in this country who, if a referendum on conscription were submitted to the people to-morrow, would vote against any such measure. If only men who come within the jurisdiction of the Military Service measure are to be given the franchise, then a large number of the members of this House would be disfranchised. Every man over forty-five years of age would be disfranchised.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Even the Solicitor-General.

Mr. NEELY: Those were the reasons given—considerations of loyalty and the question of military service. If disloyalty means nothing more than voting against this Government because they have brought in a measure of compulsory service, my hon. friend will find, before the election is over, that there are tens of thousands, aye, hundreds of thousands of people in Canada who may be branded as disloyal. The Dominion Government, in the days gone by, went into the highways and byways to bring population into this country, to help build up Canada, to develop the great prairies that Providence has placed within our charge, and a large part of this new immigration has, in recent years, gone west of the Great Lakes to fill up our great new provinces. We have been doing our best, through our public schools and our universities, to assimilate and Canadianise that alien population. In my own province of Saskatchewan, since that province was formed in 1905, a new school district has been organized practically every day of every week. The result has been that we have been able to establish a provincial university, and when the war broke out in 1914 there were represented in the University of Saskatchewan no less than seventeen different nationalities. Nearly half of the class roll of 1914 have enlisted and gone to the war, many of them being aliens. Some of them are of German origin, some of Galician origin, and some of Russian origin; but they have gone just the same. With the burden thrown upon us by the federal authorities, and with very small resources with which to carry on our work —for we have not, in the prairie provinces, control of our natural resources—we have been trying to assimilate and Canadianise those various elements of population. We have been meeting with a very large measure of success. But now this Government, by this Bill, will do more injury to that cause than anything that could possibly have happened in this House or in any other legislative assembly in Canada. The Government, by the imputation and the insinuation which they have embodied in this Bill, are casting a slur and an insult upon, and doing an injury to, a large class of our population. That insult will rankle in their hearts until their dying day, and also in the hearts of their children and of their children's children.

When this war broke out in 1914, I happened to be in my home town of Humboldt. A recruiting meeting was called, and on the platform with me was a citizen of that town who was born in Germany. This man came as a child to the United States; he took out his citizenship papers there, when he was old enough, and he served in the United States army in the Spanish-American war. Some years ago he came into Canada and took out his citizenship papers in this country. That man made this statement: It grieves me that my motherland has declared war aganist Great Britain, the land of my adoption, it grieves me that the people of my adopted country will be going over to fight against my kith and kin who are serving in the German army; but when I came into this country and swore allegiance to the King of Britain, I meant every word of my oath of allegiance, and I for one am prepared to stand by the land of my adoption. That man is disfranchised under this measure now before this Parliament. That surely is a fine reward for communities which have contributed as much as my constituency has done—I am speaking now for my own constituency, because I know it. In my constituency the population, which is largely of German origin, has contributed carloads of flour to the Belgian Relief Fund, and it is contributing tens of thousands of dollars to the Canadian Red Cross and other war funds. Numbers of the sons of German parents have volunteered for service in the army. At the commencement of the war they were rejected because of nationality, but some of them managed to enlist by stating that they were Russians. Some of them, whom I have in mind, have been on the casualty list three or four different times. As my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) says: What evidence have this Government to show that those people are not to be trusted with the franchise? The Government have submitted to this House absolutely nothing but an ungrounded suspicion. Some legal gentleman may tell us that these people are under contract with the country from which they came. The country from which they came may have passed laws that demand allegiance from their subjects after they go abroad, but those subjects, when they come to this country and take the oath of allegiance here, are not compelled to follow the edicts of their motherland. I know for a fact that, in my own part of Saskatchewan, hardly a German reservist responded to the call of the motherland when Germany, at the commencement of the war, sent orders that they should return and report to their military headquarters in the old country. Why was that so? It was because the great majority of those people left their several countries in order to get away from the oppression of a military autocracy. They came to Canada because Canada was the land of the free. And they are getting a fine dose from the present Government. Whey they read this Bill, they will waken up to something, and that is this, that the present Government at Ottawa apparently have quite as much consideration for solemn treaty obligation as the man who brought on this war, the Kaiser of Germany. A treaty to him was "a scrap of paper," and our boys have gone overseas to teach him another lesson on that point, namely, that solemn treaty obligations are something more than this.

In order to teach the Emperor of Germany that solemn treaty obligations are to be respected, this government is undertaking to secure the necessary aid for the winning of the war by actually demonstrating by this Bill that national obligations are nothing more than "a scrap of paper." They are demonstrating it by taking away the franchise from a class of men who, according to the record and according to the fact, have done nothing against the interest of this country. On the contrary, since the war broke out, they have given as generously, as freely, and as liberally to every war benefit as any other section of this great Dominion. More than that, they have not refused military service. If the Solicitor General can furnish evidence that any large section of the people of whom I speak have come to him seeking disfranchisement I should like to know something about it; I have represented a constituency for a number of years and am naturally in the confidence of the people to some extent, and I have not heard of a single constituent of mine who has made known any such desire.

The arguments advanced by the Secretary of State for the disfranchisement of these people are as fine a piece of sophistry as one could wish for. We must not send these men, he says, to fight against their kin. Does he not know that in the South African War there were Boers fighting against Boers? What about the war between the North and South, where blood relation was fighting against blood relation, and even brother against brother? Why should my hon. friend assume that these men are not prepared to go to the trenches if they are called upon to go? He has no right to assume anything of the sort unless they have refused military service, in which case there might be some ground for his contention. It this Bill is intended to win the war, and if it is therefore regarded as important to disfranchise the men of this country who are not prepared to vote for the present government, this Bill does not go nearly far enough. Since the closure has been adopted to prevent a full and fair discussion of this question in this House, I can assure, you, Sir, and my hon. friend the Solicitor General and the other members of the government that before this measure takes effect in an election it is going to be very thoroughly discussed in the country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is unfortunate that when Bills of this kind are introduced and rules are enforced to rush them through the House, that other parliamentary rules are not to be deviated from, in order that members may use the language that comes to their minds most readily in reference thereto. I have no hesitation in saying that I consider the introduction of this Bill an insult to myself as a member of this House, and as a member of the Liberal party. Perhaps it is well that the air should be cleared in some way, and this Bill has certainly clarified it, though it has to a certain extent muddied the political pool. To those who had been giving the Government credit for placing patriotism and the winning of the war above partyism, the introduction of a measure of this kind, so purely partisan in its character, must come as a rude shock. That the measure is partisan in character needs no words of proof from me. The Secretary of State demonstrated it to the hilt in his remarks this afternoon. Near the close of his address, in a fit of exuberant pride, he told the House that he believed the vast majority of the new voters would vote for the present Government. He also told the House that he believed those who are being disfranchised would have voted for the Liberal party had they been allowed to retain their full citizenship.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: In these two statements, coupled with the "hear, hear" of the hon. gentlemen who hope to profit politically by this Bill, is the proof that the Bill was introduced solely for partisan purposes, and that neither nearly nor remotely has it anything to do with the winning of the war. On the contrary, its effect will be to retard much of the noble effort which has heretofore been put forth by people in the Dominion of Canada who are not sufficiently fortunate to have members of their family at the front. There are four classes affected by this Bill: aliens of enemy origin; men who do not believe in war; women who are enfranchised; women who are refused the franchise. The women who are refused the franchise are put in the same class with the men who do not want to fight, and with the alien enemy; and the Government can give us all the sophistry it chooses as to why these women are not given the right to vote, but it still remains sophistry. The Government does not believe that these women would vote for them in an election, and that is the reason why they are not given the franchise. This is in line with the argument of the Solicitor General. Let me take up, first, those of alien enemy origin. The situation is this. The Government says to the man who has remained truly loyal under very severe conditions: "We will place upon your brow and upon the brows of your children the brand of disloyalty and treachery, and the shame of it will follow you as long as you live, while we who have remained loyal because this is our mother country and it is easy for us to be loyal, will smite our breasts and thank God we are not as other men, or even as those aliens who remain loyal under present circumstances." The reward the Government proposes to give to those men who remain loyal under present trying conditions is to deprive them of the citizenship which has been guaranteed to them. I ask hon. gentlemen is that an incentive to loyalty? Does it tend to breed patriotism among newcomers to this country? Will it impress upon the mind of the newcomer the fairness of British institutions? Will it show that we are the exemplars of the purest liberty under the sun? It gives a directly contrary impression, and I say now that this act of the Government will do more to cause unrest and to create misgivings among those who come from foreign lands to Canada than anything that has happened since Confederation. And, further, it will do more to retard immigration into Canada than anything this Government or any other Government could do. The Prime Minister went through the West on a laudable tour, making patriotic speeches. We all read those speeches, and thought they would have a good effect. The men to whom they were addressed, as well as their wives, listened to these speeches carefully, and were undoubtedly impressed. What do we find now? The men who listened to those patriotic words spoken throughout our western country—the men who came to the head of this Government, the Prime Minister of Canada, to gain from him knowledge of the freedom for which we were fighting, knowledge of the genius of our constitution, knowledge of those rights which come to every man who takes up citizenship under the Union Jack—these men went home, and profited by those words. They did their best for the cause, rejoicing in the freedom which they had. And now they are branded as traitors, without any explanation or reason being given to this House or to the country. This Bill not only disfranchises men of alien enemy origin who have come to this country since 1902, but it disfranchises many men in the province of Ontario, who have been among our very best citizens for the last thirty or forty years, men whose taxation for carrying on the war is great, men whose wives have laboured early and late, men who have sacrificed much, and some men whose sons are at the front. If this other clause had not been put in—

Some hon. MEMBERS: "If."

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me explain what I mean, because objection will be immediately taken to this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: "If."

Mr. GRAHAM: I will clear up the point in a moment. There are men in this country who came from other lands, took up their residence here, and for twenty years they have been voting in Canada. Hon. members in this House can call them by name. They are good citizens, and they believed they had the right to vote. That right of citizenship was never questioned by either side of politics. When this war broke out, they discovered that, although they had been voting for many years, they had never gone through the formality of becoming naturalized. Being loyal citizens, and to show that they were true to the Union Jack and the British Empire, they immediately took out their naturalization papers. But they have only been naturalized two or three years. And although they have been building up this country, paying taxes and raising their families although they are a credit to the country, by this Bill they find themselves disfranchised, and marked among their neighbours as men unworthy to be trusted with citizenship.

I want to know if that is going to have a good effect on the people by whom they are surrounded, or on the people in the countries from which we expect to get immigration in the future.

Now, as to conscientious objectors. It may be said, and it is said, that these men seldom vote anyway. That they do not care to take part in political strife, and that to deprive them of their franchise is not a very serious matter. For a man to refrain from exercising a right because he wishes to is one thing, but to be deprived of that right by statute is a very different thing; and the man, even although he has not voted, and his son who has voted, will resent for all time to come the interference of this Government which says to them that they are not entitled to exercise the franchise for the election of men to represent them in Parliament and to spend the public revenues to which they contribute. Taxation without representation is one of the things that was fought against at the time of the Family Compact. We had thought in this country that it had been driven from our shores for all time to come, and it has been the pride of the Canadian people that equal rights have been given to every man, no man being asked to pay taxes unless he is allowed a full voice in the expenditure of those taxes. Here are a class of men who contribute largely to the revenues of the country, a class of men who never harm anybody, friendly, peaceful—and they are to be told now: You cannot exercise your franchise, and your son cannot exercise his franchise, and in the years to come your son and his sons and daughters will be pointed out, will have the finger of scorn pointed at them throughout the Dominion of Canada as men who, in a crisis in this country, were deemed unworthy to be allowed to exercise the franchise if they had so desired. I say it is an unfair thing, it is a bad business; and although the Secretary of State said this afternoon that he believed the people of Canada would support the Government in this measure, I tell him I believe that he is all wrong, because what is deeply imbedded in the British heart is fair play to everybody and the maxim that everybody is innocent until proven guilty. But this Government undertakes to say that men who are as innocent —why, they did not even pretend to make a charge against them—are to be declared guilty without a charge made against them, guilty of a lack of intelligence and integrity such as to unfit them to exercise the franchise. The Von Hollweg of this Government will have to stand side by side with the man who said that a treaty is but a "scrap of paper." The Secretary of State this afternoon argued around that very carefully, as he is capable of doing. But the fact remains that, through the Department of the Secretary of State, certain guarantees have been given to men coming to this country, so long as they behave themselves, and one of those guarantees is that they can exercise all political rights. In dishonouring this guarantee, this Government has done just what the Prussian Government did in violating the treaty with Belgium.

Now I come to another class, the women who are enfranchised. The women who are enfranchised, the Secretary of State declares, would number about 500,000; and in palliation of the offence of depriving other citizens of their rights, he declared that the number disfranchised is so infinitesimally small as compared with those enfranchised, that it is not much of a crime after all. Sir, it is not by size or by numbers that the Act will be judged by the people of Canada; it is the principle behind the Act which will bring condemnation on this Government. If only a few were to be disfranchised, then the argument of the Secretary of State that it was necessary to do so for the safety of the State, has no foundation whatever. If the number is so infinitesimally small that it will make no difference in the election, then his argument must go by the board. But he believes, or I think he believes, that this number is so distributed among certain constituencies that it will have the desired effect politically, although in the aggregate the number is not very large. Now, as to the women who are enfranchised. I am fully in accord with enfranchising women who are closely related to the men who have gone to the front; but I am not in favour of disfranchising those who have no relatives to go to the front but who have done everything they could. The Secretary of State argued that it would be so difficult to get these other women on the list that you would have to make a distinction somewhere; some women you would not dare to put on the list—I have not heard any one say who they were as yet. But I do know that the poor washerwoman who is contributing her fifty cents a week to the Patriotic Fund and has no male relatives to go to the front, is doing all that in her lies for this country, and she should not be deprived of any privilege given to any other women in the Dominion of Canada. In this connection, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has stood on the platform with myself on many occasions on behalf of patriotic funds. He has said to the women and to the men: You who cannot go to the front and have no relatives to go to the front can do all that in you lies at home, and your duty will be as fully performed by doing those things as if you were a man and went to the front yourself. To that appeal, made eloquently, as only the Minister of Trade and Commerce can make an appeal, the women of Canada have nobly responded. Day after day, night after night, hour after hour, have they toiled—women in the Red Cross, the Daughters of the Empire, women of other associations, women not attached to any association, knitting by night, sewing by day, preparing comforts for the sons of others, for our sons who are at the front—and, forsooth, this Government says to the woman who is fortunate enough to be represented at the front: We are going to let you have the vote, but this other woman who has done her part nobly, as did the woman of old, she shall have no voice or lot in the government of this country. Thousands of women have contributed generously to the Red Cross Fund. Many of these women have not representatives at the front; they regret it just as much as any person else can; but they have taken up the burden of the work, they have performed it nobly and well—and this Government, forsooth, draws the line in front of them and says: You cannot have any voice in running the affairs of this country. I cannot understand the frame of mind that brings men to that conclusion. I have listened carefully to the excuses given for not placing these women on the voters' list—I have yet to find any reason given, they have been mere excuses—and I come back again to this point, that the women who have provided bandages for the boys at the front and have seen them soaked by party heelers as they went through; the women who provided comforts for the boys at the front, and have seen them diverted to other uses across the sea, are so down on this Government that the Government is afraid to trust them with the franchise.

Mr. BRADBURY: That is a dirty statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: I repeat that the bandages were soaked in party patronage and rake-off before they got to the soldiers. That has been proven, and I can give the House further evidence of it, if it is desired. The Secretary of State said he believed all these women who were given votes would vote for the Government. I tell him now that he will find himself mistaken in regard to that. The women of this country know something about the management of public affairs. They want honesty in administration, and if ever there was a time in the history of Canada when the women have taken a deep interest in our affairs, it has been during the past two or three years. They have given up their sons to this cause; if they have no sons to send, they have given up their energy, their effort, their work and their money to aid the Allies. They are watching the conduct of public affairs; and the Government will find when the election time comes that, although this Bill has been brought in for party purposes only, the effect expected to be gained will not be gained, but very much the reverse.

An hon. MEMBER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman may run into the Senate.

Mr. GRAHAM: I may say that I have not been trying to run into the Senate yet. I will run wherever there is a fight, because the Government never lets me run without a fight, whatever pledges they make beforehand.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I have had the honour of having the nomination in one riding for twenty-six years, and stayed there. I have never been run out.

Mr. GRAHAM: I had the honour of helping to lick the hon. gentleman once. I know that. I should like to direct my attention to the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). He has been asking the people to save, and they have been saving. The reward he gives to people for saving is that he becomes a party to a Bill to deprive them of their rights as citizens. Through the Food Controller, the Government has been asking the women of Canada to curtail expenditure. The encouragement to these people, in return for their economy, is that they shall not be allowed to vote unless they comply with certain conditions, which many of them cannot comply with. I want to know what effect that is going to have on the future enthusiasm of these women for war work. I said that this Bill, if it became law, would militate against the progress of the war, and I repeat that statement. The thousands of upright women, rich and poor, who have been labouring hourly, daily, weekly and yearly, in order that success might come to the Allies, find themselves now confronted with the rebuff, the rebuke, the stigma, by this Government, that though they have done all this they are not entitled to the franchise but must be classed with alien enemies and men who do not want to fight.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time is more than up.

Mr. GRAHAM: I seldom break the rules of the House, and I will not try to break the rule now. I will try and conclude in one word, although it may be a long one.

Mr. SPEAKER: Not very long.

Mr. GRAHAM: We ask immigrants to come to this country. On the success of immigration to Canada depends our ability to meet the financial stress that will come upon us, and this Government has done more by this Bill to cripple us financially than anything that has happened since this Parliament opened.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I am in favour of the Bill now before the House, for several reasons. First, I am in favour of it on its merits; and second, I am in favour of it because of the necessities of the war. We have had during this session three important war measures before the House. We have passed the conscription Bill, imposing military duties on all our men of a certain age, because of the necessities of the war. We tried to secure enough men by the voluntary system. We found it impossible to secure them, and, of necessity, we had to pass a conscription law. We owe it to the men who have gone to the front, to pass such a measure, and we also owe it to the men who have died at the front. The great historical precedent for our sending men to the front is that of the Greeks, when they fought for their liberty over 2,500 years ago. The people of Sparta sent 300 of their fighting men to Thermopylae, and every one of the 300, with only one exception, was buried on that field of honour, and, to their military glory, a stone was erected, and on that stone was the inscription: Go stranger, tell the Spartans that we lie here, having faithfully observed their commands. Instead of 300 men we have left 30,000 on the warfields of Europe; and we owe it to them to pass this law of compulsory military service. We passed it of necessity. Now, we are passing two other measures, a law to secure the votes of the soldiers, and providing how that vote is to be recorded, and now this law in regard to franchise. Both of these laws were rendered necessary because of the refusal of Parliament to ask for an extension of its life. I am in favour of the Bill now under discussion both because of the additions it makes to the voting population and also because of the restrictions it makes. As to the additions: For many years I have expressed the belief that women of this country should have the vote. The women of England have been given the franchise, or the proposal is coming up soon. It is more or less limited,—but they are giving them votes. The opportunity comes at a time of necessity to give the women votes, and we are giving them votes in two cases. We are giving votes to the women who are serving at the front, and we now propose to give votes to the women who are kith and kin to the men who are serving at the front. No mistake will be made to give the vote to a portion of the women of our country. Great problems will have to be solved in Canada, as a result of this war, and nobody will have a better right to be consulted, as to the settlement of those problems, than the women of this country. They are in every way fitted to exercise the franchise, but it will take some time to settle the question of how the rights of all are to be guarded, as pointed out by the Prime Minister. But the great fact is that we are enfranchising a lot of women of this country. The matter is urgent, and has to be put through in a short time. We may not include all the women, but once it is started as it has been started in England, limiting it to those of thirty years of age and imposing other conditions, it will make progress in future. The provinces of Canada have given women votes in a number of cases. The likelihood is that the United States will have a federal franchise applicable to women. They will soon have it in Great Britain, and we are starting it now. No mistake is being made in giving votes to women.

I am in sympathy with the disfranchising of quite a number of people in this country. There is a good deal to be argued for the side of the case presented by the hon. gentlemen who preceded me. But, although it is true that we ought to give votes to those who become citizens of Canada, there may be times when necessity compels us to revise our attitude on that question. The hon. gentleman refers to Bethmann-Hollweg and men of his school. I may point out that because of the intrigues of these men, because of the necessity of our acting in self-defence, because of the exigencies of the occasion, we have to limit this franchise as we propose to limit it

The national security, particularly when it is in jeopardy, is a matter of supreme importance. The necessities of the occasion count for more than even the pledges we may have given in regard to political rights; as a war measure we may have to restrict rights that may have been conceded. Many people in this country, Liberals and Conservatives—I speak from no partisan point of view—see the real national necessity of limiting the votes of these persons of alien enemy birth who have already got their citizenship. No great injustice will be done to them. Even though there may be an injustice, having regard to the knowledge we have of German and Austrian intrigues, I do not think that a great error will have been committed. I believe that the American republic, before their people come to vote, will insist upon some kind of federal law defining what shall constitute citizenship in the United States and stating to whom the vote shall be allowed. The Americans are having a great experience just now. They have not told us yet what revelations have been made to the President and his Cabinet at Washington concerning the ramifications of German intrigues. We are getting a taste of it now in the revelations that have been made in Great Britain. That being the case, the national safety demands that the franchise of these people shall be limited. Australia has taken action in this respect, not because of any hostility to the people who came there and helped them to settle the country, but for a national reason; for the safety and welfare of the Commonwealth. They are not denounced for doing that; neither should we be denounced for taking this action in a case of supreme importance.

I have pointed out that we have been compelled to take this step as a war measure and because the Opposition saw fit to oppose the extension of the life of this Parliament. We had to pass the measure of conscription, having regard to our national needs; but the passing of two other measures, the one for giving the soldiers opportunity to vote and the other the provision for the regulation, extension and limitation of the franchise, would not have been necessary had an extension of the life of Parliament been made. Moreover, we would not have needed these two measures if Parliament had had what it ought to have—the right to regulate the length of its own life. I believe that Australia has that power; but we have not. One of the questions to be settled in this Parliament in the future will be the right of the Canadian Parliament to regulate the length of a parliament. You cannot settle in a short time this question of citizenship; the question of to what extent a man shall be given the right to vote, the question of what limitation shall be attached to the franchise, having regard to the effect upon it of the operation of naturalization laws. Because necessity compels us to extend the franchise in some directions and to limit it in others, it does not follow that we are doing any injustice to a large number of the citizens of the country, but it does follow that we are doing something for the security of the nation and for the protection of the liberties of the people. You cannot take chances on a supreme issue of this kind; you must do what you think is right. This measure is a war measure; it is for war-election purposes. The Bill is justified, to my mind, and I think it certainly will be supported by the people whom I represent. I have no fear of the addition of a large number of women to the voting strength of this country. They will discharge their duty from the highest ground of patriotism and from no partisan point of view. I am willing to leave the matter to them.

You talk about national unity in this country, and the necessity for it. How is national unity to be expected? National unity will be attained only if we observe some of the things that we have neglected hitherto. One of the first things necessary for the creation of national unity is a federal franchise. Sir John A. Macdonald was the first man who laid that principle down in Parliament. I often heard him speak on that point; from the first time I heard him I have believed in the principle, and I have asserted it in this House. I am rather an old member now; I was in the House at the time we abandoned federal franchise and substituted the provincial franchise therefor. I never agreed with that course, and I do not agree with it yet; I believe in a federal franchise. Moreover, as I have said, I am confident that the American people will be compelled to adopt a federal franchise. Another thing that you must have in order to effect national unity—the Americans are coming to it—is federal enforcement of federal law. We run too much in this country in the direction of provincialism; we have to acquire more and more the nature of nationals.

We have to believe in the federal enforcement of federal laws. We have to become accustomed to look to the federal power for the defence of national and public rights. We are now going through that experience. We are finding out that, in acting on the old lines that we followed for fifty years we were not acting quite in the right direction. We are retracing our steps and coming back to the views held by the old leader of the national policy in the old days. He believed also in a national franchise, and we are coming back to his view; and we shall make no mistake if we have a national franchise. We shall make no mistake if we enfranchise the women. We shall make no mistake if we declare that under the necessities that this war has imposed on us, we are going to revise and rewrite the law in regard to naturalisation. We have been too free in regard to our naturalisation law, and it must be rewritten. If there is anything that the war is teaching us to-day, it is this, that there must be a limitation in regard to naturalisation because of our experience of German and of Austrian ideas of integrity in connection with this war. We would have had no necessity for these two Acts at this session, if we had taken measures to extend the life of Parliament probably until the war was over. But, that not having been done, the duty is imposed upon this Parliament to take steps upon the first opportunity to give this Parliament a power that the Australian Parliament has, and a power that we are fully competent to exercise, the power to settle in our own House how long Parliament ought to continue. We should not be cribbed, cabined and confined in that respect. We are a nation, and we are to-day that portion of the North American continent that is leading this continent in the defence of the great public rights that began to be recognized at the establishment of the commonwealth in England and that have come down through all these years. While for a time we may be charged with interfering with citizenship or with breaking a pledge, I do not think we are quite breaking a pledge. As a friend pointed out to me this afternoon, often when a man in this country is summoned to sit on the jury, a case will come up for trial in which a friend of his happens to be the person to be tried. In such a case the court very properly says to that citizen: You must not try this case because you are an interested party. In this case we are saying to certain people of alien birth: Inasmuch as you are closely related to the man who is being tried here—and the Kaiser and all his works are to-day on trial because of his assaults on liberty—you must stand aside on this trial. We do not deprive that man of his rights, but we say: On this occasion it is not fitting that you should be a juryman or a judge, and the citizen is the juryman or the judge to whom we are appealing in the coming election. While there may be some ground for the argument that has been made that we are limiting the rights of people whom we have invited to this country, still if we are doing that, we are not doing it because we want to deny them their rights, so much as because we are determined to save the nation in this hour of its extreme peril. The women of this country are with us in this respect. Whether they will vote for us I cannot say, but I do say we are making no mistake in recognizing the principle of "Votes for Women." We are in this country recognizing the principle of public ownership, and now we are recognizing the right of the women of this country to vote. The women, certainly the women of my own province, will not resent the fact that the measure has not been made a broad one at the beginning. As was pointed out this afternoon, it will take time to settle the extent of the women's vote, and we shall have to very carefully revise the laws of naturalisation. This measure, to my mind, is both a progressive one and one of necessity, and that being the case, I intend to vote for it and to justify my vote whenever I am called on to do so outside of this House. I believe the majority of the people of this country are in favour of this law, not from any partisan point of view, but because of its fairness and because the necessities of the war compel us to enact it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) has promised us that if he is ever called upon, outside of this House, to justify the vote he proposes giving on this measure he will be able and prepared to do so. Certainly he did not this evening give any reasons in justification of his vote. Therefore, probably the first opportunity he will have of making that justification will be outside of this Parliament. The substantial utterance he made this evening in support of this Bill was that national interests were in jeopardy unless this measure was enacted. It would have better become that hon. gentleman had he attempted to give to this House his reasons for believing that national interests were in jeopardy. If national interests are in jeopardy, then probably this measure is justifiable, but when an hon. gentleman states that the justification of this measure is that national interests are in jeopardy, it is his duty to give to the House at least a few reasons as to why he believes that to be the case. He gives, as a reason in justification of his vote in favour of this measure, the fact that the life of Parliament was not extended. We very nearly had an election in the fall of 1914, and my hon. friend was then in favour of an election. In that event, there was not and there could not have been a Franchise Act of this character. I remember reading the Sunday edition of a paper published by my hon. friend in the city of Toronto in the spring of 1915 to the effect that in a few days Parliament would be dissolved and there would be an election.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If there had been an election, it would not have done any harm.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In that event there would have been no opportunity to enact a measure of this kind. Therefore, in the two principal points my hon. friend attempted to make this evening in support of this measure, namely, that the national interests were in danger and that the Government was refused an extension of Parliament, he has signally failed in making good his statements. The Bill before the House proposes to disfranchise arbitrarily a portion of the people of this country. It proposes to enfranchise another section of our population who are defined in the Bill and who are principally relatives of those who have enlisted for service overseas. I have no difficulty in reaching a conclusion as to what should be my duty in the premises. This legislation is objectionable in principle, and I deny that there is anything in the world to justify its introduction or its enactment. Public sentiment in this country is not behind this legislation. There is practically no sentiment in favour of it to-day, and there will be less as time proceeds. I have reference to disfranchising clauses.

I submit that reason and justice clearly point out the duty of members of Parliament in connection with this Bill. A proper regard for the future of this country and for our good name among the nations and peoples of the world compel one to oppose the measure. It is not founded upon any principle of a substantial character, and I repeat what others have said, that it violates without cause an implied compact made between the State and a number of our citizens. It does violence to principles and traditions long established and long cherished in all British countries. I believe it will be regarded as an act of injustice to-day, and that it will leave a legacy of distrust to a great number of people who will come into Canada in future years, which distrust will not easily be extinguished. Further, I believe it will perpetuate in the after-war politics of this country political incidents which should be forgotten. In our western country you will find one particular party, during political campaigns, appealing to the alien-born population for support upon the ground that another party during this war disfranchised aliens, and at the same time the other political party will be engaged in denying that allegation, which will be merely an encouragement to false testimony. Or if not doing that, they will be giving other reasons, and the result will be that many war incidents will be perpetuated. I believe, it is much better that they should end with the ending of the war. I maintain that history will adjudge the act contemplated by this Bill as a blot upon our national career. And, unfortunately, it comes at a time when we are writing glorious and imperishable pages of our history, which will be the future epics of this young nation. We have solicited to our shores the citizens whom we now attempt to deprive of one of the rights of citizenship. In their native countries before their departure, we have heralded the glories of our institutions. These immigrants have come here, and no one to-day is called upon to defend them against any acts of sedition or treason or infidelity to their vows of citizenship. In this Western hemisphere, some day when the war is over, we will need more European settlers, as our economic future and salvation depends upon that. Many of the class whom we are now disfranchising by this Bill will be coming to this country, not directly from Europe, but from the United States, and I doubt if we shall not welcome them. Now I ask you, Sir, will this proposed Act fortify their faith in our political institutions? Is it worth while? Will it protect anything that is in danger to-day? What did my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) mean when he said that national interests were in jeopardy?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If Germany succeeds where would our country be?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did he say what he meant, or did he mean what he said? We have heard members of the Government give reasons in support of this legislation, and we have had an opportunity of reading the Bill, and I say that in this Bill the Government do not mean what they say, or they do not say what they mean. It reminds me of the collision between two cross-eyed waiters in the dining room, which caused a downfall in china. One of the waiters said to the other, "Why don't you look where you're going," and the other replied, "Why don't you go where you're looking." If the Government meant to make this a war franchise based upon war services, they should have said so in the Bill, and if they meant something else they should admit that they did not say what they meant.

9 p.m.

The Solicitor General denied most violently this afternoon that there was any violation of an implied contract between the State and the citizen in disfranchising the citizen, and he referred to the fact that in the province of Manitoba Chinamen, though naturalized as British subjects, have never been given the franchise. I apprehend a distinction between that case and the one under discussion. In the one case the State has seen fit to withhold the franchise from a certain class of people but in the other case the State has seen fit to give the franchise. It is now proposed to take away the franchise from these people without showing cause. If the franchise is to be taken away from them, I say let cause be shown, and if it is impressive, if it is substantial, just and right, then we upon this side of the House will acknowledge it.

To a large extent, this is a practical question. Let us see how many people it will affect. Will it affect such a large number of people that in the national interests their names should be removed from the franchise roll? If but a small number of the people will be affected, is it good business on the part of this country to enact it? If national interests are not involved and are not in jeopardy, by continuing the franchise to our alien-born, is this legislation really worth while? In that respect, therefore, this is a practical question. Now, how many foreign-born people are there in this country who will be affected by this measure? Some hon. gentlemen have already given the figures. I wish to repeat some of them, and I think it important that we should keep this in mind. In considering this Bill the people of Canada will naturally inquire, in the first instance, how many people of the enemy class there are in this country, and secondly, what is their record as citizens during the war. In many of the provinces there is practically no German or Austrian population. The foreign-born population of Nova Scotia is about four per cent, and New Brunswick three per cent. Of the population of Prince Edward Island 99.4 is Canadian-born. The German and Austrian population of the province of Quebec is almost negligible. In the province of Ontario there is a large German population, the descendants, in the main, of settlers who came from Pennsylvania over one hundred years ago. In 1911, there were in the province of Ontario 7,871 German males over twenty-one years of age born in Europe, of whom 5,143 were naturalized. There were 10,420 Austro-Hungarians of twenty-one years of age, of whom 1,049 were naturalized. In other words, the number in the province of Ontario is almost negligible, and that may be said of the province of British Columbia as well. It is in the three prairie provinces that we find the vast majority of alien enemy population. According to the figures given to the House on Saturday evening last by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), there have come into the prairie provinces since 1900, 157,000 of the class we propose to disfranchise and he estimated that there would be about 30,000 of that class entitled to the franchise to-day. I think his estimate was about correct. According to the census, of 1911 there were in the prairie provinces 21,145 German males over 21 years of age, of whom 12,007 were naturalized. In the same provinces there were 57,750 Austro-Hungarians, of whom 23,846 were naturalized. This shows that in 1911 there were about 35,000 naturalized persons of the alien enemy class over 21 years of age in these provinces. There may have been additions since then, but on the other hand there would be subtractions to take into consideration. Therefore, I consider the estimate given by the hon. member for Saskatoon to be substantially correct.

Mr. BRADBURY: It is double now.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I doubt very much if it is double now, because the number naturalized since 1911 has been very small indeed. True, there would be a certain number, but I deny the right of my hon. friend to say they have doubled.

Mr. BRADBURY: I am speaking from knowledge of my own county, and I say they have doubled.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Canada is a little larger than the county represented by my hon. friend. In 1911 there were 12,007 German males over 21 years of age naturalized in Canada. I doubt if the number has grown very much since. There would not be more than 5,000 or 6,000 Germans who would be voters in the western provinces, and I doubt if there would be as many as that. If that is correct, is it worth while violating so substantial a principle for the purpose of disfranchising that small number of electors, unless better cause can be shown for such an act. It must be remembered, also, that more than one-quarter of the German population in the Canadian Northwest came from the United States, a substantial number of whom were born in that country, and possibly their disfranchisement might be the cause of some international dispute, not of a serious nature, I grant you. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is this legislation worth while, for the sake of disfranchising such a few Germans, who may possibly be very good citizens, and a great number of whom may be quite sympathetic towards the cause of the Allied powers? The Germans in this country are different from the Germans in the British Isles, whom the Solicitor General says the British authorities deemed it not expedient to call upon for military service. Most of the Germans in this country came from the United States. The fact that they are settled upon the land and choose to come into this country to engage in an occupation of that character at once marks them as a type of people different from those who went from Germany to secure occupations in Great Britain. It is well known that the racial affinities of much of the Austrian population, which is the larger portion of the alien enemy population, are with the Russian people, and they are not known to be very sympathetic towards the Austrian Empire. If our political institutions were endangered by permitting these people to exercise the franchise, if these people of alien enemy origin were known to be hostile to Canada, to the British Empire and to the cause for which we now fight, if they showed acts of hostility in that direction; and if they were there in substantial numbers and so distributed that they could affect the result of an election in a number of constituencies, there might be something to be said in support of disfranchising them. It is not, however, necessary to defend them upon this score, because we have the favourable word of the Solicitor General upon this point. In introducing the Bill the other day, he said:

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

> I am quite free to admit that taken all in all those who come from alien enemy countries have, in the main, during the progress of the war, conducted themselves satisfactorily within lines of obedience to the laws of Canada.

And I thought he was rather apologetic in introducing the Bill. He did not unequivocally affirm his conviction as to the fairness of the Bill. He expressed himself in this way:

> It does not seem unreasonable that they should not exercise, during the war, that control of our destinies which is vested in the franchise.

Those were not strong words; they did not indicate a strong and intense conviction in the merits of the Bill. He simply thought it was not unreasonable. I am told my time is up, and unfortunately I must come to a stop before covering the ground I expected to cover. I hope, however, at another stage of this Bill to have an opportunity of concluding my remarks.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): As I do not expect to be in the House when the vote is taken on this question, I would like to state my views in regard to the Bill now before the House. I voted for closure in regard to this measure, and on three or four occasions on Saturday night I voted against motions which I viewed as dilatory motions, only intended to retard the progress of the Bill, having regard to the fact that we are coming towards the close of the session. I am a supporter of the principle of the Bill, and, if I stand alone on this side of the House, I shall so vote if I am here when the vote is taken upon the second reading. In my judgment, the matter practically comes down to three questions. First, is the proposal to give the next of kin of soldiers serving overseas, or who have served overseas, a correct one? After listening to a good many speeches here to-day, I have come to the conclusion that there is no very great difference of opinion on either side of the House upon this question.

Mr. MURPHY: There is a lot of difference.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If there is a lot, I have not heard it voiced during the course of this debate. I rather concluded from what I heard that there was almost a consensus of opinion in regard to allowing the female next of kin of the soldiers abroad to vote at the coming election. I do not believe that it will be possible to poll anything like the full soldiers' vote. I do not believe that you can poll the votes of men actively engaged upon the firing line, or the votes of men who are prisoners of Germany, or the votes of hundreds of men who are suffering pain and torment as the result of recently inflicted wounds—certainly you will not poll the votes of the thirty odd thousand men who have given their lives in this cause. For that reason, I am convinced that the proposal in this Bill to allow these men to be represented at the ensuing election is a proper one, and if it does not receive the support of both sides of the House, in my humble opinion it should receive it.

The next question raised by the Bill is that of disqualification. Upon this there seems to be rather a decided cleavage, those on your left taking the ground that it would be wrong, even as a war-time measure, to disfranchise men who have been granted the rights of citizenship in this country. And I agree that under ordinary conditions it would be nothing short of an outrage so to deprive them. But we must realise that we are not living under ordinary conditions, and extraordinary conditions require extraordinary measures. I have not had experience with what has been termed in this debate the alien vote which is resident in the North-west. By that I mean that class of people who have within the last fifteen years come to Canada from enemy countries and who have become naturalized citizens of Canada. I do not know them nor do they know me. But I am going to talk perhaps a little more candidly about some former residents of Germany whom I do know; and I do not know that there is any necessity to mince words on an occasion of this kind. I live in a county next to the county of Waterloo, and I believe from what I know and from what I have heard, and from what people in my county know, that the foreign-born German population of the county of Waterloo are not in sympathy with the objects of the Allies in the present war. I do not believe that in my county there are more than fifteen or twenty men who will be affected by the disfranchisement clause of this Bill; but I believe there are a large number in the adjoining county of Waterloo who will be disfranchised. I will give an instance. I have held meetings in Waterloo during the course of the present war, several of them patriotic meetings, Red Cross meetings, enlistment meetings. One I have clearly in my mind. It was held in the riding of North Waterloo, at Elmira. There was an audience of about 300 people in the small hall, almost all German either by birth or descent, the majority no doubt Canadian-born. I made my plea on behalf of the Patriotic Fund. My reception was rather frigid, but perhaps I did not put the case as well as I might have put it. However, at the conclusion of the meeting, a gentleman on the platform came to me and said: You must excuse us Mr. Guthrie, but take for instance myself; we are six brothers in my family, and five of us are in the Kaiser's army, and, he said, where should my sympathies be? Well, it was a very pertinent question. I could tell from the man's manner where his sympathies were, and it was only human nature when you come down to the last analysis. I put the case to myself—a Scotch-Canadian, suppose I were living in Germany to-day, unmolested by any law in Germany, where would my sympathies be? Entirely with the Allies. I believe that the highest responsibility cast on any citizen of this or any country is the duty of defending his country, and the highest privilege which the citizen can enjoy is the privilege of casting his franchise. On the one hand, you have the responsibility. But the aliens or the naturalized aliens in this country whom this Bill seeks to disfranchise are not permitted to defend this country, even if they so desired. Whether it is a military regulation of the British Government I do not know, but I have been informed that men of enemy birth are not permitted to serve in the ranks of the allied armies.

An hon. MEMBER: Fifty have gone from Ottawa.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I believe some have gone from Ottawa and some from my county, but I can tell you of some who went from Ottawa and my county, and that was the German reservists. My hon. friend says "not here." I have an instance, and I know it is correct, because a brother of mine has been chaplain in an Ottawa regiment. A German prisoner brought in seriously wounded, when my brother was called to him, turned to my brother and said: "Hello, Dr. Guthrie; I used to go to your church in Ottawa." And that man told my brother when he left Ottawa for the front. I believe there were a number of German reservists in Canada, and I believe that in many cases these were men who had taken the oath of allegiance to this country. We have had no serious outbreak in Canada—thank God for it—and I hope we may not; but if one reads the United States papers day by day he will see that the German people in that country have been carrying out a most ingenious propaganda against the United States and in favour of Germany ever since the United States entered into the war. If that is so there, is it not likely to be so here? If the sympathy of the German residents of the United States is with the Central Powers, will the sympathy of the German people in this country not also be with the Central Powers? It is only human nature, and on that basis you have to deal with it. I do not believe that the men whom this Bill seeks to disfranchise will take serious offence in regard to it. I believe they will welcome it; I do not believe they want to be put in the delicate position of having to vote under the circumstances which affect them at the present time in Canada. No one believes this to be a permanent arrangement; this is purely and simply a war arrangement to avoid any difficulties which might arise, and for that reason I think it is proper that that portion of the Act should pass.

The only other point I see in the Bill is in regard to the women who are not enfranchised by this measure, certainly a very large number. I am a supporter of woman franchise for the whole of the Dominion of Canada, and I have not a doubt that, had there been time, that proposal might have been included in a Bill for the coming general election. But time has been otherwise occupied. We have been here month after month, and perhaps not a great deal has been accomplished; but certain it is that the House has been kept busy, aye very busy, early and late; and there has not been proper time to introduce general enfranchisement for the women of Canada. Five provinces, so far as their provincial affairs go, have placed Acts on their statute books to give women votes in provincial elections. Four provinces have not done so. Whether in these four provinces the great preponderance of opinion is against extending the franchise to women, I do not know. Certain it is that the country is about divided, half and half, in regard to women's votes. I think that this question of the enfranchisement of the women of the whole of Canada may well wait a year or two until matters of stern necessity with which we have now to deal have been successfully settled. I see no hardship in the Bill, no wrongful discrimination, and I have made up my mind to support it.

Mr. BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St-Lawrence): It is not my intention to deal with the Bill generally. I wish to confine myself principally to the clause by which we disfranchise some half a million of the very best women in Canada. I would not ask that any one opposed to the Allies, such as Germans, Austrians or Bulgarians should have the right to vote in this country, but I claim that every honest, loyal citizen in Canada should have the right to vote. Why should we discriminate to that extent? I think it would be well to state to the House what the law of New Zealand is. The section reads:

> Every adult person who has resided for one year in New Zealand and who has resided in the electoral district for which he claims to vote during the three months immediately preceding his resignation on the roll of the district, and who is a British subject either by birth or naturalization, or a half-caste, is entitled (subject to the provisions of this Act) to be registered as an elector and to vote at the election of members of Parliament for that district.

Every man and woman in New Zealand 21 years of age, who is a loyal British subject, has the right to vote. In the small country of Finland there is only one Chamber consisting of 200 members. The system of voting is known as direct and proportional. The Finns have equal suffrage, and some 18 or 20 women are members of the House. I certainly welcome this Bill, in as far as it permits a large number of women to vote at the next general election, but it does not go far enough. It is narrow, it is drastic, and savours largely of kaiserism. I must take exception to the clause restricting and limiting the votes of women in Canada, and insist on that clause being amended, so as to give to all women who are truly loyal British subjects, if they choose, the right of voting. I say that a serious injustice will be perpetrated if the Bill becomes law as it stands. Why should there be any discrimination against one form of national service and other forms of service equally honourable, equally indispensible to the prosecution of the war? For the first time in this country, a Bill has been introduced which ignores workers for the Red Cross, and the win-the-war nurses, the different patriotic fund workers, Belgian relief workers, and tens of thousands of women engaged in the munition factories who will, under this measure be denied the right to vote. This Bill should be amended so as to confer equal political rights on women. We should give the loyal women of Canada the same political rights and privileges as are enjoyed by the men, with power to fill any office at the constitutional disposal of the Crown; and furthermore, to become candidates, and if elected to take their seats in this House of Commons. Then, and only then, will the reforms so long advocated in this House by a number of the members become law. Penitenitary and prison reforms ably advocated by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). reform in the liquor traffic by our good friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), and last, but not least, abolishing of the death penalty in Canada. You are depriving of the vote by this Bill five hundred thousand truly loyal Canadian women, who have been doing all this good work ever since the war commenced. It is, to say the least of it, an autocratic, undignified measure and unworthy of any government of this great Dominion. I cannot understand how any government resort to such a subterfuge under the guise of a war-time election Act, and I hope that the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) will accept my suggestion, and amend this clause. If he does not do so, I am sure he will regret it for years to come; and on the other hand, if he accepts my suggestion he will be able to look back upon this measure with pride, pleasure and satisfaction.

I must quote what President Wilson has just said in a message to the people of the state of Maine. It is an evidence that all over the civilized world women are going to get the vote, and get it soon. He said:

> May I not express through you my very great interest in the equal suffrage campaign in Maine? The pledges of my party are very distinct in favour of granting the suffrage to women by state action, and I would like to have the privilege of urging all Democrats to support a cause in which we all believe.

We are going very far away in this Bill from our democratic principle. I remember, in my young days, we used to say we were democratic—yes, "democrats to the hilt"—but there is nothing of a democratic nature in this Bill. The opinion of the people of Vancouver on this feature of the Bill is indicated by the following newspaper despatch:

> Vancouver, September 7.—The Vancouver Trades and Labour Council last evening passed a motion protesting against the manner in which the Dominion Government intends to extend a part franchise to women, and calling upon Premier Borden to give all women of the Dominion full privileges at the polls with men.

We have the following communication from Winnipeg:

> Winnipeg, September 8.—"I am absolutely opposed to it," declared R. A. Rigg, secretary of the Trades and Labour Council, in referring to the new franchise legislation. "The country is falling into the grip of autocratic rule. The last semblance of democracy is vanishing. If they continue along the lines they are now following, autocracy will undoubtedly be firmly established in this country."

In Montreal several associations have had meetings, and resolved on sending petitions to the Government and have passed resolutions opposing the Bill as it stands to-day. I will refer to one case. The People's Power League and Equal Suffrage League met last Thursday night, and the following is a report of the proceedings:

> The resolution submitted by the Equal Suffrage League deprecated the idea of differentiating between one form of national service and other forms of service equally honourable and equally indispensable to a successful prosecution of the war, and that for the first time in this country a Bill has been introduced which ignores workers for the Red Cross, Red Cross Nurses, Patriotic Fund Committees, Belgian and similar relief funds, also the tens of thousands of women engaged in munition factories, etc., who are denied the vote. It was also pointed out that many undesirable analogies will develop, and that it does not take advantage of the present psychological moment to confer upon women equal political rights with men, and that the British House of Commons and the United States have made no such distinctions in their recent franchise legislation.
> It was, therefore, resolved, "That this meeting implores the advisers of the Crown to withdraw their Franchise Bill and draft immediately a measure that will invest women with the same political rights and privileges as are shared by men, with power to fill any office at the constitutional disposal of the Crown."

Here is one of the statements made at that meeting:

> As regards the votes given to all female relatives of soldiers, nobody would grumble with that if adult suffrage for all women were established. But a slur is cast on every woman who may be without soldier relatives, and she is declared unfit to exercise the franchise! Why? What is the special reason for singling out a special class of women voters? It is not any frank recognition of woman suffrage, but as Mr. Meighen says, "to give added strength to the vote of the soldiers of Canada." Thus to 400,000 soldier votes will be added from half a million to a million soldiers' relatives' votes —a special class that no doubt the Conservative Government feel can be specially appealed to by being told the ridiculous rubbish that the soldiers at the front will be deserted if they do not all vote Conservative.

I appeal to the Government on behalf of these women who are doing so much good work. I will cite two concrete cases with a view to touching the heart of the Secretary of State, if I can.

An hon. MEMBER: It cannot be done.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I know a woman in Montreal with whom the Solicitor General also is very well acquainted. I have personal knowledge of the facts in this matter, because I have a son who is a major in the 87th Grenadier Guards, a regiment which was raised by my hon. friend's cousin, General Meighen. The lady to whom I refer, who has no sons, gathered around her a number of workers in Montreal, and they sent 6,000 pairs of socks, all knitted by these loving hands, to that regiment. Is it fair to deny the vote to these women, who have been doing real service for the boys at the front, the sons of other mothers? I say that it is unjust, unreasonable, unpatriotic. In addition to the 6,000 pairs of socks, they sent over one hundred thousand soldiers' comforts of one kind or another. The Government did not pay for these; the ladies collected the money and sent the articles to the front. I submit that such women are entitled to the vote. Another woman had three daughters, and when the war broke out the very first thing she did was to say to them: come with me. Thereupon she and her daughters started working night and day collecting money for the Red Cross and Patriotic Funds. Has that woman not a right to vote? I do hope that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State will reconsider the drastic measure that they have submitted to the House, and will decide to treat all the loyal, earnest and patriotic women of Canada as they should be treated.

Mr. FRANK GLASS (East Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, we scarcely expected that this Bill would meet with the unanimous consent of members of the House. I have almost come to the conclusion that it is practically impossible for the Government to introduce any measure or to suggest any legislation that would be entirely satisfactory to the members of the Opposition. It has been said that "only the dead are satisfied; they would not be if they were conscious of their dissatisfaction."

The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Bickerdike), with other members of the Opposition, has paid great attention to the word "democracy," and has endeavoured to show by various means how in this measure democracy is being assailed. The very foundation of democracy requires that equal rights demand equal service. If we are seeking an exemplification of equal service as we should have it we shall not find it in the attitude of the Opposition during the whole course of this session; indeed, during the whole course of the war. The late Elbert Hubbard at one time defined democracy as follows:

1. A form of government by popular ignorance.

[Mr. Bickerdike.]

2. The fool's paradise.

3. Any political system where male votes are a substitute for brains.

He had this further to say about the word democracy:

The word is from the word abracadabra; demo, lungs, and crazy; hence, to rule by caloric.

Democracy is defined in the Standard dictionary as follows:

The political system in which government is directly controlled by the people collectively through elected representatives.

Nicholas Murray Butler, in his work "True and False Democracy," defines both. He says:

Jealousy of power honestly gained and justly exercised, envy of attainment or possession are characteristic of the mob, not of the people; of a democracy which is false, not of a democracy which is true. False democracy shouts every man down to the level of the average. True democracy cries all men up to the heights of their fullest capacity for service and achievement. The two sides are everlastingly at war. The future of this nation as the future of the world is bound up with the hope of a true democracy that builds itself on liberty.

My hon. friend has shown a very keen interest in the unfortunate position of the women of our country, who, he says, as a result of this Bill, will be deprived of the franchise. It was clearly shown this afternoon that what woman has never had she cannot lose. She has not had the franchise in this country so far—but I re-echo the sentiments that various hon. gentlemen have expressed: the franchise should be extended to women throughout the whole Dominion. The time will come when this privilege will be extended to all our women. How does woman view this measure? I have before me a copy of the London Free Press in which are given interviews with several women. Amongst others, there is an interview with Mrs. Gordon Wright, a prominent leader in all social work, who is practically known internationally, and who has devoted a great deal of her time and energies to women's work throughout the country. Mrs. Gordon Wright is the sister of Hon. Newton Wesley Rowell, leader of the Opposition in the provincial legislature. She was interviewed in reference to this measure, and this is her reply:

Mrs. Gordon Wright, sister of Mr. N. W. Rowell, leader of the Provincial Opposition, holds the strongest views on the subject, and considers that the proposals of Premier Borden are only just and reflect the greatest credit on the party.

"I think that it is perfectly right that only these women who have endured the anxiety of having soldier relatives at the front should vote," she said, in reply to a question as to whether or not she considered that the Bill should be extended to all women, particularly such women as have no male relatives eligible for soldiers.

"I think that the Bill ought to go further and disfranchise all the men who ought to be at the front but who are not there. No slackers should be allowed to vote," she concluded.

Other women in the city were interviewed, and some of them expressed similar sentiments. Hon. gentlemen have said there is an object in this enfranchisement of women. Of course there is an object. That object is to do justice to the large vote of those soldiers who are at the front, and who will never have an opportunity of exercising the franchise; and, as has been stated to-day, to do justice to the memory of those 30,000 soldiers who have made the last sacrifice, who are silent, who cannot express their views at this time, to the thousands of those unfortunate prisoners at present in Germany enduring hardships and trials, to the wounded, sick and suffering in the hospitals, not only in France and Great Britain but even in our own country, and to those who, by reason of the horrors of this war and the consequent strain on their nerves, have become insane, and who are now confined in hospitals for the insane in this country as well as in the Old Land. Do we not owe a tribute to the memory of those? Do we not owe a duty to those who are still enduring hardships, who will not be able in this election to exercise their personal influence? Should we not, therefore, endeavour to carry out the aims and objects for which they are fighting? Hon. gentlemen opposite do not offer any serious objection to the granting of the franchise to the female relatives of the soldiers, but they say: There is a purpose in not extending that franchise to the rest of the women. Certainly there is a purpose. It would be eminently unjust to those who have lent their sons to fight in defence of their country, to those who have male relatives at the front, if the benefit of the votes of the female relatives of soldiers should be neutralized by the extension of the franchise to those women whose sympathies are not along the same lines. It is for this reason I can see a certain advantage in restricting the franchise at the present time to those women who have relatives serving at the front. The Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen), in introducing this Bill, pointed out those who would be deprived of the exercise of the franchise in this election. He said:

There are as well many thousands who are enlisted overseas, not in the Canadian overseas forces, but in the British forces. These men, though under the Military Voters' Act, they have, I understand, been given the right to vote, will inevitably in the main find it impossible to exercise that right. There are, besides, many thousands more who before the war were reservists in Canada—and some who were not reservists—who are to-day fighting in Europe or other continents the same battle in which we are engaged, but who are doing so as members of the Allied armies. They have not the legal right to vote; if they had it, they could not possibly exercise the franchise. An election is to be held at a time when the most deserving, the bone, sinew and virility of our country, are only partially at least enabled to take part in the contest by way of voting. There are also thousands who have fallen in battle, whose voices are stilled. There are, besides these, some thousands who are prisoners of war. Their voices also are silent; under no imaginable circumstances could they take advantage of the Military Voters' Act.

Further on he pointed out—and this was referred to by the Prime Minister this afternoon:

Nor can we forget what is a more potent fact still; that each and all of the men overseas are stripped of the influence which under normal circumstances they could exert among their fellows in an election contest.

It has been pointed out that, in so far as the alien vote is concerned, it affects more particularly those portions of Canada that we know as the western provinces. As has been shown, there are some 12,007 German voters out of a total male population of 21,145 naturalised Germans, and that there are 23,846 Austro-Hungarian voters out of a total male population of 57,750, or a total of 35,853 voters. If we had adopted the principle adopted by one of the western provinces, of classifying these men together and giving them three representatives, the same as they did with the soldiers, they would not be a great factor or influence in the politics of this country or in this House. This Government is pursuing a wiser course, as I am more thoroughly convinced after hearing the remarks of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who speaks from his knowledge and experience of the fact that alien enemy reservists, who had taken the oath of naturalization of this country, had responded to the call of their mother country and had returned in order to fight against our soldiers in the trenches. We have read the record in the press of a German who was taken prisoner, who was a Canadian citizen from one of the cities of Saskatchewan. He was a naturalized British subject, a German who had taken the oath of allegiance and who, to all intents and purposes, had accepted the conditions of nationality in this country. Yet he was taken prisoner from the German army at the front. We cannot get away from these facts which are presented to us. If there be one, if there be two, if there be a dozen, there is no reason why there may not be thousands of such men, and there is every reason to presume that those people of the same nationality, who were reservists and whose sympathies are naturally on the side of the country of their birth, would find that their affection for their native land was stronger than their affection for their adopted country. Because we believe that, these men are not to be allowed to be conscripted into our army. Then upon what ground can these men who can give no service to the State in an emergency of this kind claim the right to vote under the extraordinary conditions which we have to face at the present time? My hon. friend has said that this is not a win-the-war, but a win-the-election Bill. Personally, I do not see any great distinction, because winning the war, so far as Canada is concerned, means putting forth our maximum effort in order to bring the war to a successful conclusion, and I conceive that a government under the leadership of my right hon. friend who is now leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) would adopt a policy calculated to bring about results the very reverse of that.

I just wish to quote from the report of a meeting which was held in Calgary on May 17 last, at which Premier Sifton was one of the principal speakers:

> Premier Sifton declared at the opening meeting of the provincial election here last night that all subjects of alien birth who were naturalized before August 4, 1914, and who had in no way committed any offence against the laws of Canada since, would have the right to vote in the Alberta election.
>
> There was a meeting of five or six thousand electors, many of them being soldiers who had returned from the front. Sergt.-Major Guillfoyle, one of the returned soldiers, was given ten minutes to address the meeting, and he at once asked the Premier why he had not taken action towards disfranchising all Germans and Austrians in the province. His question was the signal for shouting and applause among the soldiers in the audience.
>
> The veterans claimed Canada was still in very real danger from these men, who were far more numerous than was generally believed, and who were now to have the right to vote.
>
> The Premier, he said, had the opportunity during the last session of the Legislature to bring in a Bill disfranchising the Germans and Austrians, but he did not do so. Turning to the Premier on the platform, he said: "I impeach you as failing to do the right thing for the country in this, and challenge you that you cannot make a reply that will be satisfactory to the citizens of this city."
> Regarding the changing of the law affecting the franchise to subjects of alien birth, the Premier said the proposal that this should be done was not made till it was too late for the legislature to take it up, and it was a matter with which only the legislature could deal.

I quote this to show that in that part of the country where the majority of these alien enemies are to be found, the soldiers who have lived side by side with them, and have therefore a better opportunity of judging them than we have here, find that they are not reliable.

I shall support this measure because I believe that its purpose is in the best interests of this country. Its purpose implies that Canada will continue with all her might and main to support our soldiers at the front till this war is brought to a finish. I believe it would be a great injustice to the memory of those who have made the supreme sacrifice, if those of alien birth in this country were allowed at this particular time to exercise the franchise and to use their influence while our men are engaged in the vital duties they are performing at the front.

10 p.m.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (Strathcona): There are quite a number of objectionable features in this Bill. As far as the question of enfranchising the wives and daughters, and sisters of the soldiers is concerned, I heartily support that particular provision of the Bill. I wish it had gone further and that the Parliament of Canada had enfranchised every woman who is a British subject, following the lead which has been given in that direction by the western provinces.

The feature of the Bill to which I object most strongly is the disfranchisement of what is called the alien enemy in this country. In the province from which I come, and in the constituency which I represent, there is a large number of so-called alien enemies, and from my knowledge of these people I take issue with any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who states that these men are alien enemies in the strict sense of the word. I have watched their conduct ever since 1914; I have come in contact with them, and I say that in no act that I have ever seen has there been any justification for the charge that the Austrian and German in western Canada is disloyal. He certainly gives voice to no such utterances as I have heard in eastern Canada, and if the basis of this franchise is war service, I think a great many of the people in the eastern portion of Canada should be disfranchised before these so-called alien enemies in the West. We have tremendous natural resources in Canada; we have a wonderful country, which needs, above everything else, population. We have embarked upon a comprehensive scheme for inducing people to settle with us and become citizens. We have offered every inducement, and our policy had been successful up to the beginning of this war. We have induced great numbers of people from all parts of Europe and the United States to come over and assist in making this a great country. We have given pledges to these people that, provided they would settle among us and behave themselves, Parliament would grant them the franchise and every other privilege a British citizen enjoys. That has been the secret of the splendid record of Great Britain as the most successful colonizing nation in the world. Britain has never attempted coercion in any country which she has conquered. She has never attempted coercion against any people whom she has induced to come and settle within her borders. From my knowledge of these people whom it is proposed to disfranchise, I know they have been a very important factor in the upbuilding of this Dominion, and in the prosperity of the western part of the Dominion. They have proven most excellent settlers, most peaceable neighbours, and a very honest, industrious and frugal people, who are transforming the country from a wild state into one of the most prosperous and productive sections in the whole Dominion.

We have endeavoured to get these men here on the promise that if they came they should enjoy all the privileges which we give to the native-born Canadian or the native-born Britisher. And now, through no fault of theirs, with a stroke of the pen, we are depriving them of this privilege. We are branding them in a way as outcasts, and casting a reflection upon their loyalty, which, as some one remarked here this afternoon, will not be wiped out in this generation, but will probably be carried down for fifty years to come. From the point of view of unity, this is a most serious thing to do. In Western Canada particularly, our population is necessarily of a very cosmopolitan character. We are endeavouring by every means to unite the different nationalities into one common citizenship, and I take the view that we have succeeded very well in my province. We have only one system of schools, and the German, the Ruthenian, the Galician and the Pole has to send his children to our schools. They have to learn English, and, to give them only due credit, they are most excellent linguists. Within a very short time after arriving in the country they become quite proficient in the language. They are falling into our customs, they are doing as we do, they are dressing as we dress, and they are assimilating themselves in every way to the pattern of the Canadian people and are becoming excellent citizens. My hon. friend from East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) quoted an article from a newspaper stating that Premier Sifton of Alberta had made a speech in Calgary which had not met with the reception it might have received from some returned soldiers in that city. I happen to know Sergeant Guillfoyle, who spoke after Premier Sifton, and from my knowledge of him I would not give credence to one word he said, no matter on what subject he was speaking.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He was only willing to die, that is all. He offered to die.

Mr. DOUGLAS: A great many men offered to die—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But, he was in France.

Mr. DOUGLAS: —I am sorry to say my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) was not one of them.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He did not put a uniform on for a summer, and draw pay.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS: As far as Mr. Guillfoyle's energies in connection with the provincial campaign were concerned, I think he only lasted a short time when he was forced to resume his position in some other walk of life. He is an agitator. He certainly tried to defend his country, and probably did everything he could along that line. Still he was not a pronounced success in an election. Mention has been made here of what the foreign-born people have done in the matter of contributions to the Patriotic Fund. I took part in a meeting east of Edmonton last year, where the population was entirely of Austrian birth——

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Is that the meeting you attended in uniform?

Mr. DOUGLAS: No, I attended that meeting in civilian clothes. The other meeting was not a Patriotic Fund meeting.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap stuff.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order:

Mr. DOUGLASS: I want to tell the House that those men responded splendidly to the appeal for contributions to the Patriotic Fund, and that the constituency of Whitford, represented in the provincial house by an Austrian, contributed more to the Patriotic Fund than any other constituency in the province of Alberta. Those men were most anxious to enlist. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) made the statement that one-half of the 218th Battalion was made up of men of Galician or Austrian birth. I have personal knowledge of the facts, and I think my hon. friend is quite within the mark in that statement. To show the earnestness with which these men endeavoured to enlist, I might say they nearly all had to perjure themselves in order to become members of that battalion. They had to swear they were Russians, yet to my own knowledge the majority of those men never saw Russia, came from Austria. Still, they were so eager to go and fight against Austria that they enlisted claiming they came from Russia. The 192nd Battalion from the Crowsnest Pass, was largely made up of the same class of people, taken from the mines of Blairmore district, and that south-west country. So that the charge that these men were not prepared to do their duty and take the full responsibility of citizenship is absolutely unfounded. If they had been given an opportunity of enlisting and joining our forces under the volunteer system, we could easily have had a full battalion of men of that race.

I was much struck with a statement I read just recently, showing the feeling with which this question of blending and making a cosmopolitan community of blended people was viewed by no less a person than General Smuts. Speaking in London quite recently, he said:

> We want to create a blend out of various nationalities. We want to create a new nation, and that is the South African nation. If we succeed in doing that we shall achieve a nation not standing on one leg, but on various legs. We shall have a nation which will embrace various traits. You will have a people all blending into one. It is only by bringing about a union like that, and by making the different racial types of people work together, respect each other, co-operate with each other, and understand each other, that you will bring into being a unanimous people which will take the broadest and largest view of the problems with which it is confronted.

These sentiments breathe the spirit of broadness, and show that the idea of cementing the people and nationalizing and colonizing is deep in the heart of that great Boer general, who not many years ago was fighting against Great Britain, and who today occupies one of the most responsible positions in South Africa. I understand the Prime Minister was at conference with this same general, and that those expressions were voiced at that conference, yet we find the Prime Minister coming back to Canada and at this late stage of the session bringing down a Bill which will have the very opposite effect to that voiced by General Smuts, an effect which will create discord and disunion in this country, at a time when feeling is running high, when everything should be done to minimize differences and quiet people rather than the reverse. I regret very much that at this time of tremendous stress, when people's nerves are on edge, there is introduced into this Parliament a measure which is going to create such dissatisfaction and feeling, because of the fact that an absolute injustice is being done to a large part of the population of this country.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the time at my disposal is very short. I must, in the first place, make complaint against the Government that this Bill was only two hours under discussion when the closure was applied. It is a Bill of far-reaching and great importance, and I think we should have been given at least a day in which to discuss it before the application of closure. Instead of that, one-half the members of this House had no opportunity to speak upon the Bill under the ordinary rules. We reached the discussion of the Bill at ten o'clock on Satuday night, and at a quarter to twelve the closure was applied. I submit, therefore, that no great freedom or opportunity was given to the representatives of the people to deal with this most important question.

With you, Sir, I come from a province where the greatest possible freedom has been given to the people in connection with the exercise of the franchise, and where every opportunity is given to the electors or to any people entitled to be electors to have their names put upon the list; and the greatest possible hesitancy is exercised in depriving any of them of the right to the franchise, after their names have been placed upon the list. In the province of Nova Scotia we were accustomed to the amplest provisions for putting names on the list, and if necessary striking off the names of those who had no right to vote. One has practically every day from the 20th of January to the 5th of March for putting names on and the same period for striking names off at the Revisers' Court, which is held annually on the 5th of March in each year; and if any person has reason to complain of the conduct of the revisers he has a right to appeal to the Sheriff's Court in each county, the provisions for that appeal being found in sections 25 to 28, both inclusive, of chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1900. The revisers are appointed by the representatives of the people in the municipal councils of the different counties in the province, and are thus answerable to the public for their conduct, and are subject to penalties for any malfeasance of office as will appear from sections 39 to 42, both inclusive, of chapter 4 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1900. Subsection B of section 40 reads:

> Every reviser who neglects to revise any of the lists of voters for the revisal section of which he is a reviser, or wilfully transmits to the clerk of the municipal district any incorrect list of voters, shall be liable to a penalty of two hundred dollars.

Subsection (2) of section 40 provides that each day a list is delayed shall be a separate offence.

Section 41 provides that every sheriff who wilfully neglects any duty imposed on such sheriff by this chapter, or places on a list of voters the name of any person not properly qualified, or strikes off any such list the name of any person properly qualified, shall be liable to a penalty of two hundred dollars.

And although the Act, that is, the Franchise Act for Nova Scotia, does not provide imprisonment for any of those offences, yet the general law, as found in subsection B of section 48 of chapter 161 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1900, provides as follows:—

> (b) That in default of payment of the said penalty, compensation, or sum of money, and costs, if any, forthwith or within a limited time, the defendant be imprisoned in the manner and for the time mentioned in the said statute or law, or for any period not exceeding three months, if the statute or law authorizing the conviction or order does not specify imprisonment, or does not specify any term of imprisonment, unless the said sums with the like costs and expenses are sooner paid.

If these officers do not discharge their duty, they are subject to the serious fines, or to imprisonment. I find that the Act now before this House provides no such penalty, although the officers who are to be appointed are not to be appointed directly by the Government or by any person who has responsibility for their actions.

I wish to point out, in the earlier part of my remarks, that the Naturalization Act of Canada gives very strong inducement for people coming into Canada to become naturalized. The provisions of our Naturalization Act afford ample protection to the foreigners who may become British subjects under the provisions of that Act. Section 24 of chapter 77, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, reads as follows:—

> An alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall, within Canada, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada, with this qualification, that he shall not, when within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject previously to obtaining his certificate of naturalization, be deemed to be a British subject, unless he has ceased to be a subject of that state in pursuance of the laws thereof or in pursuance of a treaty or convention to that effect.

I read this to show that the Act which is now before the House does not propose to repeal this Naturalization Act, and the Naturalization Act gives to every man who comes into this country and qualifies for naturalization every privilege of a British subject. The contract is made with him by this House, by the Senate, and by the King, that when he comes here and is naturalized, he is, to all intents and purposes, the same as ourselves, and that right is secured to him by statute. The men whom we are dealing with here, so far as we have evidence, have done their duty, but we are not keeping our part of the contract. It is an old saying that "The subject who is truly loyal to the chief magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures." In this case also the old saying applies, that whatever we sow the same shall we reap. The Canadian people, in giving this party power, have sown the wind and they are certainly, in this particular Act, reaping the whirlwind. I submit that when we think of the practices and performances of the party now behind the Government and of the Government itself since 1911, we must not be surprised that we have this action of theirs and this Act before the House. When we recall, Sir, that in 1911, while the party of hon. gentlemen opposite professed to be super-loyal and were waving and flapping the flag and yelling loyalty all over the country, men of that great party were financing a paper and a speaker in the province of Quebec who were not devoting much of their time to loyalty, we must not be very much surprised at what we find on this occasion.

We have been told by the Secretary of State that there was only one qualification for voters in this country and that the franchise could only be properly exercised by those giving service in the war. I submit that that statement is absolutely unconstitutional. In this country the powers and privileges of Parliament, and the functions which the representatives of the people are permitted to perform, are divided into two sections, one section to be dealt with by this Parliament, and the other by the local legislatures. The powers of the Dominion Parliament are set forth in section 91 of the British North America Act which reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:
> The public debt and property; the regulation of trade and commerce; the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation; the borrowing of money on the public credit; postal service; the census and statistics; militia, military and naval service and defence; the fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Government of Canada; beacons, buoys, lighthouses and Sable Island; navigation and shipping; quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals; sea coast and inland fisheries; ferries between a province and any British or foreign country, or between two provinces; currency and coinage; banking; incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money; savings banks; weights and measures; bills of exchange and promissory notes; interest; legal tender; bankruptcy and insolvency; patents of inventions and discovery; copyrights; Indians and lands reserved for the Indians; naturalization and aliens; marriage and divorce; the criminal law, except the constitution of the courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters; the establishment, maintenance and management of penitentiaries; such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the provinces.

Those are the many subjects which the people of this country are given the right to deal with by their representatives in this House. But we are told by the Solicitor General that all these subjects must be put to one side, and that the people of this country have nothing to say as to the class of representatives they will have to represent them, and they must only have men who give all their time and attention to questions of the war, and not to anything else. I submit that there is no justification as far as the Government is concerned, for introducing this new Act, and making these wide departures from the old condition of things that existed before the war or that existed up to the time that the Government received the extension of one year. I submit to you, Sir, that, if this Government had declared to the people of Canada, when they asked for the extension of one year, that they were going to introduce a drastic measure like this, no sane man who had anything to say in granting that extension would have consented to it but would have held them down to the proper procedure. Had that been done the people, before this date, would have had an opportunity of passing judgment upon the Government. We profess to be fighting for freedom. Indeed, we are fighting for freedom, and for the establishment of the rights of the common people. Why, then, are we called upon to commit this very high act of tyranny, which is before this House? The proper rule is that, as far as the vote is concerned, there should be one vote for one man. That has been the practice in this country, and that is the practice in recent years in England, although there have been abuses of that principle for many years in that country. We depart from the traditions and principles of British institutions in disfranchising our fellow citizens and depriving them of the right and privileges which they have freely enjoyed. We are all for the war, for the King and for the flag. Where is the candidate going to be found from whom we have to expect any danger should he find his way into this House? The only danger that we have to protect ourselves against is that members may find their way into this House who will not be as true and as loyal to the subject with which we have to deal as ourselves. I have not heard a hint that any provision is to be made as to the class of candidate we shall have, and the blow is struck at the poor people, who should have the right to poll their votes in support of the institution which we are so proud to possess.

Why is there such fear about a change of membership in this House? The Government now have passed all the legislation that they can possibly hope for. They have the War Measures Act, they have the War Profits Act, they have the Income Tax, the Soldiers' Vote Act, Conscription Act, Canadian Northern Act, the Quebec and Saguenay Act, the Overseas Militia Act, the Minister of Militia's Act, the Under Secretary of State's Act—every Act that the mind of man can think of they have within their power. I hope and believe that they have no part or parcel in the Acts of the Apostles. With all this machinery, why fear to face the people? Let them give a proper vote, and allow the people to pass judgment on the conduct of this Government. We scorn, Sir, the political methods of the Turk or the Mexican. How are they worse than we are, if we follow the principle laid down in this Bill in our dealings with those who have come into our country and whom we have made British subjects. If there is anything wrong with the men in the West, or in other parts of Canada, who may exercise the franchise under the old conditions, we have no evidence of it. This Government has been delighted to appoint commissions for every conceivable act that could possibly be thought of. They were always switching aside to some commission anything and everything that they should decide themselves. But here is one of the biggest issues that has been dealt with, or can be dealt with, by the Government—the question whether or not these people had the right to vote—and instead of sending a man to ascertain the true facts, or making any investigation, they simply pass judgment without any evidence, condemn those men unheard, deprive them of their rights without giving them the slightest hint or reason as to why the thing is being done, except that, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), it is thought they may vote Liberal. The soldier who fights for his country is doing his duty, and is doing it well, and he is certainly entitled to the first rank of citizenship. But he is not doing any more than his duty, and, as a citizen, as far as the vote is concerned, there is no law and there never was a law in any British country where a soldier or any citizen, no matter how admirable he may be, was given more than one vote. We have the foundation of the principle in our constitution, that the King can do no wrong. That fortunately is still true, but it is a sad thing to believe in this country the same cannot safely and truthfully be said of those who advise the King. The Government promised those men full rights of citizenship if they came into this country, but the trouble is, sad to relate, that those promises were ignored; and, as I have already stated, without the slightest notice and without the slightest opportunity of defending themselves the people are being deprived of that right.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I rise to a point of order. I wish to call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have a few notes, and I am passing over them rapidly. I think it is rather a small business to deprive me of the right to refer to notes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is acquainted with the rule. Under the rule a member is not permitted to read his speech, but is allowed to refer to notes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will be pleased to pass my notes over to you, Mr. Speaker, to show you that they are simply notes. I am sorry to say that it is a Nova Scotian who takes exception to anything of this kind, for the first time in 14 years I have been in this House; but I can only say that the mantle falls on deserving shoulders.

I was going to say, certain emissaries went forth from this country to the West to ask certain gentleman to cast their lot with this Government, and come under the Tory yoke. But, as they would not submit to the Tory yoke; as they would not come within the thraldom of Toryism, the next thing was to subject them to this law: to have them gagged, pilloried, outlawed. That is what is being done by this Bill. The Government says, sometimes boastfully, that they are willing to submit themselves to the judgment of the people. Their courage in offering to submit themselves to the judgment of the people is akin to that of the man who boasts of going into the lion's cage after he has had all the lion's teeth removed, his claws cut off, and his eyes gouged out. That is the courageous manner in which the Government proposes to go before the people. They say that they will win the election; they boast about it. Well, if they win it, it will be because of their having seized their antagonist and tied his hands behind him. That is the extent of the courage and bravery of hon. gentlemen opposite in offering to submit themselves to the people and in boasting of their expectation to secure the majority of the votes.

I warn the Government that in dealing with the foreigners as they propose under this Bill, they are striking a blow at the principle of freedom. Many of these men, when they came here, were led to believe that British justice, British fair-play, British privileges, prevailed in this land, and that they would have the advantages of all these. When it is known that tyranny rules, the stream of immigration into this country will be diverted to other channels. We have heard a great deal of Canada becoming an adjunct of the United States. I submit that no stronger step could be taken than has been taken by the Government towards making this country an adjunct of some country in which freedom has not been flung to the winds. If an improper spirit develops in this country after this measure is passed, hon. gentlemen opposite will know what brought about that condition, and they will have themselves to blame. We boast of our freedom, of our spirit of fair play, of our treatment of the people who come amongst us. Then why brand as cowards those people who come to our country at our invitation, to whom we have extended the right hand of fellowship, whom we have welcomed under the benign and munificent folds of the British flag? Shall we brand these people as men who are unworthy of confidence? I hope that it is not too late to save our good name, to stand steadily upon the rock-bottom principles of freedom, fortitude and fidelity, to be true and firm for our God, our King and our country.

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland): It will be admitted, Sir, that no legislation coming before Parliament is of deeper interest to the people than legislation dealing with their franchise. It is the duty of every citizen to go to the polls when the occasion demands and exercise the franchise which it is his privilege to enjoy. The people, therefore, are watching carefully and with a great deal of interest the Bill that is now before Parliament. This measure is composed of practically two parts; one, the disfranchisement of a certain number of electors; the other, the enfranchisement of a certain portion of the population. The Secretary of State, when introducing this measure, stated that one of the purposes of the Bill was to disfranchise certain persons of alien enemy birth, practically all of whom resided in the western provinces. Personally I have little if any knowledge of these people. I was particularly impressed with the very careful, logical and thoughtful remarks made with regard to those people by the member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney). I am sure that nobody would charge that hon. gentleman with making a partisan speech on this subject; he spoke as he felt. He referred to the people of that western country who —some many years ago, others not so long ago—took upon themselves the duties of Canadian citizenship. He said that they had conducted themselves as loyal and patriotic citizens during the whole of the time that they had been in this country, including the past three years, while the war had been in progress.

The Secretary of State said that one of the reasons why he introduced this measure was because a large portion of the population in the western provinces desired that they should be disfranchised in order that they might not have to vote in the forthcoming election. They stated, he said, that if they had the franchise some question might arise as to their loyalty. That was the only reason advanced by the Secretary of State for the disfranchisement of these people. Well, any elector who feels that way can refrain from voting; it is not necessary to take from him the right to exercise the franchise.

My hon. friend says that this is a war-time measure; that the Act will operate only during the period of the war and the period of demobilization thereafter. But, however much we may regret it, we are forced to the conclusion that this is an election-time measure, not a war-time measure. Some few weeks ago my hon. friend introduced a Bill for the extension of the term of Parliament for another year. Some hon. gentlemen on this side, as well as some on the other side, did not see eye to eye with the Government on the question of the further extension of Parliament, and because the resolution was not adopted unanimously the Government immediately started to prepare for an election. A Bill was then drafted and brought before the House, known as The Military Voters' Act, the purpose of which was to give to soldiers in Canada and overseas the right to vote. No one one this side of the House objected to the principle of giving to the soldiers who were fighting our battles every opportunity of casting their vote. I am sure that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) who had charge of the Bill will give at least some gentlemen on this side credit for assisting the passage of that Bill and endeavouring to make it as workable as possible.

A few days ago the hon. gentleman who introduced the measure now under consideration was promoted to the higher position of Secretary of State. Certain newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite expressed the view that his promotion was necessary in order that he might be enabled to look after the elections that were soon to be held. Well, he has started in very well to look after the election. The next Bill introduced was this one respecting the franchise, disfranchising in some cases and enfranchising in others. I shall not take up the time of the House by discussing the disfranchisement of a certain class of the population. That part of the measure has been discussed very fully and very carefully by hon. gentlemen who have more information on the subject than I have. But I wish to refer briefly to the proposed enfranchisement of female relatives of soldiers who are at the front. I have never been a strong supporter of woman suffrage. I have never had objection to extending the franchise to the women of any province if I was convinced that the women in that province actually desired the franchise. I had some experience in the local legislature of my native province, and up to the time that I left that assembly and came here I had not been convinced that the majority of the women of New Brunswick actually desired the franchise.

I realize that there was a certain number who did. The legislature was waited upon by women from certain sections asking that the franchise be extended to the women, but I never felt convinced that the majority of the women desired that franchise, because in New Brunswick—and I presume the same is true of a number of other provinces—the women have a limited franchise in regard to municipal and civil elections, and very few of them, in those elections go to the polls and exercise that privilege. I do not believe they would show any more interest in casting their votes for provincial or Dominion representatives. But, so far as I am concerned, as soon as the women of the country desire that franchise, I am prepared to give my assent to any franchise that may be extended to them. I realize as fully as any other man in the Dominion can realize the very great responsibility and burden that has been assumed by the women of Canada during the progress of this war, and I want to say, on behalf of those women who are not being given the privilege of the franchise under this Bill, that not only are they just as entitled to it as those who are receiving it under this measure, but it would be in the interest of the women of Canada if the whole female population were given that privilege instead of only those who are related to the soldiers at the front. If you go into the rooms of such associations as the Daughters of the Empire, the Red Cross or the Council of Women, you will find women working together, women who have worked together for three years in the interest of the soldiers at the front, and who are doing all they can in every way to give assistance and sustenance to our boys, and it does not seem right, just, equitable, fair or in the interest of British fair play, to say: We are going to give the vote to ten or twenty of those women out of one of those societies, who have been sitting around the table day in and day out—and almost, I believe, on the Sabbath, working for our soldiers,—and we are going to refuse to allow fifty others of those women to vote. Not only is that unfair, but it will have this effect. Instead of those women being drawn closer and closer together in the interest of the work in which they are so heartily and so sincerely engaged, a certain amount of dissatisfaction will be created amongst them, and the women who are not given the franchise will feel that they are not being accorded fair treatment by this Parliament in that regard.

I understand that, in some of the western provinces, if not in all of them, a list is made up by the enumerators as is provided for by this Bill. Therefore, they will not be subject to the same inconvenience that will arise in my province in which we have not that form of making up our lists. In New Brunswick we have always voted on the provincial lists. It was a very simple procedure, and a great deal of dissatisfaction will arise amongst the people of the different provinces who are not accustomed to these enumerators and this method of making up the lists. Very great care must be taken to ensure that a fair list is made up and an opportunity afforded to every person entitled to be placed upon that list to go before an enumerator, whoever he may be or wherever he may hold his court of revision, and that no unfair advantage is taken by any person for or on behalf of any particular candidate. The question of the franchise is a serious one in this country, one in which the people are very deeply interested, and one that cannot be passed over lightly or dealt with in a trifling way. It is a serious matter to interfere with that right of the citizens of this country, a right which they have enjoyed for so many years, a right which they will naturally look forward to enjoy. Those of us who have had the misfortune to run many elections realize the dissatisfaction that is aroused in the mind of a voter when he comes to the poll and finds his name inadvertently left off the list. He would sooner lose $100 than find when he comes to the poll that he has through inadvertence been disfranchised, and he will make more commotion, and more feeling will be aroused, over that one little thing than over other things far more important.

The Secretary of State told the House and the country this afternoon that they were disfranchising a certain portion of the population of this country because he and the Government believed that those people would vote against the Government when it appealed to the country. He told us, on the other hand, he was enfranchising a certain other portion of the population composed of three or four hundred thousand women relatives of soldiers who had gone to the front, because he believed they would vote for the Government. So far as the rights of the citizens are concerned, it does not seem to me to be of very much importance whether they are to vote for the Government or against the Government. Personally I am not afraid to take my chance; I am willing to take a gambler's chance and trust my election or my defeat to the women who will be added to the list of the constituency of Westmorland. If we are to judge by the scores, the hundreds of letters that have come to me and to other members of the different constituencies through out this Dominion, from the mothers, wives and sisters of the soldiers who have gone to the front, who have had to wait month after month, and some of them over a year without receiving the fair treatment they deserve to receive and should receive at the hands of this Government which is responsible for the machinery for carrying on the different operations in connection with this war, the Secretary of State need not compliment himself too warmly or congratulate the Government too fervently in regard to the result of the votes of the women whom he has enfranchised throughout Canada on account of their being relatives of soldiers at the front.

In conclusion, I do hope and trust that the Secretary of State, who fathers this Bill, will see his way clear to extend the franchise not only to the female relatives of soldiers who have gone to the front, but to all women in the Dominion over twenty-one years of age who are British subjects. The women of this country are working nobly and well for the Red

11 p.m. Cross, the Patriotic Fund, and other organizations for the comfort of the soldier, irrespective of whether they had husband, son, or brother at the front, because they realize that every man who has gone to the front and is fighting for King and country is just as much related to them in a national way as if he was their own brother, or husband, or son. I sincerely trust that the Government will reconsider that provision of the Bill and extend the franchise to all women of the Dominion within the limits I have mentioned, who amply deserve this consideration.

Mr. MARTIN (Saint-Mary's, Montreal) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, you don't need to keep your watch at hand, for I shall certainly not take up the whole twenty minutes allotted to me to discuss the important question now before this House.

When a certain delegation of ladies of this country came to see the Prime Minister during this session and asked him to extend the franchise to the women of this country, they were not claiming that privilege for a certain class of women only, but really for all women in general. I am disappointed not to see here to-night the hon. member for Montreal St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) in order to take their part and see to it that the franchise be conferred not only on the women of Montreal, but on all the women of Canada; that hon. member, who is the president of the Patriotic Fund, as well as president of the Red Cross Fund, has made a most particular appeal to the women of Canada and, thanks to their efforts, they have succeeded in having millions and millions subscribed to help the Allies, generally, and more especially the Canadians who have enlisted to defend the British flag and the cause of Liberty. The hon. member for St. Antoine exercises some influence over the Government, and were he here to-night, he would certainly do something to have justice given to the women of Canada. If there is a man who knows the many sacrifices of every kind made by the Canadian women, it actually is the hon. member for St. Antoine, who has had the honour of being elected president of the Canadian Patriotic Fund for the whole of Canada. In the pursuit of that patriotic work, he appealed to the women of Canada in general, and the ladies of the upper classes readily worked hand in hand with the workingmen's wives in order to insure in every way the success of this Patriotic Fund.

Mr. Speaker, personally I am not sympathetic to the proposal of granting the franchise to the women of this country, but if the franchise is to be in any way conferred on some of them, it seems to me that it should be given to all and that this is only a question of justice. For my part, I must state that many letters have reached me asking that I demand the Government to grant the franchise to all the women of this country, if they should think of granting it only to a certain class of them.

The measure which the Government are submitting to us to-day has certainly not for its object to win the war, but rather to win the elections which will soon come off. If such is the Governement's pretension, I say that they are greatly mistaken and that we, of the Opposition, have no reason to fear the effects of that measure, for these will be quite the opposite of the result expected by the Government. Do you believe for instance, that the mother of a family, who has lost her son, her only support, and to whom the Government have not given justice as far as the pension is concerned, do you believe such a woman will vote in favour of this same Government? Do you believe that sisters who have lost their brother in the war and who have received no aid from the Government, do you think they will vote for this same Government? No, Mr. Speaker, I believe this measure will in no way change the people's decision, because the present Government have not taken the necessary measures to assist the families left behind by those of our Canadians who have enlisted to go and defend the British flag. No, I repeat, we need have no fear as to this measure; it will be in our favour. During sometime, these gentlemen opposite believed, or at least, seemed to believe that the women's vote, in general, would be cast in their favour. But they soon changed their minds upon that subject, and they thought that such a measure would perhaps tend to annul the votes registered by the mothers and sisters of those enlisted.

Upon that point, Mr. Speaker, I can speak knowingly, for many mothers and sisters, who have lost in this war their only support, did come to my office, as Mayor of Montreal, and complained—that the Government was not giving them any means of subsistence. I say that this measure is an injustice, for if those who have given to the colours those who were their supports deserve that privilege, why should it not be the same with these young men and girls, employed in our manufactories, who have sacrificed two, three and even four days' wages, every year, in order to contribute their share to the Patiotic Fund? What reason can be advanced to leave them aside, when has come the hour of what I would call the reward? We have moreover in Montreal—and it is the same elsewhere, I presume—all kinds of institutions which have been engaged, for three years past, in patriotic works having for object the levying of funds to assist the soldiers families. The ladies of Montreal, in particular, have worked night and day to organize tag days, and euchres, others have given a good deal of their time to sewing rooms, all of them also in order to help our soldiers. And when the day comes to recognize these self-imposed sacrifices, these ladies are all left aside.

My hon. friend from the St. Lawrence division (Mr. Bickerdike) has just mentioned, a few moments ago, the fact that the President of the United States was in favour of granting the franchise to all the women of the American republic. Would it not be simple justice to do the same in Canada?

Well, Mr. Speaker, this is another injustice committed by this Government and injustice will fall back upon them, upon you also, since you are with them, because you are trying to take means—which I might qualify as dishonest, if the word is parliamentary—to extend the franchise to a certain category of women, because you imagine that by such a manœuvre you will be able to carry the elections.

We know perfectly well that this is done, only to allow the Government to get another lease of power. You believe that, by such means, you will be able to carry the elections, but you are deceiving yourselves, this will be against you; the soldiers back from the front will vote against the Government, and those who are still overseas, in the trenches, will also cast their votes against the Government. Indeed, when we have an opportunity to discuss with some of the returned soldiers, we learn their way of thinking about the present Government. I have had the occasion, as mayor of Montreal, to receive several of them and I know what I can believe on that point. You will see, I tell you, that these returned soldiers will record their vote against the Government.

You did not want to submit to the people the Conscription question, because you knew that measure was most unpopular, the people are anxious to govern themselves. Now, Mr. Speaker, you come to-day with a measure still—if the term is parliamentary—more dishonest, because it does not give every one equal justice. If you grant the right to vote to a certain class of women, you should grant it to all, without any discrimination.

As to the question of disfranchising certain people who are British citizens, because they were naturalized within the past fifteen years, believe me, these people, from the first to the last, will surely work against the Government, because you deny them their rights; there again you are committing an injustice as you have always been doing since 1911, all your measures have been autocratic. You have, in almost every measure you have submitted to Parliament, stripped the people of their rights, and you are now again trying to take them away from a certain class of citizens for the purpose of securing power for yourselves.

In fact, you don't know what means to resort to in order to get a new lease of power; you are trying to remain in office, in spite of the people, but you will see, when the elections are held, that if you are not turned out of office, it will probably be due to the fact that you will have taken means most dishonest—if the term is parliamentary—as you have always done.

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to speak in the name of the metropolis of Canada. As I have stated a few moments ago, I am not sympathetic to the proposal of granting the franchise to the women of this country, but I assert that if the Government want, by this measure, to confer the right of the franchise to a certain class of women, they should give it to everyone of them. This goes to show that you are taking every possible means to cling to the power you have unfairly obtained in 1911, by deceiving the electorate of the province of Quebec.

The women, as the speaker who preceded me stated a few minutes ago, do not vote. That is true. Indeed, we encounter all kinds of trouble, especially in a municipal contest wherein they are directly interested on account of their personal property qualifications, we have, I say, enormous difficulties to convince them that they should vote. We resort to every possible means to bring them to the polls, but they do not want to come. I repeat it, Mr. Speaker, by giving the right to vote to a certain class of women only, an injustice is committed. If, at least, the franchise were extended to all the women, many of them might probably consider it their duty to go and vote. As far as we are concerned, we of the Opposition, we have no reason to fear an unfavorable verdict, I am convinced of that. As I said at the beginning, I shall not take up my entire twenty minutes, because other speakers are to follow me; but I had a duty to discharge. A delegation from the Ladies Business Association of Montreal came to see me in my office and ask me, if the measure were introduced in Parliament, to insist upon the Government that the franchise be granted to all the women and not only to a certain portion of them. Those ladies, Mr. Speaker, have done no more no less than has done the delegation which came to see the Prime Minister and asked him to extend the franchise to all the women in Canada. These ladies did not come here to ask the franchise for a certain portion of them, but they did demand it for every woman of the country. The present Government, as I have just stated, are only trying, through this Bill now before the House, to win the elections and not to win the war.

On the conscription question, it was the very same thing; the Government have done all they could to prevent the people's voice from being heard, but let them remember, Mr. Speaker, that the people exist before the Governments, and that, if there are governments existing, they have been created by the popular will. Do not, therefore, try to shove the people aside.

It is evident that the measure now submitted has no other object than to secure a majority, made up of certain category which is believed to be in favour of the Government, but the Government are making an egregious mistake. Time will tell when we have the advantage of going before the people. You are trying, by every possible or imaginable means, to put back the date of the elections, the result of which scares you; but I can, without any fear, assert that you will be driven out of power, because never have the people seen a Government—I will not say rotten, for that expression is forbidden, it is unparliamentary—but never has the country seen a Government so audacious as the one we now have. You know that so well that you dare not face public opinion, and of that fact we have the proof in all the bold measures which you submit to this Parliament.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends on the other side have fallen into a fundamental error in their discussion of this Bill. There is no pledge, and there were no guarantees, and there is no deprivation of citizenship. In all the arguments which have been addressed to the House this evening, reference has been made to "citizenship" but "citizenship" and "franchise" are not interchangeable terms. That is the fundamental error which is the basis of all the arguments that have been addressed to this House to-night. Franchise is not inherent to citizenship. It never was, and I suppose never will be. Franchise is granted by a legislative body. It is a privilege conferred by legislation upon a class in a community which is named by that legislation. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Martin) must know that the province from which he comes, under the regime of Hon. Mr. Mercier, enacted that civil servants who were in the employ of the Federal Government should not have a vote in that province. They deprived their fellow-citizens of a vote; they deprived them of what my hon. friends on the other side have to-night called "citizenship" but which was not in fact citizenship, but merely the privilege of the franchise. The same thing was done in Nova Scotia. We must start with the fundamentals, and the fundamental that we must get in our minds is that citizenship and franchise are two different things, that the one does not involve the other, and that the power which confers citizenship does not necessarily confer franchise by so doing. If we get that fundamental fact clearly before us, we will relieve ourselves of much trouble, and relieve this debate of much acrimony. It is not my word I ask you, Mr. Speaker, or this House to take for that fact, but I ask you to take the considered judgment of the Lords of the Privy Council. When the question was considered by the Privy Council in the case of Cunningham vs. Tomy Houma in 1903, the Earl of Halsbury who delivered the judgment, said:

> In this case a naturalized Japanese claimed to be placed upon the register of voters for the electoral district of Vancouver city, and the objection which is made to his claim is that by the election law of the province, it is enacted that no Japanese, whether naturalized or not, shall have his name placed on the register of voters, or shall be entitled to vote. . . . A child of Japanese parentage, born in Vancouver city, is a natural-born subject of the King, and would be equally excluded from the possession of the franchise. The extent to which naturalization will confer privileges has varied both in this country and elsewhere. From the time of William III down to Victoria, no naturalization was permitted which did not exclude the alien naturalized from sitting in Parliament or in the Privy Council. . . . In the history of this country, the right to the franchise has been granted and withheld on a great number of grounds, conspicuously upon grounds of religious faith, yet no one has ever suggested that a person excluded from the franchise was not under allegiance to the Sovereign. . . . The right of protection and the obligations of allegiance are necessarily involved in the nationality conferred by naturalization, but the privileges attached to it, where these depend upon residence, are quite independent of it.

That is the whole story in a few words. Lord Halsbury said that the right of protection and the obligations of allegiance are necessarily involved in the nationality conferred by naturalization, but the privileges attached to it, where these depend upon residence, are quite independent of it. And upaon this, it is competent for this Parliament, by virtue of the powers inherent in it, to determine who shall be placed upon its register of voters. It may determine that civil servants shall not be so placed. It may determine that Germans shall not be so placed. It may determine that Austrians shall not be so placed, or that any other class of individuals may not be placed on that register, and in so doing Parliament is exercising its great law-enacting power of determining what class of citizens shall exercise the franchise for the election of members to this Parliament. That is the first fundamental principle, and if my hon. friends will disassociate franchise from citizenship and citizenship from franchise, and adopt the language of the Earl of Halsbury, they will find little difficulty in understanding the great principles underlying this legislation.

Why should this Parliament exercise the powers I have referred to? The principle upon which this House must always act is that on matters involving the national existence of this House, of this country, of this Dominion, only those who are nationals should be permitted to vote, by every rule of law and reason. Every instinct of sympathy, and commonsense, and sentiment must indicate that only those who are nationals should vote upon national issues. Upon the great issues of the life or death of the State, upon its destiny, upon the supremacy of our arms, and the life of our institutions, only those men who are nationals should exercise the national franchise. On provincial and municipal matters, the provincial legislatures may determine that any man can vote, because no national issue is concerned, but when the great national issue of the life or death and the integrity of our Empire and the life of the State is concerned, then only men who are nationals should vote.

Now, who are nationals? Nationals are, first, British subjects by birth; secondly,

British subjects by naturalization—yes, provided that that naturalization confers upon them the status of British subjects throughout the world. Our Naturalization Act and the very statutes read here this evening confer upon the Austrians and the Germans in Western Canada the status of British subjects only within Canada. They were not British subjects throughout the world. They were not British subjects in the United States. They are only British subjects in so far as Canada is concerned. We have just passed and placed upon the statute books of this country a Military Service Act, by which we have provided that we will take men compulsorily for the service of the State, and in so taking them the statute means taking them for the first line of Canadian defence in the trenches of France and Flanders. Across the Atlantic, out of Canada beyond the three-mile limit, these naturalized persons cease to be British subjects. They are not British subjects on the shores of France and Flanders. Therefore, at that moment, when they pass beyond the three-mile limit, that dormant alien nationality will revive, and they will again become Germans and Austrians. They are no longer Britons. Ceasing to be Britons, if they were taken prisoners in the front-line trenches, they would be shot as traitors, because they owed military allegiance to Germany and Austria. These men are disfranchised, therefore, by the law of their own country with respect to this great war. Our law has declared whom we will take compulsorily to fight our battles overseas. The only men who can be taken—and we provide that when taken they are for that very reason given the franchise—are our nationals. The minute these men of alien birth pass beyond the three-mile limit their nationality revives, and once more they are citizens of their own state. But my hon. friends ask why they are not drafted into the armies overseas. I will tell you why. Because, under international law, no alien can be made to fight for the state in which he lives. Under international law Britain cannot take an Austrian or a German out of Canada, land him in France, and compel him to fight her battles. These men are aliens when they have passed beyond the three-mile limit, they are no longer Canadians, no longer British citizens, and under the canons of international law we cannot take them to fight our battles there. That is the reason why, under the Army Act of 1881, aliens are not permitted to fight in the forces of England except, I think, one in fifty. These men cannot fight, therefore, and so long as they remain in Canada they cannot be drafted by Germany or Austria; but once they pass out of that limit, then, under the treaty powers, under our very Act of Naturalization, and under the Act of the Imperial Parliament of 1870, which we copied, these men are no longer citizens of this State; they are Austrians and Germans; and as such they cannot exercise their franchise in this country. That is the story, and that is the reason why the great principle is being applied here that only nationals shall vote on national questions. And, nationals being only those men who are British by birth or naturalization—using the word "British" in the broad sense in which it is used in the new Naturalization Act which will be the enactment common to all the British Empire—these men are not British subjects. As the great issue in this war is not only the life of this Dominion, but the life of the great Empire which we call the British Empire, and as nationals only must vote for the life or death of the Empire, it follows that these men, not being nationals, not being British subjects beyond the boundaries of Canada, may not, in Canada, exercise their franchise.

We have not rested at that, we have gone further. We have said that in this case where there is an obligation for military service, these men shall not be liable for that obligation unless they exercise the privilege of the franchise. On the one hand we deprive them of the franchise; on the other hand we release them from the obligation—the release from the obligation here, the deprivation of the franchise there; the release from obligation is part and parcel of international law. For this compulsory service they are required beyond the boundaries of Canada, and their latent nationality reviving they become aliens—Germans, Austrians—and as such they are deprived of the franchise because they cannot meet the obligation, not being British subjects in the broad and true sense in which that word is used. It is said that this is a political right and that under the certificate of naturalization they are entitled to all the political privileges that we are entitled to. That is true, and one of the political privileges that attaches to every man, if he be French Canadian, English, Irish or Scotch, it matters not, is that he may or may not have his name placed upon the register of voters. The same power in the legislature of Quebec that deprived the officials of the federal Government of the vote in Quebec, that gave them a lesser status of citizenship, that deprived them in Nova Scotia of the vote under Mr. Fielding—that same power exercised in the federal domain is part and parcel of the political life of the country, and all that is meant, by the acceptance of political rights, privileges and powers under the Naturalization Act is that they accept what Parliament gives them in common with everyone else—nothing more or less. Any one who studies the statutes and studies history will find that that is the case. But there is another reason that it seems to me would be sufficient, if all other reasons failed, and that is that we in this country are at war and those who know, great historians and philosophers, have told us that the tie of blood is the strongest of all. A great historian, some of whose writings I read the other day, said:

> I put the motives of men thus, in order of their strength:
> (1) Blood, that is race or nationality. (2) Patriotism or love of land and country. (3) Interest or the means by which man lives in trade and commerce. (4) Religion, which is the life and refectory of his soul but as a motive uncertain and incalculable in its influence, and (5) Politics, including all constitutional questions which are merely the means or instruments for attaining these ends.

So that blood ranks first in the motives influencing the minds of man. And I say to the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas), notwithstanding what he has said, that there are hundreds of men who have left my province of Alberta, reservists for the Austrian and German armies, and hundreds remain there to-day who would go if they could—only the strong arm of the law prevents them from leaving for that purpose. To say that these men who would, if they could, use their rifles against our fellow Canadians shall have the right to vote against the man, one of the thirty thousand who died, is contrary to every principle of—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I say more that these men would be the first to say that is so. I have talked with some of them; I know something of their views, something of the opinions of these intelligent German reservists who have come to this country to make a home, and they tell me that the tie of blood is strong upon them, the call of the Fatherland, the call of the homeland, the call of brothers and fathers and cousins fighting in the German and Austrian armies. I talked to one the other day whose uncle was an Austrian general. This man told me that the tie of blood is strong upon them; that they will keep quiet, that they will do nothing wrong, but will try and behave themselves—but the call, the insistent call of the blood is ever upon them. And these men should never be permitted to say whether or not our soldiers in the trenches are to be reinforced by their fellow-Canadians. Such a condition must not, cannot be permitted to exist. Indeed, I believe that the great cry that will go up from the men and women of this country will be that this measure does not proceed far enough, that it will still permit some who are called by the call of the blood, the tie of kinship from overseas, to vote in this great election as the ties of kinship guide them and not as the call of patriotism to Canada should influence them. That is the story, and that is all there is to be said about it.

I heard the hon. member for Strathcona assail the word, the pledged word, of a sergeant-major who had gone from Calgary, a gentleman who went to the front and has returned wounded and retired from service. It ill becomes a man who all last summer wore the uniform of the Canadian Army Service Corps and drew the pay of his rank, to reflect upon that man who offered his life for this country. It is time that sort of thing was stopped, that that sort of arrant hypocrisy was no longer heard. I say by all the reasons that influence men's minds, by the influences that have swayed men in days gone by according to all the great lawgivers from the time of Moses even until to-day, those only who are nationals should decide our national existence and our national life or death. I know the men of whom I speak, and I do not blame them; I enter into their spirit; I think I know something of what they feel and how strong the call of their fellows is upon them, and that call, strong as it is, should be the call that deprives these aliens of the franchise in this country.

So far as the enfranchisement of women is concerned, there is no man who will not say that the women of this country, by giving their husbands and fathers and sons in this great war, have earned the right to poll their vote on this great issue. No man will deny it. When you think of the long delays, the weary nights, the great anxiety, the tears, the strain that they have gone through while their loved ones have been at the front, who will deny them the right to vote. And who, at the same time, will say that a broad and general provision of women's franchise should be enacted when a conflict of citizenship is upon us, when jarring and disturbing elements of nationality are on us, when fine distinctions that must be adjusted alike by the Imperial Parliament and parliaments overseas yet are unsettled—when all these vast problems are upon us, who would say that a general measure of enfranchisement of women should be given? Only those who desire to make a little political capital against their opponents.

But what of Canadian men and women, men who love their country more than their party, and women who place higher value upon the great sacredness of the ballot than upon the mere way of exercising it? They know, feel and believe that in a time like this there must be a dividing line somewhere and that dividing line has been found on the ground of personal sacrifice, thereby indicating that those who have given this service and made this sacrifice shall be those who exercise their franchise at this time. Let us not deceive ourselves. We are in the midst of the greatest of all conflicts. We struggle against spies in our own land. Spies have been discovered out in the western country. They have been found in western battalions, and have met their death as such in the early morn. There were reservists in the streets of Calgary a few weeks before the war broke out. They disappeared and are now prisoners of war with us. We are told of a German from Lethbridge being taken prisoner in battle. Hundreds of men of that character were there. These men left our land after having lived amongst us and exercised their privileges as fellow citizens and are now shooting at our brothers and relatives at the front. No member in this House should say that those men should have a vote, and men who would do the same thing under similar circumstances, are not to be given the franchise. I will close what I have to say in the words of that great apostle, to whom my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) referred—"For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): How desperate the position of the Government is—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

[Mr. R. B. Bennett.]

Mr. MURPHY: How desperate the position of the Government is has not only been made plain by "the loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind," on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite who have just indulged in such unbecoming laughter, but also by the fact that the Government for its defence has had to go outside its party ranks and call in, as its champion to defend this measure, an independent member who sits on that side of the House. A little later in my observations I will refer to one or two things my hon. and eloquent friend has said.

Synchronizing—as the Minister of Finance would say—with the application by the Government of closure to the second reading of this Bill, was the presence on the floor of this House this afternoon of Lord Northcliffe, the gentleman who led the intrigue that broke up the Liberal party in England, that deposed Mr. Asquith from the premiership of Great Britain, and placed Mr. Lloyd George at the head of a small but select and powerful autocracy that sits outside Parliament, and which, as time goes on, deprives Parliament more and more of its hard-won rights and privileges. Every student of recent political history will recognize the appropriateness of Lord Northcliffe's first visit to the Canadian Parliament coinciding with the occasion upon which the Government of the day resorted to the drastic measure of closure to force the second reading of the alleged Franchise Bill which is designed not to elicit an expression of the people's will but is deliberately designed to thwart the expression of the people's will. If the time at my disposal were not limited to 20 minutes, I might be tempted to indulge in a few observations as to the near or remote connection of Lord Northcliffe with certain recent political happenings in Canada, more particularly in the newspaper line. That, however much as I regret it, is an indulgence that I must postpone until another occasion.

Whether regard be had to the provisions of the Bill itself, or to the manner in which it has been introduced and forced upon the House, it is safe to say that the thought uppermost in the minds of the people of this country who are watching the despotic course of the Government is the one expressed in the old adage, "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

On Thursday of last week, my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen), in explaining this Bill, said that war service would be the basis of war franchise. In the very next breath he made it clear that war service is not to be the basis of this war franchise, because the Bill, while giving votes to the wives, widows, mothers, daughters and sisters of the soldiers overseas, denies the vote to the thousands of Canadian women who do not happen to have relatives overseas, but who have rendered magnificent war service at home, in making munitions, in providing comforts and food for the soldiers, in Red Cross work, in Belgian relief work, and in the innumerable activities of the Daughters of the Empire, and of the Women's Canadian Clubs. All these women are to be denied the right to vote by this Government's Bill, although in five of the provinces they have such right under the Provincial Franchise Act, which this Bill adopts, but only after it strikes off the names of those women who otherwise would have their franchise preserved. This point cannot be made too clear. For the purpose of emphasizing it, let me refer to a question and answer reported in the proceedings of this House of September 6th, 1917, at page 5729 of Hansard.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Am I right in this: that while the women of Ontario and the western provinces have to-day, under the laws of those provinces, the right to vote, they will, with the exception of those who are qualified as the relatives of men who have enlisted, not have the right to vote in this election?

Mr. Meighen: That is correct.

In view of this statement, in justice to the thousands of Canadian women who have rendered war service of incalculable value, how hollow is the pretense of my hon. friend the Secretary of State when he said that this Bill was an attempt on the part of the Government to repair an injustice. This Bill repairs no injustice; it does actual injustice to thousands of loyal, law-abiding Canadians, of whom the women I have mentioned are only one class.

Let us consider another class for a few minutes. It has been stated over and over again in this country, and by none more loudly than by hon. gentlemen opposite and their supporters through the country, that Canada's participation in this war is against the Kaiser and kaiserism, and not against the German people.

But, Sir, this Bill is directed not against the Kaiser and kaiserism, but against the German people themselves, who are resident within the boundaries of Canada. Once this game of disfranchising the foreigner whom we bring to our shores and to whom we guaranteed equal citizenship and equal rights with ourselves is begun, where, I ask you, is it likely to stop? A moment's reflection will show how vicious is the step which the Government is taking in this Bill. As you are quite well aware, the Allies of to-day may be the enemies of to-morrow; all history proves that. To-day we propose in this Bill to disfranchise the Germans, Austrians, Hungarians and Bulgarians in Canada because they are of enemy country origin. If in the next war Belgium, Russia, Italy, Sweden, Norway and the United States are opposed to Great Britain, then to be consistent we will, in the case of a war-time election, have to disfranchise all the Belgians, Russians, Italians, Swedes, Norwegians and Americans within our borders. It is quite obvious, therefore, that by introducing this measure the Government has at one stroke succeeded in embittering our foreign-born citizens whom we now propose to disfranchise, and in implanting suspicion and distrust in the minds of those other citizens whose turn may come next.

The member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), in his eloquent address of a few minutes ago, said that in the discussion of this question it was absolutely necessary to keep separate the questions of franchise and citizenship. I accede to that suggestion, but I want to point out that that does not extricate the Government from the difficulty into which it has got itself by introducing this Bill. Neither, I submit, does my hon. friend's reference to the disfranchising of certain civil servants in the province of Quebec by the provincial Government help this Government one iota in connection with this measure. That has nothing to do, for instance, with the case of the Mennonites, who are affected by the Bill before the House. In 1873 or 1874 we entered into a solemn treaty with those people. We brought them to Canada under the express provision, in what they rightly claim to be their bill of rights, that they were to have the use of their language and to be exempt from military service. In the original Bill of rights they were guaranteed the other right of citizenship, that of the franchise, when they should become naturalized. In the Bill before us we tell these people that if they exercise the franchise they are not exempt from military service, and to that extent we break faith with those whom we brought to Canada under the solemn compact entered into in 1873 or 1874. My hon. friend's argument in reference to citizenship and to franchise, so far as he proposes to apply it to certain residents of the western provinces, is refuted by the fact that the 218th Battalion, which was raised and sent to the front from my hon. friend's province, was, I am told, composed in large part of Austrians whose services this Government was glad to accept.

On Saturday last two notable speeches were delivered in this discussion, one by the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and the other by the member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney). They told how this Bill would affect certain groups of citizens in the western provinces from which they come; their speeches were most interesting and most illuminating.

Let me illustrate for a few minutes how this Bill affects another group of citizens who reside here in Ottawa. I am informed that there are about 1,500 Germans in this city and that several families among them settled here nearly fifty years ago. In times past many of these men joined local regiments here, notably the Governor General's Foot Guards, the 43rd Regiment, and the Ottawa Field Battery. It appears that these Germans were told that the oath of allegiance which they took on joining these units gave them the right of citizenship. In any event, they exercised these rights for years without question or hindrance. In more recent years, however, these men discovered that they had been misled, and the majority, I am told, have been naturalized within the last fifteen years. These men, with the exception of those who have sons, grandsons or brothers overseas fighting in the ranks of the Allies, will be disfranchised by the measure which is now before the House. Naturally, that will raise feelings of deep resentment in the breasts of these men, all the deeper in view of their conduct since the beginning of the war. In the first year of the war an agitation based on ignorance was started against these people in Ottawa. It was about the time of the sinking of the Lusitania, and some of the agitation centered around that tragic event. But these Germans, while law-abiding people, are not inclined to lie down under an injury. They held a public meeting under the auspices of the St. Paul's German Lutheran church in this city, and they passed a resolution which I shall take the liberty of reading to the House. As published in the papers of May 18, 1915, that resolution was as follows:

Whereas members of this congregation have been resident in Ottawa and vicinity for nearly half a century and it is now more than forty-one years since they built their first church for divine worship at the corner of King Edward avenue and Wilbrod street in this city;

And whereas during the whole period of their residence in this city the members of this congregation have lived on terms of amity and good will with their fellow-citizens and are sincerely desirous that these amicable relations should continue to exist;

And whereas certain false statements designed to prejudice the members of this congregation in the eyes of their fellow-citizens have lately been published with reference to certain events of the present deplorable war, and it is deemed advisable to refute these statements by unanimous and official action on the part of the congregation;

Now, therefore, be it resolved as follows:

That as Canadians and British subjects by birth or naturalization, we recognize and profess no other loyalty than that which we cheerfully render to Canada and the British Empire;

That as citizens we claim the right to share at all times in the trials and sacrifices of this Dominion, and, having regard to our numbers and financial means, we have willingly assumed our share of the burden which such a right imposes in the present struggle against the demon of militarism;

That we condemn as a deliberate and inhuman crime the sinking of the Lusitania and the employment by the Germans of other methods of warfare which are equally unjustifiable;

That we deplore the great loss of life entailed by the employment of such un-Christian methods, and we pledge ourselves anew to further assist Canada and the Empire in the task of destroying the military autocracy which has so long menaced the peace of the world;

And be it further resolved that copies of these resolutions be sent to His Worship Mayor N. D. Porter and to the city newspapers.

Signed by the vestry on behalf of the congregation,

Aug. Garske,
Fred. Kritsch,
Robt. A. W. Hupp.

Ottawa, May 17, 1915.

That is not all. My further information is that approximately fifty of these men enlisted and went overseas; that four have been killed in action; that two have died of wounds; that several others have enlisted and were later discharged as medically unfit. I am told also that no class of our citizens have contributed more frequently and more generously to patriotic and charitable objects connected with the war than this same group of German Canadians. It is natural that the men of this group who are to be disfranchised should be incensed against the Government. They ask: If our vote is to be taken away, if we are to be denied a voice in saying how and by whom Canada's participation in this war shall be conducted, then will the Government, after the war is over, also exempt us from taxation levied on account of the war? That is a question this Government will have to answer, and that is only one of the many different questions they will have to answer because of the introduction of the measure now before the House.

If this Bill is unjust in many respects, it is ludicrous in some others. Let me cite one of the latter kind. Section 3 of the Bill provides that:

> Any deputy returning officer, either of his own motion or at the request of any agent or scrutineer, after carefully explaining the meaning of paragraphs (g) and (h) of section 67 of this Act—

By way of parenthesis, I may say that I have seldom heard of a deputy returning officer who was competent to explain the provisions of a statute, and they will be less likely to be able to do it at this election because they will be appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite.

> —may put to any person claiming to vote at an election the following questions:
> "Are you a naturalized British subject who was born in an enemy country within the meaning of paragraph (g) of section 67 of the Dominion Elections Act; or who was born in Europe and whose natural language or mother tongue is a language of an enemy country, and, if you are either, when and where were you naturalized?"

Imagine the condition of the poor alien voter when such a question is fired at him. Subsection 2 says:

> If such person refuses to answer fully such questions, or by his manner shows that he was born in an enemy country—

Could folly further go?

Mr. PUGSLEY: His manner?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, the deputy returning officer is constituted a judge of manner. If the unfortunate voter should, for instance, have been so unlucky as to have eaten for breakfast something that did not agree with him and his countenance gave outward indication of inward pain, the deputy returning officer would be justified in saying that he was born in an enemy country and was, therefore, not entitled to vote. The possibilities under that section of the Bill are enormous. That provision of the Bill would do justice to the genius of a Barnaby Rudge.

As a last word, Mr. Speaker, as I have heard the tap of your gavel, I would like to emphasize the warning given to the Government by my hon. friend from Edmonton, the hon. member for Saskatoon and other hon. gentlemen representing western constituencies. The feelings of resentment aroused by such a Bill as this will not, as those hon. gentlemen have said, subside for a generation. A German chancellor once said that a certain treaty was but a "scrap of paper." By this Bill this Government proposes, in effect, to adopt that dictum as a basis for its legislation and to declare that all the treaties made by Canada with those citizens whom this Bill disfranchises were merely scraps of paper. To such a proposition no fair-minded Canadian can subscribe, and for that reason above all others, I intend to vote against this Bill.

Mr.. L. A. LAPOINTE (Montreal, St James): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much time of the House in expressing my opinion on the Bill now before us for consideration. The more this War-time Elections Act is studied, the more it seems to me—and it is admitted—that it ought to be called "The Voters' Manipulation Act," or "An Act of Expediency to Win an Election." For instance, I feel that to be the case when I see the sweeping disfranchisement of a great number of our law-abiding citizens. That will occur in the city of Montreal in which there are quite a number of those people who are accustomed to living with us, who pay their taxes and who are good citizens. They, however, will be deprived of their vote by whatever enumerator the Government may choose, at the proper time, to name. This Bill is going to do a great deal of injustice to those people. In Montreal, there are two or three divisions in which those law-abiding citizens consider they are entitled to and ought to have a right to vote. I am speaking specially for Montreal, because it seems to me that the city, of which I have the honour to represent a division, has the right to fair play, because in Montreal there are many of those people who are carrying on business and who are interested in industries of all kinds, and they should be encouraged instead of, as is being done by this Bill, discouraged by being deprived of the right to express their opinion as to who shall represent them. Why cannot the election take place just as well with the old lists, instead of leaving it in the power of one man in a division to select whom he likes, because when he comes on a name in the list that begins with a "K" or has the diphthong "œ" or the ending "vy" and so on, he may say that man must be a stranger, and immediately that man's name will be struck off. Who is going to be the judge of that? The enumerator. One can see the possibilities when one realizes how this gentleman will be appointed, and that, no doubt, he will not be a friend of the Liberal party. The Solicitor General said in regard to that class which he is going to disfranchise that, on the whole, it was a class of the population that had conducted itself in a satisfactory manner during the war, but immediately after he had given them a good character, he disfranchised them. I do not know what his idea is on that point. He said that it might be found undesirable to enlist them for combatant service. That is not the question before us at the present time. We find that he is wrong in that regard also, because many sons and other relatives of this class of our population are fighting in France for Canada to-day. We have not hesitated to make full use of such men and to accept their services, but it so happens that in various parts of western Canada—and this is the point I wish to make—there are constituencies in which naturalized aliens form the bulk of the population, and these constituencies have always had the natural habit of voting Liberal. The Government knows that, and particularly the Solicitor General. The Borden Government, therefore, hoists the Union Jack and declares that any man who would vote Liberal shall not be allowed to vote at all, if it can be prevented. Their idea is that it would be treason to allow a man who had been naturalized for a less period than fifteen years to say whether he would prefer a Liberal or a Conservative to represent him in Parliament. Fortunately the real issue in the coming election will not be patriotism versus treachery, but we can form an idea how the election will be fought from the way the Government puts forward this extraordinary franchise Bill. Let me give a brief quotation from the Morning Albertan:

> The Franchise Bill is one of the worst pieces of legislation ever brought to the attention of the Canadian Parliament. It is bad in principle, and scandalous in detail. It has no principle in fact, except that of giving an advantage to the party in power. It disregards sacred obligations made by the nation to loyal Canadians.

That is exactly my own idea. This Bill is framed to favour the Government in the West.

As to granting the vote to the mothers and wives and daughters and sisters of soldiers, there is nothing to grumble about. But why not have adult suffrage for all women in this Dominion? Is not the Government, in this Bill, casting a slur upon every woman who may not have a soldier relative? Such a woman is declared by this Bill to be unfit to exercise the franchise? Why is that? What is the reason for singling out a special class of women voters? Is not the Government's action in granting the vote to some women a frank recognition that woman suffrage must come? The Solicitor General the other day said that this provision was intended, "to give added strength to the vote of the soldiers of Canada." Does that mean that the votes of the rest of the women of Canada would not add strength to the vote of the soldiers? Why does the Government discriminate in this way? The rest of the women of Canada are just as ready to help in the cause as those who have soldier relatives at the front, and I do not see why they should be discriminated against. There is no precedent for such an extraordinary provision, which singles out a certain class of women and says that they shall have the right to vote, but no other women. So far as I am concerned, I would advocate the giving of the vote to all women. I am sorry that the Government, having gone this far, did not go all the way.

I am in receipt of a letter from the Quebec Provincial Woman's Christian Temperance Union, as follows:

> May 15, 1917.
> L. A. Lapointe, Esq., M.P.,
> Ottawa.
> Dear Sir,—On behalf of the Quebec Provincial Woman's Christian Temperance Union, composed of over 2,500 members, I am writing to ask you when the resolution re woman's franchise comes up in the House, that you will vote in its favour.
>
> Our organization since its formation in this province in 1883, has always stood for women having the vote, so that they may help in the success of our country.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> (Sgd.) E. W. McLachlan.

To which I replied as follows:

> May 22, 1917.
>
> Quebec Provincial Women's Christian Temperance Union, > Québec, P.Q.
> Madame,—
>
> I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 15th May inst., and in reply I would assure you that I will give that question all the consideration which it merits, so as to meet you views.
>
> I have the honour to be Madame,
> Yours truly,
> L. A. Lapointe.

The officers of the Quebec Provincial Women's Christian Temperance Union, who are all well known temperance workers, are as follows: Mrs. J. G. Sanderson, Danville, Que., hon. president; Mrs. F. H. Waycott, 31 Drummond street, Montreal, president; Mrs. John Ewing, Melbourne, Que., vice-president; Mrs. S. W. Foster, Knowlton, Que., hon. vice-president; Mrs. R. W. McLachlan, 310 Lansdowne ave.,

Westmount, Que., corresponding secretary; Miss E. H. Loudon, 289 Hingston ave., Montreal, recording secretary; Miss Mary Irene Bazin, Ormstown, Que., treasurer; Mrs. A. F. Leggatt, 141 Drummond street, Montreal, Y. secretary; Mrs. J. Mahon, 409 Burnside place, Montreal, L. T. L. secretary.

I have read this letter with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, because it represents the views of many similar associations in the city of Montreal, some of them French associations. The hon. member for Montreal, St. Mary's (Mr. Martin) has stated that he has received delegations from French-Canadian organizations. I also have received many, to whom I promised that I would give particular attention to their requests. For instance, the Quebec Provincial Woman's Christian Temperance Union has urged me to support votes for women not simply on behalf of the soldiers, but for the women of Canada generally.

I feel I must register my protest. I regret the Government has not seen fit to avail itself of the opportunity of giving the franchise to all the women of the country. I do not think the Government should be jealous that we on this side are in favour of that principle. Let the Government bring it forward and we will not oppose it in any way. I have not heard any hon. gentleman opposite approving of this principle, although at one time the Prime Minister told us woman suffrage was coming. It is coming now, but with discrimination. The franchise is given to one class, but the other class is slurred. The more legislation brought before us, the more audacious the Government seems to become. They are bringing forward all kinds of measures although they know perfectly well that this Administration is in existence only as the result of an agreement entered into between the two parties a year ago. They are prepared to stop at nothing. As I said on a former occasion, they appear to be under the impression that after them will come the deluge.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): I did not intend to take part in this debate, but after hearing some of the speeches and the explanations of this measure, I thought it was my duty to protest in the name of the women of my constituency, as well as in the name of the few aliens there, who will be disfranchised. I was never a very warm advocate of woman suffrage. When the subject came before the House last year, I spoke against the granting of the vote to women. But if we adopt the principle of giving them the vote, I do not think Parliament should stop at giving it to women who are relatives of soldiers and not grant the same privilege to women in the provinces which have already adopted woman suffrage. Earlier in the session the Prime Minister criticised the position taken by my right hon. leader, who wanted woman suffrage to be extended only to the provinces where they had been given the franchise by the provincial legislature. The Prime Minister expressed the opinion that all the women of Canada should have the franchise. Now, however, he has departed from that policy, and wants to restrict the franchise to the relatives of soldiers. I admit that the relatives of soldiers deserve the right to vote, and I am in favour of granting it to them, but as some of my hon. colleagues have already said, there are many women in this country who have done great work for the war, in the way of knitting socks for the soldiers and other patriotic work—we have frequently seen ladies in the galleries of this House, knitting socks for the soldiers while listening to the debates—and do you not think, Sir, that these ladies should have the right to vote? They spend their days and part of their nights, working for the soldiers. Not all the women of this country are blessed with sons who could be sent to the front, but are they not deserving of the consideration of this Parliament, and are they not deserving of the right to vote? Would they not exercise the franchise as intelligently as those who have relatives at the front? This measure is discriminatory. It is not fair. It is not a British measure. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State have told us that in this measure the Government is adopting the provincial franchise. That statement is not entirely correct, because in five of the provinces the franchise has been given to women by the provincial legislatures, irrespective of whether they have relatives at the front or not, whereas this measure restricts it to women who have relatives at the front. This measure also departs from the provincial franchise in the preparation of the lists. According to our electoral law, we use the provincial lists, which are made by the municipal officers who are impartial and independent of party politics. By this measure the lists made by the municipal officers are to be only partially adopted. The lists will be partly made by enumerators who will be appointed by the Government who will be partisans of the Government and who will have large discretionary powers. They may refuse to place men on the lists on the pretext that they are aliens, or that their mother tongue may be alien, whereas the main reason for leaving them off is that these enumerators may suspect they will cast their votes for the Liberal candidate.

Mr. NICKLE: They have an appeal, have they not?

Mr. PROULX: There is no appeal. There are appeals in regard to the lists made in cities and county and district towns of over 9,000 population, but in the other municipalities, which are in the majority, there is no appeal. The list made by the enumerator will be final, although, if a man is not on the list, he can go to the polling booth and cast his vote if he is prepared to swear he was omitted from the list and has the right to vote. You know, Mr. Speaker, that persons who are not on the list would not care to go through the ordeal of taking an oath in order to be entitled to cast their votes. In any event, even if they do vote, it does not count until it is established before the judge that they had the right to vote. It is only on a recount that these votes would be counted. Austrians, Germans, and others from enemy countries or whose mother tongue is that of an enemy country may have come here years ago. They came at the invitation of the Government. They have settled in our Northwest, they have cultivated the land and developed the country, they have taken their naturalization papers and have been assured that they will be granted the privileges of British citizenship. These people have not been guilty of any sedition or disloyalty. If they were, certainly this Parliament would have the right, and would have more than the right, the duty, to deprive them of the franchise.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) say that the Germans of Ontario, as a rule, were disloyal. I think that my hon. friend has exaggerated the situation. There may be a few who are disloyal. But if he got a frigid reception at one patriotic meeting, that does not say that they are disloyal or guilty of sedition. We say that blood is thicker than water. Their blood is not British blood or French blood; their blood is the blood of people who are at war with France and England. The hon. member cited one particular instance, but we must not judge a whole nationality by one instance.

Besides depriving those people of their franchise, I maintain that this Act is going to create disunion and discord in this country. Even the people who are not deprived of their franchise, because they were naturalized before 1902, will resent the insult which is offered to them by this measure. This is a disrupting measure. May I quote, to substantiate my statement, an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe of last Saturday. The Toronto Globe is not very partial to the Liberal party. For some time it has favoured the Government rather than the Opposition. It has supported the Government very strongly on the Military Service Bill and other measures since the beginning of the session. The Globe says:

A Disruptive Measure.

The War-Time Election Act is a surrender on the part of the Government to the machine element of the party. It strengthens the suspicion that manipulation of the franchise is a punishment for those western Liberals who refused to enter a National Government under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden. It is asserted that when the western men were in Ottawa the Prime Minister told them that any Act of disfranchisement would be personally repugnant to him. But, as in many other instances, he has been too weak to withstand the pressure from certain of his colleagues.

As a practical means of winning a Federal election the Act is futile and clumsy. The last census showed that the proportion of Canada's voting population designated as "foreign-born" was only 6.62 per cent in 1911. The influx of settlers into the country since then, and the efflux of English-speaking men during the past three years of war, possibly may have increased that proportion to ten per cent, and only a portion of this number is of enemy origin. For the sake of eliminating a fraction of the total vote the Government would inflict a gross injustice on law-abiding members of the community.

The Act proposes to disfranchise two classes of people in Canada. All conscientious objectors to the war would be prevented from voting at the next general election, and all citizens of alien enemy birth or near extraction. That means that German Mennonites and the Doukhobors would be ruled out in the first class, and probably the members of the Society of Friends, whose loyalty has never been questioned, and that all the Ruthenians, Austrians, Hungarians, and Germans who live in the northerly districts of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba would largely compose the second class.

Few of the German population of the West have come directly from Germany to Canada. The majority of them have been classed among the immigrants who have crossed over the line from the United States. One-third of the so-called American settlers in the West are of Teutonic origin. Many of them, although born in Austria or Germany had become thoroughly Americanized before coming to this country, but they are disfranchised in the present Bill.

At no time since the war began have the Austrian or German people of the West given the authorities any trouble. The very act of disfranchising those foreigners who have been naturalized, especially the Ruthenians, who have entered most generally into the political life of the West, will tend to solidify them, and even arouse hostility towards constituted authority. This Act will make enemies out of thousands of men and women who have become Canadians in spirit and outlook. The mere loss of their ballots will not mean much to one political party or the other, but the enactment of a hostile law by the Government of Canada, which made a contract of citizenship with them when they entered the country, will create a potential animosity which the Dominion can ill-afford to invite.

The Dominion Government has thrust the responsibility of making Canadians out of the new peoples from other countries upon the provinces. In the case of the young provinces of the West that duty has been particularly onerous during the past twelve years. Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were confronted with the problem of assimilating the hordes of new settlers which descended upon them between the years 1902 and 1914. The coming of the war stopped the influx of new citizens from Europe, and made a breathing spell in which the West was able to recover itself from the rush of immigration days. The schools, colleges and universities of the West have done great work in meeting the urgent national demand for education. On the other hand, the different nationalities from Europe have had a beneficial effect upon the life of the western plains. Professor W. C. Murray of the University of Saskatchewan, in an address at Saskatoon two years ago, said: "The life of this province is being greatly enriched by the artistic, literary and musical gifts which they and their people are bringing to us. We of Canadian birth do not realize to the full how much Saskatchewan owes to European culture. Every musical festival, each convention, be it grain growers, homemakers or municipalities, but deepens the conviction that their high character is due to the training and culture of Britain and the continent of Europe." Interference at this time with the important process of assimilation, which is being directed so conscientiously by the educationists of the western provinces, will do untold injury to the life of the whole Dominion.

The proposed disfranchisement Act is also a breach with the best traditions of the British Empire. Let the politicians at Ottawa take their cue on this question from that great patriot, General Smuts, whose speeches stirred London so deeply last spring. Speaking on the future of South Africa, he set down the soundest of Imperial principles when he said: "We want to create a blend out of various nationalities. We want to create a new nation, and that is the South African nation. If we succeed in doing that we shall achieve a nation not standing on one leg, but on various legs. We shall have a nation which will embrace various traits. You will have a people all blending into one. It is only by bringing about a union like that, and by making the different racial types of people work together, respect each other, co-operate with each other, and understand each other, that you will bring into being a unanimous people which will take the broadest and largest view of the problems with which it is confronted."

In this fiftieth anniversary of Confederation it would be a poor monument indeed to place among the laws of Canada, one which would be calculated to subvert rather than perpetuate the idea of a Canadian nationality.

I submit that the character of this measure cannot be better characterized than by this article of the Globe. This Bill also deprives the conscientious objectors of the right to vote. These people, Mennonites and Dukhobors, came here on the invitation of the Government. They had objections to military service, and left their countries of origin on account of military service, and they were granted this privilege by Orders in Council passed by the Government in 1873 and 1898. And now this Government wants to break faith with these people and to deprive them of their vote. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) does not seem to take great interest in this measure; he seems to have left it entirely in the charge of the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen), which leads me to believe that this measure is brought into this House for the purpose of wresting the West from the Liberal party, and preventing a majority of Liberal members from being elected in the western provinces. The Government know that if they want to stay in power they must get a majority in the West. They know that Quebec will give a strong majority for the Liberal party, as Ontario may give a strong majority for the Conservative party, that the Maritime Provinces together may give a majority to the Liberal party, and if the Government want to stay in power they must certainly get a majority in the western provinces. The larger number of aliens reside in those provinces, and the Government wants to prevent those people from voting for the Liberals, as a large number of them have done in the past. Those people have not been guilty of any sedition or disloyalty, and some of them, according to the statements of my hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) and my hon. friend from Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) contributed largely to the Patriotic Fund, some of their sons have gone to the front, and some have offered their services, but have been refused. A great many of these people, Galicians, Ruthenians and Bukowinians, are Slavs and are not of Teutonic origin. Their sympathies are with Russia and the Allies in this war, rather than with the Central Powers.

Although only a few in my constituency will be deprived of their votes, I thought it was my duty to protest. Even if one of my constituents were deprived of his vote, I would be lacking in my duty if I did not rise and protest against the measure, which I can only characterize as un-British. There was a war in South Africa seventeen years ago, and this country sent seven or eight thousand soldiers to that country, and spent half a million dollars to vindicate for the British subjects in South Africa the right to exercise their franchise. When the Government of the Transvaal wanted to deprive the British subjects who had resided there for twenty years of their right to vote, England declared war against the President of the Transvaal, and the colonies came to the rescue. England spent hundreds of millions of dollars, and many thousands of British soldiers died on the field of battle, and some hundreds of Canadian soldiers lost their lives, only to vindicate the right of British subjects to exercise the franchise. Now they want to disfranchise citizens who came here fifteen years ago, who have been loyal to the British flag, and it is only for one purpose—to get them back into power.

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): Since the stirring incidents of Saturday evening, I have had occasion to read over in French and English the Bill which is at present before the House, and the principle of which we are discussing upon the second reading. I have searched in that Bill to find a good point, and have been unable to find any. I find that the Bill as drafted is an insult to British loyalty, and to the great majority of the people of Canada. First, it is an insult to the majority of the people of Canada because this Government, in introducing this Bill, brands a certain portion of our population as absolutely disloyal to the Crown: they have served faithfully and well for the past 15 years. The Secretary of State, in introducing the Bill at page 5725 of the Unrevised Hansard said, speaking at that time of the aliens who are naturalized citizens of Canada, and who are being deprived of their vote:

> Not only is it unfair to them that they should be asked to decide the destiny and the vigour of a war against their brothers in Europe, but it is unfair to the rest of the population that they should have the right to so decide.

How could they, by their vote, decide the vigour of the war which is being waged against their brothers, unless, Mr. Speaker, that statement means that in voting for a Liberal candidate and the Liberal party they will be doing less for the British Empire and for the war than if they voted for our good friends on the other side of the House? What right has the Secretary of State, or any man in this House, to brand the Liberal party as disloyal? Have not our members on this side of the House given just as freely and just as willingly of their sons, and of their flesh and blood, to the defence of the Empire?

Mr. LALOR: No?

Mr. BOIVIN: Have not the Liberals from one end of Canada to the other enlisted just as freely as the Conservatives? Do hon. members on the other side contend that the Conservatives are the only people who have enlisted in this war? The difference between the two parties is this; that if the Liberal party is returned to power during the coming election, the war will be continued as it has been waged since the beginning. The soldiers of Canada will be members of a volunteer army fighting with vigour and enthusiasm, boys who are willing to fight for their King and country, and if the Conservative party is returned to power, what shall we see? We shall see a conscript army where you will have to be prodding the soldier in the back with a sword to make him fight. That is the difference between the two parties. The policy of the Liberal party has been laid down and published in the press of this country, under the signature of my right hon. leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who tells us, not that he wishes to relax in any way the part that Canada is taking in this war, but that he desires to consult the Mother Country, and to apply the energies of Canada in the way which will do the most good to the Mother Country. He promises a vigourous recruiting campaign, and he assures the people of Canada and of the Empire at large that Canada will maintain her position in this war as a free and autonomous colony of the British Empire. The Liberals cannot be branded as disloyal. They have contributed generously to the Patriotic Fund, to all the different relief funds which have been working throughout the country, and it is from the Liberal side of this House that the statement has been made, and that motions have been made which have been turned down by the other side, that the people of Canada, as a whole, and the Government of Canada should not rely on public charity to look after the welfare of the wives aand children of soldiers who are fighting for us on the other side of the ocean, but that this patriotic duty should be performed by the Government itself. I feared that I misunderstood the Secretary of State, and I kept on reading his remarks.

I find the following words a few lines further down.

> It is because of the reasons I have mentioned, namely, that those who cannot in the nature of things be absolutely divorced in sympathy or sentiment from the peoples from whom they come should not be permitted, in justice to the rest of the population, to exercise a measure of control over the destinies of the war against those peoples, because it would be unfair to them to ask them to go to the polls and vote on an issue which decides to a degree the vigour, the purpose and the destiny of that war.

I dissent emphatically from that statement. I find coupled with that another statement, as follows:

It is also because war service should be the basis of war franchise. The two should go hand in hand—the obligation and the privilege.

The hon. gentleman says that war service should be the basis of war franchise; war service by whom? If he had said that war service in so far as the elector is concerned, should be the basis of war franchise, I would agree with him. But that is not the position which he takes. He does not say that the women of Canada who have worked faithfully during three or four years, day and night, knitting socks for the soldiers, collecting funds for the patriotic and red cross work, are entitled to the vote. No; that is not service in the eyes of the Secretary of State. What he considers to be service is to stay at home, draw money from the Patriotic Fund, draw money from the Government, spend the separation allowance—and then vote; that is what he considers to be service. He bases the franchise of the woman who remains at home on the service of the soldier who has gone across the ocean and is fighting on the other side for Canada and the Empire. He ignores the service which is rendered here at home. He ignores the service rendered by the wife of the munition worker—the man who for the past two or three years has been going day in and day out to these munition plants, where the gases, which have practically ruined vegetation for miles around, have the same effect upon the human system as they have upon nature—he ignores the services of the wife who ministered daily to the wants of the husband as he came home from the munition plant, being well aware that he was dying a slow death for Canada and for the Empire. Yet this woman is to be deprived of the vote, and this man who is working in the munition factory will be deprived of the vote if he happens to be an alien who became naturalized in Canada within the last fifteen years.

The member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) brought up what he considered to be a new phase of the question; he gave us a definition of the word "nationals." The Conservative party always have to be coupled up with some other organization. When it is not the nationals, it is the Nationalists; when it is not the Nationalists, it is the nationals. To-day they are coupling themselves up with the nationals. What, after all, is the definition of a national? A man who is naturalized here in Canada? A man who is the possessor of a Canadian naturalization certificate? No; a man who can be obliged to go and fight on the other side; a man who will perform active military service. If the Government wish to be consistent, why do they not disfranchise every man who is too old to fight? These aliens who have been in this country since 1902 have done their share in this war. They have contributed very generously in certain cities of Canada to Patriotic and Red Cross Funds and to the Belgian Relief Fund; those who have not contributed in that way have felt the pinch of the high cost of living due to the war. After paying directly and indirectly for several years their share of taxation for the carrying on of the war, they are told that they have not the right to vote. The Government borrowed every dollar they could raise in Canada at five per cent; then they crossed to the United States and paid six per cent to the Americans, to get money to pay the interest charges on the money which they had borrowed at home. The aliens in Canada of alien birth are helping to pay these charges: yet they are not to have the right to vote. Where is the good old British motto of "No taxation without representation?" These men are being taxed, yet they are to have no right to decide who shall govern this country. What about the statement concerning "the scrap of paper?" When we entered this war Liberals and Conservatives alike on recruiting platforms in the province of Quebec—and I dare say in every part of Canada—referred often to the action of the German Government in violating the neutrality of Belgium; of tearing up the treaty of years gone by, which was considered by them as a mere "scrap of paper." What about the promises made to these aliens who came into Canada in 1902—promises made by the Minister of the Interior in every administration, by the present leader of the Opposition when he was Prime Minister, by the present Prime Minister? According to the promises made, these people were to enjoy the privileges of British subjects in Canada. The present leader of the Opposition has kept his word; he is respecting his promise; he is voting and acting accordingly in the House of Commons. But because it suits the convenience of hon. gentlemen opposite to deprive these people of their votes; because they fear that they may vote for the Liberal party; because they fear that these people will consider that they can obtain more economic advantages in this country by voting for the Liberal party, the Government will deprive them of the vote. They might well have reflected: We have done so many things which were wrong; we have spent the money of the people so ruthlessly since we have been in power, that we feel sure, even though we deprive these aliens of their votes, that we shall still not have enough votes to win the election; we will, therefore, give votes to the soldiers, not only to the Canadian soldiers, but to those who never lived in Canada, never paid a cent of taxation in Canada, and do not know anything about the administration of this country. They are fighting for the Allies, the same as the British, French and American soldiers; but they happen to be enlisted in the Canadian army, and we will give them the right to vote; we will give them the right to put their votes where they want to put them, in whatever constituency they may choose; but we will take the vote from the alien who has paid taxes for years.

It is evident that the purpose of bringing down this legislation was not that of winning the war, but that of winning the forthcoming election. The proof of that is the statement which I have already referred to, that service should be the basis of war franchise, and that war service should be interpreted as relationship with the soldier who happens to be fighting for us on the other side of the ocean. If that is the way service is to be measured, it is only fair to argue that the sister who happens to have two brothers fighting on the other side of the ocean should have two votes, because she is giving more service to the country than the sister who has only one.

Another conclusion would, perhaps, be that those who have given their sons in death to the Emplre, whose sons have sacrificed their lives for their King and country, should have more votes than those whose relatives have come back with only one arm or with only one hand. That would be a logical conclusion, if we are going to accept the argument taken by the Solicior General, who says that service is to be the basis. If service of the man overseas is to be the basis and not the service of the person at home, it would be just as logical to say that the minor children of the soldiers should vote—I am frank to say that it will require the votes of the minor children to win this election for the Conservative party, and I am very much surprised that this provision has not been included in the Bill. The Government were anxious enough to include anything and everything. Why did they not include in the Bill a provision by which the minor children of our soldiers could vote, and by which the Conservative local candidate would be appointed tutor to those minor children to see that they voted right? That would be about as reasonable as the Bill which is now before us. That is not all. People, if their names do not happen to be upon the list as made by the enumerator of the Conservative party, must take an oath that they have a right to vote. I am afraid the Solicitor General has made a mistake in drawing up the formula of the oath that appears in this Bill. He should have stipulated that a man, before he is given the right to vote, must solemnly swear and affirm that he will vote for the Conservative party. That has not been done. It should have been done; otherwise I fear the Conservative party, by introducing this measure, will be hurting the fair name of Canada by discouraging immigration for years after the war without doing any good to itself and certainly without doing any good to our common country.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): The hour is late, but there are a few minutes left to us before the guillotine will fall and we shall be deprived of the liberty of further expressing our views on the second reading of this Bill. I desire to give notice that before the conclusion of my remarks, I shall move, seconded by Mr. Sinclair,

That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House it is not desirable, as provided by the said Bill, to disfranchise large numbers of the people of Canada who have taken the oath of allegiance, have been guaranteed the rights of citizenship in the name of His Majesty the King, and who have not failed to discharge all the obligations of citizenship.

And further that it be resolved that any measure granting the franchise only to a limited number of women, as proposed by the Bill, is contrary to the public interest and fails to recognize the splendid patriotic work which has been performed by the women of Canada generally during the present war.

There are one or two matters with which I should like to deal, and more especially with the observation of my hon. friend the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), who put forward the extraordinary proposition that there was no obligation whatever upon the part of the Government, as representing His Majesty the King, either to confer or to continue the right of franchise upon British subjects who had become such by reason of their having been naturalized. I was surprised at that statement of my hon. friend. In support of it he quoted certain language of one of the Lord Justices of England, but I am quite sure that that language must have been used with reference to a statute of the province of British Columbia whose authority was then in question; because, so far as the Parliament of Canada is concerned, no one would ever question its legal authority to take away from any citizen of Canada the right to exercise his franchise. That is within the power of Parliament, just as a provincial legislature in the exercise of the exclusive power conferred upon it by the British North American Act can deprive a citizen of his property without any compensation. But that I would say would be tyrannical, an arbitrary and an unjustifiable exercise of its power; no one would say that it was just or equitable for a provincial legislature, though it may have the power to do so, to deprive a man of his property without compensation. Now all that we say here is that the Parliament of Canada passed a law under which it provided certain means by which an alien may become a British subject, and it provides that when the conditions of naturalization are all fulfilled, by residence, by the necessary affidavits, and by the action of the court after public notice, the alien who so becomes a British subject becomes entitled to all the political and other rights, powers and privileges which belong to a natural-born British subject. Those are the words of the statute. Section 24 of the Naturalization Act, Chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, says:

> An alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall, within Canada, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada.

What words could be stronger or more emphatic? My hon. friend from Calgary seemed to distinguish in some way between political rights and the right of franchise. But Parliament does not limit the right of the naturalized British subject to political rights, but gives to him all the political rights, powers and privileges of a natural-born British subject. Now when these citizens of Canada became naturalized, they became British subjects within Canada with the same rights, powers and privileges, and subject to the same obligations, as natural-born British subjects. That is the privilege which the Canadian Government and the Canadian Parliament have held out to all people in all parts of the world. They have said through their legislation, if you come to Canada and qualify by reason of residence, and by the authority of the Court before which you appear you become a naturalized British subject, then in the future no distinction will be made between you and the man who is a natural-born British subject. Surely, Mr. Speaker, when the certificate of naturalization was given to these citizens declaring that they should have under the Canadian statute all the political and all the other rights, powers, and privileges which a natural-born British subject enjoys within Canada, that was a promise, a guarantee of the rights of citizenship, which ought not to be taken away so long as a naturalized citizen discharges the obligations which he assumed under section 24 of the statute, namely, that he should bear all the obligations borne by a natural-born British subject.

Now it is not pretended that these citizens whom it is proposed to disfranchise have not performed their obligations, but it is said that as they are exempted from military service, therefore it is in the interest of the State that the franchise should be taken away from them. That might be an argument if these men had come and asked this Parliament to exempt them from military service, but they have asked nothing of the kind.

No evidence has been submitted to this House of any desire on their part for military exemption, but this disfranchisement applies to every one of these naturalized military subjects who are above military age, and who are exempt from military service. Let me ask you, Sir, in the name of justice and fairplay, if, because you exempt from military service a young man between twenty and thirty-five, residing in Canada, it is any justification to take away the franchise from thousands upon thousands of men of the same race who are upwards of the age of thirty-five who cannot be called upon under the Military Service Act to perform military duty. Where is the justification for it? Is it not all a pretense when those gentlemen come before this House and say that is the ground upon which they put it? If that is the ground, why did they not limit the disfranchisement to those young men of alien enemy origin who are exempted specially by the statute from military service? Surely these men, who have reached the age of thirty-five years and are given the guarantee of all the rights, political and otherwise which appertain to the natural-born British subjects, are entitled to retain their franchise just the same as British-born subjects who have attained the age of thirty-five, in neither case is there any liability for military service, both classes are by law British subjects, the one is a natural-born British subject the other is a naturalized British subject. They are both declared by law to have the same political rights, powers, and privileges. And so I ask you upon what principle of justice shall one be treated differently from the other? I say it is all a pretense, and I shall tell you why I say so. There was an assurance—and I have every reason to believe it because I have it on very high authority—that if our western Liberal friends who were in favour of conscription would come in and help to form a union government this measure of disfranchisement would not be introduced. I have the proof in the procedure before this Parliament, and it is that there was no exemption of those naturalized British subjects in the Military Service Act. They were to be liable to serve, just as the British-born were liable to serve, but when the union government fell through, after the piteous appeals which those gentlemen upon the other side were making to our Liberal friends in the West, confessing to them in effect that they had so lost the confidence of the people that they felt they could not successfully carry on the war, and urging and beseeching our Liberal friends in the West especially to join them in the formation of a union government, they come down with this disfranchisement Bill and put in this Bill relating to the franchise the extraordinary provision, which they omitted entirely from the Military Service Act, exempting those naturalized British subjects from military service. They put it in this Franchise Bill because the Military Service Act had passed before the union government scheme had fallen through. Then they propose to disfranchise this large class of citizens, and in order to make it appear that there was some justification for it, they exempt a portion of these men from military service. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman sitting upon the treasury benches, and the hon. gentlemen behind them who have forced them in caucus to bring down this measure, have been justly charged with the fact that this Bill is to enable them to win an election. Some gentlemen of the Government say: "Well, suppose that is so; if it is we are proud of it, if it is likely to enable us to win an election." Well, a burglar may try to break in and steal, and he may be foiled in his purpose, and so gentlemen who would steal an election from the honest voters of the country may be foiled in their purpose. The only offence charged against these people is that the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches think they are actuated by Liberal principles. Liberalism means liberty and freedom, and when the people realize the attempt which is being made to commit a great outrage upon a most deserving portion of the population, I think they will resent it and punish those who are the authors of such an infamous measure. In the election the Italian navvy working on the railroad or working in the trenches will have a vote, but the men out on the western prairie, the naturalized British subjects, who are affected by this Bill, who came to our western country nineteen years ago—because this Bill goes back that far—settling in the province of Saskatchewan, out upon the lonely prairie, in a district where there was no railroad, no hamlet, a long distance from all the comforts of civilization, those men who have spent the best part of their lives there building up homes for themselves and their families, and who have taken a splendid part in producing what is needed for the Empire during this war, are deprived of their vote. Those men who have real substance in the country, men who have been working to build up the country are to have no right to say how the country shall be governed during the next five years.

My hon. friends upon the other side try to make the country believe that this is but a war-time measure, only to last during the war. Have they put in this Bill a clause that there shall be a dissolution of Parliament after the war is over? Not much. If they are elected under this Bill, they will be able to hold office for five years after the election, and will be able to administer all the general affairs of the country, whether arising out of the war, or connected with the war, or otherwise.

Let me call your attention to the provision of the Bill referred to in this proposed amendment, the provision relating to women. The amendment I propose moving declares that any measure granting the franchise only to a limited number of women, as proposed in the Bill, is contrary to the public interest and fails to recognize the splendid patriotic work which has been performed by the women engaged generally during the present war. I desire to express my entire agreement with hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House, as well as upon the other side, who have said it is eminently proper that the near relatives of those who have gone to the front should receive the franchise in the coming election. But, let us consider, for a moment, upon what it is based. It is not, and cannot be, based upon the service which is given by men at the front. If it were, as my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Boivin) pointed out, the vote could not be given equally. I instance a case which comes within my own knowledge. A very dear friend of mine has three boys who have been at the front since the war broke out. These boys have only one sister, only one female relative. It would not be fair, as the hon. member for Shefford has said, that there should be only one vote to represent those three boys. I know another case of one man who has gone to the front, and whose six or seven female relatives will have votes under this Act. Surely if the franchise was given on the theory that it is for the service of men at the front, that would be a very unequal representation, because in the one case there are seven ladies voting representing one man, and in another one lady representing three men. Sir, it is based and must be based upon the service which the women themselves have rendered to this country, based upon the sacrifices which they have made in parting from their sons, their husbands, their brothers. It must be based upon service, and it can be based upon nothing else. Their service to the country has been great. Their sacrifice has been great, and every member will agree that it is manifestly proper that their services should be recognized and they should be given the vote. But while that is true, is it just that the women of the country who have performed such splendid service during this war should be deprived of the opportunity equally with the others of saying how this country shall be governed for the next five years? Upon what ground is it based? The women generally of this country have, as my proposed amendment states, performed splendid service. Will it be said that they have not shown that they are entitled to the franchise just as much as the men of this country are entitled to it? Can it be based upon the ground that the issues in the next election are simply to be issues connected with the war? I saw the other day that a prominent gentleman in British Columbia took that ground. He referred to the Canadian Northern Railway Bill at a public meeting, and said that in ordinary times the action of the Government in putting that Bill before Parliament would induce the people to say that they had brought ignominy and shame and disgrace upon this country; but, he said, because the war is on I must vote for them and support them. But that is not going to be the view the people of this country generally will take. They will say that the boys at the front must be supported; that every possible effort should be made to win the war. But the question will be, who will take part in the governing of the country to enable the war to be won? Many questions will come up for the consideration of the electorate; some will take one side, others the other side. And let me say to my hon. friends that they must not expect the people, the electors at large, will not desire to take all these questions into consideration. They will look, and properly look, at the way in which this Government has managed the affairs of this country, both matters connected with the war and other matters of administration, during the years they have been in power, and will determine whether or not it is in the best interests of the country to longer entrust the administration to their hands.

You say I have but one minute longer, Mr. Speaker? I shall avail myself of that one minute to say that I think it is a most reprehensible thing that, on a matter of such enormous importance as the disfranchising of thousands and thousands of the electors of this country, the conferring of the franchise upon a portion of the women of this country, we should have, on the very first day of the discussion upon the second reading of this Bill, the application of the closure, so that reasonable and fair opportunity for discussing this measure is refused. The question is so important that a very much larger time ought to be given to it. The people of this country are entitled to be informed. Hon. gentlemen think that because we cannot convince them we have no right to speak. I trust that, through the press, our voices will go beyond be heard by the great court of the nation, tne court to which hon. gentlemen opposite and we must soon appeal and submit our case. And I ask, is it not contrary to all reason and fair play to the people of this country that a measure of this enormous importance should be pressed through by closure on the very day succeeding the motion for the second reading, which is the first opportunity given in this Parliament for a full and fair discussion? Is it treating the people of this country fairly? I submit that it is not. This country is many thousand miles in extent. There are, I venture to say, thousands of people in Canada who have not yet heard of the contents of this Bill; men engaged upon the farms, men who receive their newspapers only weekly, men who have many other subjects to engage their attention. It takes days for them to learn what is going on in this Parliament, even to learn what is going on, to say nothing of getting particulars of the proposed legislation.

I will not trespass for one single instant upon the time of the House; but I desire to say that I do believe, and I think it will be the verdict of the people of this country, that never in the history of Canada has there been, and I trust that never again in the history of Canada will there be, a measure so unjust, a measure so objectionable in its character, a measure so incapable of defence from every reasonable standpoint, as the measure which is now before the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX and Sir GEORGE FOSTER having risen together:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Rouville asked if I would see him next, and I have to do so.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): This measure is certainly the most important that has come up before Parliament for many years, and, as my friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has just said, it means the disfranchising of thousands and thousands of Canadians, full-fledged British subjects. I only regret that we have to discuss this question at this late hour and under such circumstances. Some years ago, in reading an account of the sinking of the Titanic in mid-ocean, I was struck with the last words uttered by the captain of the ship. Those who were saved on that memorable night said that they heard the voice of the captain telling his crew: Be British. These were the last words uttered by that gallant captain, so the confines of this room and that we shall faithful to the best traditions of Great Britain on the sea. Sir, it seems to me that the captain of the ship of state could give us to-day some words of the same nature. But as I see the Tory ship sinking on the eve of a general election, I am afraid that the voice of the captain is uttering other words than those of the gallant captain of the Titanic. He is telling his crew to be Prussians and to be Hunnish. This measure is most unjust, most unfair, and most ungenerous. A Bill such as this would delight the heart of any junker in Germany. It would be hailed with pleasure, with enthusiasm by General Caranza or, if he were living, by General Huerta, in Mexico.

We have been told this afternoon, in very eloquent terms, the causes of the war in South Africa. The hon. gentleman from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) told us what happened in the Boer republic when the franchise was refused to the British subjects. I had intended to quote from the first chapter of the book which had a great circulation at the time of the declaration of war against the Boer republic, entitled "The Transvaal from Within," by Sir Percy Fitzpatrick. I shall not quote from it, because my hon. friend gave us the causes of the war in South Africa and the reasons why men from all parts of the British Empire went to South Africa, in order to stand by the men of British birth who were refused their rights by the President of the Boer republic. Let me, however, quote the memorial signed by the president of the Reform Committee in the Transvaal Republic. The great grievance, indeed the most conspicuous grievance, of the British subject in the Transvaal was the refusal by the Boer Government of the franchise. The memorial says:

> Our great effort, however, was the petition for the franchise with the moderate terms of which you are all acquainted. The petition was signed by more than 38,000 persons. What was the result? We were called unfaithful for not naturalizing ourselves when naturalization means only that we should give up our original citizenship and get nothing in return, and become subject to disabilities.

Further on the memorial says:

> We have now only two questions to consider:—

Says Mr. Leonard, chairman of the Transvaal National Union, summing up the grievances of the British subjects:

> —(a) What do we want? (b) How shall we get it? I have stated plainly what our grievances are, and I shall answer with equal directness the question, "What do we want?" We want: The establishment of this republic as a true republic; (2) a Grondwet or constitution which shall be framed by competent persons selected by representatives of the whole people and framed on lines laid down by them —a constitution which shall be safeguarded against hasty alteration; (3) an equitable franchise law, and fair representation; (4) equality of the Dutch and English languages.

Sir, in South Africa the British subjects, being refused their franchise, revolted and called the Britons from all parts of the British Empire to come to their rescue, and they came to the rescue for that very purpose. I remember the occasion when the resolution was presented to the House of Commons. I was then one of the budding members of that Chamber. I had been elected in 1896, and that resolution was presented by the then Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and seconded by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in 1897. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) quoted from the speech delivered by the then Prime Minister of Canada the resolution which was adopted unanimously by the members of the House. But there is another speech which should arrest the attention of the hon. gentlemen who sit at your right, Mr. Speaker, the members who belong to the Orange lodges. I remember the speech delivered on that occasion by one of the most eminent of the Orange leaders in Canada. I refer to the late Clarke Wallace, father of the present member for Centre York, who used the following language:

British subjects have been deprived of the rights of citizenship which Great Britain has given in every land where her flag has waved. We in Canada have given a conspicuous example of that because here the fullest measure of freedom and liberty has been given to those who are not British born. We may perhaps say that greater freedom has been given by Great Britain than by any other nation to those not native born, because we have been examples of the great liberality with the most successful and satisfactory results. I desire to add my word of commendation to the resolution proposed by the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Here is the language of a gentleman who, in his day and generation, was the most eminent member of the Orange Order, and he stood in his place in Parliament and supported the leader of the Government and his friend the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). He stood by them, because the franchise had been refused the British-born in South Africa by Paul Kruger. I wish that the men who belong to the Orange lodges would follow in the footsteps of the late Clarke Wallace, and remember the timely words he uttered on that historic occasion.

The present Government sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, is only there on sufferance. The life of this Parliament has been extended, and I regret, Mr. Speaker, having assented to that extension. I was under the impression that that extension was granted last year to carry on the war, as was stated at the time, but what has happened? The Government, despite the pledges that were given by its members, forced through, first, a conscription measure, thus sowing the seed of disunion amongst a united people. The Government has—how shall I say it—Siftonized a deal of stupendous magnitude by this Canadian Northern transaction, adding six hundred millions to the national debt of Canada. And now the Government comes at the end of this session with a Bill, not of enfranchisement, but of disfranchisement, making of the most solemn pledges and of our naturalization laws so many "scraps of paper," so that, at the next general election, Hun-like, yes, Kaiser-like, they may hack their way through the constituencies of Canada. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) expressed surprise that closure had been used on this occasion. I am not surprised that closure has been adopted. The instrument is worthy of the occasion. This is class legislation, and reactionary legislation. The Tory Government is reverting to mediæval times, when foreigners were only tolerated in so-called civilized countries, and were hardly recognized as human beings.

We hear the suggestion at almost every turn: cease to be Liberals; forget your party ties and your party relations; be Canadians; be British, so that we may win the war. Yet a most un-British, a most un-Canadian measure is proposed by the Government, to serve, under the cover of patriotism, the most selfish party ends of the Tory party. This Bill emphasizes more than ever the essential and radical difference between Liberalism and Conservatism. Gladstone was a great reformer in the sense of extending the franchise; as a matter of fact, any one who has read the history of the Mother Country knows that the Reform Bills were introduced and passed by Liberal governments as they were opposed by Tory oppositions. The great Gladstone has given to the following definition of Liberalism and Conservatism:

The principle of Liberalism is trust in the people, qualified by prudence; the principle of Conservatism is mistrust of the people, qualified by fear.

I am prouder than ever of my Liberalism and of the guiding principle of my political faith; trust in the people. The present measure introduced by the Government shows exactly where the Tory party always stands. The Tory party stands for privileges, for class legislation, for mistrust of the people, qualified by fear of the electorate. The old conception of society was a conception of classes. Human beings in the old days—not so very old after all; in the beginning of the last century—were graded and standardized; certain privileges were reserved to certain groups. The first Reform Bill was introduced by an ancestor of one of the great Governor Generals, Lord Grey; others came later from G adstone and from leaders of Liberal and Radical governments. These Reform Bills were so many steps towards equal rights.

Sir, we have brought to Canada immigrants from all parts of the world. We have advertised Canada as the land of the free. We promised the immigrants equality of rights. They were living in Europe in their native lands in a state of serfdom; we gave them freedom as they came within our gates. The nationalities spread over the famous and historic Balkan peninsula have been living in serfdom, some under the yoke of Austria, others under the yoke of Turkey. Do you think that the men who lived in serfdom in those countries have any regard for the masters whom they left, for the yoke from which they were freed? As I read the other day a passage from a very interesting book on immigration, it dawned upon me that it was not possible that a Galician, for instance, although an Austrian subject, would have any regard for Austria; that on the contrary, having sworn allegiance to His Majesty the King and become a full-fledged British subject settled in the great far West, the possessor, indeed, the proprietor of 700 acres of land—would always side with Canada and Britain in preference to Austria. Speaking of the Galician, Mr. Woodsworth, in his excellent book on immigration, "Strangers within our Gates," says:

> He is ambitious. He is eager to become Canadianized. He does not cling to a language which is rich in words that express sorrow and despondency and misery, and meagre in those that express aspiration and joy and hope. Above all, he yearns to get on the land and to own some acres of his own. A Roman Catholic priest tells of conducting a Galician and his wife to a quarter-section he had helped them to secure for homesteading. The man could hardly believe that the land on which he stood was, on certain conditions, to be actually his own.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Pugsley, which was declared negatived on the following division:

EXPENSES OF PARLIAMENTARY SESSIONS.

RECOMMENDATION OF THE COMMITTEE THAT THE INQUIRY BE CONTINUED NEXT SESSION.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (E. Hastings) presented the report of the Select Committee appointed by the House to act with a like committee of the Senate to consider and, during the present session, report the total cost, including incidental expenses, of each session of Parliament and the best way, if any, of reducing the same.

Your committee regret that they have so far been unable to make much progress with the inquiry entrusted to them, and would, in view of the importance of an inquiry of this kind, recommend that a similar committee be reappointed early next session to fully consider the subject referred to them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS.

PROMOTION OF MR. A. C. CAMPBELL TO BE ASSOCIATE EDITOR AND APPOINTMENT OF MR. H. E. OLIVER TO DEBATES STAFF.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved, seconded by Sir George Foster, that the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on 6th February last, recommending the promotion of Mr. A. C. Campbell, of the Hansard staff, to be associate editor of the Official Debates, and of Mr. Harry E. Oliver, from the Committee Reporting Staff to the Official Debates Reporting Staff, be concurred in.

He said: I understand an explanation was given with regard to this matter on the 6th February.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand this recommendation is for the promotion of Mr. A. C. Campbell, of the Hansard staff to be associate editor. He is an officer of many years service and very competent.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to add a word on behalf of Mr. Campbell. I think he is one of the most obliging men in the service, and I am glad to see that the Government has recognized his merit.

Motion agreed to.

THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

CONSIDERATION OF THE BILL IN COMMITTEE.

House in committee on Bill 133, The War-Time Elections Act, Mr. W. H. Bennett in the Chair.

On section 1—Part 1 of Dominion Elections Act suspended and part 2 to operate as amended:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suggest that we consider the Bill paragragh by paragraph. Section 1 occupies about 10 pages, and the matters referred to are not alike in character.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see that there would be very much value in reading the whole section. We might consider it as much as possible in the order in which it appears. I know that it is impossible to confine the discussion to any particular clause of the Bill. We may take the discussion on the whole clause, but commence with the first part of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I desire to call attention to the words "complete demobilization" which appear in this Bill and in former Acts. That expression has never been given any legal definition. What is complete demobilization? Mobilization is simply calling the forces together, and demobilization will mean the time when, after peace is concluded, the order is given to recall the troops. Unless we have a definite definition, the period of demobilization may be extended to an unknown length.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think demobilization has a distinct significance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not able to give it accurately, but my opinion of it is this: complete demobilization takes place when all those enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces are released from further obligations as members thereof.

Mr. MURPHY: I remind the Secretary of State that judicial decisions were given in England after the South African war defining the period of demobilization. I think they may have something to do with the names of the men being placed on the voters' lists.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those decisions will apply here.

Mr. MURPHY: Perhaps my hon. friend could get information on the subject and give it to the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall try to get it.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that a definition is to be given of complete demobilization?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that a definition is necessary in the Act. I stated that I would ascertain what the legal significance of it was, as determined by British decisions, and that I would inform the committee. In the absence of any Canadian decisions the English decisions would be followed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does this legislation apply to by-elections held after the general election?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If by-elections were held prior to demobilization, the provisions of this Bill would apply, because the Dominion Elections Act as it stands now applies to by-elections as well as to general elections. This Bill suspends the operation of certain clauses of the Dominion Elections Act and makes it read in a certain way until a certain time. Consequently, this Act, during the period of its operation, would apply to by-elections.

Mr. KNOWLES: In that case, having regard to the provisions of the Military Voters' Act, at every by-election every one of the thousands of men who are British subjects and who never lived in Canada would have a vote. A great deal of expense would be incurred in taking the votes of the soldiers overseas at every by-election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Military Voters' Act does not apply to by-elections. If it be decided to hold by-elections after the general election, some new provisions will have to be made, because we could not take the soldiers' votes in a by-election. I quite agree that the provisions of this Bill would be very awkward of application in such cases. It was not intended that this Act should apply to by-elections, but legally it would.

Mr. KNOWLES: No matter what party succeeds in the coming contest, by-elections will be necessary prior to the meeting of Parliament. Nearly always after an election some additional persons are called into the Government, or some defeated minister has to find a seat. The probability of this occurring within the next few months is more marked than it ever would be under normal conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is difficult enough to provide for a general election in war time; we hope to avoid the necessity of providing for a by-election. I can conceive of scarcely anything more impracticable than to hold a by-election fairly in war time. It would be a tremendous task to pick out the soldiers who should vote in a particular constituency, to ascertain what relatives should vote in that district, and so on. I think the best way to avoid that would be not to have any ministers defeated.

Mr. MURPHY: You had better put that in the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is not a bad idea.

Mr. KNOWLES: The law is that newly appointed ministers who formerly were ordinary members of Parliament must be re-elected. I suggest that it be provided that members of the Opposition who are elected and afterwards made ministers of the Crown shall not have to be re-elected.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I call the attention of the committee to the fact that part 4 of the Military Voters' Act applies only in the event of a general election.

Mr. MARCIL: "The Dominion Elections Act" is the title of our present law. This Bill might well be styled "The War Time Dominion Elections Act."

Mr. PROULX: Does the Secretary of State not think it advisable to make this law applicable only to general elections?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot say that that would be advisable. If by-elections are held, some law must be applicable—some law that will enable the vote to be recorded. However awkward the application of this Act might be, it would be better than the application of the other Act, which would be a downright outrage in a by-election. Before we are out of committee, I think consideration had better be given to the subject of by-election.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not insert a provision stating that the law shall apply only to general elections?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will give consideration to that. But the effect of that would be this: in one province I do not think a by-election could be held at all. If a by-election could be held in a given province, it would be on a different basis entirely from that on which a general election is held. However, I will see whether less trouble would be given by making the law apply to general elections only. That provision will be adopted which will create the less trouble and be the more equitable.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. NESBITT: What is the affect of a and b in this section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The effect—my words apply to similar clauses all through the Bill—is to make the list-making provisions now applicable in part 2 to Alberta and Saskatchewan, applicable generally throughout Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is this part of the clause to be adopted? Surely that part which relates to demobilization cannot be adopted if the Government is going to give the matter consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated was that I would give the legal interpretation of the word as decided in the court. The paragraph stands so far as that is concerned.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Act should stand, not only for that purpose, but for the purpose of deciding whether you are going to make it effective after the general election is held or not, because that question is linked up with the other. The minister was to state whether or not this Act would cease to be effective at the close of the general election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The paragraph will stand.

Mr. OLIVER: I have not the advantage of being a member of the legal profession, and, therefore, I am not as well able to dovetail this amending Act into the original Act as those who are of that profession. I find the greatest difficulty in arriving at an understanding of the provisions of this amending Act on account of having to do so much dovetailing with the original Act. Would it not have been possible to draw up this amending Act as a whole, that is to say, to make it complete in itself with such provisions as would be necessary in order to leave the original Act as it stands, but so that the citizen who was not a member of the legal profession could have some reasonable idea of the working and the effect of the new provisions? I am unable to follow intelligently the provisions of this new Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: That was my trouble.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill will be printed as amended immediately Parliament decides how it should be amended. For the purpose of the committee now, I may say that the Bill will read in this way generally: The first four clauses of the old Act will remain as they are, that is, the sections before we come to Part I. The first section defines the Act as the Dominion Elections Act. The second section gives the definitions and interpretations. The third section states that no one can be a candidate unless his consent is given. The fourth section requires the presence of agents. Those stand as they are. Then everything in Part I is struck out until we come to 32.

Mr. NESBITT: You are striking that out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but we are substituting another section. When we come to section 32, we strike it out, for the reason that section 32 defines the old qualifications in Alberta and Saskatchewan. That is, the qualifications of voters fixed by the Dominion Parliament is applicable to those provinces. This Bill takes the provincial qualifications in those provinces exactly the same as in those other provinces. Consequently we take section 10, which was in Part I, and we substitute that for the old section 32. The present section 32 on the first page of the Bill is section 10 of the old Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the Secretary of State secure a dozen or two dozen copies of the Act as amended for distribution?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have just managed to get one compiled for myself. I show to the committee the size that it is.

Mr. BUREAU: Has the minister copies of the old Act as printed before, so that we can follow the amendments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had that done. I had a large number of copies of the old Act set up for distribution.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I cannot find them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know where they are. I thought hon. members had them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When was that done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Four days ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was unable to get one.

Mr. OLIVER: I applied to the Printing Bureau on my own account, and I secured two copies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked that copies be sent to the distribution office for the table of the House.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I sent for a copy of the Dominion Elections Act, and I received a copy of the Act before it was amended. This difficulty immediately arises. When one refers to the Dominion Act, one finds that there have been two or three amendments, so that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand the whole thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Copies of the Dominion Elections Act, with all the amendments up to date, will be distributed.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: An ordinary man would lose himself amongst all the amendments. For a man like myself it is very hard to understand the whole thing. I would suppose that a gentleman like the Secretary of State, with all his talents and capacity and with all the workers at his disposal, could have presented us with a Bill complete by itself without any reference to the old Act. In a few days more he could have given to the committee a complete Bill that hon. members and the general public could understand. I defy anybody to understand this measure. I have already heard the most talented lawyers complaining that they cannot understand one bit of it. Would it not be a good thing to adjourn this debate until the Government—and I refer in particular to the Solicitor General, with his talent—draw up a measure that the Government would understand?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh. I defy hon. gentlemen opposite, except possibly the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General who may understand the Bill, to tell us what it means. They are at sea just as I am in regard to this legislation, but they will vote for it no matter whether they understand it or not. I beg the Government, and especially the Secretary of State, to frame a law so that the ordinary citizen of this country will understand it. Is this a trap? I want to find that out. I do not believe so; I believe the Secretary of State is honest in this respect, but the Government should not play with the people as they are doing by this piece of paper. By the first section the minister strikes out sections 1 to 31 of the Dominion Elections Act. Does any hon. member know if he has struck out enough or too much? Then after section 32 everything is upset, and the Secretary of State takes the precaution of saying: When we enact a section between sections 33 and 34, it is section 33A. I am in earnest in asking that a measure be framed so that the general public will be able to understand it, and with the capacity of our hon. friends, that should be done in a day or two. In Quebec, when we amend an Act, we have to repeat the whole section that is amended. We do not only say that we strike out section 5 and replace it by section 4, but we repeat the whole section, and we put the new matter in brackets so that we know exactly where we stand. What I am asking for the people of this country, and especially for the people of my constituency, is that we should have a law that we can comprehend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would remind the hon. member for St. James that we are just at the commencement of the committee stage of this Bill. It is quite reasonable to expect that hon. gentlemen may not right at the very first understand the scheme of a proposed measure. But there is nothing new about it; this is the way in which we always amend Acts in this Parliament. It is true that there are more amendments necessary in this case than is usual, and that the old Act is very long itself and has been very frequently amended. Copies of the old Act are in the chief messenger's room and are being brought in for distribution. As the committee get to work on the Bill the difficulties will all disappear. It is not at all impossible that the committee may make several amendments, and as soon as the committee's work is done, not only the amending Act which we hope to pass, but the Bill as amended, will be printed and distributed to all of the members. In the meantime, I think the hon. member will thoroughly understand the Bill before we have been in committee on it for fifteen minutes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have gone carefully over the Bill and I quite agree with the Solicitor General that as discussion proceeds we shall begin to understand it more and more, and in the end it will no doubt be pretty clear to us. But the ordinary man reading this Bill finds it very difficult to understand.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: What do you mean by the ordinary man?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I mean the elector, the returning officer, the agents for the candidate, and so on. I was going to make this suggestion: After the amendments are agreed upon, would it not be better by unanimous consent to substitute the completed Bill, giving the provisions of the present law as amended here, and let that pass as a complete Bill? Any one looking over the Bill and not studying it with very great care would certainly have difficulty in following its provisions; there is no question about that. I would also suggest to the Secretary of State whether or not in those provinces where the lists prepared by the provincial authorities are made the basis of the lists which the enumerators are to prepare, the enumerators could not be done away with. Women voters are to be added to the lists, of course. What has occurred to me, and I know it would be very convenient in my own province, is that all applications for names to be added should be made to the revisors, just as a person who is entitled to have his name on the voter's list would make application. It will be a new and a very strange thing in our province to have enumerators who can go about putting on and striking off names at pleasure, in secret, behind closed doors, and then, only ten days before polling day, post up the notices requiring those who have objections to make to come to the enumerator up to and even including the day of polling. The people of my province are not accustomed to that, and they will have great difficulty in reconciling themselves to the lists made by these enumerators. I would suggest that it would be very much better to take the existing provincial lists, and then make a simple provision for the addition of the women voters. That would be very easy, and I am sure it would be much more satisfactory to the people of the province of New Brunswick, at all events.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are a long way from those clauses of the Bill as yet.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, you are not, because the moment you strike out the heading, "Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and Yukon Territory" you make the law applicable to the whole of Canada, which, of course, includes those provinces where they have the provincial lists.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think this discussion would be more appropriate on the substituted clauses prescribing the methods by which this enumeration shall be made. However, as the subject is up, I know that the hon. member for St. John has made one important omission in his speech. He does not say before what tribunal, or by what machinery, these additional voters are to be put on the lists in his or any other province. It must be remembered that these votes are scattered over the length and breadth of very large constituencies. The constituency of Halifax in Nova Scotia, for instance, is over seventy-five miles long.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mine is twice as long as that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We must have some means of getting these names on the lists. The hon. gentleman suggests that we have some short clausees in the Bill providing for it. That is just what we have. The quickest way to do it is to make it the business of somebody to get it done, and that is what we have done. It is true that a great many new names will have to added, but very few names in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, for instance, will have to be struck off, and unless we make it somebody's business to look after the enrolling of these new names they will never get on in time. You cannot make it the business of judges to go over the length and breadth of these counties, if we are to have an election in reasonable time. The method has worked fairly well in the western provinces. There has been complaint that there were no safeguards for the Opposition, that the enumerators appointed by the Government in power had an advantage. But we have given safeguards here that are just as much to the advantage of one side as the other.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not been able to discover many safeguards.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know of a more expeditious or simpler method of getting the additional votes that we have provided.

Mr. MARCIL: In the rural constituencies of the province of Quebec the lists are prepared by the secretary-treasurer for the municipality. He is the man who prepares the assessment roll and knows everybody in the municipality, and he acts under the control of the local municipal council. The lists are prepared by him and transmitted to the registrar of the county, and by him sent forward to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and eventually they become the official lists. Speaking for my own constituency, of which I have more particular knowledge, I know that the minister will be unable to find in any parish or township a man better qualified to prepare these lists than the secretary-treasurer of the municipality. He has the advantage of having all the information he needs in his hands. There will be no question of politics in it, because in one municipality the secretary-treasurer might be a Conservative, and in the next a Liberal. I certainly think this officer would be the best man that could be got.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is the same in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If you do that it simply means that you are making them enumerators.

Mr. MARCIL: Why not make them enumerators? They are the very best men you can get?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not so sure of that. If we use the machinery that is now in the provinces, the length of time that the Quebec law allows would lengthen out the whole contest. Furthermore, you have to have men who make it their business to understand this law. It is their peculiar business to find out who is entitled to vote under this law and then to put their names on the list. I do not know any reason why municipal officers would be the proper men in Quebec, when all along, ever since 1905, special officers have been appointed for the purpose in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. They have never used the secretary-treasurer of the municipalities there. Personally, I think the secretary-treasurers would resent very much having this made a part of their duties.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the newer provinces we have, and shall have for a certain number of years, a shifting population. There are many residents of the United States who own large tracts of land in Canada. As was explained to me by an hon. friend from the West last night, municipal government in the West is as yet only in embryo.

My hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) says we have an old settled population in the province of Quebec. That is perfectly true. Everybody knows everybody else. The municipal officer is a trusted official of the municipality; he acts on the school commission; he is clerk of the justices of the peace, and so on; he is secretary-treasurer of the municipality, and generally speaking he attends to all public functions in the municipality; he knows everybody; he knows the ropes, so to speak.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What would be the population of some of your larger municipalities?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The population varies; it would be anywhere from 300, 400, or 500 up to 1,000, or, perhaps, 1,500. I can assure my hon. friend that, if he will look into the matter he will find that the municipal officer is the best and most trusted officer in the municipality, and I daresay, for a small remuneration, better work could be got from him than if a stranger were brought in from the city, or if you were to appoint a lawyer from the shire town. I can assure my hon. friend that the municipal officer would give better satisfaction to the public. He knows every man, woman and child in the community, and if you avail yourself of his services I am satisfied you will find it much more convenient.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The size of the municipality, if nothing else, makes it impracticable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What do you mean by that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The population and the extent of the municipality. The scheme of this Act is that the work shall be done quickly by a large staff of officers who are paid a reasonable amount for their work. You cannot have it extended over a great length of time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend will allow me, if you utilize the services of those municipal officers in the parishes and in the villages, and then have one enumerator for each constituency or each county, those municipal officers could report to the chief enumerator. But, to reach the people, to know the people and to enumerate them, no better means could be adopted than to avail ourselves of the services of these municipal officers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has not quite seized the scheme yet. It would not do to have a municipal officer to take charge of all those in the municipality. An enumerator is responsible for a single polling division, and there must be one enumerator for each division, because he must sit at a certain place near the poll, for ten days before the voting, and he must sit at the poll or close to it on the polling day, so that if a man is not on the list he may go there and get a certificate to vote, or a certificate of refusal. It is true the lists compiled by these municipal officers will be used, and these lists are final as far as they go.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are they final? As I read the Act the enumerator can strike off or add to the list according to his own judgment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my hon. friend is wrong. The intention is that in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, the enumerator cannot touch the list except for two purposes—he can strike off but only for alienage, he can add to, but only for the female relatives of soldiers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not so read it. If my hon. friend's statement is correct, it would be an improvement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the intention, and if it is not clear in the Act it will be made clear.

Mr. OLIVER: While the provisions for compiling the voters' lists in the prairie provinces have been suitable and applicable to the conditions in those provinces, the reason is because there were peculiar conditions to be met, and the fact that the method adopted there was the best available method does not by any means settle the question that it is the best available method for other and entirely different conditions. The work of an enumerator in compiling the lists there was necessary because of what might be called the fluid character of the population, and the widely scattered settlements. It was the only way to arrive at any sort of knowledge as to who should or who should not vote. The method was not adopted because it was the best way to secure a sound and proper voters' list, and as a matter of fact it has not been found to be a good way where population is dense in the prairie provinces. It is not a good way in the cities, for instance. It is, however, the best method available in the scattered outlying rural settlements. While I am not sufficiently versed with conditions in this part of the country to criticise the Bill as applied to conditions here, I merely wish to point out for the information of the committee that the reason this system is used in the West is because of the peculiar conditions existing there, and not because the method is inherently or necessarily the best. I know of cases where an enumerator covers more than one polling division in the West, the reason being that the population is so very scattered that it would be unjust to include the total area in one poll, because it would be too far for the people to travel and at the same time it would not be worth while to appoint an enumerator for the small population voting at a single poll. Those are conditions peculiar to that country. Another point is that in regard to the actual casting of the vote, the fact that a man can swear his vote on, as we say, does not render the amendment of the list by the enumerator a serious matter there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The feature that has existed of enabling one enumerator to act in more than one polling division in sparse populations is eliminated in this Bill. Otherwise, you could not carry out the provisions of the Bill. The enumerator must be there in order to make applicable the provisions of the Bill which we look upon as the safeguards. He has to be there to give a certificate, or to give a certificate of refusal, consequently, we have an enumerator for each poll.

Mr. OLIVER: I am only pointing out that when the Secretary of State instances the conditions in the West as a reason for the provisions of the Bill in the East, the reason is not adequate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a lot of force in what my hon. friend from Edmonton says. The provisions as to enumerators are not as applicable to thickly settled districts and large cities as they are to less thickly settled districts. That is one of the reasons why this Act only puts Alberta and Saskatchewan on the same plane as British Columbia and Manitoba. There is no great difference in conditions between British Columbia and Alberta, and there is no great difference between Manitoba and Saskatchewan. When we come to the eastern provinces, however, where the population is more dense, and where there are larger cities, then we adopt the provincial lists that are here, and in the larger cities we provide for revision before we go to the poll, that is to say, we only partially adopt the enumeration system in those eastern provinces. Indeed, we only adopt it for the purposes of putting on the women who are now entitled and taking off the aliens who are disentitled.

Mr. McCRANEY: When I spoke the other day I suggested to the Government the desirability of making provision for registration in the cities of Saskatchewan. I confined it to my own province, but I have no doubt that it would be applicable to Alberta as well. In the city of Saskatoon, or Regina, or Moosejaw, or Prince Albert, there are many people moving about, commercial travellers and others, and it would be very difficult to pursue the system which is outlined in this Bill where votes may be challenged on election day, where the right of the voter to vote becomes the subject of investigation and where it will be necessary for the voter to hang around in continual readiness to prove his right to vote. On that account I suggest to the minister that it would be desirable to have registration under officers appointed by himself. Appeals can be taken and the lists will be completed in plenty of time before the election. I hope he will give that consideration.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are wandering over several clauses of this Bill, and I do not think we can make progress or discuss it in any intelligible way unless we take it up paragraph by paragraph. I suggest we take it up paragraph by paragraph and stick to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are at paragraph 32.

Mr. NEELY: Upon this paragraph, 32, I would like to know if the Government cannot see their way clear, as the Secretary of State told us yesterday that this Bill was for the purpose of enlarging the scope of the franchise, to enlarge it a little further. The right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) yesterday, in referring to the difficulty of extending the franchise to women generally spoke of matters of naturalization and some other things which should not stand in the way. There are things that could be easily obviated by designation as we do designate in paragraph 33 (a) certain things with regard to women relatives of men in the overseas force or who have been overseas. I would like to know if the Government have given this consideration and whether they are prepared to shut out from the franchise, in view of the recognition of the female relatives of men who are serving overseas, all the women in this country, say, of British birth and British origin, who have given all they were able to give, their time, their energy and their ability to war work. Surely a difficulty as to the naturalization might very fairly be overcome by designation. I would like to know if the Government will not consider enlarging the franchise in this regard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This subject comes under paragraph 33 (a) rather than 32 but I might as well give my answer now as we have virtually passed 32. Thirty-two is really a clause of the old Act any way.

With reference to 33 (a), the Government has given very long, careful, if not prayerful thought to the subject that the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) has brought to our attention. The difficulty in regard to naturalization is only one of the difficulties in the way. I noted with very great interest that, while the hon. member for Humboldt thought it could be got over by designation, he did not suggest any designation of those who should be included and of those who should be left out. That was our difficulty too. If all were included that difficulty of naturalization would be insuperable.

Mr. NEELY: I did say British by birth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member means to include all who are British by birth?

Mr. NEELY: And Canadian.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then about three-fourths of the argument of yesterday directed against this whole question of discrimination would be levelled against us if we adopted that because that is discriminating against those who are British subjects now and have not the franchise while all the rest get it. The speech of the leader of the Opposition would reach us with direct force if we adopted that course. With naturalization on its present basis—and it cannot be altered very well now without an Imperial understanding—it is not just and right that those others naturalized should 4 p.m. be in a better position than those who are naturalized by personal application. That is one of our difficulties. The other difficulty which most distinctly applies to the suggestion of the hon. member for Humboldt that all other women of British birth be included is that if all of British birth are included then this franchise extended to the female relatives of soldiers loses its representative value altogether. It is nothing to the soldier if all women described in that way are included. It is making no quid pro quo to him because he in part loses his franchise and wholly loses his influence. Of the soldiers who have gone to the front 26,000 are dead and several thousand are prisoners of war. That is giving him nothing in lieu of what should be made up to him in a war-time election. Once you go as far as my hon. friend suggests, then the women's franchise loses its representative character and value altogether and the main necessity for the Bill is wiped away. I know of no way else to draw the line which will at the same time meet the difficulty as to naturalization, and, on the other hand, and more important in my estimation, make the women's vote representative of the soldiers overseas.

Mr. McCRANEY: I appreciate the point of the Solicitor General in desiring to make up during the next election for the loss of the influence which those overseas would have if they were here by giving their relatives the franchise which, to some extent, might compensate them for that. While this has been mentioned before, it is put forward so prominently now by the minister that it strikes me that this feature is not a feature in the enfranchisement of women. It is doubling the franchise of men. It is not put forward as a measure of suffrage to women because they are women. It is multiplying the influence of men and it is put forward on that ground.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not multiplying—just keeping up the regular standard.

Mr. McCRANEY: It is very irregular, because the female vote may be from one to half a dozen in case of some soldiers. I am not complaining about it. I am only showing the character of it. Perhaps it is not always possible to be consistent. The Government does not profess to be consistent on all occasions, and I do not know why members on this side of the House should be expected to be. I would not ask the Government, in the view which they hold, to extend the franchise to the women of the country on the same terms as it is extended to men. My chief objection to this Bill is the fact that some will be disfranchised who now have a vote. Perhaps we would not enfranchise some of them, if we were starting de novo. But I feel that there is a great body of earnest women in this country whose sentiments are loyal, and who are showing those sentiments by the work they are doing. If the suggestion of my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) has made, that women who are British subjects be enfranchised were adopted, it would go a long way. It would not enfranchise those women who have become British subjects by operation of law, and, perhaps, in declining to enfranchise them my hon. friend has in mind the wives of the men whom he proposes to disfranchise, and probably he objects to their becoming enfranchised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want the hon. gentleman to understand that the wives, sisters, daughters, and mothers of that class who may be overseas are enfranchised by this Bill, just the same as any other.

Mr. McCRANEY: But the Prime Minister's statement is that that class are not accepted as recruits, and if they become soldiers they must represent themselves as Russians, or some other nationality.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend does not draw one distinction which he ought to draw. I was not speaking of women of any nationality. In the observations which I made yesterday in regard to naturalization I was speaking of women who were not British subjects by birth.

Mr. McCRANEY: I quite understand the statement of the Prime Minister in reference to that, but I am assuming—and no doubt the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that the reason women who are naturalized by operation of law, through the fact of their husbands being naturalized, are not included in the franchise, is because the Government realized that it would enfranchise that large body of women who are wives of the foreign class which they propose to disfranchise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill affects the alien enemy foreigner, but to enfranchise women generally would enfranchise the wives, sisters and all the other relatives of men born in other countries, not alien enemy at all, not speaking the alien enemy language, but speaking Norwegian or Russian, and people from all the countries of the world. It deals with a very much wider class.

Mr. McCRANEY: If the measure enfranchised the wives of all British-born subjects, I would be satisfied if it enfranchised, in addition to those, the wives of all who came from other than alien enemy countries. It strikes me the reason the Government is confining the franchise as it does is because it fears to enfranchise the wives of the men whom they are disfranchising.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, in part. But the hon. gentleman will follow me in two small steps of reasoning: in the first place, had we taken that course, and enfranchised the British born, and the British born alone, then the argument advanced by the leader of the Opposition, that persons resident in Canada, naturalized—and consequently given this pact as he describes it, if it is a pact—are discriminated against, would come with crushing force on us. That is the argument the hon. gentleman is advancing now. He could not endorse the position taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition yesterday, and stand where he is to-day. The second point—and in my judgment a much more important point—is that to enfranchise all the British-born women of Canada would be no remuneration to the soldiers overseas for what they are denied by virtue of a war election. There would be no compensation for them in that, and the Bill would lose its main purpose, and, indeed, its main justification. I think the hon. member for Saskatoon will see that this is impracticable. How can we go through an election, and say to those overseas: "Those who stay at home can use their influence, canvass, go from door to door, make their appeals, and all the weaker passions of our nature can be played upon by the demagogue and everyone else, but you men overseas, who have other motives and principles, cannot do so, and we will hold an election while you are 4,000 miles away, and deny you the right to exercise any personal influence whatever, and will also deny you 50 per cent of your vote." That is the condition we are endeavouring to repair. But if you give all the British-born a vote, you do not repair that condition in any sense at all. In peace times, it would be justified, but if you give it now, you deny to the soldiers overseas that influence which it is the purpose of this Bill to give.

Mr. McCRANEY: My hon. friend is emphasizing that point very much. I am quite satisfied that if the women of the city in which I live who are British subjects by birth were enfranchised, they would support the soldiers at the front.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCRANEY: The Solicitor General is assuming that they would be antagonistic. I am putting forward this argument, because day after day the women are going to the Red Cross room, and carrying on such activities, and I would like, without laying myself open to charges of inconsistency, to try and work out something practicable, so that these women, other than those entitled to vote because of ties of relationship, shall have some say, and shall be able to exercise their influence in the same direction as those who have ties with the soldier.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think the Solicitor General puts the ground for giving the right of voting to the relatives of the soldiers upon the right basis. I do not think it is intended to give to the relatives of the soldiers the right to vote in order that they may represent the soldiers, but the vote is to be given to the women because of the sacrifices they have made, by reason of their relationship.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Both reasons.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me the latter is the true reason—that they have made the very greatest sacrifice a woman can make in parting with those dear to them; I think that it is the true ground upon which the argument should be based. If I were a soldier I would rather trust the ordinary women of the country than my own relatives to see that I was treated fairly in everything. The ordinary women of the country would not be interested especially through ties of blood; they would be interested as citizens, as women of Canada; and I am satisfied that they could be relied upon to see that absolute justice was done to soldiers in the matter of their support at the front and of proper provision for them on their return. In the matter of allowances to their relatives, in the matter of separation allowance, in the matter of pensions, do you not think that the ordinary woman would be even more generous in her demands than the relative of the soldier would be? It seems to me that the Secretary of State does not present any argument against the extension of the franchise to those persons whom the member for Montreal, St. Lawrence, Mr. Bickerdike) called the loyal and patriotic women of Canada.

The Prime Minister makes objection to extending the franchise to women generally on the ground that conditions affecting the naturalization laws have to be considered. Surely that difficulty, if it is a difficulty, must have presented itself to the Prime Minister two or three months ago when he assured the women's delegations who waited upon him that the franchise would be extended generally to the women of the country. On the 16th of May last, the following resolution was moved by the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland):

That, in the opinion of this House, the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of the Government at the present session.

That resolution was received sympathetically by the Prime Minister; he gave the women of the country to understand that the Government would act upon it. During the course of the discussion I moved the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"the Dominion Election Act should be so amended at the present session as to make uniform the right of women to vote for members of the House of Commons in those provinces which have granted to them the provincial franchise."

That amendment was ruled out of order by the Speaker. He said:

The member has on the Order Paper a resolution No. 6, following this one, which it seems to me, although it is not in the same terms, is substantially the same as the one which he now submits by way of amendment. Bourinot says, page 301, "Nor is it regular to move as an amendment to a question a motion of which notice has been given and which appears in its place on the notice paper."

The question being again proposed on the amendment, the Prime Minister moved the following amendment to the motion of the member for South Oxford:

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this House the question of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of Parliament before an appeal to the people is made."

And the question being proposed on the amendment, I moved an amendment to the amendment in the following words:

That the following words be added thereto: "and it is therefore desirable that a measure having this object in view should be submitted to Parliament by the Government during the present session."

A debate arose upon that, and on the motion of the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) the debate was adjourned. On a number of occasions since then I have been assured by gentlemen leading the House that an opportunity would be given for the discussion of this motion, of the amendment moved by the Prime Minister and of the amendment to the amendment moved by myself. But the important thing is that my right hon. friend moved as an amendment that the matter of extending the franchise to women should engage the attention of Parliament before an appeal to the people was made. That was an assurance to the House and to the women of the country that the Government was favourable to extending the franchise generally to the women of Canada. There is no doubt about that; the women of Canada so understood it; they expressed themselves as thankful to the Government for having at last decided to ask Parliament to grant them equal rights of suffrage. My right hon. friend put forth objections of a fanciful character as an explanation why the right of suffrage is granted to a few—I admit that it should be granted to them; they have strong claims to it—and is refused to hundreds of thousands of other women who are equally entitled to it. No harm can come from extending the franchise generally to the women of Canada; I am satisfied that every possible good would come from it. The Government ought not to let this session pass, it ought not allow this Bill to be disposed of, without making provision for extending the franchise to women generally. If there are any objections on the ground of nationality or naturalization, then let the franchise be limited to the British-born women of Canada. That would extend the franchise to several hundred thousand women who, as I said yesterday, have shown during this war, by the unceasing work which they have done and the splendid patriotism which they have evidenced, that they are as capable of exercising the franchise as the men. They have shown that they are just as much concerned in the good government of this country and in the welfare of this Dominion as the men who exercise the franchise to-day. I was much struck by the remark of a lady who was very much in favour of suffrage and who spoke many times on the subject in the western provinces. Somebody suggested that the women might make a mess of politics. Well, she said, a much worse mess could not be made of it than is being made to-day; the women could not do very much worse than the men. That is true. The men do it as well as they can, but I am satisfied that the women, if they were given the right to vote, would in many cases do very much better than the men. No good reason can be urged against giving the women the right of the franchise. I appeal to the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution to which I have referred to repeat the arguments which he presented on that occasion. The women of this country are waiting to receive a message that the Government will carry out their pledge. My right hon. friend says that some of the women, recognizing that the Government have gone quite a distance, believe that the Government ought to receive the thanks of the women. That may be so, but these women have been deceived; they have been led to believe that this is simply a War-time Elections Act, the effect of which will end when the war is over. That is not true. It is nowhere provided by legislation that there is to be a new general election when this war is over. But the men, whether they will be Liberals or Conservatives, who will be elected under this proposed franchise, will be the representatives of the people and will have charge of the administration of affairs for the next five years. Supposing this war should end in a year, they will be in charge for four years after it is over. I am satisfied that, when the women of this country realize that they are to be debarred from the exercise of the franchise, of having any control over the affairs of this country during the next five years, my right hon. friend will hear from them in very loud tones. I am told that even to-day my right hon. friend has been requested to receive delegations in order to hear their representations. I have been given this telegram from Vancouver, dated the 8th of September:

> Have wired Premier following United Suffrage Societies' protest against Election Act now before House re woman suffrage which disfranchises women of British Columbia. Object to any extension of franchises to women except on same terms as to men. Demand federal franchise for women who are qualified as men are qualified.
> (Sgd.) United Suffrage Societies.

I am told that is a very large, representative, influential organization, having its headquarters in Vancouver, and I am satisfied they represent the feeling of the women throughout this country. They have been demanding the franchise; they have been led to expect that they will receive the franchise, and as I have said, at last they thought they had the absolute promise of my right hon. friend that the franchise would be given to them. The attitude of my right hon. friend at first—some two or three years ago when a delegation of women waited upon him, was that it was a matter for the provincial legislatures to deal with. He led the women of this country to believe that whenever the provincial legislatures extended to women the right of suffrage, ipso facto, they would have the right to vote for members of this Parliament. Five provinces of Canada have given to women the right of suffrage. Under the assurance that was then given by the Prime Minister, they had a right to suppose that, at all events as to those provinces, the right of suffrage in voting for members for this Parliament would be extended to them. When the matter came up in the House, the Prime Minister hesitated to ask Parliament to enact legislation which would carry out that view. I remember, either one or two sessions ago, when I introduced a resolution expressly providing for that, feeling sure that I would have the hearty support of the Prime Minister, he called upon his supporters to vote down the resolution, and, in consequence, it was defeated. During this session, my right hon. friend has led the women of this country to believe—at least so I am informed, because I was not present at the meeting, but the matter was reported in the press—that a general right of suffrage would be granted to them. Certainly, his attitude in this House when he moved the amendment to the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that the question of extending the franchise to the women should engage the attention of Parliament before dissolution, was one that was calculated to lead Parliament and the people of the country to believe that a general measure of franchise would be submitted to Parliament at the present session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend apparently forgets that, when he proposed a motion at the present session—the motion to which he has just now alluded—he phrased it in this way:

> In the opinion of this House it is desirable that provision be made either to grant to women who are qualified to vote for members of a Provincial Legislature, the right also to vote for members of the Dominion Parliament, or to grant to women throughout the Dominion the right to vote for members of Parliament, subject to such provisions and limitations as may seem reasonable to Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The proposal of my hon. friend in the first instance, made one or two sessions ago, was that we should enact in this Parliament legislation making it possible for women who had the right of provincial franchise to exercise that right of franchise in federal elections. A good deal has been said about discrimination. I imagine that the women of Canada, in the provinces in which they have not hitherto received the franchise in provincial elections, would look upon that as a very grave discrimination if the Government should carry it out. But I pointed out also to my hon. friend—although he speaks lightly of the question of naturalization to which I alluded yesterday—that, in the terms of the motion I have just read, he himself recognized the importance of certain provisions and limitations which might seem reasonable to Parliament. I do not wish to repeat what I said yesterday on this point. I endeavoured to make myself perfectly clear, and I hope I did so. My hon. friend now suggests—along the principle of his motion of two years ago, but entirely in opposition to the view put forward by his leader yesterday—that we should amend the provisions of this Bill by providing that women of British birth should have the franchise and that women born in other countries, who were not of British nationality, should not have that right. The leader of the Opposition urged, with all the force at his command, that the provisions of this measure would prevent people from coming to this country as immigrants. What my hon. friend is urging just now would be a very much wider example of discrimination. Women who came to this country from the United Staes of America, or who came from France and other Allied nations, would be discriminated against by the proposal of my hon. friend. The observations of the leader of the Opposition would have very much greater force if directed against the hon. member for St. John than they had when directed against the proposal embodied in this Bill.

I realize at once that there are in this country many women who, under the provisions of this Bill, will not have the vote at the coming election. I realize fully also, that at least a great majority of the women have worked untiringly and devotedly in aid of the purpose of Canada in this war. So far as these observations of my hon. friend are concerned, I entirely concur in the appreciation he has expressed. But we have to deal with conditions as they are in this country to-day. We have to deal with the situation which I described in my remarks of yesterday. I adhere entirely to the opinion that I have already expressed more than once in this House, namely, that the women of Canada generally are entitled to the franchise, and if the people of this country should give to me a mandate at the next general election, I undertake to carry out the purpose that I have already proclaimed. I propose to carry that out according to those lines and subject to the observations which I made on this point yesterday. Therefore, so far as that general principle is concerned, there will be no departure from it so far as my action may control it. But we are dealing now with an election in time of war. We are dealing with this question at a time when the life of Parliament will expire in less than four weeks. We are dealing with it under conditions of an unusual character in many ways. When we come to consider the question of naturalization, we have to take into account that it has been the purpose of the statesmen of all the self-governing nations of the British Empire to have one uniform system of naturalization, and that the naturalization so established shall be effective throughout the Empire and not, as previously established, effective only in the Dominion or in the nation where the naturalization was granted. So when we come to look at it in the aspect which commends itself to my mind, we find ourselves confronted with this situation: The women of this country, if they are entitled to the franchise, are entitled also to determine their citizenship. I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House or any man or woman in this country would gainsay that. If a woman is entitled to her full voice in the affairs of this country, then that woman is entitled to determine her citizenship for herself, and not to have it determined for her by the mere fact of her marriage. But in order to bring that about, and to remove the anomalies which the present system creates, it will be necessary to pass legislation which will have to be very carefully considered, and as to which there ought to be negotiations with the Mother Country and with the other self-governing dominions of the Empire if we are to preserve the uniformity which at the conference of 1911 was regarded as essential, and if we are to preserve one type and form of naturalization for the whole British Empire. I am sure every one in this country will realize the absolute impossibility of accomplishing all that between now and the 7th of October, when the life of this Parliament expires.

My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) reproaches me because he considers I have not given sufficient attention to the subject during the past six or seven weeks. I would point out to him that we have had half a dozen matters engaging the attention of the Government during this season, any one of which under ordinary conditions would have been regarded as a sufficient undertaking for a government during one whole session of Parliament. We have had to grapple with these questions as best we could, and it may be possible that owing to those circumstances, and not to any indisposition on my part, adequate attention has not been given to the particular feature which I brought to the notice of the House yesterday. That has been our misfortune, and not our fault. At all events, we are dealing with conditions as they are now, and I say once more: it would be impossible for this Parliament in the limited time which will elapse between now and the 7th of October to give to that question the consideration and the attention which it deserves, and, more than that, to have the communication with the Government and Parliament of the Mother Country and of the Overseas Dominions which would be necessary if we are to preserve the essential feature of uniformity in naturalization throughout the Empire which was laid down as a guiding principle at the conference of 1911, and which was carried out so far as the Mother Country and some of the Dominions are concerned, by the legislation enacted in 1914.

I realize fully that there may be women in this country—there doubtless are—who will not be entitled to the franchise under this Bill and who may feel aggrieved about it. But I am also convinced that when they come to realize and comprehend the situation which confronts the Government at this time, they will give the Government credit for dealing with the question in a fair and reasonable way, and for doing what they could to give the franchise to a very large body of Canadian womanhood—and this Bill will undoubtedly grant the franchise to a very large number of the women of this country. I know that there are those who have worked unceasingly and devotedly who have not immediate relatives at the front, but who are as earnest in their purpose and in their endeavour as any woman in Canada could be. I hope and believe they will understand and comprehend this situation.

As far as we are concerned, I repeat once more that we have endeavoured to frame this Bill on the guiding principle of service and of sacrifice. While I give every credit that could be given to those devoted women in Canada who have not relatives at the front, but who nevertheless have thrown their whole heart and soul into the national purpose, yet it must be conceded, even by these women themselves, that those women have made the greater sacrifice who have sent to the front those who are nearest and dearest to them to fight for our institutions, for our liberties, and for the preservation of this Empire.

Mr. NEELY: We all recognize that in giving this Bill its second reading Parliament was recognizing the principle of discrimination so far as the franchise is concerned. The Government recognized that the Bill was open to criticism from the fact that in extending the franchise to women they had to draw a line somewhere. The Prime Minister had just admitted that injury may be done to many of the women of Canada who have given splendid service since the outbreak of the war, and who will not be enfranchised by this Bill. I presume that in the matter of disfranchising the electors the same holds good, and that the Government are not satisfied with the degree of disfranchisement this Bill proposes. They would go further if they could, or if they dared; but they have gone as far as they can find reasonable excuse for going.

This Bill recognizes the principle of discrimination in the granting of the franchise, but there is this underlying principle as I understand it: the Government, while discriminating along certain lines for the benefit and safety of the state, as they tell us, still wish to depart as little as possible from the underlying principle of the Dominion franchise, namely, the recognition for federal purposes of the provincial standards of qualification. If that is the intent of the Government, if they wish to preserve that principle in the legislation now before us, as well as by their discrimination to safeguard the interests of the state, I should suggest the following amendment, which I hope the Government will see their way clear to adopt:

That at the end of line 16, page 1 of the Bill, after the word "male" there be added the words "or female," and that the same words be added after the word "male" in line 20 of the same section.

The section would then read:

The qualifications necessary to enable any male or female person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as by this Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle any male or female person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

The Government have already admitted that they are granting the franchise to certain classes of women upon certain grounds, namely, that the soldier overseas may have a representative not only to vote for him in this country, but also to exert the influence he probably would have on the sentiments of his relatives and friends at an election if he were here in person.

Mr. MARCIL. What about trying to get half a dozen women to agree upon a question?

Mr. NEELY: I do not know about that. Is there not an insinuation in the position taken by the Secretary of State that the only women in this country who can be trusted to multiply or increase the influence of the soldier overseas in an election are his own immediate relatives. I think this Bill puts an imputation, on a percentage of the women of this country, which is absolutely unworthy of this Parliament. While I know that the eliminating effect of this Bill, so far as the franchise is concerned, does not go as far as the Government would like, is there any justification or any reason why in provinces where women's franchise has already been adopted, and the principle is accepted, where we are by this very Bill trusting the men to vote, we should not also trust these men's wives? I quite understand that the proposal of the Government is to disfranchise certain of our male electors, and presumably they will not trust the wives or daughters of these male electors at this forthcoming election, but is there any reason why in those provinces where women's franchise has already been granted, the wives and daughters of electors who have not been disfranchised should not have the right to vote? That is standing by the underlying principle of the present Dominion franchise, namely, that in so far as possible we adopt the provincial standard of qualification, and it is the Government's intention and hope, they would have us believe, that they are trying to depart from that principle just as little as possible in the present Bill. That obviates all the difficulties the Prime Minister was speaking about. Stick by the provincial franchise and provincial standard of qualification, except in so far as the Government is determined to disfranchise a certain class of the electors. That, of course, we presume will naturally tell against the wives and the daughters of those electors as well as against the men themselves. I think it is a sound principle to adopt the provincial franchise, and as far as we adopt the provincial franchise if we trust the male elector to retain his franchise, we should also trust his wife and daughter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman intimates something about my not trusting any woman except those who have sons overseas. That is not the point at all. If is not a question of trusting the women of Canada to stand by the war. There are differences of opinion as to how practically to stand by our boys and by the war, and in the judgment of the Government those who would most likely share the opinions of the men overseas as to the best method and the only method of doing so would be their near relatives. It is not unreasonable to presume that the sentiments of the overseas force would be best reflected by Canada in their own immediate relatives. I do not think that is illogical or unreasonable. That is as far as I have gone, and that is as far as I need go to justify the measure. The amendment moved by my hon. friend looks to the adoption throughout Canada of the provincial franchise. If it is passed, then wherever or whosoever she be, a woman who can vote in any province can vote in the Dominion elections. Let us get the full meaning of this, so that the House may understand it, and with this in view, I think it is just as well that the amendment has been moved. In the four western provinces all naturalized British subjects, no matter how they are naturalized, get the vote. If a woman comes from Germany, or Austria, and marries three weeks after she arrives, she becomes naturalized, and is entitled to the vote.

Mr. NESBITT: Not according to the other provisions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not according to the other provisions, because they are in direct conflict with this. The other provisions are in accord with section 32 as it stands, but you cannot change paragraph 32 if the other provision stands. The contention of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) is that we shall adopt the provincial franchise as to women. Let hon. gentlemen understand what the effect of that would be. If a woman who has been a week in Canada marries a naturalized citizen, she thereby becomes a naturalized British subject. That is the law of the land to-day.

Mr. NEELY: She would not be entitled to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: She would be entitled to vote immediately she had the residence required by the province.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not the minister see that by this paragraph the qualifications necessary to enable any male or female person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as by this Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province. Could it not be easily worked out in some other sections?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If this passes who would be able to vote, and who would not?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend thinks it desirable to disqualify men of alien enemy origin, I presume he would also disqualify the wives of men of alien enemy origin. That could be easily done because if the majority of the House determines that those men should be disfranchised, naturally their wives would also be disfranchised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like to get the intention of the hon. member for Humboldt. Is it his intention by the amendment that there would be disfranchisement of the wives of Germans, Austrians, Turks, and Bulgarians, naturalized within the last fifteen years?

Mr. NEELY: Most assuredly. I said we should recognize the principle of discrimination; you would have to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would not be the effect of the amendment if it passed although of course, other clauses could be changed accordingly to bring about that effect. In so far as the alien enemy born are concerned, any one of them naturalized within the last fifteen years would not be able to vote, whether male or female, but in so far as Swedish born are concerned, a woman would be a naturalized British subject the moment she landed in Canada if she then married, and as soon she acquired her residence in the province, whatever it might be—it is one year—she would be entitled to vote. Is it the intention of the hon. member for Humboldt that the man should be required to be here three or five years, before he could become a naturalized citizen and have the right to vote, and that the woman could get that right in one year?

Mr. NEELY: She will only have the right to vote and come under the operation of the franchise if she marries a British subject. So far as I am personally concerned, I would say in answer to the Secretary of State, that I would be perfectly willing to trust with the franchise a Swedish woman married to a British subject for one year, in war time or any other time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A naturalized British subject?

Mr. NEELY: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would make her a British subject. Of course, if she was born in Germany, she would have to be here three years and the man would have to be here five years, but a Swedish woman who marries a naturalized British subject of German origin, after one year's residence, is entitled to a vote. Would the hon. gentleman support that legislation?

Mr. NEELY: That is a side issue. Cases of that kind would be exceedingly few.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are thousands of them.

Mr. NEELY: As we are discriminating we can very easily provide for cases where women marry British subjects of alien enemy birth. If you are taking the franchise away from a man of alien enemy birth it is a simple thing to say that his wife shall not have it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If she marries a British subject of alien enemy birth, she will not be entitled to the franchise?

Mr. NEELY: She will not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If she marries a British subject who was not of alien enemy birth she will?

Mr. NEELY: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not that discriminating against a British subject of alien enemy birth? Is that not exactly what we were warned against yesterday by the hon. gentleman's leaders?

Mr. NEELY: I am not trying to be consistent because I recognize that the whole Bill is a mass of inconsistencies. We are recognizing the principle of discrimination all through this Bill. We are passing this special Act to get away from the usual Dominion Franchise Act and to do that by a process of discrimination. My point is this: Keeping, as we hope to do, as near to the provincial franchise as possible, where a man has a vote his wife should have a vote also.

Mr. NESBITT: The Secretary of State has given as an illustration the case of a Swedish woman who came here and married a naturalized British subject who, under this Act, would have had to be here since 1902. We take it for granted that he would be a proper British subject if he had been here during that time. I would be perfectly willing to give that woman a vote. I have no dread of that sort of a voter. I have no such dread of the naturalized 5 p.m. alien as my hon. friend has.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not give the same right to the man?

Mr. NESBITT: Why not? I cannot see why not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a woman was a naturalized British subject and a Swede came to Canada and married her next day would my hon. friend be prepared to give that man a vote?

Mr. NESBITT: If the Swede were here a year and if he had become a British subject I would give him a vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A naturalized German woman who has been here since 1902 is entitled to a vote. A Swedish man comes here and marries her the next day after he arrives. Would the hon. gentleman give that man a vote?

Mr. NESBITT: No, not the next day.

[Mr. Neely.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what he wants to give the woman.

Mr. NESBITT: He would have to wait a year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would have to wait a year by the law of the province but he would be a British subject next day after his arrival. My hon. friend would give him a vote after a year's residence in Canada?

Mr. NESBITT: Sure I would. I do not object to giving these men votes. There are lots of men up in my constituency who will be disqualified and who are just as loyal and just as good citizens as the Secretary of State is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I only want to know what the hon. gentleman intends. If he intends that, all right.

Mr. NESBITT: Sure; that is what I intend. I would not cut them out. My hon. friend here (Mr. Neely) has moved a resolution which I am going to second and which follows the provincial law. The provincial Act does not say that if they are here a month or a day they shall be naturalized as British subjects. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they can become British subjects in a day.

Mr. NESBITT: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They would not have a vote in a day but they would be naturalized.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the use of splitting hairs in that way? The hon. gentleman, the House, and the country know what I mean. I am not a bit alarmed about these aliens. I have aliens in my constituency, many of whom are serving in the war, who are just as loyal as the Secretary of State is or any gentleman on the other side of the House.

Mr. DEVLIN: We have in that riding a respectable body of Indians, several of whom have enlisted and have gone overseas. Will the squaws in that case have a right to vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not under the Bill as it stands, for this reason, that the Bill requires women to qualify as to age, race, and residence in accordance with the laws of the provinces, and under the laws of the provinces the Indian race has not a vote.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend the Secretary of State yesterday took credit for having granted the franchise to a new class of voters, to the women who are relatives in near degree of the men who have enlisted. So far so good; nobody quarrels with that. But my hon. friend, while actuated by this praiseworthy motive, cannot conceal the fact that he is taking away the franchise from many female subjects of His Majesty who ought to have it if the law were properly carried out. I understand that my hon. friend proposes to maintain the principle of the provincial franchise in this Bill; and wants to depart as little as possible from the laws that exist to-day except that he proposes to extend the franchise to the female relatives of the men at the front, and that he is taking it away from voters of alien origin. As the law exists to-day in five provinces, women have the franchise. We had this discussion yesterday, but we are now considering the framing of this measure, and it is perhaps as well that we should have a little more discussion on it. Section 6 of the Dominion Elections Act, which we are now amending, reads:

> For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, the voters' lists shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which, on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion election, were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of that province, for the purposes of provincial elections.

Mark the words with which this section begins: For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, the voters' lists shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be the voters' lists for a Dominion election. My hon. friend told us yesterday what is well known to be a fact, that in Manitoba and British Columbia the lists which are now in existence have the names of female voters upon them.

I would think that, if a Dominion election were held under the Act as it stands, these men and women who are on the list in Manitoba and British Columbia would have a right to vote. The Secretary of State shakes his head. Yesterday we were told that the law officers of the Crown, the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General, and the Deputy Minister of Justice, were of opinion this this Bill did not give the franchise to women. Of course, every man has his own way of interpreting the law. I may be right in my view, or the interpretation placed upon the Bill by the law officers of the Crown may be the correct one, but we have to accept the opinion expressed by the law officers of the Crown. I should like to have a judicial interpretation, but that is not possible. In my view, the language is as plain as plain can be. I think that the lists have to be taken as they are, and that the provincial franchise in any province is the one upon which the law is to be administered, and under which the Dominion elections are to be held. The minister told us yesterday that section 6 did not apply to women. I do not understand why it should not apply. If the law of the province makes a person an elector, and that elector has the right to vote in a provincial election, I cannot understand why he should not also have the right to vote at a Dominion election. There is no question in such a case, if it be a male voter, that he has the right to vote at a Dominion election, but it is said that a female voter has not the same right and I cannot understand why. The law officers of the Crown have decided otherwise, and we must abide by their decision. If the law to-day is that women in the five provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, and British Columbia have the right to vote at provincial elections, there is one thing certain, namely, that these women expect to have the right to vote at Dominion elections, and they will all claim it. My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) states that the Premier has been deluged with telegrams from women protesting against being excluded from the operation of this Bill, and if section 6 of the Dominion Elections Act is not sufficient to cover the point, and grant the right of suffrage to these women who have had it in the five provinces, why should it not be provided that they should have it? My hon. friend has rather played upon words, in his answer to the hon. member for Humboldt a moment ago. He puts the case of a Swedish woman marrying an alien, and he stated that she would not have the right to vote. That is a very nice point. These women would have to choose between the husband on one side, and suffrage on the other. A woman would have to decide whether she would rather have a husband and no vote, or a vote and no husband. What reason can be urged why these women who have the provincial franchise in these five provinces should not have the franchise for the Dominion? My hon. friend's Bill reads:

> The qualifications necessary to enable any male person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as in the Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such male person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

In a subsequent part of the Bill there are provisions to exclude some of the women who to-day are voters in the provinces. Those of alien origin who have been naturalized since 31st March, 1902, are excluded. If the amendment of my hon. friend from Humboldt were accepted, the Bill would read:

> The qualifications necessary to enable any male or female person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as by this Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such male or female person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Necessarily, if this provision were accepted, it would have to be qualified later on by the same provision which excludes men of alien birth from voting. That would follow as a consequence; a certain number of those women might be excluded also, and in the same way a certain number of men are excluded from the franchise. At all events, the franchise would remain to those women who are not wives of aliens, but the wives of British subjects by birth or otherwise. That cannot be contemplated by the Act, and it seems to me that no good reason has been advanced by the Secretary of State why the amendment of the hon. member for Humboldt should not be accepted. It all comes back to this: Shall women have the franchise or not. My hon. friend has stated, and the Prime Minister repeated, that the only basis for suffrage for women was service and sacrifice. Well, there are different degrees of sacrifice. There is greater service and there is less service. It is a question of degree. But, at all events, nobody can deny that there has been service. It is freely recognized by the Prime Minister, and by the Secretary of State, that all classes of women have been serving. Some have served to the limit of their ability, but all have made more or less sacrifice. Under the circumstances, if the principle is to be adopted it should be followed in all its consequences, especially in these provinces where the women have the provincial franchise, and where it is thought by a majority of the electors that they should be permitted to participate in the rights exercised by men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I draw attention of the leader of the Opposition to the fact that section 6 provides the list, and does not give the franchise. Section 6 says:

> For the purpose of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province the voters' list shall, except as herein otherwise provided . . . .

What is "otherwise provided"?

Section 10 reads:

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

And other sections say that minors and judges shall not vote. The franchise is provided for in other sections. This section provides how the list of those qualified in that way shall be compiled as the list for the election. The courts have held, rightly or wrongly, that the word "person" as used in relating to the franchise, cannot be held to include both sexes. I am not arguing whether the law courts are right or wrong. The law officers of the Crown have advised—and I have looked into it as carefully as I can—that that is the effect of the decision.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the question ever come before the courts in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question never came before the courts of Canada, but it has been decided in the courts of England under precisely similar conditions.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is very different there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to explain the reason why our point of view was arrived at. I did not rely on my own opinion in the matter. The opinion given by our law officers is very powerfully supported. It is quite true that, if the amendment moved by the hon. member for Humboldt were adopted, by a few changes later on, the law could be made to adjust itself and have the effect the hon. leader of the Opposition contends for, namely, that of including in the female franchise all those who are in a similar position to those included in the male franchise. But I contend that that would not be a fair effect, for three reasons. First, because of our naturalization laws many women would be enabled to get the franchise after one year's residence in Canada. Second, the representative compensating character and value would be altogether removed from the franchise. A great deal would be done, it is true, in the way of giving the franchise to the women of Canada, but no special compensation would be given to the soldier. From the electoral standpoint, the provision would be of just as much service to the slacker at home as it would be to the soldier overseas; indeed, it would be of more service to the former. Lastly, the change would not follow a clear, bold line of sacrifice. I know that there are other lines of service than that of having a son or a brother at the front; there is very useful service, frequently the best that any woman can give. But you cannot measure that kind of service. We were asked yesterday to include in the provisions of this Bill those who knitted socks for the soldiers. How many socks? Half a sock, one sock, two socks or a thousand socks? We have to adopt a bold, clear line; we have to take the line that differentiates those who make the highest sacrifice from those who make what must be described as a minor sacrifice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is seeking to cast ridicule upon the work of the women in making socks for the soldiers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The women of this country, as has been admitted, have made every sacrifice it has been possible for them to make in connection with the war. I submit that no argument can be offered against the desirability and justice of giving them the right to vote. I am willing to support the amendment moved by the member for Humbold (Mr. Neely). If nothing more can be done for the women of the country, at least the franchise ought not to be taken away from them in the provinces where they now enjoy it. The Solicitor-General knows that he is taking away the right of franchise from some of the women of Canada. He puts in as the qualification for voting the words which are applied to Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon, and he repeals or suspends during the period of the war this section which gives the qualification to women in those other provinces. The qualifications for all the provinces but Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon are the provincial lists, whether they include men or women. Section 10 of the Dominion Elections Act, which is suspended by this measure, reads as follows:

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not what we suspend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why did not my hon. friend continue that section as the section providing the qualification? He does not do that; he provides that the qualification set out in section 32 shall be the qualification throughout the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In other words, instead of providing for the smaller portions of Canada—Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon—the same qualification that the Dominion Elections Act provides for the rest of the Dominion, he provides that the qualification in respect to those three districts shall apply to the whole Dominion. He suspends the operation of section 10 and brings into force the operation of section 32. As he knows, section 10 applies to all of Canada, except Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon, and section 32 relates only to Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not do that at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend does, because he suspends the whole of part I.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has made a curious mistake.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not made a curious mistake.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has it exactly upside down. We repeal section 32 as it is and we adopt section 10 and put it in this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is wrong. By section 1 of the Bill it is provided that during the war and until the completion of demobilization after the conclusion of peace, the operation of part 1 of the Dominion Election Act shall be suspended.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But we take section 10 and put it in; and we repeal section 32.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, my hon. friend does not put in section 10.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do, but we use the word " male."

Mr. PUGSLEY: Instead of using the word " person " as it is used in the whole of the Dominion Elections Act except that part of it which applies to Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon Territory, my hon. friend puts in the word "male." Notwithstanding the advice of the Justice Department, he is not willing to take the chance that the word "person" means male person. He inserts the word "male," and thereby limits the franchise to male persons in Canada. Surely that is altering the law with regard to women having the right to vote. I affirm, notwithstanding what the Minister of Justice says, that if a woman, whether married or unmarried, is a person in the eye of the law, she has the right to vote in every province where her name appears on the provincial lists, except in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Yukon Territory. My hon. friend says that he goes by some judgment of a court in England. Well, that judgment was given a long time ago, in a special case, and at a time when women in England were looked upon not as persons, but as chattels. They were the property of their husbands, to all intents and purposes; when they were married whatever they had in the way of personal property went over to the husband by virtue of the marriage contract. That judgment was delivered at a time when people were imbued with the idea laid down by Blackstone that the English law was very tender in dealing with the married woman when it permitted the husband to beat his wife only to a moderate degree. That was the view held in those days as to the status of woman. But through legislation and the decision of the courts, the status of woman has gradually become enlarged. To-day the law of England and of Canada recognizes her as a person, having civil rights just as a man has, and entitled to be recognized as a person. I believe that all the courts of the country, if the question came up, would recognize "woman" as a "person." But as I have said, the Solicitor General is afraid to rest upon the interpretation which would be given to the word person, and so afraid is he of that, and so desirous is he of making it sure that the women of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia shall not be allowed to vote, that he puts the word "male" before the word "person." My hon. friend says that he also rests upon the view of the Department of Justice. I happen to have before me an opinion which has been expressed by a gentleman who formerly occupied the position of Deputy Minister of Justice in Canada, an eminent lawyer, a gentleman who stands at the very top notch amongst the legal men of Canada, a gentleman of great learning and a very high authority. I refer to Mr. Z. A. Lash, and this is his opinion as expressed recently in an address to the University of Toronto:

> After the Ontario Act giving votes to women has been finally passed, as the Dominion election law now stands women, whose names are on the Ontario voters' lists, would be entitled to vote at Dominion elections. This affords a remarkable illustration of the interlocking of Dominion and provincial jurisdictions and machinery, all working together smoothly and in accordance with the spirit of the constitution.

Mr. MORPHY: How does the hon. member, apart from any court decisions, get over our own Dominion Act as to what constitutes a voter?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In what way?

Mr. MORPHY: On page 90 of this book of instructions, we find "Information for electors," which says:

> The following is the qualification of electors as prescribed by the Parliament of Canada:
> Every male person shall be qualified to vote at the election of a member under this Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What section is that?

Mr. MORPHY: It is in one of the schedules arising out of the Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will tell my hon. friend how I shall get over it. My hon. friend happens to be reading the instructions to the electors of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. MORPHY: One further question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the answer to the first.

Mr. MORPHY: On page 97 there appear the oaths to be taken by electors. The first oath is:

> You do swear that you are of the male sex and a British subject.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will read the oath carefully, he will find that those are the instructions to and the oath to be taken by the electors in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and in the Yukon—

Mr. MORPHY: Oh, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —and only in those provinces and in that territory. Let me show my hon. friend that I am right. This is very important, and I am glad my hon. friend called attention to it. If my hon. friend will look at section 35, which starts with the words—

> In the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

—he will find that it refers to the proclamation in Form G. Section 32 of this Bill. It says:

In the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, except as in this Act otherwise provided, every male person shall be qualified to vote at the election of a member under this Act, who, not being an Indian, is a British subject and of the full age of twenty-one years, and has resided in either of the said provinces for at least twelve months.

I am sure my hon. friend will find that the information to which he has referred is the information relating entirely to the voters of Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon Territory.

Mr. MORPHY: How about the oath? Are you going to make a woman swear that she is a man?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am answering one thing at a time. We shall now come to the oath. The oath, which my hon. friend dwells upon and which is to be found upon page 97, says:

You do swear that you are of the male sex and a British subject, that you are not an Indian, that you are of the full age of twenty-one years, and that you have resided in the province of Saskatchewan or Alberta or the Yukon Territory (as the case may be) for at least twelve months.

Mr. MORPHY: All right.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will turn to section 61 he will find that that form is the form provided specifically for Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Yukon Territory.

Mr. MORPHY: The electors must be males.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Section 61 says:

Every deputy returning officer in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory may, and shall, when he is required so to do by any candidate or agent of a candidate, administer to any elector either one or both of the oaths set forth in Form Z.

That is the form to which my hon. friend has referred and which I have just read, and the form which is limited expressly to Saskatchewan, and to Alberta, and to the Yukon Territory.

Mr. MORPHY: It deals with male persons, not with female persons. There is nothing about females there.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of course, it deals with male persons, because part II, relating to Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Yukon Territory, expressly limits the franchise to male persons.

Mr. CURRIE: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just wait one minute.

Mr. CURRIE: My hon. friend might explain why all the French Canadian members except one have left the Chamber, and that one is now leaving.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose they have a perfect right to leave, and I am gratified my hon. friends have remained while I am addressing the committee. I have a good attendance before me and I have not felt the loss of my French Canadian friends. I will refer to section 153. I feel my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) is entitled to have an answer to his question, because he does not suggest ridiculous things in this House.

Mr. MORPHY: Take your time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Section 153 says:

Except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory, an elector, if required by the deputy returning officer, the poll clerk, one of the candidates, or an agent of a candidate, or by any elector present, shall, before receiving his ballot paper, take such oath of qualification as by the laws of the province he may in the like case at a provincial election be required to take, such changes having been made in the form of oath as are necessary to make it applicable to the election being held, and there being added to such oaths, or substituted therein for any clauses dealing with the like matters or any of them, the clauses set forth in Form Y.

Let us see if Form Y, which is on page 97, says anything about being a male voter. Form Y says:

You swear (or solemnly affirm),—
That you have not been disfranchised under the provisions of the Disfranchising Act, or for corrupt practices under the Dominion Elections Act;
That you have not voted before at this election, either at this or at any other polling station;
That you have not received anything, . . .
That you have not, directly or indirectly, paid or promised anything to any person either to induce him to vote or to refrain from voting at this election.

There is no oath or affirmation there that the voter is a male person.

Mr. MORPHY: This only gives the corrupt practices part of it. It does not make the voter swear that he is a British subject.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Can my hon. friend show me where in the Dominion Elections Act the voter is required to swear that he is a male person except in Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Yukon Territory?

Mr. MORPHY: I have not searched for that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well, I have. I did so when I moved a resolution in this House two sessions ago. My hon. friend can search the Dominion Elections Act from beginning to end and examine all the forms, and nowhere will he find the requirement that the voter shall be a male person. The requirements of the statute, and the forms, proclamations and oaths which relate to male persons are limited entirely to those provisions relating to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory. I can assure my hon. friend that he has only to look at the statute to see that I am absolutely right. But the Secretary of State in this Bill is taking away the right of the women to vote; at all events the right of the women of the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia, where if they are persons they have the right to vote. My hon. friend may say they are not persons, but I say they are; a woman has always been recognized as a person in reality and in law, though law sometimes differs from reality. The women of Alberta and Saskatchewan are also on the provincial lists, and this Bill takes away the right which those women have by law to-day to cast their ballots at an election for the Dominion Parliament. My hon. friend has made it clear he is doing that, because he has put in the words "male person" and has made it applicable to the whole of Canada. Therefore, no matter what franchise may be given by any provincial legislature in Canada, when this Bill goes into force, notwithstanding any provincial franchise giving women the right to vote, their names will be struck off the provincial lists. That is wrong, and therefore I am prepared to vote, and vote heartily, for the amendment of my hon. friend from Humboldt.

Mr. KNOWLES: The question whether the amendment should carry is one of especial interest to a province like my own, where the franchise has been extended to our women citizens. I am a supporter of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Humboldt, believing that it is an improvement on the legislation which the Government has brought down. I am not quarrelling with the legislation which the Government proposes on this particular feature, but I submit that the Government should give more consideration to the possibility that their legislation can be improved upon. It is unfortunate that the Government seems to take the position that because a suggestion comes from this side of the House it must be laughed out of court, or met with taunt, or sophistry, or something like that. The leader of the Government gets up and says that on a certain occasion the leader of the Opposition, or the hon. member for St. John, said something or other. That is the kind of answer we get to a serious suggestion, made with a view to improving the legislation submitted by the Government. It is comparatively unimportant what view the leader of the Opposition, or the hon. member for St. John, held in the past with regard to women suffrage. The question, as I understand it, is whether it is right and just and in the country's interest that we should extend the franchise to the women in those provinces where the franchise has been granted for provincial purposes. Let us address ourselves for a moment to that question.

The Government manifestly has no lack of confidence in the ability of women to consider and arrive at a fair decision on the issues of the day. The very fact of the Government granting the franchise to certain women is in itself an admission that they believe the women of Canada are so mentally and morally endowed as to be able to pass judgment on the questions before the country. Now, if some women are capable of doing this, are not all women capable of it? No one suggests that the women relatives of soldiers are any different from other women, so far as assisting at a general election in this country is concerned. I can see no answer to that proposition; it admits of no debate. If we are to go as far as the Government goes we must, if we are to be consistent, go farther and give the franchise to all women who are entitled to it under the provincial law.

This legislation is but another example of the old practice of hon. gentlemen opposite, often done in good faith, because they have done it so often it has become a habit with them, of enacting class legislation. This legislation is but another form of privilegism; it is the last remove from democracy to give the vote to a mere handful of women and withhold it from the rest, for no reason at all except the flimsy, sophistical reason the Secretary of State has given. Now what is his reason? He says that if we were to give the vote to all women, it would be no prize to the soldiers' relatives. Those are not his exact words, but that was his idea, framed in his own beautiful language, which I could not for a moment imitate, and the sophistry of which I trust I never for one moment shall. He says it would be a departure from the compensating feature to the soldiers' relatives. That is to say, all women are entitled to the vote, but we are withholding it from the majority because we wish to give the privilege to the soldiers' relatives. We wish to show them some favouritism, as a sort of compensation for themselves and themselves alone. That is class legislation; the principle is wrong and vicious. The reason given by the Secretary of State is one that will not stand analysis. Let us give to the soldier or to his relatives anything under heaven that will commence to compensate in any real sense for the sacrifice that they have made, but surely the soldiers' relatives would be the very last to be so unreasonable as to say: "Let us be the dog in the manger. Let us, and us alone, have the vote to which all women are entitled." Why should the women relatives of soldiers be thankful because the vote is kept from other women? The Secretary of State does not rightly understand the womanhood of Canada if he thinks these women will rejoice in the fact of being in a position of solitary majesty of their own, while their sisters are not able to exercise the franchise which they have received. I think my hon. friend had better get some better reason than that, and in all friendship and courtesy I suggest that he ask that this amendment stand for a little while that he may consider it, and if there is an entire absence, as there seems to be, of any real, cogent reason against the amendment, then let the amendment go through. There is no man more ready to admit the accomplishments of the Secretary of State than myself, but I do think that for some of the reasons he gives in this House when he goes home at night he must be ashamed; I cannot say in Parliamentary language that I think he should be ashamed of himself, but I certainly do think that he should be ashamed of his reasons. We had the Ross rifle for a while sending our boys to sleep in France and Flanders, when they should have been full-blooded boys, and the reason the Solicitor General gave for continuing to supply our men with that rifle was that we were liable for an action for damages if we broke our contract. Then he gave us free wheat, because he wanted peace on earth with the farmers out West. Yesterday he told us he was taking away the vote from people of enemy birth to protect the State, and when I confronted him with the terms of the naturalization certificate, whereby Canada pledges herself to give all political rights in this country to these men, the only reason he had to give was that in Saskatchewan they did something to the Chinese, and in British Columbia they did something else. There are four illustrations of reasons that the Secretary of State has put up, and I am bound to do him the compliment of saying they are not worthy of him. I trust he will look into all these matters—the reason of the Ross rifle, the reason of the free wheat, the reason for disfranchising the Germans because they did something to the Chinese, and the reason he gives now that he keeps the vote from all women because he says it would not be any special compensation to soldiers' wives if the rest of Canada got it. I would ask that the matter receive further consideration of the Government, and be not turned down for no reason at all that I can see, except it comes from this side of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: I must admit the Secretary of State has made the position of the Government perfectly clear. It is the deliberate intention of this Government in this Bill, as in the Military Voters' Bill, to establish in the Dominion of Canada a military voting caste, for the purpose of perpetuating the present Government in power. They are doing this without any parliamentary authority, and without the authority of the people, and by Parliament which is very little more than half representative. Such an exhibition of autocracy Canada never saw before, and we must take it for granted that a continuation of our hon. friends in their present position will give Canada more examples of autocracy such as the Kaiser will be glad to hear of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) stated that these decisions were arrived at in England in the old prehistoric times when women were chattels, and men beat their wives. As a matter of fact, the decision was in 1909 and is quoted in the Appeal Cases.

Amendment, Mr. Neely, declared lost.

Mr. McCRANEY: In view of the defeat of the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) and of the objections made to it by the Government, I desire to move the following amendment, which I hope will overcome the objection. I beg to move:

That section 1 be amended by adding after the word "war" in line 34, the words "or is a natural born British subject qualified as to age, race, and residence, as required in the case of a male person in such province or in the Yukon Territory."

The effect of that would be to enfranchise every woman who is a natural born

British subject, and get rid of the objection which the Secretary of State made in regard to the woman coming from Sweden, who lived here for a year and had the right to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It gets rid of the objection as to the anomaly of naturalization. but it does not meet the main points at all, namely, that the whole representative value of the vote is gone, and the line of service and sacrifice is destroyed.

Mr. MARCIL: Referring to the following paragraph, will the Secretary of State tell me what is meant by the words " in any of the military forces." Does it mean the military forces of Britain and Canada alone, or the military forces of the Allies as well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not the Allies.

Mr. MARCIL: Why not? We have thousands of Belgians and French who left Canada for the front. Why should not the wives and relatives of these men have the right to vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is worth considering.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When I brought the matter up first, the Minister of Justice promised me they would have that right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will take it into consideration.

Amendment, Mr. McCraney, lost on division.

Ayes 16; Nays 38.

Mr. McKENZIE: Perhaps the minister will tell us something about the words "naval forces" used in paragraph 33a. We have only two warships, or so-called warships. I would like to know what is meant by the qualification of men serving on the naval forces? Is it confined to men who have been engaged on those two vessels?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries can give more information as to the exact details of the naval forces. My hon. friend is no doubt aware that in addition to the force he has mentioned there are patrol boats in the Department of the Naval Service. Those boats are doing very good service on the coast of several of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Canada for instance, was in service many years before the war. I am not aware that the service on her is any different now to what it was before the outbreak of hostilities. Conditions on the Canada and similar vessels are not changed, so far as I know.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Speaking generally, and subject to fuller explanation by the Minister of the Naval Service. I would understand it to include all those vessels engaged in war service under the direction of the Department of Naval Service.

Mr. CARVELL: I feel that I would like to have a little more information on this particular point. As I understand this, boys who enlist in the Naval Service become soldiers or members of the Canadian navy. Many of these are minors. Many of them are trained in Canada. I know that there are many of them in Halifax. On what ground do the Government grant the franchise to the mothers and sisters of these boys who have never left Canada, and refuse the franchise to the mothers and sisters of men who have enlisted and who are at Valcartier or a hundred other places in Canada but who have not left Canada? The female relatives of these men will not receive the franchise, whereas the female relatives of the boys who have enlisted in the navy will. Surely we have sufficient discriminations in this Bill without going to that extent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There may be something substantial in the argument of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). His apprehension is quite correct that the female relatives of those who have not left Canada are not included in the words "in any of the military forces, or within or without Canada." It may be that there should be a limitation to make the Act fair. The reason generally for using the words "within or without Canada" with reference to the naval forces is that one man suffers just the same as the other. A man engaged on the sea is not in Canada, strictly speaking, but he is on the waters surrounding Canada. That is why the Act is drawn as it is. If you used the words "within Canada" you would exclude many of these men who should be included. It may be that there are some who should not be included. If there are such as the hon. gentleman describes who are simply in training and who have never been in actual service, it may be that a change should be made in the wording of the clause to exclude them. I will look into it at once.

Mr. CARVELL: I am glad my hon. friend is going to do that, and I hope he will amend the Act so as either not to exclude some or to include many others. The hon.

gentleman has had pointed out to him the discrimination that is being exercised in favour of certain persons and against many others in Canada. I hope that while the Solicitor General is trying to recast this Act, he will see if he cannot make it a little fairer to a great many people in Canada. However, we will have a chance of discussing this after recess.

At six o'clock the Committee adjourned.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 33B—Provincial disqualifications not adopted:

Mr. OLIVER: I think section 33A was under discussion when the committee rose. The hon. gentleman from Carleton raised a question in regard to the second and third last lines of this section, and asked for explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, we will take it up when the hon. gentleman arrives. I think I am safe in saying that section 33B is the same as section 11, part 1 of the present Act, and consequently had to be inserted here, in order to make it applicable to the whole measure.

Mr. OLIVER: I may be a little short in my ability to follow the reading, but it does not seem to me that the connection is well established between the first paragraph and the subsequent paragraphs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was troubled in the same way when first reading it. The section reads:

> No person possessed of the qualifications generally by the provincial law to entitle him to vote at a provincial election shall be disqualified from voting at a Dominion election merely by reason of any provision of the provincial law disqualifying him from having his name on the list or from voting.

The objects of the disqualification are the four classes described in the paragraphs following,—first, the holder of an office; second, any person employed in any capacity in the public service of Canada; and so on.

Mr. OLIVER: I can understand what it means, and I hope the minister will not think me pernickety if I say that it does not seem to me to say what it means.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it is quite clear. It is precisely the same form as section 11 of the Dominion Elections Act which reads, leaving out the immaterial words:

> No person shall be disqualified by reason of any provincial law disqualifying him, (a) the holder of any office, (b) any person employed in any capacity in the public service of Canada.

And so forth.

Mr. OLIVER: If it read as the Prime Minister reads it it would be all right. But it does not read that way.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think so.

Mr. OLIVER: Well, I withdraw my objection.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I read it leaving out the immaterial words.

Mr. OLIVER: But when the words are in it does not read in the same sense.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The section reads:

> No person possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law to entitle him to vote at a provincial election shall be disqualified from voting at a Dominion election merely by reason of any provision of the provincial law disqualifying him from having his name on the list or from voting—> (a) the holder of any office; or
> (b) any person employed in any capacity in the public service of Canada or of the province.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why does the minister insert there the word "generally?" If the person has the qualifications he has them, and that is all there is about it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are following precisely the present section in the Dominion Elections Act. It seems to me quite plain. No person possessed of qualifications generally which would entitle him to vote shall be disqualified by this provision under the provincial law.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would be better to say: "No person possessed of the qualifications required by the provincial law." There is no general qualification.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be a contradiction in terms if we adopted that suggestion, because the section then, in effect, would say: "No person possessed of the qualifications required by the provincial law shall, by reason of some of the qualifications themselves, be disqualified." If he has the general qualifications, this particular section will not disqualify him for Dominion purposes.

On paragraph (f)—Posting proclamation:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the Alberta and Saskatchewan provisions the list, as compiled by the enumerators, is posted up eight days before election day, and we are enlarging that to ten days.

Mr. McCRANEY: That is all right. Is it under this Bill, or under the Soldiers' Votes Bill, that you take four weeks between nomination and election? The time between the issue of the writ and election day will be much longer under these newer conditions than previously, and it is desirable that we should have a much longer time than ten days for the posting of the lists, because the enumerator will certainly require a great deal of time.

The returning officer will receive his writs, lay out his polling subdivisions and appoint his enumerators. There will then be, possibly, a month before nomination day, and a further period of four weeks after that before the election is held. But the lists should be put up a good deal more than ten days before the election.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not quite understand why my hon. friend thinks that a longer period between nomination day and polling day should affect this particular provision.

Mr. McCRANEY: My recollection is that under ordinary conditions a period of five weeks should be sufficient from the issue of the writ to the holding of the poll. Eight or ten days would then be all that could be allowed between the putting up of the lists and the holding of the poll—that is, giving the returning officer and the enumerators time to prepare their lists. In view of the fact that in this case time will be necessary to take the soldiers' vote, a period of four weeks is being set between nomination day and election day. Under the circumstances, that is all right; but that very fact should give you a longer period between the issue of the writ and the holding of the poll. Where five or six weeks was formerly sufficient, you now require probably ten weeks. In view of these considerations, you should have the enumerators lists completed and in the hands of the public by nomination day. The old law provided that the enumerators' lists should be posted up in public places the day before nomination day. There was plenty of time between the issue of the writ and nomination day for getting out the enumerators' lists. Even at ten days, therefore, the period between the posting of the lists and the holding of the poll is altogether too short. If you provided that the lists should be posted up the day before nomination day, you would give your enumerators as much time as they have had hitherto, and the public would have much better satisfaction. The enumerators' lists are of very little use to the Opposition party if they are put up only eight days before the election.

The Government candidate will likely assist in preparing the lists, and he will have access to them, but the Opposition candidate cannot do that. The Government party has all the material, and the Opposition party has not any. For that reason I think that the principle of the law as it stands should stand now; that the lists should be put up by the enumerators the day before nomination day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would never do to go that far. My hon. friend's contention is that, whereas five weeks were formerly sufficient between the issue of the writ and the day of the election, more than five weeks will now be necessary, because the period of a week prior to nomination day will not be sufficient to enable the proclamation to issue.

Mr. McCRANEY: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the period of a week is not very far from sufficient. At all events, I am informed that the one week will be almost sufficient. It must be remembered that we have already made provision for earlier posting up of the notices—ten instead of eight days before the election.

Mr. McCRANEY: How long before election day will the lists issue from Ottawa?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Between five and six weeks.

Mr. McCRANEY: The hon. gentleman will not get along with anything like that. The returning officer gets the writ; the Government candidate brings in those who are familiar with the district in question and gets them to lay out the polls. It takes a good deal of time to lay out the polls in some of the western constituencies. In my last election there were 147 polls in my constituency. Just imagine what it means to get men who are familiar with all the different districts, have them meet the convenience of settlers in making the necessary arrangements, see that the polls are laid out, get your enumerators appointed, see to the posting up of the proclamation, and things of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You adopt the provincial poll.

Mr. McCRANEY: I am speaking now of a Dominion election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But in the Dominion election, the provincial polls are adopted under paragraph (g).

Mr. McCRANEY: The hon. gentleman will find that the boundaries of the Dominion constituencies do not coincide with those of the provincial constituencies. Moreover, there are provincial polls in Saskatchewan only in the cities and in the country districts the same procedure has to be had as is the case in Dominion elections.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see how there can be no provincial polls in the country districts.

Mr. McCRANEY: In Saskatchewan, I understand, the procedure is practically the same as it is in the Dominion. We follow the old Dominion law in respect of rural districts; the polls are laid out at each election, because there are no voters' lists.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they know where the polls were in the previous provincial elections.

Mr. McCRANEY: Not always; new settlements are springing up, new conditions have to be met. Of course, the matter is somewhat simplified by having information as to the polls used at the previous election, but in this case much of that information would be lost, because it is six years old.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is only two or three months old.

Mr. McCRANEY: I was thinking of the last Dominion election. In view of the fact that a period of eight or ten weeks is provided between the issue of the writ in Ottawa and the taking of the poll, a much longer time should be given than has hitherto been provided between the posting of the enumerators' writs and the holding of the poll. The law now says that the lists shall be posted up the day before nomination. That should be the law in this case, because the returning officers and enumerators will have just as much time under the amended law as they had before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is familiar with the working of the Dominion Elections Act in Saskatchewan and has an acquaintance with the kind of constituency where the period required would be the longest. But we worked this out pretty carefully, and we really think that we can bring the election on within six weeks from the date of the issue of the writ. We may be wrong in that, but we cannot be very far out. Every member in the House is anxious that the time be no longer than that, if possible; six weeks between the issue of the writ and the day of the election is just about enough of that kind of stress and turmoil. We are going to try to bring it on within that time. It may be that a slightly longer period could be allowed, but it seemed to us that ten days was enough for all that there was to do. Possibly twelve days might be allowed; we shall consider that.

Mr. McCRANEY: Under the law as it now stands the public are to be in possession of the enumerators' lists at the moment the candidates are in the field. The candidates are in the field one week before election day, and one day before that the lists are to be posted up so that the public shall be in possession of the lists when the candidates formally take the field.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no real connection between nomination day and the posting of the writs.

Mr. McCRANEY: I think the intention was that when the candidates went into the field, the public should have possession of the lists upon which the voting was to take place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see the connection between the nomination day and the posting of the lists. I do see that the fullest time possible should be given between the time the lists are posted and election day in order to enable a candidate to reach the electors, to provide for his getting about as much as possible, but I do not see that nomination day has anything to do with it. We shall see, however, if we can make the time any longer.

Mr. McCRANEY: What does the minister think about extending the time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have made a note of the matter to see if we can make the time longer. All we have to do is to add an amendment to this section. There are some other things that have to be changed also.

On paragraph (g)—Subdivision of electoral district into polling divisions:

Mr. MURPHY: Do I understand that the words inserted and the words added form one new section?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is all an amendment to section 37.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would suggest that when the Bill is reprinted the addition commencing in line 32 with the words "he may adopt", which is in inverted commas, be dropped down a line and made to commence a new paragraph. It is very confusing to have words inserted in that way. The same applies to the words inserted commencing in line 25 with the words "except in the provinces".

Mr. MURPHY: That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

On subsection 3—Separate and additional polling stations where polling division has more than 300 voters:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subdivision 3 comprises exactly sections 28 and 29 of the old Act.

Mr. MURPHY: This is just breaking up one subdivision into two where there are more than 300 voters.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McCRANEY: In regard to what I had to say as to paragraph (f), I may say that I had the provincial law in mind. My hon. friend need not bother any further making a note of the matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I was under the impression that this was the law as it exists to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why repudiate it here then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reason is this: In our first section we say that, during the present war, part I shall be suspended. But there are two or three sections in part I which we cannot suspend, but which should be brought in in their proper place here.

Mr. MURPHY: Like section 10 which we discussed this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, section 10 was one; section 11 was another, and this is a third.

On subsection 4—Returning officer to obtain documents defining provincial polling divisions:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is section 22 of the old Act. There is no change at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: That could not apply to Nova Scotia then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It applies everywhere, just as it did before. It was section 22 of part I which applied everywhere outside of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. OLIVER: Subsection 4 is not absolutely identical with section 22 of the old Act. In section 22, there is a paragraph (b), which is not contained in subsection 4. It may not be necessary, but I am calling attention to the fact that subsection 4 is not actually a reproduction of section 22.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should have mentioned that. The reason is that paragraph b of section 22 of the existing Act refers to provincial lists. As there are none in this case, of course, it is not applicable.

On subsection 5—Certified copies of provincial lists to be obtained:

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is section 23 of the old Act.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the reprinting of the Act, may I add to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) the further one that, where an existing section is reprinted for the reasons stated by the Solicitor General a few minutes ago, that might be indicated by a different kind of type, or by a foot note, or something of that kind. This section is divided up in a different manner from that in which it is printed in the original Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suppose, after the measure passes, it will be necessary to print part II of the Dominion Elections Act with these amendments, as otherwise it would be impossible for a returning officer, or indeed any one else, to understand it without a good deal of study.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall have to reprint not only part II, but the whole Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And the Military Voters' Act with it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would suggest that the latter part of section 33B be made a new section. In the same section there are two separate amendments very much mixed up. The Solicitor General might keep that in mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be possible to have the Act read sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and so on, in which case section 33B can be made a new section. I am not quite sure whether that is possible or not. The usual provisions of a revision will be followed in reprinting the whole Act.

On paragraph (h)—appointment of enumerators to make lists.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I want to bring to the notice of the committee the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, the special conditions with regard to Prince Edward Island. In that province we have no lists at all either for Dominion or for provincial elections. We have vote by ballot. A good many years ago we had lists, and I heard the candidates, men in public life at that time, saying that the preparations of those lists and the revision of them from time to time caused them more trouble and expense than the holding of an election.

But that system was abolished. Since then both Conservative and Liberal Governments have been in power in that province, and the present system works so well that nobody thinks of making a change. And I feel that if the Government could see its way clear to leave conditions as they are in that province it would be very satisfactory to the people there. There is no insuperable difficulty in the way, I should think. I was very much impressed the other day by the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), who is a moderate and a reasonable man, to the effect that the method provided in this Bill for drawing up the lists was practically the same as that which prevailed in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta some years ago, which was found to lend itself to improper practices, more particularly to what is called the tied ballot. I should be very sorry to see anything like that introduced into Prince Edward Island, where we are getting along first-rate, and where there is not even a suggestion of tampering with the ballot or anything of that kind. I think it would be very unfortunate if we now introduced into the province a system which might give rise to a suspicion of improper practices such as took place in Saskatchewan and Alberta some years ago.

If we had no lists, no enumerators would be required, and that much money would be saved. It might not amount to a great deal, but it would be a saving just the same. I suppose there are about 130 polls in the province, and there would be an enumerator for each poll, at a cost, say, of $100 apiece, which would not be extravagant. That would amount to $13,000, which the Government might just as well save. I was speaking to the Secretary of State about this matter the other day, and he spoke very fairly about it, so far as I could judge, but I know he is a clever man, and, perhaps, he was just jollying me a little. He very fairly and frankly stated, however, that if the members from Prince Edward Island supporting the Government took the same view as I did, he would see that present conditions, so far as Prince Edward Island was concerned, continued. I have spoken to the members from Prince Edward Island supporting the Government, and while they have not given me any definite answer, they have very frankly stated that the enumerators under this Bill would practically be organizers for them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot agree with them on that.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The members were not very much interested, but undoubtedly they expected some party advantage from this method which they were unwilling to give up. I have an amendment here that I would commend to my hon. friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we were to accept it, the Act would have to be very greatly amended.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: All that would be necessary, I think, would be to say that the provisions of this Bill with regard to the drawing up of the lists by enumerators should not apply to Prince Edward Island, but that every other provision would apply. The procedure there is very simple. An elector presents himself at the polling booth on election day and asks the deputy returning officer for a ballot, and in ninety-eight cases out of a hundred he is entitled to a ballot. In Prince Edward Island we have a homogeneous population and everybody knows everybody else, and the qualifications are very simple. If the agents of one of the candidates think that the man is not entitled to the ballot, objection is raised, and decided upon right there by the returning officer, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred satisfaction is given. If the returning officer has any doubt in his mind he puts the voter under oath. If conditions are left as they are in Prince Edward Island, it could do no possible harm to anybody.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is it not a fact that under the system which my hon. friend commends in Prince Edward Island, the candidates themselves are put to the trouble and expense of preparing lists on their own behalf? It is perfectly true, as I understand it, that there are no official lists, but it does become necessary for candidates at an election in that province really to prepare their own lists.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Yes. But as I have already said everybody there is acquainted with everybody else, and there is no difficulty. The agents of each candidate prepare a small list for themselves, either typewritten or handwritten, and there is no expense attached to it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Do they not really have to perform all the duties which an enumerator has to perform, finding out who are the electors, where they reside, their names and so forth?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: There is no trouble at all about that, because everybody there is acquainted with all his neighbours. The fact that the local government has adopted the system, and that nobody ever thinks of changing it, is the best proof that I can give to the Prime Minister and the committee that it suits local conditions. The present system saves trouble and expense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member spoke to me about it, and I said virtually what he reports to the committee. I said that I thought it was a subject on which I might well be advised by the members from that province, Liberals as well as Conservatives. I have not had an opportunity since then to see any of the other members, but I have made inquiries from other sources, and I find there is this difficulty: If we were adopting entirely the same franchise as before, then in a province like Prince Edward Island, where there is little actual movement in and out of the population, and where everybody knows everybody else to a degree that does not obtain in other provinces, it is conceivable that perhaps the most convenient way would be to do without this. But even under those conditions I can remember hon. members from that province complaining to me at other times that they had to make their own lists, and that it was a matter of great expense to them. That might not be the case in the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. J. J. Hughes), but in a constituency like Charlottetown, for instance, I can quite understand that it would put considerable extra expense on a candidate. I can remember that the figure was given to me as over the thousand dollar mark.

But the point is this: The same franchise is not adopted. Everybody of the male sex had the vote before, and it was easy to tell who did not vote, because virtually everybody did. Now it is very different. There may be some disfranchised as aliens, I doubt if there would be many, and there are certainly many of the female sex to be added. There will be many of the female sex who will be entitled to vote, and there will be very many who will not. Consequently, the question as to who votes, and who does not vote, is a much bigger question and requires more decision now than before. That is why we need the lists, otherwise it will be all left for decision until election day. I have not seen the other members from Prince Edward Island since my hon. friend called on me, but it would appear that it would be in his own interests to have the lists compiled in the same way as in the other provinces. It must do good, as far as it goes. There will be no extra work done that has not to be done in any event, and the line between the voter and the non-voter of the female sex will be clearly drawn and known before election day.

Mr. HUGHES: There is some expense that the candidates have to bear in this way. The official lists would be very useful if they wanted to send reading matter from Ottawa to their constituents, but for the sake of an election they are not so useful. If the Secretary of State cannot see his way clear, or the committee cannot see its way clear, to adopt the suggestion I have made and have no lists or enumerators at all, I have another suggestion to make. We want to have a fair election, and to take no advantage of anybody, Conservative or Liberal. Let us give the Liberals one-half of the enumerators.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sure if my hon. friend will consult the members from Saskatchewan and Alberta, he will find he is quite wrong about that. They will assure him that enumerators are needed, not as organizers at all.

Mr. HUGHES: I know that some of my colleagues from Prince Edward Island expect to get some advantage in that way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will be deceived.

Mr. HUGHES: They may be deceived. As I understand it, the Secretary of State would not think of the suggestion I have made that we should have one-half of the enumerators?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Neither side will have any. The enumerators will be officials of the country; they will not be officials of either side.

Mr. HUGHES: Who will recommend them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The returning officer appoints them.

Mr. HUGHES: Who will the returning officer be?

Mr. MEIGHEN: His name has not been determined on yet. He will be a very fair man.

Mr. HUGHES: I suppose those things cannot be helped. I had occasion to say a few words on the conscription Bill when it was going through the House, and my idea was then, and it is still, that the best thing to do was to have a general election. I felt that would clear the air better than anything else. I made the statement that if the Government would hold a fair election, and was returned to power, whether I should be in Parliament or out of Parliament I would give them every assistance I could in carrying out the law. I would like to keep my promise in that respect, but it is coupled with a fair election. There will be no difficulty in having a fair election so far as our province is concerned, whatever difficulties may arise in the other provinces where, perhaps, people go to greater extremes. I feel satisfied that if we can have conditions there as we have had them for many years, it would conduce greatly to give our people the impression that we were having a fair election, but if new conditions are introduced, and we have such a system as they had some years ago in Saskatchewan and Alberta, which lent itself to improper conduct in regard to elections and provided facilities for crooked work, I fear our people will come to the conclusion that we are not likely to have a fair election, and may think that there will be some improper work carried on. However, I cannot do any more than present my views to the committee, and say that I wish very much the Secretary of State would consider whether my suggestion is or is not practicable. I know it would be possible to carry it out, and I believe it would be practicable to leave conditions as they are in that province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is the very great difficulty that it would leave to election day the determining of who votes as a woman voter, and who does not. I am afraid it would be a pretty big problem to deal with this on the day of the election. It is very different from what has taken place before.

Mr. BUREAU: Before six o'clock, the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) asked the Solicitor General if the wives, sisters and other female relatives of those who are British subjects and are serving in the French or the Belgian army would have the right to vote, the same as the wives and sisters of those who are serving in the British army. The Solicitor General said he would look into it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The fact of the matter is that is the way the Bill read in the former draft I prepared, but I made up my mind it would be unfair and dangerous. I thought if it was in the Bill there would be very great objection from the other side of the House. I felt it would be unfair to include it, and I will tell you why. It would be too difficult to ascertain whether the allegation of a person who wanted to vote was correct or not. For example, how could we find out whether the man was serving in the Russian army? There are all manners of population in our western country, and the enumerator might, if he was the least unscrupulous, perhaps encourage some people to think they had brothers or relatives in the Russian army. How could that ever be checked? The same would apply to any other army. We can check them in our own army, or in the British army, and can get their numbers, but if we are going to open it to the Allied armies, I am afraid it might be subject to very great abuse.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think it would be so difficult. All those British subjects who lived in the cities, such as Montreal, Quebec, or Three Rivers, for instance, are well known. The enumerators could get evidence from persons whose word could be taken or whose oath could be taken.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be cases of that kind, of course.

Mr. BUREAU: The French Consul, for instance, would know of those men who were British subjects and who enlisted in the French or Belgian armies. He would know exactly where those men are. I do not see any reason why the wives, daughters, widows and mothers of British subjects who are fighting in the ranks of the Allies should be deprived of their right to vote, if the relatives of other soldiers are granted that right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be cases that could be ascertained. In my own constituency I would very much like to have this in the law, because there are many French reservists who have gone over from there. But if you open it to one you must open it to all. If you open it to those who claim they have relatives in the Russian army, the Japanese army, the Roumanian army, or any other army, how could you ever check the claims that will be made? I think it would be impracticable and dangerous.

Mr. BUREAU: The burden of proof would, of course, be upon the applicant.

If a woman could not establish to the satisfaction of the enumerator, or the judge, or whoever it is, that she is entitled to vote, of course she would be refused. It is better to refuse twenty than to refuse a whole class who are entitled to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be just a matter of credibility, because the applicant would have no way of establishing it, in the majority of cases at all events, except by swearing to it and perhaps getting somebody else to swear to it. I do not think there would be any documentary evidence that could be produced in one case in a hundred.

Mr. BUREAU: There might not be any documentary evidence but they could accept the oaths of people who know them well. I do not think there could be anything like the conspiracy which the hon. gentleman mentions for the purpose of procuring the vote for a man. The list of the enumerator will show that his application for a vote is supported by the oaths of persons who are credible, who have known him for a long time and who believe that he has a right to vote, and the enumerator can thus satisfy himself that the application is correct.

Mr. PROULX: In the Military Service Act the Government is leaving the appointment of certain members of the local tribunals to the judges. I think it would be a good provision to be put in this Act that the enumerators shall be appointed by the judges. Where there are district judges, they know the people in the different localities very well and I think it would be safer that the enumerators should be appointed by them. They would not be as partisan as if they were appointed by the returning officer, who will be appointed by the Government. The returning officers are generally partisans who are recommended to the Government by the members supporting the Government or the defeated candidates or the persons who hold the patronage. The judges would be more impartial in the appointment of enumerators.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member (Mr. Proulx) has made rather a cruel attack on the fairness of the measure passed by his very distinguished leader and in force for many years. These officials have always been appointed by the Governor in Council or the returning officer. I do not see how the judges could very well come in there. The returning officer is the man who has charge of the constituency for election purposes. He has charge of the working out of the whole machinery of the Election Act applicable to the constituency. He divides it up into polls, and goes about from place to place and appoints enumerators. I do not think that as a rule the returning officers are partisan. I may be very innocent, but in two elections I contested, where I was the Opposition candidate, I did not think that there was any partisanship, and I do not see how there could have been to any great extent. I believe that these men, appointed to responsible positions, intend to observe their oath of office and to discharge the duties that the oath requires. It would be impracticable to bring the judiciary into this. We had better leave the judiciary out of something.

Mr. PROULX: These officers always belong to the party which has control of the appointments. The enumerators can do more to the detriment of the Opposition party, probably, than the returning officers. The returning officer only carries out the law.

9 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney), or the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), can answer that better than I, but I think they would say "no" to the allegation of the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx).

Mr. McCRANEY: As the Secretary of State calls me as a witness, I would say that in my experience there has always been great difficulty in getting a returning officer. The duties are very arduous as compared with the remuneration. When a returning officer is willing to accept the office, a great part of the clerical work is thrown on the Government candidate. The returning officer does not know the riding as a rule. It is hardly as the Secretary of State has explained—that he lays out the polls and appoints the enumerators. The whole riding has to be laid out, and men who know the districts have to take the enumerations and they must be partisans, but the Government candidate has to assume the responsibility and see that there is a fair election. I was glad to hear the tribute the Secretary of State paid to the persons appointed by the late Liberal Administration.

Mr. McCREA: The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) a little while ago called the attention of the Government to the fact that there were 12,000 or more officers in England, men who had received commissions before they enlisted, who went to the other side and then found there was no place in their rank for them. They are around London and other cities in England, having taken no part in the war and not having been at the front. The hon. member recommended that these men should either be sent to the front or sent home. How does the minister propose to deal with these gentlemen? Will the wives, mothers, sisters and fathers of these officers be given a vote, and, if so, on what ground? It is the intention to give votes to the female relatives of men who are wearing the khaki and drawing the King's pay, but who have not done anything and are not likely to do anything in connection with the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member (Mr. McCrea) very much over-states the phase of the subject that he is drawing attention to. I think he is multiplying by about ten.

Mr. McCREA: I am stating what the hon. member for Parry Sound said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member said hundreds instead of thousands. All overseas forces are treated alike. It would be utterly impossible to discriminate between the merits of the men in the overseas forces for the purpose of the franchise just as it is impossible to discriminate between the individual merits of men in Canada. We had to take the class. The relatives of all overseas men will be treated alike.

Mr. KNOWLES: If it is possible to discriminate between people in Canada and those overseas, is it not quite possible to discriminate between those in England and those who are in the danger zone at the front?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do that. We take all in England, of course, because they may go from England to France any day. It would be impossible to say that only the relatives of those in France should vote, because many of those in England may go to France any day at all.

Mr. KNOWLES: Many of them will go at no day at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that is very likely.

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask if the hon. gentleman's statement as to inability to discriminate between members of the expeditionary force serving overseas will apply to those who are engaged in the Canadian War Office—if that is what you call it—in London?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any who are employed there, who are not members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, would never be included in this Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: If they are members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they are members of tthe Canadian Expeditionary Force they will be included. I think a great many of them are returned soldiers who have seen service and are back in that office in London unfit for further military service.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does it apply to men who are still within the borders of Canada, who have not left, but who are liable to go at any time now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should think that even if the man has only got as far as Halifax, the sacrifice made by his wife or mother is as great as the sacrifice made by the wife or mother of the man who is twirling a cane and walking up and down the Strand or Picadilly, and who never goes any further.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a very great difference. There is no question as to the man in Canada. We know whether he has gone across the ocean or not. But it would be perfectly impracticable to work it out on the other basis, and say that the relatives of those who are still in England should have votes, because by the time the enumerator makes up the list these men might have gone to the front. That is not so in regard to the men in Canada. I would have no objection to giving a vote to the relatives of those who are still in Canada. But there might be an incentive for men to join the force in some capacity, not altogether too bona fide, in order to get the votes. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to enfranchise the female relatives of soldiers in Canada, we will consider it, but I really do not think they want it.

Mr. MURPHY: There was some evidence given before the Returned Soldiers' Committee by the Auditor General. Speaking of the investigation into that London office, he told us under oath that it would have saved the country thousands of dollars—I think he said hundreds of thousands—if they put a lot of the men out on the street and got them out of the way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What office was that?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know whether it was the Pay Office or what department. I would not like to say at present, but I can get the information for the minister. If there are men there who are not real soldiers, but are just playing at the game, I think the discrimination to which my hon. friend referred should properly be exercised. In order that the matter may come under the observation of my hon. friend, I will send him a copy of that evidence, because my recollection is that the matter was gone into rather in detail, and the statements of the Auditor General were confirmed by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R B. Bennett), who, I think, had some personal knowledge of the conditions existing in that office. That occurred only a few months ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the whole matter has been cured now. It can have no application to this Bill. This Bill deals with the members of the expeditionary force. If they were playing at soldiering at that time, they must now be in active service, to come under the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: When was it cured?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When we know there is a disease we immediately cure it.

Mr. MURPHY: Not in the case of the Ross rifle.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not seen the evidence to which the hon. member refers. I think this discussion will be dealt with better on some other occasion.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) is under an entire misapprehension as to the purpose of this Bill, or he would not have brought up the point he mentioned. He must know that this Bill is for the purpose of manufacturing votes for the Government, and he must surely know that the man who is drawing pay, without giving service, under the authority of this Government, is surely more certain to cast his vote for the Government, when the time comes, than the man who is compelled to render service, for which he is paid.

Mr. McKENZIE: As we are talking on the question of enumerators, I think this is perhaps as good a time as any to talk about the condition of things which this Act is going to introduce into my own province I think the Prime Minister will sympathize with me in the difficulty which I experience in regard to this Act. We have a most happy condition of things in regard to the list in Nova Scotia, and in every other province, I suppose, as well. There is no such officer as an enumerator in our province, and no disturbing elements about the list. About the first of January in each year a man begins to look around, and see that names are properly put on the list. About the 1st of April, the sheriff's court is through with them, and the list is handed in to the county clerk, certified by the sheriff, and a copy of that list is sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. That is done every year in every county in Nova Scotia. The machinery runs along smoothly. The revisers are appointed by the county council, and the town councils and city councils look after the lists. Nobody complains, and everybody gets his name on the list if he has a right to have it there; and if a name gets on the list when it has no right to be there, it is taken off. When it comes to election time, the returning officer gets this list from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at Ottawa. and that is the end of it; nobody interferes with it. Now we are up against a condition of things that we do not know really where we are. I cannot gather from this Bill when the list is to be completed, or whether a complete list is to go to the returning officer who is appointed, say, for my own county of North Cape Breton and Victoria. The Government appoints a returning officer for the county. I do not know where he is going to get his complete list. I find some machinery by which twenty or thirty people will go round the county making lists. I find nothing in this Act providing when they are to begin, or what kind of system is to be followed as to where they shall sit, or how they shall conduct the business, or what opportunity one has for getting a name off or on. I must say to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State that it is introducing into the province of Nova Scotia a very disturbing element indeed, and one which is capable of creating a lot of confusion. If there is any way by which the present machinery of making the lists can be utilized in Nova Scotia, I am sure it would satisfy the people very much better than this measure. The present officials are not partisan. Whatever the complexion of the council may be in Nova Scotia, whether there is a majority one way or the other, each Councillor has always been permitted, so far as I know, to name his own officers. If there is a Tory councillor for the district, as a rule he has Tory officers, and if there is a Liberal councillor, although there might be a Tory majority in the county, he gets his own officer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is the sheriff appointed?

Mr. McKENZIE: He is appointed by the provincial government, I never heard any complaint as to him. The county officials have been men of high standing, and I have never heard any complaint about them. I think the same is true of every sheriff in Nova Scotia. I appeal to the Prime Minister in this matter, and I tell him that if the machinery now in vogue in Nova Scotia for looking after the lists were utilized, every one would know where to go, and how the thing was to be done, and it would work out, I think, very much better. As it stands, I must admit, I do not know where it begins or where it ends. At present the lists are to be fixed and tinkered with right down to election day, which must necessarily be unsatisfactory to us who are unaccustomed and unacquainted with anything of that kind.

Mr. NESBITT: I ask the Secretary of State if I am right in thinking that in 33 A, the words "who is serving or who has served without Canada" will include those that have been sent home and been honourably discharged?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In regard to what the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has said, I am afraid that the members on this side of the House are not quite so well pleased with the lists in Nova Scotia as he is. I am bound to say that, as far as my own county is concerned, Donald Archibald, the sheriff who acted as returning officer in many of the elections and who was final arbiter on the lists, was as fair a man as could be found in Canada, and I have not a word to say against him. As far as I know, the same is true of the present occupant of the office. But I have had reports from gentlemen on this side of the House in regard to some other sheriffs that are not precisely of the same tenor. One hon. gentleman has asserted to me that 192 names were dropped from the lists in his county by the sheriff without his knowledge and after it was supposed that the lists had all been settled. He gave me pretty definite information as to that. My hon. friend knows that for many years past there has been an effort in Nova Scotia to obtain judicial revision of the lists, but that demand has not yet been complied with. I am quite sure, therefore, that the view entertained by members on this side of the House in regard to the condition of the lists in Nova Scotia is not quite the same as that which has been expressed by my hon. friend. However, so far as the operation of this Bill is concerned, I do not think that there will be any difficulty. The enumerators will commence work as soon as they are appointed, and their work must be completed under the terms of the Bill as it is at present, at least ten days before election day.

Mr. McKENZIE: How are they to go on with their work? Are they to have a court, sitting in some particular place?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They go on precisely in the same way as they have gone on for the last twelve years in Alberta and Saskatchewan. The provisions of this Bill so far as enumerators are concerned are based on the provisions of the law as it has existed in those provinces. The only difference is that this Bill provides certain safeguards which have not been enforced in Alberta and Saskatchewan during the period of twelve years to which I have referred.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In Alberta and Saskatchewan there are no lists, but in the other provinces for which we are now preparing new machinery they have lists—in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. We are giving the enumerators power to recast those lists. What is the object of that? So far as I can see, it is simply, on the one hand, to eliminate the names of those who, according to this Bill, should not be on the lists because of their being of foreign origin; and, on the other hand, to place upon the lists the names of female voters who, under this legislation, will have the right to vote as relatives of soldiers. The enumerators take off names here and put on names there, but as a result of their work there is no official decision; the vote can be challenged at the poll and it is provided that a judicial authority shall afterwards determine whether or not the name was properly put on or taken off the list. If the work of the enumerators settles nothing, what is the use of having the work done? Let the lists be taken as they are. A man goes to the poll to vote; objection is taken to him on the ground that he is of alien enemy birth. If he persists in his claim to the right to vote, he casts his ballot and the question whether or not he had the right to vote will be decided after the election by judicial authority. What is the use of having all this machinery? The great advantage of the lists in all the provinces is that the right to the vote is settled by the presence of the man's name on the list; no one can be challenged if his name is on the list. It seems to me that this work is of absolutely no use.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is true that there were no lists in Alberta and Saskatchewan; therefore, lists had to be made. It is true, also, that in various provinces of Canada there are no complete lists—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes there are.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are no complete lists for the purposes of this Act, because names must be added and names must be struck off. It is necessary, therefore, to make new lists. If we had followed in their entirety the provisions of the Act which my hon. friend thought was good enough for Alberta and Saskatchewan for twelve years, there might be some ground for complaint. As I understand the law of that province, a man could obtain the right to vote by making an affidavit; there was no appeal against that, and no remedy in respect of it afterwards.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The same as it will be here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The man went on the list; he disappeared the next day; no one could find him; there was no remedy. Gentlemen from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have pointed out that the enumerator there was in touch with one candidate and not in touch with another, the result being obvious. If we had adopted the method that my right hon. friend thought was a fair method for those two provinces for 12 years, I admit that we might be subject to some animadversion. But we have not done that. We have provided in this Bill that the vote of any man whose name gets upon the list through his making an affidavit may be afterwards challenged. Any person who goes on in the regular way is subject to having his right to vote challenged afterwards. So that there is, in effect, a judicial revision of the lists—that revision, if any is necessary, is to take place after, not before, the voter has deposited his ballot. The safeguard is the same in one case as in the other, and that safeguard was absolutely wanting in the provisions of the Act that my hon. friend kept in force in Saskatchewan for twelve years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Act with regard to Saskatchewan and Alberta was framed in 1905, when the provinces were created. We took then the provisions that we found in the existing law. We took them as they were. We could do nothing else. There could be no provincial list, because there was no province.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Why could my right hon. friend not have provided a judicial revision in Alberta and Saskatchewan?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not aware that there has been any complaint in that regard. There may have been. While I contend that everything we did was right, we may have made mistakes. Our regime, however, was so good at all events, that the only complaint that was made against it was that we remained in power too long, and that is the reason we were defeated. We did too well. The great difference between the law as it exists to-day and the law that will exist after this Bill passes is that, under the law as it is to-day, the lists which are made are final. The lists are revised by a judicial authority, and then after a man's name goes on the list, it is no longer challenged.

Mr. CROTHERS: It can be challenged at the poll.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The list is revised by the judicial authority, and his decision is final.

Mr. CROTHERS: If a man is asked on election day to take an oath, he has to do so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, he cannot be asked to do that. When the judge is revising the lists, a man may be disqualified, but after his name has been put on the list, there is no challenge; the matter is fixed finally. This Bill is very complicated, but if I understand it aright, the list will be made by the enumerator. That officer will take the list which is made to-day, which would be final and the present law, and will strike off names and add on names, but the question whether those names have been properly stricken off or added remains to be decided after the vote has been taken. If that is to be the law, why not leave the lists just as they are? Suppose a man's name is put upon the list by an enumerator, and it so happens that he was born in an enemy country. He comes to the poll and is challenged. He may claim that he has a right to vote and may ask for a certificate from the enumerator. The enumerator will give him a certificate; his name will go on the list, and his vote will be taken subject to its being accepted or rejected afterwards by the judge. All this revision is of no benefit. You will have no saving of time or expense; in fact, you will have all the trouble and expense of the enumeration to reach the same conclusion to which you can attain to-day under the law as it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: the point is just this, that the work is 90 or 95 per cent done instead of the judge having to do it afterwards. If the right hon. gentleman's reasoning was correct, we might as well never have a list and simply have a challenge on election day. That would mean that the judges of Canada would have to revise 1,750,000 votes, whereas by having lists made up by the enumerators as carefully as their abilities can do it, you reduce to a mere fraction of one per cent the work that a judge would have to do.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What section are we at?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Paragraph (h), section 42, at the bottom of page 3.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not understand that the former clause was passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not passing anything; we are passing from one to another.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are touching them all.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the procedure in Alberta, at one time the procedure embodied in this measure was partially followed in that province. The provision was made that the man whose name was not on the list could swear his vote on, and that vote was subject to subsequent adjudication before a court.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is in the provincial election only.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. It was found in practice, if my memory is correct, that this resulted in other than the public interest, and instead of making the vote, after being cast, subject to adjudication, as to its being counted, it was considered to be sufficient that the man who attempted to vote should take an oath thereby rendering himself personally liable to a penalty if he had exercised the right improperly. Experience showed, in the judgment of the authorities there, that it was not in the public interest that the validity of the vote itself should be the subject of judicial investigation. It was considered that the penalty for taking a false oath was a sufficient restraint to answer the requirements of the public, although theoretically, of course, it was not an altogether equitable, final decision. This Bill goes fufrther and provides for the tying up of votes of men whose names are put on the list by the enumerator.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would my hon. friend suggest that we had better have the proposed judicial revision eliminated from this Bill and make it precisely as it is now in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to take the responsibility of introducing the legislation that my hon. friend sees fit to introduce.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is trying to give suggestions.

Mr. OLIVER: The Secretary of State has laid emphasis on the statement that he is following the conditions in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: But providing safeguards.

Mr. OLIVER: I am pointing out that, if I understand the matter correctly, he is following conditions as they have been, but abandoned in Saskatchewan and Alberta for reasons that prevail there but that may not be valid in other parts of the country. I am only desirous that there shall not be a misunderstanding on the part of the committee as to the facts of the case, and that the committee may not be impressed with the idea that the provisions of the Bill are desirable in application throughout Canada because it has been found necessary, owing to special circumstances, to apply them as they are applied in Alberta and Saskatchewan. What did occur in Alberta when the principle that is contained in this Bill was embodied in the provincial law was this: Ballots were tied up vexatiously, for the purpose of improperly influencing the election in this way: A number of votes would be challenged, and they would be tied up. They would not be counted at the general count. Then there would have to be a semi-judicial investigation as to the validity of those votes, and there is always the possibility of manipulating the evidence that might be brought to bear, and if the first count seemed to be to some extent indecisive, then the election had to be fought all over again in the courts in regard to those tied ballots. It was not because the principle was not theoretically sound. The principle was,theoretically,absolutely sound, but in practice it did not work out properly, and, if I understand the matter correctly, the authorities decided rather to take the chances on the occasional count of a vote that was not valid than to prejudice the conclusion of the whole election by reason of dilatory legal proceedings.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I imagine my hon. friend has a wider experience as to the effect of such provisions than any other member of this House, and naturally any suggestion that comes from him based upon his long experience are entitled to very careful consideration. I understand him to state as a result of that experience that the system of judicial revision having been tried, and the system without such judicial revision having been also tried for a number of years, it was found that the latter system was on the whole the more satisfactory of the two.

Mr. OLIVER: The lesser of two evils.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And that for the reason which he states very forcibly, namely, that the uncertainty, the delay and inconvenience attending a judicial revision rather outweigh any danger which might result from the lack of such judicial revision. I shall take his view into very careful consideration, as there is a great deal of force in what he suggests, and his suggestion is based upon a very long experience of both systems. Perhaps the matter might be allowed to stand over for the present, and I will confer with the Secretary of State in regard to it.

Mr. OLIVER: I only wished to inform the committee as to the actual facts of the case, and I was led to do so by what I heard the leader of the Opposition say. I am not sufficiently familiar with the Act to know whether I took the right point or not, but I thought that where provincial lists are adopted, and insofar as they are adopted, it would not be an improvement at any rate to provide for any tying of ballots on account of challenge of those votes which were on a fixed list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In so far as the lists are adopted, there is no tying of ballots at all. It is in so far as the lists are changed that there is a tying of ballots.

Mr. OLIVER: But not the fixed lists?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to make sure that I understand this Bill correctly as it applies to the older provinces, particularly Ontario. The list which will be adopted in the province of Ontario, subject to change by reason of this Act, will be that list which was finally revised in the autumn of 1916. The method of that revision is well known. The list is prepared from the assessment roll, and finally revised on appeal by the county judge, except in cities, where they have registration. Do I understand that that is to be the basis of the list in Ontario, subject to the changes made by the enumerator owing to the provisions of this Act? Voters who are disfranchised under this Act will have their names removed from that list.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There will be changes resulting from both enfranchisement and disqualification.

Mr. GRAHAM: And the enumerator will have to add to the list the new voters who are enfranchised by this Act? As I understand the proposition of the Government, so far as the list of 1916 as finally revised in Ontario is concerned, there will be no rejection of ballots, except by the ordinary form of challenge. Under ordinary conditions the scrutineer challenges a vote for any cause. If the voter takes the oath prescribed by law the vote is counted. Under the present law that vote will still be counted. So far as new votes are concerned, which are to be added by the enumerator, if objection is taken to any vote it is placed in a separate receptacle and not counted, except under proceedings which may become necessary on account of the closeness of the vote. I imagine that what my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) had in his mind was that the tied ballot would apply to the fixed list as well, but that is not the case. There is a good deal to be said, however, for his contention as to the merits of the two methods. Whether more will be gained or lost by placing those challenged ballots in a separate receptacle, is a question for the committee and the Government to consider very seriously.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are advantages and disadvantages in both methods.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is another point in connection with clause 48. As I understand it, the voters' list as finally prepared by the enumerators will not be posted, in Ontario, until ten days before polling day. In the county of South Renfrew, for instance, ten days would not give the candidate an opportunity of any practical value of having in his possession a voters' list, which is a very necessary thing for a candidate to have. In a constituency that is over a hundred miles long, and where the electors, particularly in winter time, can only be reached by team, it would be impossible to make any use of the voters' list if it were not posted for a longer period than ten days before polling day. Even in a small constituency it would be very difficult to make practical use of it in such a short time. Of course, the candidate will have in his possession the list of 1916 as finally revised except for the changes to be made by the enumerator, but the names of the women voters who are to be added will not be in his possession, and those are the ones about which he will show a great deal of solicitude, and have probably little or no information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would point out that the similar provisions in force in Alberta and Saskatchewan provide for only eight days before polling day, and that in a country which some years ago was very sparsely settled, and is not as thickly populated to-day probably, as the portion of Ontario to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. NESBITT: It is eight days before nomination day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, eight days before election day.

Mr. NESBITT: The old Act says eight days before nomination day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In the Alberta and Saskatchewan Acts it is eight days before election day, and if their Acts would work satisfactorily under conditions such as I have described, it would seem to me there would hardly be the difficulties that my hon. friend anticipates in the county of Renfrew or in any other county in the province of Ontario. However, the Secretary of State has already said in reply to the hon. member for Saskatoon that we will consider extending that period of ten days, and we are going to consider it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no knowledge of conditions in Saskatchewan and Alberta, but I take it for granted that practically every resident there would have a vote, so that a candidate travelling over a constituency out there would not be likely to miss many voters.

But with this new addition of the women voters the situation will be a little different. You will not be in a position to know, unless you inquire intimately, whether they have relatives at the front. The situation is different from what it would be if you were dealing with men living in the vicinity who you would take it for granted, had the right to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is one matter I want to make clear, because I am very anxious that there should not be any mistake whatever in regard to the meaning of this law, and I invite the attention of the hon. member for Edmonton to the point. When I stated to him and to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) that there were no tied ballots in relation to the lists that are not adopted and fixed, but the tied ballot appertained to the work of the enumerator only, that is true in spirit, but it is not absolutely accurate. In this sense: all the enumerator can do is to add the names of women who are entitled to vote. All he can strike off are those who should be struck off for alienage or as conscientious objectors. Suppose he should strike off a name saying that the party was a conscientious objector, and if that were not true the man whose name was so struck off, if he was on the original list, could go and vote. Then the ballot would go into an envelope and become tied; so that, strictly speaking, a man on the list might get into the tied ballot list.

Mr. GRAHAM: The work of the enumerator is subject to the tied ballot system?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is nothing reviewed by the judge except the work of the enumerator. A man should not be on the list, let us say, because he has moved away, but the enumerator cannot strike his name off for that reason, and even if he does the man can vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: As it is at present in our province, if you are going to move to have a name struck off the list, there is one day in the year on which it can be done and that is the fifth day of March, the day on which the revising board meets. You must serve the man with a notice that on that day you are going to move before the court of revision to have his name struck off. In this case the enumerator has the power of the revising board; he has the power to strike a name off. What opportunity do you give any person to be heard, and upon what facts does this enumerator strike a name or names off?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He gets as good evidence as he can get, and he acts on that. But the party does not need to appeal, because all he has to do is to go and vote. He can make affidavit that he is entitled to a certificate of refusal, and he votes.

Mr. McKENZIE: But his vote is not counted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is counted, if the judge finds he has the right to vote.

Mr. CARVELL: Suppose a hundred, or two hundred, or three hundred names were struck off the list by the enumerator—

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are only 300 on the list.

Mr. CARVELL: I am speaking of the electoral district.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have to consider the polling division as the unit.

Mr. CARVELL: Say there should be 300 of these men struck off in an ordinary constituency. I want to tell you that if you had to deal with some of the people we have to deal with in the Maritime Provinces, you would know how easily it could be done. These 300 votes would not be counted, they would be placed in envelopes, and would finally reach the judge. Think what a burden that would impose upon the candidate, to bring those 300 witnesses in order to prove they are qualified voters. I confess I never had any experience in preparing lists by enumerators as hon. gentlemen in this House from the West have had, and they would know very much more about it than I do. At the same time, it seems to me it makes the enumerator practically a dictator. That is so repugnant to the ideas we have always had in the East in regard to the preparation of voters' lists, that I view it with the greatest alarm. Think of a man, who is always a political supporter of course, being chosen to go around the country and make up a list of the female voters, and who would also be allowed to strike from the list the names of any voters who are aliens, or former aliens, or conscientious objectors. So far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, I think the number of the aliens and conscientious objectors is practically nil. This enumerator starts to make out a list of the female voters. There seems to be practically no appeal from his decision. He works in the dark, or at night, and anywhere he has a mind to, and strikes off practically whomever he pleases. All we know is that ten days before the election one of these lists is put up in the post office, and that the enumerator is to be at some place for two hours each day after that to listen to objections. But suppose he will not listen to them? It seems to me this work should be done by the same officials who are making up the lists at the present time, at least in the provinces east of the Great Lakes. Almost invariably, these enumerators are representative of both political parties. In the province of New Brunswick you will find once in a while a board composed altogether of Liberals or altogether of Conservatives, but that is a very rare occurrence. Each party has a chance to be heard. Before a man's name is removed he must have notice, and after the list is made it is posted up and notice given that at a certain time the board will meet to revise it. I should think some arrangement of that sort might be arrived at. They have had this system of enumerators in the West, but we have never had it in the East, and I can see all sorts of trouble looming up. I would like the Government to consider if there is not some way of utilizing the machinery already existing for the preparation of those lists.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to ask the Secretary of State if subsection 2 so numbered, at the top of page 4, refers to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan alone.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The four western provinces and Prince Edward Island. Wherever the enumerator makes a whole list, he uses as a basis any information he can get.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the minister had stated that before, I think it would have cleared up the matter to a great many gentlemen on this side. It would be a very unfair provision to apply in my own province at least.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Why?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would practically do away with the provincial list. In section 65 A it is provided that the list in force for provincial purposes shall be adopted by the enumerator. But under subsection 2 the enumerator is given power to make an entirely new list. I would make a suggestion. I understood from the Secretary of State this afternoon that he had the manuscript in typewritten fo m of what will be Part II, that is, he has all the sections with the amendments proposed in this Bill written in. Would it not be possible to send that to the printer immediately and have it back perhaps some time to-morrow. It is almost impossible to understand the Bill as it is, and one's time is taken up in trying to read it, leaving very little to consider the principle of the Bill or make suggestions. It is most confusing. I do not think it is a fair way to put a Bill before the committee. Usually we have marginal notes in Bills, which are very helpful. For instance, if subsection 2 on page 4 referred to the fact that it was applicable to British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, it would have helped a great many of us on this side. I do not believe we can make much progress with the Bill in its present form. It might be a very simple affair and perhaps we could dispose of it very quickly if it were in some better shape. This is the most horrible Bill that I ever saw before Parliament.

Mr. CARVELL: I feel very much as my hon. friend does. I had to leave last Friday and I took a copy of the Bill with me. I thought I would have plenty of time on the way down to digest it. I might as well have been reading a Latin grammar that I had never seen as to read that Bill. It was not Latin, it was Greek, to me.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would have been perfectly plain to my hon. friend if he had had a copy of the Dominions Elections Act with him.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not have a copy of it. If I had had half a day to myself and a copy of the election law, I might have arrived at some conclusion as to what the Bill meant.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend will find that it is not as difficult or complicated as he imagines, when he grasps the basic idea of it, which is that the polling subdivision is the unit for the preparation of the lists in Alberta and Saskatchewan. That law is the basis of this Bill. They adopted the principle in the Act of 1905, based upon a previous Act, that the polling subdivision should be the unit for the preparation of the lists. It rather impressed me with its simplicity, and I do not think it will be difficult to understand this Bill if we keep that idea in mind.

Mr. MACLEAN: Is it not possible to carry out my suggestion about having the Bill printed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be possible. I did not want, first of all, to go to the expense, and, secondly, the delay, of printing a large number of copies until we knew what would be its final form.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Only Part II would need to be printed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would not be complete, because Part III is essential to an understanding of the effect of Part II. I intend to have that printed, and indeed we could start to-night and print it, but if we did we would likely have to amend it substantially before it got through committee. I know that the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken will have no difficulty with a copy of the Election Act before them. I could get on without a copy of the Election Act at all. Certainly, the Bill itself is not very likely to have much meaning without the Election Act read with it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some of us on this side of the House, with a little labour, could understand the Bill, but a great number would have difficulty in even understanding it. It is only right that they should have some proper understanding of the Bill before they are asked to consider it.

Mr. ROSS: I would like to back up the suggestion made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) with regard to the machinery in connection with this Act. It is all very well for the Prime 10 p.m. Minister to say that it is based on the polling subdivision. Let me state what that would mean, and for the purposes of my illustration I will take the riding of West Middlesex in which there are eighty polling subdivisions. It means that you will have to appoint eighty enumerators in that riding, and that they will have to sit for ten days before polling day to prepare these lists. That is going to put an immense expense upon the country. In the 234 ridings, supposing there are eighty subdivisions in each and you have an enumerator for each polling subdivision, the expense is going to be very heavy. I think it would simplify matters if this provision of the Act were reversed. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Carleton is sensible and practical. He says: Why not use the present machinery? Speaking of Ontario particularly, this work might be left to the township and municipal clerks in each municipality who have the preparation of the lists in charge.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not applicable to the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. ROSS: I am speaking of Ontario. There is no reason why the Act should not be made applicable to Ontario if a more sensible and less expensive method is proposed than the one suggested. In rural and town municipalities—it may not apply to cities—why should not the township and municipal clerks prepare these lists, and, during the ten days when the enumerator sits, why should not the township clerk sit at the township hall and revise the lists in the ordinary way? He is more familiar with the lists than any other person in the county. In West Middlesex there are sixteen municipalities, and sixteen township clerks would do the work. Under the system suggested by the Secretary of State you will have to appoint eighty or ninety enumerators who are not familiar with the lists or with the people as the township clerks are. You save a great deal of expense in not having to appoint all these enumerators, you have the lists perfected, and on election day one man, the deputy returning officer, will do all the work that you are asking the enumerators to do under this Bill. That would simplify the matter very much, and you would be able to carry out the spirit of the Bill much more intelligently and much less expensively than if you adopt the plan suggested by the Secretary of State. That hon. gentleman said a moment ago that the enumerator would only have the power to add the names of the female relatives of soldiers and strike off the names of people of alien birth and conscientious objectors. He said that he would have no right to strike off a non-resident if he came back to vote. Are we going to have non-resident voters under this Act? If a man has gone from West Middlesex to Carleton, say, and is on the voters' lists, although he is living in Carleton, will he be allowed to come back and vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the law stands in that regard as it was if no Act were passed.

Mr. ROSS: Under the present law he could not vote at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then, if he could not vote at all, he could not vote under this.

Mr. ROSS: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that that man could come back to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gave that as an illustration. If a man on the list in Ontario cannot, by virtue of the Ontario law vote, because of being a non-resident, although he is on the list, he cannot vote under this Act. I did not know that. If that is the case my illustration has not any force. I will give another. Suppose that the enumerator says that a man is not of age.

Mr. ROSS: He could not do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He could not do that. That man will go on and vote. It does not enable a non-resident to vote if, according to the Ontario law, he cannot vote.

Mr. ROSS: I would like the Secretary of State to consider the suggestion I made because I think it is far more practicable than the plan proposed.

Mr. EDWARDS: In suggesting that the township clerks take the place of the enumerators who will be appointed for each polling subdivision does my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) propose that the township clerk should go to each polling subdivision within his township and ascertain the names of the women who may be added under this Act?

Mr. ROSS: I do not see any reason why he could not. No man is more familiar with that township, and all the persons residing in it, than he is, and if you have, as a protection to the voter, a further provision that the township clerk shall sit in the town for ten days, to have names added to the list or names struck off, I think you have every protection to the voter.

Mr. EDWARDS: There would not be very much saved, in the matter of expense, if the township clerk had to go around and do the work of the men who were appointed at these various polling divisions to attend to the work. There is another feature of this question; my hon. friend must remember that each township clerk is, first of all, a servant of the township. It might be that under this Act he would be required to be present at a certain time to investigate conditions at some polling division and at the same time the township council might require his services along some other line. The township is entitled to his services first. The advantage of appointing an enumerator at each poll, in preference to appointing any one man who lives in some particular corner of the municipality, is obvious. Some one man in each polling division would be better acquainted with all the people in that polling division than an outside man could possibly be. I do not think the township clerk of any municipality would know what men were entitled to be placed on the list under this Act in every corner of the municipality. He might know most of them; he might possibly know more than any other one man would, but I do not think he could possibly be as well acquainted with each polling division as some person selected from that polling division.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not much concerned about whether we nominate the township clerk, on account of the saving of expense, although I think there is something in that, but I should like to see some public official appointed so that the suspicion of political partiality in the matter will be removed. The township clerk in Ontario has something to do with the preparation of the list. If you take the revising officer, or the revising board as we call it in New Brunswick, which prepares the list, or if you take the secretary treasurer in Nova Scotia who, I understand, prepares the list subject to supervision, you give it a final flavour. The people for generations, in the old portions of Canada, have been used to having their lists prepared by municipal authority, and while they have their own troubles, and probably some unfairness, yet the system works out very well. They know how to meet one another and how to argue these matters, and we get a pretty good list, as a rule. But I view with a great deal of suspicion, in eastern Ontario, the provision by which the Government is going to appoint its own political friends. They will start out to make a list, and I cannot see, after reading the Bill over hurriedly, any provision by which any person can appeal to that man and have a name added or a name taken off. He can go to them, but there is no provision for making an affidavit. You can go to a man and say: "Here is a certain woman who has a son at the front," and the official may say: "No, she has not a son at the front; he is at Halifax, and I will not put the name on." What is she going to do?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Vote.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but her vote will not be counted. She has to go before a judge later on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But supposing the system in Ontario were adopted, and you had to go to the judge first, and have the name put on, you would be put to the same expense as in the other case.

Mr. CARVELL: No. The local revision is all done within a very small compass. You can get the affidavits of the proper parties, and prove to the municipal authorities that the party is or is not enitled to be placed on the list, and you make your revision beforehand at practically no expense, because it is all done locally in each municipality—we call them parishes in the East, or polling districts. But when you force them to vote under protest you call it a tied vote. Then the court meets, and you bring all those people to the shiretown. In my constituency I might bring people some seventy-five miles to prove whether they had a right to be on the voters' list. I do not know whether my hon. friend has appreciated what this thing means. If you change this provision, so that the municipal authorities would re-revise the list, or add to the revised list, it would be an improvement. If you have municipal authorities in my province, or in any province in eastern Canada, who have the jurisdiction and the right to make the list of male voters, surely you could be able to hand over to the same authorities the power to make the list of female voters. You are introducing something we never heard of before in eastern Canada, and I can see no end of trouble and misunderstanding, and there would be no end of mistakes. An hon. member near me suggests that they will pick out the female voters who will vote the right way. I am not so very much afraid of that in the East, because people are known to one another, and if the different political organizations take hold of the thing and work hard enough, and they have an enumerator who is not too violent a partisan, you may get a fair list. But you have always the suspicion that it is not straight, and you may get hold of a political partisan—and I am sorry to say we have in the East, on both sides of the fence, men who will do things you can hardly imagine—and if you send a man like that around making up the lists by himself, without any one having the right to go to him, it will not be fair. He makes up his list, he is the man to whom you must appeal, and he may say, "I will change it," or "I will not change it." It seems to me you will have all kinds of trouble and unfairness under that system, whereas if the old machinery were adopted people will know what they are doing. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) referred to subsection 2 which provides that the enumerator has the right to strike a name from the list on the ground that the party was a former alien or a conscientious objector. My friend might say, "Oh, well, if he strikes a man off improperly the man still has the right to go to the tribunal and make an affidavit. But this is so foreign to our ideas down East in regard to removing names from the voters' list that I cannot accept it for a moment. We look upon it as an outrage to strike a man's name from the voters' list, unless you give him notice.

Surely a man ought to have the right to protect himself. He ought to have the right to say: I am not a German; I am not an Austrian. He ought to have the right to say: I am a person of Austrian birth, but I was naturalized sixteen years ago. Under this Bill you give the political friends of the Government the right to remove the name of that man from the list, and he has no alternative but that of swearing his vote. Later he may have to travel fifty or seventy-five miles in order that he may satisfy a judge that he had the right to vote.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does this Bill provide that persons qualified to vote under the Military Voters' Act shall have their names added to the list by enumerators?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The names of a great number of such are not on the roll.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a man qualifies under the ordinary civil law, he has the right to go on the list even though he is a returned soldier. But if he does he can vote only once; the Military Voters' Act provides that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There will be a large number of soldiers in Canada who are not registered but who will be entitled to vote by simply coming to the poll and taking the oath.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Such men could not get on the list in Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Quebec on that ground, because the Bill provides that only female relatives of soldiers can get on.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Most of the persons whose names will be removed from the electoral lists by reason of alienage will be found in the western provinces. Why should their names not remain on the lists and the oath be put to them when they come to vote? If they swear that they were qualified prior to 1902, they will be entitled to a vote. If anybody is of opinion that they were not naturalized prior to that date, they may be required to take the oath; if they decline to take the oath they lose the vote. Outside villages or any incorporated town or city in my constituency I should be willing to let the wives, mothers and sisters of soldiers vote without their names being on the lists. They would be well known in the several communities in which they resided, and if an oath were inserted in the Act which could be administered to those asking for the right to vote, that would cover the case. In larger places lists could be made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the same principle you might as well not have a list at all. If you do things that way, the whole election will have to be revised by the judges. Good list-making involves this: as much work as possible should be done before the contest; everything that can be finally decided should be decided before the contest. Such as cannot be agreed upon is subjected to judicial decision; but let us not leave everything to judicial decision. If every woman could vote by merely swearing that she was the relative of a soldier—and she might so swear quite honestly—thousands of votes might be polled that should not be polled at all.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My suggestion, of course, is applicable only to rural districts, where it would be almost impossible for any woman to claim improperly the suffrage under this Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is possible to conceive of an enumerator who would defy the obvious rights of a person who should be on the list, but such an enumerator would be notoriously crooked and notoriously stupid. Suppose the enumerator declines to put on Mrs. Smith whose son, everybody knows, is at the front. He could not do more harm to the candidate whom he is supposed to favour than he does by taking that course. Whenever that becomes known the people begin to feel that they had better vote the other way. It arouses disgust at once.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not the way it is done down East. They manipulate the votes not by refusing to put a man on who is entitled to be registered, but by putting on men who are not entitled to be registered. That is where the difficulty comes in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the names are posted up, the public become aware of the fact, and the same revulsion of feeling sets in. It may be suggested that this provision might be abused on polling day by too many challenges, but the same check exists in that respect. If people are sworn recklessly on polling day, it hurts the candidate whose agent does the swearing. The friends of those sworn make up their minds that they do not like that kind of work. I have known votes to go the other way as a result of instances similar to this; the thing works out all right in the end. It has worked out all right in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the people there are not a bit better than the people down in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; the enumerators are not a bit better or worse. It is in the interests of all concerned that the enumerators do the work in such a way that it will be acceptable to the public. It is suggested by some hon. gentlemen that we employ the township clerks to assist in making up the lists. The insuperable difficulty in that respect is that a township includes many polling divisions and you cannot work this Act out unless you have an enumerator for each division. That is the basic principle of the Act. The polling division is the unit and the enumerator attends to that division; he is right there on polling day; he does his work as best he can; he has to make out his certificates of refusals. If we appointed township clerks we would have to have many deputies.

Mr. ROSS: Not at all; the deputy returning officer would do the work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the deputy returning officer has not been doing the work all along. The enumerator has been doing the work, or, in the case the hon. gentleman suggests, the township clerk. He knows the lists; he knows Mrs. Smith; he knows why John Brown is off the list. He is in a position, consequently, to do the work well on election day. On the contrary, the deputy returning officer would be a new man on the job. He would have his other duties to attend to, and you could not reasonably heap these new duties upon him.

Mr. McCRANEY: Very frequently in the West we have to appoint enumerators as deputy returning officers, because there are many districts in which you cannot get two men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where there are small polls it might be necessary.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: It is half an hour since my suggestion of this afternoon, that this Bill be reprinted, was endorsed by my hon. friends from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean).

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is half an hour since the Bill went down to be reprinted.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I am glad to hear that the order has been given. We have lost half an hour, because it is difficult to understand this Bill as we have it. I hope that the Secretary of State will present a Bill with a proper classification of the clauses so that we shall be able to understand it. I suggest that we should discuss one clause at a time, so that everybody will know what is being discussed. I am glad that the Government has acceded to my request to have this Bill reprinted so that it may be presented in proper form.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Perhaps the committee is not acquainted with all the facts with regard to the ordinary ridings in Ontario. The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) suggests that the township clerks should prepare the list of names to be added. If he will think for a moment, I am sure his experience will tell him that the ordinary township clerk has something other to do than the business of a township clerk. In one township the man may be a druggist. The ordinary township—I am not speaking about those which are irregularly shaped—is about twelve miles by fourteen miles. Surely you would not expect a druggist or a merchant—and many country merchants are township clerks—to go over an area of twelve miles by fourteen miles in order to ascertain which women in that area may be entitled to be put upon the list under this caption. That would be quite without the mark. Let us consider another fact. The ordinary polling division, at least in my county, comprises at least between 150 and 200 names. If you have an enumerator in that district, he will be able to cast his eye over it and recall the names of the men in that district who have enlisted. It is then an easy matter for him to tabulate those names and prepare the list. Surely not much expense will be incident to that. As to the question of the enumerator remaining as it were in appeal, the Bill says:

> The enumerator shall attend at the time and place so designated for at least two consecutive hours on each of said ten days,

And so on. That will not mean much expense. Our hon. friends from the Maritime Provinces speak of all those officers being appointed, as it were, by law. As a matter of fact, in Ontario in many municipalities the same man may not be township clerk for two years running. He is simply appointed by the township council or the town council. One man may be assessor this year. He may become disgusted with the smallness of the salary, or he may have some other cares that take up his time, and may give up the position. The assessor is a "come and go" man. Yet the basis of the lists of the whole township comprising 600 or 700 names is prepared by a man who may be an assessor this year and who may never be an assessor again. He is in no sense an official of a Government, either provincial or federal; he is simply the creature of the township council for that year. The ordinary township clerk may be a farmer or a merchant. Surely you can expect an enumerator to put on the names of ten or twenty women in a division that will have from 150 to 200 names when you can trust him to put on the names in a township of 600 or 700 people. The matter is simple. No man in a polling division is going to be so grossly unfair to his neighbours as to exclude one woman or one girl who may be entitled to vote on account of being a wife or sister of a soldier at the front. As a matter of fact, the names will all be disclosed, because under this measure the man has to post up the list, and if he left one person's name off it would show that he was a partisan, and the mistake would in any event be corrected. Although the system is new in the old-settled districts of Ontario, it is not new in the unorganized districts such as Thunder Bay, Nipissing and parts of Muskoka and Parry Sound. This system of enumeration has gone on in those districts year after year, and I have never heard any complaint about it. The whole system of enumeration is so simple, it will prove so inexpensive, it is so summary and the people are so brought face to face with their individual enumerator, that there can hardly be any cause for complaint. When the facts are realized by hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, they will see, that at least in Ontario, the matter is a very simple one and should commend itself as being perfectly plain.

Mr. LALOR: I understand that the 1916 list is the last revised list we have in Ontario. What are the duties of the enumerators that are appointed? Do they simply add the names of the women voters to the list of 1916? Is that list the adopted list, or is there a means of putting qualified voters, other than women, on the list?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In Ontario, excepting cities or towns of over 9,000 population, the list, as prepared in 1916, is final, except that the enumerator may strike off any one because he is an alien or a conscientious objector and add on women who are qualified as being relatives of soldiers. He cannot do anything else. Further, as to the suggestion that has been pressed latterly, it may be recalled that Ontario now adopts the enumeration system. They call the enumerator a registrar, but he is an enumerator, in fact, even more so than he is under this Bill, because he is directed by the Act to go from house to house and to enumerate the voters. He must go out into the highways and byways and compel them to go on the list. It is not his duty to sit and wait until they come to him. We do not instruct the enumerator how he is to do his work. His duties are so local that it might not be necessary for him to go out at all, but he must get the names.

[Mr. W. H. Bennett.]

Mr. LALOR: The difficulty with accepting the list of 1916 is, I am afraid, that a great deal of injustice will be done to many electors. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) mentioned non-residents. Many people move from one county to another, or from one town to another. In Ontario such people cannot vote in the riding they have left, having ceased to be residents. With us their names are put on the list for the place in which they have taken up residence. This is done each year by means of a court of revision. I would like to see a similar provision in this measure by which such men could get on the lists in the place in which they reside. In the town in which I live there are many qualified voters who will not be on the list at all because there is no machinery provided by which they can get on. The enumerator should be given the power to accept affidavits, as is done in the court of revision in Ontario. By means of affidavits, or by presence in a court to which he might go, a man should be able to get on the list. I am sorry to hear that there is no provision made by which these people may get on the lists.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: As it is decided to have this Bill reprinted, I would suggest that where there is a new section, or where there are one or more words inserted or added to a section, those new words or sections should be put in brackets, so that we shall know exactly what is old and what is new. If there was only a slight amendment to a section we could pass it very quickly. In that way, by reading section by section, you will find out what is changed. That is done in the province from which I come.

Mr. OLIVER: Might I draw the attention of the Solicitor General, following out the suggestion of the hon. member for Montreal, St. James, (Mr. L. A. Lapointe), to the fact that recently the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) submitted to the House amendments to the Dominion Lands Act prepared in very complete form for the information of the members. I do not know whether it is too late now for the Secretary of State to adopt such a suggestion, but I do wish to say that the form in which the Minister of Interior submitted to the House his amendments to the Dominion Land Act was most complete in the information given, both by comparison and by explanation, and I would recommend very strongly that the Secretary of State adopt the same form in regard to this Franchise Act. The Minister of the Interior would be able to explain just what the character of the preparation was. I can assure the minister that to have an amending Bill placed in the hands of members in the form in which the amendments to the Dominion Land Act were prepared would save an enormous amount of time and discussion, and give the members full information in regard to the changes that are being made.

Mr. MICHAUD: In the province of New Brunswick the local custodian of the lists is the secretary-treasurer of the county, and at every provincial election he is called upon to deliver the voters' lists to the returning officer, and on declaration day the returning officer makes a parcel of all these lists and sends them to the Provincial Secretary. We had a provincial election in New Brunswick in the month of February last, and the lists of 1917, which were prepared in 1916, are no longer in the hands of the Provincial Secretary. All that he could give to the enumerator under this Bill would be a copy of those lists. But if that would be satisfactory to the enumerator, well and good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The lists are now filed with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and have become the official lists.

Mr. MICHAUD: And the enumerator could get them from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes. Answering the hon. member for Haldimand, if his suggestion were carried out and the provisions of the western provinces were applied to the province of Ontario, and that would mean making a new list from the ground up, using the old list as a basis only. I fear there would be no justification for that in the province of Ontario. Even if the present law were applied without any new Act at all, it would mean the adoption of the very same lists and the consequences of that adoption. As to the printing of this Bill it seems to me it would not be impossible to have the amendments in italics, and I will endeavour to have that done.

Mr. McCRANEY: Is my understanding of the matter correct, that the principle of the tied ballot has been taken from the present law of Alberta, or has it been repealed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My understanding is not the same as that of the hon. member for Edmonton. I have not looked at the statute, but my information—and it comes from one who certainly ought to know—is that the tied ballot exists in provincial elections in Alberta to-day. We have the same principle here, although much enlarged and improved. In Alberta all they can do is to vote on oath, and if they vote on oath that ballot is tied. They cannot challenge a vote, tie the ballot and have it submitted to a judge. We allow that here. In Alberta all that is done with a tied ballot is that some Justice of the Peace tries the case the next day, or within a few days. We subject it to a judge.

Mr. McCRANEY: I have not had any experience of the tied ballot since the provincial election of 1905, and my recollections of it may be somewhat at fault, but in Saskatchewan we had the same provision at that time, I suppose, as they had in Alberta, because both elections were being run under the same law. My recollection of it is that any person challenged would have his ballot put in an envelope and it would be laid on one side as a tied ballot. Before the voter left the polling booth he would be handed an appointment by the deputy returning officer naming an hour within a couple of days when he was to appear before one of two Justices of the peace, near the place of polling, and the right of the voter would then be tried out. I understand from what the Secretary of State says that while this law introduces the tied ballot there is no local tribunal and everything is held up pending a recount. I attended some local tribunals in connection with the elections of 1905. There are always a number of votes tied up, but these cases are very often quickly settled to the satisfaction of all parties before a Justice of the Peace, without any need for referring them to a judge. That is to say, the fact that there is the right of examination and of investigation will obviate the necessity of taking an appeal from the local tribunals to the judge. At the last election I had a county 130 miles long and 60 miles wide, with 147 polling places, and nearly 10,000 votes were cast. Under such a system as this Bill provides it would surprise me very much if there were not at least ten per cent of the ballots tied up. The very cumbrous machinery which makes it so difficult for a person whose ballot is tied, and who lives sixty or seventy miles away from a judicial centre, is a great inducement to an opponent to tie up a vote. If there was a local tribunal where both sides could get information, it would settle a great deal of that. I do not like these tied ballots at all, and the Secretary of State will find that our elections in the West are going to get into a terrible mess if there are one or two thousand votes—and I venture to say that that will occur—which will have to come before the judge for trial. Imagine the examination of several hundreds of people, even in a judicial matter, with other witnesses possibly coming in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has forgotten, or possibly has not observed, the conditions under which a ballot can be tied. First, the enumerator must have refused a man the right to vote. Now those cases would not be many.

My hon. friend feels that there may be a great many challenged ballots, but there is a great check which never was used in the provincial contest. The agent must take an oath that he has grounds for believing, and does believe, that the man appearing to vote has not the right to do so, and he must swear to the reasons for so believing. Of course, he may take oath lightly, and there are some who will, and there would then be a number of tied ballots; but I do not think the election will be in a "mess" on that account. It would hurt the candidate if they tied too many ballots. In any event, supposing they did, it simply means there will be some delay until it is decided. In this contest, in war time, there is bound to be many a delay before we know who is elected, because the soldiers' votes count will not be here for many days after. I apprehend that in this coming contest many a one will not know whether he is elected or not for many days after the election. This is unfortunate, but it is true.

Mr. McCRANEY: I think this is going to be an uncertain election for probably a month after election day. We will not know absolutely who is elected, and who is not, for perhaps that length of time after the polling day. My recollection is that in the election in the city of Prince Albert in 1905, there were over 300 tied ballots.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no check, though.

Mr. McCRANEY: Not of this character. I do not know that the objection is removed very much, because I think if you post up a list and perhaps only ten days before the polling day you have several hundred names —

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just 300; that is the maximum.

[Mr. McCraney.]

Mr. McCRANEY: My hon. friend says "just 300," but in some places you will have 500, because you are going to take the township as your unit, or something like that, and you will find it necessary to have polling places where there will be only half a dozen. It is just as easy to take 300 votes in one ballot box, as to take 200, if it is a convenient place for voting. You will have some polling places in which there will be a very large number of ballots in one box, and in which there must be a tremendous amount of information obtained. I have spoken to the minister with regard to registration in cities, and he expressed the view a few moments ago that it is desirable to have as much finality as possible. Will he tell me whether he has given consideration to the proposal to have a registration which will be complete with all proper appeals taking place in our cities. Because it is there the great difficulty over this tied ballot will come. There will be more challenges and so on on account of lack of information, whereas if the applicants for registration have to take the oath before they come on, it is a very simple matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course, in Ontario cities is done. The provincial authorities have a regular board on which sits a judge to do this work, and we simply have to adopt the machinery.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the registration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is called that. It is really enumeration. In the west, there is no such machinery. We would have to reerect the machinery and would have to constitute the whole board. We would have to apply the law to suit the times and conditions. I think we would be obliged to have something different in each province. In British Columbia for instance, there is machinery for revision, but it is revision by a provincial officer. Of course it would not do to accept that. In Alberta, there is no machinery at all, neither is there in Saskatchewan. I think there is some new machinery in Manitoba, created by a later Act, I am not just sure what it is. It would be much more difficult to do it in the western provinces. I thought of trying to have something in the western provinces similar to what there is in Ontario, but it did not lend itself to the application of that principle nearly so well as it suits Ontario, and we shall use all our means to try to get it in the western provinces as we have it, and trust to the check to safeguard it, and provide for the revision afterwards. We have not regarded it as vital even if we have to know the result later on in those western constituencies, because the result will be all the more dependable and more correct after the judges revise it.

Mr. McCRANEY: I do not altogether agree with my hon. friend's statement. I think the fact of having so many ballots tied up, and people going out of town, and so on, means that the result of the revision would make a more unsatisfactory election than if you have the registration under your own officers. It seems to me that if the sections were taken right from the Saskatchewan Act into this Act, and if you appointed your own officers to carry out your own registration, had the same system of appeals and everything else, you would get a satisfactory list, in the cities at any rate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is quite evident we cannot make very much progress to-night, and with the new Bill printed and in our possession to-morrow I think we, on this side of the House, will be in a position to contribute more to the passage of the Bill than we can possibly do now. Our last session was very long, and I would suggest to the Secretary of State that the committee rise for the evening. I do not think there is very much to be gained by sitting longer now.

Mr. LALOR: I agree to some extent with the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) as to the necessity for some system of registration. I think it should be extended to towns of 2,000 people. I know from my own experience in working on voters' lists in the province of Ontario, if we adopted the lists of 1916 and made no provision whatever for adding names, we should disqualify a good many citizens.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the new law with regard to voters' lists passed by the Ontario Legislature at the last session made some provision along the lines suggested by my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Lalor), and I was a little surprised to hear the Solicitor General state that no such provision was made in this Bill. I thought the tied ballot covered those who might move from one constituency to another. If the lists of 1916 are to be used in the province of Ontario, a great many persons outside of the places of 9,000 and over will certainly be disfranchised. There has been a great movement, of population. For instance, people working in munition factories in towns of less than 9,000 have moved, and will be disfranchised unless some provision is made. I do not see any reason why the tied ballot should not cover cases of that kind. In the rural districts, a great many tenant farmers change in the spring of the year. A man might move just across the line from one constituency into another, and if no provision is made for it, he will have no redress and cannot tender his vote. The towns and cities of 9,000 and over have always had a great advantage over the rural districts in that respect, because they have registration, and their lists are right up to date when the election comes on.

In view of the length of time that has elapsed since the lists were made up in Ontario and the great changes that have taken place because of people working in munition factories and other places, I think it is important that an effort should be made to meet this situation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My only duty now is to make fully understood the proposals that are made by my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). If their suggestions are carried out it means the making of new lists by enumerators for Ontario outside of the cities commencing right at the very beginning. It means that in any event. It is true, the old lists might be used as a basis, but they would be new lists and the enumerators would have to decide who should go on and who should not, subject to the revision by a judge. Of course, these hon. gentlemen may have had in their minds that you could have a revision first in the counties, the same as in the cities, but you could not because there are not enough judges to have the work done in time to have an election by next March. It is different in the country districts from what it is in the cities. The territory to be covered is too great to enable the people to get there; you could not do it. The only way to do is to make new lists commencing at the beginning and then depending on the tied ballot for a revision afterwards. I am not afraid of the tied ballot. I hope it will not be abused, but still I do not want to resort to it any more than is necessary. The plan of the Bill was worked out and it was realized that in Ontario we would have to put up with the fact that there were some people who would be disfranchised. But if we passed no Act at all that would be the effect of the present legislation. That is the only list there is, that is the list in force and we have to abide by it. Of course, it is not impossible to throw away the lists in Ontario, and, commencing at the bottom, make new lists just as we provide in this Act and just as the Ontario Act provides.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is much more lengthy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Much more lengthy, and it has its disadvantages as well as its advantages. I readily admit that there are going to be quite a number who will be unfortunate enough to lose their votes, and there will be some who will be fortunate enough to get votes who should not get them. But is it worth while to make such a great change?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would not suggest that you should do away with the old list and make new ones, but I had hoped that there would be some possibility of taking care of the voters who are shifted around. I think it would be a mistake to do away with the old lists. It would be much more satisfactory to use the lists as already compiled.

Mr. LALOR: No very great hardship or injustice would be done to the farming community because the changes are very few. The injustice is going to be done in the towns of less than 9,000 inhabitants. If some provision could be made by which a revision would take place in towns of 2,000 to 9,000 inhabitants it would obviate a very great injustice. In those towns some provision might be made for a revision of the lists before a judge.

Mr. GLASS: The matter that the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for Haldimand have referred to seems to me can to some extent be remedied. In Ontario, domicile and residence is essential to the privilege of voting. If an elector moves around from one township to another the oath requires him to swear that he is domiciled within the district at the time the vote is taken. Surely we accept the principle that where a man has a vote he must not be deprived of that vote. Why cannot a provision be inserted in the Bill that if a man who is qualified to vote except for domicile moves from one part to another he may go back to the place of his former domicile and vote? There is in this Act, and there has been in the Ontario Act, a discrimination against the country districts, although I do not think there is any very grievous feeling about it. There is provision enabling those living in cities and towns to apply to a judge to have the names of those who have been omitted and those who have become eligible since the last revision put on the list. There is an anomaly in connection with this Bill to which I would direct the attention of the Secretary of State. There are a number of young men—and this condition more generally prevails in the country districts—who were under 21 years of age when the 1916 lists were revised and who have become of age or will become of age between the time that the last lists were revised and the time when it will be necessary to make the new enumeration. It is an unreasonable and unnecessary anomaly to say that the sisters, mothers and female relatives of soldiers who have become of age shall have votes, whereas the younger brothers, who have been held at home on the farm to enable the older ones possibly to go to the front, are deprived of their votes. Provision might be made to include the names of such young men as may be of legal age at the time the enumeration is being made. I think it would appeal to every hon. member of this House that, if we extend that recognition to the female relatives, we might fairly extend it to the younger brothers who have come of age since the 1916 voters' lists were revised.

Mr. GRAHAM: These same points have been argued for a great many years in the legislature of Ontario. No lists can be made under which some person will not be deprived of a vote who under ordinary conditions would vote. There have been difficulties from time immemorial arising with regard to a man moving from one constituency to another. Provision was made for cheesemakers and clergymen who had moved from one constituency to another.

As to registration in towns of 2,000, I do not know what the situation is now. When I was in the legislature of the province, members objected to registration being extended to the smaller towns on account of the great expense. A man who has not lived in a town or city where there is registration does not understand that he might just as well run an election as a registration. It reminds me of an anecdote told by an ex-Provincial Secretary, of a gentleman whom he approached one day for a subscription to another candidate who was running. This gentleman represented a constituency which only required a candidate to get the convention and his election was assured. When he asked for a little financial aid for a candidate this gentleman inquired, "But, has he had his convention?" and the reply was: "He is not going to have a convention; he is a candidate." Then this gentleman said: "What does he need the money for, if he is not going to have a convention?" Hon. gentlemen who are asking for registration may not find it so convenient when they have the registration. I would just about as soon have an election as a registration. One of the difficulties is that the lists are left at loose ends in large towns, and men pay no attention and make no effort to get on the list until the time arrives, and then there is a great struggle to get on the list. Is this not the situation to-day? If there had been no legislation passed in the province of Ontario, and the law stood as it has been for many years, and we were holding an election, now or within two or three months from now, would we not use identically the same lists that would be used under this Act, except for the new conditions? So that the conditions are unchanged. The lists of Ontario have not been finally revised, and would not be revised, under the old conditions probably, until December. An election held before December would have been held on the list of 1916, just as this election will be held. So that the difficulties outlined by hon. gentlemen are the difficulties which would have arisen had the law not been changed in Ontario, no matter when you have the election.

Mr. GLASS: In Ontario, where elections have been held when the lists were not completely revised, the lists were used in the townships in which they had been revised. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) tells me, not for Dominion elections. I am not talking about that, but I know in certain townships within my own riding, where the lists have been revised within 60 days, which is necessary in order that they may be used, the lists of that current year were used, whereas in the other townships the lists of the previous year were used.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not many of them are revised at the present time.

Mr. GLASS: Some of them were revised in the first month.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I desire to refer the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Glass) to sections 151 and 152 of the Dominion Elections Act, which provide for residential voting. They are repealed in this Act, consequently the list stands just as it stood for each polling division in Ontario. Though a man may have moved into another division, he still has his vote in the old division.

Mr. NESBITT: Where he is on the list?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: That is not fair. Supposing a man had not been on the list any place, and he moves into another riding, the enumerator has not power to put him on. He has only power to put females on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all.

Mr. ROSS: I have not been influenced by anything said by the hon. member for Haldimand, or the hon. member who has just spoken. It seems to me that I am absolutely right in regard to the clerk doing the work which the hon. gentlemen proposes that the enumerator shall do, and for many reasons. This Government has made a great many sanctimonious protestations that it wants to be absolutely fair, and not partisan in regard to the soldiers' vote and in regard to this Act, and the minister says he is willing to consider amendments. Let me make a suggestion with regard to these clerks as far as Ontario is concerned. The voters' lists of 1916 are to be used in Ontario. How will they prepare the lists? The assessor prepares his assessment roll, and hands it to the clerk. The clerk copies it off, prepares his voters' list, and passes it on, and that voters' list is revised by the judge. The clerk in each municipality has more thorough knowledge in regard to the lists than any other man in the township. He has gone over the lists of appeals made by the various parties before the judge and court of revision. Every soldier, whether across the seas or at home, appears in that list, and the clerk knows who each soldier is. The consequence is that, if we appoint the clerk of the county instead of the enumerator, he is necessarily seized of the names of the soldiers, and he knows who they are. On account of the prominence of the county clerk, in my part of the country he is absolutely acquainted with the township, and all the people in it, and he consequently knows who the soldiers and the soldiers' wives and mothers are. That does away with the objection of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett). The clerk does not require to go through the township to find out who the women are, because he knows them on his own knowledge, and the soldiers are already on the list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he knew the names of the soldiers, would he know the names of the sisters, mothers and wives?

Mr. ROSS: To a great extent he would.

Mr. LALOR: Is it not a fact that, in many municipalities, the clerk has become a very old man?

Mr. ROSS: In some cases he is. My hon. friend is justifying my argument that the clerk is a prominent official, and if he is a very old man, he has been there a long time, and is all the better acquainted with the soldiers and their relatives, so that he does not have to go around the township, as the hon. member for East Simcoe suggests. But even if he had to go round the township, he could do it in less time than any one else. Under the provisions of this Act, if any person is left off, there are ten days within which to make application, and they can make application to the clerk just as well as to the enumerator. One of my hon. friends said the list could be corrected if any mistakes were made by the enumerator. But the list cannot be corrected under this Act, except on a recount. Under section 62 of the Bill, as I read it, there is nothing the deputy returning officer could do that the enumerator could not do. Section 62 of the Act as amended by this Bill will read as follows:

> Subject to the provisions of section 65A of this Act, any person whose name is not on the voters' list of a polling division, but who claims that it should be thereon, may, at any time during which the poll is open, apply to the enumerator of such polling division.

On what ground can he or she apply to be a voter? Just because she is a relative of a soldier or on the ground that she has been improperly rejected by the clerk as an alien? These are simple things. What are they to do? They have simply to make an affidavit under this Act, showing that they are not aliens, or that they are entitled to be on the list as soldiers' relatives. Surely the deputy returning officer can go into that matter, as well as the enumerator.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman think a returning officer has time to take down the names of soldiers, their relatives and antecedents? Has the voting all to stop while he is doing this?

Mr. ROSS: My hon. friend said a little while ago that there would be few of such men. Each polling subdivision accommodates 300 voters. The fact is that this Government proposes to appoint anywhere from 15,000 to 25,000 enumerators.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be just as many under my hon. friend's plan.

Mr. ROSS: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; there would be no such thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will not be much pay for each one, because his work will be neither long nor heavy. You cannot work this Act unless you have some one to take care of each poll—some one who has made the list for the poll and knows all about it. I do not see why my hon. friend did not raise this point years ago, because the same thing has been done in Alberta and Saskatchewan and his objections would apply as much in that case as in this.

Mr. ROSS: Does my hon. friend deny that 15,000 enumerators will be appointed by the Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not counted the number, but there will be someone to do the work at each poll. There will have to be 15,000 deputy returning officers, and there will have to be so many returning officers. The deputy returning officer cannot undertake the revision of the lists on the day of polling. In some polls he might, but not in a poll designed to accommodate 300 voters.

Mr. ROSS: I am not asking that the deputy returning officer make up the list. My hon. friend does not appreciate my point. The clerk makes up the list and is most familiar with it. The only thing the deputy returning officer does is this: if a man comes on polling day and says he should be on the list but was struck off by the clerk, the deputy returning officer examines his qualifications. I am asking that my hon. friend add to the duty of the deputy returning officer that of deciding, the comparatively few cases that will arise whether a man was wrongfully on the list or was wrongfully eliminated from the list. I ask him further to apply a non-partisan system to the choice of those who shall make up the list in Ontario, rather than an utterly partisan system which lends colour to the suspicion that the Government does not wish to be fair in the administration of this Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that the language of my hon. friend is rather extravagant. I call his attention to section 42 of the Dominion Elections Act, which in part is as follows:

> In the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Governor in Council may appoint enumerators to make lists of the electors in the electoral district.

That has been the law of this country so far as these provinces are concerned for twelve years. My hon. friend has only now come to the conclusion that a system of that kind is intensely partisan. Why did this not dawn on him during all these years? Why has he suddenly awakened to the conclusion that it is an iniquitous thing that the Governor in Council should appoint enumerators? The suggestions that have been made on both sides of the House will be taken into attentive consideration; we will proceed with the Bill to-morrow. But there are other sections of the Bill which have not yet been touched and upon which I should like to offer some explanation. I move, therefore, that further consideration of section 1 be postponed in order that we may proceed to the consideration of section 2.

Motion agreed to.

On section 2—Part III to operate as amended:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In accordance with suggestions made from the other side of the House, Part II of the Dominion Elections Act, with the amendments proposed, is to be printed, in order that it may be placed in the hands of hon. gentlemen to-morrow afternoon with a view to a clearer understanding of the Act. Part III is very long; we should not have time to have it printed by to-morrow. But in any case that is not necessary, because the changes are very few. The changes in Part III are embodied in section 2 of this Act; I will state them now, so that a complete record will be in the hands of hon. gentlemen to-morrow afternoon as to what the Act will be with the amendments proposed to be effected by the Bill now under consideration.

Section 2 provides that in the first place section 143 of the Dominion Elections Act shall be struck out and the section provided here shall be substituted. Section 143 of the Dominion Elections Act is as follows:

143. Where there is a voters' list, each elector shall, subject to the provisions of the next following section, except,—

(a) in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory; and,

(b) in case of non-resident electors provided for in Part I, of this Act; be entitled to vote at the polling station of the polling division or one of the polling divisions upon the list of voters for which his name is entered as such voter, and at no other.

2. In the province of Prince Edward Island, subject to the provisions relating to officers and agents employed at an election, every elector qualified to vote in the electoral district in which he resides shall vote in such district in the electoral division, or, in case such electoral division is subdivided, in the polling division thereof in which he resides, and not elsewhere; and every elector qualified to vote in an electoral district in which he does not reside shall vote in the polling division thereof in which is situate the property on which he claims to vote, and not elsewhere.

As will be observed, that is struck out and the following substituted as section 143:

143. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, each elector shall be entitled to vote at the polling station of the polling division, or of one of the polling divisions, upon the list of voters for which his name is entered as an elector, and at no other.

The next change is in section 136. Section 136 as it stands at present in the Dominion Elections Act is as follows:

136. The poll shall be opened at the hour of nine of the clock in the forenoon and kept open until five of the clock in the afternoon of the same day; and each deputy returning officer shall, during that time, in the polling station assigned to him, receive, in the manner hereinafter prescribed, the votes of the electors duly qualified to vote at such polling stations.

It is proposed by this Bill to amend that so that it will read as follows:

136. Except in the cities of Calgary, Edmonton, Halifax, Hamilton, London, Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec, Regina, St. John, Toronto, Vancouver, Victoria and Winnipeg, wherein the poll shall be opened at the hour of six of the clock in the forenoon, and kept open until five of the clock in the afternoon of the same day; and each deputy returning officer shall, during that time, in the polling station assigned to him, receive, in the manner hereinafter prescribed, the votes of the electors duly qualified to vote at such polling station.

The next section that is touched is section 137, which reads:

137. In addition to the deputy returning officer and the poll clerk, the candidates and their agents, not exceeding two in number for each candidate in each polling station, and, in the absence of agents, two electors to represent each candidate on the request of such electors, and no others, shall be permitted to remain in the room where the votes are given during the time the poll remains open.

The section as proposed to be amended will read as follows:

137. In addition to the deputy returning officer and the poll clerk, the enumerator, the candidates and their agents, not exceeding two in number for each candidate in each polling station, and, in the absence of agents, two electors to represent each candidate on the request of such electors, and no others, shall be permitted to remain in the room where the votes are given during the time the poll remains open.

The next is section 144, which says:

144. Except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory, the returning officer, on the request of any elector entitled to vote at one of the polling stations, who is appointed deputy returning officer or poll clerk, or who is named the agent of any of the candidates for a polling station other than the one where he is entitled to vote, shall give to such elector a certificate that such deputy returning officer, poll clerk or agent is entitled to vote at such election at the polling station where such elector is stationed during the polling day, and, on the production of such certificate, such deputy returning officer, poll clerk or agent shall have the right to vote at the polling station where he is placed during the polling day, instead of at the polling station where he would otherwise have been entitled to vote: Provided that no such certificate shall entitle any such elector to vote at such polling station unless he has been actually engaged as such deputy returning officer, poll clerk or agent during the day of polling and that no more than two agents of any candidate shall have the right to vote at any one polling place under such certificate.

Section 144 as amended by this Bill will read:

144. The returning officer of any electoral district in the province of Ontario which contains in whole or in part any city or town to which Part II of the Ontario Franchise Act, 1917, applies, on the request of any elector entitled to vote at one of the polling stations, who is appointed deputy returning officer or poll clerk, or who is named the agent of any of the candidates for a polling station other than the one where he is entitled to vote, shall give to such electors a certificate that such deputy returning officer, poll clerk or agent is entitled to vote at such election at the polling station where such elector is stationed during the polling day, and, on the production of such certificate, such deputy returning officer, poll clerk or agent shall have the right to vote at the polling station where he is placed during the polling day, instead of at the polling station where he would otherwise have been entitled to vote. Provided that no such certificate shall entitle any such elector to vote at such polling station unless he has been actually engaged as such deputy returning officer, poll clerk or agent, during the day of polling and that no more than two agents of any candidate shall have the right to vote at any one polling place under such certificate.

The further amendments effected by this section are to strike out the the whole of sections 149, 150A, 151, 152, 152A and 247. It is hardly necessary that I should read all those sections because they are before hon. gentlemen in the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, and a supply of copies of that Act has been placed on the Table available for their use. I think the rest of the section does not require any particular explanation because it is all embodied on the face of the Bill.

Mr. ROSS: I understood the Solicitor General to say that, on account of the repeal of section 151 of the Act, if a voter left a riding in which he was on the list and went to another riding, he could come back to vote.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS: That is not in the Dominion Elections Act. That applies only to a voter who moves to another electoral district in the same city or incorporated town. In that case he could go back to the former electoral district to vote, but if he removed from one riding to another, he could not go back to his own riding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This Bill provides, by section 2, which has just been read by the Prime Minister, that any elector may vote wherever his name is. That is the new section 143:

Except as otherwise provided in this Act, each elector shall be entitled to vote at the polling station of the polling division, or of one of the polling divisions, upon the list of voters for which his name is entered as an elector, and at no other.

The only place where there is any exception at all is in section 151, or section 152. As those two are repealed, a man can vote wherever his name is.

Mr. CARVELL: I was very sorry to see that, although it does seem to follow very largely the provisions of the section as it stood before. In my province there has for some time been a provision that if a man moves from one electoral district to another he applies to the secretary treasurer of the district or county in which he resided, who gives him a certificate. That is taken to the secretary treasurer of the new district, and a certificate is granted to the man by which he can vote where he lives. In New Brunswick the question of residence plays a very important part. A person can vote only in the county in which he resides. What I am afraid of in this legislation is that you will break up all that idea. If a man's name is added to the list we shall say in St. John, he may have removed to Restigouche, two or three hundred miles away, and that would mean he would have to go back to St. John to vote. I am afraid that will be the way in which the matter will work out if this section is permitted to go through. While it is true, under the provincial law—and we are taking the provincial law as the basis of this list—they would have the right to change that man's name from the county in which he formerly lived to the one to which he removed and make it a part of the voters' list. I am somewhat doubtful, if this is put through as it is, if they would have any right to make a new list, or if the provincial authorities would have a right to make an addition to the existing lists.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they would not have.

Mr. CARVELL: I can assure my hon. friend that it is going to make a lot of trouble with us. It is going to break up that for which we have been working for a long time, and which has given a great deal of satisfaction. There is another thing. I do not know what the Prime Minister means; he is not getting ready to apply closure to-night, I hope.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have all day to-morrow.

Mr. CARVELL: If we are going to have the gag applied in that way I suppose we might as well face it, but I would like to discuss this measure, as there are many things about it I do not understand. I have not been offering any factious opposition, nor do I think anybody else has, but if the Government is simply getting ready for closure, we are in a minority, and we might just as well simply throw up our hands and say all right.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We want full and reasonable discussion of this Bill, of course, but I would point out that a whole day was wasted on Saturday that might have been devoted to this Bill, and for no other purpose, so far as we can understand, than to obstruct the discussion of this measure. It began at three in the afternoon and lasted until ten at night.

Mr. CARVELL: I was not here. I was not responsible for it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not blaming my hon. friend for it. I know he is not responsible.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know that any one is responsible. I cannot understand the Government taking the ground that a Bill of this revolutionary character, which violates every principle of the British fair play which we have bragged about in this country ever since I was a boy, is going to be railroaded through Parliament. I cannot understand the Prime Minister characterizing as obstruction what is simply a reasonable amount of discussion. The Government have a majority and we are compelled to submit, but it does seem pretty hard for a man like myself who has not obstructed the Government—I have not spoken two hours altogether on all the contentious Bills that the Government have introduced this session—to be denied the right not merely of offering criticism, but of getting information, simply because my right hon. friend thinks that two or three members may have discussed something that he regards as not pertinent. That is the situation. However, as we are not gagged at the present time, I suppose I shall be allowed to ask a question or two. I think I know enough about movements to see that closure is coming, and I want to avail myself of this present grace to see if I cannot get a little bit of information before the axe falls. I am amazed at the Prime Minister of Canada, I simply cannot get around it, Mr. Chairman. If it was some other member on the opposite side of the House I should not have been surprised, but that a man born and bred in the Maritime Provinces, who knows what justice is, that a man of his education and training, should try to force a measure of this kind through in one day—it simply amazes me. I see that paragraph (g) on page 12, says:

> A person shall be deemed to have been born in an enemy country, within the meaning of this paragraph, if he was born in a country which forms part of the territory of any country with which His Majesty is at war: Provided that a person claiming to vote who was a natural born citizen or subject of France, Italy, or Denmark, and who arrived in Canada before the date upon which the territory in which he was born became part of Germany or Austria (as the case may be) shall not be deemed to have been born in an enemy country if he produces to the deputy returning officer an unrevoked certificate in the form W|13 in the schedule. Such certificate may be issued by the enumerator.

What an awful injustice will be done to certain people in my constituency if this is allowed to go through. I suppose the clause has been framed to meet some condition in the West. It is about as bad as that other clause empowering the deputy returning officer to declare a man an alien enemy if he does not like his manner.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is taken word for word from the Australian legislation.

Mr. CARVELL: That does not make it any better. If a vicious piece of legislation has been passed in Australia, we are not compelled to pass it here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It covers the case of those who have come from Alsace-Lorraine and Schlesweig-Holstein.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend had better get out of his mind that there is any deadly purpose in this. The people who came to this country from Alsace-Lorraine before it became German territory, would be within the meaning of this paragraph.

Mr. CARVELL: I imagine this clause was put in to meet conditions in the West, where there is some body of people the Government want to disfranchise, I presume.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This is an enfranchising clause, is it not?

Mr. CARVELL: No, a disfranchising clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is enfranchising.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I can read the English language. It says:

> Provided that a person claiming to vote who was a natural born citizen or subject of France, Italy, or Denmark, and who arrived in Canada before the date upon which the territory in which he was born became part of Germany or Austria (as the case may be) shall not be deemed to have been born in an enemy country.

That is, if he arrived in Canada before the territory was conquered he is not an enemy, but if he arrived in Canada afterwards he is an enemy; he is a German. In the county of Victoria there is a large colony of Danes who came from Schlesweig-Holstein after the war of 1864. I cannot say just how many there are, but I am told there are a great many of them. They left that country because they would not live under German rule. As soon as Alsace-Lorraine was ceded to Germany, or shortly afterwards these people emigrated to New Brunswick. They form one of the most thriving and intelligent communities that I have ever been in, and I know of no place in my constituency—it was formerly in the constituency of my hon. friend from Victoria and Madawaska, but is now in my constituency—that it is a greater pleasure to visit. Many of these people were not naturalized for years and years; in fact, it is only within recent years that many of them have become naturalized.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did they come to this country?

Mr. CARVELL: Late in the sixties, or very early in the seventies. Many of them did not become naturalized until recently, and I know that some of them have never been naturalized, although they have always been voters. These men who came to this country because they would not live under German rule, who have lived here practically all their lives and raised families here, who are intelligent people in every way, are to be disfranchised.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What would you suggest?

Mr. CARVELL: Cut it out entirely.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Cut what out?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not see why on earth you want to disfranchise a man who has left a conquered country. Take the man who came from Alsace-Lorraine after 1871, is there any reason why they should be disfranchised if they came here afterwards and within fifteen years became naturalized British subjects? Surely they would not be charged with having German sympathies. I cannot understand what in the world the Government means. It brings me back to my assumption that there must be some body of men in the West they want to get after, and therefore they insert this clause. I would feel that a most serious injustice was being done to these people in my constituency, who are among the very first citizens in New Brunswick, if, by passing this legislation they were disfranchised. The Prime Minister should give us at least a reasonable chance to go over these things and discuss them. Of course, if we cannot have that chance, we cannot have it, but I think it is carrying the thing to such a ridiculous extreme that it will at least appeal to the Prime Minister as absurd.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought it was carried to an extreme when the whole of Saturday was wasted. That is my opinion, notwithstanding any view to the contrary that may be entertained on the other side of the House. I think that is where the absurdity began in the first instance. We have no desire to avoid reasonable discussion of this Bill. We would like to have the third reading not later than Friday next, and I think the third reading should take place then, because the time available for this Parliament to deal with this or any other measure is drawing to a close. After the Bill has been disposed of in this House, it will have to be dealt with in another House, and there may be considerable delay there. I am perfectly willing to give to-morrow and the day after for the consideration of the Bill in Committee, and to sit as late on either of those evenings as hon. gentlemen on the other side may desire, provided that we have an understanding that the vote will be taken on Friday night or Saturday morning at any time hon. gentlemen may select.

Mr. OLIVER: I took part in the discussion on Saturday, and I have no apology to make to the Prime Minister or to this House——

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not asking for any.

Mr. OLIVER: —for having taken part in a discussion of such importance to the Dominion of Canada—not as important, I will admit, as an attempt to disfranchise tens of thousands of citizens, but still a matter of very deep and far-reaching importance. I wish to add a word to what my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) has said in regard to the effect of paragraph (g) of this section. Since I came to the House this evening I received a telegram in the following terms:

Winnipeg, Sept. 10, 1917.

Hon. Frank Oliver, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—The Bohemian (Czech) National Alliance in Canada strongly objects that Bohemians who are loyal Canadian citizens should be deprived of the franchise by the War-Time Elections Act. The Bohemians in Canada are heart and soul in favour of the Allies, and are anxious that Bohemia, their native country, should be enabled to throw off the hated yoke of Austria. Bohemians have joined in large numbers the different Canadian battalions, and one company composed entirely of Bohemians was organized and went overseas with the 223rd Battalion from Portage la Prairie. Bohemians are fighting in large numbers in all the armies of the Allies. We would appeal to you to see that Canadian Bohemians are honoured for their loyalty to Canada, and not deprived of their franchise by the Act. Similar request has been wired to Right Hon. Sir R. Borden on the 5th of September.

We are, Sir,

Your obedient servants,
August Fibiger, President.
Frank Dojacek, Secretary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Following the lines suggested by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), I would say it would be most unjust to put this Bill through by the application of the closure. The Bill should at least have been prepared in a decent way. There can be no defence whatever for putting a Bill drafted in this way before Parliament. Surely the Prime Minister and his friends can hardly expect members of the House to grasp the purport of such a Bill quickly and easily. What is proposed to be done for us to-morrow, should have been done in the first instance. If hon. gentlemen will look at what is clause (g) of 33b on page 2, they will find two amendments in one clause, and the amended portions are so inserted that they are only recognizable because there are quotation marks at the beginning and end of the amendments. I never saw or heard of a Bill presented to Parliament in that form. There may be nothing difficult to understand about the Bill if one had an opportunity of going through it thoroughly and carefully, but this, of course, would take some time. I think the Bill should be allowed to stand until to-morrow, when we can have at least a portion of it in the form in which it should have been presented to the House at first. We have not yet discussed the greater portion of section 1, which covers ten pages. One clause of a Bill covering ten pages is confusing to most members of the House. I think we could make very substantial progress to-morrow if Part II is printed in the manner intimated by the Prime Minister. We must also remember that the officer designated as enumerator is an unknown quantity in the Maritime Provinces, and also in Quebec.

Mr. GRAHAM: And in the older districts of Ontario.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill was not even explained to us in a very complete way before being taken up by the committee. In introducing it, the Secretary of State simply discussed two or three of the main principles involved, that is, the disfranchising clauses, and the enfranchising clauses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the list-making clauses.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Very little else. I would have expected that on the second reading he would explain the purport of many of the sections, as is customary. He explained the principle of the Bill on the first reading, but said nothing whatever about it on the second reading. The Bill was prepared in a way that would confuse one, and on that ground alone I trust the Government will consider the matter of postponing further consideration of it until to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What do you say about Friday night?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think at the present juncture it is hardly fair to ask us to say that the Bill must have a third reading on Friday night. So far as I have heard, there is no desire to retard it, and if the Government is under the impression that such a desire exists, they have a wrong notion. I do not know how they got it into their minds, but they seem to me as if they were to have a head-on collision.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We thought we had a pretty good object lesson on Saturday.

Mr. GRAHAM: No one knows better than the Prime Minister that the question discussed on Saturday is one of the most vital questions affecting the people of Canada at the present time. Not pretending to know more than any one else in this House, I feel that the hon. members do not understand in detail the significance of Saturday's discussion, but perhaps they will later on. I do not think Saturday was wasted. I think the future will show that Saturday's discussion was a very important one. After all, it took up only a part of Saturday and this Bill was proceeded with on Saturday night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How about those divisions on points of order?

Mr. GRAHAM: I was not here for those divisions. The Prime Minister thought that there was time wasted on Saturday. I say it was not wasted, and I ask hon. gentlemen to postpone their judgment for a few weeks and then come to a conclusion as to whether it was wasted or not. In a House that has been in session for month after month is it reasonable that the Government should object to one day extra for the discussion of a Bill of this magnitude? Outside of not more than twelve men in this House, not one understands this Bill, and I am not including myself in the number. I have read the Bill and I have had something to do with the preparation of voters' lists for the last thirty years. I am going away beyond the limit in putting the number at twelve. If closure had never been conceived in the mind of the Secretary of State we would never have dreamed of rushing this Bill through in this time. If closure be applied to-morrow hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House cannot make the suggestions which they want to make and we cannot make suggestions from this side. When you have made your speech you must sit down. A free and easy discussion, back and forth, in which a question can be asked and answered and information, which we all need, elicited is much better. If notice be given to-night that the motion will be made to-morrow that is excluded and this Bill will go through the House without members understanding it. I do not think that is reasonable. This Bill has been introduced, the Government admits it was not introduced in proper form, and it is going to make a rearrangement to meet the suggestions which have been made. If this Bill had been brought in with explanations as to the changes proposed we would have been in a different position. The lawyers might know by looking at it by chapter and paragraph what it all means, but there is not a man, outside of the dozen I have named, who knows what the chapters referred to in this Bill mean. There is no desire as far as I know to retard this Bill or to prolong the session. Under these circumstances, I submit, the Government ought to accept the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Carleton and let us go on with this Bill to-morrow, when we shall be in a position to discuss it more intelligently. If there are signs of obstruction to-morrow I will have no objection to the Government giving notice that they intend to apply closure, any more than I always have to applying closure because I believe it is an unfair way of doing business. But we do not know on either side of the House many of the details of what we are discussing, and I would ask the Prime Minister to accept the suggestion I make.

12 m.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The difficulty about it is that if we do not have the vote on the third reading on Friday we cannot very well have it until the following Tuesday.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not Saturday?

An hon. MEMBER: Why not Monday?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am told that hon. members on both sides of the House do not want the vote on Saturday or Monday. They say it is very inconvenient to have the vote on either of those days.

Mr. CARVELL: What harm would it be? There are still three weeks before Parliament is dissolved. Does the Prime Minister think that the Senate is going to hold this Bill up for three weeks?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know what the Senate is going to do.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot understand this unseemly haste. There seems to be some reason in the mind of the Government for it, but there has never been any indication of an intention to obstruct the passage of this Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Hon. members on both sides are agreed that the session ought to come to a conclusion.

Mr. NESBITT: That is true.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is the opinion on both sides of the House. I am most anxious to give every opportunity for the reasonable discussion of the Bill, but we do not want to stay here any longer than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of affording that opportunity. I have had a good deal of regard for the intimations given to me by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House to hurry up the business of the session and let us get away. I had that in view when I made the proposal to hon. gentlemen. We have had two days in committee on this Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: No, one day.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: One on the second reading and one in committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not very much for a Bill of this kind.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have had two days on the Bill. When I proposed that we should have two days more in committee and one day for the third reading I thought it was a reasonable proposal, especially as I accompanied it with the statement that we would sit as late on those evenings as hon. gentlemen might desire, but no later.

Mr. NESBITT: If the right hon. gentleman will allow it to go as it is and then, if there is any sign of obstruction, and I personally have on intention to obstruct—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will see that if we should be driven to the expedient of a closure we could not apply it on Saturday night unless we sat until two o'clock on Sunday morning, which would be undesirable, and probably we would not be able to take the vote until Tuesday next. We know that hon. gentlemen are desirous of bringing the session to a conclusion, if possible, not later than the end of next week. I think that in this I am expressing the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. If we were to have any reasonable assurance that this could be accomplished I am sure I would not have any objection, but I understand that my hon. friends on the other side cannot presume to speak for the other House. I do not expect them to, but perhaps they might give their impression.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot speak for the other House and I do not intend to try. I am only speaking for myself. I am not obstructing the Bill at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not claim that my hon. friend is obstructing.

Mr. CARVELL: I feel pretty seriously over this matter and pretty bitterly too.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend's criticism has been reasonable.

Mr. CARVELL: The Government delay a measure of this importance until Parliament has been in session for seven months and then they come down and say: We must get through here next week. It means as much to me as to any other man in this House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would there be any objection to having the third reading on Saturday?

Mr. CARVELL: As far as I am concerned, I have no objection but I cannot bind anybody else.

Mr. BUREAU: I listened to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and I understand that if closure is applied and if you put a question you have to sit down and cannot go any further. The first part of the Act as to enumerators is absolutely new in the province of Quebec.

I have been watching my chance to ask the Secretary of State what qualification this enumerator would require to possess, whether he would require to be resident of the particular polling subdivision, or the particular municipality wherein the alien resided. There is a lot of information which we have not got. We know nothing about the work of these enumerators, and I think it would be unfair if we did not have a chance to ask questions and get the information. We would like to have it, because we want to be prepared to meet this enumerator when he is appointed.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the Secretary of State answer the question asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau)? It is a matter which interests the province?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no examination or educational test, but the returning officer selects him as a man capable and available. I think the difficulty will be to get men available, but they will have to be got.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will it be the returning officer who makes the selection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is the way it is done.

Mr. DEVLIN: The Bill does not say that. It says that the Governor in Council—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, if the Governor in Council does not appoint them, the returning officer makes the appointment. That is exactly the provision in the old Act, and that is the way they have been appointed in the province for years. It was always left to the returning officer, because in practice, nobody else could do it. We leave the Act as it stands.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no possibility of that here, because section 42 says:

> Subject to the provisions of 65A of this Act, the Governor in Council may appoint enumerators in each province to make lists of the electors in each electoral district, and the returning officer of each electoral district shall assign one of such enumerators to each polling district therein.

So that the Governor in Council must make the appointment, and once these men are appointed the returning officer has the right to assign them to their respective places.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the next subsection says that if the Governor in Council does not appoint, the returning officer makes the appointment.

Mr. BUREAU: Whether the returning officer appoints them, or the Governor in Council appoints them, makes no difference. The Act says the enumerator shall be taken from the particular municipality where he is to act. There is nothing in the Bill which I have seen which provides for that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman, I understand, suggests that they should be from the same municipality.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should think that would be inevitable. They would have to be in the neighbourhood, or they could not do the work.

Mr. BUREAU: It is very easy to say this man should be a resident of the municipality where he is called to act as enumerator. There is nothing to prevent the returning officer or the Governor in Council from appointing a man in another place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but the returning officer would not do it, because the man could not do the work. The Act has always been in that form.

Mr. BUREAU: We never had any enumerators in Quebec. We know nothing about the working of that branch of the Act. We have clerks and secretary-treasurers and municipal councillors, and secretaries of the school board. These men would know every man, woman and child, and would know where they lived. They have been there for years. The objection made by the Secretary of State to the appointment of such men was the fact that they would have too large a territory to cover.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They could not be in two or three places at once. They have to be at the polling place on election day, and they have to take care of each individual poll. That is the reason we cannot appoint a clerk of the township to take care of the township.

Mr. BUREAU: There are few municipalities that I know of in Quebec where they have more than two clerks; they seldom have three. This enumerator could take care of two polls. There is a great deal of information we desire to obtain from the Solicitor General, and many suggestions we wish to make, to guard against any appointment being made that would not assist in the working out of the Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it the intention of the Bill to disfranchise persons whose place of origin was Switzerland?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would those who are residing in Canada, who are naturalized not be disqualified because the mother tongue of more than one third of them is German?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the mother tongue was German, and they came to Canada and were naturalized in the last 15 years, they would be disqualified in this election, and if the hon. member knew all the facts I do not think he would consider that was any variation of the principle of the Bill, nor any injustice.

Mr. OLIVER: I might give an instance which would have some bearing on the case. Mr. A. S. Rosenroll, a native of Switzerland, was M.L.A. for the district of Wetaskiwin for several terms in the local legislature. When the war broke out, his eldest son voluntered in the Princess Pats. He was disabled for life, and then his second son volunteered, and I am afraid he has met a similar fate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would be entitled to vote on three grounds.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, I understand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Firstly because he has been a member of the legislature; secondly, because the first son volunteered, and thirdly, because the second son volunteered.

Mr. OLIVER: Why should the people of Switzerland be considered pro-German when, in this particular instance, the evidence we have is that they certainly were very anti-German?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are certainly instances where they are pro-Ally.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the Secretary of State tell us what would be the evidence required by the enumerator to prove relationship in the case of the female relatives of soldiers? We are not accustomed to enumerators in Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be anything that convinces the enumerator that the woman applying is of the relationship provided in the Act. Her word will be sufficient, if he has no reason to disbelieve it. But if it is not sufficient, or if the enumerator accepts evidence that it is insufficient, then there is the right of review before a judge as provided by the Act, and the judge will then accept such evidence as he would accept in an ordinary action in court.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Before six o'clock the member for Carleton raised a point in connection with section 33A, page 1 of the Bill, regarding the enfranchisement of the wives, mothers, sisters and daughters of those engaged in the naval forces of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The naval forces of Canada are defined in chapter 43 of the Naval Service Act, section 2, as follows:

> "Naval forces" means those naval forces organized for the defence and protection of the Canadian coasts and trade or engaged as the Governor in Council may from time to time direct.

I have consulted the Minister of the Naval Service, and he states that any persons who are attending college would not be included in the naval forces of Canada. Those cadets from 16 to 18 years of age and older who are on the boats actually engaged in patrol work would be included—there are about 200 of them, I think. Only those actually engaged in training in connection with this war would be included.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mine-sweeping is carried on only in Halifax and Sydney harbours. It is not a dangerous occupation, and can hardly be regarded as being within the naval service. I doubt very much whether there is any necessity for that work at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend had better not say that unless he is prepared to put his opinion above that of the Admiralty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That may be the opinion of the Admiralty. They are making preparation for the establishing of quite a patrol service in the Maritime Provinces. For the past several weeks, even months, forty or fifty men have been living in a hotel in Halifax. They have no boats; I do not know what work they can be doing. Of course, one cannot get very far in offering opposition to a suggestion of the British Admiralty, but in my judgment there is absolutely no work on our coasts for these patrol boats. If the suggestion has been made by the British Admiralty, the Government of Canada should suggest to them that the work is purposeless.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before going further, I want to move some amendments which are not substantial; I think they are chiefly misprints. They amend the Bill as follows:

By striking out the words and letters "and (h)" from paragraph (d) of section 2 of the Bill and inserting instead "(h) and (i)."

By striking out the figure 3 which appears in the Bill as denominating section 3 thereof and inserting instead of said figure the figures and letters 67B, and constituting said section 3 as paragraph (f) of section 2, by inserting immediately preceding said figures and letter the following: "(f) by adding as section 67B immediately following section 67A, the following:"

By enclosing within brackets the figure 4, which denominates section 6 of the Bill and constituting said section 4 as subsection (4) of section 67B of the Bill.

These amendments do not affect the purpose of the Act in any way; they simply make the arrangement of the sections more symmetrical and correct some misprints.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will female relatives of soldiers living in unorganized territory in the province of Quebec have the right to vote, and where will they vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They will vote in the polling division in which they reside—at the place where they would vote if they were enfranchised under the provincial laws of Quebec.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to have something more definite about the enfranchisement of the female relatives of those engaged in the Naval Service of Canada. I do not see any reason why they should be enfranchised. I do not believe that they will appreciate it. Many female relatives of the men engaged in the Naval Service will be laughed at by their neighbours if they exercise the right of franchise under this Bill. Is the mine-sweeping in Halifax harbour now carried on by tug boats or small steamers chartered from private individuals? I do not think that the crews of those boats are within the naval service; yet they are engaged in mine-sweeping and the Secretary of State says that their wives and sisters and other female relatives will have the right to exercise the franchise.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As to the first part of my hon. friend's observations, consideration will be given to them. As to the second part of his remarks, I think that he is mistaken. The mine-sweeping is done by boats chartered by the Department of Naval Service and the men engaged on those boats are in the service of that department. I move——

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that this Bill was to be reprinted?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: At the suggestion of hon. gentlemen on the other side we are printing Part II of the Dominion Elections Act as it will stand after the amendments affected by this Bill have been adopted. This is being done in order that hon. gentlemen may have before them a clear view of what Part II of the Dominion Elections Act will be with these amendments. This course is not usually taken, but I thought that the request was a reasonable one; having regard to the way in which this Bill is framed. I move that——

Mr. DEVLIN: Before the Prime Minister moves that fatal motion, I should like to point out to him that the suggestion was made to-day that the Bill be reprinted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are not reprinting the Bill. We are printing as I have already explained more than once, Part II of the Dominion Elections Act as it will stand after the amendments effected by this Act shall have been adopted.

Mr. DEVLIN: I have been in my seat since three o'clock. I have not asked many questions, but as a result of this legislation a good deal of new law will apply to the province of Quebec. I direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that up to the present moment there has been no Bill before the committee. We have been considering amendments to an Act that has already been passed, amendments to a law already in existence. What we are considering is not a Bill proper; it will be a Bill when the law is reprinted containing the amendments. It is really impossible to say that we are considering a Bill until we have the Bill before us.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend and I hold the same view although we express it differently. If we have not a Bill before the committee, I do not know what we have been engaged in considering all day to-day or what we were engaged in considering yesterday.

Mr. CARVELL: We have words before us, not a Bill.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move:

That the further consideration of this section be postponed in order that we may proceed to section 3.

Motion agreed to.

On section 3—Questions to naturalized aliens:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Are there any observations with regard to this what we ought to take into consideration before we come back to-morrow? I do not think it is a very important section.

Mr. PARDEE: I did not know that the Prime Minister was going to move that we proceed to another section. Why does the Secretary of State go back to the non-resident vote? That has been done away with long since. What is the object of non-resident voting being brought into vogue again?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The non-resident vote is done away with provincially, I presume because the man who moves from one place to another can get on the list in the other place. Now that he cannot get on anywhere else because we maintain the lists as they are, and the enumerator has not power to put him on, we prefer to give him the right to vote where he formerly resided than that he should have no vote at all.

Mr. PROULX: Suppose an elector leaves my county and comes to the city of Ottawa to reside, there will be registration in the city of Ottawa and he will be put in the list here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He can get on the list where he resides, but he can vote only in one place, although he may have his choice.

Mr. NESBITT: As a matter of fact if he moves out of a district after a certain time, he would not have a vote at all because he would not get into the city in time to have his name placed on the list.

Mr. CARVELL: The Prime Minister asked if we had any suggestions to make as to section 3. I cannot understand this section, although I suppose there may be some explanation for it. I cannot understand why you should disfranchise a man who is a naturalized British subject, who was born in an Allied country but whose mother tongue was that of an enemy country. There must be a body of people of that class, because otherwise the Government would not have inserted this section. Every one of these sections means something; they are put in this Bill for a purpose. Will the minister please explain why he proposed to disfranchise people who speak the German or Austrian language, but who are not Germans or Austrians by birth and who are British subjects by naturalization? I presume there may be Russians of that class who might speak the Austrian language.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: German or Austrian.

Mr. CARVELL: It would be more likely Austrian than German, because we know that in southwestern Russia, Russians and Austrians intermingle and are practically the same race. Why is it that if a man is Russian-born but speaks the Austrian language, and still is a British subject, he should not have the right to vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are a number of the very class described by my hon. friend, and the fact of the matter is that in their sympathies, in all their feelings in relation to this war, they are distinguishable from the German or Austrian-born. I presume in most cases they have very recently come from Germany and Austria. Moreover, in some cases they have developed a hatred of Russia.

Mr. CARVELL: I am speaking about the man who came from Russia, the man who was born in Russia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He may have developed a hatred of that country. You may look up his naturalization certificate and see where he was born, but beyond that there is no distinction in sympathy whatever between those foreign people, provided they speak the enemy language, whether they are born in Austria or across the border. I do not know how many of them there are.

Mr. CARVELL: This is putting a tremendous power into the hands of a returning officer. It is about as vicious a feature as I have seen in this transaction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a man claims that he is wrongfully disfranchised, all he has to do is to vote and have his case tried.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend knows how valueless that is to any man. If he gets his vote tied up in that way, he might as well throw it into the river.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Mr. CARVELL: This is on a par with the rest of the Bill. The Government are disfranchising Austrians, Germans, British subjects; they are disfranchising women, in fact, it seems to me that they are disfranchising any one who they think will vote Liberal.

Mr. McCRANEY: Near the town of Rosthern in Saskatchewan there is a settlement of Russians from a community formed by them in province of Saratov, which is in the Ural mountains away from the German border altogether. Their ancestors went there over a hundred years ago. They speak both Russian and German, but German is the language of the community. So far as I am aware, their sympathies are not with the Germans in this war, but under the provisions of this Bill as it is drawn, those people will be disfranchised.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If their mother tongue is Russian, they will not be disfranchised.
