Mr. McCRANEY: But the language which is used in their homes, their mother tongue, is German. They belong to the Lutheran church, and their associations rather are German.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there not in Canada a number of Belgians who speak German?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never heard of any.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is the language of about one-third of the Belgians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some of them speak Flemish, but not German.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are a great number employed in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, and I know some of them speak German. It would not do to give the power to a returning officer to distinguish between the German and the Flemish language. It is quite probable that some Belgians might be disfranchised by this Bill, and that would hardly be fair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never heard of a Belgian speaking German, but many of them speak Flemish. If a Belgian speaks German—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: He is gone.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —I would not like to presume he would be done an injustice by this Bill.

Mr. NESBITT: Some of the enumerators might think if a man was talking Yorkshire, he was talking German. Might I suggest before closure goes on, that in subsection 48 you increase the ten days a little, say to fifteen days?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall try to do that.

Mr. NESBITT: And in 65A I would suggest you increase the three days to five days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall try to do that if we can.

Mr. ROSS: Will the Secretary of State consider the question of the voting of non-residents? Under the provincial law as it exists in Ontario to-day, non-residents will not be entitled to vote, and there are always some men who are deprived of a vote and who were deprived of the vote under the old law. It may be an injustice to some, but not to a great many. At the same time, however, if the law is to be as this Bill provides, it is going to re-introduce this question of bringing back non-residents to vote throughout Ontario, a thing we have been rid of for the last fifteen years, and not a desirable thing at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move that further consideration of section 3 be postponed and that the committee proceed to section 4.

Motion agreed to.

On section 4—Names of disqualified persons not to be put on lists:

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a provision in the Bill which deals with men who have not responded to the call for military service. What provision is made for the enumerator striking these men off the list if they are already on? Has he to take the whole responsibility? What proof will be required, and where will he get his proof?

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not make the enumerator the judge. There has to be a conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not shown in the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It says, "any man convicted."

Mr. NESBITT: This section does not apply to Italians?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the riding I represent there is quite a large number of Poles, and I have been trying to discover just how the Bill will affect these men. Some of them may have owed allegiance to Germany, and some to Russia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Poles as a rule speak the Polish language. Consequently, they are not affected by the Bill at all, unless they were born in Germany or Austria. If they were born in that part of Poland that at one time formed part of Germany or Austria, they come under the provisions of this Bill no matter what language they speak, but if born in Russia, they speak Polish and do not come under the Bill at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think they all speak the Polish language.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do the citizens of Norway and Sweden speak the same language?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A great number of them speak the Norwegian language and the Swedish language, and some of them, I think, speak the German language.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It might be worth while considering another clause to this Bill in the event of Sweden becoming an enemy of the Allied powers. A great number of Norwegians might be disfranchised in this country, and I hardly think the Government would like to disfranchise the Norwegians. I should like to ask what prompted the Government to provide for the opening of the polls in the cities of Canada at six o'clock in the morning. So far as Halifax is concerned, I do not think it will be of any practical value, and I do not think the citizens will care for it. I do not think it is desirable, but I am not objecting to it if other cities in Canada desire it. I think, however, it would be much better to keep the polls in the cities open an hour later in the evening. It is very inconvenient opening the polls at six o'clock in the morning, particularly if we are to have a winter election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Representations have been made, chiefly on the part of the railway and labour men. Indeed, we have been asked to try and provide for the railway and commercial traveller vote outside of the county, but the expense and the difficulties in the way of an extra-constituency vote make it impracticable. We are therefore endeavouring to meet the case by opening the polls at six o'clock. This will enable nearly all the railway men and most of the travellers, especially if the election should be on a Monday, to put in their ballots. The labouring population, which, of course, is of much greater consequence, because there are a larger number of them, would also be able to get their votes in before seven o'clock without losing any time.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move that further consideration of this section be postponed and that the committee proceed to section 5.

Motion agreed to.

On section 5—Interpretation:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to amend this section by striking out the figure 5 and substituting the figure 3. This is just a rearrangement of the clauses.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How is the enumerator to receive evidence of the qualifications of those to be enfranchised? Can an application be made on behalf of other persons?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move that further consideration of this section be postponed, and that the committee proceed to the schedule.

Motion agreed to.

On the Schedule:

Mr. BUREAU: This afternoon I asked the Secretary of State about "complete mobilization." He said the clause would stand and that he would look into the matter and give us a definition of it. I understand the Chairman is trying to have the clause carried.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No.

Mr. PARDEE: Who signs the form W4? Is it the enumerator?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The candidate or his agent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What I really had in mind a moment ago was section 4. In effect it means that the enumerator is the judge as to whether or not a man who has lost his certificate of naturalization is a British subject. I think that should be left to some higher tribunal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the simplest thing in the world. A man's certificate is proof of his naturalization. It is just a piece of paper that he keeps in his house. If there should be an error it is subject to review as any other error.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is easy if he can produce his certificate; but supposing he can not?

Mr. McCRANEY: My experience is that there must be thousands of certificates of naturalization on file with the Department of the Interior. When a homesteader applies for a patent he gives in his certificate with the application. Sometimes it comes back and sometimes it does not. I have written over and over again and had certificates taken off the files of the department and returned to the homesteader. I am sure there are many of them who do not know where their certificates are, while they are safely on file with the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course they will know now that the certificates are of value to them, and they will have ample time to get them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As I understand it, the certificate must be produced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the proof to the enumerator, but if they will swear they are naturalized they can vote, then they can establish their naturalization even if the certificate is lost.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On recount proceedings.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would like to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that if closure is put on to-night and the motion made to-morrow, h will not be allowed to make any amendment except one; he will have made his speech then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what the arrangement is, but I want to remind the hon. gentleman who is leading the Opposition that all the clauses can be considered now and the notice given. I do not think the notice need apply to any particular day, as long as it is given at a previous sitting. I think a day might intervene under the closure rules.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the notice were given to-night and the motion were made to-morrow, then closure would apply automatically after the motion was made, if it be made. If notice be given to-night and if the motion is made to-morrow, the Secretary of State could move one amendment, and then he would be through. He would have made his speech in the twenty minutes, and could not move any further amendments.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Some one else could do it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The closure simply says that a member can speak not more than once on any one clause, and for not longer than twenty minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is if the closure is on one clause; but if the closure includes all the clauses, as the conduct of the Government to-night would seem to indicate to be their intention, then the Secretary of State would be through in twenty minutes. If he can speak twenty minutes on every clause, every other member of the House can also speak twenty minutes on every clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so.

Mr. GRAHAM: But if the closure covers all the sections, as I think is intended to be done judging by the manoeuvres of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State would be confined to twenty minutes on all the clauses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My understanding is, although I do not say I am perfectly sure I am right, that any member can speak twenty minutes on any clause, and speak twenty minutes on any other clause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: May we discuss the Bill to-morrow much after the manner we have been discussing it to-day? Could you not postpone the motion after giving notice to-night?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so. Notice may be given to-night, and perhaps we may come to an arrangement.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not suggest either that the Government put it on or that they do not. They are at liberty to do whatever they like. When the Bill was before us the other day we were allowed 20 minutes each and then we were through. That covered all the clauses. I suppose that will be the case to-morrow, and I would suggest that the Solicitor General should distribute whatever amendments he has among the members of the Government.

Mr. CURRIE: The Secretary of State can speak on each clause, but where the axe catches hon. gentlemen on the other side is that the debate must close at two o'clock in the morning.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If all the clauses should be considered, any hon. member may speak 20 minutes on each clause. I move that further consideration of the schedule be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg to give notice that at a future sitting of the House, or the Committee, I will move that the further consideration of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, the schedule, and the title, be not further postponed, and shall be the first business of the Committee. I give this notice in the hope that we may make arrangements to-morrow morning by which it will not be necessary to make the motion. As I have already explained to the House, we are all anxious to get through with the session, and I do not think any one is more anxious than I am. I am in hopes, from a conversation with the hon. member from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), and with the Chief Whip of the Opposition (Mr. Pardee) that we can make an arrangement to-morrow morning which will render it unnecessary for me to propose the motion of which I have just now given notice.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: On the basis of the proposition just made by the Prime Minister, I hope there will be no arrangement with the Government come to, especially in view of the fact that even though the Bill has not yet been put in our hands notice of closure as been given by the Prime Minister

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 12.55 a.m. (Wednesday).

MOTION TO READ THE ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I move seconded by Sir George Foster, that the Orders of the Day be now read.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The only matters to be taken up before the Orders of the Day are a few questions and motions for papers. I suggest to my right hon. friend that the business of the House will not be delayed if we take these up first.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If no other matter is to be introduced, I agree to that. I withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

MOUNTED POLICE—PENSIONS.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. How many retired officers of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are drawing pensions?

2. What is the pension allowance for officers?

3. In case of the death of a retired officer, does the pension go to his wife and family?

4. What is the amount of pension to non-commissioned officers and men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police?

5. Does this pension go to the widow and family?

6. Is it the intention of the Government to revise the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Pension Act, in order to provide a better allowance for the men who have served long periods in that force?

Mr. HUGH CLARK:

1. There are 21 retired officers of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police drawing pensions.

2. The pensions to officers and men of the R.N.W.M. Police are governed by the provisions of the Mounted Police Act—Chapter 91 of the Revised Statutes of 1906—Parts II and III, respectively.

Section 43 of the above mentioned Act provides that an officer who is retired compulsorily for any cause other than misconduct, or inefficiency, after twenty years' service, shall be entitled to a pension for life, not exceeding one-fiftieth of the pay and allowances of his rank or permanent appointment at the time of his retirement for each completed year of service.

Section 44 provides that an officer who retires voluntarily after twenty-five years' service shall be entitled to a pension for life, twenty per centum less than he would be entitled to if he were retired compulsorily.

Section 46 enacts that no addition shall be made to such pension for any service beyond thirty-five years.

3. In the case of the death of a retired officer his pension is not continued to his wife and children, but sections 51 to 54 of the Mounted Police Act provides that the Governor in Council may grant a pension to the widow and a compassionate allowance to each of the children of any officer, who, having completed 20 years' service, was at the time of his death either on full pay or in receipt of a pension.

The amounts of pensions to the widows of officers are as follows:

(a) In the case of the commissioner, $500 per annum.

(b) In the case of an assistant commissioner, $450 per annum.

(c) In the case of a superintendent or surgeon, $350 per annum.

(d) In the case of an inspector, assistant surgeon or veterinary surgeon, $250 per annum.

The compassionate allowances to children are as follows:

(a) In the case of the commissioner or an assistant commissioner, $80 per annum.

(b) In the case of a superintendent or surgeon, $70 per annum.

(c) In the case of an inspector, assistant surgeon or veterinary surgeon, $65 per annum.

(2) If the child is motherless and in great need, the allowance may be doubled.

4. The pensions to non-commissioned officers and constables of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are governed by Part III of the Mounted Police Act.

Section 66 of the Mounted Police Act provides that the pension to a constable (or non-commissioned officer) on retirement shall be according to the following scale:

(a) If he has completed 15 but less than 21 years service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay (not including allowances, as in the case of officers) for each completed year of service.

Note.—Unless a constable or non-commissioned officer is incapacitated by infirmity of mind or body, he is required to serve for 20 years before becoming entitled to a pension.

(b) If he has completed 21 but less than 25 years service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay (not including allowances), with an addition of two-fiftieths of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty years.

(c) If he has completed twenty-five years service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay (not including allowances) with an addition of one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty-five years; provided that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay at his retirement.

Note.—"Annual pay" as referred to above is deemed, for the purposes of pension for a non-commissioned officer or constable, to be the average amount of pay received by him for the three years preceding retirement, exclusive of extra pay or allowances.

5. In the case of the death of a retired non-commissioned officer or constable, the pension is not continued to his wife and family. No provision is made in the above-mentioned Act for the widow and family of a deceased non-commissioned officer or constable who, at the time of his death, was in receipt of a pension.

6. As already explained above, the pension of an officer of the force is calculated on his pay and allowances, the latter for the purposes of pension, being fixed by Order in Council, whereas the pension of a constable is calculated on his pay only. The matter of amending the Act to permit of constables' pensions being based on their pay and allowances, as in the case of officers, has received the attention of the department, and it is hoped to deal with this and other amendments at the first suitable opportunity.

THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that the right hon. leader of the Opposition has some announcement to make as to when the third reading of Bill No. 133, the War-Time Elections Act, may be had. We had some discussion here last evening on that point.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know what it was.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand from a note received from the chief whip that my right hon. friend would say something to me about it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sorry that the Government should see fit to move the closure. I have no objection that they should move the closure if they want to do so, but whether they want to do it or not, all we desire is a proper discussion of this Bill. Yesterday, while there was a considerable amount of discussion on section 1, there was practically no discussion upon sections 2 and 3. What we had yesterday, so far as they were concerned, was simply an announcement from the Government of the changes made by this Bill. Whether the closure is moved or not moved, I intend simply to ask for information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What I suggested yesterday to my hon. friends opposite was that we are perfectly ready to give to-day, to-morrow and Friday for discussion of this Bill in committee provided that we could have an assurance that the third reading would be taken not later than Saturday. There has been one day in committee already. We purpose giving three more, which would seem to me to be ample for all the discussion that would be required in committee. That would bring the third reading on Saturday. It is perfectly true that Saturday is a very inconvenient day, but I thought, under the circumstances, as we have been here for about eight months, including the vacation, that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, who live near Ottawa and who usually go home on Saturdays and Sundays, might be willing to stay on this one occasion in order that we might expedite the business of the House. It seems to me that the proposal I made for three more days' discussion of this Bill was a reasonable one, and that we might have the vote on Saturday. Further than that, I said last night, and I repeat again, that we are willing to sit as late in the evening as may be desired, and I am also willing to commence mornings sessions to-morrow in order to give further time for discussion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend must realize that it is not conducive to the making of agreements to have them offered under threat. We are told that we are to do this or we are to have the closure. So far as I am concerned, I do not intend to prolong the discussion one minute more than is necessary for a thorough understanding of the Bill. Under such circumstances I will not make any agreement whatever, and if my right hon. friend will not be satisfied with that, I cannot say more. I have no intention at all to prolong the discussion.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am sorry that, under the circumstances, my right hon. friend leaves me no alternative except to make the motion. I did not make the proposal to him in the sense of any threat. I discussed it last night, not in that sense at all, as hon. gentlemen opposite, I think will bear me out. I was endeavouring to place before my right hon. friend what I thought was an exceedingly reasonable proposal so far as the further discussion of the Bill in committee is concerned. I beg to move:

> That the consideration of sections 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, and of the schedule and title of Bill No. 133, The War-Time Elections Act, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the Chair, I beg to say that this motion should be given in committee.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will move it in committee. I think my hon. friend is right.

THE HOUSE IN COMMITTEE ON THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT—RULE 17B APPLIED.

House again in committee on Bill No. 133, The War-time Elections Act.—Sir Robert Borden—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg to move:

> That the consideration of sections 1, 2, 3 4 and 5, and of the schedule and title of Bill No. 133, The War-Time Elections Act, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed.

Motion declared carried: Yeas, 43; nays, 25.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I desire to ask a question before we proceed with the Bill. Is the asking of a question equivalent to a 20-minute speech? If one asks a question, may he afterwards speak?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You have to take 20 minutes to ask it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: A member of the House has always the right to ask a question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If a member is on his feet once that is all the right he has.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would like to inquire of the Government if they have any statement to make regarding the exclusion of the relatives of those engaged in the naval forces in Canada. An answer was promised yesterday.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps I had better give a short statement of fact in committee in regard to what constitutes the naval forces of Canada. The Naval Service Act of 1910 defines naval forces:

> "Naval forces" means those naval forces organized for the defence and protection of the Canadian coasts and trade, or engaged, as the Governor in Council may from time to time direct.

There are employed under that definition in the naval forces of Canada about 3,882 men altogether: on the east coast 2,028, on the west coast 652, and in the overseas division, that is Canadians, men enlisted in the Canadian navy serving overseas with the British navy chiefly, 1,202.

Speaking briefly, the term would include all men on vessels that fly the white ensign and are at present engaged in the Naval Service. That would not include vessels that are engaged in the fisheries protection fleet, as the men on those vessels do not come within the definition of Naval Service given in this Act, nor would it include the cadets at the Royal Naval College at Halifax. But it would include those who have enlisted as boys in the Navy under the provisions of the Act, and whose nominal ages are from fourteen to eighteen, but in fact and practice from sixteen to eighteen years. In addition to that, there are some men who have been sworn and enlisted as members of the Naval Service who are doing work on shore at the dockyards, and certain civil work. I understand that the suggestion has been made that it might be desirable to draw some distinction between the men who are actually serving in what is commonly understood as the Navy and those who are doing shore work. It might be possible to make that distinction if desired, just as a distinction is drawn in the military forces between men serving in Canada and those serving overseas.

The qualification which is provided in the Order in Council of September 1st, 1917, regarding the three months' pay given to officers and men on retiring from the Naval Service, has as one of its conditions that the men shall have served continuously for not less than six months during the present war in a sea-going ship, or have served overseas during the present war in the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, Overseas Division. The definition of service in a sea-going ship is "Service in a ship of war, not being a depot ship for wharf or harbour service only."

In regard to the boys to whom I have referred I might say that there are less than two hundred of them who have regularly enrolled and enlisted. Their ages, though nominally from fourteen to eighteen, are as a matter of fact from sixteen to eighteen, because we find that very few boys under sixteen enlist for overseas service. The total number enrolled in the Naval Service is about 3882, of whom 1202 are serving overseas on ships of His Britannic Majesty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Am I correct in assuming that men engaged in mine sweeping and harbour work are not included?

Mr. HAZEN: The men engaged in mine sweeping and patrol are members of the Naval Service. The service they are engaged in is in some cases of a very dangerous character, and is essential to our part in the war. These men are enrolled and form part of the Naval Service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the Government intend enfranchising these? The Secretary of State promised last evening to advise us about this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have made inquiries as to the nature of their occupation. In the first place, we are not enfranchising these men at all by this Bill. They are enfranchised under the Military Voters' Act. All that this Bill does is to divide those of female sex into voters and non-voters, and there is of course no reason at all why the female relatives should be debarred simply on account of the age of these boys, for the female relatives are just as old, no matter how old the boys are. These boys are engaged in war work of a character analogous to that of the men overseas. I understand there is considerable peril attached to it, although it is true that so far they have been successful in avoiding it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where is the peril?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My information is that they use dynamite. Mine sweeping is always a more or less dangerous occupation. We cannot distinguish between different classes of war work for the sake of this Bill. It would appear to me to be utterly illogical to do so as long as the men are not engaged around our own shores, where, of course, conditions are quite different. These men are engaged in active service in connection with the war, and there is a measure of peril attached to their occupation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What about those who are working on shore in the Naval Service?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is where we make a distinction. It may be that there is some degree of danger even there, but we have to draw the line somewhere.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not exclude all those in the Naval Service who ordinarily are engaged in Canadian waters? Why should the female relatives of a man who happens to be employed on a little tug boat or gasoline launch in Halifax harbour be entitled to vote? I hope the minister will drop this altogether.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not entitling these men to vote by this Bill. Whatever rights these men now have as regards voting, they have by reason of the Military Voters' Bill. It may be that so far there has been no loss in this particular service, but it would be very bold indeed for Parliament to assume that those men were engaged in a peaceful occupation akin to work on land. We do not know at what hour it may become the most perilous of occupations. My information from the department is that the service has certainly not been free from peril.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The mine sweepers in Halifax harbour work only two hours a day, and their occupation cannot be described as dangerous.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know much about it myself, but I made inquiries in the department, and I have given the information I got.

There were several other inquiries I promised to answer to-day. First of all, I will take the meaning of the word "demobilization." I have had the following memorandum prepared:

> The meaning of the word "demobilization" is not given or referred to in any of the legal authorities which I have been able to consult, with the exception of a definition given in 13 Cyc, where it is said that it means "in military law, the dismissal of an army or body of troops from active service." He refers to Rapalje and L. L. Dict. as his authority for this definition.
> In the Century Dictionary the meaning given to it somewhat accords with this definition. The meaning there given is "the act of disbanding troops; the reduction of military armaments to a peace footing; the condition of being demobilized, and not liable to be moved on service."

It seems to me that this all taken together is just what every one has understood by demobilization—the release from military obligations—and the moment our overseas soldiers are released from the obligation they assumed as such in our expeditionary forces, at that moment demobilization has taken place.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Bill says "complete demobilization," that is, the cessation of operations, or the withdrawal of the troops from practical operations. Of course you might withdraw one corps after another.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My own opinion is it would be just the same. I do not know how we could word it to meet that difficulty. I presume it would be possible to keep ten men mobilized.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But, it is a feature of all legislation that even an ordinary expression is defined. I had hoped my hon. friend would have given the definition of the words "complete demobilization."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without an interpretation at all, the meaning would be just the meaning we would give by an interpretation, namely, the release of the members of the overseas forces from their obligations as such. That is just the effect of it as it is.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it not a fact that these men are all engaged for the period of the war, or until six months after the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My information is, that that is the condition of the voluntary enlistment.

Mr. MARCIL: Will you keep those men six months after the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Personally, I do not see how they can get home within six months. Steps may have to be taken to keep them on the force until we can bring them home.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We may understand then that complete demobilization means the release of all the troops from active service, whether they are in Europe or whether they have returned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Release from their obligations as members of the expeditionary force. Of course we would not release them overseas.

The next question was as to whether this Act would be applicable to by-elections. I have looked into the matter very carefully, and in my opinion if a by-election should become necessary while this Act is in operation, that is, before demobilization, this Act is applicable, and should be applicable. It is true the Military Voters' Act is not applicable. They would not have a vote in any by-election, but it is much better that this Act should be in effect rather than that the old Act should be in effect. As a matter of fact, the old Franchise Act would scarcely apply at all in some provinces. Reference to sections 52, 214 and 218 of the Act as it will be when this Act is passed, will show this Act is clearly applicable. Section 52 of the Act as it stands reads:

> 52. Except as provided in this part, it shall not be necessary to prepare new voters' lists for the purpose of any election to be held under this Act, when there has been in the said electoral district a previous election, the voters' lists prepared for which are of record in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and there is an interval of less than twelve months between the dates of the writs for the two elections.

So that, for any election held within one year the voters' lists prepared under this Act and in the possession of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery would be the lists. Section 214 says:

214. The returning officer shall also transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the writ, with his return, the stamp furnished him for stamping the ballot papers, and all the ballot papers including those unused, the original statements of the several deputy returning officers, together with the lists of voters and the poll books used in the several polling divisions, and all other lists and documents used or furnished for the election, or which have been transmitted to him by the deputy returning officers.

That section provides that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall keep those lists.

Mr. NESBITT: That is in the present Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the Act as it stands now, and as it will stand. Section 218 provides:

218. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, retain in his possession the papers transmitted to him by any returning officer, with the return, for at least one year, if the election is not contested during that time, and, if the election is contested, then for one year after the termination of such contestation.

So this Act will be applicable in the event of an election within one year.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the soldiers on the other side vote in that by-election?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Military Voters' Act is not applicable.

The next subject is with regard to relatives of members of the Allied armies. I cannot add to what I said yesterday on this point. I think it would open the door to the gravest abuses. While I freely admit there are some whom it would be in the public interest to admit to the franchise, still we cannot distinguish between Allies in the war. We are very anxious to avoid distinguishing, and the difficulty in drawing the line is so great that I think it is better to leave the Bill as it is in that regard.

Mr. GRAHAM: What about the ten days?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will deal with that in a minute. The hon. member for Saskatoon urged very strongly that we should extend the time backwards, that is, make the dates earlier upon which the voters' lists should be posted by the enumerators in the polling division, also the time within which the enumerator would add to or strike from the voters' list after that. Under the Bill as introduced, the first time was ten days, and the last three days before the election. In the former Acts it was eight days and two days. After a thorough review of the Act I prepared amendments which will have the effect of making the dates twelve and five, instead of ten and three. The enumerator will have to post his lists twelve days before the election, and the lists must be complete, so far as the enumerator makes them, five days before the election.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Why not make it fifteen?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We cannot.

Mr. NESBITT: Does that refer to Ontario as well?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It refers to Ontario as well, in so far as the enumerator makes the lists in Ontario.

Mr. NESBITT: Twelve days before the elections?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: And, five days to appeal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He posts the lists twelve days before the election. He is supposed to have them as complete as he can get them. Until five days before the election he sits for two hours each day, and he is obliged, if any one convinces him that the list so posted is wrong, to add to it or to take off a name that he deems should be taken off, but after five days before the election he cannot do that. All he can do is to give a man a certificate on election day which enables him to cast his vote, or to give him a refusal which enables him to tender his vote, which vote is placed in an envelope and deposited in the ballot box.

Mr. NESBITT: If the minister looks at paragraph 65 (a) of the Act, clause 3, line 34, he will see what I mean:

If the enumerator refuses or omits to enter upon the list the name of any person the applicant may, in person or in the case of a qualified person who may be absent from the polling division at the time of the enumeration, an elector in the polling division acting on such absent person's behalf, may within three days after the posting up by the enumerator of such list, appeal to such Board.

That is what I asked my hon. friend about last night. I want that extended to five days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will try and look into that during the afternoon. That is in the province of Ontario?

Mr. NESBITT: In the cities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That applies to the cities only?

Mr. NESBITT: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well that is another subject.

Mr. NESBITT: The Act just gives three days to correct the voters' lists, and I want my hon. friend to give us five days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will try to see if it can be done. I find that since we met a calculation has been made, and I am informed that we can make the twelve days fifteen days. That meets the request which was made by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). The dates will be twelve, fifteen and five, whereas previously they were eight and two.

Mr. TURRIFF: This, in so far as it applies to Saskatchewan, is practically the same law as we have been working under since 1896 in so far as Dominion elections are concerned. Instead of making the provisions that my hon. friend is making—and I realise that they are made for the protection of the Opposition—it would be better to make another change and follow the old system. My suggestion would be that in all cities of 5,000 and over in the West there should be a judicial revision of the lists during the fifteen days prior to the election. In so far as the rural polls are concerned, we would prefer that the law which we have had since 1896 should remain in force. There is practically no effort made in the rural districts to bring in doubtful voters who will take an oath and secure a ballot and vote when they are not entitled to. In the rural parts we never have had any difficulty along those lines. But in the cities it is quite possible that there will be trouble. I would suggest that in cities the judicial revision be made before the election instead of after and thus avoid the necessity of putting so many ballots in the envelope. We have never had that system in Saskatchewan in connection with Dominion elections. But I can see where an unscrupulous scrutineer or enumerator might easily tie up such a large number of votes as to make it very difficult for the candidate to bring the men concerned forward and have their ballots counted in a recount. In rural districts I do not think any revision is necessary at all. The Act worked well in the past, and the fact that no man can be denied his right to vote has always been a safeguard. It is proposed in this Bill that a man whose name is not on the list can go up, take the oath, get his ballot and vote. I do not think any one need be afraid that in so far as the rural polls are concerned any wrong-doing will take place under that system. If my hon. friend could see his way clear to making the change I suggest it will prevent a great deal of work and bother after the election in the event of a recount, and it will certainly make it easier for the enumerators and the officials carrying out the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have finished the answers to the notes I made yesterday. Included in them was a reference to the subject introduced again by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). The principle of this distinction is quite sound. There is undoubtedly more difficulty in cities than in the rural parts. There is no possibility of either plugging or disfranchisement in the rural parts of the country. In the cities it is different. But we were faced with this difficulty, that in the three western provinces there is no machinery for this revision. In Ontario, where we adopt it, there is the provincial machinery already established and in operation, and it is a very complicated matter to establish new machinery and to fit it to the needs of individual provinces. We set about, then, to avoid the necessity of doing that because we thought it could be avoided without taking any very great risks. The posting up of the lists so long a time before election day and the virtual closing of the lists five days before election day will be a very great protection in itself. Secondly, the judicial revision afterwards is an enormous protection and the one that I chiefly rely on. In that connection, there is a great deal in what the hon. member says, namely, that an unscrupulous scrutineer acting for a candidate might make the opposing candidate's position difficult if he were ready to challenge a great number of voters who should not be challenged. But, we have put this check upon that: Hereafter voters cannot be challenged in the ordinary way, as they are in the provincial elections in Alberta, merely by a challenge. We do not allow that. The scrutineer must take his oath that he believes that a man has no right to vote, that he believes the cause and the cause must be sufficient to disfranchise. I think scrutineers will hesitate before they expose themselves to the risk of going before a judge under cross-examination with affidavits in their faces that were manifestly false. They will have to go and show that they have ground for the affidavit and I think that scrutineers will hesitate a long time, and will be advised to hesitate by the candidate, before they take any step of that kind. In the first place, they must go to the extent of perjuring themselves, and in the next place they must perjure themselves with the certain knowledge that they will very shortly be brought before the judge to answer for their perjury. If we were to apply the suggestion of the hon. gentleman to the cities of the West, it would delay the election campaign for a very considerable time. After a very thorough review of the circumstances, it was decided that we would adopt the safeguards that we have adopted and put the whole of the West on the same footing.

Mr. MARCIL: We are to have the enumerators in the rural parts of Quebec. Will the minister kindly explain how the system will work out there in a rural constituency?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Judicial revision in the rural parts would be out of the question because it could not be done within the time. The only work in Quebec that has not yet been reviewed judicially is the work of the enumerators, and that will be very easily tested as it applies only to the question whether a woman has a brother or son overseas, or whether a German or Austrian immigrant has been naturalized since 1902.

Mr. MARCIL: If five women were placed on the list in my county it would be difficult to trace them within the fifteen days provided. They might not reside in the constituency at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But under the Bill they must.

Mr. KYTE: Does the provision as to the completion of the enumerators work fifteen days before election day apply all over Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: And also the requirement that the objection of a scrutineer to a vote on election day must be supported by affidavit?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: Must enumerators reside in the district for which they are appointed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is any restriction on residence, but in practice only a resident of the district could do the work.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. BUREAU: The word "municipality" has a different meaning in other provinces from its meaning in Quebec. With us the boundaries of a municipality are coextensive with those of the parish and of the school district. Would it not be well to say in section 42 "may appoint enumerators residing within the municipality in the province of Quebec or in the neighbouring municipality?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there would be objection to that, although I would rather not amend it as I think it will work out in that way.

Mr. McCRANEY: Under the law as it now stands, lists of voters must be posted one day before nomination day, so that when the candidates are placed in the field there is a list of voters upon which to go. Under this Bill the lists will be posted up only during the last fifteen days 4 p.m. of the twenty-eight days in which the candidates are in nomination, so that there will be thirteen days in which there will be no lists and during which candidates will be in the field. I suggest a further extension of that time. When candidates are in the field the lists ought to be available. Then who are the persons qualified to nominate a candidate for Parliament? They are persons who are on the enumeration list. Are you not going to change the whole basis of your nomination? To-day the candidate is nominated one week before election day, and he is nominated by so many qualified electors, that is those whose names have been posted up the day before in a public place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not necessarily; he simply needs to be qualified. Being entitled to go on the list would be a qualification.

Mr. McCRANEY: The existing provision is that each enumerator, the day before nomination day, posts up two copies of the list in conspicuous places, one I think in the post office and another in a conspicuous place. There is no provision for the case of lists being torn down. That sometimes happens in rural districts. Lists disappear. They are posted on the outside of buildings. Has that point been covered so that the public will have before them continuously the lists? Under the new provision giving fifteen days for the posting up of the lists, there will be candidates definitely in the field before any lists are available. There is no provision under the old law for the delivery of copies of the enumerators' lists to candidates, because the candidates are nominated the day after the lists go up. The Secretary of State is providing that candidates shall be in the field 13 days before the lists go up. I ask him to provide that the enumerator in each polling division give a copy of the enumeration list to each of the candidates. Most of these lists are typewritten and a number of copies can easily be made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman suggests that if the lists are not completed a man cannot qualify as nominator or candidate. The Act says that a certain number of electors may nominate a candidate. An elector is defined as one entitled to vote.

Mr. McCRANEY: In this case he would not be entitled to vote, because his name would not be on the enumerator's list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would be entitled to vote if he was a qualified voter. A man may be entitled to vote, even though he is not on the list.

Mr. CARVELL: Suppose two candidates are nominated and objection is taken against one on the ground that he has not been nominated by 25 duly qualified electors of his riding. The returning officer is called upon to decide whether or not the man has been properly nominated. If he decides that the candidate was not properly nominated, that is the end of the election. If he decides that the candidate was properly nominated, the election shall proceed. In the Maritime Provinces, Quebec, and Ontario there are lists from which the names of 25 qualified voters could be selected. But where there are no lists, how is the returning officer to decide whether he is justified in coming to the conclusion that the candidate has been properly nominated?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Election Act sets forth the qualifications and disqualifications of voters; he would have to judge from that.

Mr. McCRANEY: In that case he would have to examine into the qualification of every man whose name appeared on the nomination paper. Formerly there was no occasion for that because the enumeration list was posted up, and that was prima facie evidence—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The returning officer always has to do that. Possibly he obtains the necessary information by simply examining the list. Now, however, he may have to decide whether on that nomination paper there are 25 men duly entitled to vote—subject, of course, to whatever judicial review there may be afterwards. That task may be slightly more difficult than it was before, but I do not think that any candidate would have difficulty in seeing to it that there were on his nomination paper at least 25 who were qualified to vote. As to the second point raised by my hon. friend regarding the necessity for provision against the tearing down of the lists, section 258 of the Act as it now stands, and as it will stand, provides severe penalties for such an offence. As to the furnishing of copies, I think that the hon. gentleman's suggestion is a reasonable one. There is no difficulty now about getting the lists to the candidates. I have asked that an amendment be prepared to provide that the enumerators shall furnish each candidate with a list.

Mr. CARVELL: I have read this Bill through with a great deal of care; I spent an hour this morning in my room trying to digest it. I do not understand how in the world the thing is going to be worked out. In the first place you appoint as enumerator some political friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill does not say that.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what it means; the man appointed as enumerator will be the most offensive partisan in the district. I know what I am talking about so far as New Brunswick is concerned. Part 2 of the Act was put in our hands only at half-past three this afternoon, and after trying to digest it the best way I can I find that this partisan goes round and makes up his list privately. We have nothing to say about it; we are not entitled to be represented. Ten days before the election—I believe the minister is going to make it fifteen—the lists are put up. The enumerator gives notice that he is going to sit somewhere two hours each day—it may be in his kitchen—and he is to say whether this person shall be added to or that person removed from the list. Why not provide that an affidavit or declaration shall be necessary upon which the enumerator must act? I can pick out the men in my county who will be enumerators—men who for ten years deliberately kept on the list persons who never resided in New Brunswick. They brought these men across the boundary line in automobiles, rushed them to the polls, perjured them and then sent them back to the United States. These men have been the revisers of our lists in

New Brunswick in many cases. Thank God a change has been made and these men no longer have the right to make the lists. Now my hon. friend is putting into the hands of these same people the right to make up the lists—and the Lord help any Liberal candidate who is trying to run in some portions of New Brunswick if these people have that right. If you provided that the municipal authorities should make the list, then you would have a board of three men and you would get justice. Or if you provided that the enumerator should take the affidavit of the applicant or of some other person that the party is or is not entitled to be added to the list, the condition would not be so bad. But it is wrong to leave it to the ipse dixit of this person whether a man shall or shall not go on the list. Worse than that: this man gives notice that he is going to sit some place on election day—and that place is just as liable to be five miles away as it is to be at the polling booth. He sits there and he has the right to make voters all day long. A woman comes in, tells her story, and if he wants to do so he gives her a certificate that she has the right to vote. If he does not want to give her such a certificate he gives a certificate of refusal and when she votes her ballot is placed in an envelope. The matter is absolutely in the hands of this partisan who sits as judge on election day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subject to appeal.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the good of an appeal? If the enumerator has a suspicion the woman will vote as he wants her to, he gives her the necessary certificate; in that case her ballot goes into the box and is counted. But if he does not want her to get the vote, he gives her a certificate of refusal, form W-2 in the Bill. On that certificate she has the right to vote, but her vote does not go into the ballot box; it goes into an envelope. Later on, if a candidate is willing to put up $2,000 or $3,000 to thresh the matter out before a judge, she will probably have her vote counted. Otherwise she cannot get it. This system may work out in the West where the people know something about it, but this is the most horrible piece of legislation, so far as elections in eastern Canada are concerned, that has ever been proposed in my day. I am not drawing up any fanciful objections. During the last nine years there has never been in my constituency an election in which men, who do not reside in New Brunswick, and who have no right to vote, have not been kept on the list. They have been brought over from the United States in automobiles, or in trains in the winter time, and voted, then they have been immediately whisked away. As there was not a Liberal magistrate in the county, you could not arrest those men. Dozens and dozens of votes have been stolen in that way in every election during the last nine years.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Who has made up this list that, according to the hon. gentleman, is such an infamous one?

Mr. CARVELL: Tory politicians.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: What particular Tory politician makes up the list in each county in New Brunswick?

Mr. CARVELL: One of them who is appointed by the Government, is the chairman of the board. What that man cannot do about voters' lists is in many cases, not worth knowing. I am giving actual facts. In the local election of 1912 in New Brunswick we deliberately challenged, at one polling division, either eight or nine men who did not reside in New Brunswick and had not resided in that province for years, but whose names had been kept on the lists. They took the oath and voted, and then took an automobile and got out of the country inside of two hours, and there was no way of getting at them.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Who are the officials other than the sheriff?

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say the sheriff.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I thought the sheriff was one.

Mr. CARVELL: I would trust the sheriff, no matter whether he was a Liberal or a Conservative. We have Liberal sheriffs and Conservative sheriffs. We have had them under both regimes. So far as sheriffs are concerned, we have not been treated very badly. I would trust any sheriff in New Brunswick to make up a list. If my hon. friend could devise some means of appointing sheriffs in New Brunswick, I would be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I was asking the hon. gentleman for information, because I do not know who makes up those lists. Who are the three officials?

Mr. CARVELL: The lists are made up by the two municipal councillors of the parish. I suppose that would correspond with what you call a municipality in Ontario. The word "municipality" in my province means a county. There are a number of parishes corresponding to townships, and there are two men elected usually biannually, who are called county councillors and those two men, together with a third man appointed by the Government, make up the voters' lists for that parish. Those two men are usually pretty fair men, because they represent the people, but the trouble is with the third man appointed by the Government. He is the chairman of the board, and no list is of any value unless it is signed by him. The other two men might make up a perfect list, but if the chairman does not want to sign it, it is of no value. That practically means that the list is made up by the chairman appointed by the Government.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: What time of the year was that list made up last?

Mr. CARVELL: October, 1916.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Will that be the list to be used in New Brunswick in the coming election if it is held before December?

Mr. CARVELL: That will be the list on which the coming election will be held if the election is held at any time before the second or third day of March.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Will that list be generally acceptable so far as fairness is concerned?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes it is the law of the land, and we shall take it.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: What is the complaint then?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know what my hon. friend is speaking about. I am not finding fault with the list. It is there. It is made up by Tory officials, and we have to take it. If the election were held after the third day of March, we would have a much more honest list, but we have to take it as it is. What I am speaking about is that you are going to appoint those Tory partisans as enumerators, and they are the ones who are going to make up the female suffrage list. Those enumerators will play a very small part in the Maritime Provinces so far as disqualifying people is concerned. because, in my constituency at all events, I do not think there is a solitary voter who could be disqualified by any enumerator no matter how badly he might want to act. There may possibly be some of those Danish voters to whom I referred last evening. I do not know how many of them or if any of them came from Schleswig-Holstein. If any of them came from there after it was ceded to Germany, then I am afraid some of those men might be disfranchised. I think there are very few of them in the Maritime Provinces. What I am afraid of in regard to these enumerators is the making up of the list of the female voters. I would like to see some safeguard thrown around the matter. I do not like to see a partisan appointed who has the power to make this list in camera. No man has any right to go near him in order to find out what he is doing, until fifteen days before the election when he posts up his list and says: That is my handiwork. I can go to him and produce the most solemn affidavit in the world and prove to him that he has added to that list names which he should not have added or that he has refrained from adding names which he should have added, but I have no redress, and I cannot make him remedy the matter at all. There should be some appeal or some person to whom one could go in order to get justice. My only object in referring to some of the conditions which prevailed in the past is to show the Solicitor General the conditions of affairs we have fought against, and having fought against them, and having won out and having reached a point at which we can get an honest list, we in New Brunswick feel very sore that we have to go back to the old system, and that the supplementary list has to be handed over to a partisan from whose decision there is no appeal. There is no way of compelling an enumerator to add to the list that which he should add or to strike out from the list that which he should strike out. That is what I am finding fault with. If the Secretary of State does not want to take the revising board—and the chairman of the revising board will now be a Liberal—let him cut them out. Let him take somebody. Let him take the sheriff. If he would have an appeal to the sheriff of the county—and in my county there are two, one a Liberal and the other a Conservative—I would be perfectly satisfied to take either one. Let him make them the arbitrators or court of appeal, and they would make up an honest list.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Under the New Brunswick system is there any appeal?

Mr. CARVELL: No, there is not. At the next session of the legislature, the whole law will be changed. The legislature was not able to meet on account of the old Government not resigning until the month of May. The legislature passed only the smallest quantity of legislation absolutely necessary to carry on the affairs of the province. It is the intention of the Government to change entirely the method of making up the lists in New Brunswick. They will either change it over entirely, or they will provide an appeal from the board of revisers to some official, probably the county court judge, or something of that kind. As it is to-day, there is no doubt in the world that in New Brunswick there is no appeal whatever, and it means that practically what that chairman of the board of revisers says, goes, and that is the end of the matter. If we are going to enfranchise the women—and that has my hearty consent, except that they should all be enfranchised—there should be some appeal from the ipse dixit of this enumerator in order to get justice. As I said before, I would be willing to leave the matter to the sheriff.

An hon. MEMBER: Time

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friends want to call time, all right. I understand that the rule is being adhered to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Go ahead.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the big objection I have to this Bill. I also object very strongly to the enfranchisement of the female relatives of a man who happens to own a little motor boat on the Atlantic coast, and has enough political pull to get the Government to hire it from him. Nineteen-twentieths of all the little motor boats that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries talks of as being engaged in this dangerous service are being paid an exorbitant rate per day as a matter of political pull; that is what it amounts to, and nothing else. I have here a letter written by the Department of Naval Service to a Mr. Calder, of Wilson's Beach, New Brunswick. This man had a motor boat thoroughly equipped in every respect. He was crazy to get the Government to take it off his hands, and put it up to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but he was a Liberal, and therefore his boat was no good and could not be used. His neighbour, who hapened to be a Conservative, rented his boat to the Government. All the little gasolene launches along the Atlantic coast are taken by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if they belong to men of the proper political stripe, and their owners are paid an enormous rate per day, and become members of the Canadian Navy. It simply means that the Government are enfranchising the female relatives of every Tory along the Atlantic coast who owns a motor boat, and they are refusing the franchise to everybody else because they are not able to get in on the inside and lease their boats to the Government. I have another letter which I am willing to let the minister have if he wants it—I have a whole lot of correspondence from this gentleman, in fact—pointing out how this Canadian Naval Service is working out, that all it means is that no man can possibly rent his boat to the Government unless he belongs to the proper political stripe. That is why I raised this question yesterday. Why should the female relatives of the man who happens to rent a motor boat to the Government have a vote in Canada, while the female relatives of the soldier who has enlisted, but has not yet gone across the water, have not a vote. It is simply a method of giving the vote to the female relatives of the leading Conservatives in the Maritime Provinces, and that is all there is to it. I protest most strongly against it.

When this Bill was introduced the Secretary of State stated that he would be glad to receive suggestions. We have been offering suggestions right along, not during a long period, I admit, because we only started yesterday afternoon, but we have been trying to point out the iniquities of this Bill and endeavouring to show how it can be improved, but our suggestions have not met with very much success. It looks to me as if the Government have made up their minds to let this thing go through as it is, and let the axe fall at two o'clock. I admit they have the power, but what is the use of offering suggestions under those circumstances? However, we must do our duty, and offer such suggestions as we think will improve the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Several suggestions have been accepted.

Mr. CARVELL: I fail to see any of any importance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Ask the hon. member for Saskatoon and the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not going into the details because I have not time, and I am not discussing the principle of the measure now, as I may have something to say about that on the third reading of the Bill. I am now simply pointing out the objections I have to the working out of the Bill. Unless some change is made in this provision for enumerators, I can tell my hon. friend that, so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, there will be more trouble in eastern Canada than he has ever heard in his lifetime. They have had their troubles in western Canada. I am not saying that one party is any better or any worse than the other. But whenever you give to a political partisan the right to draw up a voters' list and make him the sole arbiter, there is bound to be injustice, and there is sure to be trouble in the end.

I do not see why the minister could not adopt some method, so far as eastern Canada is concerned at all events, of appealing from the decision of the enumerators. Let some man set the enumerator right if he is wrong. If that is done, then, so far as the working out of the Act is concerned, we will be satisfied. But if it is left entirely to the enumerator, an injustice is bound to be done in certain portions of eastern Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: I cannot understand why the Government are providing for these enumerators. I question very much if it will be an improvement on the system we have at the present time in the province of Quebec. As I pointed out the other day, the secretary treasurer of the municipality prepares the lists. He knows every man, woman and child in the municipality, knows all their circumstances and everything about them. He submits the lists to the municipal council, which represents the people, both Liberals and Tories, and is therefore a non-political body. Why should not the secretary-treasurer of the municipalities in the province of Quebec be empowered to prepare the lists? He has a list already and all he would have to do would be to strike off the aliens who are disqualified under this Bill and add the names of the women whom this Bill enfranchises. He is the most competent man in the municipality for the work and his list could be submitted to the municipal council for ratification. If it was found that he had made a mistake, the municipal council could have it rectified at once. The municipal council, in case objection was taken to the secretary-treasurer's list, could act as an appeal tribunal, to sustain or overrule the decision of the secretary-treasurer. But if the lists are to be prepared by enumerators, one of them could come into a municipality and ask for the existing list and keep that list in his possession until ten days before polling day, when he could issue a new list. I am sure that no member from the province of Quebec would declare this to be an improvement on the system we now have. The people are not used to that way of preparing the lists, and if the minister insists on this method, he is simply heaping up a lot of trouble for himself and the candidates at the next election. There will be general dissatisfaction because conditions are being changed entirely. Suppose we have an enumerator for each polling district. The enumerators for the municipalities would vary in number because some municipalities have only one polling district, and others have two or three. I repeat that the secretary-treasurer is the best man for this work. He is a permanent official, and generally a man of education and standing in the community. He would simply have to make the necessary changes under this Bill in the existing list, and everybody in the municipality would be satisfied.

If you take the other course suggested, which may be a good and proper course in the West, but with which we are not familiar in the province of Quebec, you reverse the whole position of affairs.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not hear the first part of the remarks made by my hon. friend from Carleton, but from what I heard I judged that he was claiming that the revision in New Brunswick at the present time was not satisfactory, and that as a result the lists were not satisfactory.

Mr. CARVELL: I was complaining of the provision in this Bill for enumerating the women voters in New Brunswick, and I was giving as an illustration the conditions which have existed there in the past and pointing out that they are very unsatisfactory and should be changed.

Mr. HAZEN: I think I correctly caught the tenor of what my hon. friend said. The counties of New Brunswick are divided into parishes, which, with the exception of two, each elect two representatives to the county council. There are two parishes in the county of St. John, where the representation is three instead of two, but practically the representation of every parish on the county councils is two. The lists are revised every year, and the revisers are the two county councillors who are elected every second year, I think, the third member of the board being a reviser who is appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. As a result you have for your revisers in the parish at least two men who must be very familiar with the parish, because as county councillors it is their duty to know the people, and having to run elections every second year, they naturally have a thorough knowledge of their people. In my experience there has been little fault found with the lists as we have them in New Brunswick. The list in force to-day is the list that came into force on, I think, January 2 of the present year.

Mr. CARVELL: On January 1.

Mr. HAZEN: The next list will come into force on the first or second day of January, 1918. The list which is now in force and which will be used as the basis if an election is held now under this Act, is the list which came into force on January 2, 1917, and the same list on which the provincial elections were held in February last. I have been through every election in New Brunswick for a great many years past, and since the present Act came into force I have heard very little fault found with it. True it is there is no appeal when the list is once made and published. The list is, in a sense, a permanent list, and the duty of the revisors is to strike off names of those who during the year have left, or died, or otherwise become ineligible to be on the list, and to add to the list those who have become eligible, or acquired the necessary qualifications. They post up in public places throughout the parishes and the cities the names of those whom they propose to strike off, and the names of those whom they propose to add. An opportunity is thus afforded to political parties or to individuals to bring to the attention of the revisors before the list is finally made up and filed, the names of those whom they think should be added, the names of those whom they think should be struck off, or the names of those who are improperly struck off and should be retained. In the cities, which are divided into wards, the system is practically the same, with the exception that the city council appoint two of its number to act as revisors, the third being appointed by the provincial government. After the lists are made up and filed, there is no appeal, and they become effective in January, and are the lists used for any election that may take place during the year. To some people this may appear at first blush to be a very serious defect. I was a member of the legislature when this Act was revised, and when the present Act was passed, and my hon. friends will probably recall the fact that the doing away with appeal was by the common consent of both parties in the legislature at the time. It was found there was a great deal of trouble and difficulty in taking appeals to the sheriff, who was an official appointed by the Government of the day, and therefore scarcely a man who would exercise the very best judgment. A great deal of trouble, expense, and difficulty arose in connection with those appeals, and both parties in the legislature agreed on the revision such as is now in effect. It was felt that while there might be occasional individual cases in which possibly injustice or hardship would be done, it would be far better to dispense with those appeals altogether. If I recollect rightly, my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) was a member of the legislature at the time. It was under that system that the Dominion elections of 1908 and of 1911, as well as all the local elections which have intervened in the meantime, were held. So far as I am aware, there never has been any agitation for a change of the system. I note my hon. friend says it is the intention of the present government of New Brunswick to introduce a new Act some time in the future. That cannot be done, of course, until there is another session of the legislature, and in the ordinary course of events there will not be another session of the New Brunswick legislature before the month of February or March next. Inasmuch as it is fully expected that the federal elections will be over before the New Brunswick legislature meets, it would be impossible for us to frame a Bill anticipating any changes which might be made by the legislature of that province.

There has been very little trouble with our lists, and I think every man who has been interested in politics in New Brunswick will agree with me in that statement. Some years ago, there were quite extensive frauds attempted which were spoken of as the "Swamp Vote." Names of people who did not live in the county, and had no property in the county, were put on the lists. As a result of that, and as a result of the frauds attempted in connection with what is known as the Rothesay list, the legislature enacted that no one should have the right to vote for the provincial or federal House who is not at the time of tendering his vote a resident of, and domiciled in, the division in which he votes. There prevails the policy of one man, one vote. The voter has to poll his vote in the place where he lives and is domiciled. There is no such thing as a non-resident vote, and the ownership of real estate in a district does not give the right to vote to a man who does not live there. The present list, which came into force in January, and on which the recent local election were held, will be the list used in the next Dominion elections with these changes: from it will be struck all the names of those aliens who are disqualified, and to it will be added the names of the women who have the right to vote under the provisions of the present Bill. It seems to me there will be very little difficulty in making up a list which will be thoroughly satisfactory to both political parties under that system.

My hon. friend referred to another subject in regard to the votes that are given to the female relatives of members of the Naval Service and to some correspondence from Mr. Calder, a member of a well known family in Charlotte county, New Brunswick who, it seems, wanted to sell or charter a patrol boat to the Naval Department and whose offer was not accepted. I know nothing about the case myself; I have never heard of it. If my hon. friend will go over the list of boats that have been purchased or chartered by the department since the war broke out, I venture to say that it will be found that as many of these boats have been purchased or chartered from gentlemen who are members of the political party to which my hon. friend belongs, as from members of the political party to which I belong.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is smiling when he makes that statement.

Mr. HAZEN: I make that statement in all good faith though I smile because my hon. friend would never believe it possible that a Liberal should receive anything approaching fair play at the hands of this Administration. All these boats that we have chartered or purchased for the Naval Service were secured after careful examination by the permanent and responsible officials of the department and our only desire and anxiety have been to get boats suitable for the purpose for which they were secured. My hon. friend puts it before the House as if every man from whom we purchased or chartered a motor boat would become a member of the Naval Service and that his female relatives would be entitled to vote. Such will not be the case. His female relatives will not get any votes under the provisions of this Bill. They only get votes who are relatives of the men who are enlisted in the naval forces of Canada. As I said earlier this afternoon, there are about 2,800 such men of whom 1,500 are serving overseas. The others are serving in vessels such as the Rainbow, submarines, and other vessels working in connection with the Naval Service and in addition the men who are serving in the patrol vessels which are doing work of a distinctively naval character and recognized as such all over the world, particularly in Great Britain. This work consists in patrolling the coast to see that no base is established by the submarines of the enemy and such other work as the department finds necessary after consultation with the authorities of the Admiralty and after getting the best advice it can in regard to the matter.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the patrol service extend inland on the St. Lawrence any distance, or is it confined to the Atlantic seaboard?

Mr. HAZEN: A certain number of patrol vessels patrol the coasts of Canada. I regard the coast of Newfoundland, the straits of Belle Isle and the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence as the coast of Canada in that connection. The men on these vessels are doing work of a dangerous character. We have had losses of life, not from the enemy, but from the perils of the sea, because these men have to go out in severe storms at any time they are called upon. They enlisted for naval service, they are naval men, they are doing naval work and are doing work of a hazardous character. The female relatives of these men will get votes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would it not be well, as they are comparatively few in number, to put in the Bill the names of the ships service on which qualifies the female relatives of these men to vote?

Mr. HAZEN: These vessels change and are added to from time to time, and I do not think the suggestion of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) would be very practicable or easy to work out. I told the committee before—perhaps I had better do so again—that the female relatives of cadets of the Naval College, who were referred to in the House yesterday, are not entitled to vote under this Bill. A certain number of boys in the Naval Service are employed on ships. Every one knows that in His Majesty's Navy, in addition to men of mature years, boys are employed on the vessels; they are enrolled, and are as distinctly members of the Naval Service as are the men of more mature years. In the Canadian navy most of these boys are from 16 to 18 years of age. Under the regulation they should be from 14 to 18, but in actual practice very few are found under 16 years of age, as they do not go into the service at as early an age as they do in Great Britain. It is proposed that the female relatives of those who are doing active service in connection with the defence of the country should have votes, but it is not proposed that female relatives of the owner of a patrol or motor boat, or a boat of any sort that has been chartered by the department, shall have votes, because he does not come under the definition in the Naval Service Act of a member of the naval forces of the country.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not so innocent as to think that this Bill permits the female relatives of every man who happens to lease a boat to the Government to get a vote, but in nearly every case the man who leases the boat goes with the boat.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. CARVELL: This is what happened in the Calder case—

Mr. HAZEN: I know the Calder family of Charlotte very well. Will my hon. friend state for what purpose this boat was chartered?

Mr. CARVELL: It was not chartered.

Mr. HAZEN: Or purchased?

Mr. CARVELL: It was not purchased; the man was a Grit and they would not have anything to do with him.

Mr. HAZEN: For what purpose was it that the Naval Department was seeking to acquire a boat of the character of Mr. Calder's and why was it that the department did not take it over from him?

Mr. CARVELL: Here is the letter of the department to Mr. Calder:

> I am directed by the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service to inform you that he is unable to accept your valued tender of April 12, 1916, for motor boat for patrol service.

The man who was lucky enough to have his boat accepted as a motor boat for patrol service in the Canadian navy enlists in the Naval Service and in nine cases out of ten he simply draws pay and does nothing. I want to test my hon. friend's sincerity in this. It was all very nice for the hon. gentleman to try and make the country believe that the Government are not putting through this Act because they see in it a chance to steal the election. It is coming on winter time, there are no German boats around the coast and no mines except the mines that we may have laid ourselves and no mine-sweeping except going out for practice. Is my hon. friend willing to restrict this Canadian naval vote to the people who have enlisted up to the present time, or is he going to rent all the boats on the coast of Canada which are owned by Tories and swear the owners in as members of the naval force and give their wives votes?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no idea in the mind of any official in the Naval Department that we are going to charter a whole lot of boats for the sake of giving votes to the female relatives of the men who own them. They would not get votes anyway unless the men enlisted in the Naval Service and prepared to serve in the defence of the country until after the war.

Mr. CARVELL: Does he not think that any one who owns a boat on the Atlantic coast would be willing to enlist under conditions now existing? He gets a great big per diem allowance on his boat and does not have to do anything. That is what they are all after. That is what this man Calder who, I presume, is a Liberal, is finding fault with, that they would not give him a chance because he is a Grit. This talk about the Canadian Naval Service is the greatest nonsense these people have uttered since the war began. The minister has hundreds of these little boats in his employ, for which he pays large sums, but which contribute nothing to the defence of Canada or towards the war, and never will. If he is sincere, why not say that the female relatives of no person who enlists in the Canadian navy after this date will have the right to vote.

Mr. HAZEN: The statement that we have hundreds of these boats is about as exaggerated as many others made by the hon. member. We have engaged only such boats as were absolutely necessary for defence purposes.

Mr. CARVELL: Tell the committee how many.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member asks that the female relations of men who have been enrolled and enlisted in the navy up to the present time only shall have votes. I do not know what view the Secretary of State or the other members of the Government would take of that suggestion, but I do say it would be doing great injustice, as we are still enlisting men and sending them everywhere—

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, hiring boats.

Mr. HAZEN: —we are still enlisting men and sending them overseas. When they go overseas they go on vessels of the British navy which are engaged in work of the most important and dangerous description.

Mr. CARVELL: I was not finding fault with the men who go overseas but with the men who stay in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: A provision restricting this right to the relatives of men who have already enlisted would have no appreciable effect; it would not vary conditions to the extent of ten votes. Between now and next spring few if any boats will be chartered or purchased by the Government of Canada, and I do not think that my hon. friend's suggestion would make a particle of difference to the vote which will take place in a few months.

Mr. CARVELL: Then show your good faith by making the change.

Mr. HAZEN: I would have no objection to doing so, only there might be cases where grave injustice would be caused.

Mr. MARCIL: Does not the patrol service extend up the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes?

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. gentleman will understand how undesirable it would be to discuss the patrol service in the House; but we shall be glad to give him, as a member of Parliament, all information at any time.

Mr. KYTE: I reminded the Minister of Marine sometime ago that in the ports of Sydney and Glace bay a considerable number of motor boats have been employed by the Government and the owners have been in charge of them ever since they were taken over. I have in mind one boat not chartered by the Department of Naval Affairs but by another department. The owner of that boat has been receiving $15 per day for the past two years for the services of that boat, out of which he has to pay the wages of one man and the oil used. He has drawn some $11,000 for the hire of his motor boat, which originally could not have cost more than $600 or $700. I endeavoured to get a list of the motor boats employed by the Government at Sydney, but, for reasons which satisfied me, that list was not given out and I must depend for any information I give to the committee upon inquiries I have made at Sydney and Glace bay.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the name of the boat referred to and what department is she employed?

Mr. KYTE: I think it is the Helena. She is employed by the Customs Department.

With regard to men who have enlisted for service, I know that in Halifax there are some forty men, masters and mates, who were engaged by the Department of Naval Affairs as far back as June to take charge of patrol boats. These boats have not yet been supplied, and still these men are drawing pay and living at the Acadian hotel which has been taken over by the department as a boarding house for them. They have done nothing except to go out for an hour or two each day in Halifax harbour for instruction in mine-sweeping. Will their female relatives be entitled to vote?

Mr. HAZEN: Those men are enrolled and enlisted and belong to the naval forces of Canada. They are going on boats that will be ready in a very short time, the construction of which has been delayed. As soon as the boats are ready these men will be engaged in a very important and arduous work. Their time is not being wasted at Halifax as they are receiving instruction which will be of great value when they take up their work. It was found that we could not safely put off their employment to a later date. They must be ready for duty the moment the boats are ready. Their female relatives would undoubtedly have the right to vote.

Mr. KYTE: I understand that there is quite a large waiting list of masters and mates who have applied for similar positions, so that I do not think there would have been much danger to the department if they had delayed making these appointments. Will the instructors on the Niobe at Halifax, who are giving instruction to the cadets and students at the naval college, be included in the naval forces, so that their female relatives will have the right to vote?

Mr. HAZEN: If they are enrolled and enlisted as members of the naval service and are bound to serve during the period of the war, they will belong to the naval forces of Canada. I cannot tell my hon. friend, offhand, however, whether they are in that position or not. With regard to the masters and mates, their training has taken a somewhat longer time than we had anticipated, but that is something that could not possibly have been prevented. In Great Britain the highest value is attached to the services rendered by men of the mercantile marine, by fishermen, and others, who are engaged in mine-sweeping and other work of an important and dangerous character.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister said that it would not be advisable to make public the information asked for by the member for Bonaventure. Could the information be given privately?

Mr. HAZEN: If the hon. gentleman applies to the department the information will be given to him privately.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Answers have been made to question put by hon. gentlemen in respect to matters affecting provinces other than Quebec. That province is referred to in only one place, page 16 of the reprinted Bill. I quote from section 65A as amended:

1. In the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the enumerators shall adopt as the basis of the lists of voters which they respectively shall compile the lists prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for the election were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of the province, for the purposes of provincial elections, and they shall not add to such basis list any other names than those of female voters qualified to vote by this part of this Act nor strike off nor erase therefrom any other names than those of persons disqualified from voting, by this part of this Act, and section 62 of this Act shall apply only to qualified female voters whose names do not appear on any list compiled by any enumerator and to persons whose names he has erased or struck from such basis list.

The Secretary of State has done some nice drafting in this Bill in providing for mushroom enumerators. Section 42 of the Dominion Elections Act, as amended by this Bill, is where the mushroom enumerator comes in. It reads:

Subject to the provisions of section 65a of this Act the Governor in Council may appoint enumerators in each province to make lists of the electors in each electoral district, and the returning officer of each electoral district shall assign one of such enumerators to each polling district therein.

Under one provision of the Bill it is provided that the enumerator shall adopt the old list as the basis for the making up of the new one, but this last provision seems to require him to make out new lists. Although it is provided that in the province of Quebec he shall take the old lists as a basis, it is further provided that he shall compile an entirely new list. I should like to have an explanation of that. I wrote to Hon. E. L. Patenaude, then Secretary of State, on June 6, asking him to send me a list of the electors of St. James Division, Montreal. On June 7 he wrote me a letter —I think it was his last communication as minister; he resigned on that day—enclosing the list I asked for. I find that St. James Division, Montreal, has 88 polling booths and 7,343 voters. That list includes outsiders, people who were born in Ontario. It includes Jews who may be regarded by the enumerator as persons of German birth, and who may be, therefore, struck off the list. How is the enumerator to find out what female electors should go on the list? How is he to find out how many soldiers have gone to the front from St. James Division? How is he to obtain information as to the wives, sisters and female relatives of these soldiers? I suppose he will take as a basis the list already existing, compile a new list, and send it to the returning officer. Who will revise this list that the enumerator has compiled? The basis of the list of electors in Quebec is by virtue of article 180 of the Election Act of Quebec, amended in 1912 and in 1915, so as to have the system of "one man one vote." Article 180 says:

The following persons, and no others, being males, and who at the time of the deposit of the list under articles 196 and 197, or 222 or 223, as the case may be, are domiciled within the limits of the municipality for which the list is made, and who are of the full age of 21 years, subjects of His Majesty by birth or naturalization and not otherwise legally disqualified, shall be entered upon the list of electors.

The suffrage in Quebec is very wide. The franchise is given to sons of owners, occupiers or tenants, every man over 21 years of age who has an average revenue of $10 per month. I am not going to say anything about the rural districts. In the municipalities the list is made up by the secretary-treasurer of every village and deposited on the 15th of this month. The list is posted up, and if there is any objection, or if any one claims that his name should be put on, the municipal council deals with the matter. In the city of Montreal we are under article 224. We make up the list every two years. Notice is given that those who have the necessary franchise shall appear and swear that they are entitled to vote. The list is made up in December. In January, notice is given that the Board of Revisors will go over the list and receive complaints as to errors. This board is created by virtue of article 224 of the Election Act, which says:

There shall be, for each of the cities of Montreal, Quebec and Three Rivers, a board of revision called the "Board of Revisors of the city of (name of the city)." The said board shall be composed of three persons selected and appointed as follows: The city council of each of the said cities shall appoint one of the said revisors. . . . The Lieutenant Governor in Council shall appoint the other two revisors.

In Montreal these three gentlemen compose this board: the Hon. Justice F. X. Choquette, who is the president; Mr. George A. Morrison, K.C., and Mr. Harvey, K.C. In January, they went over the list and found it correct, and the city council of Montreal is bound by the law to send a copy of that list to Ottawa. This is the copy I have in my hand. The point I want to make is this: Is it necessary, when we have the guarantee of the reputation of Mr. Justice Choquette and of those other two gentlemen, that they will make up a proper list, that we should hand over the work to one enumerator who may be appointed to the dissatisfaction of the whole community? You are proposing to take the old list as a basis. Why could not Mr. Justice Choquette and the other two gentlemen add on the names of the women voters and strike out the names of foreigners whose names they think should be stricken out? Why put in this mushroom enumerator? The enumerator might be a kind of a dog mushroom, because there are different kinds of mushrooms. We shall have to watch the enumerator. I shall have to sit next to him in order to see that he does not strike out or add on names which should not be stricken out or added. By leaving the list to the Board of Revisors in Quebec and Montreal, there is every guarantee that it will be made up properly and to the satisfaction of all concerned. In that way also, the Government would save a great deal of money. In Quebec we have 65 counties, and there would have to be at least 65 enumerators with the right of the returning officer of the county to name more; that is to say, one to every polling subdivision. I fail to understand why the Government is introducing this system of enumerators. We never had such a thing before in Quebec. Under subsection 62, a person may go to an enumerator and say: I have the right to vote. The enumerator may refuse, but he will generally give the right to vote to anybody so that it may be that in every booth there will be five or six or seven of those people coming to vote. What control have you in that case? The deputy returning officer or the representative of a candidate can challenge, but at the same time, if this person offers to swear, he must receive the vote. There will, therefore, be an electoral campaign in every polling booth. There will be discussion there as to whether such a person shall be allowed to vote or not. You will have one agent fighting against the other agent, and you will find that there is really no basis for the list. The list will apparently be made up, but at the same time it will be so disrupted by the enumerators that nobody will recognize it. There will be a fight in the booth. To save all this I would ask that the Board of Revisors be permitted to revise the list in the city of Montreal, to receive all complaints, to strike out the names of foreigners whose names should be struck off and to add the names of the women whose names should, according to this measure, be added. You may take all the precautions you like to name a good enumerator, but he will be a partisan. Two years ago every one expected an election. The people of Montreal thought there would be an election.

Partisanship came in. I was asked to look after the revision of the electoral list of St. James, but I had no money to spend for that purpose. My opponent, however, had an office controlled by a great politician whom we sometimes see in this House. He appointed two men for each polling subdivision, and these two men made every one who applied to be put on the voters' list establish his qualifications. A man called Peter, we will say, would come along, and these two men would say, "We don't know Peter," and Peter would be struck off the list. About fifteen hundred names were struck off in that way. Last year 700 or 800 applied to be put on the voters' list in St James, and no organization was formed to strike off names. I thought the Government had possibly decided to prepare a new list. Full opportunity was given to applicants to be put on the list. Does any one expect that we will get justice if these enumerators are appointed? There is not the slightest doubt that the enumerators who will be appointed will be the best string-pullers in the municipality. They will be near to the Government in some way or other, and we shall have to look after our own interests. I think it would be far better to leave it to the judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true that the enumerator makes a complete list and hands that list to the returning officer, but in making that list he is compelled by law to put on every man who is on the list that exists for that poll, except aliens naturalized since March 31, 1902, and conscientious objectors. He is also compelled to add the women who are enfranchised under this Bill, and those only. Those are his duties as defined by law. That work of his is subject to appeal to the judges. If Judge Choquette is the judge who would sit on a recount, he will sit and have just the same authority as before, and I hope he will exercise it well, as no doubt he will. Nothing else is subject to appeal. Why? Because it has all been judicially revised before.

We do not propose to appoint string-pullers or mushrooms as enumerators.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: These things might occur after the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The election will not be decided until the judge is through with his work. As long as the result of the election depends upon his work, it makes no difference whether his work is done before or after polling day. It is the result that counts, and that result depends just as much upon the judicial work of the judge as if he did it before polling day. That is the intent of the Act, and I am sure if my hon. friend will consult with his friends around him he will be advised that that is exactly what is embodied in the Bill.

My hon. friend from Carleton made a suggestion to us with regard to the boys who might from the date of the passing of this Act be enlisted for patrol work on the Canadian coast, and he asked that any so enlisted should not be counted among those whose female relatives would be permitted to vote. As soon as he made the proposal it struck me as reasonable, and he put it as a test of our sincerity. I accept my hon. friend's suggestion, and am prepared to embody it in the Bill. I do so for the reason that it is in line with the spirit of the Bill as it now stands. We declined to give the vote to the women relatives of the soldiers in Canada, and to my mind the chief reason was that it would admit of abuse. There would undoubtedly be the possibility of taking enlistments, and if there is any possibility of that in connection with the naval forces around the shores of Canada I do not think it is unreasonable that the suggestion of my hon. friend should be accepted, and that 33A should be amended accordingly. Between six and eight o'clock I will prepare an amendment embodying the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: I am very thankful indeed to the Solicitor General for this small fraction of comfort, which I am sure will be of some value around the eastern coast of Canada. I should like my hon. friend to consider between now and eight o'clock the other side of the case. When this Bill was introduced I listened to him very carefully, and the reason which he gave for the enfranchising of the women relatives of the soldier overseas was that that soldier could not be here to exercise his influence among his neighbours, and therefore his influence could not be exerted to its fullest extent in the election. He stated that the man who had enlisted but had not left Canada was not in the same position, because he was here to exercise his influence, and his female relatives were therefore not entitled to the vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is another reason.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the principal reason. Now the men in the patrol service around Canada are here and can exercise their influence to a much greater degree than the soldier who is in Canada, because the soldier is confined to barracks and is not liable to get around among his neighbours, whereas the man in the patrol service is living at home, carrying on his ordinary business, and just as much able to exercise his influence during an election as ever he was in his lifetime. I do not think my hon. friend understands the conditions in the patrol service. These men are simply living at home and carrying on their ordinary occupations, and the Government is paying them for the boats. If there be any reason for excluding the women relatives of the soldier who is in Canada, there is a double reason for excluding the woman relatives of members of the patrol service. However I am very thankful for the small concession my hon. friend has made, and I hope he will take this further suggestion into consideration between now and eight o'clock.

Mr. NEELY: In connection with this cloven-footed provision which disfranchises all British subjects who have been naturalized since March 31, 1902, I would like to ask the Secretary of State what evidence or proof, or what safeguard is there in this Bill as to the nature of the evidence that will be considered sufficient by the enumerator, or by the deputy returning officer, when a voter is voting and is challenged as to whether he was born in an alien enemy country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The judge decides that.

Mr. NEELY: But here is a man who is making application to the enumerator to go on the list, and he speaks the German language—

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is refused.

Mr. NEELY: But he was born in the United States. The enumerator says: "Well, I don't know whether you were born in the United States or not." Is he refused by the enumerator?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he is born in the United States he should not be refused by the enumerator, and if he is refused he can vote and his vote will be counted.

Mr. NEELY: It will be tied up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the enumerator would not gain anything by that.

Mr. NEELY: How is the enumerator to decide whether this man should be put on the list? Is he to take the man's word when he says that he was born in the United States, or that he was born in Germany? What proof must a man furnish? Surely, the Secretary of State does not expect a man to produce his birth certificate? It does not seem to me there is any safeguard here whatever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it would be unreasonable to demand a birth certificate if the man did not have it. If he had his birth certificate, of course he might be asked to produce it. I do not think there will be very much doubt as to the origin of the men who are under the jurisdiction of the enumerator, because he has only one poll and he knows the people. He has for years known what the public has generally considered was the place of birth of John Schmitz. He has understood it all along, and in the majority of cases it is clear there would be no dispute about it. If there was a dispute he could make inquiries from the neighbours, and so on, and if by any chance he was wrong, then it comes before the judge, who takes such evidence as he would take in any civil proceedings.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When does it come before the judge?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the recount.

Sir WILRFID LAURIER: It is tied up until then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But what is the difference? When this safeguard was put in, it was done in the belief that it secured absolute judicial revision, and for the life of me I cannot see why a judicial revision, which takes place before the result of the poll is determined, is not as effective as if there was no necessity at all for such revision.

Mr. NEELY: The safeguard spoken of by the Secretary of State does not seem to me to meet the point at all. The actual working-out of this feature will be this: if you get an active partisan as enumerator, and send him into a German-speaking polling division—a number of which I have in my own constituency—he can doubt any man's word, he can refuse to put the name of any German-speaking man on the list, and when that man comes to vote, his name not being on the enumerator's list, if he votes at all he must swear in his vote. These votes will be put in envelopes, and will be considered before the judge on a recount. I can imagine in a constituency where there would be perhaps forty or fifty polling divisions, largely constituted of men of German birth or extraction, if the candidate wished to protect his interests and to protect the interests of every voter in those forty or fifty polling divisions, he might have to bring all these men before a judge on a recount to verify their right to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have to swear to their exact qualification in order to vote.

Mr. NEELY: Exactly. It seems to me the scrutineer of that polling division might challenge every one of these votes, and compel the deputy returning officer to put them into envelopes to be brought before the judge in a recount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the enumerator refuses to put a man's name on, and the man is prepared to swear he has the right to vote, nobody can challenge that. It goes in the envelope anyway.

Mr. NEELY: So much the worse. If the man has to swear in order to vote, then automatically his vote goes into the envelope.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the enumerator makes him swear.

Mr. NEELY: Giving the enumerator credit for being conscientious and trying to do the right thing, although a partisan, should we put upon him the responsibility of deciding as to whether or not a man who was born in the United States or in an alien enemy country, should or should not have the right to vote? I think that is an entirely unfair proposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is subject to judicial review.

Mr. NEELY: Supposing the man does swear in his vote, and he has to appear before the judge on recount. What evidence is the judge to accept?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That position arises in every case. The judge will be governed by the laws of evidence. I do not know how you are going to determine anything ultimately except by the laws of evidence of this country. The rule of evidence is that the judge will demand the best evidence that can be secured. This would be the certificate of birth, but if this certificate is not securable, then he gets the next best evidence that can be secured. That is plainly put in the rule of evidence, and that is the rule the judge will follow.

Mr. NEELY: I think it would be very much fairer to candidates and to voters if this Act were to state the class of evidence which would necessarily be accepted by the enumerator as to the place of a man's birth, so that if he were born in the United States, or in some friendly country, his name could be put on the list and he would not necessarily be sworn, and his vote tied up, nor would he be under the necessity of appearing before a judge on a recount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If that were done there would be the same difficulty. If the enumerator is honest, he will take the best evidence he can get. If he is dishonest he will not. Supposing he is dishonest, and is told by the law to take such and such evidence, but does not do it, all the man can do is vote, and have his ballot tied. It would be tied anyway. As long as the man has his recourse to go before a judge of the land, no injustice can be done to him.

Mr. NEELY: The point I make is, that the enumerator has nothing in this Act to guide him as to what kind of proof or evidence is proof or evidence to him that the man is not entitled to be on the list?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor has the judge anything to guide him under the ordinary law of the land. The judge has to take the best evidence available, and the enumerator has to do the same thing, and if you put up hard and fast rules I think hon. gentlemen will find the matter would be a good deal worse than it is now.

Mr. NEELEY: I see in the present arrangement the possibility of the entire vote of a polling division being tied up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that is possible for the reason that, if the enumerator were to act like that, he would be in a most unenviable position when he was landed before a judge, on a subpoena from the other side, afterwards. He had sworn to do his part. I would not like to be the enumerator and, similarly, I would not like to be the challenger at the polls. There is that check. But, suppose he did, no injustice would be done to the hon. member for Humboldt. If either party wants to make a fool of itself it can but it does not do it any good. It finally comes before the judge who, we presume, will be absolutely fair.

Mr. NEELY: The enumerator is not a lawyer or a judge and he wants to know. I am assuming that he wants to be fair but there is the case of the man who does not want to be fair and who may say: If he tells me that he is from the United States I am supposed to take his word. I would suggest that it would be a great injustice to ask a man in the short time of an election campaign to back up his claim to citizenship. The other man who is affected by this Act is a naturalized British subject and he has taken the oath of allegiance. He has a naturalization certificate. In taking his oath he gives his place of birth under circumstances that do not in any way tend to fraud. When he was taking out naturalization there was no reason why he should say that he was born in the United States when he was actually born in Germany. The naturalization certificate should be prima facie evidence as far as putting the man on the list is concerned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I too think it would be prima facie evidence but it would not be conclusive.

Mr. KNOWLES: That would make it conclusive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Suppose a man could not find his affidavit and suppose also that his certificate was missing—we have provided that a judge can weigh the evidence of the man's right to vote without giving the absolute right to everybody who cannot locate his affidavit. He might have difficulty in getting his affidavit although he had his certificate.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to call the minister's attention to clause 33(a). I take it that the female relatives, enumerated, of the man who has served overseas, whether he is back in this country or not, have the right to vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: In that case I would ask the Secretary of State to strike out the word "person" as it appears in line thirty of this clause:

> Every female person shall be capable of voting and qualified to vote at a Dominion election in any province or in the Yukon Territory, who, being a British subject, and qualified as to age, race and residence as required in the case of a male person in such province or in the Yukon Territory, as the case may be, is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any person.

I would propose to insert "military elector" in place of "person."

Mr. MEIGHEN: And leave in "living or dead"?

Mr. BUREAU: Leave in the rest but substitute for "person" "military elector."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then we would have to define "military elector."

Mr. BUREAU: That is defined in the Military Voters Act. I suggest that out of respect for the soldier himself. I was reading in the papers the other day about a man who was being chased around this country, an outlaw, who is a returned soldier, a dynamiter named Monette or Girard. It is not right that the mother, wife, daughter or sister of a man who has been at the front and has served his country well should go to the poll with the wife or sister of this man Monette, an outlaw and a deserter, for whom the police have been looking. The term "military elector," although not contained in this Act, is defined in the Military Voters Act, and I think that, for the honour and dignity of those men who are at the front and doing their duty, it is proper that it should be used in this Act rather than the word "person." The definition of "military elector" in the Military Voters Act is:

"Military elector" means and includes every person, male or female, who, being a British subject, whether or not ordinarily resident in Canada and whether or not a minor or an Indian, has been, while within or without Canada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Militia on active service, or the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, or has been, while within Canada, appointed, enlisted or enrolled as one of the British Royal Flying Corps, Royal Naval Aviation Service, or Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol.

I have been looking over that clause, and I find that it covers every man whom the Minister of Naval Service would like to have included. It may extend the franchise a little farther than the Secretary of State intends. We might restrict it, if the minister desires to do so, with reference to the men who have not yet left Canada. On the other hand, I would like the persons whose relatives are entitled to vote under clause 33 (a) to be designated as a "military elector" who is serving or who has been honourably discharged, instead of by the word "person."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The suggestion is a very valuable one. It did not occur to me that the relatives of a deserter would be included here, but I rather think they would be. It would be quite wrong that the relatives of those who had joined and deserted should be on a par with the relatives of the man who was serving or who had been honourably discharged.

Mr. CARVELL: Section 63 of the Act as it now stands provides that any person, practically, who is on the voters' list can be challenged and if he refuses to take the oath in form Z he cannot vote. Then section 65 provides that every voter shall be entitled to vote whose name is on the voters' list and has not been erased therefrom in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this Bill. I assume that the enumerator takes the list as it comes from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery or the custodian of the list in New Brunswick, erases from it the names of any former alien enemies, and adds the names of the female voters, and that becomes the list for the election. Therefore it seems that every voter is entitled to vote whose name is on the list unless he refuses to take the oath in form Z. But form Z merely refers to people in Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon Territory and not in the rest of Canada. At section 153 it will be found that in the rest of Canada we have a distinct cause of challenge on the ground that a man does not comply with the qualification provided by the provincial statute. In New Brunswick, he must take an oath that he is a resident of the constituency in which he attempts to vote; but if you leave the Bill as it is now, you render nugatory that provision of our law which prevents him from voting in a constituency in which he does not reside. In other words, it comes back to what I said earlier in the afternoon; in my constituency, I have no doubt there are from 100 to 200 names on the voters' lists who do not live in the constituency and have not for years, but who, for political reasons, have been deliberately kept on those lists in order that they may be brought from the United States to vote.

Mr. HAZEN: How can they vote? They have to take the oath, and that would be perjury.

Mr. CARVELL: They do. But there has been a change in the East and the man who attempts to perjure himself now will be in the worst scrape he ever was in. It will be no longer safe for a man to come from Boston or the state of Maine and perjure himself because his name is on the voters' list. But if the law stands as it is now I am afraid that man will be safe and we cannot put the oath to him because, once his name is on the list, he can come from Boston or anywhere and we cannot prevent him because, being on the list made out by an enumerator, he has a right to vote. That means a serious thing to me, perhaps 100 or 150 votes. I would ask the minister to look into this carefully before eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL: Before the Secretary of State replies to the question that I put to him before six o'clock, I should like to call his attention to the provisions of section 63 of the Act as it now stands. The section reads:

> Every person whose name is on the voters' list, unless sworn as in the next preceding section provided, shall before being permitted to vote, if required by any candidate, agent or elector, take the oath number one in Form Z.

If he refuses to take the oath, his name shall be erased from the voters' list. But the swearing " in the next preceding section provided " is that in the case of persons who have been added to the list by the certificate of the enumerator on election day. Section 62 provides challenge only for a limited number of people; section 63 is the general challenge provision, but my hon. friend will find that form Z could not be used at all except in Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Yukon territory.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Form Z is omitted. Section 62, page 8 of the Bill, says:

> "Form Z No. 1. You swear that you are legally qualified to vote at this election, that you are of the ('male' or 'female') sex, a British subject, and of the full age of 21 years."

I had this matter looked into during the recess, and those who looked into it are thoroughly satisfied—from their report to me I think that they are right—that that fully meets the point raised by the hon. gentleman before six o'clock. The amendment to form Z makes form Z the proper oath to be taken by all persons other than those who are sworn because the enumerator will not let them go on the list.

Mr. CARVELL: Legally the minister is right, but that is not sufficient for my purpose. Section 153 of the Dominion Elections Act, which was added in 1909, before the last general election, at the request of members from New Brunswick, was designed to meet the very condition I have pointed out to the minister. We have had a terrible condition of affairs in New Brunswick because of the fact that the names of men who live in the United States have been kept on the lists. They are brought into the province for a consideration amounting anywhere from $5 to $25, and in some cases $50. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) says, "pretty high." I can tell him that they have paid as high as $100—as a matter of fact, $100 was a kind of upset price against me in 1911. These men were brought over and swore that they were qualified. In order to meet that condition section 153 was inserted, providing that, in addition to complying with the general law, a man must take any oath provided for by provincial legislation. There is an oath in the law of New Brunswick in which a man must specifically swear that he is a resident of the electoral district in which he is tendering his vote. I do object, therefore, to seeing this provision cut out when it might as well be left in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is still there, and can be used. Section 153 will lose none of its force in the coming election by virtue of this Act. It says:

> Except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory, an elector, if required by the deputy returning officer, the poll clerk, one of the candidates, or an agent of a candidate, or by any elector present, shall, before receiving his ballot paper, take such oath of qualification as by the laws of the province he may in the like case at a provincial election be required to take, such changes having been made in the form of oath as are necessary to make it applicable to the election being held.

Make it applicable to this election, and the man is bound to be qualified by residence in order that he may be enabled to vote. The hon. gentleman can make up an affidavit in accordance with that, and if the man refuses to take it he cannot vote.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot make up an affidavit. All any person can do is to ask the man to take the oath provided by law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By the provincial law.

Mr. CARVELL: Is section 153 allowed to stand?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend does not specifically repeal it, but he does so in effect by the provisions of section 65 of this Act. Section 65 says:

Every voter shall be entitled to vote whose name is on the voters' list and has not been erased therefrom in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this part.

We could demand that a man take the vote according to the new form Z, but that is not sufficient. A person who, for a consideration, comes to the poll with the avowed purpose of voting when he knows he has no right to do so, asserts that he is qualified to vote. If you make him swear that he is a resident of the electoral district in which he tenders his vote, then you can get after him with a warrant five minutes afterwards. That is what we want him to swear, and that is why section 153 was put in. That provision has been useful to us. I suggest that section 153 should read this way:

Every voter shall be entitled to vote whose name is on the voters' list and has not been erased therefrom in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this Part, and subject to the provisions of section 153.

Just add those words. Then you will retain the rights given us by section 153.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The rights are still retained even if you do not do that. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is not in agreement with my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: I think the hon. member for South Renfrew and I are entirely in agreement in regard to the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member say that, if at the end of section 65, you make section 153 the dominating section, then in Ontario a man who is on the list, say in the county of Renfrew, and who has moved into the county of Leeds, a sufficiently long time to disqualify him in the county of Renfrew, could, under the provincial law, still vote in the county of Renfrew? I am afraid he could not.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think he could. The hon. member for Carleton and I had a little conversation. The point I had in mind was this. I was anxious to have some oath that the man who is on the list confirmed by this measure could be asked to take as to his right to vote. He may have got on the voters' list without having any right to get on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When he got on?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. He may have got on wrongly. I see the difficulty the Secretary of State is in. By accepting this provision, as he says, a man who had moved out of the county would be prevented from coming back and voting, and consequently he would have no vote. Would it meet the purposes of my hon. friend from Carleton if the man had to swear that he was a resident of the province?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the difficulty.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would hardly be fair to say, so far as Ontario is concerned, that a man should have to swear he was a resident of that riding, because provision is made in this Bill that a man having removed from the riding and, I suppose, being still in Canada—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: —should have a right to return. If not, he would not have a right to vote in this election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is it exactly.

Mr. CARVELL: I have another suggestion to make, which will not interfere with the condition of affairs in Ontario. We have, in a dozen places in this measure, made certain provision respecting one, two or three provinces. Therefore, we are not violating any principle if we make a special provision for a special province. I would suggest that section 65 read:

Every voter shall be entitled to vote whose name is on the voters' list and has not been erased therefrom in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this Part and in the province of New Brunswick subject to the provisions of section 153.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I find it very hard to agree with that, for the reason that the cases of the two provinces are identical.

Mr. CARVELL: I may be in error in that. This is the law in our province: If a man's name is upon the list, say, in the county of Carleton, and he moves to the city of St. John just before an election, he must vote in the constituency in which he resides. All he has to do is to apply to the secretary-treasurer who is the custodian of the list in the county of Carleton and obtain from him a certificate which he takes to the secretary-treasurer of the city of St. John, and this entitles him to vote in the city of St. John. That is the way in which we work it out.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is there no time limit fixed?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. EDWARDS: Would that be the case even if the man went the day before an election?

Mr. CARVELL: If he became a bona fide resident of the city of St. John the day before the election and became a qualified voter under the authority of that certificate, he would be entitled to vote.

Mr. EDWARDS: The case is not the same in Ontario.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the difference.

Mr. CARVELL: A good many people have moved into New Brunswick just a few days before election. What I have stated is the law, so that you do not deprive the man of his vote by applying section 153 to him. He has the right to take his vote with him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not under this law.

Mr. CARVELL: No, under our law he has the right to take his vote with him. I feel, therefore, that some provision should be made by which we can retain the provisions of section 153.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman must understand that is not a matter of qualification, and consequently, that did not, under the old law, become the practice. Certainly, under his measure, that practice does not exist. That practice could not be followed under the scheme of this Bill so that, as far as this election is concerned, Ontario and New Brunswick are precisely in the same condition, and I do not see what reason any one could give for adopting one rule in one province and another in another. Besides that, the legislation would look very much butchered. We have to get on one foot or the other. We have to take the provincial lists that are there as final, or not. If we do not take them as final, then it means virtually a total revision, or, in other words, new lists. If the hon. member for Carleton really wants new lists, I do not think I would have any objections to having them.

Mr. CARVELL: By enumerators? The Lord forbid!

Mr. MEIGHEN: You could call them registrars. If the hon. gentleman wants seventy-five per cent of the list completed now and final, I think it has to stay that way. I do not see how we can invade the list and, at the same time, preserve the principle at all.

Mr. GLASS: That is exactly the point we were discussing last night. I think the principle ought to be accepted that a citizen of Canada who is qualified to vote should not be disqualified because he has moved from one part of the country to another. We have adopted the principle that there should be one vote for each man. The provisions in New Brunswick, as the hon. member for Carleton has stated, cover that point to a certain extent—but I do not think as fairly as they should—to allow that man to return and vote in the constituency in which he was on the list provided that he was not on the list in any other part of the country. It does not seem to be right that any citizen of this country who has voting qualifications, if by reason of business necessity or otherwise he has moved into another part and has not been in that district a sufficient length of time to be on the list, should be in the position of an alien and entirely disfranchised. Provided that a man is on the list only in one constituency and has been continuously resident in this country and is qualified in one constituency, he cannot have been away very long, and I do not see why he should be deprived of his vote. So far as justice to the voter is concerned, it would give precisely the same conditions as exist in New Brunswick except that the voter would return to the place in which he was on the list instead of voting in the place in which he resides.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think he would have a vote there at all under Form Z.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In this connection there is a point that came to my notice which is virtually akin to this, and perhaps it will help the discussion if I mention it now. The qualifications as to the women and men who are put on the list are, amongst other things, that they shall be qualified as to age, race and residence, according to the law of the province. A thorough investigation has shown that the law of the province cannot be made applicable from the point of view of residence. Consequently there has to be a definition of residence in so far as it applies to all names that go on. But the hon. member for Carleton is referring, not to names that go on, but to names that are on. In so far as names that go on are concerned we are going to move an amendment to cover the matter of residence. For example, in the province of Ontario I think it is, the residence qualification is a certain number of months prior to some work of the assessor. Plainly that cannot be made applicable here at all. And there are similar difficulties in other provinces. Consequently, it is intended to make a uniform residence qualification throughout the whole Dominion for all men and women who are on the lists, the other qualifications being left as they are.

Mr. BUREAU: That would not apply, I suppose, in the province of Quebec, because no man can be added to the list according to 65 A.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it only applies to women.

Mr. GRAHAM: The objection of the hon. member for Carleton, as I understand it, is that men not resident in Canada at all may come in and vote. I think we could shut out the vote that might be brought in from across the line by adding to Form Z No. 1, after the word "British subject" the words "a resident of Canada."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am inclined to think that that could be done, if it will suit the needs of the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. CARVELL: It will get rid of most of the difficulty. Let me give an illustration. In our country we have many cases where a man may be revised in two counties. Perhaps he has land in both counties, and he goes on the assessment list. Of course, he should be removed from the county in which he does not reside. He might attempt to vote twice, but that is a local affair, and it is watched pretty closely. If my hon. friend would insert the words "a resident of Canada" I think it would about meet the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move that Form Z No. 1 be amended by adding after the word "subject" in the third line thereof the words "a resident of Canada."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move:

That section 1 of the Bill be amended by striking out of the fourth line of the amended section 48, paragraph (j) of the Bill, the word "ten" and substituting therefor the word "fifteen."

This is to make the period between the posting up and the election day fifteen days instead of ten.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move:

That section 1 of the Bill be amended by striking out of the sixth line of paragraph (k) of the amended section 48 the word "three" and substituting therefor the word "five."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move:

That section 1 of the Bill be amended by striking out of the seventh line of paragraph (l) of the amended section 48, the word "three" and substituting therefor the word "five."

Mr. BUREAU: What is the substance of the amendment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Prior to this Bill, in the provinces where enumeration applied, the enumerator had to post up his lists as complete as he could get them eight days before election day, in the post office, on the polling booth, and so on; and he had to sit as a Court of Revision until two days before election day, when the list was complete as far as there was a list at all. Now instead of making it eight days and two days, we are making it fifteen and five days.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GLASS: Referring to Form Z No. 1, sometimes difficulty arises in connection with the interpretation of what is meant by "a resident of Canada". We occasionally have cases where men are temporarily outside the bounds of Canada, but their families are still resident in Canada. I think it should be understood that a man is held to be domiciled where his family resides.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The courts have interpreted it. Under the court rulings the man described by my hon. friend would be a resident of Canada.

Mr. GLASS: But it is a question of how it may be interpreted for the time being by the returning officer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. GLASS: If that matter could be explained to a voter who was conscientious, so that he would know the fact that his family residing here would justify him in taking the oath—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it would be better to have it explained to him.

Mr. CARVELL: The Solicitor General is quite right in his interpretation of the law. A man resides where his family is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move:

That section 1 be amended by inserting at the end of paragraph (n) of section 1 the words "and by striking out from the second line of section 57 the words 'nine o'clock in the forenoon' and inserting instead the words 'the opening of the polls.'"

This is necessary because the opening of the poll in certain cities is at six o'clock instead of at nine o'clock.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not in the Bill; it is only in the reprint.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You may not be able to amend in that way. You are amending a section which is not in the Bill before the House. You are referring only to the amending Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The effect of the amendment I have just read is to change "nine o'clock in the forenoon" to "the opening of the poll," so as to make it applicable to all polls, no matter when they opened.

Mr. MORPHY: Will the Secretary of State permit me a word in connection with the opening of the poll? Section 136 of some Bill I have in hand—and it is very difficult to tell what we are working on—deals with certain cities, the cities of Calgary, Edmonton, Halifax, Hamilton, London, Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec, Regina, St. John, Toronto, Vancouver, Victoria and Winnipeg wherein the polls shall be open at the hour of six o'clock in the morning. As I may not be present when this section comes up for discussion, I would like to say that the city of Stratford, in the constituency of North Perth, which I have the honour to represent, is a large railway centre, and the early trains leave that city every morning except Sunday long before the usual hour for the opening of the polls. These trains leave for Buffalo, Port Dover, Toronto Montreal, Owen Sound, London, Detroit, Sarnia, main line to Chicago, and Goderich division and on only one of these divisions is it possible for the train crews to poll their votes. I think the city of Stratford should be included in this list, as it is one of the largest railway centres in the province of Ontario.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a question on which I think the committee should be guided largely by the views of the members who know most about the cities. If it is in the public interest in any city that the polls should open at six o'clock instead of at nine o'clock, we want the Bill to read that they shall open at six o'clock. I may say I have also been requested to add the city of St. Thomas to the list. I think it would be a great advantage to the committee if hon. members would carefully review the ground, and let the committee have the benefit of their ideas as to how the section should be amended, if it needs amendment at all. There is no reason why the city of Stratford should not be added to the list if it is going to be a public convenience. At the same time we do not want to impose on cities that do not need it the necessity of opening the poll at six o'clock in the morning.

Mr. GLASS: I think nearly all divisional points on the railways would be in the same position.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like to have an expression from the Secretary of State to the effect that no matter what other members of the House will say or do, he will put Stratford in the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite ready to do so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At the opening of the session this afternoon, I asked the Secretary of State if since last evening he had taken into consideration the enfranchisement of relatives of persons serving in the Canadian navy within Canada. He informed me it was not the intention to limit the enfranchisement to those without Canada. At the time I was not sure whether I should be in order in pressing my point, and I abandoned it for the time being. Now, however the discussion is quite free and open, and I wish again to direct attention to this matter. I do not think it is wise or necessary to enfranchise the female relatives of those serving in the Canadian navy within Canada. I understand this Bill is based upon the principle that we have a great number of men serving abroad in France and elsewhere in Europe; many of them on account of death of course will not be able to vote. In introducing this Bill, the Secretary of State expressed the view that it would be but proper if some of the relatives of those deceased soldiers should have the right to vote.

He urged as another justification for the Bill the fact that the influence of the soldiers was lost. They had an opportunity of voting but they had not an opportunity of exercising any influence during the campaign in Canada. That is another of the two grounds upon which he justified this Bill when introducing it. That ground does not apply to the naval forces. Surely within Canada the relatives of this class ought not to be given the franchise. They have an opportunity of exercising their influence in Canada, and I cannot understand upon what principle my hon. friend desires to enfranchise the female relatives of these men. I submit that it should not be done. According to the statement read to the committee this afternoon by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it includes some classes of people who, in the strict sense of the term, are not engaged in the naval service. In that statement the minister says:

> It would also include the relatives of men employed in clerical positions in Ottawa, Halifax or elsewhere who never sailed in a ship and are employed continually ashore.

I submit that it is not fair to extend the franchise to the female relatives of men employed in the dock yards at Halifax or in the naval service department here at Ottawa. Proceeding further the statement says:

> It would also include the relatives of officers serving in Canada on Imperial duty such as the officers of the Naval Patrol in Halifax, the staff in charge of the dispatch of convoys at Sydney,

And so on. There is no particular reason why the relatives of this class should be enfranchised. I find, according to the statement, that on the east coast of Canada there are 149 boys and on the west coast 53. Their female relatives will be enfranchised. If the minister would apply the principles upon which he justified the Bill itself, to this part of the Bill referring to the naval service, he would strike out the words "within or" at the bottom of the first page. The female relatives of men serving in the military forces of Canada, and within Canada, are not enfranchised; why should the relatives of those engaged in the naval service in Canada be enfranchised? Why not apply the same principle to both the military and naval forces? I understood last evening that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State were rather disposed to view this application of mine favourably. No reason was given this afternoon in justification of this particular section. I hope the minister will see his way clear to restrict the application of this clause.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I regret that I am not able to agree with the hon. the junior member for Halifax and I am a little surprised that an hon. gentleman who favours the extension of the franchise to all women should wish to restrict it in this way. I should think that if he were in favour of universal suffrage he would be glad to have it extended as far as possible and that if he could not get the whole loaf he would want the half loaf to be as large as possible.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot follow that line of reasoning.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am sorry if the hon. gentleman cannot follow my argument. There is a great distinction as far as the peril and danger is concerned between the soldiers doing garrison duty, or training in Canada, and the sailors on a ship along our coast. I think there could be no more dangerous avocation than that followed by those brave men who to-day are protecting the shores and coasts of eastern Canada. They are watching out for mines, they are continually menaced by the danger of striking an unknown mine, of being torpedoed, of running into a hostile ship, and the dangers of the sea. There is no more hazardous occupation than that which is followed by the brave men to whom I desire to tender this well-deserved tribute. I believe the anguish that is suffered by the relatives of those brave men is almost as great as that which is endured by the women relatives of those who are at the front.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where does this anguish come in? What is the cause of all this anguish on the part of the relatives of men employed on some ships in Halifax who only do about two hours' work a day?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am afraid that my hon. friend is hard of heart.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, he is not at all. Tell me where this anguish comes from.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Any good woman, when her husband is exposed to danger on the sea, naturally suffers anguish, and these men who go out even for two hours on the Atlantic coast brave the danger of submarines, hostile craft and inclement weather. They are in a most dangerous position. The suffering and anguish of their female relatives is akin to that suffered by the female relatives of men at the front.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend must be thinking of phantom ships of the enemy or "ships that pass in the night." Surely he is not talking about real ships of the enemy that are a menace to these Canadian ships of ours?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am surprised that my hon. friend would refer to the Canadian navy as a phantom. I am astounded at the hon. gentleman contending that there are no dangers on the ocean these days. It is full of dangers and there could be no more hazardous occupation than that which is followed by these men. From the standpoint of suffering for the cause and for the flag, we are abundantly justified in giving the brave women relatives of these sailors the privilege of the franchise and I sincerely trust that it will not be denied them by this statute.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This Bill will enfranchise the female relatives of 57 wireless operators on the Atlantic coast and 35 on the West coast. Does my hon. friend mean to tell me that the wives and sisters and mothers of these men employed as wireless operators have to undergo anguish? Are these wireless operators exposed to great dangers and menaces of any kind?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I say emphatically that wireless operators are exposed to danger. And I would ask my hon. friend if there are no mines along the Atlantic coast, if there is no danger from that source, what in the world are these men doing cruising and searching for them?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are not doing much of it.

Mr. DAVIDSON: But every day they are out.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Once in a while.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I happen to know that they are out.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to hear from the Secretary of State as to my suggestion to amend this Bill. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) is subject to some hallucination about this matter. The protection of our coast is really performed by the ships of the British Navy which are stationed upon the coast. There are a great number of small steamers in the harbour of Halifax whose officers and crews, I believe, come within this Bill—three or four times more than are necessary; half of them might be dispensed with entirely. They are exposed to no such dangers as my hon. friend would have this committee believe.

Mr. NESBITT: It might rain on them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When this Bill was presented to the House by the Solicitor General, he laid stress on the fact that it gave the franchise to the female relatives of overseas soldiers who, by reason of their absence, were unable to exercise any influence in the coming election in this country. I can understand this ground, although I do not believe in it; but why should it apply to men to the navy?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I believe in both grounds and therefore support the Bill; but I cannot understand the hon. member who says he does not believe in these grounds at all and still does not want the line pressed one inch beyond them. I am willing to concede that the ground of absence and consequent loss of influence among the electorate is eliminated in the case of those who spend a considerable part of their time on shore with their fellows; but the other ground of sacrifice, the exposure of husbands or sons to the perils of war, applies to those whose husbands and sons are serving in the navy for the protection of our coast. If that is not so, let us say that the whole coast defence is a fake, and that the whole idea of a Canadian navy for coast defence is a fraud. I do not think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) would want to take that ground. I never contended that there was not need for coast defence even in peace, and I believe that to-day there is need for every kind of coast defence. I also believe that those engaged in it are exposed to the same perils in mine-sweeping and so on as in any other form of service.

9 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where is the mine-sweeping being done in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Marine told us this afternoon where it was done.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not believe there is any mine sweeping outside of the harbours of Sydney and Halifax, and possibly in the river St. Lawrence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have to take my information from the Department of Marine. The minister said that extensive mine-sweeping operations were going on in connection with the coast patrol.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There may be some patrolling, but no such thing as mine-sweeping on the coast.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is dangerous.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, it is not.

Mr. BUREAU: Before six o'clock I was suggesting an amendment to the Solicitor General in the definition of persons who could give a right to vote to their female relatives. The Solicitor General raised an objection that would disappear if he yielded to the demand of the hon. member for Halifax. I suggested the use of the words "military elector" in place of the word "person." He objected that the word military elector might include people in camp in Canada who had never been overseas. The clause already provides for that in respect to the military forces. The soldier who has not gone across the seas cannot give the vote to his female relations. If a similar clause were inserted in relation to the naval force, everything would be all right. I do not see why a difference should be made between the man who serves in the navy and the man who serves in the land forces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my hon. friend's suggestion had far more value than he attributes to it. His suggestion was to substitute for "person" in 33a "military elector" on the first page of the amending Act, limiting "military elector to those who had not left the Canadian shores. The great value of the suggestion was that as the Act stands, a man who enlisted and deserted perhaps a week afterwards is placed in the same position as a man who is still fighting in Flanders; his relatives have the right to vote just as do the relatives of the bona fide soldier. My hon. friend suggests that that class of relatives should not be enfranchised; certainly they should not be. I propose to meet my hon. friend fully on that point. Indeed, I am obliged to him for the suggestion, because it is wrong that the relatives of a deserter should be given the vote under any principle embodied in this Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: How does my hon. friend differentiate between the man serving in the military and land forces and the man serving in the naval forces? As I understand it, the moment a man in the naval forces goes outside the three-mile limit he has gone overseas for the purpose of service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You could never tell whether a man was just outside the three-mile limit or not.

Mr. BUREAU: "Without Canada" are the words used in the Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Without Canada" legally means beyond the three-mile limit. Actual war service is frequently performed by members of the naval forces within the three-mile limit along the Canadian coast. The war service of a man in the military forces is not so performed; his active service is performed overseas. That is the difference. The men who are guarding the Canadian coasts are engaged in war service. It is conceivable that that service may become even more perilous than service overseas.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the Secretary of State justify the enfranchisement of female relatives of those engaged in the naval service upon the ground that the latter are subjected to peril?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That they are engaged in actual war service involving peril.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose some of them are engaged in war service, but in many instances it is almost a commercial transaction. For instance, there are 92 wireless operators in the naval service of Canada. Does the work of a wireless operator constitute war service in the strictest sense of the term? Is that not a purely commercial occupation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think they are in the naval service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are in the naval service, according to the statement made this afternoon by the Minister of the Naval Service. In Halifax harbour probably a dozen motor boats and steamers are operated by the Government, whereas three or four, or at least half the number, would be sufficient.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are they doing?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some of them do nothing. A good many of them hardly ever go outside the mouth of the harbour. Some of them are engaged in the mine-sweeping in the harbour which is not a hazardous occupation.

Mr. CARVELL: They are practising mine-sweeping.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are under instructions from the British Admiralty to sweep Halifax harbour for mines every day. They may be practising, but I suppose that work has to be done in any case. In many instances, these steamers have been chartered from individuals. In taking over the steamers, the Government took over the crew; automatically, I suppose, the men entered the naval service. Surely my hon. friend cannot justify the extension of the franchise to the female relatives of these men on the ground that they are subjected to peril or that they are actually engaged in war service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose the hon. gentleman would take the same position in regard to the men engaged in forestry work in France. There is a minimum of peril there, I should think. You cannot distinguish between one war service and another.

Mr. CURRIE: Is it not a fact that about a year ago a number of men were lost off the patrol boat Grilse? These are the men whom he speaks of as not being engaged in perilous service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is true that the Grilse on her way from Halifax to Bermuda met with disaster and some lives were lost. That steamer should not have been sent to sea at the time.

Mr. CURRIE: The same thing is liable to occur to any one of the boats in this patrol service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: She was the largest boat on the east coast engaged in patrol service. The case of the Grilse is evidence of the fact that the greater part of the patrol service down there is unnecessary. The Grilse never performed any large amount of service while there; she never should have been sent there. She is capable of real service, not on the Canadian coast but on the coast of the United Kingdom, on account of her great speed.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman knows that this patrol service extends far beyond Newfoundland. Several Newfoundland harbours are patrolled in the same way.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know it, and I doubt very much whether my hon. friend does.

Mr. CURRIE: We are informing the hon. gentleman now of the facts.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who is informing me?

Mr. CURRIE: You cannot tell what moment a submarine will arrive off the coast of Nova Scotia and blow up one of the fishing towns.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not accept my hon. friend as an authority on this matter. Men much more familiar with matters of this kind than the Secretary of State, the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) or myself, say that the patrol service on the Atlantic coast is largely unnecessary—and I believe that is a fact. I should like the minister to give the committe some reason for retaining in the Bill as it now stands the clause to which I refer. Is it not peculiar that the female relatives of wireless operators should be enfranchised? A great number of men in this service in the city of Halifax never go to sea. Possibly there may be grounds of extending the franchise to some female relatives in some cases, but it is unnecessary and unfair to leave the provision so broad and so unrestricted as it is in its present form.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is putting me at an unfair advantage to ask me to defend the Naval Department and to proceed on the assumption that the Naval Department is making a fraud of its work. I am not the Minister of Naval Service, but I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman's allegations in that regard are not founded upon fact. Wireless operators surely go out to sea. I assume that the mine-sweepers have wireless operators on board—men who are enlisted in the naval forces. What is the difference between a man who is a wireless operator on a mine-sweeper and a man who is a paymaster of a battalion? There are degrees of peril, degrees of service, degrees of hard work, endurance, suffering. You cannot draw an exact line in that respect.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Quite a number of wireless operators perform service on land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I assume they are sometimes on land and sometimes on ship. Take the men engaged in construction and forestry work; some of them are working in England; some of them may at no time be in France. The only bold line you can draw—the fairest line, without going into details in individual cases—is the line between active war service and something there is not war service of any kind. If we did everything with absolute fairness, if that were possible at all, we would give to the poor fellow in the front line who goes over the parapet about twenty-five votes, and to the fellow in England one. We cannot do those things.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Let me remind the Secretary of State that at Halifax two regiments, which were called out at the commencement of the war by compulsion, are still performing service. Many of them are very much inconvenienced thereby. Many have been taken from their business, and would like to-day to avoid service and to return to their ordinary occupations. Are not the female relatives of those men just as much entitled to the franchise as many of those engaged in the naval service? They are performing war service.

Mr. ARTHURS: Have any of those men been refused the right to go overseas?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see what that has to do with the matter.

Mr. ARTHURS: It certainly has a great deal to do with it. Those men perhaps have no desire to go overseas.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: A great many of them have gone. The regiment is changing all the time.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) takes altogether too complacent a view of the marine situation in this country. It is rather a habit with hon. gentlemen opposite not really to appreciate danger until it actually comes. We remember only a few months ago that there was, according to my hon. friends opposite, no emergency in this country, notwithstanding the fact that Germany was preparing up to the hilt for war. They could see no danger. They cried "wolf," and laughed at the Prime Minister when he spoke about the rumblings and lightnings on the national horizon. I am surprised that my hon. friend, who has so long represented a marine constituency, does not appreciate the very great danger that besets the men that go down to the sea in ships, particularly warships, even in time of peace. If he will allow his memory to go back only a few years, he will remember that the Canadian warship, the Niobe, when the sky was clear, when there was no war, went down to attend a social function at Yarmouth during Home Week. There were no submarines, no mines, nothing of that kind. Yet that gallant ship came to grief even in time of peace. How very different those times are from now. We know that submarines have visited this side of the Atlantic—and not phantom submarines, by any means. Was it a phantom submarine that arrived off Nantucket a few months ago and sank a number of British ships? I think not. It is an open secret to all who live along the Nova Scotia coast that there is a great menace arising in that way. My hon. friend makes light of these dangers because the Government is not, for many reasons, able to give all the information it might give under other circumstances in reference to this matter. But if there was no peril there, hon. gentlemen opposite would probably not have made the clamour for protection that they have made in this House on more than one occasion. We all remember how eloquently the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) criticised and denounced the Government for not taking any precautions. Those craft sweep not only Halifax harbour, but the coast of Nova Scotia, and it is an open secret, with at least every longshoreman in Halifax, that they go as far as Newfoundland, and I have a notion that my hon. friend has a suspicion of that fact also. He says that because some of these people at certain times merely go out in Halifax harbour to look for mines, they confront no danger. Since this war began, one or two dreadnoughts have blown up in harbours.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What harbours in Canada?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am not speaking about Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Warships have been blown up a very short distance from our harbours. My hon. friends from Quebec cannot see any danger to this country because they do not hear the peal of the guns.

Mr. BUREAU: The members from Quebec see better than you do.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend cannot see that a menace that would visit English harbours might, also, in the space of a few hours, visit a harbour on this side of the Atlantic.

Mr. BUREAU: What is an English harbour?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I would almost think an English harbour would be a harbour in England.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: A harbour speaking English?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Would the hon. gentleman repeat his question? I did not catch what he said.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Go on, or shut up.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I may be digressing, but I do not think I am taking such liberties of speech as my hon. friends are doing when they go down to address anti-conscription meetings in Quebec. My hon. friend, who indulges in discourse himself, might permit me the privilege of addressing a few words to the committee on behalf of those very deserving people who, while my hon. friends, in many instances, are safely and snugly in bed, are facing all kinds of danger to protect our coast. I think it is very unkind and unjust to assert that the services of those noble men is absolutely free from danger and is unnecessary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We are not doing anything to those men.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the amendment I moved some time ago has not been carried. The only effect of it is to make one of the sections applicable to a class of polls open at six o'clock instead of at nine. It is unnecessary if certain polls are to open at six o'clock. It would be well to have that amendment carried.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: What section is that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is an amendment to paragraph (n) of the amending Act. These words are added at the end of the paragraph:

> And by striking out from the second line of section 57 the words "nine o'clock in the forenoon" and inserting instead the words, "the opening of the poll."

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: What would be the time the poll opened?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the larger cities, at six o'clock in the morning and everywhere else at nine.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: What time at night would they close?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The same hour as always—five o'clock.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I think the desire of the labouring classes would be that the polls should remain open later at night instead of opening at this hour in the morning. They generally go to work at seven in the morning. In the cities, instead of closing at five, the polls should close at nine. In Montreal we struck an average and made it eight o'clock for closing. If you were making it about eight o'clock you would deserve some credit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point is this. There is a clause in the Act which enables any labourer to vote. His employer has to allow him to go, and consequently he does not need to vote at six o'clock in the morning but he has the privilege if he so desires. If the extra hour were put on at the end instead of at the beginning of the day, it would not be of any value to the railroad men at all. They would be away, and they do not come back in time. It would, also, not be of any value to the traveller, especially if the election day were on a Monday, which is the best day for him. The opening is fixed at six o'clock in the morning to enable those classes to vote before they leave and also to enable the labourer to vote before seven o'clock if he so desires.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Most of the engineers and train crews have left the station by seven or seven-thirty, and does my hon. friend believe that all these men will have had time to vote between six and seven o'clock?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think in this election every engineer and conductor in Canada will see to it that he gets a chance to vote between six and seven o'clock.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I am not complaining about the polls opening at six, but I think we should give these men and the labouring class an opportunity to vote by keeping the polls open later at night.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: They are going to "railroad" this election.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think I have discovered a solution for all these difficulties. There are two classes in Canada who are away from home a great deal. The men of one class never know when they are going to be home, and the other class may know that they are going to be home for week-end; I refer to railroad men and commercial travellers. In this Bill there is a clause providing for the opening of the polls in certain cities within municipalities at 6 a.m. This is ostensibly for the purpose of allowing railroad men and commercial travellers, and any others who may so desire, to vote early in the morning, it being presumed that commercial travellers and railroad men will be leaving home early in the morning. This provision will be of some benefit, no doubt, but as regards railway men it does not begin to meet their case. Every person who has lived in a railway centre, large or small, knows that railway men are liable to be called out at any hour of the day or night. It has very frequently occurred in my experience that crews have been called out at ten or eleven, or early in the morning, and they would be away from home long before six o'clock, and their runs would not alow them to return in time to cast their vote. The same thing might be said with regard to commercial travellers, though perhaps not to the same extent, because some commercial travellers at least can get home for polling day, but those who have a large territory to cover cannot do it. In the province of Saskatchewan special provision has been made for taking the vote of railway men and commercial travellers. In some of the states of the Union it is provided that an elector can vote wherever he is. He is not deprived of his vote by travelling, no matter how far away he may be from his own constituency. I would not suggest that we go as far as that, but would urge the Secretary of State, now that we are dealing with this matter, to avoid the necessity of naming city after city, and town after town—as will have to be the case, and as is the case—by providing a clause similar to that in the Saskatchewan Act which would be applicable to every terminal point of a railway. That would cover the railway men's vote at any rate. The Saskatchewan Act strikes me as being very simple, and I think it is surrounded with all the necessary safeguards. If the committee will permit me, I will read one or two sections from their Act. Section 286 reads as follows:

> Section 287 to 295 inclusive of this Act shall apply only to railway employees, commercial travellers and other persons whose employment or calling is such as to necessitate from time to time their absence from their places of residence, who are qualified electors under this Act in the electoral divisions or portions of electoral divisions mentioned in form 57 in the schedule to this Act, and who have reason to believe that they will be absent from their places of residence on the day fixed by the writ for the election.
> 287. For the purpose of enabling every such person to vote at any election held in the said electoral divisions the returning officer shall establish a special polling place in the city or town mentioned in form 57 in the schedule hereto as forming the whole or part of such division, which polling place shall be centrally located so as to suit the convenience of the voters.

The next section gives the method by which the vote is to be taken. Then section 289 reads:

> The poll at each such polling place so established shall be open between the hours of seven and ten o'clock in the afternoon on the three days exclusive of Sunday immediately preceding the day of election.

That is, the poll is open from seven to ten in the evening for three days previous to polling day, so that all the railway men and commercial travellers may register their votes on one of those three preceding days. Every night the ballot boxes are sealed, just as is done in an ordinary election. The ballots are perfectly safe, and are not counted until the end of the proper polling day. That seems to me to be a pretty simple provision, which I think could well be worked into this Act. Any one who has had anything to do with elections in a railway centre has felt the necessity for some better provision than we have ever had for allowing the railway men to vote. It is not the fault of the railway men if they are ordered out and must go. "First in, first out"; if it is their turn to go, they cannot remain. A provision such as is in the Saskatchewan Act would remove all possibility of manipulation. For instance, the superintendent, or the man at the head of a railway company, who is friendly to one candidate has it in his power to order out the crews who do not agree with his views, and keep the men in who do agree with his views. There has been a good deal of complaint about that, and it is not fair to the men themselves. The railway men, who take a very deep interest in public affairs are very often unable to cast their votes, and I think it would only be doing justice to these men to have a provision in this Act such as I have mentioned.

The same thing might be said with regard to commercial travellers. When a member of the Government I was waited on by both these bodies on several occasions, and urged to devise means whereby they could vote. I suggested several methods, but the men handling the justice end of the Government did not see it my way. I have observed that the Saskatchewan Act meets in a large measure what I have in mind, and if the minister could adopt something of that kind it would cover the case and meet the wishes of the railway men, commercial travellers, and others of that class, and also the wishes of those for whom the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) has spoken.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: In the city of Montreal the municipal elections are always held on a Monday, to enable commercial travellers to vote. The Association of Commercial Travellers had represented for a long time that Monday would be the most convenient day for them. Why should not the Government decide that the election shall be on a Monday? They might even go so far as to fix the date in the Bill, but perhaps that would be asking too much. I think it is my duty to move that the polls be kept open until eight o'clock at night, and I beg to move accordingly, seconded by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin).

Mr. BUREAU: Does the Solicitor General intend to close the poll at six o'clock in the evening?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: No, five o'clock.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman said just now that the law provided that the employer of labour should give the man an hour for voting. Take the city of Three Rivers, for instance, which is a city of about 20,000 or 22,000 inhabitants. They give the men an hour extra at noon to vote, and the result is there is such a congestion at the polling booths that the men cannot vote, because it is not only the workingmen who are trying to vote, but business men who are going up to lunch will stop at the polling booths also. I have seen cases where a good many men could not vote within the hour allowed them by the employers because there was too much congestion. It is well to open the poll early in the morning in order to give the railway men and the commercial travellers a chance to vote, but if we are to choose between the two classes, the workingmen and the railway men or travellers, I would take the workingmen, because they are more numerous. I do not suppose there would be more than one commercial traveller in 100 or 200 votes. More will suffer proportionately if you close the poll at five o'clock in the evening than if you open it late in the morning. If you open the poll early and close it late, it may be said that it would be too hard on the deputy returning officers, or on the clerks; but I do not think that is a very serious matter. If you open the poll at six o'clock in the morning and close it at seven or eight o'clock in the evening, you would give the labouring man the advantage of being able to vote if he could not do it during the hour granted him by his employer for that purpose.

Mr. DEVLIN: I support what has been said by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). The third largest city in the province of Quebec, the city of Hull, is in the riding I have the honour to represent.

Mr. BUREAU: Hull is fourth; Three Rivers is third.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am sorry I must disagree with my hon. friend. He has told us that the population of Three Rivers is about 22,000. Statistics show that Hull has a population of 25,000. I simply make this statement to set my hon. friend right. The population of the city of Hull is practically entirely of the labouring class.

Mr. NESBITT: What about the saloons?

Mr. DEVLIN: We have some of the greatest industries in Canada located there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am surprised to see so many hon. gentlemen on the other side have become quite familiar with Hull only recently. They will bear me out in saying that we have the E. B. Eddy Company, the Matthews-Laing Company, the Gilmour-Hughson Company, and several other manufacturing companies of considerable importance. The voters in the city of Hull would have really little time to vote between twelve and one o'clock. The difficulty suggested by my hon. friend from Three Rivers applies with great force to the city of Hull, and I would like to see the Secretary of State insert a clause in the Bill that manufacturers in cities of over 18,000 population shall give their employees two hours instead of one for lunch on polling day.

Mr. GLASS: The question brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) in connection with the Franchise Act of Saskatchewan, is one which seems to me to be worthy of consideration, and I speak with some understanding of the wants of the commercial traveller, because I had the honour of being a director of the Western Ontario Commercial Travellers for some years. The inconveniences and difficulties surrounding the polling of the commercial travellers' vote are generally known in the commercial districts. The principle of having Monday as a polling day for the commercial traveller has not met with the requirements of the commercial travellers. In the city of London, and I think in the city of Toronto and some other cities, in municipal elections, they have the polling on Monday invariably, but this has not resulted in polling a large commercial travellers' vote. A great many of these commercial travellers are out for two or three weeks at a time. I agree with the idea suggested by the hon. member for South Renfrew, that it might be practicable to get this class of men if arrangements could be made for taking the commercial travellers' vote on the Thursday, Friday and Saturday preceding the day of election. Because, if an election comes on Thursday and you arrange to open the poll on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, the advantage to the commercial traveller is practically nil, for the reason that he goes out on Monday and will be out for the whole week, and cannot, without great expense to his firm and inconvenience to himself and his business, arrange to get in and poll his vote. This question is not a new one. It has been before the House in connection with the different Election Acts which have been passed.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that Friday is a better day than Monday for the commercial travellers to poll their votes?

Mr. GLASS: No, my hon. friend did not understand me correctly. I say at certain hours on Thursday, Friday and Saturday previous to the election. In the great majority of cases commercial men are at home from Friday night to Monday morning. Some of them are at home on Thursday. I do not mean to keep the poll open the whole time, but if it were open for, say, three hours at the end of the week it would meet the requirements, whereas if it were open on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday during the week and the election was held on Thursday, it would not meet the requirements because the men would be out on the road. My hon. friend has also said that if special consideration is to be given to any vote it ought to be given to the labour vote because that is the larger vote.

Mr. BUREAU: I said that if something had to be sacrificed it should be sacrificed to the more numerous element.

Mr. GLASS: I agree with my hon friend that the labour vote is a larger vote and that it ought to have facilities extended to it by giving workingmen a certain time to vote during the day. We had this question up in 1914 and it was discussed fully then. I brought to the attention of the House at that time the fact that there were employers whose political prejudices were so strong that they put obstacles in the way of their men going out to vote. They would say: Of course, you have the right to go and vote; if you want to exercise the right that is given to you by the law, do it, but you will understand what the consequences will be. I believe that there should be hours arranged for the workingmen to go and vote. The Bill should specifically provide that there should be two or two and a half hours in the day when every employee of a factory should have the right to vote or, if necessary, there should be alternative hours during which some of the employees, if all could not go at one time, should be allowed to go and vote. The Act should not make it permissive, but it should be made obligatory on the part of the employer to permit his employees to poll their votes without reference to the political prejudices of the employer.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I move that the word "five" in the second line of section 136 of the Dominion Elections Act be struck out and that the word "eight" be inserted in lieu thereof. I want to emphasize the fact that paragraph 3 of section 36 of this Bill makes it imperative for the returning officer to provide that the number of votes to be taken in a polling subdivision shall be not more than 300 and not less than 200. Paragraph 3 of clause 36, page 4, reads as follows.

(3) Where a polling division in a province has more than three hundred qualified voters according to the voters' list as compiled pursuant to section 46 and posted pursuant to section 48 of this Act, the returning officer shall provide separate and additional polling stations near to one another, according to the total number of qualified voters on such list, for the polling of the votes in such polling division, and so that not more than three hundred, and, when practicable, not less than two hundred qualified voters' names shall be on the list for each polling station.

It is impossible in our city to register such a large number of votes at one polling station. There has frequently been complaint about the time it takes to poll the vote. People assemble at the door of the polling station, they cannot get in and they go away disgusted. Suppose that an enumerator should send ten or fifteen women whose names are not on the list to a polling station to vote; the time occupied by the challenges and the controversies between the agents would make it impossible to register the vote at that polling subdivision during the time that the poll remained open. You will really have to extend the time from six in the morning for the railway people to eight in the evening for the labour people. I think the labour people ought to be given a chance to vote. This measure has been studied in the city of Montreal. Montreal people asked that the polls should be open from nine o'clock until eight and it has worked very well. It takes considerable time to register 200 or 300 votes. If there are many challenges they consume a lot of time. As far as the commercial travellers are concerned, it was due to them that Monday was fixed as election day. A resolution was passed by their association, with the result that in Montreal no election takes place on any day except Monday. The commercial travellers generally come back to the city for the week-end, and if the election is held on Monday they have an opportunity to vote before they leave to resume their business on the road.

Mr. VERVILLE: I do not object to having the polls open at six in the morning for the accommodation of the railway men, but I think this matter can be dealt with in another way. The labour men have been asking that election day shall be declared to be a legal holiday. If we had a legal holiday on the day that the general election is held it would obviate the necessity of making provision to meet a great many of the suggestions which have been brought before the committee to-night. While the polls will have to be opened at six in the morning for the railway men, it would not be necessary with reference to any other business, because the men would be in a position to cast their votes at any time in the day and they would not need to have the polls kept open any later than five o'clock. My hon. friend says there are two hours which the men could utilize to cast their votes. I know by experience that many employers will say to their employees: You may go and vote if you like, but we are very busy to-day. They allow them to go and vote between twelve and two o'clock, which does not really give them two hours, but one hour. It is impossible to provide for the case of every person, but there are the stationary and electrical engineers, who would find it impossible to cast their votes unless the polls were opened early in the morning. They could not take two hours because they are running the machinery that keeps all industry in motion. The labour men have time and again asked that election day be made a legal holiday. I am sure the country would not suffer if it were declared in the Bill that the day on which a general election—not a bye-election—is held shall be a legal holiday.

Even the business men would find it an advantage to have a legal holiday, and they would be free to look after the election. My hon. friend may say that we are going to compel the labour men to lose a day. I believe the labour men are willing to lose a day provided we have a legal holiday on election day. We may find some employers generous enough to pay the men for their day. I should like to see those employers after the election; and if we find any we will erect a statue to them. I believe this will be the best system for everybody.

Mr. EDWARDS: I cannot see the necessity for the change advocated, nor do I see the wisdom of it. Railway men and commercial travellers are provided for by opening the poll earlier in certain places. The labouring men are provided for because, instead of the poll opening as formerly at nine o'clock and closing at five, it now opens at six o'clock. There is three straight hours. Then they have another hour given them by statute in addition to their lunch hour at noon. From 200 to 300 men vote at each polling subdivision in cities, and with the poll opening three hours earlier and with the hour given by statute in addition to the lunch hour, there should be no congestion in the polling places at any time. It will be found in practice that a considerable portion of the labouring men will vote between six and seven in the morning. We have had no such extension of time as my hon. friend now wants at previous elections, and the necessity for it has not been shown by any demand from members on either side of this House.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: The hon. member points out that we have not had these extensions of time in the past. But to-day we have an opportunity of amending the statute. Ten years' experience has shown that it is necessary to extend the hours of polling during the day. Quebec as a province has done that, and the cities of Qubec have amended their charters extending the hours of polling until eight o'clock, and in some places nine o'clock.

It is not every day that the Dominion Government has an opportunity of amending the Elections Act. I think that the time for the closing of the poll should be extended to 8 o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not be in the general interest to extend past 5 o'clock the time during which the poll should remain open. The hours fixed in the Election Act are not of our fixing; they have hitherto been from 9 to 5, a period of only eight hours. We add three hours in those places where there is need of the additional time; that is a very substantial extension indeed. If the additional time is added at the end of the day, it does not meet the case of any who are not accommodated by adding the time at the beginning of the day, because the labourer can vote at the beginning just as well as at the end. Moreover, it does away entirely with the opportunity of the traveller and of various classes of railroad labourers to vote. The additional time at the beginning of the day makes more valuable to the labourer the hour that he is entitled to receive from his employer under section 136A, because the poll will not be so crowded during that hour. In the first place, a number of labourers will have voted between six o'clock and seven or between six o'clock and nine, and, in the next place, a large number of those who would otherwise crowd the poll with him at the noon hour will also have voted. The great rush to get the vote out is immediately upon the opening of the poll. Each party struggles with the other to get the bulk of the vote to the poll early so that as much time as possible may be allowed for the straggling vote.

Mr. NESBITT: That is the doubtful vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope that even the doubtful vote will be a minimum in this election. However, a large proportion of the vote will be polled in cities between six o'clock and nine; consequently, the statutory hour to which the labourer is entitled will be of far more value to him because he is going to be able to vote at that time.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: What about those who commence work at seven o'clock in the morning?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of such persons, those who are able to do so will vote between 6 o'clock and 7. It is true that some may live a long distance away and may not be able to do that. But they have an extra hour at noon, and that hour will not be so crowded as it was on previous occasions, because large numbers of those who formerly came at that hour will have voted early in the morning. This election will be held, perhaps not in the dead of winter, but at all events when the days are short; and if the time for the closing of the poll is extended from 5 o'clock to 8 there will be a good deal of polling after dark. I do not think that hon. gentlemen on either side of the House want the polls to be open between 6 o'clock and 8 in the winter or in any month that is not near the middle of summer.

As to the suggestion of the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville); I remember its being discussed in the House at length some years ago. There is a good deal to be said in favour of it. In fact, there is more to be said in favour of a holiday on election day than on some other days when holidays are now given. It would seem to me, however, that there are objections to that course. The excitement that prevails on election day would be intensified a good deal if the whole day were made a holiday. At any rate, the subject is one that is worthy of consideration; so is the suggestion of the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I do not think, however, that either suggestion can be adopted in a Bill that we are going to get though this session. As to the proposal of the member for South Renfrew, the Saskatchewan enactments were sent to me and I have gone thoroughly into them. He is quite right in saying that it has heretofore been impossible for a large number of travellers and railway men to vote and that hardship has resulted. It is true that the difficulty has been met in Saskatchewan, but in that province there are only two divisional points, whereas in the whole of the Dominion there are 45. To deal with the question in respect of the whole Dominion would necessitate the opening of booths in these 45 divisional points, at which this class of the population could vote for some five hundred candidates, in 234 Dominion constituencies. The hon. gentlemen will see that tremendous complications would creep in; no matter how perfectly the plan might be worked out, tremendous difficulties in its execution would be involved and great expense incurred. Perhaps the day will come when the difficulty will be met. I think that in the meantime we have met the greater difficulties—and they will be still more substantially met if the election is held on Monday. I am not in a position to say definitely that it will be held on Monday, but if the election is held in the middle of the week we lose a good deal of the advantage of this new section. So far as I can see now, there is no insuperable objection to holding the election on Monday, and that will be done if possible.

Mr. GLASS: In what section is permission given to employees to have an hour off for the purpose of voting?

Mr. MEIGHEN: 136A. I will read the section:

> Every employer shall on polling day give to every voter in his employ at least one additional hour for voting other than the noon hour and shall make no deduction in the pay of such employees nor impose or exact any penalty from any employee by reason of absence during such hour.
> 2. This section shall apply to railway companies and to the government railways and their employees, with the exception of employees engaged in the running of trains and to whom such time cannot be given without interfering with the manning of the trains.

Mr. GLASS: Would it be possible to arrange that a portion of the day be set apart as a holiday for that purpose? I have observed cases where the authority of employers has been exercised viciously and in a partisan spirit as against their employees who dared to vote. In large cities a man has to vote where he lives, and sometimes his place of occupation is several miles from the place where he must go to vote. Two hours does not give him enough time to get his dinner and go to the place of polling to register his vote.

As to the suggestion that election day be a whole day's holiday, I do not think that is desirable because we have found, in certain cities of Ontario in which New Year's day has been set aside for a municipal election, it has been to the disadvantage of getting out the vote. The shrinkage has been all the way from twenty-five to forty per cent of the total vote polled. Might it not be arranged to give the last quarter of the day in addition to the hours which the voter might be allowed to avail himself of at the opening of the polls? If it is a ten-hour day, we might give him the last two and a half hours, and make the last quarter of polling day a legal holiday and let every man off for that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I can add anything to what I said with regard to that subject just a few moments ago. For this reason, I think it would be obvious to the hon. gentleman that the question of establishing a new statutory holiday could not be disposed of with that consideration that should be given to it, if we are going to get through this evening.

Mr. BUREAU: This is a War-time Elections Act, and we can do things in war-time that we cannot do at other times.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This question does not pertain to a war-time election any more than it does to any other election. It had just the same application to the election of six years ago as it has to this one. I wish to refer to an amendment which I moved some time ago, which is purely a formal amendment. I am not sure whether it has been carried or not. I am sure it is the desire of hon. gentlemen that it be carried because it is of the most technical character. It is to substitute the words "the opening of the poll," for the words, "nine o'clock in the morning."

The CHAIRMAN: It is carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move this amendment, which is of exactly the same character:

That paragraph (g) of section 1 of the Bill be amended by striking out the word "and" from the sixth line of subsection 4, of section 37, which is provided thereby.

It is on page 3, line 25, the second word.

Mr. NESBITT: "And such."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The word "and" should go out. It is a clerical error.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Glass.]

Mr. NESBITT: Did the Solicitor General consider the question I asked him about before recess?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, we are doing that. I move:

That section 1 be amended by striking out the bracket which appears after the word "Council" on line thirty-three of page nine of the Bill, the comma which appears after the word "behalf" on line thirty-nine of the same page, and the comma which appears after the word "advertisement" on the first line of page ten.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move:

That paragraph (i) of section 1 of the Bill be amended by striking out the letter "F" at the end thereof, and inserting instead the letter "W."

The section says that wherever a woman's name appears on the list the letter "F" shall be placed after it. We substitute the letter "W" for the letter "F" for this reason, that the letter "F" in Ontario has hitherto been used to denote the word "freeholder."

Mr. NESBITT: Under the new list it does not, but you are using the old list.

Mr. BUREAU: In Quebec the letter "F" would be all right, meaning femme. The letter "W" in French means nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The letter "F" would be all right, but the letter "W" cannot be confused with any other significance, and there would be confusion in Ontario if we were to use the letter "F."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move:

That section 1, paragraph (r) of the Bill be amended by striking out of the twenty-sixth line of paragraph (3) of section 65A the word "three" and inserting instead the word "four."

That is in response to the request of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). He asked that it be five days, but after considering the matter we have decided the utmost we can allow is four.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to amend paragraph (d) of section 1 of the Bill by adding at the end thereof the following:

But excluding persons who have deserted from or have been otherwise than honourably discharged from any of such forces, or in the case of an officer excluding persons other than those who have been permitted to resign, or who without fault on their part have had their services dispensed with.

Mr. BUREAU: Why not use the words "military elector?"

Mr. MEIGHEN: It goes too far.

Mr. BUREAU: It goes too far in only one instance. The only objection to using the word would be that a military elector is an elector in camp or barracks or somewhere else in Canada. But the Act now before the House qualifies that, and deals with "persons serving without Canada." I think the word "military elector" would cover the whole ground and make for uniformity.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I first of all asked that the words "military elector" be used, but it is too wide as it is. Even if it were not, if you used the words you would have to put in the whole definition.

Mr. BUREAU: You could refer to the definition in the Military Voters' Act, subject to modification by the present law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One could do that if this were an ordinary Act, but this is an Act which is going to be sent round to returning and deputy returning officers and enumerators, who will not have a Military Voters' Act with them. Consequently, it would be of no use for us to say "as defined by the Military Voters' Act." I think the amendment meets the case entirely, and will be better understood by those using the Act.

Mr. BUREAU: I think it would be in the interests of uniformity if we used the words in the Military Voters' Act of 1917 after deleting the words that would conflict with this Bill. Not many words besides the word "Indian" would have to come out. I do not know whether the wife of an Indian serving at the front would have a vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will let the amendment stand for the moment. I beg to move:

That section 1 be amended by inserting at the end of paragraph (p), section 1 of the Bill, the words "and by further amending said Form P by inserting between the words 'being' and 'an' in the second line of the second paragraph thereof—

This is the form which gives information for electors, and which reads as follows:

Every male person shall be qualified to vote at the election of a member under this Act, who, not being an Indian, is a British subject and of the full age of twenty-one years—

And so on. To conform with the present Act it will have to read this way:

Who, not being a person affected by the provisions of section 67 of the Dominion Elections Act, nor being an Indian, is a British subject.

That is to say, every man who, not being an Indian, is a British subject of the full age of twenty-one years, and is not disqualified by the provisions of section 67, which gives the disqualification of voters. I will read the whole amendment:

That section 1 of the Bill be amended by inserting at the end of paragraph (p) of section 1 of the Bill the words "and by further amending said Form P by inserting between the words 'being' and 'an' in the second line of the second paragraph thereof the words 'a person affected by the provisions of section 67 of the Dominion Elections Act nor,'" and by striking out the word "two" from the third line of the third paragraph of said Form P and substituting therefor the word "five."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that section 1 of the Bill be amended by adding thereto, as paragraph (s)--this is at the end of section 1 of the Bill—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That refers to form X 1 of the Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Form X 1 is obviously inapplicable to the present law, so it is struck out—by inserting within the form EE between the lines respectively reading "rejected" and "not used and returned" the words "polled in envelopes."

And also in form FF, between the words "were" and "rejected" in the third line from the end, the words "polled in envelopes."

This is simply to make the form correspond with the Bill. There are now ballots polled in envelopes, and they must be treated as other election papers, consequently they are included in these forms.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to amend section 1 of the Bill by adding thereto, as paragraph (t), the following:

(t) By inserting between the words "make" and "three" in the fifth line of section 46, the words "at least."

Previously, the enumerator had to make three copies of this list. Now he will have to make at least three copies in order to provide one for each of the candidates. I also move to amend section 1 of the Bill by striking out the words "the other" from the second last line of section 48 as provided by paragraph (j) of said section, and inserting instead the words "another," and by adding at the end of subsection 1 of the said new section 48 the words "he shall on the same day deliver or send by registered mail to each of the candidates a copy of such list." That is to say, fifteen days before election day, he must send a copy of the list by registered mail to each of the candidates. The other words have to be changed accordingly; so that he will have to make a sufficient number of lists to do that.

Mr. NESBITT: Does that apply also to page 9 for the cities and towns?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It applies everywhere.

Mr. NESBITT: What he has to do is separated for the cities and towns.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a clause that applied everywhere before, consequently when we are amending it it applies everywhere still.

Mr. NESBITT: I will read the part with reference to the cities and towns:

—nine thousand or over according to the last Dominion census shall complete, date at his place of residence, and sign the copies of the voters' lists fifteen days before the polling day; two of the said copies he shall forthwith post up as required by section 48 of this Act, and the third he shall personally deliver or mail by registered letter to the chairman of the voters' registration board constituted by the Ontario Franchise Act, 1917, for the city or town.

According to that, he is supposed to strike off three copies, two to be posted up, and one sent to the chairman of the registration board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the point now. The enumerator is done with it once he makes the list; then they go to the voters' registration board. There is no use of the enumerator sending one of these lists to the candidate at all because they are not complete. They are revised by the voters' registration board.

Mr. NESBITT: We have no way of getting a copy except by going to where they are posted up and making a copy of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That applies to both sides, of course.

Mr. NESBITT: It would be no trouble to the enumerator to send a copy to the candidate when he strikes off three; just as they do in the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My opinion is we have amended the clause to the extent that it would mean he would send his list, so far as completed, to each of the candidates.

Mr. NESBITT: They are supposed to be completed by the enumerator, and the reason why we have four days for checking them is to correct any error there may be. It would be a very awkward thing to send somebody up to the board where they are posted, to take a copy of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there is any doubt about it, I will have an amendment prepared so that the enumerator will send a copy to each of the candidates.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the Secretary of State now take paragraph 33A? I have no objection to his amendment if he will add four words to it. As it is now, it says:

Every female person shall be capable of voting and qualified to vote at a Dominion election in any province or in the Yukon Territory who, being a British subject, and qualified as to age, race, and residence, as required in the case of a male person in such province, or in the Yukon Territory, as the case may be, is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any person, male or female, living or dead, who is serving or who has served without Canada—

The amendment comes on the word "person," that is, on the person on whose account this right to vote is given, but it does not say so. If the Secretary of State will add the words "but excluding the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any persons who have deserted from, or who have been otherwise than honourably discharged from any of such forces." That would cover the ground.

Mr. NICKLE: If the committee will direct their attention to line 30 it will be observed that the word "person," to which reference is made, is used there for the last time and therefore the language following must refer to that word "person" and no other.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) cannot have been in the House this afternoon when I suggested that the word "person" qualifying the right of female relatives to vote might refer to any man who, under this Act, would not have the right to vote. It was brought to my mind by the fact that this dynamiter, who is being chased around, is a returned soldier, and yet under this Act his wife, mother or sister could have the right to vote. If you put another subsection in, you start something new and you exclude the man who has not been honourably discharged. These things are provided for by the Military Voters' Act. The section which we are considering has reference only to the female relatives of these men. There will be ambiguity unless you do what I suggest.

Mr. NICKLE: My hon. friend desires that the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of a deserter be not entitled to vote?

Mr. BUREAU: Not a deserter, but a man who has not been honourably discharged.

Mr. NICKLE: Not honourably discharged. Let us read the section:

> Every female person shall be capable of voting and qualified to vote at a Dominion election in any province or in the Yukon Territory, who, being a British subject and qualified as to age, race and residence as required in the case of a male person in such province or in the Yukon Territory, as the case may be, is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any person, * * * * but excluding the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any persons who have deserted from or have been otherwise than honourably discharged from any of such forces.

That can only refer to a member of the forces because the wife, mother, sister, or daughter cannot be discharged from the forces. The only person that can be discharged is a member of the forces, and therefore the reference excluding the relatives of a person means relatives of a soldier who has not been honourably discharged from the forces. I do not see any other meaning that can be taken out of the amendment.

Mr. BUREAU: It may be that my knowledge of the English language is defective, but when I translated this provision into French I found that it led to ambiguity. If you adopt my amendment there is no possibility of ambiguity. We will use the French version of the statute in our province. I do not see any harm in making this change. If it makes it more lucid I do not see why you should refuse to adopt it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will return to that in a few minutes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the view which my hon. friend has in mind would be achieved if we put at the end of the clause "excluding the relatives of persons who have deserted."

Mr. MEIGHEN: The difficulty would be that the relatives of persons who had deserted might have other persons at the front who had not deserted. What we are doing is to exclude deserters from the operation of the section altogether.

Mr. BUREAU: A woman might have one relative who had deserted and another who had not. That would be a hard case, but you cannot make a law that would meet every case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You can meet that case.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend wants to exclude a deserter and in that I am with him, but I say that the place to exclude a deserter is in the Military Voters' Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not on that Act.

Mr. BUREAU: You are giving the franchise to women in a clause that relates to women only. Under that clause the widow, wife, sister, or mother of the Canadian who has gone overseas to fight will have the right to vote. I am not opposed to disfranchising the deserter, but let that stand aside for the time being, because you will have to amend the rest of the law if you are going to do that. This particular suggestion I made came to my mind because the case of this man Monette. I happen to know something about the relatives of this man, and I asked myself: Why should these women, who, I am sorry to say, are not deserving of having the vote, even if Monette did go to the front, be given the right of the ballot while the wife of my neighbour, who has been working night and day knitting socks and collecting subscriptions for the Red Cross and the Patriotic Fund should be denied that right? If the theory of the Solicitor General is right, that we should emphasize the right of the man who has gone to the front to express himself at the polls, and I think it is, it must be remembered that this Bill does not deal with the right of any soldier to vote. It says that the female relatives of any person who has gone to the front shall have the right to vote. My hon. friend says that a deserter, or an officer who had not been properly discharged, would be excluded. But they should be dealt with in the Military Voters' Act. Let us put another section into this Act so that there will be absolutely no ambiguity as to the right of women who are the relatives of soldiers to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We can return to the section in a moment. In the meantime I wish to move the amendment that I promised the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I move that paragraph (d) of section 1 be amended by adding thereto the following as subsection 2 of 33A:

> Such naval forces of Canada shall be deemed not to include members thereof engaged within Canada who may become members after the passing of this Act.

Amendment agree to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move also that section 1 be amended by striking out of the second line of section 131 the word "seven" and inserting instead the word "twenty-eight". That is merely to have that section conform to the change in the law making twenty-eight days between election day and nomination day.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg also to move an amendment to paragraph (d) by adding at the end thereof:

But excluding persons who have deserted from or have been otherwise than honourably discharged from such forces.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I suggested, and what I think my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) would approve of was: "this section shall not be deemed to include such relatives of men who have deserted or not been honourably discharged."

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they might be relatives of more than one soldier.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If a woman was the relative of two soldiers, one of whom had deserted and the other was at the front, she would still be entitled to vote by virtue of the man who was serving.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, because she gets no right except by this section.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why not put in the words "sole right"?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Subsection 2 of section 1 of the first Bill begins with the following words:

Subject to the provisions of section 5A of this Act, in the compilation of such lists,—

And so on. This Act will be in the hands of many men not accustomed to reading or construing statutes and this section may be confusing. I find that many of my friends on this side have understood this to apply to all the provinces, whereas it is intended to apply only to British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island. Enumerators reading this may take it as applying to all the provinces. I would suggest the insertion of the words "in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island." This would remove any chance of confusion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It applies all over with respect to women. While an enumerator or deputy returning officer getting only this Act or the old Act might have great difficulty in understanding all of it, as it applies to different provinces in various ways, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is compelled by the law to issue definite and clear instructions to enumerators and returning officers in every province telling them just what does apply to his province. This will all be made clear by instructions from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not quite agree, and I see no objection to my suggestion by reason of the fact that women must be placed on the list. The same words are used in several sections, section 48 and section 62. The marginal reference to section 62 is "application for certificate as a qualified voter by person whose name is not on list." The sense of that section is that outside of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, a person claiming the right to vote and not finding his name on the list may apply to the enumerator to have his name entered.

Clearly that could not be done so far as Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are concerned. It would be made quite clear, I think, by striking out the first and second lines and inserting the words "in the province of British Columbia"—then mentioning all the other provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be clearer if it would be right. In my opinion it would not be right, because the section operates not merely in those provinces, but all over the Dominion; in certain provinces it operates subject to certain limitations. The briefest way of putting it, therefore, is as it is here. I am sure that it will be clearly explained in the instructions issued by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not come in early in the evening because I knew that it was utterly impossible to discuss this Bill under closure. The rule is that no member shall speak more than once while closure is in force. Has that rule been rescinded?

The CHAIRMAN: The committee agreed by consent not to follow the letter of the rule. If an hon. gentleman calls my attention to the fact that the rule is not being observed and raises objection, the rule will have to be followed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do you intend to apply the rule at two o'clock in the morning? Shall all these important amendments be adopted without further discussion?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for St. John asks me to apply the rule, I certainly will do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do insist upon the rule being either rescinded or strictly applied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The rule was rescinded by general consent. Certain hon. gentlemen opposite asked if they might put questions and receive answers the same as before, and that was agreed to. If the hon. gentleman desires that the rule shall be observed it will have to be observed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister comes here to-night with amendment after amendment which he recognizes as being absolutely necessary to perfect the Bill. It is utterly impossible to discuss this Bill under closure. Amendments have been submitted which alter the Bill, in some cases materially, in other cases not so materially. I understand that at 2 o'clock in the morning closure will be applied. Surely the Bill should not be reported from the committee with these important amendments before it is reprinted for the information of hon. gentlemen. I call the attention of the Secretary of State to the unfairness of dealing with the matter in this way. Does he think that this is an occasion upon which closure should be enforced? Every disposition has been shown to facilitate the passage of the Bill; there has not been the slightest attempt to delay it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is quite true that we have been getting on excellently; I hope that we shall so continue. The amendments that have been made, while necessary, do not, in the main, involve discussion. One or two—we have discussed them —simply make the Bill comply with the fundamental principles of the proposed legislation. There is no reason why they should not come in on the last day of the discussion; I have never heard that no amendments should be offered on the last day in committee. There is no question about discussing them. We can discuss them, I freely admit, much better under the ordinary rule in committee, and we have unanimously agreed to do that. But we cannot do it except by unanimous agreement, and I am willing that we should apply the rule rigidly if the Committee so desires.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister intend that the closure shall apply at two o'clock in the morning without the Bill being reprinted with the amendments?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen who have been here know that the amendments are all right. They will be reprinted as soon as they are decided upon by the committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the Bill leaves the committee stage?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Bill has to go out of committee at this sitting. There is not the least question about printing these amendments. If there were, that would mean that on the last day of the committee no amendments could be submitted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A great many of these amendments have been made upon the suggestion of the minister himself, and it is grossly unfair to ask the committee to consider them with the closure resolution passed this afternoon staring us in the face. The minister says we cannot consider these amendments after two o'clock. But the minister himself since I came in has occupied three-quarters of the time of the committee in making the necessary explanations—explanations which he has made with great clearness and with much satisfaction to the committee. What I protest against is that this important Bill should be considered and amended in many different respects under closure procedure.

Mr. BUREAU: Are you going to apply the closure rules, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. NESBITT: Let us go on as we are.

Mr. BUREAU: I asked the Solicitor General before six o'clock if it would be possible to provide in the law that the enumerator should have a residence qualification. Of course, I would prefer that the qualification in Quebec should remain as it is. Every time the lists are made up names can be added by either candidate. The secretary-treasurer does this in our provincial elections. But the Solicitor General does not want to amend the law along that line; it is not such an amendment as he would desire to insert at this time. As I remember the wording of the Bill it says "the Governor in Council may appoint." That means that he will appoint.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This has always been the form. But the Governor in Council has never appointed them.

Mr. BUREAU: That may be, but, as I said this afternoon, this is a thing that is absolutely new to us. We have never had enumerators, and we have never dealt with them. I would suggest that the enumerators should live in the municipality and, if it were possible, that the secretary-treasurer of the municipality should be the enumerator. I think that would be the fairer way because the secretary-treasurer is a man that has some responsibility. He holds his position through the good-will of every inhabitant of the municipality. Perhaps the word "municipality" may seem strange to or scare some of my hon. friends opposite. I understand that in some provinces municipality means the whole county.

Mr. HAZEN: That is the case in New Brunswick.

Mr. BUREAU: In Quebec a municipality that has three polling divisions is a very large one. By the word "parish" we mean all the worshippers that belong to a church, and, for administrative purposes, the municipal boundaries are all the same, so that there is in our province a closer kind of affinity between the people in a municipality on account of our institutions than there is in the other provinces, out West, for instance. The secretary-treasurer, as I said this afternoon, is thoroughly acquainted with, not only every man and woman in his municipality, but every child. He is at the same time the secretary-treasurer of the school board for the district. I would ask the Solicitor General—this would not take much of an amendment—to insert in the Bill that in Quebec the secretary-treasurer of the municipality shall be the enumerator. The absolute and complete knowledge that he has of his muicipality will make it easier for him to take care of three polls than if you take a man who is not accustomed to going through the assessment rolls and the rolls of the children at school. With men who are accustomed to the work, you would need three men, if each one has to attend to only one poll. The secretary-treasurer is usually a man of education. He is generally a notary. Sometimes, of course, his duties do not involve much work, because the valuation is only revised. As has been stated by some hon. gentleman opposite, the changes in a municipality, especially in an old one, are just the deaths and births, and when the electoral list is revised those who have gone are stricken out and the young men who have reached the age of twenty-one years are added. I make a last appeal to the Solicitor General, not in the way of embarrassing him, nor of delaying the Bill, but in the way of helping along the execution of this law, and of helping along the enfranchisement of the people whom the Bill desires to reach and the disfranchisement of those whom the Bill wishes to disfranchise. The secretary-treasurer knows better than any one else when a man of alien enemy nationality came to the municipality and whether he is naturalized or not. The municipalities are so small, the people are so close together, and their relations, I might say, so intimate, that the secretary-treasurers know the family history of any one perfectly well. Should the Solicitor General decide that he cannot grant that, I would ask him to add after the words "the Governor in Council" the words "may, in the province of Quebec, appoint an assessor residing within the municipality for which he has to act, or in the neighbouring municipality." We do not want to impose upon other provinces what we think right in Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is just the difficulty that has arisen several times. You cannot make any rule on that point that would be applicable everywhere, and still every province is just in the same position, so far as the real substance of the case is concerned, as Quebec. I do not see any formidable objection really to appointing an enumerator from the municipality, nor even from the neighbouring municipality, and I venture to predict that every one will be appointed out from municipality and not even the neighbouring one. One might get a case in which the right man was just across the road, in which the man everybody would want was the town clerk, perhaps, and could not reside in the municipality. He might reside outside. There would be no gain by my hon. friend's amendment. The great chance is that every one who will be selected will reside in the municipality because he must reside in the polling division to know his work, to be qualified to do it. I do not like the idea of selecting an individual man and saying to him: You must do this work. That is not the spirit of this Bill. The man, as soon as he is sworn to act, is then bound to act, but it would hardly be right to put the hand of the law on every secretary-treasurer in Quebec, who may, in some cases, be engaged pretty steadily in his own work and may have other engagements and occupations besides, and say to him: No matter how busy you are; no matter whether your present time is occupied from morning until night, no matter what sacrifice it may be for you, for the sake of $30 or $40 you have to travel through your municipality and enumerate the women in it.

Mr. BUREAU: The secretary treasurers under the provincial law do the work that would correspond to your enumeration. They are making up the lists now. On the 15th those lists have to be posted. I am not afraid of the enumerators, but the people in the municipality are not accustomed to that line of conduct to be followed in order to be registered as electors, and they would be at a loss to know where to go. They would not understand this new method of procedure, and I am satisfied that it would not work so easily for the women you want to reach, or the men you want to exclude, as the system I suggest. As far as the work is concerned, I can assure the Solicitor General that none of the secretary-treasurers in any of the rural municipalities will refuse on account of being overworked. I am satisfied they will accept the position.

Mr. NESBITT: The Solicitor General could comply with my hon. friend's request so far as having the enumerators appointed in the polling division is concerned, because it is a custom in Ontario to appoint the deputy returning officer out of the division, and it would be a matter of common practice to appoint enumerators from the division because there would be no difficulty about getting them. I have no doubt that practice would be followed, and there would be in the division plenty of people perfectly willing to act. If in compiling these lists, say in Ontario, we have to add only certain names and strike off certain names, would the enumerators be likely to go around from house to house to get those names, or would he be subject to the candidates supplying him with names that ought to be added on or taken off?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be his duty to employ both methods, namely, to go from house to house and to accept names from the candidate after investigating each one.

Mr. NESBITT: Or from others?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. While I am on my feet, I will move the amendment which meets the former request from the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). I move to amend paragraph (r) of section 1 by striking out from the eighth line of sub-section 3 of section 65 A, provided by said paragraph, the words, "and the," and inserting instead the word "(a)," and by further amending said sub-section by adding after the word "town" in the twelfth line thereof, the words "and he shall deliver or mail by registered letter a copy of such list to each of the candidates."

While I am on my feet permit me to correct a slight error that I think I made yesterday in referring to the province of Ontario. It is not all the cities and towns over nine thousand that are in the special list of those for whom made-up lists are not now being used, but only county or district towns over nine thousand.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the amendment my hon. friend has just read confined to Ontario?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That one is, but a previous one did the very same thing for the rest of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: The greatest objection I have in connection with these enumerators is the great uncertainty as to when and where they shall meet. Section 45 of the old law says:

> In the Yukon Territory each enumerator forthwith after taking the said oath, shall post up in six of the most public places within each polling division for which he has been appointed enumerator, a notice that he has been appointed enumerator for the polling division, and that he will proceed forthwith to compile, and within thirty days will complete the voters' list for the polling division, and designating the office or place within one of such polling divisions where he may in the meantime be found, and the hours during which he will attend at such office or place for the purpose of compiling such list on each lawful day, which shall begin not later than ten o'clock in the forenoon and end not earlier than four o'clock in the afternoon each day.
> 2. In such notice the time and place during and at which the final revision of the lists for which provision is hereinafter made will take place, shall be designated.

That is the law for the Yukon. If something along this line were done for the province of Nova Scotia, so that we would know when and where these men were to begin work, I should be satisfied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has always been a corresponding section to this for Alberta and Saskatchewan, and that section is now applicable to all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: Which section is it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot give it just now, but it is further amended by providing for the posting up of the lists for a longer period during which the enumerator sits to revise the lists, and for a longer period between the time of revision and election day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The posting is required to be done in only two places. That is a very limited notice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the way the posting is always done in those provinces. In addition to that we are compelling the enumerator to send a separate list by registered mail to each candidate in each constituency on the very day he posts up the lists. The candidates get a list, and they can make copies if they want to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think two is a very small number.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It must be remembered that in the rural parts they have no way of typewriting the list, but there is nothing to hinder the candidates from making a copy.

Mr. MURPHY: A copy will be sent to the candidates fifteen days before polling?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I wish to move in amendment to section 2:

That section 136 of the present Bill, subsection (b) of section 2, be amended by adding the names of the following cities: Stratford, St. Thomas, Saskatoon, Moosejaw, Kingston, Brockville and Hull.

Mr. NESBITT: Would my hon. friend object to adding Woodstock also?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is any objection to adding any place so long as the member for the constituency is sure that the convenience is going to be greater than the inconvenience.

Mr. NESBITT: It does not make a great deal of difference.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) is not in his seat at the moment, but I imagine he would like to have Moncton added to the list. It is a great railway centre and, I think it would be desirable to have the polls open an hour earlier there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will add Moncton.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think Brockville is a city for the purposes of the provincial Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Naming it as a city makes it a city for the purposes of this Act.

Mr. ROSS: In the case of a tied ballot, on a recount the judge decides whether the voter who has been refused a certificate by the enumerator had the right to vote in a certain polling division. It might happen that the tied voter might not have the right to vote in a certain polling division on account of not being a resident there, but he might have the right to vote in the electoral district.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If that were permitted and if a man wanted to vote in some more convenient place than where he had the right to vote, all he would have to do would be to force his vote through and the judge would have to count it. We do not want to enable a man to vote out of his division.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to ask one or two questions which are not actually in line with the subjects which have been under discussion this evening, but perhaps I might get attention. What is the position of Doukhobors who have left the community and have taken up residence as ordinary citizens? Are they free from the prohibition of the Act, or are they still under the terms of the Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In my opinion, they are free from the prohibition of the Act.

Mr. OLIVER: Could that ruling or that view be expressed in any way for the information and guidance of the enumerators?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it could be, by the instructions which, the Act provides, shall be sent out by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The disfranchisement provisions of this Act are intended to cover only Doukhobors and Mennonites who are included in the exemptions under the Military Service Act, and not other Doukhobors and Mennonites or other classes who are not conscientious objectors, so that the Doukhobors and Mennonites who are not members of the community, if they do not come in as conscientious objectors, would not be subject to this Act. There is no difficulty in making that clear by instructions issued by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Of course, I realize I should be very careful about giving my opinion to the House on matters of law. I simply give this as my opinion as a lawyer. Personally, I have not the least doubt about it.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not as familiar with the situation in regard to the Mennonites, but I rather fancy it is somewhat similar. There are Mennonites who, although they call themselves Mennonites, do not hold to the original non-combatant principles of the sect. I should think similar action would be desirable in their case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so, too.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand that a man of alien enemy descent is debarred from voting, no matter in what country he was born.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not unless his natural language is an alien enemy language.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend is aware that there are large numbers of people of German descent, born in the United States, who are now residents of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not affected by this Act at all. Any born in the United States, no matter what language they speak, are not affected by the Act.

Mr. OLIVER: The word "European" is used?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I wish to move that the cities of Charlottetown and Belleville be added to the list I moved in my last amendment.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Has the question of the secrecy of the vote been very carefully considered, according to article 62?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Suppose the enumerator gave a certificate to a woman, entitling her to vote at a certain polling station. The deputy returning officer takes the vote, and he is obliged, according to the law, to record the name of that woman in a book. Now, suppose only one woman votes and that vote has to be put in an envelope, where is the secrecy?

Mr. GRAHAM: She will tell anyway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid in that case my hon. friend is right. If there was only one woman in the poll, and her vote had to be enveloped, and it came before a recount judge, I am afraid the public would know for whom she voted, if the judge decided she had the right to vote. If he did not so decide, the public would not know.

Mr. NICKLE: If the committee will turn to section 32 of the Bill distributed to-day, they will see it reads as follows:

> 32. The qualifications necessary to enable any male person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as by this Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such male person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Section 33A says that the qualification of a woman shall be the same as to age, race, and residence as that of a man. In the ordinary lists prepared in past elections, the provincial qualification and the provincial machinery were available, and the lists were prepared pursuant to provincial legislation. In all the provinces, I think, to be a voter a person must be a British subject and twenty-one years of age. As this Act is altogether independent of the electoral machinery of the provinces, the electoral machinery of the provinces will never begin to work, therefore there is no data on which one can determine how long a person must have residence in the province or in the municipality to be entitled to vote. For the sake of illustration, take the province of Ontario.

At the last session of the Ontario legislature a change was made in the conditions under which a man might be placed upon the voters' lists. Prior to that if he was entitled to vote at a municipal, and not at a legislative election, he would be put on the list provided that he had been in the province for nine months prior to the assessor beginning his duties or twelve months prior to the revision of the list by the judge. If, on the other hand, he was a manhood suffrage voter, he would be put on the legislative list if he had been one year in Canada and three months in the municipality. These provisions will, however, under this Act, never come into effect as the provincial legislative machinery in Ontario intended to apply to the province will not be effective, and therefore in order to make provision for residence and domicile qualification it is necessary that there should be an amendment to this Act. I, therefore, beg to move:

> That section 1, paragraph (c), be amended by adding as subsection 2 and 3 of section 32 the following:
> "2. Except in the province of Quebec and notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, in preparing or adding to the voters' lists provided for by this Act, the qualifications as to residence, and domicile of electors shall in any province where there is no relevant or applicable provision to the contrary be residence for one year in Canada and residence and domicile in the electoral district for thirty days, both of said periods to be fixed by reference to the date of the writ of election.

The purpose of the amendment is that in any province outside of Quebec the elector must have resided in Canada for one year and in the electoral district for thirty days prior to the date of the writ of election being issued.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be applicable to women voting in Ontario?

Mr. NICKLE: To a very great extent. It would apply also to cities and county towns where the population is over 9,000. In Quebec there has to be a variation for the reason that their law has no qualification as to residence in Canada or residence within the electoral district. All that is necessary is that the elector shall at the time of the preparation of the lists be domiciled in the electoral district. Therefore the second amendment reads as follows:

3. In the province of Quebec notwithstanding anything in this Act contained the qualification as to domicile shall be domicile at the date of the said writ of election.

A person must be domiciled in Quebec at the time the enumerator makes his rounds.

Mr. McCREA: I notice that there are certain towns and cities to be put on the list where the voting will commence at six o'clock in the morning. These are manufacturing and railway points. Sherbrooke is a manufacturing and railroad centre, and I think it would be well to put it on the list of places where the poll will be open at six o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will have it added to the clause.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): Is it the pleasure of the committee that Sherbrooke shall be added?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It strikes me that the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) are so very important in their character that they should not be pressed to-night. Take that affecting the province of Quebec for instance; there are very few members from Quebec here to-night. The leader of the Opposition is absent. It is intended to depart in some way from the provincial lists. If it is not intended this amendment would not be moved by my hon. friend. He is moving it because he is taking some position different from that which is in the Quebec law. Section 32 provides that:

32. The qualifications necessary to enable any male person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as by this Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such male person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Why is it necessary at this late hour for the hon. member to propose an amendment to alter the principle laid down by the Solicitor General that the provincial law as to the voters' lists should apply? If this makes any change it is of a most important character. If it does not make a change, if it simply carries out the provincial law, there is no necessity for it. I would ask my hon. friend whether he thinks an amendment of that character should be pressed without giving an opportunity to members from the province of Quebec to discuss it. I do not quite understand what the other amendment with reference to the rest of the Dominion means.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The object of these provisions is merely to cover possible cases of omission. As has been explained by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), on account of certain legislation passed by the legislature of Ontario at the last session, the provisions fixing the period of residence would not be applicable in the case of lists which are to be made up in cities and towns. Therefore, this provision seems necessary. As far as Quebec is concerned, it is not intended to affect the provincial law but is simply to carry it out. In Quebec, the qualification is domicile at the time the list is being made, but as the provincial law may not apply to the lists made under this Act the same principle is established here; that is domicile at the time the list is made up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, this is changed apparently. The domicile in Quebec is of the date of the writ of the election.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is when the list is made up.

Mr. NESBITT: As I understand the amendment, this would apply to women who are to be added in the townships and towns in Ontario, and also in the towns of over 9,000 where registration takes place.

Mr. NICKLE: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: So far as Ontario is concerned, I agree that it is a necessary amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not limit it to Ontario? There is no difficulty in the other provinces because there is the qualification. In New Brunswick one qualification is as to residence or ownership of property. If the provincial lists are to be followed, there is no necessity to make any change. Why not make the amendment apply simply to the province of Ontario?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that would be wise. The necessity of the amendment arose by reason of attention being called to the peculiar condition of the legislation of Ontario. Argument might be made that there was no relevant provision in Ontario. We cannot be sure that some similar condition does not prevail in other provinces. This section has no application except in the case where there is no relative and applicable legislation in the province. If there is relevant legislation, in any province, that prevails. If for any reason it appears that legislation in the province is not in force for this particular purpose, then this Act has application, but not otherwise.

Mr. MARCILE: I do not think there is necessity for this amendment in our province, as a man has no right to be put on the list unless he is domiciled in the district.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This amendment has been prepared by the Minister of Justice, whom we consulted, and who said, as my hon. friend has said, that the legislation of Quebec requires that there shall be domicile at the time when the list is in preparation; but that provision of the provincial law may not have application to a list which would be made up under this Act, and therefore, in order to carry out the absolute and necessary intent of the provincial law, this amendment is proposed which declares that domicile at the time the list is made up, that is at the date of the writ of election, shall be the controlling qualification.

Mr. MARCILE: But if a man from the province of Quebec leaves the province and is away for a year he has no more right to vote, by the law.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This does not change that.

Mr. MARCILE: We are at present making our lists in Quebec. They will be deposited by the 15th. Complaints may then be made until the 30th of September, after which time the council of every municipality has fifteen days to revise the list. A man to be on our list must be domiciled in a polling district.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Act does not touch lists as already established in Quebec except as they are to be changed by the addition of women voters and by the disqualification of voters of enemy nationality. In fixing domicile for the women voters it is necessary to have this provision which is established upon the same basis as that which ordinarily prevails in the province of Quebec in the preparation of the provincial lists.

Mr. GERMAN: Section 48 says that the enumerators shall post up copies. There is no appeal, so far as counties are concerned, from the enumerators. There is an appeal in cities an towns of 9,000 or over. These appeals must be in within three days, which is too short a period.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has been changed to four days.

Mr. GERMAN: And the ten days has been changed to fifteen days. The times are all too short. When there are enumerators appointed absolutely of one political opinion, who can make up a list just to suit themselves, it is an absolutely wrong thing to tie any party down to the decision of enumerators. I should like those in charge of this measure to look at section 48. Where is the appeal? There is none, excepting to the enumerator on election day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The enumerator's work is revised in every respect judicially. Everything he does in any province, if it is wrong, can be corrected by the opposing party before a judge.

Mr. GERMAN: After the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the election is decided. I will be quite happy in my constituency if I can be declared—

Mr. GERMAN: Yes, because the enumerator will be of your political faith and will fix the lists to suit you. That is the object of the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman believes what he says—

Mr. GERMAN: I believe absolutely what I say; and that is why the Bill is being passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You should have sympathy with us during all these twelve years in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. It is strange the hon. member did not look so fierce and talk so wildly in those days.

Mr. GERMAN: Because the Act was being administered honestly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I see.

Mr. GERMAN: I would like an answer showing what provision there is for an appeal from the enumerator in counties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: First of all, the Act will be administered honestly. Next, if any enumerator makes an error intentionally or otherwise, if he puts a man off who should not be off, the other side can challenge that vote and demand that, before it be counted, a judge shall say it is right. If he refuses to put a man on who should be on, that man can defy him, demand a certificate, go to the poll, take the oath and vote, and his vote is counted unless the judge decides it is not a proper vote. The residue that will come before the judge, it is believed, will be the smallest residue that could in justice go.

It is the only way you can get review; it is the only way you can get your lists in country districts ready in time for an election. If you have judicial review in every country district you cannot have the election within a reasonable time. We provide for having the election within a reasonable time and at the same time provide such safeguards that no enumerator can make an error without the other side having ample opportunity to correct it. I do not think it makes any difference whether the judge gives his decision before or after the election, so long as his decision is a proper one. It has the same result so far as the contest is concerned.

Mr. GERMAN: Why should you not have appeals in rural districts as well as in cities and towns?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are not judges enough; you could not get the work done. Does the hon. gentleman know how long the work takes now in rural districts?

Mr. GERMAN: I do know very well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the northern parts of Ontario, for example, it takes three months.

Mr. GERMAN: You propose to leave all these questions to a recount after the election is held. It seems to me that is an absurd proposal. Why should there not be an appeal before the election. You have thirty days between nomination day and polling day. Why should not the lists be made up at least by nomination day? Surely the judge in any constituency can decide in twenty days whether or not the lists are properly made up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In many instances he could not get around.

Mr. GERMAN: Well, give him an opportunity to get around.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman know that in some constituencies—

Mr. GERMAN: I know as much about the constituencies as the hon. gentleman does; perhaps I know more. The proposal with regard to appeal is absurd and absolutely wrong.

Mr. OLIVER: Section 33A, page 1, provides that a woman who is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any person, male or female, living or dead, who is serving or has served without Canada in any of the military forces, shall be entitled to vote. Is it not desirable that there should be a direction to the enumerator that he should take knowledge of the name and identity of the soldier in regard to whom a woman claims the right to vote? If the name of the soldier in whose name a woman claims the right to vote is placed on the enumeration list along with her name, there would be no question, in case of challenge, about her right to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would encumber the list quite a little, but if it produced any substantial results. there would be a compensation. I do not think, however, that it would produce any substantial results. If the vote is challenged, all these details must come before the judge in any case. It is a question whether the judge's duty would be in any way lightened or anything would be made any more definite before the judge by the presence of the name of the soldier after her name on the list.

Mr. OLIVER: If there is no direction to the enumerator all he is required to do is to ask the women: Are you entitled to vote? Have you a brother, son or other relative at the front? She says: yes, and he puts her name down, he is not required to pursue the question of identity. If there was a direction that he must pursue the question of identity, it might save troublesome proceedings later on and tend to the securing of a better and more definite list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am inclined to think that the hon. member is right. It would be better to have the instructions to the enumerator include the duty on his part of keeping a record of the name of the soldier.

Mr. MURPHY: Could not my hon. friend go further than that and devise some method of establishing the identity of the person claiming relationship?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Every person's identity is put beyond doubt on the list. The directions would be to get the name of the soldier.

Mr. MURPHY: As this discussion goes on I recall from time to time the evidence given before the Returned Soldiers Committee. I have in mind a statement made by the Chairman, who was also Chairman of the Patriotic Fund, that in any number of cases two or three women claimed to be the wife of one man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The identity of the women is to be established by every possible means. Her name goes on the list; she has a number; her occupation and address are given. I do not think there is any way of more clearly fixing her identity.

Mr. MURPHY: Surely some proof ought to be required.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Prime Minister says that the amendment which has been moved by the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) was prepared by the Minister of Justice. To whom should its authorship be attributed?

Mr. NICKLE: This amendment arose merely out of my desire to do a kindly thing to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), who was intensely bitter before recess because there was no provision preventing men who had been out of New Brunswick for nine years, and who had gone to the United States, from voting. This was done in order to try to prevent the evil of which he complained.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That may be correct as to other provinces, but I am speaking now of Quebec. I cannot understand this provision:

> In the province of Quebec, notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the qualification as to domicile shall be domicile on the date of the said writ of election.

The Prime Minister, in answer to the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Marcile), said that this would apply only to the new voters, but it does not only apply to them; it is general; it would apply to all. The result of this would be, it seems to me, that a voter whose name was on the list and who changed his domicile, perhaps a month before the date of the said writ of election, would be disqualified, and as he would not be on any other list, he would lose his vote altogether. I dislike intruding myself in any matter relating to another province, but the matter has to be dealt with as this is an important amendment and it is so late in the discussion. If the minister would change this to read—

> In the province of Quebec, notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the qualification of the female voters to be added under this Act as to domicile shall be domicile on the date of the said writ of election.

I would see no objection, but in the form proposed by the minister it might disqualify a large number of people who would find themselves challenged at the polls because they had changed their domicile, and as they would not be on any other list would thereby lose their vote altogether.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, the proposed form would not be objectionable, but I would like to consult either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice before definitely accepting that amendment.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: I was not in the House when the amendment was moved, and I did not hear the explanation of the Prime Minister, but it seems to me that it really applies to all the voters, because section 32 applies to any male person qualified to vote at a Dominion election. This amendment would, therefore, apply to all voters already on the ist of Quebec. There is certainly no reason whatever for this amendment.

Mr. NICKLE: If hon. gentlemen will refer to section 65 A on page 8 of the original Bill, they will see that there is nothing in their contention. The Minister of Justice, who drew this sub-section—of course, I do not understand the law in Quebec—explained it to me. He said that in Quebec, the qualification of the elector is determined by his domicile as of the date on which the lists are deposited with a certain official who has charge of the lists—I do not know just what his title is.

Mr. BUREAU: The clerk of the municipality and the town clerk of the city.

Mr. NICKLE: That applies to the male voters in Quebec, those who are entitled to vote at a parliamentary election. But the lists on which the female voters in Quebec will vote will never be deposited with any official because the provisions of the Quebec law do not make that possible, and therefore, there must be some date determining domicile. As the list in reference to the male voter would be prepared so that the provisions of sub-section of 65 A would not apply, it was not necessary to say anything further on that point of the argument, and this sub-section 3, as I understand it, will apply only to the female voters. Whether or not there is any objection to putting in the word "female," I do not know what the Minister of Justice will say. This subsection 3 was put in with a view to only affecting women voters added under this measure.

Mr. MARCILE: If it applies only to female voters, let us say that, and then there will be no objection.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This section says that in the preparation of and the adding to the lists, the qualification shall be domicile on the day of election. I can understand why, in respect to new voters you should make that provision, but the difficulty is in the interpretation of it. A man who had changed his domicile prior to the date of the writ could be challenged and his name would be struck off, and as he would not be on any other list, he would lose his vote. That is what I am afraid would be the result of this amendment.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 65A begins with the words, "Notwithstanding anything in this part of this Act." This amendment says again: "Notwithstanding anything in this Act." That bars section 65A, and the question of domicile will be settled as from the date of the issue of the writ. I did not read the section very closely, but it would be better if you struck out the words, "Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained," and just say, "In the province of Quebec, the qualification as to domicile shall be domicile on the date of the said writ of election." Do the words, "Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained" refer to the whole Act or to subsection 65A?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: They have general application. The object of the section prepared by the Minister of Justice is to preserve, in relation to additions which are to be made to this list, the same principle which is enacted by the law of Quebec with regard to the preparation of the ordinary lists of that province. In the ordinary lists, qualification as to residence is settled by the domicile at the time the lists are made up. This amendment is designed to maintain that principle in respect to additions made of women voters to this list. That is the sole purpose of it. It was thought necessary by the Minister of Justice, who can explain it much more fully that I can as he is more familiar with the laws of the province of Quebec than I can claim to be.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When my right hon. friend was out I raised this point. The amendment says:

> In the province of Quebec, notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the qualification as to domicile shall be domicile on the date of the said writ of election.

You see, it is general in its application; it does not apply simply to the female voters who are added.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Some amendment is proposed as to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Probably that will cover it.

[Mr Pugsley.]

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Section 32 applies only to male voters; it says:

> The qualifications necessary to enable any male person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as by this Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such male person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

And to that section 32, which applies only to male voters, it is proposed to add a subsection 3, reading:

> In the province of Quebec, notwithstanding anything in this Act contained the qualifications as to domicile shall be domicile on the date of the said writ of election.

This subsection is added to a section which deals with male voters only. This is certainly likely to create confusion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a section that I thought could be delegated while I was attending to others, and I have not followed it from the beginning. I have listened to the argument pretty carefully, and I hope it will be found that the words can be inserted. My idea is that they can be.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The amendment should be to section 33 instead of section 32.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to the purpose of the amendment itself, before we discuss where it ought to be put, as the Prime Minister has explained with regard to these female voters to be added to the lists, the date of domicile must correspond with the ordinary law of the province. By section 180 of the Quebec Election Act it is provided that,

> The following persons, and no others, being males, and who, at the time of the deposit of the list under articles 196 and 197, or 222 and 223—

I may say that this provision is for Montreal and the divisions outside of Montreal.

> —as the case may be, are domiciled within the limits of the municipality in the electoral district for which the list is made.

With regard to the ordinary lists there is no requirement as to period of residence in the constituency. You are entitled to be on the list, so far as domicile is concerned, if you were domiciled in the constituency at the time the list was deposited with the secretary treasurer, or with the City Clerk. With regard to these women who are to be put on the lists, they only get put on the lists when this enumeration takes place, and absolutely the same principle is applied. If you are domiciled in the constituency at the time the list is being made, that is the constituency you belong to, and on the list for that constituency you are entitled to be put. We have fixed on the date of the issue of the writ of election, because that is the time when these additions to the original list are taking place.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Why not specify "female voters"?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not the slightest objection to adding these words. The amendment will then read:

In the province of Quebec notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, the qualification as to domicile of female voters shall be domicile on the date of the said writ of election.

The advantage of putting the amendment where it is proposed is that you are dealing at the same time with the question of qualification depending upon residence or domicile.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I should like the Solicitor General to consider Form Y on page 97 of this little yellow book, where the voter is required to swear that he has not been disfranchised under the provisions of the Disfranchising Act, or for corrupt practices under the Dominion Elections Act. This oath is very often put to the elector by the candidate's agents. Will the same formula be adopted under the new law? In a big city like Montreal, electors are constantly moving in and out and the lists have to be revised every two years. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice knows how difficult it is to locate one's electors. One man, one vote, is the formula we apply, but suppose a man has moved from one constituency to another and his name has not yet been crossed off the old list at the time of the election—and here are hundreds of cases of this kind—would this man be disqualified?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is nothing said in the form as to the place where the voter resides who is asked to swear that he is not disqualified? Is my hon. friend's suggestion that because of a man's change of residence he might not feel justified in swearing that he was not disqualified?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course this is the form that has been in use for years. As regards all masculine voters in the province of Quebec, the existing lists will stand just as they are to-day. There is no requirement made of residence anywhere in the present Bill that will alter in any way the qualification of a male voter in so far as residence is concerned. The male voter who comes under the category of persons born in alien enemy country may be struck off the list, but save in that regard, and save that female voters may be added, the list we have under the existing law is the list upon which this election shall be held, and any man who is on the list in a particular constituency is still perfectly qualified notwithstanding his having moved. I do not see why any difficulty should arise when he swears he is not disqualified. He is qualified because he is on the list for that electoral constituency, whether he has moved out or not.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: If we swear him he might object to the wording of it. If the question be put to him "have you been disfranchised under the Franchise Act"? he may say "I do not know what that means."

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not changed that in the slightest. That is the form which has been always there.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE. But to-day it is one man one vote, and the elector votes where he resides.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The disfranchising law is just the same as it was before; the Corrupt Practices Act is just the same; so the oath means just the same.

I wish to move, that the words "so help you God" in paragraph (q) of section 1, form Z, be added at the end of the form. This should have been in the Act, but was omitted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move the adoption of one amendment which was not carried as we went along, that is in regard to paragraph 33A.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the female voters, Quebec?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are certain restrictions suggested by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell).

I think my hon. friend does well to wait until we are pretty weary before asking that this section be adopted, because every man who is at all awake and alert must see there is the strongest possible objection to the section in its present form. I find it provides that the relatives of any person who is serving within Canada in any of the naval forces shall be entitled to vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have amended that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend recognizes the utter absurdity of the provision, and amends it so that it will not apply to any man who enlists after the passage of this Act. After the Act passes, I suppose there will be four weeks before the election, and of course you can see the absurdity of allowing it to apply to relatives of persons who may join the naval forces after the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Carleton assured us if we accepted the amendment he would accept us as sincere. I hope you will not repudiate that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sure the Secretary of State misunderstood the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what he said.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not believe anything the minister could do in the way of slight amendments of this character would convince the hon. member for Carleton of the sincerity of this Government in submitting this Bill to Parliament. I would ask my hon. friends on this side of the House if they heard the hon. member for Carleton say he would be satisfied as to the sincerity of the Government. There is no corroboration of that statement. The amendment is a slight concession to the demand for not violating all the rules that ought to govern in connection with the giving of votes to the relatives of the soldiers. The Secretary of State has spoken of the Bill as based upon a principle, which appeals very strongly to every man—that those who have gone to the front occupy a unique position. He says they have either made or are ready to make the supreme sacrifice for the country; that many have died upon the battlefield; and that it is only right that their relatives might be supposed in a certain measure to be able to speak for them, and it is but proper their relatives should be given the right to vote. He based it upon the grounds of service and of sacrifice.

Yet he allows the relatives of, I presume, hundreds of men who have joined vessels engaged in the fishery service to vote—vessels which now are part of the naval forces of Canada, and also men on cruisers, cooks, engineers, and others who had been employed on these vessels for years before the war broke out, who never thought of going abroad, who are engaged upon vessels that could not sail or steam across the Atlantic, and who, when they joined, knew that their services would be entirely in Canada. These men are simply doing the work that they were employed to do years ago and their engagement involves no liability to cross the ocean, to go to the front or to incur the risk or make the sacrifices which men who have gone to the front are called upon to make. The relatives of these officers and men, seamen, midshipmen, cooks, engineers and deck hands, are, by this Act, to have the right to vote. I do not know what argument has been presented in favour of doing this, but it cannot be justified upon any of those grounds which the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have so eloquently put forward as the reason for giving the votes to relatives of those who have gone overseas. In the case of the soldier, of the man who enlists, but who has not left Canada, who has volunteered for the service of his country and is ready to cross the ocean and risk his life on the battlefield, this privilege is not extended to his relatives. It is only when he goes overseas that his relatives shall be entitled to vote. Yet, that principle is departed from in regard to men who are engaged upon these vessels which constitute a part of the Canadian naval service. Why should that be so? Why should the relatives of a man who has enlisted in the expeditionary forces of Canada as an infantryman, an artilleryman, or as the member of a forestry battalion, and who has signified his willingness to go to the front and risk his life, be debarred from the right to vote because he is still in Canada, while you give the right to the relatives of the men who are engaged upon these vessels, who have not gone out of Canada, who never intend to go and who know that they will not have to go?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is quite wrong. A man who joins the naval service has to go wherever he is sent, whether overseas or elsewhere. When the hon. gentleman says that these men never volunteered to go overseas he is wrong.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They never expect to go.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The figures given to-day show that some 3,000 have gone. With regard to the rest of the hon. gentleman's address, I have answered it so often that I think he would consider me a bore if I answered it again.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has not answered. The minister says that they have volunteered to go overseas. So did the infantrymen and the artillerymen volunteer to go overseas.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite true.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They have all volunteered to go overseas. But there are a great many small vessels forming the naval forces in Canada—is that not so? Are not the fishery cruisers a part of the naval forces of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The naval forces were defined clearly this afternoon by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would include the men I spoke of. It cannot be that because they have volunteered and are liable to be sent overseas the right is given to their relatives and refused to men who have volunteered in the military forces of Canada to go overseas. They are compelled by the oath which they take to go beyond the seas, and they volunteered for that purpose. Why should their relatives be refused the vote while the relatives of the men who are serving on board these vessels, who are still in Canada and many of whom have never been outside of Canada except perhaps for a few miles along the coast, be given the vote? I am not able to see the reason.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman desires the relatives of the soldiers in Canada to be included it can very easily be done by simply striking out the words "without Canada." If the hon. gentleman cares to move that amendment we will give it immediate consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not what I am at. The Government limit the right of the female relatives of soldiers to the relatives of those men beyond the seas. That is the principle of the Bill. I take it that, for good and sufficient reasons as they appear to the Government, they do that as a matter of principle because their view is that if men are still in Canada they will be able to vote and there will not be the same difficulty about it as there may be in the case of the soldiers at the front. I hope that difficulty will not occur in very many cases. I trust that all the soldiers will have an opportunity of casting their ballots and determining how the affairs of this country will be administered during the next five years, and whether the mismanagement, corruption, partisanship and waste of public money shall be continued during the next five years or not. Now the Government refuse the privilege to female relatives of the members of the expeditionary forces who have not left Canada.

But with respect to those in the naval forces, the relatives of those who have served either within or without Canada are given the vote. My hon. friend may have explained the reasons for this distinction very fully and satisfactorily. He certainly did not do so when I had the good fortune to be present; and I should be delighted, and I am sure the country would be, if the minister could give any satisfactory explanation for this distinction. I cannot conceive of any. We have still an hour before the guillotine will fall, and I invite the minister to explain this discrimination. He invites me to suggest amendments. We have been considering this Bill hour after hour, a Bill which, when it was presented to this committee, gave evidence of as careless drafting—perhaps not careless but of as hasty drafting—as any Bill ever presented to this House. When the Bill was introduced it was incomplete, it was interlined, it was not completely printed, and it was in such form that it could not be printed in French until the very day of the second reading. This Bill, drafted and introduced in imperfect form, was not distributed in French and English until after the calling of the second reading, owing to the haste of its preparation. To-day the minister has presented amendment after amendment, all under the rules of closure which, if they had been applied, would have absolutely prevented any discussion of these amendments or of the Bill. I would ask the minister during the remaining hour to explain the discrimination in 33 A between the female relatives of those who have joined the expeditionary force and are still in Canada training to go overseas to fight for their country, and the relatives of those who are members of the naval force who are still in Canada and will be at the time of the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is quite true that there is an hour yet before the closure comes into effect, and I know that the hon. member is troubled as to keeping up the discussion for that time. We are all good-natured on this side, and do not at all mind his occupying—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I can assure you that we feel very ill-natured on this side. This is one of the greatest outrages ever perpetrated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would rather the hon. member would not ask me to repeat myself to help him out in occupying this hour. I have explained every point that he has brought up. We have no particular objection to enfranchising the relatives of soldiers in Canada if hon. gentlemen opposite desire them to have the franchise. But there is a difference between them and those who are overseas. There would be an opportunity for fraudulent enlistment for male fide or not bona fide enlistment. There has been some of that in Canada, not a great deal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the way you would get recruits.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Recruits that are not bona fide are not much good if they afterwards leave. I accepted the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) with reference to the patrol service in Canada. Those in Canada as 1 a.m. yet are not subject in any degree to the perils of war. Those enlisted in the naval forces are, although some of them are not in as great danger as others; many of the overseas forces, construction and forestry battalions, are in the same position, although the peril there is very substantial indeed. It is very substantial in the naval force too.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Are the vessels engaged originally in the fishery service now within the naval service?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall ask the minister.

Mr. CURRIE: What is the sense of asking that? Every man who enlists for service in this war takes the oath for the war and becomes a soldier or sailor for the war.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What has that to do with it?

Mr. CURRIE: Just to create trouble the hon. member desires to send for the minister to give that information.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend does not understand my statement. I want to know if the ships that are actually engaged in the fishery service, by the statute become part of the Canadian navy. There are on the Great Lakes a number of vessels engaged in the fisheries service; does my hon. friend say they are performing war service?

Mr. CURRIE: The man who enlists in the naval service, is sworn in and put on the regular patrol is performing war service. By no stretch of the imagination could the hon. gentleman look upon these men as not belonging to the navy.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Suppose they do; is it right that their relatives should have the vote?

Mr. CURRIE: The question resolves itself into whether these men will vote for hon. gentlemen opposite. If they would not vote for hon. gentlemen opposite, it would be very wrong to give them the vote; that is what is disturbing the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). Many of those men are doing mine-sweeping service on the coast, where submarines have been active. A gentleman whom I met in the hotel last evening told me that the ship upon which he had been bound to Quebec was sent to Halifax when it reached the Banks because of the report that there might be submarines in the mouth of the St. Lawrence. The most dangerous service rendered in connection with the war is mine-sweeping,—looking after mines dropped by submarines. Thousands of young men in Scotland and England have been blown up in these trawlers. I received a letter the other day in which it was stated that a young man 22 years of age had been drowned when a trawler that he was on was blown up. Many of these ships go out, strike a mine, and are never seen again. The Germans have submarines in the Atlantic that are capable of coming to this side and of carrying large quantities of mines for distribution around the mouths of harbours. Submarines have attacked vessels off the Atlantic coast of the United States. Men engaged in the very service of which my hon. friend complains have been lost at sea. Why, then, does he desire to discriminate against them? The wives, daughters, sisters and mothers of those men are as much entitled to the right to vote as to the right to receive separation allowance. The member for St. John has talked so much this session; he has asked so many questions, that he really exhausts the frontbenchers on this side. I am sure that he must have asked millions of questions since the session commenced. The member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) also has distinguished himself by his attacks on members on this side, particularly by his venomous attacks on the Government. When I see a man in action in this House I always visualize something that he resembles. There is a modern instrument which is employed in the building art and which is operated by means of compressed air and mud. This instrument is known as a mud-gun, and if there is one thing that the member for North Cape Breton reminds me of, it is a mud-gun. The trouble is that when he starts in he does not confine himself to operations above the belt. He indulges in all kinds of insults and insinuations, and he gets away with them because we do not want to waste the time of the House in answering him. The volumes of Hansard he has filled this session will go down to posterity, but at the conclusion of this session I have no doubt that we shall have seen the last of him for ten years.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) thinks that it is a soft snap to put me out of action in my county, I invite him down to North Cape Breton and Victoria. The honourable gentleman is the last man in this country, in view of the record that the ex-Minister of Militia gives him, who should talk about action.

Mr. CURRIE: Now, he is starting the mud business.

Mr. McKENZIE: If my honourable friend wants to know his record as a man in action, I may tell him that he was found up to his neck in a dugout when he should have been at the front leading his men. When he came to this country looking for promotion the then Minister of Militia refused to give him promotion, because he was not entitled to it. Afterwards the honourable gentleman stood up in this House and complained about it. For a number of months the honourable gentleman was too much ashamed of himself to mention soldiers or soldiering. Now he is getting Dutch courage; he thinks that people are forgetting his record. What right has he to turn on me at this hour of the night? I have been perfectly quiet during the last twenty-four hours. My honourable friend puts himself forward as a man whose intellect towers over that of other honourable gentlemen in this House, but he is the only person who thinks he occupies that position. So far as wasting powder on dead monkeys is concerned, I think I have put in almost enough time on my honourable friend. If he thinks that he can fling mud at me whenever he wants to, he is mistaken; he had better take to his dugout. He says that I have insulted the Government and the members of the House. I am not aware, Sir, that I have insulted any member of this House since I came into it. I do not take kindly to insults from anybody. I do not expect them; I do not take them, because I am not built along those lines, either mentally or physically. What I do not take from other people, I am not disposed to pass over to them. I am disposed to get along amicably and respectfully with every member of this House, and I shall be sorry, indeed, to have it go abroad amongst hon. members that I am insulting the Government or insulting any member of this House. If I believe the Government is wrong, or if I have any criticism, I make it in clear cut, bad Anglo-Saxon very often, because I must say to hon. gentlemen that, when I stand up here speaking English, I am not speaking my native tongue. When an hon. member from Quebec addresses the House, if he makes mistakes in his English, it is all excused because English is not his native tongue, but if a man who is a Gaelic man as I am, makes any mistake, it is attributed to stupidity on his part. I am serious when I say that English is not my native tongue. I am not, therefore, as flowery as some hon. gentlemen might be in the use of that language, but I can make myself understood, particularly when I am saying some things about hon. gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches. What I wish to say about the Bill now before the House—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Say it in Gaelic.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for Calgary, (Mr. R. B. Bennett), who is not in the House now, broke forth the other night into some of St. Paul's injunctions and directions—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Say it in Gaelic.

Mr. McKENZIE: He was dealing with spiritual wickedness in high places. I am asked to speak Gaelic. I am also going to follow some of St. Paul's directions, namely, not to cast pearls before swine. To be serious for a moment—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Say it in Gaelic.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for North Simcoe, (Mr. Currie) understands me in Gaelic well enough. I have spoken Gaelic to him before, and perhaps he thought that was a weakness in me, and that was why he turned his mud-gun on me, the only gun he can handle.

There is in our constitution a provision which recognizes civil rights as property. The right to vote is, in a sense, property. The minister is giving the enumerators power to strike men off the lists without giving them notice or an opportunity of defence. That is not right. If some day, when the minister is not very busy, he will open the first volume of the reports of the Supreme Court of Canada and read the first case reported there, he will find this doctrine of notice dealt with at length, and the doctrine laid down that a British subject cannot legally be deprived of anything that is in the nature of property or civil rights without giving him notice that he is to be so deprived and affording him an opportunity of defending his right. I think it will be accepted by every hon. member in this House, and particularly, by the lawyers, that the right to vote is property, and that no citizen of this country, whether he was born in this country or elsewhere, once he has become a British subject, should be deprived of property or civil rights without being given notice, and an opportunity of saying to the court before whom he is called, the reason why he should not be so deprived. This enumerator does not sit publicly. The man who is deprived of his vote does not know where the enumerator is sitting. The only thing he knows is, when he goes to the poll to cast his ballot, that his name is not on the list, and he will then discover that at some place and at some time this enumerator struck his name off the list. There should, therefore, be something in this Bill a little more explicit than we have now by which it would be known to men who are likely to be struck off the list, where this official will be sitting, and that when that official goes over the list and comes across names he intends to strike off, he should serve notice on such men that on a certain day he intends to deal with the question whether or not they shall remain on the list. They can then appear before him and give such answer as they may have. Even if their reasons would not change the mind of the enumerator these men, would feel more satisfied, and it would be more along the lines of British practice if they were given notice. There is nothing in the Bill to enable the enumerator to do that. There is no provision as to where the enumerator is to come from. I have no great objection to any man in my county being appointed an enumerator, but I think it would be better that enumerators be appointed within the county. I would not care that enumerators from the western part of the province should be brought down to my county, and I am sure the people of the western portion of Nova Scotia would object to men being brought down from Cape Breton to be enumerators in the western part of the province. Provision should also be made that enumerators should be residents of good standing in the county in which they are to operate. They are appointed in a lump number by the Governor in Council. Then the returning officer distributes them to the different parts of the county. The town of Sydney Mines is divided into six or seven polling divisions. Will there be an enumerator for each of those polling divisions?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. No one is deprived of the right of the franchise although he may be deprived of the right to be on the list.

Mr. MORPHY: As there is still half an hour going begging in this debate, I hope I shall not appear to be trespassing on the time of the House if I say a few things in connection with some statements that have been made during the debate to-night, particularly by the hon. member for North Cape Breton, who has made an unwarrantable attack upon an esteemed and worthy member of this House.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who started the ball?

Mr. MORPHY: An unwarrantable attack, I say, upon a gallant soldier, Colonel Currie of the 48th Highlanders. One would have thought that a man who boasted of his Gaelic descent, and of his Scottish birthright, would have been the last to stand up in a public assembly and attack a member of the gallant 48th. There seems to be the bitterness of gall there. My immediate object in referring to the matter is to say to hon. gentlemen of this House that the attack is absolutely without foundation and entirely unworthy any hon. gentleman to make in this House against a soldier who has been under fire at the front with his men, day in and day out, at the risk of his life. A man who has shown the intrepidity that Colonel Currie has shown should not be attacked in such an unwarrantable manner on the floor of this House from personal or any other motives. I have seen not only one, but two letters from the front from men who have served under Colonel Currie. I wish I had them here, because it was with great pleasure that I read them. One was from a private in the ranks who had seen some of the attacks made against Colonel Currie in the press of this country and throughout the world, and he said that the attacks were without foundation, and that the men who have served under Colonel Currie loved him so much "they would follow him to hell." To hear a gallant officer defamed in this House in that way makes my blood boil, and I think it is only right that I should tell the House what I have learned from letters from the front.

. With regard to the general attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, as I have listend to this debate I have been struck by one thing above all others, and that is that some hon. members opposite have shown no love for the soldier's wife, and mother, and sister and daughter. Others with a higher patriotic spirit have maintained a splendid respectful silence. This House has witnessed an attack on a soldier and his near relatives. We have witnessed a deliberate attempt in the face of public opinion in Canada to give to the wife of the slacker and the wife of the alien enemy a status equal to that of the wife of the soldier who is fighting for the Empire. I do not know why that should be. Have we descended so far in the realm of party politics that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will stand up in this House and say, as he did the other night, that a party in this House will hear from the alien enemy wife and widow and sister in thunder tones? He mistakes the patriotic women of Canada. There is no more loyal woman in the world than the patriotic women of Canada, who are glad to see the soldier's wife, and daughter, and mother, and sister, who have made the greater sacrifice getting the vote. The women of Canada who have knitted socks and made comforts for the soldier have displayed a patriotic spirit right through that would have been an inspiration for the hon. member for St. John if he had felt like coming up to the high standard these women have set. These women are proud that the soldier's women relatives are being given a preference in the matter of voting.

I was very much amused at my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) taking the attitude he did after he had boasted so much of being Gaelic. Why, the record of Scotchmen the world over is one of chivalry and bravery; there never was a Scotchman in the days of old who would have voted against supporting the men at the front as my hon. friend did; no, not one. They have always been over the top first, the Black Watch and the Irish Enniskillens. And to hear a Scotchman who has voted against conscription, against sending succour to the boys who are fighting in France and Flanders for his liberty in this country—to hear him boasting of his Gaelic ancestry and indulging in a tirade of abuse against an officer who has seen service at the front, is a very painful thing for me to have to listen to. I do not wonder that as the clock goes on some hon. gentlemen opposite have grown tired.

I do not wonder that, though they complain of closure being applied, their heart is so little in this fight that the Chamber is almost empty. They cannot occupy the time alloted to them, and we on this side of the House who have sat silent have to get up and help them fill up the time. Their hearts have failed them in this fight; it is palpable, you can almost feel it. Some hon. gentlemen over there are good, some of them are fine; but the atmosphere is charged to-night with the weakness of the cause for which they are fighting, with the abject futility of fighting against what they know to be right.

Let me say a word or two about my own constituency. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) last night spoke of the German in the West who could not be allowed to enlist. Have there been two policies in the Militia Department of this country? No. The German in the West was entitled to enlist just as freely as the German in the East. In my own county—I say it with pride—forty-five boys of German descent enlisted in the 110th Battalion and went to the front and fought; some of them died, others have been wounded, and a few have returned. In the 71st Battalion there were 58 men of German descent. In the 34th Battalion 52, in the 11th Battery—

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are some members of this committee who are desirous of discussing this Bill, and I would call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. MORPHY: I am discussing the Bill, and if the hon. gentleman's stock of patience is as large as the vocabulary he has displayed during this debate he will see that my remarks were strictly in order. I propose to discuss this Bill, and I do not think that my hon. friend has any right to interrupt me, as he has already given up the fight.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He has not given up the fight by any means. He is going to carry the fight to the country and hon. gentlemen will hear from him. The point of order is this. The hon. gentleman has been speaking of everything but the Bill which is under consideration. He has also spoken his twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: I took note of the time at which the hon. member started speaking, and I find that he has almost ten minutes to run yet.

Mr. MORPHY: In the 14th Battery there were twenty-four of German descent; in the 64th, six; and in No. 1 Canadian Army Medical Corps, nine. Altogether 203 Germans have enlisted and gone to the front from the county of Perth. One of them has won the Military Cross, and a second bar. His father happens to be a German born, and I am sorry to say that that man will be disfranchised. It is a pity, but it is true.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will not the father be enfranchised under this Act, his boy having gone to the front?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He will not be disfranchised. He was never naturalized.

Mr. MORPHY: The record those boys have made has been splendid and they have carried back a lot of French wounded soldiers. They are doing great work in every possible way. I think the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will bear me out that it is paradoxical in this country, in this war, in this great crisis, that German boys of German descent, to the extent of 203 by actual count of mine over the service rolls have left to fight against the principles of the Hun, against the principles laid down by the Kaiser. We will not say very much about the county of the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot); there have been only 36 altogether who have left there, and I do not know whether any of them were French or not. I think it is so paradoxical that it is worth while mentioning it on the floor of this House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Only the day before yesterday I read in the press a very fine report about the French-Canadians at the front. Twenty-four of them were decorated on the field of battle.

Mr. MORPHY: I am glad my hon. friend speaks of it, because there is no man in Canada who takes a greater pride than I do in the brave fellows who have left the province of Quebec to help in the great fight. But why are they not supported to the fullest limit? Their bravery in leaving for France ought to compel every man who proclaims his French ancestry to come along and give those boys all the help they desire. It should not be left to the German boys of Ontario to bring back French wounded.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On the eighteenth of this month I am taking my boy down to Halifax.

Mr. MORPHY: Splendid. Every man who does that is entitled to all credit, and I give my hon. friend credit for sending his boy—not for sending his boy but because he has a boy who will go without being sent. But if the hon. gentleman and his leader had done what should have been done, instead of standing back and playing the game of politics, we would have had a splendid army of 100,000 men, instead of 6,000, from the province of Quebec. Let me come to the point, so that my hon. friend from St. John will not think wrong about it. There are grandfathers in my county of the boys who are gone to the front, old men who came into the county in the pioneer days, who pioneered the farms, and built up their homes, but have never been naturalized because in the early days no one thought of it. Some of them took an oath of allegiance. Now because these men happen to have been born in Germany, although their sons and grandsons are fighting for you, Mr. Chairman, and for the country at large, you are going to disfranchise them under this Bill. A finer and more loyal body of citizens never lived in any country in the world. Their sons are as British, and even much more British, than some men in this House. They are absolutely intrepid and fearless. They have gone forward and have done their duty like soldiers, and have died like men. They have won honours which have reflected glory upon the Dominion of Canada. Why could not the grandfathers of those boys be naturalized in some way? Why should they not be recognized? Why should not this Bill be so amended so that the old men, past military age, should, through the grace of this House if nothing else, be given that right of citizenship which they have earned through their pioneer days by the fulfillment of all their duties and by voting consistently from year to year? Why should they not be given the right to vote in this Bill?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. member is very late in suggesting this. It is a quarter to two now.

Mr. MORPHY: There is an excuse for being late. The time has been frittered away by hon. gentlemen opposite. I was only forced to speak when I saw I had a real opening because hon. gentlemen were complaining they were gagged, yet the gag was not so tight that they failed to fill in the time, and they let me in. I ask the Solicitor General to consider, even at this late hour, whether something cannot be done along the lines I have suggested. Say something that will satisfy what I look upon as the fair claim of these men whose sons and grandsons have gone to the front to fight the battle of freedom, to fight for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as on this side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true there are numbers in the province of Ontario, and there are some in other provinces, who have sons and grandsons enlisted, and who are not able to vote. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) is not speaking strictly correctly when he states they are disfranchised by this Bill. No man who has a son or grandson at the front is disfranchised no matter what race he belongs to. No man who has a brother in the overseas forces is disfranchised by this Bill, no matter what race or country he comes from. The trouble is there are men who, although they may have exercised the ballot, have not been naturalized, consequently they are not able to vote. They have never been legally qualified, and they are not now. Their status is not changed in the least. The law as to them is precisely as it was before. To meet the suggestion as the hon. member for North Perth stated it would involve the giving of the franchise to other than British subjects in the country. In the case of military voters, those who have gone overseas and are fighting in France, though we went, as far as we believe any Government in the world has gone, and as far as we believe we could, we did not go so far as to enfranchise even the soldier himself if he were not a British subject. Consequently, I think it would be going too far, if we were now to entertain the idea of enfranchising the relatives of the soldiers who may not be British subjects. They labour under a disability at the present time which I freely admit is in certain cases a hardship. In many instances, through no fault of their own they have not been naturalized; in many cases they believed they were naturalized, and they lived for years having taken some oath of allegiance, and in the sincere belief that they were naturalized, and they exercised all the functions of citizenship. Many of them made the very best citizens in this country. However, when the war broke out, the subject of naturalization became a live one, and men began to inquire. It was ascertained that very many who thought they were naturalized as a matter of fact were never naturalized at all, and very many more who had paid no attention whatever to the subject became alive to the conviction that they were not really British citizens at all. After the outbreak of the war the British Government sent a despatch to this Government to the effect that they in Great Britain were not naturalizing any alien enemy subjects, and suggesting that we follow the same practice in Canada. We were in this position: We had a Naturalization Act which had been on our statute-book for years, which prescribed the conditions of naturalization as three years' residence, and certain oaths, etc., and which placed the power to naturalize in the hands of the judges. That Act was still in force. Men had come to this country on the faith of that Act and had assumed duties of citizenship relying upon it being carried out. Consequently, we did not feel we should interfere with the exercise of the right of our judges to enfranchise under the Act, and we so notified the British Government. But aside from that restriction, aside from that limitation, we have abided by the practice followed by the British Government and the request they made of us. The result is this: that some judges under the old Act have granted naturalization; others have refused it. The practice in the province of Ontario, following the decision of Chief Justice Meredith, has been to refuse naturalization. Consequently, in the province of Ontario, there has been no naturalization by the judges under the old Act, and there has been no naturalization under the new Act by the Secretary of State, on account of the understanding with the British Government.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman not realise that there is a great distinction between the German who is living in England and the rural, frugal German who comes to till the land in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As he does in the three prairie provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the three prairie provinces the case is not the same, because in Ontario many of them have been there since Confederation.

Mr. MORPHY. For sixty years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it might well be that consideration could be given to the request of my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) that there should be some relaxation in this country of the practice applied in Great Britain and impliedly though not specifically acceded to by the Government of Canada in dispatches. Some consideration might well be given to the question of admitting to naturalization in proper cases those who though of alien origin have resided in this country such length of time and under such conditions that it is a hardship upon them to deny them naturalization. I can say to my hon. friend from North Perth that the most careful possible consideration will be given in this regard.

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to ask the Minister why he would grant naturalization and the vote to the German in Ontario—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not the vote.

Mr. CARVELL:—and refuse it to the German in western Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say the vote.

Mr. CARVELL: What on earth is the use of naturalization unless you give the vote?

Mr. MORPHY: A good deal.

Mr MEIGHEN: What I say applies everywhere and to every province.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he will grant a German in Ontario naturalization and he will not grant him a vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He will not get a vote because he will not have been naturalized for fifteen years. Of course he would if he had a son at the front.

Mr. CARVELL: Then you are doing that in order to get votes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has quite misunderstood me. The matter of votes has nothing to do with the suggestion of the hon. member for North Perth. It was merely a question of whether the Naturalization Act would be administered in such cases as these.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before the time expires I desire——

Mr. CURRIE: I desire to make a personal explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The honourable gentleman can make his explanation after I have finished.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville): The honourable member for North Simcoe desires to make a personal explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He may do so when I get through.

The CHAIRMAN: The honourable member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) caught my eye first.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hold in my hand—

Mr. CURRIE: I wish to make a personal explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hold in my hand—

Some Hon. MEMBER: Order, order.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I was up before the honourable member for St. John and I have a question to ask.

The CHAIRMAN: The honourable member for St. John caught my eye first.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: May I be allowed to ask a question on the Bill?

The CHAIRMAIN: It cannot be asked unless the honourable member for St. John consents to it. Similarly, the honourable member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) cannot make a personal explanation unless the honourable member for St. John consents.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: It will only take half a minute.

Mr. CURRIE: I will only occupy a minute.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will give way to the honourable member for Montreal, St. James (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I want to ask the Secretary of State how many enumerators he will have to name by Order in Council for the province of Quebec? There are 65 counties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many polling subdivisions to the country on the average?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE:

Subject to the provisions of section 65a of this Act the Governor in Council may appoint enumerators in each province to make lists of the electors in each electoral district, and the returning officer of each electoral district shall assign one of such enumerators to each polling district therein.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I only gave way to allow my honourable friend to ask a question. I must ask my honourable friend to allow me to proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, let the honourable gentleman (Mr. L. A. Lapointe) take his seat. The honourable member for St. John just gave way to allow the honourable member for Montreal, St. James, to ask a question.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: The honourable member for St. John just gave way for one question and I think the honourable member for Montreal, St. James, got a little farther than one question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The honourable gentleman will have a chance a little later.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot ask a question?

Mr. CURRIE: It is my right to make a personal explanation. Under the rules I am entitled to do so. What I wish to explain to the committee—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I decline to give way to the honourable gentleman.

Mr. CURRIE: I do not want to be charged—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have been allowing hon. members every possible latitude in the discussion of this Bill and if they will look at Hansard to-morrow I think they will find that a great deal of work has been done. Now, the hon. member for St. John has the floor and if he objects to subject he has a right to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order—

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hold in my hand the memorandum which was submitted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the Solicitor General a portion of which I propose to put on Hansard because it has special reference to the point I made this evening, that no reasonable excuse can be given for discriminating between the soldiers who have joined the expeditionary force and are still in Canada and those who are members of the naval forces. No reason can be given for giving votes to the relatives of those who are in the naval service and not giving them to those who have joined the expeditionary forces and who still remain in Canada. The memorandum, which has been prepared by Mr. Desbarats, the deputy minister, is as follows:

The War-Time Elections Act.

The first section of this Act would give the right to vote to certain female relatives of "any person, male or female, living or dead, who is serving or has served without Canada in any of the military forces, or within or without Canada in any of the naval forces, of Canada, or of Great Britain in the present war."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time, time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have still fifteen minutes. When a member rises before two o'clock, he has twenty minutes. That is the view of the Speaker and I think the Solicitor General will agree to it. I would not violate the rule but the words are that you shall not rise to speak after two o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS: I rise to a point of order.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. EDWARDS: No, I have a right to rise to a point of order. The hon. member for St. John, having spoken before, has exhausted his right to the twenty minutes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not speak after the rule was invoked. Hon. gentlemen were speaking with the unanimous consent of the House, and I had not spoken.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman was on his feet immediately before I spoke, and addressed the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That was not a speech.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order is well taken. We are proceeding under clause 17B of the rules of the House. Practically every member has spoken on the question many times. It was simply by tolerance that they were permitted to discuss this matter without the enforcement of the twenty-minute limit. As the debate was conducted in that way, I think the hon. member for St. John will not insist in speaking after two o'clock, as the time limit is being enforced.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Allow me to call attention—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let us keep order for a few minutes; it is the desire of all the members that we shall close this debate with reasonable dignity and in a good spirit. The words of the rule are that "no member shall rise to speak after that hour," that is, after two o'clock. I have had an opportunity of speaking of this with the Speaker and I am sure from what he said to me that in His Honour's view, if a member rises before two o'clock he has his twenty minutes. He gave a similar ruling in favour of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. EDWARDS: I rise to another point of order. That is, that you, having ruled that my first point is well taken, the only thing the hon. member for St. John can do, if he does not agree with that ruling, is to appeal against it. He has no right to speak again, as it is after two o'clock, and, under the rule, we should take the vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Chairman did not rule, he just expressed a wish.

The CHAIRMAN: As we have been proceeding by tolerance all day, if the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) would be kind enough not to press his point of order, then the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will finish his remarks may be in ten minutes.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. EDWARDS: If it was the case of a member who had not used up the time of the House ad libitum I would not say anything about it, but I must insist upon my point.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MARCILE: While it is two o'clock—

Mr. PUGSLEY: This memorandum—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This memorandum gives every woman the right to vote who—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: As the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has insisted on his point of order, I rule that, it being after two o'clock, no one can speak as the time limit to speak was used up by every member who took part in the discussion during the day. Each member spoke more than twenty minutes.

Mr. MARCILE: I wish to ask the Secretary of State one question.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order, order. Sit down.

Mr. MARCILE: It is absolutely unfair. Am I not to be allowed to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 of the Bill as amended be adopted?

Carried on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 be adopted?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I had the honour to place in your hands an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 2 as amended be adopted?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Carried. Lost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I may be permitted, the point taken by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Lapointe) is well taken. He submitted an amendment to this clause, which I think should be put first. The amendment was to effect that the hour for closing the polls be eight o'clock instead of five.

Mr. MURPHY: Generally?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Amendment, Mr. Lapointe, negatived on division, yeas 26, nays 50.

Section 2 as amended agreed to on division.

Section 3 as amended agreed to on division.

Schedule agreed to on division.

Title agreed to on division.

Bill reported, and amendments read the first time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before this report is acted upon I desire to make some remarks in regard to it. I do so under rule 56, which provides that after report the Bill is open to debate and amendment before it is ordered for a third reading.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I submit that this rule was overruled by the rule which was adopted in 1913. The new rule supersedes the old, because it specifically declares what motions are debatable. Of course, all that is before the House now is the motion for the receiving of the report.

2 a.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, the report is received.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the report is received, the motion for concurrence is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman could not properly speak on the motion that the amendments be read the second time and concurred in. According to the decision which I gave in the House not long ago, under rule 17A that motion is not debatable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I did not know that Your Honour had so ruled.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the honourable member rise to a point of order?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes. The question is one of great importance, affecting the rights of the minority; therefore, I bring it specially to Your Honour's notice. Rule 56 specifically deals with—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think your honour will say that I am in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am permitting the member for St. John to make some remarks on the point of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is true, as the Solicitor General suggests, that we have rule 17A, but we have also a special rule, rule 56, bearing upon a particular point. Rule 56, which has not been repealed, says :

All amendments made in committee are reported by the chairman to the House, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the Bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a Bill is reported without amendment it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the House.

It is argued by the Solicitor General that that rule is inconsistent with rule 17 A. When we have a rule dealing with general matters and also a special rule stating what shall take place in a particular instance, that special rule would not be overruled by the general rule. If the House had intended when it adopted rule 17 A to repeal rule 56 it would have done so. But it did not do so; therefore, rule 56 is still in force. I think that if there is any doubt in the matter Your Honour should decide in favour of rule 56, because the rights of the minority in this House are very much restricted. It should be borne in mind also that this Government, by virtue of its majority, can declare anything to be carried. I await Your Honour's interpretation of the rule in full confidence that the House will support your decision. It seems to me to be clear that under rule 56 the Bill is now open to debate and amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order raised by the member for St. John is, indeed, a most important one; I have had occasion to give the matter consideration within the past few days. As a matter of fact, the point has already been settled by decision of the House, to be found on page 5374 of Hansard of August 29, 1917. Rule 56 is in conflict with rule 17 A, but rule 56 was in the rule book and was prior in point of time to rule 17 A, which, overriding all other rules, was designed specifically for the purpose of restricting debate. If the interpretation placed upon the rule by the member for St. John were sustained, the express object which the House had in mind when it enacted rule 17 A would be defeated. Notwithstanding that, I am cognizant of the import of the point raised by my hon. friend. It is very clear in my mind that rule 17 A must prevail; that it must override rule 56 and that, therefore, it is not open to the hon. gentleman to enter into a discussion at this stage of the proceedings. In any case the discussion could take place only on the motion which I now propose to put: that the amendments be now read the second time and concurred in; and under rule 17 A that motion is not debatable.

It is moved by Mr. Meighen, seconded by Mr. Hazen, that the said amendments be now read the second time and concurred in. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Motion agreed to, and amendments read the second time and concurred in.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Meighen, the House adjourned at 2.20 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, September 13, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE DRY DOCK SUBSIDIES ACT, 1910.

RESOLUTION AGREED TO AND BILL INTRODUCED.

On the Government Notice of Motion:

Mr. Reid—In Committee of the Whole—Will move, that the resolution of August 1 with respect to amending the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, 1910, be amended and that all the words after the words "sum of" in the eighth line be struck out and the words "one million dollars" be substituted in lieu thereof.

Hon. J. D. REID (Acting Minister of Public Works): This is for the purpose of amending the resolution contained in No. 20 of the Orders of the Day. What I wish, with the consent of the House, to do, is to pass this resolution and then take it up in connection with Order No. 20 of the Orders of the Day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the minister desires to go in Committee of the Whole on this resolution to-day?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: As it is not an Order of the Day, the minister cannot do so except by consent of the House.

Mr. REID: When we come to the Orders of the Day, I want to take up Order No. 20 with reference to dry docks. This is an amendment to that resolution, and if the House will consent, I would like to pass this resolution and then take it up when we go into committee on No. 20 of the Orders of the Day.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House went into committee on the following proposed motion, Mr. W. H. Bennett in the Chair:

That the resolution of August 1 with respect to amending the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, 1910, be amended and that all the words after the words "sum of" in the eighth line be struck out and the words "one million dollars" be substituted in lieu thereof.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. REID: I intend, when we reach the Orders of the Day, to move resolution No. 20 which is to amend the Dry Dock Act. The object of that resolution is to provide for increasing the width of dry docks from 110 to 125 feet. This is being done at the request of the Admiralty. In addition to that we want to increase the depth over the sill from 37 feet to 38 feet. We are also increasing the rate of interest from 4 to 4½ per cent. There is another clause that we propose asking the committee to consider, namely, that, on a dry dock which is being constructed, we may issue bonds to the extent of 75 per cent of the amount invested after $1,000,000 have been expended. The resolution which is on the Order Paper in the name of the Hon. Mr. Rogers was discussed on August 13, and it was found it was not in accordance with the intention of the minister at that time, and it had to be amended. That is why this amendment is being moved.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I understand it, the substitution of the words "one million dollars" for "five hundred thousand dollars" in no way increases the liability of the country, but rather restricts it. $1,000,000 must be expended before progress estimates can be given. The original resolution stated that $500,000 must first be expended. Therefore, this is a greater safeguard to the public.

Mr. REID: That is the position exactly.

Mr. CARVELL: Does this change it in any way so that the Government is responsible for the bonds, or is it only responsible for the interest? This Act was passed a good many years ago, and my recollection is that it provides only for the payment of interest for a certain number of years. Is there any change in the liability resulting to the country, apart from the increase in the rate of interest from 4 to 4½ per cent?

Mr. REID: There is a change. A new clause is being added. Under the old Act the dry dock had to be completed before any bonds were guaranteed.

Mr. MURPHY: That is not the point.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What the hon. member asks is whether there is any liability on the part of the Government to pay the principal. There is no change in that.

Mr. REID: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no guarantee of bonds. There is just a payment of interest.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

Mr. REID thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 134 to amend the Dry Docks Subsidies Act, 1910.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

THE BATTLE OF LENS.

CANADIAN CASUALTIES AT LENS—RECRUITING AND WASTAGE BETWEEN 16TH ND 31ST AUGUST.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia and Defence): In reply to a question put by the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) the other day as to the casualties amongst Canadians in the fighting around Lens, the casualties at the front in the Canadian Expeditionary Force so far reported for the period from the 16th to the 31st of August were 7,586. This covers the period of exceptionally severe fighting in and around Lens, where the Canadian forces were heavily engaged. The discharges in Canada during the same period for various causes were 689. This gives a total wastage of 8,275. The total recruits in combatant arms during the same period was approximately 800, making a net wastage of approximately 7,475.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How are the casualties distributed? How many men were killed, how many wounded, how many missing, and so forth?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall be glad to get that information.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

POSITION OF RETURNED OFFICERS UNDER MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) asked me in the House the other day whether the surplus of officers who have been returned to Canada would be liable for service under the Military Service Act. The information my hon. friend desires is given in the Military Service Act, 78 George V, Chapter 19, in sections 2 and section 13, subsections 1 and 2, and in the schedule to the Act, paragraph 5.

OVERSEAS EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

PAY OF SOLDIERS PROMOTED AND OF OFFICERS WHO REVERT IN RANK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) the other day asked the following question:

> I wish to ask the Minister of Militia whether it is a fact that men who have been promoted on the field in France and Flanders, and who, having been wounded, return to the base or to Canada, receive only the pay of the position which they occupied when they left Canada, while men who received their appointment in England or in Canada, upon being wounded, receive the pay of their present rank.

So far as the department is aware, men who have been promoted on the field in France and Flanders, and who have been wounded, and returned to the base, continue to receive the pay of the permanent grade held at the time they were wounded. Men who have received their appointment in England or in Canada, upon being sent overseas, and who have been wounded, would similarly receive the pay of the permanent grade they occupied in their overseas unit.

The above does not apply to men who are holding acting rank only. When men with acting rank are wounded, they receive the pay of their permanent rank.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL: I understand the minister to say that the men receive pay according to the rank which they held at the time of being wounded.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The pay depends upon the conditions which I have just indicated.

Mr. CARVELL: I know of a case in New Brunswick, where a man who was promoted on the field to the rank of Major, and who was afterwards wounded, and returned to Canada, has been receiving the pay of a Lieutenant all the time. I can give the minister his name privately.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall be glad if my hon. friend would, as there may be some irregularity about this case.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand that there are some cases where an officer who was acting in a higher rank—for instance, a captain acting as a major—and who had been recommended for promotion which had not been given at the time of his death, has been overlooked. Will the minister look into that matter?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Yes. In reply to a question by my hon. friend the other day on this subject I would say that officers who voluntarily revert in England to a lower rank, in order to go to the front, receive the pay of their lower rank, but their wives continue to receive separation allowance of the original rank which the officers held prior to reversion.

CERTIFICATES TO THOSE MEDICALLY UNFIT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said the other day that he had seen it stated in the press that certificates were to be given to men who had offered to enlist but who had been refused on account of medical unfitness. I would say that, in accordance with Order in Council 2199, of the 10th August, 1917, a badge and certificate known as Class "D" will be given to those who have offered themselves for active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and have been rejected as, and who still are, medically unfit. As no list of those who offered to enlist and were refused on account of medical unfitness has been kept by this department, the Order in Council above mentioned requires such applicants to undergo a further medical examination and supply proof, by statutory declaration or otherwise, that they come within Class "D." I shall lay the Order in Council on the Table.

COLONEL JOHN ALLISTER CURRIE, M.P.

STATEMENT BY SIR SAM HUGHES DENYING ALLEGATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

The Hon. Sir SAM HUGHES: I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has just been drawn to some remarks made in the House yesterday concerning Colonel

John Currie. The gentleman addressing the House said:

"I may tell him he was found up to his neck in a dugout when he should have been at the front leading his men."

This does not concern Colonel John Currie in any sense whatever. This story was told—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Unless the hon. gentleman wishes to deny or qualify some remark in respect to himself he is not in order in bringing this matter up on a question of privilege.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I will deny some remarks concerning myself. The next statement of the hon. gentleman was:

"When he came to this country looking for promotion the then Minister of Militia refused to give him promotion, because he was not entitled to it."

Neither of the two statements I have read is correct. I may say that I recommended Colonel Currie for promotion to the rank of Brigadier General. Owing to the fact that rumours had been passed around concerning him by his enemies, I had previously investigated them and found them absolutely without foundation in fact. There was no intention to hit Colonel Currie when these rumours were first started, but gossip soon gets going, and it was decided to hold up the recommendation until a full report was obtained. Subsequently I recommended his promotion to the rank of Brigadier General and he acted as Brigadier until recently. Later on, Colonel Currie complained in the House that he had not been decorated for his splendid service at the battle of St. Julien. That statement of his had no connection whatever, as I understand it, with my action in recommending him for promotion. I was not present when he made these remarks in the House, but judging by the Hansard report, he seemed to think that General Alderson and I should have recommended him for some decoration on the field. I explained in the House that I had nothing whatever to do with that, and would not think of interfering. So the statements made yesterday in the House concerning Colonel Currie and myself are absolutely without foundation.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. NEELY IN REFERENCE TO AN INTERVIEW WITH SIR CLIFFORD SIFTON CONTRADICTING STATEMENTS MADE BY THE LATTER.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): I wish to speak on a question of privilege. On Saturday last in the city of Chatham I made a statement in regard to a more or less public man in this country, not a member of this House but who was once a member of this House. I find in the Toronto Daily Star of September 10, that this gentleman, Sir Clifford Sifton, as politely as possible gives my statement the lie, and directly contradicts what I said at the public meeting referred to. My statement in the city of Chatham on Saturday last was that on the 8th day of June last I met Sir Clifford Sifton opposite his office in the city of Ottawa, and that he invited me to his office—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NEELY: I am giving the statement so that I may explain the denial Sir Clifford Sifton has made in which he charges me with misrepresenting the facts.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Neely) purposes to give denial to some statements made outside the House. I doubt if that is a question of privilege. If the statements were made in the House he would be quite in order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The hon. gentleman is calling attention to a statement in the newspapers. I think he has a right to do that.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it called in question his action as a public man, he would be in order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He says he made the statement in a speech which was reported in the newspapers. Then he finds another newspaper denying the statement he made. Do you not think he is entitled to establish the facts as they are? All this appeared in the public press. As a matter of fact, some time ago I corrected a statement made in a similar way.

Mr. SPEAKER: As a matter of general principle I desire to give every opportunity to an hon. member who rises to a question of privilege to make his statement, but as the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) proceeded, it appeared that he had reference to a difference between him and a gentleman who is not a member of this House. If the hon. member's action as a public man is called in question, he would be quite in order in explaining it.

Mr. NEELY: I was speaking as a public man, and I have been given the lie direct. That charge against my truthfulness has been published in the press throughout the country from coast to coast. The statement I made in Chatham on Saturday last was to the effect that on the 8th day of June Sir Clifford Sifton, in an interview with me, pronounced himself as against putting conscription into force in Canada at the present time. In the Toronto Star of September 10 he, Sir Clifford Sifton, is quoted as making the following statement with reference to that interview:

I said that I regretted very much there was likely to be a split on the subject of conscription, in which different portions of the country would be arraigned against each other, but that it was quite clear to me that the English-speaking Liberals in the House ought not to follow Sir Wilfrid Laurier on this question. Dr. Neely asked me what I thought they ought to do. I said that they ought to organize themselves and repudiate the stand taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and at the same time announce their intention of supporting conscription and supporting the Government in its war policy.

That gives me the direct lie as to the statement I made. I made this statement outside of the House, as a public man, so that I could not claim the protection of this Parliament in making it. In the statement I made I have the support of the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the member for Quebec West (Mr. Power) and the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin). The hon. member for Quebec West stated over his own signature that at or about the same time Sir Clifford Sifton expressed to him exactly the same views as he expressed to me, and instead of the statement that he had advised me to organize those who proposed to vote for conscription on this side of the House I say emphatically that Sir Clifford Sifton told me to get the so-called conscriptionist Liberals toogether and see if there was no common ground on which they could support the stand of the leader of the Opposition because that was the proper stand at the present time in this country.

As verification of what I say I have in my hand the signed statement of the hon. member for Quebec West which sets out that views similar to those expressed to me by Sir Clifford Sifton were expressed to him on the 7th day of June by the said Sir Clifford Sifton, and that it was proposed to him that he should give an interview to the editor of the Manitoba Free Press who was to be in Ottawa in a few days. The hon. member for Quebec West, whose views on this question have never swerved from the beginning, and who was against the application of conscription as everybody knows—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NEELY: I am giving my evidence to establish that my statement is correct. The hon. member for Quebec West agreed to give this interview and went to his home at the week end. While there on June 9 he received the following telegram:

Ottawa, Ont., June 9, 1917.

Hon. William Power, M.P., Quebec.

Find that no useful purpose will now be served by doing as suggested yesterday. Am leaving town tomorrow.

Clifford Sifton.

I make these statements because of the fact that this public man through a newspaper which he owns in the city of Winnipeg, the Manitoba Free Press——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member is going too far. He has been given opportunity to make a complete denial and to state his position, and I think he should be content.

Mr. NEELY: I was just going to say that it was because of misrepresentation previous to this as to the attitude of the conscriptionist Liberals in this House—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. NEELY: Then, I will leave that out. I would call your attention Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House, to this very remarkable admission on the part of Sir Clifford Sifton in his denial.

It is quite true, however, that in common with many others in favour of conscription at different times, I have in discussing the question, recognized the difficulty of enforcing it, and that it would have been desirable to have got recruits by voluntary enlistment if possible. In this respect my opinion does not differ from that of any other intelligent person familiar with political conditions in Canada.

So out of the mouth of my detractor I prove my own truthfulness.

EXPLOSION AT WATERFORD, N.S.—RELIEF OF DEPENDENTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): In the absence of the Prime Minister I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Labour to the following telegram which I have received:

Glace Bay, N.S., Sept. 10, 1917.

G. W. Kyte, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Would appreciate further effort from you secure Government contribution towards relief of dependents left by Waterford explosion. Telegraphed Sir Robert Borden to-day on this matter.

J. B. Maclachlan,
Secretary Amalgamated Mine Workers of Nova Scotia.

I would ask the Minister of Labour if the matter of providing funds for the relief of the dependents of those who were killed in that explosion has been considered by the Government.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Some time ago the matter was considered by the Government but the parties particularly interested replied that they did not desire any donation, inasmuch as the dependents of those men were fully protected by the company. Nothing has since been done by the Government.

EXPORT ON APPLES TO THE UNITED KINGDOM.

THE EMBARGO ON CANADIAN APPLES IN GREAT BRITAIN NOT TO BE REMOVED.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has any information with respect to the embargo against the importation of apples into the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I received a cable from the Secretary of State for the colonies in which he regrets that it is impossible to raise the embargo on apples. He says the matter was given very thorough and sympathetic consideration, but owing to financial and tonnage conditions it has been found impossible to give the permission that was asked for.

APPLICATION OF EX-PRIVATE JAMES SAUVE FOR PENSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL: I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp). As a member of the committee appointed by this House to investigate the treatment given to returned soldiers, my attention was called this morning to the case of ex-Private James Sauve, No. 144070, 38th Overseas battalion——

Mr. SPEAKER: A minister cannot possibly give an answer to a question with respect to one private out of thousands. I would ask the hon. member to place his question on the Order Paper in the ordinary course and he will get an answer.

Mr. MARCIL: I would ask the Minister of Militia and Defence if it is in the ordinary course for the department to allow a soldier, honourably discharged in Kingston on the 17th May, after good conduct and good service, to wait until this date in September before getting a pension of any kind.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The question which the hon. gentleman asked has reference to a matter which does not come under the Department of Militia and Defence, but I may say that a soldier receives his full pay until his pension is granted.

Mr. MARCIL: The Minister of Militia and Defence, having declared that he had nothing to do with pensions, would I be allowed to direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman who is now leading the House (Sir George Foster) to the case of a man discharged on the 17th May at Kingston and allowed to go until the 13th of September without having any attention paid to his application for a pension?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Would it not be well for my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) to write a letter giving the circumstances of the case and address it to the chairman of the Pensions Board? Ministers have a vast number of questions and a great deal of responsibility in reference to them, but my hon. friend must not try to load too much on the ministers. If he will get into direct communication with the chairman of the Pension Board and give the exact facts of the case, he will get his answer much quicker than by asking a question on the Orders of the Day.

NEW CANADIAN WAR LOAN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) when he will be in a position to give an official statement to the House concerning the new Canadian War Loan, which, it is rumoured in the press, will be placed on the market in October.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not my intention to make a statement to the House as to the forthcoming war loan. The terms and conditions of such a loan can only be determined shortly before the date of issue and it would not be possible for me, no matter how much I might desire to give the House the information, to make a statement at the present time. I may say, however, that the intention is that the loan shall be offered in November. Further than that I am unable to give any informaion.

EXPORT OF POTATOES.

MR. CARVELL SUGGESTS THE REMOVAL OF THE DUTY ON POTATOES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): A week or so ago I asked the Government if they would not consider the advisability of removing the duty on potatoes, the effect of which would be that our potatoes would have the right to enter the United States free of duty. I was promised consideration of the matter and I would now ask the minister if he is able to give an answer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The matter referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) is one relating to the tariff. Announcements of that kind are not discussed in advance for reasons which will be obvious to the House. I am unable to make any statement with respect to the matter except to say that any action the Government may take will be announced in due course. It is impossible for me to make a statement in reference to the matter at the present time.

Mr. CARVELL: If the Government could put wheat on the free list by Order in Council they could put potatoes on the free list in the same way. It would not need any tariff change.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. W. H. Bennett in the Chair.

Customs—Salaries and contingent expenses, further amount required, $350,000.

Mr. KYTE: The minister promised to give the names of the officers in my constituency who would benefit by this increase.

Mr. REID: The increases proposed are as follows: At Baddeck, D. J. Macrae receives $100; Mr. Macrae receives a salary of $750; John Larusic, of Aspey Bay, receives an increase of $50. At Ingonish, T. D. Curtis receives $100. At Iona, Edward MacNeill receives $100. At Little Narrows, D. B. McKay receives $50. At Munro's Point, Angus Carmichael receives $50. At New Campbellton, W. R. McKinnon receives $100; J. A. Bain, $50; J. J. Bain, $50; Duncan Carey, $50; Alexander Harton, $50. At Neil's harbour, Edward Dowling receives $50, and at Ste. Anne's, Donald McAulay receives $100, and Alexander McLeod, $60. At White Point, P. A. Mackintosh receives $50. At St. Peter's, C. M. Morrison receives $100, and at Arichat, A. F. Boudrot, $100. At D'Escousse, Felix Landry receives $50

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would the minister give the same information for Guysborough and Antigonish?

Mr. REID: The increases are as follows: At Canso, P. C. Cullen, collector, receives $100; E. M. Hurst receives $100. At Country Harbour, J. M. Milward receives $50; H. M. Scott receives $100. At Isaac's Harbour, Hugh McMillan receives $50. At Port Hillford, J. McConnell receives $50. These have been submitted to me for my consideration by the officers of the department, and I have not had time to go over them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there any increase in the office in Sherbrooke?

Mr. REID: M. J. Keating receives $100 and David Murray $100.

Mr. MARCIL: On what principle are the increases given?

Mr. REID: I have left it to the officers of the department. Men who are not really dependent on the office for their living, who receive $300 or $350 a year, receive increases of $50. Those depending almost entirely on their salaries for a living get $100.

Mr. McKENZIE: I asked for some information in reference to my constituency.

Mr. REID: That information is as follows: At Sydney and outports, P. C. Campbell gets $100; J. L. Bray, $100. Theodore Chisholm has enlisted and his case will have to stand for consideration until his return. A. D. Gillis receives $100; J. W. Kennedy, $100; Edward Macpherson, $100; Roderick McDonald, $100; A. A. McIsaac, $100; J. H. Scott, $100; A. W. Steacy, $100; James McPhee, $100; J. A. Richardson, $50; E. McGillivray receives $50, Anthony McDougall $100, and Joseph Orr $50. At Glace Bay there are three officers. A. P. O'Neill receives $100, and Daniel Keigan $100. Then we have N. F. McDonald, but he is overseas and nothing was done in his case. The understanding was that these men should get their salaries, in addition to their military pay, while overseas.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister give me the names and increases of the officials at North Sydney and Sydney Mines?

Mr. REID: T. L. Brennan, enlisted for overseas, so that his salary remains as it is until he returns. Then the following officers received an increase of $100: J. H. Cammeron, John Cogan, David Edwards, F. E. Jackson, J. J. McDonald, H. W. McNeil, James McLeod, Angus Young, E. A. MacNeil. Then there are some small increases: C. J. Jessome of Little Bras d'Or, $50; John Boutilier, $50; Robert Newton, $50; D. J. McGillivray, $30; Roderick McDonald, $200; James Peck, $100.

Mr. McKENZIE: What about the official at North Sydney?

Mr. REID: Joseph McPherson; he is receiving $1,600 and about $300 for extra time.

Mr. McKENZIE: His position is about the same as that of Mr. P. C. Campbell, and they ought to be getting about the same salary.

Mr. REID: I have not gone over all these items. The salary of the official at Sydney is more than the salary of the man at North Sydney. The official at North Sydney gets about $400 out of the Inland Revenue. He holds two positions there, Collector of Customs and Collector of Inland Revenue, so that his salary is really higher in proportion than the salary of the man at North Sydney. At all events this memorandum has been submitted to me and I have to give his case consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has only given me the answer in regard to part of my county. I asked him in regard to Antigonish and Guysborough. He gave me the answer with regard to Guysborough, but not with reference to Antigonish.

Mr. REID: I do not know what places are in Antigonish.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I want the increases.

Mr. REID: At Antigonish a man named W. C. Chisholm is receiving $100 increase. Then there are increases to the officials in four small places, Bayfield, Cape George, Harbour au Bouche and Malignant Cove, of $50 to the following officials: W. M. Strople, Alexander McDougall, Captain John Fraser, J. D. Chisholm.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What was the increase in each case?

Mr. REID: $50.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What about Harbour au Bouche?

Mr. REID: They are all $50.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What about the official in the town of Antigonish?

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. REID: There is just one man there, the collector, and he is getting $100 increase.

Mr. CARVELL: I should like to know the principle on which the increases are made. I would not offer any objection, if the increases were given to the men who are doing the work. In my constituency there are some officers who, I believe, are underpaid, and to whom a reasonable increase is a fair reward. I have other officers in my constituency who have never earned a dollar since they were appointed, who have never performed any services, and who hold the positions simply as rewards for political services, I would be very much obliged indeed, without publicly stating those who, in my opinion, are not earning anything, if the minister will give me the names of the officials in the port of Woodstock whose salaries have been increased. I will be able then to draw my own inference, and the people of the country will be able to arrive at their own conclusions.

Mr. REID: I really do not know the officers in the hon. gentleman's constituency. I am depending entirely on the official of the department for my information.

Mr. CARVELL: For that reason, I am not mentioning any names, but if the hon. minister will give us the names, we can easily make the application ourselves.

Mr. REID: In Woodstock proper we have three officers.

Mr. CARVELL: I think there must be a couple of dozen, taking in the outports.

Mr. REID: Does the hon. gentleman refer to the outports as well?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I am not concerned about the officers at Woodstock, I want to state publicly that, so far as the officers in the port of Woodstock proper are concerned, they are earning their salaries.

Mr. REID: These matters have been suggested to me. The collector at Woodstock, G. E. Balmain will receive $100 increase; Uriah Hanson, T. L. McCaffrey and G. A. Hooser will also receive $100 increase. Mr. Hoover's salary is $800. It is evidence that his whole time is taken up with the work. Then Robert Kelly, Aroostook Junction, receives an increase of $50. Mr. G. A. Giberson, Bath, receives no increase. Then there are no increases to the officials at Bloomfield, Centreville and Clair. The subcollector at Debec, Mr. J. R. Kirkpatrick receives an increase of $100.

Mr. CARVELL: What salary does that give him?

Mr. REID: His present salary is $850 and the increase will bring it to $950.

Mr. CARVELL: That official has done well during the last three years.

Mr. REID: His whole living depends on the customs work, and the commissioner thought that on account of the high cost of living that $850 was a small salary and suggested $100 increase. Then at Grand Falls, Mr. H. W. Taylor receives an increase of $100. Mr. J. B. Porter, at Lower Andover receives an increase of $50. Mr. W. H. Lindsay, of Richmond Road, receives $50. The official at St. Hilaire receives no increase. Then Joseph Desjardins, of St. Leonards, receives $100 increase, and J. J. Walsh, of the same place, receives $50 increase, J. G. Sirois, of Edmundston receives an increase of $100.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are other places in my riding I should like information about. What has the minister done at Sydney mines, Grand Narrows and Iona?

Mr. REID: I thought I read those out. At Sydney Mines, we propose giving James Peck an increase of $100.

Mr. McKENZIE: Are there not two officers at Sydney Mines?

Mr. REID: I think there is only one.

Mr. McKENZIE: The real officer at Sydney Mines is McDonald.

Mr. REID: Roderick McDonald. We purpose giving him an increase of $200. His name is on the list.

Mr. McKENZIE: What will that make his salary?

Mr. REID: $1,500 a year.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose that is little enough.

Mr. REID: At Grand Narrows there is E. A. McNeil whose present salary is $250. We purpose giving him an increase of $100. At Iona, there is Edward MacNeil, whose present salary is $250. We purpose giving him an increase of $100.

Mr. ROSS: What are the present salaries of the officers at Glencoe, Park Hill and Strathroy, and what increases are the officers there receiving?

Mr. REID: At Glencoe, there is J. A. Jones, whose present salary is $800. We purpose giving him an increase of $100. At Park Hill, there is a D. J. Gray, whose present salary is $850. We purpose giving him an increase of $100. At Strathroy, there is W. H. Murray, whose present salary is $250. We purpose giving him an increase of $100, making his salary $1,200.

Mr. ROSS: Who was the former officer at Park Hill?

Mr. REID: I have not the book here. If my memory serves me aright, the Park Hill office was held by a man who was formerly a member of this House or of the local legislature, and he had the post office and the customs office together. Of late years they have been separated.

Mr. ROSS: Just for one year.

Mr. REID: This man died only a short time ago. Prior to his death, complaints were made, and it was requested that the two offices should be separated. The combination was not satisfactory to any one. The officer would be occupied part of the time as postmaster and part of the time as customs officer. When he was in the post office, the work of the customs office would be neglected. At his death, we appointed the present officer at a salary of $850. I could not say what the salary of the former officer was. But when the two offices were combined, the two salaries together were less than they would be if the positions were held by different men.

Mr. KYTE: Will the minister give me the present salaries of the sub-collectors at River Bourgeois, Petit de Grat Bridge and L'Ardoise?

Mr. REID: W. S. Boyd is the present officer at River Bourgeois. His salary is $250. We purpose giving him an increase of $50. At Petit de Grat there is James Le Blanc, whose salary is $250. We purpose giving him an increase of $50. At L'Ardoise here is W. S. Brymer, whose present salary is $250. We purpose giving him an increase of $50.

Mr. KYTE: All those sub-collectors are receiving the same increase?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: Are the officers at Hawkesbury receiving an increase?

Mr. REID: I have not that here. There are only two officers at Hawkesbury.

Mr. PROULX: Dr. R. P. Pattel is the sub-collector.

Mr. REID: He holds two positions there.

Mr. PROULX: No, he is only the sub-collector.

Mr. REID: I have not that here.

Mr. PROULX: There is from the minister's town a Mr. Edmond, who is the assistant.

Mr. ROBB: I did not hear the minister make a general statement. Does this increase apply to all customs officers throughout Canada?

Mr. REID: In June and July last, we had a small amount left over that we used to give increases, and there are men who got increases then that are probably not on the present list. But the commissioner and his officials have gone over every officer from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and they have been increasing the smaller salaries more on account of the high cost of living. For instance, if a man is receiving a salary of $800 or $900, we have increased it by $100 if his living depends entirely upon the position. The amount in the estimates would give an increase of only about $75 to every official, so that we could not take them all in. We are giving some of them $100 and some of them $50. We are making it go as far as we can, and we are giving the largest increase to those whose living depends entirely on the position.

Mr. ROBB: Has the minister given due regard to length of service? If a man has been in the service a long time, is he given preference over those who have come in recently?

Mr. REID: Yes, that is taken into consideration by the officials. So far as the customs service as a whole is concerned, the commissioner and his staff have been dealing very fairly with them. The system I am carrying out is just what my predecessors in the Customs Department have done in the past. The commissioner and his staff make out a list, and it is almost entirely followed.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister give us a sample of what he has done in Quebec, for instance, in Bonaventure county, let us say, in Paspebiac?

Mr. REID: They are suggesting that E. W. LeGallais get an increase of $100, Joseph Beaudin an increase of $50, H. D. L. McKenzie an increase of $100, and Thomas Enright an increase of $50.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about Magdalen Islands?

Mr. REID: C. F. Painchaud and Camille Delaney get an increase of $100.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mines and Geological Survey—Compassionate allowance to the widow of the late C. W. Drysdale, M.Sc., Ph.D., who was drowned while in the discharge of his duties on July 10, 1917, $5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was he an old officer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, he entered the service in 1913. He was a university graduate of McGill, and took a post graduate course somewhere in the south. His salary at the time of his appointment was $1,600.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has he left many children?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Three children, all under four years of age. He was an exceptionally capable officer. The references to his work out in the western mining camps are really remarkable. He achieved a great deal for the Government. A short time before his death he was offered a much more lucrative position with a western mining company on account of the services that they knew he had rendered in British Columbia, but feeling that it was his duty to complete the work he was engaged on for the Government, he declined, and was promised an advance in rank on that account. At the time of his death he was receiving $2,300 a year. On the 10th of July last, in the performance of his duties, while travelling by pack train from Cochrane to the Windermere area of British Columbia, he was drowned while trying to cross the Kootenay river. His widow is left with very little indeed, except for a small amount of insurance.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Now that the estimates of the Secretary of State are under discussion, I have a small matter to bring to his attention, as I understand it comes under his department. Some twelve or fourteen years ago it was thought well by the citizens of Brantford to erect a memorial for the purpose of suitably commemorating the invention of the telephone, and perpetuating the memory of its inventor, Dr. Bell. The citizens got together and elected the following board of directors, which was afterwards incorporated by provincial charter in 1906 as the Bell Telephone Memorial Association: W. F. Cockshutt, M.P. (President); Lloyd Harris (vice-president); W. N. Andrews; E. L. Goold; M. K. Halloran; Geo. Kippax; G. H. Muirhead; T. H. Preston, M.P.P.; F. D. Reville; A. J. Wilkes, K.C.; C. H. Waterous; John Muir (treasurer); Geo. Hately (secretary). A prospectus was issued, and we waited on the late Government in the year 1906; I think it was. My right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, was good enough to listen to our request, and grant us $10,000 towards the erection of a memorial. I presume it is so long ago that hon. gentlemen may have forgotten but we appreciate the gift all the same. I have here a record of the public bodies that contributed.

The Parliament of the Dominion of Canada gave $10,000, the legislature of the province of Ontario gave $2,000, the legislature of the province of Quebec gave $1,000, the city of Brantford gave $5,000, the county of Brant gave $500, the city of Toronto gave $500 and the city of Quebec gave $100. We have been upwards of ten years working on this memorial, and I am pleased to state to the House that it is now complete and that His Excellency the Governor General will be in Brantford on October 24 next to unveil the monument. I desire to take this opportunity of inviting my right hon. friend the leader of the Government and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to be present with us on that occasion. I think it will be acknowledged by all that the invention of the telephone is one of the greatest inventions of modern times. It is more in ordinary use as a commercial enterprise and for social intercourse than any other instrument. Dr. Bell is a man of the highest standing as a scientist. He is now a resident of Washington, but spends the greater part of his summers in the Maritime Provinces at a place called Baddeck. Dr. Bell was a resident of Brantford during the early part of his career. His father lived there for about twenty years, and the son who was teaching at Boston used to pay frequent and long visits to Brantford. It was on one of these occasions the telephone was invented, in the year 1874. I think this is worthy of your attention, because the United States has made a persistent effort to claim that the telephone was invented in that country. They have set up a memorial in Boston to that effect. However, we have the statement of the inventor under his own hand that the invention originated and was developed in Brantford, Ontario, Canada, in the year 1874, and that the first long distance transmissions of speech over a telephone wire or telegraph wire were made in the neighbourhood of the city of Brantord, one from Mount Pleasant to Brantford, a distance of five miles, and the other from Paris to Brantford, a distance of seven miles.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend describe the memorial?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I will give a description of the memorial in a minute or two. I want to establish the fact that we are not making any claim which is not absolutely borne out by the facts. There are hundreds of persons living in Brantford at the present time who were present at the first experiments and who know that the invention originated in the city of Brantford. Therefore we have for nearly thirty years past called ourselves the Telephone City. The old homestead of the inventor is still there and has been acquired as part of the memorial. Originally half a mile of wire was strung around the house under the eaves, and the inventor telephoned to himself sitting in his own room. That was the first experiment. After that the wires were run along a rail fence for about a mile, and then attached on telegraph poles, and taken into the city of Brantford. Then the two long distance messages I have mentioned, one from Mount Pleasant to Brantford and the other from Paris to Brantford were sent. I think we are entitled to claim that Brantford is the telephone city par excellence of the North American continent, that the telephone was invented there, and that it is a matter of no small public interest to the Dominion that Canada should be recognized as the home of the invention of the telephone, which is one of the greatest of modern inventions. I have before me a recent report which was submitted to the directors on September 10, 1917. Perhaps I cannot do better than read a brief extract from it:

> The monument has been completed in accordance with the agreement made with the sculptor, Mr. W. S. Allward, dated September 28, 1909.

He has been engaged on this great work for upwards of eight years.

> The monument is composed of Stanstead granite with bronzes as follows. Two heroic figures representing humanity sending and receiving messages, at the left and right, and a large centre panel in relief, containing five figures, representing "Man" discovering his power to transmit sound through space, with a figure over him representing "Intelligence," and three floating figures representing three messengers, "Knowledge, Joy and Sorrow." Under this panel is inscribed in the granite: "To commemorate the invention of the telephone by Alexander Graham Bell in Brantford in 1874." In the rear of the monument is a granite fountain, and the whole is bounded by a circle of granite.

The association has raised almost $60,000, including the subscriptions I have read. Many distinguished men, although not contributing very largely, have sent us subscriptions, and have placed on record their appreciation of what we were doing. Inasmuch as they are mostly public men perhaps you would permit me to read the following expressions of opinion which we have received from several who are well known in Canada:

Duke of Argyle: I fully sympathize with the desire of the citizens of Brantford to have a memorial to the eminent inventor of the telephone. I shall hope to see it when again in Brantford, for I look back with pleasure to my last visit.

Earl of Minto: Hope that great success will crown your efforts to do honour to Professor Bell and his wonderful invention.

Earl Grey: The suggestion is a most excellent one, and will be glad to give it his hearty support.

Lord Strathcona: I fully enter into the spirit of the proposal for commemorating the invention of the telephone by Professor Graham Bell, and it would give me pleasure to have my name associated with it, and to aid in the matter to the best of my ability.

Sir W. Mortimer Clark: Expresses cordial approval of the scheme proposed.

Hon. J. P. Whitney: Already in Brantford you have appropriately commemorated in the Brant Memorial a historical fact in which Britons everywhere take great pride, viz.—the loyalty of the Six Nations to the British flag in the Revolutionary war. Your present enterprise is likewise of more than local interest, and we, as a people, have reason to congratulate ourselves that the first experiments with the telephone were made on Canadian soil near your thriving city.

Hon. Geo. W. Ross: I had the pleasure, perhaps I should say the honour, of speaking through the first long-distance telephone invented by Professor Bell, from his residence in the city of Brantford to his father's residence at Tutela Heights. I think it was in 1874. The telephone was regarded then as the production of a clever inventor calculated to interest the curious and novelty-loving people, but no one dreamed of its possibilities for commercial purposes. I think you are doing no more than is eminently proper to place on record your appreciation of the invention and the inventor in his connection as a resident of your beautiful city.

Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, U.S.A.: I am well acquainted with Dr. Bell, and am one of his admirers. I believe him to be one of the greatest scientists of the age, whose invention had done more to facilitate the spread of intelligence than that of any other man, living or dead. He is at this time absent from Washington, being at the University of Edinburgh, where he is to receive an honourary degree. I am pleased to see the Canadians taking this step towards honouring him. If there is anything I can do to facilitate the movement to honour him, I shall certainly be glad to do it.

Admiral Dewey: This project seems to me a very worthy one, and I gladly comply with your request that I permit the use of my name as one of the American patrons of the association.

John Joy Edson, Washington: In Washington, where Mr. Bell has resided for many years, the highest possible value is placed on his services rendered to the world as the inventor of the telephone.

Mr. Bell is esteemed also in Washington as a scholar and a great scientist and benefactor in many ways. Moreover, he is beloved by all in Washington who are fortunate in having enjoyed his personal acquaintance, and who have been his guests.

And last but not least I wish to place on record the appreciation of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, now King George the Fifth:

Ottawa, 13th September, 1904.

Sir:—

The application of the Bell Telephone Memorial Association as contained in your letter of the 27th June last for the patronage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales having been referred to the Governor General from the Colonial office, His Excellency was pleased to recommend it to the favourable consideration of His Royal Highness; and at the request of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, His Excellency now desires me to inform you that His Royal Highness is very glad to accede to the request of the association for his patronage.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

C. J. Jones,

For the Governor General's Secretary.

W. F. Cockshutt, Esq., Chairman,
Bell Telephone Memorial Association,
Brantford, Ont.

From this you will see that the present King, then the Prince of Wales, became one of the patrons and we have as distinguished a list of persons as has ever extended their patronage to any memorial in the Dominion of Canada. The list is as follows:

Patrons:

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales; His Excellency the Earl of Minto, Viceroy of India; His Excellency the Earl Grey, Governor General of Canada; the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Stamford, New England Company; the Hon. Sir W. Mortimer Clark, Lieutenant Governor of Ontario; the Hon. J. P. Whitney, Premier of Ontario; the Hon. Geo. W. Ross, Senator; Sir Thomas G. Shaughnessy, President of the Canadian Pacific Railway; Hon. Jas. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, U.S.A., Washington, D.C.; Hon. W. Murray Crane, Senator U.S.A., Washington, D.C.; John Joy Edson, Esq., Washington, D.C.; Hon. George Dewey, the Admiral of the Navy, U.S.A., Washington, D.C.; O. P. Letchworth, Esq., Buffalo, N.Y.

These are the names of the persons who have associated themselves with us and I am now pleased to inform this House and the country that the monument has been completed. It is a work of art second to none in Canada. I want to extend most heartily an invitation to all the members of this House and to all the senators, if they will come, and especially to members of the Government and the leader of the Opposition under whose auspices this vote was given, to come to the city of Brantford on the 24th October next and help us to celebrate this epoch in the history of the city of Brantford and also commemorating the fact that Canada is the home of the invention of the telephone by Dr. Bell in 1874. Although Dr. Bell is a Scotchman by birth, his early days were spent in Canada and his father for upwards of twenty years was a resident here. I am sure that Canada will do itself honour in joining with us in celebrating this great event.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to say a word about the observations of my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). The gentleman to whom he refers is a constituent of mine and we are usually glad to claim anything that is coming to us by way of honour. I have had the pleasure of his personal acquaintance and I have been more than once the guest of the distinguished gentleman to whom my hon. friend from Brantford has referred. Dr. Bell and his good wife and family are well known and highly honoured in the county of Victoria. Dr. Bell is not only recognized in our part of the country as a great scientist but as a great man in every walk of life. He is a philanthropist of the first order and although now an American citizen, he, his wife, and family, have done everything they possibly could do in the promotion of every interest of the war since the war broke out. I have no doubt that although true to the country of his adoption, his heart fondly lingers with his old friends in Scotland, in England, and in that part of Canada which he now makes his home for the most part of the year. Dr. Bell has the distinction of being the inventor of the telephone. He has also had much to do with the progress of aviation in its early stages in this country. I had the good fortune seventeen or eighteen years ago of being in his laboratory at Bein Braigh, as he calls his place at Baddeck, when he was conducting his early experiments on the invention of the flying machine. Later on, when these experiments had been developed, we had the satisfaction in Baddeck of seeing a flying machine passing over the country giving a practical demonstration of the correctness of Dr. Bell's theories with regard to aviation. In his school started this young man, McCurdy, who has given great service to the country in connection with the war and who is giving great service now. It would be impossible in a short time to do justice to the history of this great man, Dr. Bell. I am glad indeed that the hon. member for Brantford has brought up the matter in the House in the way in which he has done, so that in a small way we may be able to do justice to the reputation of one of our greatest men and one who has conferred perhaps as much benefit upon the human race as any other man who has ever lived. I have much pleasure in associating myself with the hon. member for Brantford in everything he has said about the services, reputation, achievements, and life of the distinguished man about whom he has spoken.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Before we leave the Department of the Secretary of State, may I be permitted to ask him if there has been any relaxation of the rule about women crossing the Atlantic? Last May there was an embargo placed upon them sailing in passenger steamers and there have been a number of inquiries as to whether leave could be given to women who wanted to go across to Britain. I understand there is a rule but I do not understand how it is applied or whether it is universal or whether there are any grounds upon which an applicant may get leave to go.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The rule is very strict. I am not sure that I can precisely state it. There have to be very special reasons indeed to enable the authorities to permit a woman to cross the Atlantic. The British Government put in force a regulation to the effect that none can go except with the consent of the Canadian Government. I do not know if they stated to us just the reasons that would warrant us in giving consent but their great desire is that it be granted as rarely as possible and only in cases where real hardship would exist if it were refused. There has been no relaxation of the rule. What it was at first, it is the same now. My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) would be able to better state it than I because he has had more to do with the administration of it. But I might give an instance of the way the rule does apply. The British Government appointed a Toronto University professor—Professor McLennan—on the board of scientific research over there, a board similar to the one we have established here. It is a more or less permanent appointment, at all events, a war appointment, but under the rule which existed and which still exists, his wife was not given a passport to go. That is about as extreme a case as I know of. I thought it was quite an extraordinary thing. There has been no relaxation that I have heard of and I am satisfied there has been none at all.

Senate.

Travelling expenses of Senate members of the Parliamentary Committee appointed to consider the care, etc., of returned soldiers, $142.95; to provide an amount for the Speaker of the Senate in lieu of residence and attendants from January 18, 1917, to the close of the session, at the rate of $15 per diem, $3,345; to provide for the payment of the full sessional indemnity of a senator who died during the present session, $2,500.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as the first item is concerned, I presume that is all right. We know that the members were on the committee, and I have nothing to say. The second item seems fairly generous, but I shall not discuss it.

Mr. REID: This item is, of course, to compensate for the quarters which the Speaker formerly had.

Mr. CARVELL: Then there is a question about the third item, for a senator who died during the present session. I have been making inquiries about that, and I think that three senators have died during the session. As an act of justice, I should like to see the full sessional indemnity paid to the wife of the senator from New Brunswick, who died during this session.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is the usual item in such cases, and while I am unable to give details and names, I am quite sure that there is no possibility of there being any discrimination as between members of the Senate who died during the session. I understand that there is to be a further supplementary estimate, and I will undertake to get full information from the Senate so as to satisfy my hon. friend upon that point when the items are under consideration at a later stage.

With respect to the second item, which the hon. member for Carleton passed over lightly, the amount is very much larger this session than it would be in anything like a normal session. At the allowance of $15 per day in a normal session, this would come to a very much smaller amount because this item covers the period of recess. I intended to make reference to this in case we had any discussion upon a similar item in the estimates for this House. Even with the amount as it appears in the estimates of this year, I do not believe that from the monetary point of view it affords an equivalent to the Speaker for the loss to him of his quarters, and attendance, and the perquisites which obtained when we were in our old quarters in the Parliament Buildings. From another point of view it by no means affords a compensation, because members can hardly appreciate the worry upon the Speaker in quarters such as we have here, being constantly in attendance and with no conveniences, and having to change his clothing four times per day, besides losing a large amount of time going to and from the House during the recess periods.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Whatever garb he may wear the Speaker is always very genial, he is the highest type of a gentleman.

Mr. CARVELL: The question would be whether that bouquet was for our Speaker or the Speaker of the other House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh, it is for our Speaker.

Mr. CARVELL: If it is for our Speaker, I wish to second it. But I think we were discussing the Speaker of the Senate. I shall be very glad if the Government or our Speaker will furnish me with details for which I have asked respecting the indemnities of deceased senators, because if the full indemnity be not paid to the family to whom I referred, it would be a great injustice, as compared to the treatment given to the families of deceased members of both Houses of Parliament in the past.

I do not know that we want to inject into this debate a question of policy, but I gathered from His Honour's remarks that he would be in favour of having the Speaker's quarters retained in the New House. There has been some discussion in the press and quite a lot of agitation in favour of abolishing the residence of the Speaker in both the Senate and the House of Commons. Never having occupied that high and honourable position, and not expecting to, I do not know much about it and have not much feeling for it. But, as no doubt, the interior arrangements in the new Parliament Buildings will be fairly well settled before Parliament meets again, it might be well if the Government or the committee who have charge of the re-erection of these buildings would take into consideration this very important question whether there are to be residences in the Parliament buildings for the Speakers. I am perhaps becoming old enough to support time-honoured customs unless they are shown to be based on error, and if there is room enough in the new buildings I am inclined to believe it would be as well to continue the residences.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am older than my hon. friend. I have had forty years parliamentary experience, and I hope that Mr. Speaker, whether for himself or his successors, will see that the new buildings have apartments for the Speakers. It would be most inconvenient, in my judgment, for the incumbent of that high office not to have his residence in the premises. When the House sits until five o'cclock in the morning it is most inconvenient for the Speaker to go to his lodgings outside of the House. Moreover, it is more convenient for him to have his office in the building, his lodging there, his family there. In my experience I never found any inconvenience arising from the custom; on the contrary, I found great convenience from the Speaker having his lodgings under the roof of the Parliament Buildings. It is the practice in England, and I should be sorry to depart from it. I do not know the views of the present Speaker, but I hope he will agree with me.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I was going to suggest, as the matter is being discussed in the press and the country and also to some extent among the members, that it would be a good idea to get an expression of opinion upon this question from the present Speaker, and also from hon. gentlemen who who have been Speakers in the past.

It seems to me their opinion, as they know the conditions, would be better than the opinion of others. As I understood the remarks of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I think it would be a good thing to have the residence of the Speaker in the new House of Commons, unless there be some very serious objection. I rise to ask if the present Speaker would care to make any suggestion as to what he thought would be the proper arrangement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in thorough accord with the remarks of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman from Carleton, and I may say to the hon. gentleman from Souris that I am pleased to give my views upon this matter. I should think, from the point of view of the Speaker, it would be a very great hardship if there were no Speaker's house. I am a young man, and, I think, of average physical vigour, but I have felt the strain of the constant attendance, hour by hour, during the present session, and I am sure an older man would feel it in a very marked degree. The Speaker must change his clothing at the dinner hour, and when he comes to the House prior to the opening of the sitting, and when the House closes at night. That may not seem a very serious matter, but when you realize that you have to do that four times a day, and drive to an outside residence in all conditions of weather, it becomes somewhat tiresome and troublesome during the long sessions. There is the further fact that hon. gentlemen can get pairs upon all occasions, and go home to their families or to social engagements, but the Speaker is debarred from that, and must be always present.

There is another aspect which, I think, is of even greater importance; it is this: there is an atmosphere about the office of Speaker which I would be sorry to see this Parliament lose. There is a dignity and importance attached to the office in Great Britain which we, of course, cannot hope to attain in Canada, but which we should emulate. I am not referring to the social feature, but to the added dignity that lends itself to the office of Speaker when he has an official residence. There is also the circumstance that hon. gentlemen of varying shades of political opinion have the opportunity to foregather in the Speaker's house from time to time, which tends towards more pleasant and friendly relationship between the members, and as members thus come to know each other better, it, in my opinion, elevates the love of public life. My own view is—and I have given the matter very careful thought—that it would be a mistake to try to adjust the space in the new building to suit the requirements of the Speaker's House. In the first place, the ceilings are too high. It is doubtful if the partitions could be properly arranged to afford suitable accommodation. My view is that it would be a wise thing to erect an individual house for the Speaker on the edge of the cliff, which could be, while a separate house, joined with the main Parliament building by an arch-way or arcade of Gothic design in consonance with the building itself. By such a construction you would have all the advantages of an individual house for the Speaker. You would have convenient access to the Chamber. From an architectural viewpoint, it would add materially to the appearance of the buildings on the hill, because it is just a question whether, as the building now stands, it is not too rectangular. The Speaker's residence would break off, and rather improve, the perspective, looking at the hill from a distance. I have discussed this feature with Mr. Pearson, who is, of course, a very competent architect, and who has splendid artistic taste, and he is in thorough accord with my suggestion. It would cost more to do this than to arrange quarters in the new building, but, as against that, you would have the added space in the new building, and, after all we are erecting buildings which ought to be suitable to the business of the Dominion for centuries. Bearing that in mind, it seems to me, for all it would cost to build a separate house for the Speaker, that that would be the ideal thing to do, and I sincerely hope that my suggestion in that respect will meet with the approval of hon. members.

To appoint Mr. M. F. Johnston to the Second Division, subdivision A, at $2,000 per annum, as reporter on the Committee Section of the Reporting Branch of the House of Commons, from September 1, 1917, $1,166.67.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a case which the Civil Service Commission are entirely responsible for, and I may say, with all respect to that body, if they had seen their duty as I think they ought to have seen it, this item would not of necessity have appeared in the estimates at all. I might say in explanation that last session when the Senate re-organized its debates reporting staff, it was arranged that Mr. Johnston who had been one of the Senate reporters for 25 years, should be transferred to the Commons Committee reporting staff, to fill an existing vacancy. It was assumed that a certificate would be given by the Civil Service Commission. Mr. Shortt refused to issue a certificate but Mr. Larochelle wrote approving the appointment of Mr. Johnston on his fitness and qualification. The letter from Mr. Larochelle is attached.

Mr. Johnston was engaged for over two months this session reporting the committees of the Commons, and for nine weeks reporting the debates in the House, in both of which positions he gave satisfaction.

Recommendations as to Mr. Johnston's qualifications for the position on the committees staff were furnished by the editor of Hansard and the associate editor, and by the chief of the committee reporters, and Mr. Holland, late chief of the Senate reporting staff.

In their recommendation, the editors of Hansard state that Mr. Johnston's appointment "would be in the interest of efficiency in the service."

Mr. Johnston has been for many years official reporter in the Ontario courts, and has had wide experience in such work. The appointment is to fill a vacancy; it does not add to the establishment or the charge on the revenue. It was assumed that under section 21 of the Amended Civil Service Act the Civil Service Commission would grant the necessary certificate, but for reasons which I know not, they refused to do so. In a letter to the Clerk of this House, Mr. La Rochelle, the other member of the Civil Service Commission, writes:

Sir:—

In answer to your letter of the 25th instant, concerning the proposed appointment of Mr. Fiske Johnston to the Committee Reporting Branch of the House of Commons, I may say that I have carefully considered this matter, and that I believe this gentleman fully qualified to fill such a position.

The Civil Service Commission has been furnished with statements and testimonials from the heads of the reporting staffs of the Senate and the House of Commons, establishing that Mr. Johnston possesses to a high degree the qualifications required to efficiently fill the position to which it is proposed to appoint him, and, furthermore, that for more than twenty years he has been actually discharging with the utmost satisfaction duties similar to those attaching to the position in question.

It is true that, as a general rule, the Civil Service Commission issues certificates of qualification for positions in the inside service only after actual tests of qualification, but, on the other hand, section 21 of the Amended Civil Service Act (1908) provides that in certain cases of a professional, technical or peculiar character, where it is satisfied that a person recommended for appointment is fully qualified, such examination may be dispensed with. And I am to state that in my opinion the present case is clearly one where an examination may be dispensed with and that the certificate required for the appointment of Mr. Johnston may very properly be granted by the Civil Service Commission.

You will understand, of course, that my opinion is not shared by my colleague and that as a result of our disagreement no certificate can legally issue under the law.

This is a case in which, if we did not take this action, a very grave injustice would be done to a very competent official of this House, and, under the circumstances, I am quite sure the committee will pass the item.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a deadlock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: The Government provided some years ago for the appointment of a third member of the Civil Service Commission. If that appointment had been made this deadlock would have been avoided.

Mr. SPEAKER: I quite agree with the hon. member for Bonaventure, but that is a subject over which I have no control.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As we are speaking of the debates—and Mr. Johnston belongs to the Debates Branch—

Mr. SPEAKER: The Committee Reporting staff.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I might, perhaps, here interject a few remarks about the French translation of Hansard. There has been a marked improvement in the management of the French translation staff. The committee will remember that some years ago I and the hon. member for Bonaventure and a few others who took a deep interest in having a proper translation brought the matter before the House, and changes were made, but, unfortunately, the Speaker who then occupied the Chair did not seem anxious to meet our views. In fact, he followed his own inclination, and as he had, I suppose, no great sympathy for the French translation, matters went from bad to worse. I am bound to say, however, that since the appointment of Mr. Leon Gérin as head of the French staff, we have had excellent translation of Hansard. At the same time, we have had the French Hansard distributed to members practically at the same time as the English version, with, perhaps, a few hours or a day between. A little delay does not matter, however, provided we have a good translation. My hon. frfiend the Speaker will realize that Hansard is sent to public Libraries in Europe, to countries such as France, Belgium, Switzerland and even Italy. In Europe, the people who have to consult our debates will naturally read the French version, because they are more familiar with the French language than with the English. We, who profess to have some love for the French language and who are interested in the culture of it, are rather jealous of that translation. Mr. Leon Gérin is a well-known litterateur, and he has had a long experience in the departments before becoming head of the French translation staff. For many years he was the secretary of the Hon. Sir A. R. Angers when he was Minister of Agriculture, and as a technical translator he has possibly no superior in the country. He has, on one or two occasions, been the President of the French Section of the Royal Society, and he is one of the French Canadian writers best known outside of Canada. In fact he very often writes in reviews published in France. But there is always a fly in the ointment. My hon. friend the Speaker will realize that the head of a staff should be protected against the intrigues of his subordinates. The orders which he gives and the discipline which he must exercise in his department should be sanctioned, and it should be the duty of both the Speaker and the Clerk of the House to see that that authority is maintained. It is so easy with translators, who generally have served in journalism, to take liberties with discipline, that it would be a pity if that staff, which has been so well reorganized, should lose its strength. I do not make any charge or accusation against any one, but it has happened that one member of that staff, whom I will not name, has simply discarded the authority of Mr. Gérin. I know Mr. Gérin well. I beg the Speaker of the House to see that his authority is respected, because the moment there is a flaw in the management of that office, it will go to pieces as it did a few years ago. As it is organized to-day, it is as near perfection as possible. I want the protection of the Speaker and of the Clerk of the House, both eminent gentlemen and men who value discipline, to see that Mr. Gérin's authority is respected within his own department.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am very glad to hear the words of commendation from the hon. member for Rouville. I cannot speak from my own knowledge as to the value of the work of the translators, but I know the opinion generally expressed is that this work, in the past has not been done as well as it ought to have been done, and while some improvement has been made, there is room for greater improvement still. So far as my ability permits, I shall be only too glad to render every effort to that end. On the point the hon. member has raised as to the authority of one in charge of a branch, my experience in the business world before I had any experience in politics has taught me that it is an axiom of successful business management that you must give your foreman complete charge in the sphere of his duties, and that you must back him up while he is in authority. If it comes to a point of conflict between your foreman and those who are under him, you must choose as between your foreman and those who are under him, and it simply means that either the foreman remains, or his usefulness is done and he must go. So far as Mr. Gérin is concerned, his services have been eminently satisfactory. While I happen to be Speaker he will always receive from me full sympathy and support along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I ask if anything has been done towards helping the elevator men in the building? My hon. friend has been very kind to the messengers, but the elevator men are after us nearly every day. They give us a lift, and they think we ought to give them a lift in their salaries. Of course, we have no influence with the Government, but I thought I would bring to my hon. friend's attention the fact that these men are appealing to us. Remember also that the high cost of living pinches the poor man more than the rich.

Mr. SPEAKER: This matter has not been brought to my attention before. I think these men come under the Public Works Department.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But the Speaker is their spokesman.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will make inquiries about the matter.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And about the messengers too.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

To appoint Miss M. J. Barton to Third Division, Subdivision A, at $1,000 per annum as a clerk in the Law Branch, $1,000.

Mr. SPEAKER: I object as much as any member of the House to promoting officials by Act of Parliament as against the Civil Service Commission, but there are certain cases where a grave injustice would be done if a special vote were not arranged for. I cited a case only a moment ago, and I have now before me the case of Miss Barton, whom it is proposed to appoint to subdivision A at a salary of $1,000, as a clerk in the Law Branch. I cannot put the case better than by reading a memorandum prepared on the subject by Mr. Gisborne, the Parliamentary Counsel:

Miss Marietta Barton passed the Civil Service examination under the law in force before the amending Act of 1908 and came first in the examination at which she passed. She was first employed on the House of Commons staff in 1908, and since that time was employed during the sessions on the House of Commons staff, and during the recess in various departments. I was appointed Parliamentary Counsel in the autumn of 1913, and Miss Barton came to my staff as my secretary in July, 1914, and she has been continuously employed in that position ever since. She is not only able to do my shorthand and other clerical work, but is also able skilfully and intelligently to look after the large amount of legal drafting that I have to do, as well as other legal work in the office. Unfortunately, she is now past the age at which she can go up for examination under the new law, but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, I would ask that her name be put in the Supplementary Estimates as a clerk in grade 3a, at a salary of $1,000. She has been receiving pay at the rate of $900 for some years past. I would point out that I have, since my appointment, dropped two clerkships from my branch, one at $2,000, which was then vacant, and one at $1,400 caused by the death in action of the late Mr. John L. Godwin, so that the appointment would not involve any enlargement of the organization of the branch. I am particularly anxious to have this proposal carried out, as Miss Barton is now only on the temporary staff and her loss would be a serious blow to the efficiency of my office.

(Sgd.) Francis H. Gisborne.

I can bear testimony to the ability, efficiency and industry of the Parliamentary Counsel, and in view of his representations I felt it my duty to ask that this vote be included in the estimates.

Mr. CARVELL: The Speaker states that this lady has reached an age where she cannot appear before the Civil Service Commission for examination. Would a similar vote to this have to be taken every year for this appointment?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that this makes her a permanent official, and that from now on she will be in the same position in all respects as if she had been placed in the same grade by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CARVELL: Then she is appointed to the position by Act of Parliament?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is what it amounts to.

Mr. CARVELL: Once she is appointed by Act of Parliament, is her status any different from that of a clerk appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SPEAKER: They are in precisely the same position, I understand.

To provide a service of stenography and typewriting for the use of members—further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would call the attention of His Honour and that of the committee to the fact that $25,000 was voted in the main estimates for this purpose, and now an amount of $15,000 is being asked for, which makes $40,000 altogether. How many employees come under this head, and what is the salary paid to each?

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret I cannot give exact information at the moment, as some of my papers have become misplaced, but speaking from memory, I think there are, at the present time, 42 stenographers for the use of members. The salaries vary slightly, but in the main the stenographers get $75 a month during the session. If the hon. member desires exact information on this point, I shall be very happy to send it to him in the course of the day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The reason I ask is that I think it is worthy of consideration whether or not there should be a change in the system. I am speaking of my own individual case, and my remarks may not have any weight with other members. I occupy a room with three other ex-ministers, and I do not find it at all convenient to have my work done by a member of the stenographic staff. I find it much more convenient to employ a private stenographer, whom I have to pay for the work I have done. I really think it would be very much better if an allowance, nothing like $1,000 per annum or $75 per month, but something like $400 per annum, was made to the members, and let them arrange for their own secretarial work. There is another objection. Many members have private correspondence to attend to, and for that reason it would be much more satisfactory to have their own stenographers. I throw out this suggestion for the consideration of hon. members. I had the opportunity some time ago of speaking with His Honour on this subject, which I think is well worthy of consideration. The amount which is paid out, $40,000, is very large, and I really think that half of this amount allowed to the members would enable them to get their stenographic work done much more satisfactorily than under the present system. I do not wish to make any reflection upon the work which the stenographers have done. I think they are very competent and that their work is satisfactory, but in my own case the system is not satisfactory. I do not know whether other hon. members agree with me or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I give only my own views, of course, because, after all, the arrangement, whatever it is, has to be determined by the House of Commons. I may say that my views are entirely in accord with those expressed by the hon. member from St. John. When I was a private member of the House, before any arrangement was made, I always had my own stenographer here. I followed this practice until I was appointed Deputy Speaker. From almost every point of view, it would be more desirable if an allowance could be made so that each member might make his own arrangements. He would get better work done and would have the services of one stenographer who would become familiar with his methods. He would also have the advantage of his correspondence being kept in the strictest confidence.

Mr. EDWARDS: In voting a sum of money for stenographers, this House is accepting the principle that it is right to pay for such service to carry on the political correspondence of the members. That seems to me to be reasonable, but there is no doubt in my mind that under the present arrangement the money is being used to pay stenographers to do a lot of private business for members. We might assume that each member would have about the same amount of political correspondence—that is not exactly true, but we may go on that assumption, and therefore we might make an allowance to each member to cover his political correspondence. Some of the members of this House carry on very extensive businesses, and I quite understand they might require more stenographic services than other members. I would be very strong'y disposed to endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. John. As it is now, some members of the House are having more money paid out in their interests than others. We are all on the same basis so far as concerns the principle of paying for the carrying on of our necessary political correspondence. I think it is reasonable that a certain allowance should be made to each member, and let him supplement it if necessary, to get a stenographer who would attend to his business.

Mr. CARVELL: I entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac. I believe I must plead guilty to being one of those who have employed a stenographer for private affairs to a much greater extent than for political affairs, because my political correspondence has always been very meagre, indeed, and it is practically nil at the present time. I have nothing but the highest praise for the manner in which the present system has worked out. The officials who have charge of it are exceedingly courteous, and do everything they can to meet the convenience of the different members, at least they do in my case. The members of the staff are also very courteous and attentive to their duties. I have had one stenographer who is a real artist, and whenever he is available I can almost take the responsibility of signing a letter without reading it over. Being a first-class stenographer, however, he is greatly in demand, and it often happens I cannot get him. I find when I dictate a letter containing some legal expression, or some technical term, or somethhing out of the ordinary run of correspondence, to a young lady who has had no previous experience in that line, naturally she brings back the work in a most unsatisfactory condition. I cannot find any fault with her, because she has not had the experience or training in legal matters. If this amount of $40,000 were divided among the two hundred odd members, it would allow about $200 each, which would be ample for a member who wished stenographic work done. If he had more work than that to have done, he should certainly pay for it himself. I believe there are many members of this House who would be perfectly willing to take this $200, and supplement it by whatever sum might be necessary, and provide their own stenographers, because in that way we would get much more satisfactory service than we are receiving at the present time. I wish to call the attention of the House to the last item, which may be a personal matter to some extent, but perhaps we might just as well have it explained. Perhaps the Speaker will tell us on what principle that item is made up. Of course, I understand there is one item of $2,500 for Hon. Dr. Beland with which every one will agree, but I would like to know on what principle the rest is made up.

Mr. REID: The last item reads:

To provide payment of the full sessional indemnity of members of the House of Commons —days lost through absence caused by illness, public business, being engaged in necessary farming operations, or on account of death, during the present session, including an amount of $2,500 to Hon. H. S. Béland, a prisoner of war in Germany, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in Chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes, an Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons or any amendments thereto—payment to be made as the Treasury Board may direct, $22,010.

It is stated in the Act that members are entitled to fifteen days' absence without deduction from their sessional indemnity. If they are absent more than fifteen days it is deducted from the indemnity. The item explains itself to the extent that it is to pay members of the House of Commons who have lost days through absence caused by illness. We have some members who have been ill. I might mention the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) and the hon. member from Essex North (Mr. Wilcox) and the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Guilbault) as being some hon. members whose names occur to me at the moment. Then, ministers and others may be absent on account of public business. It is also to provide funds to pay for days lost through absence on account of members being engaged in necessary farming operations.

Mr. CARVELL: I am a farmer, and I was just wondering whether I would come under that.

Mr. REID: About the month of May, the two Whips stated there were a number of men engaged in farming, mostly in the West, who wished to remain at home to put in their crops and look after their farming interests. It was understood that these men would be allowed an additional fifteen days. It was understood that those members who were actively engaged in farming would be allowed an additional fifteen days. That is the reason the item is worded in that way. Then, the other is on account of a death during the session. There is another matter that I might mention. We have had a long session, and it has been suggested by the Whips that fifteen days ought to be allowed in addition to the fifteen days that the statute allows.

Mr. CARVELL: That would be general?

Mr. REID: That would be general. It is under the consideration of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. CARVELL: I would be much more in sympathy with the latter proposition than I would be with the proposition as it now stands in the supplementary estimates. I have not been entirely in sympathy with the idea that a member is a school boy and that he will receive pay, or fail to receive pay, according to his attendance. A man who is elected to Parliament must answer to his constituents, and if he does not attend the session and perform his duties, in all probability his constituents will settle with him when he goes back to them again. You allow a man fifteen days absence, and then, if he is absent beyond that, you deduct, I think, $15 a day. A deduction is generally made in my case, because I am away more than fifteen days during the session. Yet, I do not think I could be blamed very much if I said that probably I devoted as much time to the public interest as any other member of the House of Commons. If I am absent more than 15 days, I simply have to lose the amount that is deducted. For a number of years the custom has grown up by which members are allowed a certain amount of leeway on account of illness. I have known of men receiving some benefit from that provision in recent years that I thought was very shady indeed. I could hardly believe that it was a case of illness to the extent to which it has been taken advantage of.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Parliamentary illness.

Mr. CARVELL: Parliamentary illness, as my leader says. Now, we come to the question of farming. I do not know why the man who is away on account of being a farmer should be placed in a different position from the man who is away because he is a lawyer. If I have courts going on, I must attend them, in doing so I am attending to my private business, and when a farmer is away he is away attending to his private business. I cannot see much reason in making this allowance, and I think he should be charged for the time he is away like the rest of us. I am heartily in agreement with the proposition that on account of the length of the session the Government might properly allow an extension of fifteen days. I have always felt that special extensions are unfair and discriminating.

Mr. REID: On account of the great shortage of labour in the West this year these members had to go away, and that is why this allowance is made. But the estimate brought down to provide for an additional fifteen days' allowance will be a general one, and we will all be on the same footing.

Mr. NESBITT: I have sympathy with the Government in the extension of fifteen days to those who have had to go West to attend to their farming work, although, as my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) says, there should not be any exceptions. Each man thinks his business is just as important as the other man's. But, this year, on account of the great shortage of labour, I think it is quite excusable. I am thoroughly in accord with the proposition to extend the time of all members on account of the length of the session. But, I am not in accord with the idea of paying members who shirk their duty, who do not pretend to be here during the session, who only come once in a while when a vote or something of that kind is on, and neglect their duties for the rest of the session.

Department of Public Archives—To provide for the salary of the chairman of Publication Committee, $5,000; to provide for one clerkship in Second Division, Subdivision A, $1,600—$6,600.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is that new?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: An explanation should be given of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the year 1907 the Government published the first series of volumes relating to the constitutional history of Canada. The second volume, along the same line of work, was published in 1912. On account of the demand for the work, which came to be used in universities and schools as a text-book, in 1914 the Government undertook to republish both books, the previous editions having proved insufficient. Leading jurists were among those who made strong requests for the republication. Having issued these volumes, the Government considered the question of issuing collections of documents covering other important fields of Canadian development, including the treatment of the industrial and agricultural growth of the country. That is the purpose of this vote. The purpose of this vote is to provide for superintending the production of these works.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is there a chairman?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is to be. There has been none selected as yet. The item was in when I came to the department. It is to provide for one chairman and one assistant, the chairman at $5,000 and the assistant at $1,600. They are to be known as the Publication Committee, and their duties are to collect and edit a series of publications following on from what has been done with the subject of the constitutional development of Canada, and commencing at the beginning with regard to the agricultural and industrial development. I am not sure that I am giving an explanation that is anything more than indicative to the committee. The work, however, is not new. It is merely a matter of putting it on a systematic basis, and making some one competent responsible for its success.

Mr. CARVELL: Has the assistant been chosen yet?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not even heard the suggestion of the name of an assistant. I have heard a name mentioned for the chairmanship, but I am not at liberty to mention it.

Mr. CARVELL: I presume that the assistant would have to be chosen by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. CARVELL: What about the chairman? Would he be in the same position?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not think so. It would be unreasonable, a technical position—

Mr. CARVELL: I thought possibly there might have been some decision as to this point. A couple of months ago a lady spoke to me about a position something like this, not asking me to assist her in obtaining a position, as she knew I had no influence with the Government, but rather complaining bitterly that the Civil Service Commission had refused to consider her application for a position having to do with the Archives, and I assume it must have been this position, on the ground that about 160 or 170 years ago an ancestor of hers, in his official capacity, had played a part that had not been very friendly to certain people who lived in what is Canada at the present time. I thought if that were true, it was drawing the line very fine indeed, to cast upon this party a burden which she should not be called upon to bear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Visiting the sins of the father—

Mr. CARVELL: Not the father, the great, great, great, grandfather, because it goes back about 160 years. I shall give the name to the minister in confidence. I was given to understand that the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission pointed out to the lady that, on account of what had taken place in the case of one of her ancestors a century and a half ago, she might possibly not be persona grata.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall make a note of this, and so far as it is in my power no lady will suffer because her great grandfather committed any crime whatever.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh no, it was not a crime; he was a very high public official at that time, and carried out probably a very unpleasant duty.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I scarcely understand the necessity for this board. It would seem to me that the archivist would be the best judge of what should be published. If it is simply to deal with the question of what shall be published, I should like to know why we should have a distinct and separate board of officials for that purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The archivist is merely a collector. If Canada is to have her industrial and her agricultural as well as her constitutional records properly kept and edited, the archivist is not a man of standing to do that. I know that if hon. gentlemen heard the name of the man—

Mr. MARCIL: Is he a cabinet minister?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not know of any cabinet minister who is anxious—

Mr. MARCIL: We were told that some were going out after the session to make room for new ones.

Mr. REID: That is a false story.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I were competent I should like to undertake the work. I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that the party contemplated will be in a distinguished sense competent to do the work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me the Government ought to hesitate about adding this office to the archives branch, especially when that branch is at the present time costing more than $60,000 a year, as will be seen from the list of officials in the main estimates, and the vote for contingencies. Now it is proposed to create another office and to attach a salary of $5,000 a year, together with assistants. I do not think this is the time for such an undertaking. These publications might very well stand over for a while. I suggest that for the consideration of the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no doubt there is some extra expense in the archives owing to the extra efforts that have to be made now in connection with records for the war. Mr. Doughty went over to England and France a year and a half or two years ago and has spent most of that time over there in the pursuit of duties that peculiarly appertain to his office and that were quite necessary.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He is an exceedingly good man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He urged very strongly that this opportunity should not be lost as the work could never be overtaken in the future. That may account for some of the expense, if there is an increase. This work is of a permanent character and if it is worth doing it is worth doing well. Literature that is not good literature is not worth producing.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these publications issued in the two languages?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Both languages.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

To defray the expenses of the Economic Development Commission, including an amount of $750 payable to Mr. E. H. Godfrey of the Census Branch, for services as editor of the commission, $3,750.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that a new office?

Mr. REID: No, that is the Economic Development Commission. It is just being wound up.

Mr. OLIVER: Has this item been under discussion at all? What has happened in connection with this commission?

Mr. REID: So far as this commission is concerned there has not been very much done during the last year. This commission is composed of Sir James Lougheed, chairman; Senator Ross; J. B. Roland, Montreal; W. R. Dobell, Quebec; Mr. Farrell, British Columbia. Sir Joseph Flavelle was on the commission for a while. Mr. Watters and a gentleman from Moosejaw, president, I think, of the Grain Growers, were on the commission?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. gentleman explain the objects of the commission?

Mr. REID: I have not followed it up. The assistant secretary was receiving a salary of $100 or $125 per month, and they have had a little printing to do in winding up. Sir James Lougheed intends to have the commission wound up shortly after the close of the session. The commissioners are working gratuitously, but their expenses are paid. They have reports ready, and these reports have been audited by Mr. Godfrey, who was paid $750 for that work. This amount is intended to pay the expenses of the commissioners and the assistant secretary's salary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not objecting to the amount, if the hon. gentleman will explain the object of the commission. Later on, perhaps, the minister can give us an explanation.

Mr. REID: I will give an explanation later.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am glad that the Government have appointed Mr. Roland, a very well known paper manufacturer at St. Jerome, who stands very high in the industrial world. I wish to express regret that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has not seen fit to appoint a gentleman from Quebec to a position on the Scientific Research Commission. The minister said the other day that he did not know any person from Laval who was competent to serve on the commission. I can assure him and the committee that there are several very eminent professors at Laval who could fill one of these positions. I hope that when there is a vacancy on the board a professor from Laval will be appointed.

Mr. OLIVER: When the minister obtains the further information, will he include in the memorandum the date of the appointment of the commission, the date at which it is expected the organization will be terminated, and the amount of money that the commission has cost, or will have cost, between those two dates?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I forgot to state, in answer to the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day, that some years ago, when the World's Congress of Geology was held at St. Petersburg, the only scientist representing Canada was the late Monseigneur Laflamme of Laval University, who was a well-known authority in geology and other sciences. He has left some successors to follow in his footsteps. Some years ago, when I was in Japan, visiting the University of Tokio, where there are, as my hon. friend knows, very eminent scientists, I found that the name of Monseigneur Laflamme was the only Canadian name known to that distant country. I make this statement to show that Laval could be of service to the country through some of its well-known professors. I hope my hon. friend will revise the unjust and biased view taken by his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

To provide for the expenses of the Conservation Commission, $4,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the commission headed by Sir Clifford Sifton?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that Sir Clifford Sifton is very busy conserving other things than the national resources of the country. He is trying to conserve the good things for the Tory party. Perhaps, if his activities are so much needed in that conservation process, his services might be passed over to the Tory party for good, and a less obnoxious gentleman might be appointed at the head of the Conservation Commission.

Mr. OLIVER: Does the work of this commission include any construction or manufacture of any kind?

Mr. REID: A report of their whole work during the year has been laid on the Table. I have not read the report this year, but it gives a full explanation of the work done.

Mr. OLIVER: I wondered if, included in the work of this commission under its distinguished head, there was anything devoted to cabinet making.

Mr. REID: No, nothing of that kind.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Conservation Commission not make a report?

Mr. REID: Yes, the report has been laid on the table of the House; it is very extensive.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know that we receive from the commission weekly sheets which are interesting, and the annual report is interesting also. I am anxious to know if there is a report made in regard to expenditure.

Mr. REID: The expenditure is all given in the Auditor General's report.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a supplementary estimate. About what will be the total expenses of the Conservation Commission for the year? What was the total expenditure for last year?

Mr. REID: I have not that here.

Civil government—Department of Justice, including penitentiary branch, $5,475.

Mr. LEMIEUX: While we are on the item of penitentiaries, and as the session is coming to a close, will the minister give the committee the information concerning Thomas Kelly? The other day the Solicitor General stated that he would bring down the papers, but I have not seen them so far. I have read in the Toronto Telegram an item which deos not tally with tne information given by the minister to the House. I am not saying that I do not accept the statement made by the minister, but the item in the Toronto Telegram differs radically from his statement. The item was published the second day after the release of Kelly. Possibly the minister saw it in the press.

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not see it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Toronto Telegram, in a despatch from Winnipeg, expressed surprise that Kelly had been released. It stated that, as a matter of fact, he had received special treatment since he had been detained in the penitentiary; that he did not, for one thing, receive the hair cut; that he did not wear the garb of a convict, and that he was immediately sent to the hospital ward. That means favourable treatment for any prisoner, unless, of course, he is, as the minister states, sick. Later on, after some pressure was brought to bear upon the department by way of petitions, letters, telegrams and doctors' certificates, he was sent to a hospital outside of the the penitentiary. This is the point I wish to emphasize. According to the despatch—I am referring to what the correspondant of the Toronto Telegram states—Kelly apparently was not sent to any hospital, but was sent home, which, after all, is the best hospital. The first news that he was released was that he was seen in his house by people passing along the street. I cannot for one moment believe that any favour was shown by the minister to a prisoner found guilty of such a crime as Kelly had committed. I believe what the minister says, namely, that Kelly was really a very sick person, and in danger of losing his liberty for good, that is to say, his life. For the sake, however, of the minister's reputation, in view of the statement made by a paper which supports the Conservative party, he might, perhaps, give an explanation in regard to the matter.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be very willing to do so. I am surprised that any statement that Kelly was treated differently from the manner in which any other prisoner in the same condition of health was treated, should have been published. There has already been laid upon the table the correspondence with regard to the manner in which Kelly was treated during his detention in the penitentiary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That was some months ago.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. We are on the question now as to his treatment in the penitentiary. I may summarize the matter very briefly. When Kelly arrived at the penitentiary the penitentiary surgeon, in the performance of what he conceived to be his duty, communicated to the department the fact that in his opinion—the committee, of course, will understand that I do not purport to give his exact words—the prisoner was suffering from nervous breakdown, which placed him on the verge of insanity. I do not say that he used the word "insanity," but he did say that the prisoner was in a most critical condition, and asked that he might be permitted to call in another doctor in consultation, Mr. Kelly, or his family, being willing to pay the expense of that consultation. I do not think that was a very material feature in the matter. Permission was, of course, given when the surgeon asked for it. The doctor called in consultation was Dr. Carscallon, of Winnipeg, a gentleman of standing and reputation, I am informed, and the head of an institution in which nervous diseases are treated. Dr. Carscallon, in consultation with the penitentiary surgeon, Dr. McGuire, who, I regret to say, has since died, reported at that time in very strong terms that he was exceedingly apprehensive that, if Kelly were not released, the consequence would be very grave; that he was in an extreme condition of nervous breakdown, and that he had, as Dr. Carscallon had ascertained, been some ten years ago treated for a similar attack which had been exceedingly grave. The doctor's conclusion was that Kelly ought then to be released. In this condition of affairs, as it was represented that there was apprehension that continual confinement would produce those serious results, I thought it proper that before action there should be at least be some opportunity to see whether those apprehensions would be fulfilled. I waited a little while. In the meantime the facts had been reported to us that Kelly was under the surgeon's care, and that he had not had his hair cut nor been put into the ordinary garb because of the opinion of the surgeon that in his then condition any such action would precipitate the consequences that he apprehended. The matter stood for some little time. I caused inquiry to be made from the surgeon as to whether Kelly's condition was yet such that he might alter the treatment. Not only did he report to me again that Kelly's condition was not such, but he persisted in his view that it was a matter of grave danger to retain the man in the penitentiary at all. Thereupon, because I realized the gravity of the offence of which this man had been found guilty and the great importance of not allowing it to be suggested that because of any position of his, financial or otherwise, there would be any action taken that the circumstances did not actually call for, I caused him to be examined by Dr. Lafleur of Montreal, whom the hon. gentleman no doubt knows to be one of the leading physicians not only in our province, but I think I may safely say, in the whole Dominion. Dr. Lafleur reported that Kelly had certain physical symptoms, that he was very much affected, but in his opinion there was not any nervous condition that might not be accounted for by the circumstances in which Kelly found himself. He did not think that in the condition in which Kelly was there was reason to apprehend that further confinement would bring about serious results. As to Kelly's nervous condition, it was quite impossible for him to form any serious opinion. That was some time in April. In view of that report, and notwithstanding the report of the jail surgeon and of Dr. Carscallon, I felt I would not be justified in ordering Kelly's release. But I did have further communication with the penitentiary surgeon as to the possibility of altering the system under which Kelly was dealt with. The penitentiary surgeon again reported to me that he would not take the responsibility of that being done. We must conduct these institutions, so far as the health of their inmates and the treatment they are to receive is concerned, in accordance with the advice of the surgeon, and what was done in Kelly's case would have been done in the case of any other prisoner in regard to whom the surgeon had made a similar report. Conditions remained the same until some time in June—I am speaking from memory, and do not recall the precise date—when we again made inquiry, with the same results so far as the penitentiary surgeon was concerned. The conditions remained the same until a date in the month of August which I do not precisely recall. In the meantime we had the most pitiful representations from Kelly's friends in regard to his condition of health. Whether they were well founded or not, I think that any gentleman who heard the story as it was told to me would at all events have had implicit confidence in the sincerity of those who told it. However that may be, in the month of August, on a date I cannot recall at the present moment, I received a message to the effect that Kelly was exceedingly ill, and that the warden had sent for the members of his family to come and see him. The next day, I think, there was communicated to me the report of Dr. Miner, who had been called in by the family, and he described Kelly's conditions as most serious. He intimated that he was not prepared to define precisely what the trouble was, but described Kelly as being in a most precarious condition. Under those circumstances, I caused Kelly to be visited and examined by Dr. E. R. Popham, of Winnipeg, a gentleman who, I ascertained by inquiries from people absolutely disinterested in Kelly in every way, was an outstanding physician of eminent professional capacity and unquestioned integrity. I asked him to report to me on Kelly's condition, and to give me his opinion as to the consequences if Kelly was retained in confinement in the condition in which he was. He reported that Kelly was suffering from an attack of gastritis, and he gave his temperature, which was very high. He said that he was rapidly losing strength, and that in the condition in which he was, there was no reason to expect any improvement. I felt that there was no course open to me but to act on that report, confirmatory as it was of the other reports that had been coming to me, which were based upon a condition which had supervened several months after the examination by Dr. Lafleur. Thereupon, I did advise His Excellency the Governor General that it was a proper case for the issue of a ticket-of-leave, for the purpose of having the patient transferred to a hospital where he would receive proper treatment. That was what I understood was considered the best course. I did learn subsequently that when the prisoner was liberated for that purpose he was taken to his own home instead of being taken to a hospital. Upon that I had Dr. Popham visit him again to ascertain whether he was in a better condition of health, and whether it would be possible to move him, if desirable, to a hospital. He reported that he was not in a better condition of health, but that it would be possible to remove him to a hospital. Under the circumstances I could not see that there was anything to be gained by ordering him transferred to a hospital. We should have no greater control over him there than in his own home. He was on ticket-of-leave, and the order that he should be liberated for the purpose of being transferred to a hospital had been made, not because we supposed we would have greater control over him in a hospital, but because our impression was that that was what was desired. Upon the last report Kelly is still a very sick man, under the care of his doctor in his own home. What may be the proper course if he should recover will, of course, be a matter for consideration. For the present I regret not having brought down all the papers that bear upon Kelly's condition of health. As I have already said, the papers that bear upon the reasons for the treatment he received are already before the House, and I shall be glad to bring down the other communications with regard to his health to-morrow. I have no hesitation in saying that on the evidence before me I am convinced that I could not have acted otherwise than I have done.

Of course, it has no bearing on the release of Kelly, but it is only fair to him to state this fact. He was convicted of an offence for which the maximum sentence is three years. He was sentenced to two and a half years, and had served nine months of that sentence, but he had been in custody awaiting extradition, and in jail at Winnipeg, from the month of October, 1915, to the month of November, 1916, when he was taken to the penitentiary. He then spent nine months in the penitentiary, so that altogether he has been in close custody in the jail and penitentiary for a period of twenty-one months for an offence for which the maximum sentence is three years. In all fairness to Kelly it is proper to point out that, while he was charged with different offences, yet, under the judgment both of the Court of Appeals in Manitoba and the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, he could properly be found guilty of but the one offence of obtaining money under false pretenses.

Of course, I do not want to say that was a matter that had a bearing on his release under the circumstnaces. He was released solely in view of his physical condition. I think it is fair to point out these other circumstances because it is well for the public to know the extent to which this man had actually received punishment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We are reviving an old case, but because I had seen in the press, as I stated, representations to the effect that there had been favoritism in the Kelly matter I thought it was well to bring it up. However, I do not accept the reports in the press as against the statements made by the Minister of Justice. It is well that the public should know that my hon. friend found good and sufficient reason for the action he took, because although he states that Kelly had served twenty-one months, including the time he was awaiting trial and that spent in prison after sentence, one must not forget that the matter in which he was involved was a very serious one, and that if the public are led to believe that criminals who are found guilty of such offences as the one in question receive favourable treatment at the hands of public men for political considerations, they would lose confidence in the administration of justice. Personally, I must say that, having heard the explanation given by the minister and knowing the medical certificates which were sent to him, I do not hesitate to accept his statement in preference to the statements made in the press. The minister will not think I insist on getting the information for the pleasure of ventilating this matter before the public. It is well that the public should know that every man receives even-handed justice before his peers. While I am on this subject of ticket-of-leave, may I call the attention of the minister to another question—

Mr. MORPHY: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt? Will the Minister of Justice tell me how many Kellys got out of the penitentiary last year, and give us a little of the history of the other two?

Mr. DOHERTY: I must confess I do not keep a special register for the Kellys. At the moment I did not recall there were other Kellys who got out during the course of last year. "Kelly" is a name which is not rare. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give me some more definite information.

Mr. MORPHY: The reason I ask the question is because I saw that there was a man named Kelly convicted on a charge of manslaughter, and owing to some laxity in the penitentiary another Kelly, who should be released, was not released, but the man who was convicted of manslaughter was released, although he should have been kept there for a long term of years. The Kelly who should have been released was, of course, released afterwards. I wanted to know if there were any more Kellys, and what peculiar charm there is about the name of Kelly that gives them a ground floor advantage in the penitentiary.

Mr. DOHERTY: The other Kellys were Reillys.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The other question to which I wished to refer is the dynamiting outrage in Montreal. According to the press reports, three of the culprits are ticket-of-leave men. Of course, a ticket-of-leave is never a certificate of virtue, but at the same time it is remarkable that three of those ticket-of-leave men should have been found acting in conjunction with the other dynamiters. Perhaps the minister is too lax in his methods, or perhaps his heart is too tender. I would not charge him with laxity, but, perhaps, he might be open to the suggestion of tender-heartedness. It is remarkable that Elie Lalumiere, although he may not have been a jailbird, was just nearing the jail. The minister will remember that this man's name was very prominent in a famous case a few years ago, and that he was doing some very evil work in a certain election. However, I am referring only to the real jailbirds who were released under ticket-of-leave. Can the minister explain why there was a sudden exit from the penitentiary just at the proper time for these men to take part in this dynamiting outrage in Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: With all respect, I must confess the question put by my hon. friend is a somewhat extraordinary one. In dealing with tickets-of-leave we endeavour to ascertain the past, we do not pretend to prophesy for the future. My information is that only two of these men were ticket-of-leave men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There may be only two ticket-of-leave men, but certainly another had "done time." Of course, I do not claim the minister is responsible for him.

Mr. DOHERTY: As regards the other two——

Mr. LEMIEUX: They are wards of the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: —how they happened to get out in time to do this I do not think I can say, except that they did it after they got out. Certainly I do not suppose the hon. gentleman desires to suggest that the idea of letting them out on ticket-of-leave was that they should engage in the commission of the crime.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they not shadowed after their release?

Mr. DOHERTY: A ticket-of-leave man is under the obligation to report monthly. With regard to the suggestion of tender-heartedness, I shall be very happy to furnish my hon. friend with a report of our operations under the Ticket-of-Leave Act. I am glad to say there are a large number of men allowed out on ticket-of-leave, and more glad to say that a very small percentage of the men released on ticket-of-leave forfeit their privilege. Everybody knows that a ticket-of-leave man committing an offence within the duration of his ticket-of-leave forfeits the time he had to serve when he got the ticket of leave, and has to return to the penitentiary. The last time I had occasion to look at the figures, I saw that only from four per cent to five per cent of all those who obtained tickets-of-leave fell back into crime.

There are cases where they do. But in the case of these two criminals, after they had been released, they proved most unworthy of the clemency that had been extended to them. As to that we were not in a position to judge by anticipation. I have not now in mind the particular circumstances leading up to the sentence which they were undergoing when they were released, but I am informed that the sentences were not extremely severe. Moreover, at the time the recommendation was made, it was in contemplation that these men, who were soldiers, should be returned to their calling. Subsequently, the military authorities for some reason did not wish to take them back.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I see that the name of an officer, either of the Justice Department or of the Dominion Police, is mentioned in connection with this dynamite case. I read the evidence yesterday in the press, and this man seems to have been a frequent visitor with Lalumière at the meetings which were held and offered to procure arms for the other culprits. Perhaps it is too soon to speak of the case until the whole of the evidence has been given, but if it be true that an officer of the Dominion Police, or of the Justice Department, was connected with the affair in that way, it seems that it is not conducive to public order. If any officer incites a person to commit a crime he acts beyond his duty.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am satisfied that no officer acting under the directions of Sir Percy Sherwood, Commissioner of Dominion Police, would have acted, with instructions, in such a way as to incite any one to commit a crime. If any such thing has taken place, I can assure my hon. friend that in due time it will be carefully looked into.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I read the evidence of Tremblay, one of the witnesses yesterday—is it true that he is also accused?—and he stated most positively that at a meeting this officer, Desjardins, was present and told the culprit that he could get arms and weapons from the armoury. That is in the press of yesterday.

Mr. BUREAU: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) just now said that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) would not suppose that anybody would try to get convicts out because he had any interest in getting them out, and that any such thing would be scandalous. It must be within the memory of the Minister of Justice that a celebrated convict and highway robber, who had held up the Canadian Pacific train at Mission Junction, got out of the British Columbia penitentiary. All the officers of the Justice Department at that time who had anything to do with the penitentiary not only were accused of having information about the contemplated escape, but were actually charged with having connived at getting the convict out of the penitentiary so as to share in certain Australian bonds which were supposed to have been stolen, although the bonds never existed. The name of the man was Bill Miner.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think I have any responsibility for that.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. BUREAU: I do not say the minister had but he was in the House and the Justice Department was under criticism at the time.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I have heard the name.

Mr. BUREAU: I see an item here:

To increase the salary of Joseph Adolphe Renaud, K.C., legal officer, to $4,000, from April 1, 1917, $600.

I do not object to that, it is a well deserved increase and I do not think that any of the legal officers are overpaid in the Department of Justice. If the minister will allow me, I am going to take up another subject. The Quebec judges, in what they call the rural districts, in my estimation, are underpaid. I will take the district where I practice—Three Rivers. The judges are getting $5,000, while in Quebec and Montreal they are getting $7,000. The $7,000 paid to the Quebec and Montreal judges is not too much, but the $5,000 paid to the judges of Three Rivers is too little. I asked the attention of the Minister of Justice to this question once before, and one of the reasons that was given at that time why the judges in Montreal and Quebec were paid higher salaries was that the cost of living in Montreal and Quebec was higher. I do not think that reason stands good to-day. I call the attention of the minister to the extra work that devolves upon these judges in rural district and the amount of extra cost which is imposed upon them on account of their residence. In Montreal they have a very large law library which is at the disposal of the judges when they want to study a case. In the district where I live we have not such a library, for the reason that the fees that are paid by students who are called to the bar are generally paid in Montreal and Quebec. These students attend the universities of McGill and Laval in Montreal and Laval in Quebec, they are generally articled with Quebec or Montreal lawyers and most of them remain with the firms with which they have been articled. In the Three Rivers district the judge has to subscribe for the law publications and he has to pay out of his own pocket for the text books he requires and which are not in our library and which we cannot afford to buy because we have not sufficient revenue. I maintain that more work is imposed upon the judges in the rural districts than is imposed upon the judges in Montreal and Quebec. In Montreal you have the circuit court while in our district we have no such court. They sit as a court of appeal that hears all municipal appeals with regard to valuation rolls, etc. They sit as a court of appeal in all cases under the Fish and Game laws. In addition to that the Superior court judge acts as an arbitrator. In our district all expropriations under the provincial Railway Act, for transmission lines and for water-power development are heard before a judge of the Superior Court sitting as an arbitrator. In view of the fact that our judges are overcrowded with work, would it not be possible to put them on the same footing as the judges in Montreal and Quebec and raise their salaries from $5,000 to $7,000? I think it is only a matter of justice.

I am speaking for the district in which I live with the circumstances of which I am well acquainted. That district has developed far more rapidly than any other district in Quebec on account of the water powers located on the St. Maurice river and on account of the new industries which have been established there. At the time the two judges were appointed, Shawinigan Falls was a town of probably 2,000 inhabitants. According to the last census, there are over 11,000 people there. At that time lands along the St. Maurice river were considered valueless. To-day they are considered very valuable, and every day more disputes arise. Furthermore, expropriations in connection with all these water-power developments create litigation. Grand'Mere, which had about 2,000 or 3,000 people, is now a town of about 10,000 or 12,000 people. Three Rivers at that time had about 12,000 inhabitants, and to-day it has over 22,000. Along the St. Maurice, Cap Madeleine, which had formerly 1,200 people, now has 4,000 or 5,000 owing to new industries established there. All these industries in these town create litigation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. These judges are put to greater expense than others, as they have no library accessible and have to purchase books for themselves. They should be put on the same footing as the others and receive $7,000 per year. I think that Three Rivers ought to be no longer counted as a rural district for judicial purposes.

Mr. DEVLIN: The district of Ottawa is much more important from a legal point of view and in other senses than the district of Three Rivers. Litigation is of considerably more importance. Mr. Justice McDougall was unable to take any holiday this summer, as he was constantly engaged in investigations or otherwise. There is really more work for the two judges in the district of Ottawa than for any two judges of the district of Quebec—perhaps I should not say than any two judges of the district of Montreal. This also applies to the second judge of the district of Ottawa, as his case is somewhat exceptional, and he is not labouring under the same conditions as Mr. Justice McDougall. Whilst I instance Judge McDougall, I would like to make my words apply to all the judges of the Superior Court in Quebec who have to-day a great amount of work, as the Minister of Justice knows, and who have also the same degree of expense, in view of the increased cost of living, as the judges of the larger cities.

Mr. EDWARDS: It may savour of presumption in the opinion of some members for any one not trained in the legal profession to dare express an opinion in regard to the salaries of judges. Notwithstanding that, I am going to take the risk. In my opinion, speaking generally, the judges in this country get more than they are entitled to now. As to a judge not being able to take holidays this year, he will be in a position to sympathize with all of us here, as we have not been able to take any this year. The judges have always had the advantage of very eloquent and able advocates on both sides of this House when their salaries were being fixed. We have always had a number of very able men of the legal profession in Parliament, and I hope always will have them; they are valuable men for the country. But I have always felt that they never lose sight, as lawyers, of the possibility that some day they might occupy positions on the Bench. The judges receive what must seem to the great majority of our people to be munificent salaries, and after serving for a certain number of years, they may retire on a good fat pension. That is how it strikes the ordinary man. Men in other walks of life have to provide for their old age, but the judge can retire on a pension fixed with the idea of enabling him to maintain the dignity which he maintained when he was on the Bench. There are cases where men who have retired from the Bench after putting in their time have engaged in other work which was even more strenuous than that in which they were engaged when on the Bench. It is all right to say that we must provide for the men who occupy the Bench a salary which will make them independent and above suspicion. How far has that gone in the opinion of members of this House? Session after session, we have had instances of Royal Commissions, where one judge has been appointed, perhaps in Manitoba, to act on a commission, and in the eyes of one-half the members he is a white-winged angel—everything that is good and pure. Then another is appointed to inquire into his conduct and he becomes a very different kind of man. Time and again we have been told that we must provide salaries for the judges that will place them above suspicion, on a plane by themselves. But we have also heard these men who are supposed to be above suspicion and above partisanship severely criticised by members on one side or the other according to circumstances. I am not a member of the legal profession, but I believe I am voicing the opinion of a great proportion of the people of this country, I think the majority, when I say that the judges are being well enough paid. Talk about them having a lot of work! What right have they to draw a salary if they do not work? Is it the idea that these gentlemen shall be placed upon a pedestal and that the greatest effort of their lives shall be to draw their breath and their salaries?

They are no better than other people to work. They are getting better pay than most people who are trying to make a home for themselves and something to live upon in their old age. Judging by the convictions, and by the way some of these men fill their positions on the bench, I think many of them should never have been appointed. Fancy a judge sending a boy of fourteen or fifteen years of age to the penitentiary for five or six years, for stealing two or three dollars in money and an old revolver. In my opinion, that judge ought to be sent to the asylum; he is not fit to occupy a place on the bench. The men who occupy positions as judges are, in the majority of cases, fine men, men of exceptional ability. Notwithstanding that, I do not believe that in all cases, nor in the majority of cases, a judge accepts the position purely and solely out of love for his country. I cannot get away from the idea that the judge was thinking somewhat of himself when he accepted the appointment. He looked at the salary, and considered the fact that, after a certain number of years, he might retire and have his old age provided for. There is no objection to that. It is perfectly legitimate to look at it in that way. As a class, considering the work they have to do, I think the judges are better paid to-day than any class of citizens in the Dominion.

Mr. BUREAU: I am glad the hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) stated that he did not belong to the legal profession, because, if he had said that he did, I would be inclined to think he was talking about something he knew nothing about. It does not follow that, because a judge sends a boy to penitentiary, he is acting unjustly. He may have been right in sending the boy there. I do not know about that. When the hon. gentleman says that judges have nothing to do but draw their breath and their salaries, he had better inquire into the work that they have to do.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not say that.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman said the most of them had nothing to do but draw their breath and their salaries.

Mr. EDWARDS: No.

Mr. BUREAU: I have to accept the hon. gentleman's statement. Hansard will show which of us is right. But the breath and the salary were mentioned. I say that there are no harder worked men in any occupation in life than the judges who sit in the districts wherein I practise, and I am simply asking that they be treated the same as other judges. The legal profession is not like the noble profession of my hon. friend, where you go and feel a patient's pulse, and then go home and sleep over it. The judge goes home with a case. He has the fortune of a man, or possibly the life of a man on his mind, and he is working twenty-four hours a day, if he is awake during that twenty-four hours. My hon. friend should realize that. A judge has great responsibility. If a judge makes an error, or if he ruins a man, the litigant can go to the superior courts in appeal from the judgment. My hon. friend is looking at it in a different way. He buries his victim six feet under ground. That is the end of it—heart failure. The hon. gentleman had no right to attack the judges as he has done. Our judiciary is the pride of this country, and no man in this country can deny my statement. I am not invoking a pension for a retired judge for personal reasons; my hon. friend may rest at ease in that respect. If I ask that the salaries of the judges in Three Rivers be increased it is not for my benefit, because if they offered me a judgeship on a golden platter I would not accept it. I think if I had desired such a position I could have had it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: There is no "hear, hear" about it. I am speaking sincerely, and if I were hankering for a position as judge, I would have enough pride not to rise in this Chamber and expose myself to the criticism: "Oh, Bureau, you want to be a judge and that is the reason you want an increase for the judges." I ask this increase as a matter of justice, and no one knows better than the Minister of Justice that in the province of Quebec our judges are harder worked than the judges in any other province, because they have to sit as a Court of Appeal in numerous cases. The judges of the Superior Court have to sit as a Court of Appeal in all municipal appeals, valuation rolls, and in all school troubles. A judge has to act as an arbitrator in all expropriation cases, whether for railway purposes or for transmission lines, or taking the shores of the river and flooding them in the development of water-power, which, in our district, is a very considerable cause of litigation. The St. Maurice is nothing but a cascade, and every day these cases are coming before the court. With the development of industries, many personal injury cases arise and come before our judges. They are more numerous by tenfold than they were five years ago, and yet the judge gets the same salary, while everybody is getting an increase because they say it costs more to live, which is a fact. It does not please my hon. friend from Frontenac to see a judge sit on the bench and assume the responsibility of deciding on questions involving men's lives and fortunes, because the judges do not cry patriotism and loyalty; because they have their work at heart, and perform it—and not all lip-work, as is the case with some men I know—he says they do not deserve to be adequately paid for their labour. I take exception to that, and I say that the hon. member had no right to say the things he has said to-night regarding the men whom I consider the hardest-worked men in the district where I live.

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville) (translation): Mr. Chairman, we have been pleased to hear professionals, doctors, lawyers, and I think it would not be out of place that a farmer should also express his opinion.

I congratulate my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) who has just told this House that, if he asks for an increase of salary for the judge of his district, it is not that he is aiming at a judgeship for himself. Most assuredly, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is an exception, to the rule in that regard, and I congratulate him, because very nearly every lawyer in the political maelstrom is seeking high office. The judicial Bench is considered very much in the light of a reward for political services; I have no objection to that. But, Mr. Chairman, what I object to is that a man appointed to the judicial Bench who is the recipient of a salary of $5,000, should pretend that he is underpaid.

I have had the honour of sitting in this House for some years past; as every other member, I draw an indemnity of $2,500 per annum; I never complained of it, no more than I do because this present session is not remunerative. But what I want to lay stress on, Mr. Chairman, is this, that at a time when the country is, to a certain extent, overwhelmed with the excessive burden of the war, this House should not be asked to authorize unnecessary increases of salaries. For my part, I believe the judges of the land are receiving fair and sufficient salaries, and that they may live very fairly even if, now a days, the cost of living may be said to be rather high. If a certain public officer, receiving a salary of $5,000 a year, asks for an increase, under the pretence that such an amount is inadequate, what then about the people, in general, who are earning a great deal less? For, it is not every one who has the chance of earning an annual salary of $5,000 or of $7,000.

There is another matter to be equally taken in to consideration, that is that judges may become disabled in a very short time. We have an instance of this in this very House.

Mr. WILSON (Laval) (translation): And young judges too.

Mr. LANCTOT (translation): And young judges too, as my hon friend from Laval aptly remarks. Those judges, having become disabled, claim pensions. I have taken the trouble, Mr. Chairman, of calculating the amount already paid and probably payable by this country to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). This gentleman, because he has occupied a seat on the judicial Bench in Montreal for fifteen years, will probably cost the country $400,000.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Rainville) (translation): I would point out to the hon. member that the Committee is now invited to discuss an item concerning some increases in the salaries of the employees of the Justice Department. I would ask him to limit his remarks, as much as possible, to the special item of the estimates now under discussion.

Mr. LANCTOT (translation): I do not exactly know, Mr. Chairman, which item the Committee is now discussing, but what I do know, is that the members who have preceded me did speak about the judges of the land, and I do not see why I should not also be permitted to speak upon that subject, on behalf of the electors whom I represent. I think I am entitled to make some comparisons, and if certain hon. members of this House ask that the salaries of the judges be increased, I believe it is my duty to institute comparisons, and that is why I quote the example of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), a thing which I have, indeed, already done in this House.

I therefore say that the judges who are now receiving a remuneration of $5,000; it is not only that sum of $5,000 which is their salary, because they expect to draw, moreover, a pension, fifteen or twenty-five years later. A judge whose salary is $5,000, fifteen years if he becomes, fifteen years later, afflicted with some infirmity, disabling him from the due execution of his office, he gets his superannuation on a retiring allowance of the two-thirds of his salary—even if he is not disabled, as says the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Delisle)—but, if he occupies a seat twenty-five years on the judicial Bench, he is entitled to retire on full salary; so that, should he live twenty-five years more, his annual judicial salary will not have been $5,000 but, actually, $10,000. Now, I want to tell this House that the judges are the only privileged ones. In every country in the world, nobody receives a pension or an annuity, unless he has previously paid some money in order to get such a pension, the judges are the only ones who do not pay one cent and who draw a pension after fifteen or twenty-five years.

I am wondering wherefore this discrimination. Is it because there has always been in this House so many lawyers, on either side, to pass such measures almost unseen, in order to reciprocate later? In fact it is generally admitted that judges don't die quick enough, and if they don't wish to withdraw from the Bench, their wishes are even anticipated; some are forced to retire before Parliament is dissolved. I even predict that, before this Parliament ceases to exist in order to go before the country, some judges now on the Bench will be interviewed and spoken to as follows: "Please, do resign, we have members whom it will be impossible to re-elect in their counties, and we would like to put them on the Bench." That is the policy of governments, Conservative or Liberal, and that is why such a system must necessarily disappear.

I have already had the honour to introduce into this House a Bill to the effect that no pension be granted to a judge, unless he has occupied a seat on the judicial Bench for twenty-five years or he be an invalid; but not an invalid to become a member of this House, a senator or a minister.

I say that, in a future Parliament, such a state of affairs must be remedied; that a Bill must be introduced to wipe out these bad laws, and I hope we shall then have another Minister of Justice, who will listen to our complaints and will not hesitate to introduce such a Bill in order to put a stop to this money riot.

Is it not absurd, indeed, to see a Minister of Justice drawing $5,000 as a minister, $2,500 as a member and a pension of almost $5,000? Would that be tolerated in any country? I do not believe it; not even in China or Japan. It is only here, in Canada, that such things can be seen.

I declare it again, even to-night, that if God spares me, and should I sit here in the next Parliament, I will once more introduce a Bill in order to take away their pensions from those who do not deserve them; I believe that, instead of taxing the poor people for war purposes, these pensions should be suppressed, for the object of the Act was to superannuate only disabled judges or those having served for twenty-five years.

Why, Mr. Chairman, pay a pension to this gentleman? Would it not be better to pay that amount to a charitable fund, the Patriotic Fund, for instance, or else employ it towards our war expenses? I declare it to be an abuse of power, and I want to register as strongly as I can my protest against such a state of affairs.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU (translation): It is evident my hon. friend has not taken my observations in the same sense I had stated them. He pretends to speak on behalf of his electors who are almost all of them farmers. It is also in the name of the farmers I am protesting, since the judges of rural districts are not treated as fairly as those of the cities of Montreal and Quebec. I repeat it, my only object was to do justice to the agricultural class and that, by granting the judges of the rural districts a sufficient salary to afford them the means of having a library, a thing they absolutely need for the judicious exercise of their functions. I do not think my demand either exaggerated or unfair since, in my opinion, at least, the judges of the rural districts deserve quite as much as the judges of large cities, such as Montreal or Quebec. If the objection made until now to my proposition, that of the high cost of living in the cities, was formerly a just one, it has certainly ceased to be to-day, for I have personally realized that it costs more to live in Three Rivers than in Montreal or Quebec. I therefore see no reason for my hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville to be scandalized; my demand is based upon the principle that the position and remuneration of judges appointed to administer justice in country districts should be such as to render full and ample justice to the agricultural class.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am pleased to see that Mr. J. A. Renaud, K.C., is being given equitable treatment. He has had a long career at the bar He was a lawyer of eminence in the district of Joliette, where he had a large practice. I know that in the Department of Justice he is doing splendidly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is this vote in regard to Mr. H. B. S. Lane a special vote, not in accordance with the Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: The case of Mr. Lane is inserted by name because this is not an increase in the ordinary sense of the Civil Service Act. Mr. Lane has been in the department for thirty-eight years. He is the chief accountant in the penitentiaries branch. He is at present receiving a salary of $2,600. The increase is to make it $2,800. The length of his service appears by what I have just said, and the efficiency of that service is borne testimony to in the highest terms by all of those who have been over him during this very long period of faithful service. Under those circumstances, it was thought justifiable to recommend that he should have this increase of $200 per annum.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: I am glad the Minister of Justice had given credit for length of service. I think I know Mr Lane, and I have no doubt what the minister said about the length and value of his services is quite correct. I would like to see the same increase granted to such an old employee as the present warden of the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. I do not know exactly how many years he has been in the service in that institution, but I would not be surprised if he had been there for thirty or thirty-five years. His salary is only $2,800. I understand he has some living accommodation. If Mr. Lane deserves an increase on account of length of service, this gentleman also deserves an increase.

I am delighted to see that some of the officers in the Department of Justice are getting an increase; I think they well deserve it. If the minister will permit me to refer to a conversation I had with him some time ago, I should like to remind him of the claims of the penitentiary guards for a higher salary. I see that the officers of the penitentiaries with salaries of $1,000 or less are to get a bonus of $100. That is a step in the right direction, but it is not much to the penitentiary guards at St. Vincent de Paul, for instance, who receive only $800 a year. An officer of that institution with a salary of $1,200 a year told me the other day that after exercising all possible economy, his living expenses for the month amounted to $8 or $10 more than his salary. As the law stands, I know these men cannot be granted a statutory increase, but the law should have been amended. As the minister is granting a bonus, however, I would strongly urge that it be increased from $100 to $200. I think every man employed in our penitentiaries should receive $1,000 at least. I have no political end to serve in making this suggestion; I make it simply because of the high cost of living, and the difficulty that the guards at the penitentiaries have in making both ends meet. They have to be on duty from six in the morning to six at night, and are forbidden, and their wives as well, to engage in any other occupation which would bring them in money. How can a man live on $800 when the necessaries of life are so dear? I had to pay $10 for a ton of coal for my country residence the other day. That may not be much to me, but it is a big item for a poor man, and other household expenses have increased accordingly. It costs the guards more to live at St. Vincent de Paul than in the city of Montreal, because, working from six in the morning till six at night, they cannot get in to market. I am delighted to see these two legal officers at Ottawa getting their increases, but it seems to me that it is always the higher-salaried officials who get an increase. It is the poorer paid men who should be looked after. Speaking of old employees, might I refer to the hospital overseer, who is well known to the Minister of Justice. This man, who has a very large family, is not receiving the salary a certified clerk in a drug store in Montreal would get, and he is getting no increase at all. I would urge the minister to take this case into his consideration.

There is another matter. The minister may have found out from his inspectors that there is a great temptation on the part of the guards to engage in some trading amongst the convicts in liquor, tobacco, drugs and things of that sort, because, as I have said, they are forbidden to engage in any occupation outside of their own work, and the salaries they receive are so small. The other day some of the guards came up to me and made certain representations, and I advised them to quit the service. But they said that they had been in the service ten, twenty or thirty years, and must stick to it now, and regulate their mode of living according to their salaries. I remember when I came to this House in 1908 the guards were receiving only $500 a year, but I succeeded in getting that raised to $800. But I am not satisfied with that. I think $1,000 is not a bit too much for any of these employees, if you want to get good, reliable men. I am sure the Minister of Justice knows that he has had to dismiss several guards for trading with the convicts in order to make a little extra to support their families. Now there should be no necessity for that. The most dangerous element of our population is kept at these institutions, and the men to look after them should be above suspicion, and of first-class character. These men are doing work that is just as important to the welfare of the State as the work that is being done by the soldier at the front, and it is a dangerous occupation too. Not very long ago a deputy warden in the West had his throat cut by one of the convicts, and there is still fresh in the memory of many of us the mutiny at St. Vincent de Paul, in which Dr. Laviolette proved himself a hero. The lives of the guards are always in danger. I would again urge upon the minister to increase the bonus from $100 to $200, rather than increase the salaries of men who get $25 a day for making an investigation—I will not mention any names at the moment.

Administration of Justice, Exchequer Court of Canada—To provide for the publication of the Exchequer Court reports by contract, $2,000.

Mr. BUREAU: Has the increase been caused by the general increase in the cost of printing, paper, binding, and so on, or is it on account of the greater number of cases reported?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is the introduction of a new system in the making of those reports. It arises out of the following circumstances. The present Mr. Justice Audette, assistant judge of the Exchequer Court, was, previous to his appointment, registrar of the court, and at that time Mr. Morse was the reporter. When Mr. Justice Audette was appointed to his present position, Mr. Morse was appointed to the position of registrar, and it was then believed it would be possible for him to combine the official performance of the two duties of reporter and registrar. However, the work of the court has very considerably increased, and in recent months it has been found that it is not possible, consistently with the proper performance of Mr. Morse's duties as registrar, that he should attend to the reporting of the cases. Members of the profession will understand the importance of promptitude in the turning out of these reports. As a result of existing conditions, the reports are actually six months behind. In taking up the question of what would be the most economical method of providing for a proper system of reporting, it was found that we could make this arrangement with the publisher, under which, for $2,000 a year, he would undertake the full work of the reporting.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Would that be done by contract or is it an increase generally?

Mr. DOHERTY: By contract. We make a contract with the publisher to see to the proper reporting. The undertaking on his part is that the numbers shall be out within thirty days after receipt of the manuscript. I may say this is being done now as an experiment. We are asking for the vote for this year to put it to the test whether this will prove a more satisfactory method of having it done, as we anticipate, rather than the method of appointing a salaried official as reporter.

Mr. BUREAU: Is this amount to be paid to the reporter?

Mr. DOHERTY: The publisher undertakes to see to the reporting.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that the publisher will take down the decisions, publish the reports, and keep the subscriptions he charges us for the reports, and in addition to that receive $2,000 from the Department of Justice?

Mr. DOHERTY: In the past, the work was done at the Printing Bureau, and the cost was not very much less than $2,000. Now we get the reporting done as well as the work which was formerly done at the Printing Bureau. These two things are combined. If we had proceeded on the old system, we would necessarily have to appoint a reporter, and that reporter would get a salary of at least $2,000, and we would remain with all the cost of bringing out the reports as in the past. The system we are now adopting commends itself to my judgment as being a better arrangement, but I am asking for this vote only for the purpose of putting it to the test.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I certainly will not oppose any expenditure in connection with the Exchequer Court. Never has a court rendered such distinguished service to the country as has the Exchequer Court during the last year. I have only to refer to the famous Quebec merger case in order to prove my contention to the hilt. That case was referred to the Exchequer Court in virtue of a statute passed last year, and the Chief Justice saved at least $2,000,000 to the people of Canada by one stroke of the pen. In one case he saved an item of $500,000, and an item of $794,869.58. Although the counsel appointed by the Government to look after its interests had decided to accept the two items, they were rejected by the judge. Since this judgment of Sir Walter Cassels has been made public, the Government has taken the wise course of stopping this expenditure concerning the Quebec and Montmorency, the Lotbiniere and Megantic, and the Quebec and Saguenay railways. The Exchequer Court of Canada is a blessing, not in disguise, but a real blessing to the Canadian taxpayer. It has just saved Canada from one of the most disgraceful and scandalous deals that ever came before this Parliament, and for my part I would vote with both hands for any justifiable expenditure to maintain and develop the Exchequer Court.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: In the supplementary estimates, penitentiaries, there is a vote made up of two items—to provide for a certain bonus to penitentiary officers, and to pay a compassionate allowance to Mrs. Mary Jane Mackenzie. If I am in order, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice when these items will be taken up.

Mr. DOHERTY: At the next opportunity we have of taking up my estimates. I understand it is the desire to proceed with other business now.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Will it be next week?

Mr. DOHERTY: I hope so.

Progress reported.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

THIRD READING.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 133, the War-Time Elections Act.

Mr. BUREAU: I was under the impression that we were to get a reprint of the Bill, and have an opportunity of looking over the amendments made yesterday.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is on the Table.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was distributed this forenoon.

Mr. BUREAU: I was told there were some corrections to be made, and that we should not use the copy given us this morning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without speaking to the Bill, I may say the reprint as it is, is correct. In the printing there was an item of four words left out on one page, and I think two or three words on another. The Bill is really very well printed.

Mr. BUREAU: We have not had an opportunity of looking at the Bill. Certain amendments were made yesterday, which were run through in a hurry, and we passed them on the understanding that this Bill would be reprinted and that we would have a chance of looking over the amendments to see how they worked in with the various sections to which they were added, and that they were all right. The Solicitor General should give us fifteen minutes to look into this Bill and see what it is.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I hope the Government will not insist upon us taking up this Bill to-night. We did not expect it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I thought it was understood we should go on with the Bill for a little while this evening and adjourn the debate until to-morrow.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Adjourn it now. There is nobody here to take it up.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Could we not go on for half an hour?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No. I did not understand we were going to proceed with the Bill to-night. I think we should adjourn now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill was reprinted this forenoon. We rushed it for all we were worth and we got the French copy reprinted, too. There were several amendments, most of which were purely clerical. But it is important that hon. members should have a chance of thoroughly reading the Bill, and, consequently, at the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite, it was agreed that we would not go on with the Bill at three o'clock, but that we should wait until to-night. I thought the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) understood that we would take a little time on the Bill to-night and then go on with it to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If hon. gentlemen did not so understand it we do not want to press it to-night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Go on with it to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In view of what my right hon. friend has said, I shall not ask the House to go on with the third reading to-night. But in the absence of any assurance that we shall conclude the third reading to-morrow, it becomes my duty now to give notice, under Rule 17B, which I accordingly do. I now give notice that I will move at the next sitting of the House that this debate shall not be further adjourned.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Government has the right to give notice, and I have no observation to make on that point. But I would ask the Secretary of State to have the Bill carefully reprinted. I have had no time to look at it myself, but I am told that there are several errors in it, especially in the French version. I hope they will be corrected before it comes up to-morrow. I would also suggest that we should have the Bill early in the day, so that we can be ready for the discussion at three o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had not heard that there were any errors in the French version, but I will have it thoroughly looked into.

On the motion of Mr. E. Lapointe, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 9.50 p.m

Friday, September 14, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING DISCUSSED UNDER RULE 17B.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 133, the War-Time Elections Act.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, with the strict application of the rules restricting debate in this House, this Bill has reached its final stage. I have followed the discussion with the most careful attention, and while listening to the advocates of this legislation I could not help recalling the words of Disraeli: "a conservative government is an organized hypocrisy." The right hon. the Prime Minister and other gentlemen who sit on the other side sought to convey the idea that this enactment was for the benefit of those very men who are going to be its victims. They also stated that the winning of the war required this, as it required the giving away by the friends of the Government of millions of the public money to the Canadian Northern. They protested in loud terms that no party consideration had been contemplated and no political benefits had entered into account in the introduction of that Bill.

Sir, if the Government does not expect or hope for another verdict as a result of the change they are effecting in our electoral law, why do they make the change at all? On the other hand, if they expect such another verdict resulting from such a change, I state that it constitutes a dishonest manipulation of the franchise in order to thwart and frustrate the will of the people.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) who has been given credit for this undemocratic legislation, after having already been the recognized father of the closure rules and other narrow Tory enactments, was more frank in his cynical admission that he expected the Conservative party to get the votes of such as are given the franchise by this Bill, and the Liberal party to lose the votes of those whose rights are taken away. Sir, I like to believe that the Secretary of State was not speaking seriously; he did not do justice to himself. I have much admiration for the talent of the Secretary of State, but I do not hesitate to say that a man whose ethics and convictions would permit him to consider as justifiable the tampering with the election law of the country on the eve of a general election in order to secure the return of his party, cannot be morally fit to occupy a prominent position amongst the rulers of this country.

This Bill is an expression of distrust on the part of the Government, distrust of themselves and distrust of the Canadian people. It is an admission that they lack the support and the confidence of the country; it is an indictment against themselves, and such an indictment only needs to be ratified by the people. The Government and its supporters are trying to get away from the judgment of those who have elected them and who are their natural and regular judges; they desire to escape a great popular consultation; they want to be judged by a sort of family jury.

This Parliament is being compelled by the Government to enact a measure which is opposed to the most elementary principles of democratic government. It does away with this fundamental rule without which liberty cannot exist, namely, the equality of all citizens under the law. One of the main articles of the great charter for which the people of France fought in older days read:

"Every citizen has an equal right to participate in the formation of the law and to the appointment of its representatives and agents."

A representative parliament must properly and justly reflect the nation; it must receive and return the nature, the proportions, and the peculiarities of such nation. Every citizen of the country has a sacred right to his proportional share in the national representation. Those are not German principles, they constitute the doctrine of liberty, and it is for the maintenance and conservation of such principles in the world that Canadian soldiers are to-day fighting in Europe.

This Bill shamefully destroys and takes away that equality and that proportional share which all Canadian citizens are entitled to in the administration of the affairs of Canada. The first main provision gives the suffrage to all female relatives of soldiers, whether such soldiers are dead or alive, are still in active service, or are discharged and again residents of this country. This is class legislation; it is the creation of a military autocracy; it is the very opposite of what is done by all the free countries of the world. Honourable gentlemen opposite are indulging in rhetorical expressions regarding the noble sacrifice of our soldiers. Most assuredly, we are proud of our soldiers; France also is proud of her soldiers; they are an army of heroes. Do you think, Sir, the French soldiers are given any controlling influence in civil affairs, in the parliamentary representation, in the elections of the representative body of the great republic? On the contrary, no soldier and no member of the national army has the right to vote in an election whether in peace or in war, except when on leave of absence for a period of at least 30 days. And I am not aware that at any time this condition of things has ever been detrimental to the great effectiveness of the army. But the French people have made too many sacrifices, they have spilled their blood too freely for the conquest of liberty to surrender the rights of government to a military class or autocracy. Here, in this country, we have given votes to all the soldiers, we have given votes to men who have never seen Canada, who do not know any thing about the affairs of this country, and we are now enacting a measure that will give votes to 400,000 women, on account of their relationship to those soldiers.

The Government is creating a situation which is fraught with grave and unexpected danger to the welfare of this country. The civil power must predominate over the military power, and not be subjugated to it. We already see in the newspapers telegrams and written statements emanating from generals, colonels, and other military officers criticizing the actions of this Parliament, and giving direction or advice to the Canadian people on questions which are debated or discussed in this Parliament and before the people of this country. This is a state of affairs which would not be tolerated by any self respecting people in the world, and I do not hesitate to say that the right honourable the Prime Minister should have taken steps to put an end to that most improper indiscretion. A few months ago, one of the foremost generals of France had to resign as Minister of War as a result of an equivocal word which was construed as putting in question the rights of control of the Parliament over all that relates to the army. The rights of the people, the privileges of this Parliament must be safeguarded.

But what can we expect from this Government when they set the example and show an utter disregard of the authority of this Parliament. On the 1st of January, 1916, the Prime Minister issued a statement or proclamation ordering that the army of Canada would thereafter be raised to 500,000 men, and that was done a few days before the opening of the session of Parliament and without seeming to realize that it was pertaining to this Parliament to make such a decision, and not to the Prime Minister, however, distinguished he may be. A well settled line of difference must exist between the legislative and the executive power, as there must also be a line between the civil and military power. Canada shall not stand for any kaiserism and that is the reason why this Bill is so repugnant to the people in all parts of this county.

I have another objection to this provision granting the vote to the female relatives of soldiers. I am not a partisan of women suffrage as many gentlemen in this House seem to be. In the province from which I come, this new move does not get the general approval of public opinion. We have been taught to consider the woman as a queen—the queen of the home—and we have always been afraid, rightly or wrongly, that by taking part in our bitter political contests, she should be exposed to lose some of that very delicate and superior respect that we all have for her.

But I am free to admit that in most of the other provinces of the Dominion, a strong current of public opinion is in favour of a woman suffrage, and that its being embodied in our electoral law cannot be successfully opposed. What is most objectionable is the granting of the suffrage to one particular class of women. If the granting of the vote to women is done to recognize their services and their sacrifices, and as an act of gratefulness on the part of the State and the Canadian people, by all means do not make any uncalled for distinction, but grant it to all Canadian women, for they are all qualified for such recognition.

I now come to the other provision of the Bill, which is perhaps the most objectionable. You are going to deprive Canadian citizens, British subjects, of rights and privileges which they now possess and which have been granted to them by a solemn contract to which the people of Canada, as represented by this Parliament, was a party. And, you are going to do this, not because of any misconduct or any act of hostility on their part, but as a penalty for having had the misfortune to be born in countries which they have left to get away from oppression and tyranny and in order to accept our invitation to come and help build up this country and breathe the free air of liberty. Is this British fair play, is this Canadian justice?

Let me read the section of our statutes which deals with the rights that have been granted to those citizens:

Section 24 of chapter 77, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, reads as follows:

> An alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall, within Canada, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada, with this qualification, that he shall not, when within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject previously to obtaining his certificate of naturalization, be deemed to be a British subject, unless he has ceased to be a subject of that state in pursuance of the laws thereof or in pursuance of a treaty or convention to that effect.

So that by receiving their naturalization papers they have been granted, unreservedly as far as this country is concerned, all the rights, political and others, which are being enjoyed by other Canadian citizens.

The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) contended, and I was amazed to hear him bring forth such an argument—although one may expect almost anything from that great apostle of Toryism—the hon. gentleman contended that because our naturalization papers do not confer the status of British subjects outside of Canada, our naturalized citizens cannot claim in this country all the rights and privileges pertaining to British subject citizens of Canada. I would like to know what the Minister of Militia Overseas (Sir George Perley), who is only a naturalized Canadian, as those we are dealing with are, thinks of such a doctrine.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware that Sir George Perley has been naturalized under the statute of 1916, and has world-wide naturalization?

Mr. PUGSLEY: What difference does that make?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: That makes no difference in the line of my argument. Is it to be supposed that because a third party refuses to recognize a convention entered into by two parties to a contract, any one of those two parties has the right to cancel the contract or to refuse to be bound by it? Surely this cannot be argued seriously.

Those whom you are going to disfranchise are free citizens of Canada and are entitled to all the rights of the other British subjects in this country. They are subject to the heavy taxation which it will be necessary to impose on account of the scandalous expenditures for which this Government is responsible, they shall have to pay their share of the millions which will be paid for the valueless stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, they and their children shall have to pay, for many years to come, their large share of the enormous sums of money and the many obligations this country will have to meet as a result of our participation in this war. Yet they will hereafter be refused representation in this Parliament; nobody will have the right to speak for them, and this House shall no longer be the true expression of the general will and of popular sovereignty.

I have only to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, because I did not like to hear the sound of your gavel, and I wish to finish my remarks before you use it: The Government is expecting much of this Bill as an electoral scheme. I must admit, however, that some of their friends are not altogether sure of what may be the result. To a crazy ship all winds are contrary. It is always dangerous for a government or for a political party to play with the franchise. The people like fair play, they like an honest game, they favour a loyal fight between parties as between men, and I have enough confidence in the people of Canada as a whole to trust that they will strongly and effectively resent this last desperate act of a despotic government.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Mr. Speaker, having once taken our place in this great world struggle and having, as a people, approved, as we have approved, of the action of the Government in placing Canada by the side of the Mother Country in this great conflict, the question must always be present with us in the conduct of our public affairs: what is in the best interest of the carrying on of this great struggle? And all questions that are presented to us for solution must be brought to the bar of that test and decided in the light of whether they are in consistency with the purpose of this war and conducive to our maximum military effort in this great struggle.

When I spoke upon conscription, I endeavoured to address myself to the subject along that line, and I desire to approach this question to-day from the same viewpoint, to ask ourselves whether the Bill which the Government asks this House to endorse is one that is in the interest of Canada from the viewpoint of doing our utmost in our way, small as it may be, to bring about victory and to relieve the suffering of the world in this great conflict. And in this connection I cannot but recall that in August, 1914, the two greatest Empires of the world classified themselves voluntarily, deliberately. The German Empire classified itself as a nation that was ready to pay a terrible price of money, blood and sacrifice on the side of broken faith and broken pledges. The British Government had no selfish or material object in view, but it was ready to classify itself on the side of keeping its pledge, even if it cost, as it has cost, hundreds of thousands of lives, for no material, political or partisan gain, but simply because they believed that the name of England would ring down through the nations in disgrace if she did not stand by her pledge and by her plighted word. We have asked our soldiers to go to the front and shed their blood for nothing material, but for principle, and we are still asking and will continue to ask them to do so. Many of them have fallen and it has been mine, as it has been yours, to walk in cemeteries in Flanders where thousands of our boys lie sleeping, and the only consolation is that they lie there because they loved principle more than material things, because they believed that the plighted word of England must be sustained, and that the honour of England must be kept high as it has been down through all the centuries before us. But now we in this country are asked to support a measure that takes the plighted word of Canada given in the name of His Majesty the King, and for no reason other than a miserable political reason tears into scraps of paper, not one treaty, but thousands, perhaps thirty thousand or forty thousand treaties and covenants, and in so doing we voluntarily classify ourselves in the same way as the Prussian Empire voluntarily classified itself in August, 1914. I have here the document which we hand to the man who gives to us the consideration for it, the oath of allegiance. That document reads:

> This is therefore to certify to all whom it may concern, that under and by virtue of the said Act "so and so" has become naturalized as a British subject, and is, within Canada, entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just read on.

Mr. KNOWLES: The balance has no cogency to my argument, but since the minister asks me to do so, I shall read it.

—and subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject.

The weakness of my hon. friend the Secretary of State is shown in the fact that he asks to have read something that is entirely irrelevant to my argument, and he knows it. We have given to that man while in Canada, in the name of the King, all rights, powers and privileges of a political nature in Canada; and to-day, while he is still in Canada, the Government is taking those rights from him for no other reason than the same reason for which a robber will pillage things that do not belong to him, namely, for his own personal aggrandizement.

The record of these men in this country who took us at our word and made their treaty with us is one that can be studied with the closest criticism and scrutiny, and all the pages of the history of these men as a class in this war are free from any objectionable conduct on their part. From the very opening of this war they behaved themselves in an exemplary manner, and the Government has admitted this in the present debate. I go back to the short session held in August, 1914, and on page 14 of Hansard I find the following statement by the Prime Minister, dealing with the native-born Germans and Austrians.

We have no reason to believe that those people are inspired by the militaristic tendencies which influence the German Government at the present time or the Austrian Government for that matter. We have no reason to doubt, and we do not doubt, that these people will be absolutely true to the country of their adoption.

In the succeeding session, 1915, on page 20 of Hansard, the hon. Prime Minister, speaking of the Austrian and German-born:

So far as the others are concerned, I repeat what I said in August last when we were considering matters connected with the war that those of German birth and those born in the Empire of Austria-Hungary who have come to this country to be citizens of Canada have with very few exceptions borne themselves worthily and well. I believe that I can speak with peculiar knowledge as to this, because it has been part of my public duty to make myself acquainted with their sentiments and with the part which they are taking at this juncture of our affairs.

Deliberately, in the month of February of the succeeding year, the Prime Minister repeated the assertion which he made in August, 1914, and which I have just read to you. But it is not necessary to go that far back. We have the statement of the Prime Minister in this debate at page 5891 of Hansard:

I have not one word to say against the loyalty to Canada of these men.

And the Secretary of State said:

I am quite free to admit, that, taken all in all, those who come from alien enemy countries have, in the main, during the progress of this war, conducted themselves satisfactorily within lines of obedience to the laws of Canada. It is not based on any complaint of that kind that the principle embodied in this Bill is adopted.

Therefore I say that they are tearing up the srap of paper, for no reason of a national nature whatever. There is no suggestion seriously made that those who have come amongst us and made this country their home are anti-British in their feelings, and no suggestion that, at the polls, they will select men who do not wish to carry on the war. The thing is a falsity on the face of it. Those residents of western Canada are represented in this House, as has been said before, by hon. gentlemen who, irrespective of their party affiliations, have stood for the prosecution of this war to the utmost, and there is no suggestion that that is not the case. We have in Canada to-day unfortunately, many men who are far more against the win-the-war policy, as hon. gentlemen opposite, boastingly call it, or the carrying-on of the war policy, than are those naturalized citizens. We have men holding riotious meetings in certain parts of our country. We have certain men in the unions of Canada who have pledged themselves against conscription and they are quite within their rights in so doing. There are men who will come out in the open and say that they do not approve of the methods of the present Government in reference to conscription. There are stronger arguments against some of the men I have referred to than against these men in the West, who have kept silent. We have Mr. Bourassa and his press, and we have friends of the Government, who have preached to the people, and the first precept they would teach them was that, on no account, should they give any aid to Great Britain, and they were discouraging people from helping us in the present war. But there is no suggestion of disfranchising Mr. Bourassa, or Mr. Lavergne, or any of the friends, or quondam friends, of this present Government. The fact of the matter is that these German and Austrian citizens, so far as I know, came from Europe to disassociate themselves from the conditions which prevailed in their own countries, and they would be the very last to be filled with enthusiasm for those conditions, or the militaristic power in Germany. I am convinced that their wish is that the military powers in Germany may be crushed and overthrown. That is my belief, from my knowledge of the men, and there is no desire on their part that kaiserism, or the militaristic powers of the German Empire should be sustained. If, in this election which is coming, this great struggle, these people were allowed to vote they would have given their support to those pledged to win the war, because the candidates of both parties in the West will be in favour of a continuance of the prosecution of the war. If it could have gone forth to the world that the new citizens coming amongst us were filled with the desire to perpetuate, and to make victorious Canadian and British principles, it would have been one of the grandest encomiums that could have been pronounced, and one of the greatest compliments that could have been paid to Canadian and British statesmanship. It would have been a message, even to the Kaiser himself, that his militaristic days were numbered, that even those people from his own country were sending to Parliament men who were supporting the Allies in the prosecution of the war.

There is no way in which this Bill can be justified. If the Government were to lay down either of two broad principles I would say they might justify the Bill. The first principle would be this: that none should have the franchise unless they were actively engaged in the war. That principle, of course, is not laid down, and it would mean a straight military electorate. The other principle which they might lay down is that no one who is against the Government should have a vote. The Austrians and Germans in western Canada do not, generally speaking, live in cities, and they are largely Liberals for the same reason that English-speaking people in the country are Liberals, because they believe in the Liberal policy. We have not very many naturalized Austrians and Germans in our cities. They do not have to naturalize, and the people in the country must be naturalized, in order to get their homesteads, and over 95 per cent of the voting power of the native-born Austrian and Hungarian is a rural, or agricultural vote, and it is Liberal, not because of the war, but because it believes in the principles of Liberalism, and does not believe in the perpetuation of the high tariff power now in Canada. The hon. gentlemen are not manly enough to adopt the great broad principle that Liberals should be disfranchised and follow up that broad principle, but they come here in this insidious way, in this solicitor general way—I use the word in this sense as an adjective—and they beat round the bush, they draw red herrings across the trail, they split hairs, they appeal to race and passion and everybody in the country knows that this is a Bill for the perpetuation and the relief of the Conservative party, first, last and all the time, and it has no justification therefore, in the national way, and the Government itself is ashamed of the Bill.

I look upon this Bill as a great peril to us. If we are to lay down the principle that a government that is in power can go behind the Bill of Rights, and the principles of the Magna Charta, and can say, "We believe we must be perpetuated and continued in power, and we will disfranchise people who would vote against us," then the democracy is destroyed, and any tyrant who would assume power in this country could continue to possess that power, if you are going to once allow the principle that he is to be able to dictate as to who will vote. I view the matter with the greatest alarm, and I regret that the Bill is going through Parliament, and I say to hon. gentlemen opposite—to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who, in my opinion, is not a bitter partisan—that it is unfortunate that through the passage of this measure the day will never come in Canada when the tyrant will look in vain for a precedent when he is desirous of putting his autocracy and his tyranny into effect. The day will never come when the wolf will not be able to look upon other instances in which the lamb has been devoured. The day will never come when autocrats will not have a precedent for asserting the German principle that "might is right." It is a sad day for Canada when we must admit that the Government, notwithstanding the fact that our boys are falling in the fight for the maintenance of our principles and our honour, have put before principle, before the honour of the country, political expediency and the serving of their own party purposes.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Did the hon. gentleman approve the adoption by the Saskatchewan legislature of a Bill to exclude from the right of voting naturalized Chinese persons in Saskatchewan, for which measure the member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) voted?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is a fair question; I can only give a fair answer. As far as I know anything about it, I did not approve of it. I do not like the principle of it, but I never studied it; it was not my duty to do so. However, that has nothing at all to do with this question. This Bill is following the German principle that might is right, not the British principle that right should prevail.

You, Mr. Speaker, were a member of a group of persons—I myself was among them—who had the privilege of meeting a number of men from South Africa, while we were for a month in Europe a year ago. You saw among them men who had fought in the Boer army against Great Britain; the Minister of Trade and Commerce also saw them. To-day those men are filled with undoubted loyalty to the Empire and to the British King. You were told, I doubt not, in conversation with them and with their English colleagues from South Africa, that they were won over beyond peradventure to the British Empire first and foremost because from Great Britain they had received a square deal; they had received freedom and liberty and justice, even while their hands were still warm from the butt of the rifle with which they had been fighting the troops of the British Empire. That is what made South Africa, when the great test came in 1914, loyal to the core as a British colony; it had learned from the British Empire the great principle, synonymous with British history, that men must have their rights; that the British subject, poor, humble, primitive as he may be, should not be denied his rights because the great, the powerful, the wealthy, the mighty, endeavour to disturb him in his enjoyment of those rights. I am not afraid of any substantial difference being effected as against the Liberal party by the operation of this Bill, but I can only say that my heart is sick for my country when I think that there are men in power who will force this iniquitous, vicious, un-British, Prussian Bill through the House simply because they want to gain partisan advantage in the coming election.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this Bill. I do so on the ground that it is contrary to the general policy of Canada, contrary to her past history, contrary to her future interests. I have had the honour of sitting many years in this House and of seeing men come in and go out. To say that the membership of the present Parliament is superior to that of the one which preceded it would be unfair—unfair to this Parliament as well as to the preceding one—and I shall not institute any comparison. But I doubt very much whether the men who laid down the basis of Confederation, with whose names every school boy is familiar, should have been led at any time to introduce a measure of this kind. Canada has been well styled the fairest and most brilliant of the daughter nations of the Empire. In the hostory of the Empire Canada has played a most brilliant part, because in the framing of the Act of Confederation and in other legislation we have laid down precedents which are known and recognized throughout the whole of the Empire. The name of Canada stands high to-day throughout the world because she is inhabited by two of the great races now carrying on this war in the interests of humanity and civilization. If we look back to the elementary procedure introduced here by the British Government by the Acts of 1791, 1841, and 1867, we see that at all times Canadian statesmen, backed up by British authority and by the British statesmen who came to this country, were actuated by a desire to have in Canada perfect equality, to make sure that Canada should remain what it always has been, a loyal colony of the Crown. Canada has on many occasions given evidence of her loyalty, but she has perhaps never done so in more striking manner than she has done since 1914. We all remember how this war burst upon us; how we were then enjoying a vacation in the summertime, thinking of anything but war. But when the call came; when it was announced that the Government of Canada had decided to send a division to the other side, Parliament was summoned—and let it be said to the credit of this House that not a dissenting voice was heard within its walls against all the measures submitted by the Government with a view to carrying on Canada's part in the war. That happy union which was effected in this House in the month of August, 1914, was continued until the present session of Parliament.

Canadians are loyal to the Crown and to British institutions. They have shown that on many occasions; they are still loyal. But, while they are loyal to British institutions, they have learned from the British Constitution itself and from precedents which we have followed in this country that the rule of the people is sovereign; that in Canada the people must govern, as they do in other parts of the Empire. When the time came for the renewal of the mandate of this Parliament, there was a division of opinion in the country on the question whether the mandate should be renewed or whether there should be an appeal to the people. The Liberal party, with, perhaps one or two exceptions—the member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche) was not then associated with the Liberal party, although he voted at times against the Government—associated itself with the party in power with a view to extending the life of Parliament for another year without an appeal to the people. Unfortunately, during that year, instead of trying to cement the people together, instead of trying to bring them all to greater effort with a view to winning the war, the party in power adopted certain measures which caused a division among the people.

Finally the Military Service Bill was introduced and we had a rupture of public opinion in this country. The Act now before us is the following up of the conscription Bill. The Military Service Bill, of all others, should have been submitted to the people. I am sure that if this measure had been submitted to the people and had been carried by popular vote on a referendum or plebiscite, the whole of the province of Quebec would have submitted to the law as it is submitting to the law now. The people of that province have not been consulted, but they are submitting to the law because they are a law-respecting and a law-abiding people. Unfortunately, Canadians have divided on this Military Service Bill; not because they object to service which they are called upon to perform; not because they object to service which the Empire requires of them, but because the conditions and the notions of parliamentary government have been departed from. Canadians have looked upon the Government of this country as a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Many a time in the old days I heard Sir John A. Macdonald and other leading men of the Conservative party proclaim, especially after 1878 when Sir John A. Macdonald scored his greatest victory, that the Canadian Government was essentially a government of the people, by the people, for the people and with the people. If any appeal had been made to the people a year ago or in 1915, the difficulties that we now face would have been avoided.

Either the Government or the Opposition of that day would have secured a mandate from the people, and having a mandate they could have carried out the people's will. Unfortunately, this was not done, and the Military Service Act is soon to be enforced. The attitude of the province of Quebec has attracted some attention, but I know the province will submit to the law until such time as it has been able to bring about its repeal, backed up by the public opinion of Canada generally.

This War-Time Elections Act, unfortunately, is not a war measure in the sense of the other "war measures" which I and other hon. members of this party have had the honour of supporting. It is more a political measure than anything else. It is introduced, as has already been said by those who have spoken from this side of the House, as a means of keeping the present Government in power. I make but few objections to the general regulations, because when I object to the principle, I do not care to discuss the details.

Regarding the enfranchisement of female relatives of soldiers, there is a large English-speaking element in my constituency, several hundred of whom have enlisted and gone to the other side. Since the war broke out the women of my county have had the honour of doing everything they could in the way of assisting, not only the Canadian boys, but the French and Belgian soldiers as well. They have formed patriotic associations, and have helped the Red Cross and have continually been sending comforts to the soldiers. These women are being disfranchised in large numbers by this Bill, because the majority of them, unfortunately, have no relatives at the front. I do not object to the granting of the franchise to the women relatives of soldiers who are at the front, because from what I have heard in my constituency I am satisfied that the majority of these women will vote like the men in that constituency will vote. On the political ground I have no objection to take, but I am sorry that an injustice is being done to the hundreds of women who have worked so devotedly and unselfishly for the soldiers since the war began, and who will be disfranchised by this Bill. I would draw the attention of the Secretary of State more particularly to the fact that this measure does a grave injustice to French and Belgian women in this country. In the city of Montreal, and the province of Quebec generally, thousands of young French and Belgian reservists enlisted and went to the front at the very outbreak of the war.

There have gone from the city of Montreal some six or seven thousand French and Belgian reservists, who are fighting as only French and Belgians can fight. At the Marne, Verdun and other places we have had ample evidence that the French soldier has not deteriorated. Under this Bill the women relatives of these men are disqualified, and I say that a greater injustice could not be done. These French and Belgian reservists came to this country as to a new promised land, where they thought they would enjoy all the advantages of a new country. Many of them married Canadian women, British subjects by birth and descent, and these women are being disfranchised by this Bill. We are told that that is because it is impossible to get at the Russian reservists who left this country to serve in the Russian army. But the fact that an injustice may be done to the women relatives of Russian reservists in this country does not justify an injustice to the women relatives of the French and Belgian reservists in this country. I am sure that if any consideration had been given to this point before the measure was introduced the franchise would have been extended to the women relatives of the Belgian and French reservists as well as to the relatives of the Canadian soldiers.

We have heard representations from the West on the question of debarring the Germans and Austrians from voting. I was sorry, in the early days of the session, to see some of our friends breaking away from us on the Military Service Bill, which was indeed an anti-Liberal Bill. But I am glad to see that on the question of maintaining the sanctity of British citizenship, these men have come back to Liberal ideals and to the Liberal fold. The greatest thing a British subject can boast of is his British citizenship. The British Empire has maintained an army and has waged war in all parts of the world for the purpose of defending British subjects, simply because they were British subjects. These German and Austrians have come to this country trusting in the promises which were sown broadcast in the literature that was distributed throughout Europe. They trusted in the promises made by our immigration agents, trusted in the speeches of Canadian statesmen who have often declared that Canada was to be a free land, the equal of the United States. Now that these people are in this country they find themselves treated as the French were treated in Alsace-Lorraine, and as the people of Poland are being treated by Germany. What a spectacle that is for a young country like Canada to give to the world. Canada has always boasted that she was, par excellence, the land where all classes could come. Under Liberal rule, thousands and thousands of people from all parts of the world invaded our Canadian West. Every day they came in by the thousands, and the total immigration for one year amounted to 350,000 or 400,000. Three years after the advent of the Liberal party to power, the new provinces were formed in the West, and a great many of us had the pleasure of voting for granting autonomy to those provinces. We told the people who came from all parts of the world and settled there that they were becoming citizens of a British country, and would receive the protection of the British flag, and that their rights and privileges would be respected for all time to come. But to-day we are departing from that promise. We are doing what Wilhelm of Germany did when he tore up the treaty by which he had bound himself to maintain Belgian independence. We are treating our promises to these people as a scrap of paper. I am sorry that the brilliant Secretary of State, a man who no doubt has a great future before him, should have supported a measure so unfair and unjust as the one before the House, which deprives these men of their votes, and deprives the French and Belgian women of the sacred rights which they have in common with their sisters of other nationalities. In after years, like many another distinguished man who has played a part in the history of this country, he may find that he has made a mistake. A right is a right, and a wrong is a wrong. Canada has done great things in the past. We have had several examples of British fair play in this country. We have performed wonders in the material, industrial and political spheres, and have astonished the world. I am sure the world has been impressed with what Canada has done since 1914. We have sent across to the other side an army of nearly 300,000 men, all of them ready to give their lives for the cause they thought sacred. It is true that the province of Quebec was not represented as largely as it should have been, but if the numbers were not there, the quality was. The French Canadian troops who fought at Courcellete, Vimy Ridge, Festubert, and Givenchy have proved themselves the equal of any soldier who fought on those battlefields.

These are the men who saved the honour of the province of Quebec, and if other methods had been adopted for the purpose of bringing about a larger recruiting percentage in that province, better results could easily have been achieved. Not long ago I read a letter addressed to the Prime Minister by Colonel Mignault of Montreal, who had been entrusted with the enlistment in the province of Quebec. When he returned from Europe he found that recruiting had fallen off, and he said that during his absence fully 100,000 men had become employed in the munition factories in the province, especially in and around Montreal, fulfilling contracts for war purposes. He gave this as his reason for the falling off of recruiting. They had been told that the man who worked in the munition factory, the man who worked on a government contract of any kind for war purposes, was doing as effective work as the man in the trenches, and the people of the province of Quebec had acquired that idea. Outside of Montreal the people of the province of Quebec are, for the most part a farming people. In my own constituency, for instance, they are practically all fishermen or farmers. How many of these men could leave Canada without bringing about a loss to the country? They are all producers of food, and they are all necessary in the country, and I know the exemption tribunals which will sit in that part of the province will exempt the great majority of them on that ground, because their presence will be more valuable here than it will be on the other side.

I do not want here to indulge in any further criticism of the Bill. I condemn the whole principle of it, because I think it affects what Canadians should uphold as the most sacred part of our Constitution—the sanctity of the ballot box. If we once admit that the fountain of power in this country were setting a precedent which might be unfortunate for the country in future years, if the present Government for alleged reasons of war takes upon itself to disfranchise a large class of citizens of Canada, and to enfranchise another class, what is there to prevent another party, or even the same party, which may be in power in future years, from doing the same thing at every general election, for other reasons? It is a most unfortunate state of affairs, and I believe for that reason it will be condemned throughout the country because it looks too much like a party measure which has not the support of the whole House that it should have had if it were a purely war measure. You have nodded to me, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. I thank you for the patient hearing you have given me, and I conclude by saying that I know when the election day comes those women who are enfranchised in the province of Quebec and in the constituency which I represent will join us in bringing about the true condition of affairs which should prevail in this country, equal rights for all and privilege to none.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): We are discussing the third reading of the War-Time Elections Act. We are dealing in that Act with one of the many problems of Canada, and it is because we are dealing with one of its most important problems in what appears to me to be a most unfortunate way that I have the strongest objection to this measure. Canada is a country of vast extent. It has great variety of population because of that vast extent, because of the variety of conditions and because of racial characteristics. The great problem of Canada is to establish a great country and to build out of these varying component parts a united citizenship that shall take the forefront in the progress of civilization. The great problem of Canada is to secure unity amongst our people. Perhaps it is unfortunate that we have not started out as a united country, but it certainly will be unfortunate if having started out in our national life as a country having a variety of national elements, we shall so carry on our public business as to accentuate those diversities of outlook and opinion that necessarily accompany diversities of race, of traditions, of surroundings, and of locality. Canada has suffered more during her past history on account of this division of race than from any other cause, and it is to be regretted that her statesmen in bygone times had as their ambition the maintenance of themselves in power rather than the building up of a united country. It was because of that fact that Canada stood still while her neighbour to the south went ahead. It was not until under the inspiration of the leadership of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when he was honoured with the direction of the affairs of Canada, that this country had an Administration which looked to success and progress through unity amongst our people. That inspiration and leadership brought the two great races inhabiting this Dominion together, working shoulder to shoulder in the common interest, and Canada made progress as she had never made before. She outstripped the best record of our neighbour to the south and it was more because of that unity of purpose with which our people had been inspired than any other point of policy. Unfortunately, that condition did not continue. Unfortunately it seemed good to those who are now charged with the administration of the affairs of this country to revert to the policies and principles of their traditional predecessors, and when the occasion arose, they followed the old policy "divide and conquer." and did what lay in them to split Canada in twain. When they came into power they succeeded in their purpose, and they split Canada, and Canada is now back where she was twenty years ago. It was hoped by many of the citizens of this country who looked for its progress and welfare that out of the stress and urgency of the great war a united Canada would emerge. It was hoped that in the support of a common cause, in the common interest of sacrifice for a great end, there would be found a means of uniting all our people, whatever their race, whatever their language, whatever their religion, whatever their locality, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in the great name of liberty.

It is a most terrible thing that has occurred to Canada. It is more terrible than those sacrifices of life and limb that have been made in the interest of liberty. It is more terrible than all, that this great occasion, which should have been used to bring together the people of our country and make them one, from the beginning until the bringing down of this measure, has been used by the same men, who attained power on the principle of division and conquest, to exert every endeavour that lay within them to accentuate differences between the different peoples of this country. Time does not permit that I should dwell upon the attitude they have taken or the course they have pursued as to military matters towards the population of the great province of Quebec, but it is on record and it is within knowledge that they and their friends in that province, working for a common purpose but at opposite ends, have achieved the result they set out to achieve—the result of setting that province by itself as against the rest of the Dominion. Now they have transferred their energies and their attention to the prairie West, where the greater Canada must, if anywhere, be built. It is only in that country between the Red river and the Rocky mountains, where there is room and opportunity for a vast population, that we can have a great Canada. We have on these prairies men of different races, different ideals, different outlook, and it is a great problem that necessarily faces every one charged with the administration of the affairs of this country to assimilate all those peoples in the ideals of Canadian citizenship and British liberty. Some of these people are of German descent, some are of Russian descent, some of one nationality and some of another. As my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has said, a large majority of them are a rural population, they are on the land because of the land, their ideals are attached to the land and above everything else their purpose, object, hope and aspiration is to build up in that great prairie West a country for themselves and their children that shall not repeat the conditions that they have left in Europe. It has seemed good to our Government to introduce this War-Time Election Act to disfranchise 40,000 people, naturalized citizens of Canada, men to whom the faith of Canada and of the King of England is pledged to give them the rights of citizenship. They have done nothing, they have contemplated nothing, that would warrant their being deprived of those rights. But our Government has seen fit by introducing this legislation to so deprive them of their rights. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that the way to build up a united Canada, is that the way to establish on those prairies a united and progressive population that shall uphold the ideal of Canadian citizenship and of British liberty as the highest ideal in the world?

We who live in that country amongst those people, who meet them from day to day, have held our heads high when speaking to them. We have claimed that we represented a different ideal from that with which they were familiar. We have told them that British liberty and justice was the guarantee that they had from the Government of Canada, a guarantee that would never be broken. To-day that guarantee is being broken by a Parliamentary majority, by a Government that has set itself deliberately to set the Prairie West by the ears as it has already a large part of old Canada. We have had good service from those we call foreigners in the West. They have been industrious, law-abiding and they have been producing from the earth as well as any one else. They have had before them the ideal of Canadian citizenship and British liberty. Can we expect from these men in the future the same result as in the past?

Will not they rather be turned to some other country, to some other condition under which they can achieve that which they thought they had achieved when they landed on our shores? I do not see how it can be otherwise than that we have turned back in the minds of these people that course of sentiment that was bringing them on and on and building into them the ideal of Canadian citizenship. We are doing what we can to prevent them from ever adopting our ideals and becoming citizens with us in this country.

The inspiration of the Government is being well taken up by those who are supporting them throughout the country. I read in this morning's paper a despatch from Regina which is as follows:

> Regina, Sask., Sept. 13.—A deputation of army and navy veterans has been appointed to go to Prussia, Saskatchewan, and demand that the Teutonic names of streets, such as Kaiser Wilhelm and Hanover, be changed to those of more British origin.

It can only be expected that the lead given by the Government will be followed by their supporters and that a course will be taken in these prairie provinces, such as has been taken in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. In the Prairie West we have had no collisions of any kind whatever, and our people have lived in harmony and amity, we now see introduced there, as a result of this legislation, and as a result of the policy of the Government, the same conditions that have prevailed in Ontario and Quebec.

I say that this Government is committing a crime against Canada in the legislation that is now before the House, a crime the effect of which may be more far-reaching than any man can now see. And this legislation is being introduced by a Government which has been proclaiming far and wide for the past four or five months that it desired to govern Canada on non-partisan lines, that it desired a union government. And it is giving evidence of its good faith in desiring that Canada should have a union government in which there should be no parties and no divisions, where everybody should be united, shoulder to shoulder in war effort, by introducing a measure such as was never before introduced in the Parliament of Canada as a partisan measure; it is introducing a measure that goes far beyond the question of political partisanship to the question of disfranchising, decitizenizing, tens of thousands of the people of the country.

And this is the Government that wanted honest Liberals to take share with it in administering the affairs of Canada! We have heard across the floor of the House of the mutual bargainings between so-called Liberals on this side and members of the Government on that, the bargainings as to the exchange of principle for place, in the name of patriotism, in the name of honour, in the name of loyalty. Well, it is a long time since the man who was traitor to his principles had honour with the people. I think the same attitude of the public mind that prevailed 1,900 years ago and that has been handed down through all those centuries to the present time, will still regard the crime of Judas as the climax of villany.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the speech with which the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) presented this Bill to the House, he endeavoured to argue for its justification out of the precedent of similar legislation in Australia. I quote from his speech (Hansard, page 5725):

> There has not occurred as yet in any great country engaged in this struggle of unprecedented dimensions a general election. Where democracy governs nations in this war, it has not as yet left to individualism, by means of the ballot, the determination of the conduct of the war, save in one country alone. That country is Australia. When they were, in Australia, facing a situation such as we face to-day, but by no means as aggravated as ours, they prepared by legislation for the contest along lines similar to those of this Bill. They, however, disqualified for the war-time election all of their citizens who were of alien enemy birth, no matter how long they had been in Australia or how long they had been naturalized. This Bill does not go that far.

I endeavoured to get a copy of the Australian Act which was cited by the Secretary of State but have been unable to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the only copy in Canada is in the possession of Mr. O'Connor, where the hon. gentleman may see it.

Mr. KYTE: I sought that Act indirectly from Mr. O'Connor. A gentleman who has something to do with the custody of documents in this House told me that he applied to Mr. O'Connor and that Mr. O'Connor told him he had not it. I applied at the office of the Secretary of State to-day. His secretary was good enough to say to me that if he could get his hands upon it he would let me have it, but I have not yet received the copy and I am therefore unable to argue from the text of the Australian legislation whether or not this House of Commons is justified in going so far as is proposed in disfranchising a large element of our population. But I am able to argue from other circumstances and conditions existing in Australia that this Parliament and this Government are not justified in passing legislation of the character which we are now considering, even although Australia has thought proper to do so. To begin with, in Australia there is a coalition government, both parties are united for the purpose of carrying on the war. When conscription was first proposed in Australia, such a loud protest was heard among the people of that Commonwealth that the Government receded from its position, and instead of passing a military service law such as we passed in this Parliament, they consulted the people by a means of a referendum, and compulsory military service was defeated. Thereafter a coalition government was formed upon the basis of no conscription, and that Government is in control of affairs in the Commonwealth to-day. Again, the Commonwealth of Australia is populated by 98 per cent British-born; only 2 per cent of the total population of Australia are foreign-born. The Commonwealth of Australia never invited Germans and Austrians to become citizens. We in Canada are in a different position; we held out inducements to citizens of the Central Empire to come to this country, take up homesteads, become a part and parcel of our population and enjoy the full measure of citizenship. As I said, Australia did not ask for immigrants from the central countries of Europe, and only 2 per cent of her population are foreign-born. But there was a small element of the population of Australia that came from Germany. They came to represent the Krupp interest that established itself in Australia for the purpose of getting control of the total metal output of that Commonwealth. It is well known that at the outbreak of the war the Government of Australia found that the total mineral product of Australia was controlled through German residents in Australia representing the Krupp interests in Germany.

The first thing the Government of Australia did after the outbreak of war was to dissolve the corporation which controlled the metal products of Australia, and to take possession of it, in the interest of the Commonwealth and of the Allies. It is not, therefore, strange that a very strong feeling of antipathy should have developed in Australia against the limited numbers of Germans who were citizens of that Commonwealth. They were there, not as citizens of the Commonwealth, but as representatives of the Krupp interests in Germany, and spies of the German Government. It is not astonishing that, under those circumstances, a coalition government in Australia, or a non-party government would have been able to disfranchise those men who were notoriously alien enemies, without protest from any section of the community. But, as I stated a moment ago, that element of the population was exceeding small.

I referred to the drastic action taken by the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia to prevent German interests from continuing to control the metal product of Australia. How differently has that matter been treated by this Government. We know that, ever since the outbreak of the war, it has been alleged on the floor of this House of Commons, as it was alleged in the legislature of Ontario and in the press, that German interests in control of a certain mining corporation, having power to operate and control property in the province of Ontario, were shipping their nickel product to the United States, and across to Germany. It is also well known that, up to the very hour that the United States Government declared war against Germany, the underseas freighter Deutschland was carrying cargoes of nickel from New London, Conn., across to Germany. It is very well known that in 1916 no less than 764 tons of nickel was shipped from Canada by the United States to Germany. While the German interests sought the use of our nickel to manufacture munitions to destroy the Canadian soldiers on the battle line, this Government took no action. Why? Because it is well known that gentlemen intimately associated with this Government were large shareholders in the company that was interested in shipping the nickel from Canada to the United States, and thence to Germany. It is well known that the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), while a member of the Ontario Government, entered into an agreement on behalf of the Government with this foreign nickle trust, to fix the rate of taxation which would be levied upon that corporation at a contemptibly small amount, notwithstanding the fact that the profits of that corporation amounted to from twelve to fifteen million dollars a year. Not only that, but the agreement was to extend over the years 1912 to 1916, and in 1916 the present Premier of the province of Ontario renewed that agreement with the Hon. Wallace Nesbitt, K.C., on behalf of and representing that nickle corporation. But, Sir, if more proof is wanted that there is a connection between this Government and the German interests that sought the nickel in Canada to manufacture into munitions to destroy the Canadian soldiers, all I need cite to the House is the fact that, when an investigation was demanded by the members of this Parliament, both Liberals and Conservatives, as to whether or not Canadian nickle was being shipped through the United States to Germany, the gentlemen appointed for the purpose of conducting the investigation in New York was Mr. Graham A. Bell, the comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals. We have every confidence in the ability of Mr. Bell as a comptroller of the Department of Railways and Canals. But when it came to holding an inquiry into the operations of the German nickle trust and its associate companies in the United States and Canada, one would imagine, if this Government were sincere in their desire to get at the bottom of things, they would have selected another gentleman instead of Mr. Bell to carry on the investigation.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a point of order. The matter which the hon. gentleman is discussing is not relevant to the question before the House.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Rainville): I thought the hon. gentleman was getting away from the subject before the House, and I was going to ask him if he proposed to use the statements he is making as an argument against the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. KYTE: I have sometimes the habit of getting away from the matter under discussion, and I also have a habit of coming back to it. I propose coming back to it now. I made this statement to the House for the purpose of showing that, if this Government is anxious to follow the precedent set by Australia in matters of legislation, it is unfortunate they did not follow the precedent set by Australia in dealing with the German interests in that country. I pointed out that the War-Times Election Act in Australia was passed by a non-party Government. I am not sure as to the date on which that Act was passed, but if it was not passed by a coalition government, it has to be enforced and applied by a coalition government. Non-partyism is the very essence of success in war measures. The Government of Australia may be justified in passing the War-Time Elections Act which has been referred to, because ever since the war broke the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia has been concerned exclusively with the passing of war measures. That is not the case with respect to this Government. While we have been uniting our energies for the purpose of carrying on the war, and devising legislation best calculated to direct all our resources and energies to the carrying on of the war, the Government has not been content to limit its legislative activities to war measures. This Government has placed party legislation before war legislation for the last three years. If this Government had confined their legislation exclusively to war measures, they might be justified under the circumstances in passing such a disfranchising Act as we have under consideration at the present time. Instead of confining the legislation to war measures, this Government in the session of 1915, passed an Act for the purpose of increasing the tariff and reducing the British preference. That was an issue upon which the parties in this House might well divide, as parties in this country are divided upon this question. They passed the income tax during the present session of Parliament, which is a substitution for the excess war profits tax, which has been in operation for the last two years. Party opinion is divided upon the wisdom of terminating the war profits taxation at the end of the present year, and substituting therefor an income tax, which will relieve the friends of the Government who have made huge profits during the war of a large proportion of the taxation which ought to go to swell the revenues of the country. The electors of this country who are disfranchised under this legislation will be debarred from passing judgment upon these party measures which the Government passed during the last three years, under the guise of war measures. Again, the electors who will be disfranchised by this Bill will be prevented upon expressing their opinion on other legislation which has been passed by the Government. There is the legislation with reference to the Canadian Northern railway, which involves an addition to our burden of some $600,000,000, and a payment of at least $30,000,000 at a time when the resources of our country and the ingenuity of the Minister of Finance are taxed to the utmost to procure money for necessary war purposes.

Then there is the legislation which transferred the Quebec and Saguenay railway to the Government. We had under discussion a few evenings ago an item of nearly $4,000,000 passed by this Parliament in defiance of the judgment of Sir Walter Cassels, judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada. These matters the electors who are now disfranchised by the Bill before us will be unable to vote on.

There is another question in which the people are vitally interested and upon which they should be permitted to express their opinion. I refer to the failure of the Government to deal with the high cost of living and the fixing of the price of food products—matters which have been dealt with successfully by the governments of every other belligerent country. The Government hope to get by with everything done by them against the public interest, every failure on their part to properly perform their duties, by this legislation under which they purpose disfranchising 50,000 people in this country. All these things are done under the guise of war measures—all because we are at war. When the ex-Minister of Public Works resigned his portfolio on August 20, the folowing statement appeared in the newspapers:

> While Mr. Rogers was favourable to the original scheme of coalition government and to conscription, he is known to very strongly oppose the idea of union government on the lines now proposed. There was also a marked divergence of opinion on the question of disfranchising citizens of enemy nationality. The former minister insisted that it should be done. Sir Robert Borden would not agree to such a proposition, which he characterized as "ruthless."

This legislation shows that the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) is more powerful outside the Cabinet than he was inside. He failed to convince the Prime Minister that this ruthless legislation should be carried by the Government through Parliament, but he has since succeeded in getting the Prime Minister to introduce it into the House. It is generally suspected that the resignation of the ex-Minister of Public Works does not place him very far from the realm of influence with the Government; it is the general view that he is as competent to-day and as influential with the Government as ever he was. The ex-Minister of Public Works resigned because the Prime Minister would not give his consent to the disfranchising Act. We have now before us the ruthless legislation which the Prime Minister had refused to accede to, but which has been acceded to since the ex-Minister of Public Works left the Government.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to repeat in substance the arguments that I advanced against this Bill the other day on its second reading—arguments having mainly to do with the injustice accorded by the Government to a large number of the citizens of Canada, particularly of western Canada, who are to be disfranchised by this Bill. This afternoon I want to view the question from another standpoint: that of the breach of faith on the part of this Government with the members on this side of the House, especially those from western Canada, who supported the Military Service Act, which is now the law of the country.

I am sorry that the Prime Minister is not in his seat, because I wish directly to charge him with breach of faith. The Military Service Bill was carried with the aid of twenty-seven Liberals who voted with the Government. In voting as they did, the western Liberals voted as representatives of the people whom this Bill now proposes to disfranchise, namely, naturalized British subjects in Canada of alien enemy birth or extraction. If the Government thought that we were casting an honest and sincere vote on that occasion, then they are open to the charge of having broken faith with those who supported them on the Military Service Bill. We by our votes stood sponsors for the people whom the Government now proposes to disfranchise. The Government are declaring to the country that they have no faith in the word or the vote of the men who stood sponsor for this large class of citizens in western Canada. That being the case, I should like to have asked the Prime Minister, had he been in his seat, what was the reason of this change of front. So far as I know, not a member on this side of the House from western Canada who voted for the Military Service Bill has been consulted as to the effect the legislation now under consideration would have either upon their own constituents or upon the people as a whole. I should like to hear from the Prime Minister the reason why in this measure he casts an insinuation and a slur upon the honesty and sincerity of members on this side of the House who voted for the Military Service Bill and who at the same time stood sponsors for the class of citizens whom this present Bill proposes to disfranchise? Was it because of certain resolutions that were adopted at the Winnipeg Liberal convention on the 7th and 8th of August last that the Government have made this change of front? Some very important resolutions were adopted at that convention. One was a resolution condemning the Borden Administration because during three years of war it had carried on Canada's part in the war as a purely partisan proposition. That resolution I shall now read to the House, so that hon. gentlemen may judge for themselves whether or not the Liberals of western Canada were justified in adopting it. The resolution is:

This convention of the Liberals of the four western provinces of the Dominion assembled for the purpose of assisting in the solution of the many serious problems facing Canada at the present crisis feels compelled to place on record its most severe disapproval of the war administration of the Borden Government.

War is essentially the business and concern of the entire nation and not of any section, class or political party. It can be waged to the greatest advantage only when behind its prosecution all classes of its people are enlisted in the same passionate determination to defend the right, and triumph over the forces of despotism and unrighteousness.

Any attempt to arrogate to one section of the people or one political party a monopoly of its prosecution and the prestige of the conduct of a national struggle for freedom and existence can be characterized only as base and unworthy in the highest degree.

Because the Borden Government has sought from the outset to make our national life and death struggle a prerogative of one political party, to the exclusion of one-half of the Canadian people, and an instrument for selfish political advantage rather than the triumph of national ideals, because it has exhibited gross incompetence and inefficiency in the face of national peril; because it has substituted partisan selfishness for honour and fair dealing; because dissension has overcome leadership in its councils, and weakness and vacillation have taken the place of firmness, resolution, courage and efficiency in execution, we condemn it as no longer entitled to the confidence of the Canadian people.

Is there a line or a word in that resolution that is not absolutely justified by the history of Canada's participation in this great struggle for the last three years? The Prime Minister has himself condemned his own administration quite as much as the western Liberals do in the resolution which I have just read. Why has he been in conference week after week and month after month with Liberal leaders from the West and other parts of Canada for the purpose of forming a national government, if partisan government was not contrary to the interests of Canada in her war efforts? I say that the conduct of the Prime Minister for months past, since he made his first proposal of coalition to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, verifies in every line and every sentence the resolution against the Borden Administration passed by the Liberal Winnipeg convention.

[Mr. Neely.]

Does the Prime Minister, or any man on that side of the House, say for one moment that Canada's efforts in the war up to the present time have not been conducted on a party basis? If they were to deny that fact, the country would simply laugh at them. Even in connection with the proposal of coalition that was made to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, there had to be announced a policy which, in days to come, future Conservative leaders in this country could say was a Conservative policy, and that that policy had saved Canada's efforts in the war. I repeat that that resolution passed by the Winnipeg Liberal convention is verified to the fullest extent by what the Prime Minister has said and done with regard to forming a so-called national government after three years of party government during this great struggle.

There was another resolution passed at that convention which seems to have exercised the Tory press and the Tory political leaders throughout Canada to a very great extent. It was a resolution which I am proud to say I had the honour of proposing to the convention, and which received its unanimous support. It was the win-the-war resolution.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEELY: I know this is bad medicine for some hon. gentlemen opposite, but they may as well take it; they are going to get it anyway. There has been a great deal of criticism on the part of Conservative newspapers and Conservative leaders throughout the country because a certain amendment proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) to the win-the-war resolution was not agreed to by the convention. It was an amendment proposed to the second clause of the resolution. I do not wish to put on Hansard the whole clause, but will just read clause 2:

By the maintenance, in unimpaired strength at the front, of our fighting forces, and the taking of all steps necessary to secure the required reinforcements for this purpose.

My hon. friend from Assiniboia moved on the floor of the convention to amend that by adding the words "by compulsion, if necessary."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NEELY: Before you rap the gavel, Sir, I hope you will take this unseemly interruption into consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will give the hon. member full credit for any interruptions, but I might point out that I think he is going rather far afield. The question before the House is the third reading of the War-time Elections Act.

Mr. NEELY: My point is this—in this War-time Elections Act the Government have broken faith with the men on this side of the House who supported the Military Service Bill, and I am asking the reason why. I am asking whether or not these resolutions of the Winnipeg convention were the foundation for this change of front on the part of the Government. My hon. friends opposite applauded too soon. I want to tell them that before the Liberal members of this Parliament went to the Winnipeg convention they had a conference in the precincts of this House, and passed certain win-the-war resolutions, which were supposed to be the basis of a resolution that we hoped would be adopted by the Winnipeg convention. In that resolution, which was given to the press by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), there was not a single word of reference to compulsion or conscription, except that the idea was implied, just as it is implied in the win-the-war resolution passed by the Winnipeg convention. We reached that understanding by common agreement. I am sure hon. gentlemen will not question the good faith of my hon. friend from Red Deer on this point, who I am sorry is not in his seat to confirm what I say. But he was the man who in our little caucus in the precincts of this House was absolutely set and opposed to having the word compulsion or conscription in a win-the-war resolution, because he said the object should not be to emphasize the idea of compulsion or conscription, but to emphasize the idea of national service. It was because of that agreement reached by the Liberal members of this House who voted for the Military Service Bill, that the word compulsion or conscription was deliberately kept out of the resolution, although the idea was implied in it. I have the resolutions adopted by the so-called Conscriptionist Liberals in this House before the Winnipeg convention was held. On that basis the Resolutions Committee of the Winnipeg Liberal convention agreed unanimously on the win-the-war resolution, with the exception that my hon. friend from Assiniboia moved his amendment in committee. He could not find a seconder, however, because every member of that committee, every conscriptionist member of that committee, felt that the resolution covered everything that was necessary to secure Canada's maximum effort for the winning of the war.

In moving his amendment the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) deliberately —I will not say maliciously, because you would rule me out of order, Sir—broke faith with his colleagues in this House and with his colleagues on the Resolutions Committee in Winnipeg, when he went on the floor of the convention and moved his amendment to the second clause of the win-the-war resolution. His amendment could not be accepted, for the reason that we could not submit to its implication that we were passing a win-the-war resolution which did not mean everything it said. If that resolution is the reason why the men on this side of the House who voted for the Military Service Bill are to have a large number of their constituents disfranchised, then I say we have obtained a very raw deal from the present Government.

Mr. McCREA: What else could you expect?

Mr. NEELY: In my judgment, the present measure negatives the sincerity of every effort that has been made by the Prime Minister in the weeks and months gone by for the formation of a National Government in this country, because the right hon. gentleman knows that he cannot secure representative men from western Canada at all events to enter his Government and pass such a measure as this and put it on the statute books. It is true he may secure the support of certain members on this side of the House, but they are very few, and I want to say further, that if they are so secured, those men no longer represent Liberalism in this House or in the country, because they not only have voted with the Government on the Military Service Bill, but they have voted with the Government to force through Parliament by closure every autocratic measure they could devise. I say these men have ceased to be representatives of Liberalism in this House or in this country, and a Government that included them would in no sense be representative of the great Liberal party throughout Canada. To my mind the effect of this measure has negatived the sincerity of the efforts of the Prime Minister to secure what he calls union or national government. The first blow he gave to that movement was when he sent Sir Clifford Sifton West to mobilize the sentiment of western Canada in favour of the proposition of a national government. I am told that that hon. gentleman had even portfolios in his pocket which he was prepared and authorized to submit to certain western leaders if they could be secured for the formation of a national government.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman's statement is absolutely inaccurate. I did not send Sir Clifford Sifton West; he went entirely of his own initiative, and so far as I am aware he had not the promise of any portfolio to any one.

Mr. NEELY: The country will be very glad to know that, because the people failed to understand why preceding that Winnipeg convention Sir Clifford Sifton made it a point to go West and make the speeches he did. Evidently he had the blessing of the Prime Minister, if he had not his actual endorsation or authority. I may tell you that the West has no use for Sir Clifford Sifton. The people believe he betrayed them in 1911, and so far as he is concerned the West is short on faith and long on memory. I think I have almost reached the limit of my time, although there were some interruptions. I presume there is no hope the present Government will abandon this measure. I wish to say to this House that I go back to my constituents with shame and sorrow in my heart.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEELY: That is the way with hon. gentlemen opposite. They often go off at half cock. I go to my constituents with shame and sorrow in my heart that any representative body of men in Canada, let alone this Parliament, should mete out to innocent men such a measure of injustice as this Bill proposes. The people I speak for are in every respect law-abiding citizens, who have given freely of their substance for war effort, and who have refused no form of national service; nevertheless they are disfranchised, and their political rights are taken away without any pretext that hides a purely partisan motive. I make my protest, and if it were the last word I should speak in this Parliament—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEELY: —but it is not going to be, and hon. gentlemen need not worry about that. If it were the last word I were to speak in this Parliament I would declare that this measure is unjust, unBritish, autocratic, and damnable to the very last degree.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw the last adjective. It is not properly used.

[Mr. Neely.]

Mr. NEELY: Then, I withdraw it, but I looked in Webster and I find the meaning of the word "damnable" is "worthy of condemnation."

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be better to use the expression "worthy of condemnation."

Mr. NEELY: Therefore, to make my protest effective, I beg to move the following amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be again referred to the Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to amend it by eliminating from it all such provisions as tend to remove the franchise from any class of His Majesty's subjects who are now qualified electors according to the laws of the province in which they reside.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Saint-Hyacinthe) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall improve the twenty minutes, allowed to us by the rules of this House to express my views upon the Bill now under discussion, and also upon the proposed amendment. I shall make my observations as concise as possible and I wish to enter my most formal protest against this piece of legislation submitted to us.

To give emphasis to the views I entertain, I may say that the present Bill is the last born of a whole family originating and conceived in the most absolute iniquity; that it is worthy of its authors and also that it does not disown its elders.

The Bill under discussiion is iniquitous by the fact it grants the electoral franchise as it does. It is doubly iniquitous because it takes away that same franchise from those who now are entitled to it. Let me use the comparison which has already been instituted on several occasions in this House. It has been said that the franchise legislation laid before this Parliament would be worthy of the German Kaiser. I think it is doing an injustice to the Kaiser, to compare him to this Government.

The German Kaiser, Mr. Speaker, fights in broad daylight; he sticks to the conviction that in order to maintain his Empire, might conquers right; he does not hide himself, but fights in the open. And to show to what extent he is imbued with that doctrine, he does not fear to take the offensive. For that principle, he struggles, although the majority of his people complain that the populations are dispersed, the territories devastated, but he, the emperor of Germany, knowing that this principle is at the very root of his power, scoffs at the civilized world and faces, so to say, the whole world. He has let loose upon mankind a beast which he had unmuzzled and it will require the united efforts of civilization to overcome the ferocious animal Now, Mr. Speaker, is there not some grandeur in that act?

Everyone hopes that Prussianism, such as it has been created by the Kaiser and those who surround him, shall be some day crushed; but we must nevertheless give it that credit that it fights for a principle and that it has the courage of facing its enemies.

Now, what do we see in this House? The most iniquitous measures, the most unjust and the most outrageous to the liberty of the citizens, are introduced into Parliament and in what way? As the sponsor for such a Bill, they pick out the man with the softest, the mellowest voice, a real eunuch's voice, might I say to express its full justness and sweetness. Well! I shall denounce that Act for just what it is. It is the worst legislation ever submitted to this Parliament. The Alsatians and the Lorraines have had to bear the yoke of Germany during forty-seven years; they have incessantly longed for the coming of the French armies and, in this heroic war, overflowing with memorable facts, no action has gone more quickly to the heart than that visit of General Joffre to Alsace and Lorraine, at the head of his victorious armies. That illustrious general thought he could do nothing better than to put a kiss upon the burgomaster's cheek, saying: "This kiss I give you, I give it to you in the name of France—you will again become French."

Well, Mr. Speaker, is it not pushing irony to its extreme limit to say to these gentlemen who originally came from Alsace and Lorraine, who bear impressed on their features and in their hearts that nobleness characteristic of the French race: "You are German subjects and, by virtue of this Act, you no longer have any voice in Canada's business management." Is it not the same for the Slavs and the Moravians, whose fellow citizens are still groaning under the yoke of Austria-Hungary? Their eyes and their hearts are turned towards the Allies, anxiously expecting the blessed hour of deliverance; but because they are weighed down under the foe's oppression, are they to be denied their rights? And what is to be said of the Italians born in the Trentino or Triest? At her very entering into the conflict, Italy sent her armies towards these provinces; her soldiers crossed the Alps and sprang to the relief of their brothers crushed under the yoke of Austria-Hungary.

Technically, they are our foes, but all their aspirations, all their hope rest upon the Allies' victory. These are the people you are treating as enemies, by disfranchising them, and that for the only reason that Providence has willed that they be born within a territory that happened to be under the domination of Austria-Hungary. Mr. Speaker, this is an iniquity from beginning to end, but I may immediately add that it does not surprise me.

The Government are to-day forging the last link of the chain around their necks and we intend to use that chain, not to strangle them, but to drag them before the bar of public opinion. In spite of all the Prussian laws and all the iniquities committed by the authors of those laws, which have no other object but the muzzling of the people, public conscience will rise; there will be a start among the people and the Government will pay the penalty for the injustice they are to-day committing by disfranchising citizens whose only wrong is of having been born in enemy territory. These citizens, anxious to have a place under the sun of freedom, went into exile and came to our shores, trusting our rulers' good faith when they told them, through their agents, that, should they comply with certain obligations, they would enjoy the same privileges as the native Canadians. They wanted to escape from a tyrannic government, and believing that freedom reigned here, they came over to Canada.

They have found it so, they have had it until now. When they decided to leave their native land in order to enjoy liberty, they came and settled here in order to help us in developing Canada; but they will find out that, even in Canada, there are still people who do not hesitate in laying their hands upon individual liberty, and denying to citizens of this country their rights. Why? Because, in certain quarters, it is believed that those people might vote against the Government.

Mr. Speaker, if the present Government had the courage of the German Kaiser, to whom its members have been compared, they would have framed a very simple Bill; an explicative clause, and then an organic one.

The explicative section would have stated: the word "person" means the whole male and female population of Canada;

Section first and only section: "Every person believed to be in favour of the Government shall have the right to vote and all the others shall be denied that right."

It is plain sailing, as you see. But no, that would have smacked too much of Prussianism; and these gentlemen have a refined Prussianism of their own.

They want to befool the people they are about to disfranchise, into the belief that they are doing them an actual service by denying them the franchise; those, at least, who have approved or condemned the Administration who are about to go before the country, they had the right to vote, and that right is taken away from them. Why are they denied their franchise? Ah, Sir, for a very simple reason: the Government wants to stand by the Tory doctrine. The Tory party believe they have the absolute right to rule mankind; it is their divine right to administer public affairs and when, unfortunately, they are turned out of office, we all recall their moanings and their groanings. Had they both the courage and the power, they would enact that never must the Liberal party aspire to administer the affairs of the country, because the country's affairs, just as its citizens, must be the absolute property of the Tory party. And the present Bill only reflects the light which strikes those who are now ruling us.

Mr. Speaker, the women of this country, who did not ask the franchise, have it given to them. Upon what principle? Is it to replace the soldiers' vote? Oh, no! If however, they had said: every man who has risked his life to go and defend the country, to fight for the triumph of Liberty, Justice and Civilization, should have a proxy in order that, when the day of voting shall come, he may be heard from and, if he has made the supreme sacrifice and his body lies buried somewhere in the soil of old Europe, that he may have a proxy who will express, in his name, his approval or his disapproval of the Government we have had for the past six years.

Not only shall the soldier vote, but all the women of his family are enfranchised. The Government are carrying things to such extremes that they do not hesitate to enact class legislation; the Government, instead of enacting have from the standpoint of public interest are resorting to expedients in order to get another lease of power.

Had I the time to do it, Mr. Speaker, I using the language which you seem to understand so well, I should like to emphasize, the comparison I wish to institute with regard to these hon. gentlemen.

Every man, on his deathbed, looks back to his past life, with remorse and regrets his errors; the adulterer remembers with distress the wrong done to his wife; the thief laments having taken his neighbour's goods; the drunkard remembers with sorrow the ruin he has heaped up during his lifetime, the wrong done to his wife and children, and on his dying bed, he wishes he could get a longer lease of life and turn over a new leaf.

There is only one being in the world who, upon his dying day, is impervious to remorse. It is the gambler. He also regrets life, not in order to change his ways for the better, should he begin life over again, but that he might again feel all his heart-strings quiver, all his fibres move and feel the full delight of handling the gold he risks and of heaping up the gold he wins from his gaming companions.

The Government is like unto the gambler. The Government is impervious to remorse for, to feel remorse, one must have a conscience, and this Government has no conscience, it can have no remorse. I say that this Bill shows it to the eyes of the people such as it actually is and far from demanding that it be voted down and thrown out or amended, I say: Let it stand such as it is, let it be crystallised into law, and the future generations will say that, in the year of our Lord 1917, this country was unfortunate in being ruled by an Administration steeped in Toryism to an extent unprecedented in the history of this country.

Mr. ETHIER (Two Mountains) (translation): Mr. Speaker, just as I have entered my protest against the passage of the Compulsory Military Service Act, which the Government have imposed upon the country, but which they have not yet attempted to put into force—a thing which, I hope, they will have no occasion to do before the coming general elections so that it may remain in the statutes of 1917 as a dead letter,—just as I did put on record my protest against the no less iniquitous Act for the acquisition of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern, so do I believe it my duty, again to-day, in spite of the closure rule, although a servile majority has been ready, for days and weeks, to endorse every iniquity of the autocratic Government we have, in spite of all the crushing arguments brought forward to prevent that Act becoming law, I believe it is my duty to register once more my protest against such measures.

Upon the second reading of this Bill, I gladly voted against that second reading and in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition. It was with the same pleasure and conviction that I registered my vote in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). The amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition reads as follows:

"That this Bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved, that the abridgment by this Parliament of the electoral franchise now enjoyed in any province of the Dominion by any class of His Majesty's subjects would be contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

I say that I have voted in the country's interest, generally, and in that of my constituents in particular, when I registered my vote—in spite of the entreaties of the hon. Prime Minister and of those who so slavishly follow him—in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John and which contained two points, to wit:

That the said Bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved, that in the opinion of this House it is not desirable, as provided by the said Bill, to disfranchise large numbers of people of Canada who have taken the oath of allegiance, have been guaranteed the rights of citizenship in the name of His Majesty the King, and who have not failed to discharge all the obligations of citizenship;

And further that it be resolved that any measure granting the franchise only to a limited number of women, as proposed by the Bill, is contrary to the public interest, and fails to recognize the splendid patriotic work which has been performed by the women of Canada generally during the present war

I again contend that, although siding with the minority of this House, we are however voting with the majority of the people and that, in moving this amendment, the hon. member for St. John was only voicing the sentiments of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, the Bill which is called the "The War-time Elections Act", should more properly by known as The Election-time Vote Making Act. Such a title would be justifiable, since from the wording of this Act the Government has the right to make votes by extending the electoral franchise to a certain class of the female population, believing that by adding to the electoral lists the names of 400,000 extra voters, it may still have in the next Parliament a majority just as truly and servilely at its command as the one it has to-day.

They think they can justify this Bill by saying that it is for the Empire's welfare that the mothers, daughters and sisters of the soldiers be granted the franchise. They also state, to justify that iniquity, that it is a case of justice to grant them such a right. It seems to me Mr. Speaker, that there is a far more practical way of doing justice to them.

In 1915, when the Government brought down a Bill giving the soldiers the right to vote, we did not object to the passing of that Bill, but I wonder why the Government have seen fit to further extend that right, after the recent experience of British Columbia and the rather distressing consequences that have resulted from it.

If the Government want at any cost to do justice to the mothers, wives and daughters of our soldiers, there is, I repeat it, a far more practical way of doing so; it would be by assisting them in a pecuniary manner. As a matter of principle, I am opposed to extending the franchise to women; however, this is a debatable question and, on that point, my own opinion is that women in general and mothers have a nobler part to play than to meddle with our political life and serve the interests of certain politicians too often untrustworthy. It seems to me that a splendid way to aid the mothers, wives or daughters of our soldiers, would be to increase the pensions granted them in 1914. The conditions are no longer the same that existed at that time; indeed, the cost of living has increased from 50 to 60 per cent, I might even say 100 per cent, and yet the mother, whose only support has enlisted, draws to-day from the Government the same pension, which is $20 for a private, $25 for sergeant, $30 for a lieutenant, $40 for a capitain, $50 for a major and $60 for a lieutenant-colonel. Well, Mr. Speaker, why not give the woman an increase in her pension proportionate to that in the cost of living? Is it just that a man who is exposing his life in the interest of the Empire and of civilization, should only leave his wife or his mother, whose sole support he is, the paltry sum of $20 a month? If the Government means to do something for those mothers, let it start in by increasing that pension which to-day is a derisive one. Should it do this, I am sure those women would not ask anything else.

The Government imagines that the women, whose names shall be put on the electoral list, will vote for it; for my part, I am sure of the contrary and the coming elections will show you that the vast majority are against this Government.

To justify this Bill, the Government has seen fit to recall the sacrifices those women have accomplished, and that it was only fair that this privilege be granted them. If, Mr. Speaker, this Act is fair towards this class of women, is it not unfair for another class still more numerous? Women and young girls have sacrificed themselves since 1914, have ruined their health in the mills and in the munition shops; others have worked night and day to help our soldiers, and lastly, others again have given their time and their energy for the success of all kinds of works in order to relieve the Belgians, the French, in the regions laid waste, as welle as the Poles and the Serbians. Is it not unfair, Mr. Speaker, to refuse them a privilege which is granted to others?

By virtue of the second part of this Bill, British citizens are deprived of their right to take part in the country's affairs, a right they had acquired by their labour, and that because they fear that the great majority of those voters might declare themselves against the present Government. That Act, Mr. Speaker, is worthy of another country than the one we live in. It is not in conformity with the liberties of which the British flag is the emblem. To judge such an Act at its value, we must recall that the citizens who are to be disfranchised came into this country more than fifteen years ago, that they have contributed to its development by their labour, and moreover that, since their coming here, they have contributed their full share to the administration's expenditure and to the war expenditure. But you do not hesitate to commit such an injustice.

Mr. RAINVILLE (presiding) (translation): I wish to point out to the hon. member that Parliamentary procedure demands that he address himself to the Chair.

Mr. ETHIER (translation): Mr. Speaker, by depriving these citizens of their right to vote, the Government are in direct contradiction with the Act they caused to be passed in 1914 concerning naturalization. In 1914, the Government saw fit to amend the Naturalization Act by stipulating that the period of residence required from an alien should be five instead of three years, if I remember well; and, on the other hand, wishing to give these aliens more extensive rights, it was provided—what did not exist in the Naturalization Act—that, in the future, all citizens naturalized under this Act would have all the rights of British citizens throughout the British Empire. To those people, who have been naturalized for three years, were given the rights of Imperial citizens and it is those very rights they want to take away from them to-day.

Those who have become naturalized have taken the oath of allegiance, they have sworn fealty to the King of England. But, if these gentlemen have taken an oath, they have the right, in return, that the pledge given by the British Crown—when the civil courts granted their request by which they asked to become British citizens—they have the right, I say, to expect that the pledges made by the British Crown be respected. What is that pledge? The very text which the judge reads, in His Majesty's name, to the naturalized citizen, is as follows:

> This is therefore, to certify to all whom it may concern that, under and by virtue of the said Act, the said A. B. has become naturalized as a British subject and is, within Canada, entitled to all the political and other rights, powers and privileges, and subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled.

What do they now do with that pledge? They go back on it, they repudiate it, they treat it as a scrap of paper. It is worthy of the Teuton spirit, it is worthy of the Boche spirit, which seems to especially animate, for some weeks past, the hon members opposite and the present Cabinet. Mr. Speaker, is it fair to disfranchise 50,000 citizens who will not have the advantage of being able to say, when the people of the Dominion will be called upon to judge the Government, that they condemn the methods which have characterized the present Administration and especially the Militia Department, since the inception of the war?

With their "Win-the-War" cry, the Government believe they can make the electorate forget all their turpitude since 1911; they think they can thus cause the people to forget all the scandals which have marked their passing upon the ministerial benches and which have defiled Canada's political history; but the electorate will have their revenge.

Will those whom you are disfranchising be called upon to pay the $600,000,000 which the Government has borrowed to meet the war liabilities? Will those forty or fifty thousand disfranchised citizens be asked to pay the income tax which the Minister of Finance has put in the statute books during this session? Will they be exempted from paying the pension funds to the families of the soldiers who have fallen on the fields of honour and for the disabled soldiers now returned or for those who will come back after the war? No, and yet all their rights are taken away from them. They take away their right to say what they think of the present Administration, and still they will compel them to pay.

There is another clause in the Bill which is also an iniquity, that which says that the man who will not answer the call, under the Compulsory Military Service Act, will lose his right to vote.

Yes, this is another iniquity of the reign of terror, of the reign of despotism and, in spite of the efforts of my hon. friend, the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau), the Government would not listen to his suggestions, they bring us back to the Elections Act previous to 1896, to the old institution of revisors which the Laurier Government had abolished. However, the Franchise Act has better operated in the country since 1896 than under the old Chapleau Act.

Instead of leaving the preparation of this list, created by this nefarious Bill, in the hands of competent persons, such as the municipal secretary-treasurers—I refer to the province of Quebec—an enumerator shall be needed, not only in every voting district, but in every polling division, as stated in section 42 (1) of the Bill as amended.

This section 42 (1) reads as follows:

Subject to the provisions of section 65A of this Act, the Governor in Council may appoint enumerators in each province to make lists of the electors in each electoral district, and the returning officer of each electoral district shall assign one of such enumerators to each polling division therein: by inserting between the words "such" and "appointments" in the first line of subsection (2) of said section the words "or sufficient", and by striking out of the ninth line of said subsection (2) of said section the words "one or more polling divisions" and inserting instead the words "polling division;" by striking out from the fourth line of subsection (1) of section 46 the words "or each of the polling divisions" and by adding as subsections (2) and (3) to said section the following.

It is evident that the returning officer, who will be a creature of the Government, will appoint an enumerator of his own choice, who may himself operate the machinery to suit his taste, in the hands of his creatures—and they call that "fair play." Thus, in the rural counties, if there is one with four polling divisions, there will be four enumerators. The provincial Act works well; the federal Act has worked well since 1896, and the preparing of the lists was in the hands of the secretary-treasurers. In the province of Quebec, in September, the secretary-treasurers have completed the electoral list for every polling division. From September 15 to 30, those who find they have been wronged may complain, have the required corrections made and the municipal council, after September 30, if there are any complaints, must revise the electoral list, from October 1 to October 15. This costs nothing to the country and it is done by competent parties. You know those facts, Mr. Speaker.

Upon the whole, I say that this iniquitous and unjust Bill will be a cause for corruption in the making out of the lists and in the application of this Act.

Mr. Speaker, I bow down, my time is up, I am done.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. PROULX (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, when this war was declared, about three years ago, all classes in this country responded to the call of the Government to enlist and go across the ocean to help Great Britain and her Allies. There was no distinction of race or creed in the call or in the response. No opposition was offered by any party in this country to the participation of Canada in the war. When the first war session was called in August, 1914, the Liberal party unanimously supported the policy of the Government and voted the money asked for by the Government to equip, organize and send the troops across the seas. Now the Government propose to disfranchise some of the people who responded to that call. If they did not answer the call by enlisting, they answered it by contributing generously to the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross Fund, and other patriotic works. Shortly after the outbreak of the war I remember hearing the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) express his belief that people of Austrian and German extraction would be loyal to the British flag and to the country of their adoption. Nothing has happened since to change that opinion and belief of the Prime Minister. There have been no acts committed by those subjects whom this Bill seeks to disfranchise to lead Parliament to believe that they do not deserve the rights of British citizens. I had always believed that citizenship carried with it the right and privilege of the suffrage. The first case which determined that point, as I remember, was the case of Ashby vs. White. In that case an elector was refused the right to cast his vote, by a returning officer, and he sued the returning officer for the restitution of his right. Under the common law in England it was decided that there was no infringement of rights without a remedy, and the court rendered judgment against the deputy returning officer, and declared that the right of the elector had been infringed, because British citizenship carries with it the right of determining who shall govern the country, and how its affairs shall be administered. Some of the subjects whom it is proposed to dispossess of the franchise came to Canada fifteen, twenty-five or thirty years ago. They did not all become naturalized immediately. Some of them came from the United States. They had been Americanized before they were Canadianized. They had learned the benefits and blessings of representative institutions. They had agreed to respect the American constitution and then afterwards the Canadian constitution, which is framed on the British constitution. They have worked for and increased the wealth of their adopted country. They had been invited by this Government to come here in large numbers. The countries of Europe were scoured by our immigration agents to find people to come and settle the unsettled plains of the western provinces. Now, Mr. Speaker, for political purposes, for the purpose of retaining power, the Government propose to infringe the most sacred rights of citizenship and to disfranchise a large class of people who have shown themselves to be loyal, who have shown that they love the country of their adoption, and some of whom have offered their services as soldiers in the armies of the Allies. Those who have not offered their services have given largely of their means to help the cause. I remember that when it was rumoured that a Franchise Bill would be presented by the Government to disfranchise a certain number of people in this country, one of the principal organs of the Government, the Montreal Gazette, discouraged the Government from bringing such a measure before the House and condemned any measure of disfranchisement. Another of the principal organs of the Government, the Mail and Empire of Toronto, in an article published on the 7th of this month, justified this measure only on the plea that the Liberals had opposed the extension of Parliament and had refused to join in a union or national government. That is the only excuse offered by that journal for this action of the Government. One of the principal newspapers of this country, which, though not usually supporting the Government has been supporting it on the Military Service Bill and other important measures, strongly condemns this Bill. In an article which appeared on the 7th of this month, the Toronto Globe had this to say:

The Disfranchising Bill.

The War-Time Election Bill is a party measure. The attack on the political rights of a large group of foreign-born Canadians is tempered by their exemption from combatant service, but the principle of the Bill is wrong. It is inconsistent with national honour and British traditions. When men of alien birth were given their naturalization papers they were also given the full privileges of Canadian citizenship. It was a contract to which the good faith of the country was pledged. The Bill will cancel the chief article of the contract, the franchise, without proof that the voter has forfeited it by conduct unbecoming a patriotic Canadian. The presumption of innocence until guilt be proved, which underlies the common law, is reversed. It is true that the disability applies only to men who have been naturalized within the past fifteen years, but the country offered them the franchise three years after their arrival, in order to hasten the process of Canadianizing them. It is now proposed to deprive them of the badge of citizenship.

The Bill is aimed at the large element in the West of German and Austrian birth. These men came to Canada to escape the conditions of life in their native lands, and they came upon the invitation of the Canadian people, whose agents scoured Europe for immigrants to till the empty prairies. They have added immeasurably to the wealth of the country. During the war they have given no trouble as a class; one hears no echo among them of the seditious propaganda of Teutons across the line. Many are Ukrainians—the Galician branch of the family—whose sympathies, formerly with Austria, though never troublesomely so, have turned to Russia since the Revolution, which has given a new hope and vision to their race in Europe. Disfranchisement will be only for the period of the war, but the memory of it will survive for a generation, and will tend to undo the great work of assimilation carried on by the schools, the churches, and, not least, by the ballot, the pledge of their civil and political equality. The Bill is therefore not good national policy. It is more German than Canadian or British in its character.

I think this Bill and its provisions are very well characterized by this article of the Globe. It is my belief that this is not a Bill which is fathered by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) or even by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). I believe that my right hon. friends, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who come from the Maritime Provinces, who were reared in the provinces bathed by the sea, who have breathed the freedom of those provinces and of Canada, would not be guilty of such an infringement of British and Canadian rights. I rather ascribe this measure to the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen). He comes from the West, and in the West, well, they take chances—they are more addicted to gambling; they do things that are not done in the eastern provinces. I believe that this is a penalizing measure, and that if the negotiations for a union and national government had succeeded the measure, would not have been introduced. But as these negotiations did not succeed, I believe the Secretary of State brought this measure before the House with a vengeance, he wanted to get even with those infernal Grits of the West who did not want to join with this Government. The Liberals of the West would not join with this Government, especially after they introduced their measure to purchase the shares of the Canadian Northern railway, and to punish them, the Secretary of State has brought in this measure to decrease the strength of the Liberal party in the West. As the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said this afternoon, this measure is a menace to the union and to harmony between the races in this country; it is going to create disunion and discord. We had union and harmony until this year, but by the Military Service Act and the Soldiers' Voting Act, and now by this nefarious Bill, the union and harmony of this country are again threatened. Not only are they threatened, but the union is disrupted, and will remain disrupted, probably, for many years to come.

The Government say that this measure is only for the time of the war. But the war may end next year and Parliament will still be elected for five years. There will be important questions after the war which will affect the people whom this Bill disfranchises as well as those who retain the right of the franchise. A very considerable war debt will be contracted, and this debt will have to be paid, if not the capital at least the interest. The money will have to be got somewhere from somebody. The people disfranchised by this Bill will not be exempt from taxation, but they will have no voice in the election of members of this Parliament. This Parliament will be elected for five years, and if the war ends next year they will be sitting for four years without these people having had one word to say in the election of their members and the framing of the policies of the Government. Not only the right of franchise, but also the principle that there should be no taxation without representation will be infringed upon. That is a principle which has been held sacred in all British countries—that there should be no taxation without representation. It has always been held sacred in Canada. In the municipalities you would not think of taxing a person without giving him a vote and a voice in the election of members of the municipal council. These people will have to pay the income tax, and the customs tariff tax, and they will have to put war stamps on the patent medicines they buy and on the cheques or promissory notes they issue, just as do other citizens. They will not be exempt from war taxes, but still they will have nothing to say in the administration of the affairs of the country. Two great principles always recognized by the British constitution, the right of the suffrage with British citizenship and the principle that there shall be no taxation without representation, are violated by this Bill.

There is one feature of the Bill which particularly I do not like. When we were in committee the Secretary of State said that the enumerators who are to prepare the lists will be appointed by the deputy returning officers. I suggested then that these enumerators should be appointed by the judges, as some of the members of the local tribunals under the Military Service Act are appointed. We know that those appointed by the Government are usually friendly to the Government, and oftentimes partisan. The Secretary of State said they would be appointed by the deputy returning officers, who, as a rule, are fair. I believe that, as a general rule, the deputy returning officers are fair; but the deputy returning officers do not prepare the lists. By reading the Bill, I see that the minister did not fairly state the position. The enumerators are not appointed by the deputy returning officers, but by the Governor in Council. That means that they will be recommended by the sitting member or the defeated candidate, the person who has control of the patronage, and the Secretary of State on this recommendation will appoint them. All that the deputy returning officers will do is to assign their work to them. We have no guarantee that they will even be residents of the municipalities in which they will do the work. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) wanted to have it inserted in the Bill that those appointed should be resident, and should be the secretary-treasurers of the municipalities in Quebec, as they are familiar with all the electors; and some members from Ontario also suggested that the municipal clerks of Ontario should be appointed enumerators. But the Secretary of State would not accept any of those suggestions, although they were fair— and the Government pretends that it wants to be fair, that it wants fair enumerators and a fair list. If it wants to be fair, why will it not accept the suggestions made by hon. members on this side and have impartial men appointed as enumerators so as to insure a fair enumeration and a fair list?

My hon. friend from Three Rivers asked the Secretary of State to assure us that these men would be qualified. We have no assurance that they will be qualified. I believe the only qualification will be that these men must be friendly to the Government. That will certainly be their main qualification. I say that these officials will have too much discretion and too much latitude. They can take names off the list, as well as add names to it. On what evidence will they take names off the list? There is no provision in the Bill in regard to that. They will take the Ontario lists prepared in 1916. The Bill does not provide that they shall hear evidence, but they will use their own discretion, and take names from the list for certain reasons. If these officials are partisans, they will perhaps act unjustly. In order to secure the benefit of the vote of those men whose names are taken off the list, the voters will have to appear before a judge and testify. Their vote will only be received on a recount, after their right to vote has been established before a judge. I think the Secretary of State should have accepted some of the suggestions made on this side of the House, and should have given us an assurance that the enumerators would be fair men, and that a proper list would be prepared, for a fair list is the very basis of an election. The Government should not load the dice. The Government has secured enough advantage by the passing of the Soldiers' Votes Bill, and the provision that these votes may be distributed to any county the voters designate. The provision permitting the bunching of the votes gives them enough advantage, without giving the enumerator the right to take voters from the list. I should like to make further remarks about this Bill, but those who follow me will be able to show many deficiencies in the Bill and I certainly intend to vote for the amendment and against the motion for third reading.

Mr. W. G. WEICHEL (North Waterloo): Many measures have been introduced into this House since Canada's participation in the war commenced, but I venture to say to-night that none apart from the Military Service Bill, created a greater interest throughout the country than the present Franchise Bill. It is a pity that there is a necessity at all for introducing a measure of this kind. I don't wish to put all the blame on other men's shoulders, but I cannot view the matter in any other light than that the blame for the introduction of the present Franchise Bill must be placed on the shoulders of the present Opposition, because, had they agreed to an extension of the life of Parliament, as the country demanded, and had we had coalition or union government, the necessity of this Bill would absolutely have been obviated. I wish to say a few words with regard to the measure in its present form, and I do not wish to follow my hon. friend from Prescott (Mr. Proulx), as my line of thought will lead me in a different direction. I am greatly in favour of the feature in this Bill which provides for the granting of female suffrage to the relatives of the soldiers at the front. I have been in different parts of Canada, and have never yet met with any man or woman who was not greatly in favour of this particular section which grants suffrage to the wives and other relatives of the soldiers at the front. The Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen), in so ably describing the measure the other day, stated that the basis of franchise was service and sacrifice. We all know what sacrifices have been made by the men who have left the soil of Canada during the last three years. We know that 30,000 of these brave men lie buried in France, and that thousands of them are to-day prisoners in the prison camps in Germany, suffering untold hardships, no doubt. We also know that others, on account of doing special military service, will not be privileged to vote during this election campaign. We must not forget that the personality of a man in his own district counts for a great deal during an election campaign; and that personality to-day, owing to the fact that these men cannot be with us, is missing, and, therefore, I think a thousand considerations are being pressed home, that these men should be protected by someone here who can speak on their behalf. And that is being provided for by the Bill. I have heard several gentlemen on the opposite side of the House state that the women of this country feel insulted, because the Bill does not provide universal franchise for all the women of Canada. I have never heard anything of the kind in this country, and I believe I have travelled as much as most men in this House. In fact, I know that the women of this country are in perfect accord with the Bill in its present form, and, to prove that, I will take the liberty of reading a despatch which appeared in this morning's Journal-Press, dated Toronto, September 13. It reads:

A letter signed by Mrs. F. H. Torrington, Mrs. Albert Gooderham, Mrs. E. Stevens, and Mrs. L. A. Hamilton, and referring to the War-Time Election Bill, has been issued:

The ladies subscribing to the letter represent the National Equal Franchise Union, the Daughters of the Empire, the National Council of Women, and the Ontario W.C.T.U. The letter says:

"The result of numerous enquiries convinced these women that, considering the peculiar conditions which prevail at the present time in certain provinces and the uncertainty of the results in granting a full franchise, it would be desirable that a limited franchise should be given as a war measure in order that Canada may do her full part in the war and remain true to her sacred trust to the Canadian men now fighting the battle of freedom."

That resolution, coming from four of the most representative bodies of the women of Canada, proves conclusively, in my opinion at least—and I believe in the opinion of this House—that the Bill in its present shape is being received with favour throughout every part of Canada.

The other matter that I wish to refer to is the disfranchisement of alien enemies in the Dominion. I have not been in the West often enough to be familiar with the conditions that prevail there, but I do know something about the conditions existing among the people of German origin in Ontario—and I speak only for them. Last January, in the city of Kitchener, a rather lively municipal contest was held. As a result of that contest some ninety-six old men, who had been living in my constituency for from twenty-five to thirty years, were deprived of their citizenship because they could not produce their naturalization papers. All the blame and all the responsibility should not be placed upon the shoulders of those men; many of them, by taking the oath of allegiance in former years, felt that they were British subjects. The fault must be laid at the door of the politicians of the past, on men who should have known better; on men who should have advised these people that by the taking out of naturalization papers they might become British subjects. These people who now seek naturalization were pioneers in that district. The member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) says "Hear, hear." I know, Sir, that many of these people live in his riding; others live in the Hurons, the Bruces, the Perths, the Renfrews, and in many other parts of Canada. These people, I have said, were pioneers in that district; they helped to build up Waterloo county, and that county, not only prior to 1914, but since the outbreak of war, is held in the highest esteem by all right-thinking men in Canada. These men hold property, they have served on juries; they have served on school boards; in some instances they have acted as aldermen. You can rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that the present situation has produced many heartaches, many hardships, among these people. Their position is entirely different from that occupied by persons of foreign origin in other parts of Canada. The people in the county of Waterloo are not clannish; they intermarry with the English, Irish and Scotch. It is true that many differ from persons in other parts of the country in respect of the names that they bear, but so long as a man keeps his name free from suspicion; so long as he allows nothing to besmirch it, there is no reason in the world why he should change it.

Permit me to point out another difference between these people and other foreigners who come into our country. Take, for instance, the class of people who come from southern Europe—every hon. gentleman in the House knows to whom I allude. They stay here for a few years; they work in the shops; they accumulate a considerable amount of money—because it does not cost them a great deal to live—and after they have accumulated a small fortune they go back to the land of their birth, as the Chinese and Japanese do. You never see them stay here; many of them, when they come, do not intend to stay here. Such is not the case with the people of German origin in my riding, who have lived there thirty or forty years. They intend to make Canada their permanent home; they intend to live and die in this country. I ask the Parliament of Canada, therefore, that people of this class who have lived in Canada from twenty-five to fifty years be given some legal status in the matter of citizenship; that they be given some standing in the community. I ask that men of this description be allowed to take out naturalization papers; that is only a matter of fair play and justice. There has been no whisper of wrongdoing on the part of these people. I know that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) will say "aye" to everything that I have said tonight about the persons of German origin in Ontario. They have conscientiously done their duty in respect of everything pertaining to the war; they have given generously to Red Cross, Belgian Relief, and Patriotic Funds. Besides doing all these things because they believed it was their duty, many of them have sent sons to the front to fight with the boys of English, Scotch and Irish extraction. My brother's second son is at the front, and the eldest has by this time enlisted. As the member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) stated the other evening, quite a few of these boys of German origin have given up their lives on the battlefield. These boys enlisted only because they felt that it was their duty to do so. We are proud that in the constituency of North Waterloo over 300 boys of German origin enlisted; and many of them are to-day in the trenches in France. As a matter of simple justice, as a matter of right—because these people have been here not for five or ten years, but half a century longer than many of us can remember, I ask the Prime Minister and members of this House to back me up in my simple request that these people receive some standing in the community by being granted naturalization as soon as possible.

I wish to refer to a remark made by the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in this House the other day. He stated that at a patriotic meeting held in the little town of Elmira, he received a frigid reception. I believe that the hon. member is mistaken with regard to the sentiment that prevailed at that meeting. Elmira is my home town, my birthplace, and I think I know the people there about as well as any man does. They are not given a great deal in these days to handclapping and flag-waving, but my hon. friend's speech that night must have made a tremendous impression, because the secretary of the Patriotic Fund informed me to-day that the little town of Elmira stood almost as high as any town or village in Ontario in respect of the amount of money given. In justice, therefore, to the town of my birth, it is only fair and right that I should make this remark with respect to what the member for South Wellington said in this House. I do feel that he was entirely mistaken with regard to the sentiment that exists in that place.

I have placed my request before the Prime Minister and the members of the House; I feel that if it is granted the country will be the gainer. We must remember, Sir, that this is a cosmopolitan country. We invited these people to come here to be citizens of Canada, and they have accepted the invitation. They are here; they own property; they have tried to build up their part of the country, and in my riding they have succeeded wonderfully well in that respect. I therefore hope that the Prime Minister will see his way clear to granting some relief to these people, and I can assure him it will be very highly appreciated.

Let me read a clipping from the Detroit News of a few days ago. It is dealing with the situation across the border, which in my opinion is practically the same situation we have here, for theirs is a cosmopolitan population to a greater degree even than ours. The Detroit News says:

> Whatever has happened in the past three years, we should now begin to get our balance, and renew our trust and address ourselves to proving to our Canadian friends and fellow-citizens of German ancestry that a democracy is not merely a name, but that it has at its core a profound brotherly feeling of man for man, whatever his ancestry; that it means at root justice and fair dealing: that it means sympathy and love for those with real heart-aches; that it means mutual help and mutual service; that it means the strengthening and building of inseparable bonds of friendship and the banishment of doubts and fears; that a true democracy is a realm where each may do and must do his part for the help of all, and do that which he is qualified to do best for the upbuilding of the nation, which in plain truth means to make our neighbour wiser, stronger and better; that in thus making each citizen stronger we make the nation so powerful for right that might has no place in our life.

The conscientious objector when exemption from military service is granted is deprived of his voting privileges during the war-time election. In my riding I have many of this class, called Mennonites. I have lived among them all my lifetime and can vouch for their honesty of purpose and integrity of character. They are God-fearing people, whose faith teaches them to abstain from taking up arms. I can conscientiously say that they have lived up to their faith, and many of their leading men have intimated to me their desire not to take part in any war-time election.

Lastly, I hope that the Prime Minister may make a statement regarding the request I have placed before this House and the country.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) has made a personal appeal to me in the observations which he has just addressed to the House, it is proper that I should make a statement as to the policy of the Government in such matters. The Secretary of State spoke with regard to this matter the other evening, and I have little to add to what he placed before the House on that occasion. I entirely agree with what the hon. member for North Waterloo has said with respect to the good service which have been rendered to the country by the class of citizens to whom he referred. We all know that there are no more prosperous, progressive or thriving communities in the Dominion than those which have been built up by men of German descent in those counties in the province of Ontario to which my hon. friend has alluded. The remarks I am about to make will also have some application to certain conditions mentioned by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) a few days ago. It would appear that in the communities mentioned by these hon. gentlemen there are men who for twenty, thirty or forty years have been citizens of this country, and who during that period, or for the greater part of it at all events, have believed themselves entitled to exercise all the rights of British citizenship. They have voted at elections, taken the oath of allegiance, filled positions of trust and responsibility in the community, have served as aldermen and members of municipal councils; and they now find, sometimes to their surprise, that, although they have been engaged in all these national activities for many years, they have never been naturalized and have never technically acquired the rights of British citizenship.

At the commencement of the war there was correspondence with the British Government with regard to the granting of naturalization under the Act of 1914—the Act which was passed in that year both by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and by this Parliament, after a great deal of negotiation and after much discussion in both Parliaments. Hon. gentlemen will remember that under the terms of that Act naturalization is to be granted by the certificate of the Secretary of State, and not by a judicial tribunal as under the Act which was previously in force in this country. It will also be recalled that under the provisions of the previous Act the period of residence was three years instead of five, and that that Act conferred naturalization which was valid and effective in this country only, and not beyond the limits of our Dominion. The policy laid down by the British Government under the Act of 1914 was to refuse, during the period of the war, naturalization to men of alien enemy citizenship. We acquiesced in that policy, and we have hitherto acted upon it.

So far as naturalization under the law in force previously to the Act of 1914 is concerned, there has been a divergence of judicial opinion. The courts of the country were entrusted with the power of granting naturalization under that Act. In some of the courts it has been held that, notwithstanding the war, naturalization can still be granted in proper cases. Other courts have held that the existence of a state of war debarred the judges absolutely from granting naturalization to a person of enemy nationality.

The conditions in this country with regard to those who have come to Canada to make their home here are somewhat different from those which prevail in the United Kingdom, and we think that these differences of condition ought to be taken into account. The subject has been brought to our attention during recent weeks, and an Order in Council was passed only a few days ago, a copy of which will be laid on the table of the House either to-morrow or Monday. That Order in Council sets out the policy hitherto pursued will be in the ing naturalization under the Act of 1914 to persons of the class and character and residence described by my hon. friend from North Waterloo in the very interesting address which he has just given to this House. The purport of the Order in Council is this: That where men of enemy nationality have for many years resided in this country, where no exception can be taken to their character, and there is good reason for believing that their sympathies are with the Allied Powers in this war, where they have had reason to believe that they were British citizens and have exercised their rights as such, we shall depart from the principle hitherto pursued, and the Secretary of State for Canada will be prepared to grant naturalization to such persons. I am very glad to believe that this divergence from the policy hitherto pursued will be in the best interests of this country, and also that it will be appreciated by those who find themselves in the position described by my hon. friend from North Waterloo.

Sir WIFRID LAURIER: Is it the opinion of the officers of the Crown that the Governor in Council has that power under the statute?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes. It is a question of policy under the Act. While the policy of the British Government is of the character to which I have alluded, we have thought, in view of the considerations which have been brought to our attention in respect to persons falling within the description placed before the House by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, that it would be a proper departure from the policy heretofore pursued, for the Secretary of State for Canada to grant naturalization in such cases. That is the policy which will be pursued.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will my right hon. friend allow me? As a result of this, will the present Bill be amended or any supplementary legislation introduced to prevent these people from being disfranchised?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) put forward the question solely with regard to naturalization. We do not intend to alter the Bill already presented to the House. As the persons alluded to naturally feel that their status as citizens in this country has been affected by the fact that they have not been naturalized, although they have in the past exercised the rights and fulfilled the duties of British citizenship, it seems a proper and reasonable course, and a course which would be appreciated by them, if that divergence from the policy of the past to which I have alluded should now be undertaken. I entirely concur in what my hon. friend from North Waterloo has said as to the splendid efforts of these citizens of German descent in the province of Ontario in sustaining and assisting the Patriotic Fund. I very well remember that in the first appeal made on behalf of the Canadian Patriotic Fund in Canada, the citizens of Kitchener made it a point that they should surpass in their proportionate contributions any city or town in Canada. My recollection is that they pretty well succeeded in doing so. We have every appreciation of the loyalty and devotion thus displayed, and we believe that the course which I have indicated is no more than is just and fair under the circumstances.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Since the question of conscription was first brought into this House a few months ago, I have been endeavouring to treat all these matters in connection with winning the war as free as I possibly could of partisanship. It is a somewhat difficult position, especially as this afternoon I was made the subject of an attack by my friends on this side of the House. However, I do not pay very much attention to that. The question we are now discussing is the Franchise Act, and I look on the Franchise Act as more or less connected with winning the war.

Mr. PROULX: Winning the election, you mean.

Mr. TURRIFF: It is not necessary for any one to put words into my mouth. I know what I want to say, and I propose saying it in my own way. If I were disposed to do so, I might say that I think the winning of the election will have a great deal to do with the winning of the war. However, the question we are discussing tonight is the Franchise Act. I do not agree with all the features of the Franchise Bill now before the House. I cannot bring myself to believe that disfranchising anybody is a good policy or is a necessary policy for winning the war. During the local election held a short time ago in Saskatchewan, that question was up rather strongly, brought about principally by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). I took a strong stand then against disenfranchising anybody, and I do not propose to change my views on the subject, and on this occasion, in spite of the ill-natured remarks—as I take them to be—of my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) this afternoon, I intend to support his amendment. During this debate I have on two occasions voted in favour of the closure, and I did so feeling absolutely certain that as we are right at the closing of the term of Parliament, unless the closure were adopted this Bill would never have got through at all, and there would be no Election Act whatever, and we would be in a state of confusion. Judging by the bright speeches which have been made during the last two or three weeks under closure, better debates have taken place than when every member was given all the latitude he chose to take. My judgment is that many men on both sides of the House on this occasion have put as much into twenty minutes as would be put into an hour's and very often into two hours' discussion without closure. It seems to me when the next Parliament meets it would not be a bad idea, whichever party is in power, to take up the question of curtailing discussions in this House, and so shorten the sessions, that we may not be here six, or seven, or eight months.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

This Bill, as I look at it, is more or less of a party Bill. It could not be otherwise. It is brought in by one party. I think I am fair in saying that it is introduced more for winning the war than for any advantage to the Conservative party, because if my hon. friends on the other side of the House think the Bill will help them win elections for many years to come in the West, they are labouring under a delusion. However, whose fault is it that the Bill is brought in as a party measure? I think it is only fair to say that the right hon. leader of the Government has made every effort to have a union or national Government to bring in this measure. I feel that a much better measure could have been prepared by a union or national Government. At the same time, I do not think it is the fault of the present Government that we have not a national government to introduce this measure. In my judgment a national government would be better than any party government could possibly be during the war, and I am satisfied if we had a national government there would have been no necessity for disfranchising anybody. I would have preferred to put the matter squarely before all classes of people and take my chances. Possibly, by disfranchising certain classes of people, we may help win the war. This Bill may help elect a win-the-war government, but I am not so sure of that, and for what little advantage there may be in it I do not think it was worth while. If I understood my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) rightly this afternoon, he likened us twenty-six Liberals who had voted for conscription to Judases.

Mr. OLIVER: May I correct my hon. friend? I think I made myself perfectly clear when I alluded to the offers and counter-offers that were made across the floor of the House for positions in the Cabinet. I made no allusion to men who voted according to principles.

Mr. TURRIFF: That may be what was in my hon. friend's mind, but he certainly referred to members on this side of the House, although he did not have the courage to designate them, as my hon. friend from Humboldt had.

Mr. OLIVER: I think my hon. friend's conscience is bothering him.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend from Edmonton need not worry about my conscience. If the appellation Judas can be applied to a man who votes against his party, my hon. friend from Edmonton is certainly an authority on the subject. I remember that, not so many years ago, he made these halls ring with his denunciation of the very people he is now so anxious about, and he was voting against his party, which was in power then, almost as often as he was voting with it. However, he had a perfect right to do that if he wished, and I have no objection. I do object, however, to be called a Judas because on one occasion I have differed from my leader.

My leader, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), has been bigger, as we would naturally expect, than my hon. friend from Edmonton or my hon. friend from Humboldt. He said to every man on this side of the House: If you do not agree with my views, do exactly as you like. But the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for Humboldt apparently think that because a member on this side of the House takes that position, he must, if possible, be driven out of the party. I usually use my own judgment and nothing they can do, one way or the other, will influence me in the slightest degree as to what position I will take on this or any other question that may happen to come up.

The hon. member for Humboldt stated this afternoon that I had broken faith with the conscription Liberals by the action I took at the Winnipeg convention. I did nothing of the kind. He also stated that my amendment to the win-the-war motion that was brought up in the convention was unanimously voted against. If he had been watching—and he was on the platform—he would have found that some hundreds of votes were given in favour of my amendment.

Mr. NEELY: What I said, and it will be found in Hansard, was that the win-the-war resolution which I proposed was voted for unanimously, not that my hon. friend's motion was voted against unanimously.

Mr. TURRIFF: I accept the correction; I may have taken it wrongly. But, certainly, I broke faith with nobody, and if the resolution which my hon. friend moved in the convention was passed unanimously, what has taken place since then in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta shows that it was not unanimous with the Liberals of the country. Mr. Speaker, I have said what I wanted to say and I do not propose, even if the twenty minutes is not up, to take up any more of the time of the House. I am against disfranchising anybody, I will vote against that and I will vote for the amendment of my hon. friend from Humboldt.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention when I came here to-night to speak with regard to the measure which is now before the House but in view of the fact that the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) has moved a resolution which practically means that this House is asked to express an opinion as to the wisdom or otherwise of our putting into effect legislation that has the effect of disfranchising certain foreigners, coupled with the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), it becomes necessary that the attention of this House and the country should be directed for a minute or two to the tremendous change that has taken place in Germany in relation to the naturalization of men who have left that country and to the dual nationality that their law now recognizes. The prior law in Germany with reference to naturalization was the law of 1870, by a provision of which a German lost his nationality provided he had left Germany and remained abroad without interruption for ten years. The wonderful tendency towards settlement of the German people and the pan-German scheme, which seems to have influenced that race during the last fifteen years, brought about in Germany a great change of public opinion with the result that in 1913 a new law in reference to naturalization was passed. Some of its provisions were of the most unique and startling character. The general principle of international law seems to recognize that if a man chooses to expatriate himself and assume the nationality of the country in which he settles he loses the nationality which he formerly had and becomes a citizen of the new country. For instance, the British Naturalization Act 33-34 Victoria, chapter 14, section 6 says:

Any British subject who has at any time before or may at any time after the passing of this Act when in any foreign state and not under any disability voluntarily become naturalized in such state shall from and after the time of his so having become naturalized in such foreign state be deemed to have ceased to be a British subject and to be regarded as an alien.

That recognizes the general and fundamental principle of international law that when a man loses the citizenship of one state and assumes the citizenship of another he becomes a citizen of the new country and has no further right to look to his former country for protection or assistance.

If I might direct the attention of the House to what is commonly known as the Delbrück law, which was passed in Germany in 1913, I think it will be convinced that the Germans who have come to this country, as well as those who have settled throughout the world, occupy a very different position from others who assume to become naturalized in a foreign state. Section 25 of that law reads as follows:

A German who is neither domiciled nor permanently resident in Germany loses nationality on the acquisition of a foreign nationality if the latter is acquired on his application or on the application of the husband (in the case of a married woman or legal guardian in the case of a ward.) A married woman or ward, however, only loses nationality if the conditions are fulfilled under which a discharge could be applied for in accordance with sections 18, 19.

As I previously said, the law in force in Germany, prior to the passing of this law, was that a German who had left Germany for ten years and settled in a foreign country lost his German nationality and ceased to be a citizen of Germany. This law of 1913 laid down the new principle that a German did not lost his nationality unless he took steps voluntarily to acquire a new nationality. That is consistent with the English law that I have just read to the House and is consistent with the general principle of international law recognized throughout the world. But the German law did not stop there. In keeping with the sophistical tendency of German thinking, with the principle that recognizes that wherever a German goes he must, if possible, still be regarded as a German and with the wonderful capacity of the German people for colonizing throughout the world, a second clause, paragraph 25, was enacted in the Delbrück law of 1913, which reads as follows:

A person does not lose his nationality if, before acquiring a foreign nationality, he has applied for, and received, the written permission of the competent authorities of his home state to retain his nationality. Before the grant of such permission, the German consul is to be consulted.

What does that mean? It means that a man may have left Germany since 1913, or, as a matter of fact, may have left almost ten years before and he may have lived in Canada, but if he did not voluntarily, of his own free will, become a citizen of Canada prior to the passing of this Act, he has the right to apply in Canada to become a Canadian or a British subject, and though he may become naturalized as a British or Canadian citizen, he is still regarded by the German state as a German citizen and entitled to all the rights of German citizenship and German protection.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the law that the hon. member speaks of German law or Austrian law?

Mr. NICKLE: I am quoting from the German Imperial and State Nationality Law passed on the 22nd day of July, 1913, together with a memorandum prepared by the British Embassy at Berlin, the memorandum being presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of His Majesty in March, 1914.

Mr. OLIVER: I asked because 99 per cent of the foreign settlers in the West are not from Germany but from Austria.

Mr. NICKLE: At the present moment I am dealing with my attitude towards the amendment of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely), and the reason I will vote against it is that I believe the great problem before this country to-day is the winning of this war; I believe that, in the winning of this war, as a war-time election, to my regret, has become inevitable, we should endeavour to secure a fair expression of the people's will. We have some 300,000 men as members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who cannot take in this election the same interest as they otherwise would. We have from 25,000 to 30,000 men dead in Europe, and I do not know how many lying ill in the hospitals there or prisoners in Germany. I am not prepared to admit that under these circumstances the members of a State whose laws of naturalization admit that they may take the oath of allegiance that entitles them to become British citizens and at the same time retain their home nationality, should at a time like this, be entrusted with the franchise. If I understand at all the principle of naturalization, it is that, that when a man swears allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain, it means that he has cut himself off from his former state and that Great Britain has a right to expect his service and his sacrifice and his support. And I say that when another nation says: you may take that oath; you may deceive the state in which you are settling; you may conceal the facts from that nation and we will if you ask us still give you protection and regard you as a German citizen—its citizens are not entitled to the franchise in Canada. But the law does not stop there; some might argue that this is a little thing and does not amount to very much because very few would take advantage of it. But let us refer again to 1913 law and see how much further it went. The general principle of naturalization is that once a man has lost his nationality in one country he cannot re-acquire it unless he again settles in the country. Let me refer to section 13 of the same law:

A former German who has not settled in Germany—

Note, he has left Germany, has become naturalized in another country and has not returned to Germany.

A former German, who has not settled in Germany, may be naturalized on his application by the Federal state to which he formerly belonged if he fulfils the requirements of section 8, paragraph 1, numbers 1 and 2; the child or adopted child of a former German has the same legal position. The Imperial Chancellor is to be informed before naturalization; naturalization does not take place if the Imperial Chancellor raises objections.

The provisions of paragraph 8, to which reference is made, are:

A foreigner who has settled in Germany may be naturalized, on his application, by the Federal State in whose territory such settlement has taken place—

(1) If, according to the laws of his previous home state, he is absolutely capable of transacting business, or would be absolutely capable of transacting business in the eye of German law, or if the application is made in accordance with section 7, paragraph 2, section 2, by his legal guardian or with his assent.

(2) If he has led an irreproachable life.

What does that mean? It means that anybody who came to Canada from the very beginning of the colonization that took place in this country until to-day, could become a German citizen again if he cared to make application to Germany, although his residence was still in Canada, by demonstrating to those at home that he had a capacity to carry on business and that his character was good. It means that the entire German population of the Northwest, if they so desired, might lead us to believe that they were no longer Germans, having become naturalized in Canada prior to 1915 and that, having made application to the German authorities at home they might become German citizens and entitled to all privileges of that nationality. Are these men to be entitled to vote, men whom we have thought to be British citizens but whose native country permits them at the same time to be German citizens? Are they to be entitled to the franchise at a trying time in the history of Canada and to be let cast a ballot when their brothers may be fighting against our men in Flanders, when their sentiment may be in favour of the early conclusioin of the war, while the national sentiment of this country may be to carry it to a definite conclusion? That does not seem reasonable.

Mr. McKENZIE: To what class of citizens is the hon. member referring, the Germans in Ontario or in the West?

Mr. NICKLE: I am speaking on the general principles of nationality as applied to the Germans throughout the world. Apply it specifically or generally as you will.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is not the hon. gentleman's argument at variance with the promise of the Prime Minister to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) a few moments ago with regard to the naturalization of men in Ontario?

Mr. NICKLE: No. The policy of the Prime Minister, as I understood it, was that these people who had been in Canada for twenty-five years or thereabouts would be granted naturalization if they desired it.

Mr. MACDONALD: They would be German subjects.

Mr. NICKLE: No, they would not. The principles of the law are these: Since 1914 by the principles of the Delbrück law, any German who desires to be naturalized throughout the world for business or commercial or professional reasons, as a citizen of a non-German country has a right to become naturalized, and if he has had the consent of the German authorities, as set out in paragraph 25, to become naturalized, he is still entitled to retain and does retain his German citizenship, and the German Empire recognizes the dual nationality. That is my first proposition. My second is this, that if, prior to that date, any German had become naturalized anywhere in the world, he has a right, under paragraph 13, to become again a German citizen. For the sake of my argument, assuming he had lost his German citizenship under the law of 1870, he can again become a German citizen by making application to the Federal State or to the Imperial authorities by showing that he has business capacity and has led an irreproachable life. In other words, my argument is that the law of 1913 recognized a dual and fluctuating nationality.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my hon. friend say that an Act passed in 1913 would apply to those who became naturalized British subjects ten, fifteen or twenty years before in Canada? Is it retroactive?

Mr. NICKLE: No, it is not retroactive, nor does it need to be. A law does not need to be retroactive which gives a right to a man to re-acquire his German nationality while in a foreign state it would apply to the future.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where previous to naturalization in a foreign country he had got leave from the German Government. Therefore, it cannot be recognized.

Mr. NICKLE: My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Pugsley) is confusing the argument. Let me repeat the law, as I understand it. Paragraph 25 lays down the principle that if, prior to making application for naturalization subsequent to 1914, the German gets the consent of the German authorities provided for by the second paragraph of 25, he can retain his dual nationality, and he may become a British subject, and still be a German subject. He may become a citizen of the United States, and still be a German subject at the same time, and if, prior to that date, he acquires the nationality of any one of these countries, or of any other country, while he loses his nationality by doing this prior to the passing of the Delbrüch law, by section 13 provision is made for him again becoming a German citizen, although he continues to live in the foreign state in which he acquires nationality; in other words, it recognizes the dual nationality.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would not my hon. friend's remark as to the right to become re-naturalized in Germany apply to the very worthy gentleman from Ontario whom the Prime Minister has indicated would be naturalized?

Mr. NICKLE: It certainly would, but in the case of the man who has lived in the country for twenty-five or fifty years, and helped to build it up, I am prepared to take chances, but I do not want to take any chances with the men who have come to the country within the last five, ten or fifteen years, and who have not become imbued with our ideas of civilization. I am prepared to take chances with the man who has been here for twenty-five years, who has cut himself off from the home land, and who occupies a position, as my right hon. friend says, that the French Canadian occupies, namely, they have cut themselves off from overseas relatives, and are Canadians in sentiment and ideals. However, a totally different condition prevails with reference to the condition of the men who have left Germany within the last ten or fifteen years, and who, perhaps, have brothers and sisters over there who are still members of the German Empire, and are interested in the success of the German arms and the cessation of hostilities.

I am in favour of the Bill for another reason. I believe the mothers, sisters, daughters and the wives of our soldiers are entitled to the vote. I think they are entitled to it because some 300,000 of our men are out of Canada, over at the front, and cannot, therefore, exercise in this election the influence they would ordinarily have; and owing to the fact that some 30,000 are dead, and others lying in the hospitals. I was surprised the other night to listen to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Shefford (Mr. Boivin), who seemed to treat with scorn the sacrifices which the relatives of the soldiers had made in this war. He said they stayed at home and drew separation allowances and from the Patriotic Fund. He must have come from a district where men have not gone overseas in large numbers. I come from a section of country whence the very best of our blood has gone to the front. I have seen women hold their children to their breast and smile as they said good-bye to the men who were entraining to go overseas. I have seen them hold their children close to them as the train pulled from the station, as they turned away with a sob in their throats. I have been in contact with these people month in and month out, year in and year out, since the war commenced, and I have seen sacrifices made by them which made my heart bleed. Yet, we are told these women made no sacrifices, and that their financial condition is better than it was before the war. Perhaps the financial condition of some of them is better than before the war, but surely the people who have made tremendous sacrifices are entitled to a great deal of consideration. Surely these women who have borne the shock of the telegram handed to them telling them of a brother or a husband being taken away, are entitled to consideration. If I know the sentiments of the women of this country it is this: that, although they may want the vote, and many worthy women may be disappointed at not getting it, I do believe there are but few reasonable women from one end of Canada to the other who will not be prepared to say that the women who have sacrificed so much by giving their male relatives to this war have a right to say what Government shall take charge of the destinies of the country for the next few years, whether a government which is determined to see this war carried on until it is brought to a victorious conclusion shall be placed in power, or whether we are to have a government in power which is opposed to selective conscription, and which will only endeavour to secure reinforcements by voluntary methods. Those who have been connected with the history of the effort know that it is futile now to attempt to get further men in that way. Are the men who have died and given their lives in Flanders, to have made that sacrifice in vain? Are those of us who have said good-bye to friends we will never see again to say that the sacrifice these men have made amounts to naught? J. McDonald Mowat, the man who opposed me in the last election was a brave man. No braver man could be found. He went to the front and his dust enriches Flanders. He gave his life to the nation, and am I to stand by and see this sacrifice made in vain? I cannot bring myself to it. I voted for conscription because I believe the men at the front are entitled to reinforcements from Canada, and I will vote for this Bill for the same reason. I desire to see this war carried to a successful conclusion, and I believe the true Canadians are in sympathy with my ideas, in sympathy with the cause of the British Empire, and in sympathy with those who have said to the men now at the front, "If you volunteer and go, we on our part, will see that no stone is left unturned to see that the last man and the last dollar that Canada can spare is used to secure you necessary reinforcements." I vote for this Bill, so that those whose sympathies are with the British Empire and with democracy, may have the decision as to what Government shall be in power after the next election takes place.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I am sure that any observations which are made by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government to the effect that the people of this country are anxious to win the war, and anxious to do anything and everything necessary for the support and comfort of the soldiers at the front is not controverted by members on this side of the House, or by anyone else in this country, as far as I know. I am surprised that a member of the experience and intellectual talents of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) should find it necessary to stand up in this House and make an argument that he is supporting this Bill because, in some far-fetched and indirect way, he thinks it is going to help the soldier at the front. I am sure there is only one mind, heart and thought in this country so far as that subject is concerned, and I trust the hon. member for Kingston will, for all time, dismiss from his mind the idea that there is any other thought on this side of the House, or in the Liberal party of this country. I am sure he has not found any man on this side of the House voting against any proposition, financial or otherwise, that was calculated to advance the cause of the Allies in this great struggle.

I cannot agree, Sir, with the philosophy of the member for Kingston concerning Germans in Canada, either those in the far West or those in Ontario. It seems that under Tory rule, and according to Tory doctrine and Tory belief, the thraldom of far-away countries is still binding upon subjects of those countries who come to settle in Canada. Before Tory rule was commenced, it was a generally accepted principle that the moment such men set foot upon British soil, they became free. According to the member for Kingston, that is no longer the law; that is no longer the principle that is to govern Canadian and British institutions. According to him, a man who comes into this country and takes the oath of allegiance to the Sovereign, thereby being invested with all the rights belonging to a British subject, must be treated as an alien, as a traitor, as another Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, one moment a German and the next a Britisher. If I know anything about the manhood of this country and about our constitution, there is—to recall the story told by the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver)—"no such animal" in this country.

I cannot reconcile the doctrine laid down by the member for Kingston with the promises made by his leader. When the member for North Waterloo goes home, he will carry on one side of his horse the promise made by the Prime Minister and on the other the speech of the member for Kingston. It is unfortunate that he should have to do that, because the speech and the promise are absolutely irreconcilable; they are unmixable; they conflict with each other. When the member for North Waterloo gets home, he will have not even a grease spot of a promise to present to his people. But I suppose the member for North Waterloo understands the game. He understands that promises are made, but that they are not necessarily carried out if the party making them is returned to power. He understands that the Prime Minister is not to be taken seriously. The Prime Minister on various occasions promised the country that there would be no conscription; yet he betook himself to compulsory military service. He promised 2,000,000 women in Canada that they would have the franchise. This promise he tears up as a scrap of paper and these 2,000,000 women confront the Prime Minister and ask him to implement his promise. If these 2,000,000 women bring actions for breach of promise against the Prime Minister in the courts of this country he will have a busy time during the election. His time will be well occupied defending himself against this army of indignant women who insist upon the fulfilment of the promise that he made and so ruthlessly broke. I am sure, therefore, that the member for North Waterloo will understand that he has nothing to expect as a result of the promises made by the Prime Minister and by the Secretary of State. It was arranged that the promise should be made by these gentlemen, and that the logical, clear-cut speaker from Kingston should stand up and say that such a thing could not be done; that no remedy could be afforded to these people. That is for consumption in one part of Ontario; the promises of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State are for consumption in another part of the province. We on this side of the House understand how the machine works; we understand how hon. gentlemen opposite swallow all that is said by members of the Government. Recently we had an example in the other Chamber of the extent of the reason and the logic that governs the actions of the Government majority. The leader of the Government in the Senate was asked by the Liberals the other night to accept amendments to an Act passed by this House involving the expenditure of millions of dollars of the people's money. He made this concise, crisp reply: "The only amendments that you will get, gentlemen, will be thirty-seven, forty-three." That, of course, meant the count that would be taken on the vote—and we get the same thirty-seven, forty-three in this House. We cannot expect anything but machine politics from hon. gentlemen opposite. In that machine the member for North Waterloo is a cog; he goes round with it, and I never saw him do his part better than he did this evening. I have no doubt that the member for North Waterloo was telling the truth when he said that he represented an intelligent people. But I do not think he was doing them justice when he blamed hon. gentlemen on this side for the condition of things that this Act is creating. What has Liberalism to do with the bringing forward of this Act? He tells us that the people of his county are true and loyal to British institutions. No Liberal in this House has ever said anything to the contrary. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), since he struck the trail for the Tory Damascus across the way, has seen a good deal of light. He tells us that the people of North Waterloo are not loyal. We are not responsible for anything that he says in that regard. So far as this Bill is concerned he is not speaking for us. But, as hon. gentlemen opposite are taking the member for South Wellington to their hearts, let them settle with him the question whether or not he is giving proper testimony with regard to these men. If he is, these people have no right to apply for enfranchisement or for the rights of citizenship. We on this side are open-minded on this question. We have not asked for the disfranchisement of anybody. We are willing to put ourselves in the hands of the people who live in this country and who have enjoyed our institutions. We are not afraid to compare our institutions with those of any other country in the world. We believe that the men and women who come into Canada and enjoy the rights and privileges and educational advantages of this country for fifteen or twenty years—aye, for three years, the period set out in our Naturalization Act—are so seized with the benefits of our institutions and the superiority of our laws, that they will be loyal, true and faithful to Canada. We believe that they are not willing to exchange the conditions under which they previously lived for those which they now enjoy in this country, no matter what country they came from.

That is the principle of Liberalism; that is the principle which we are willing to follow, and if there are any heartaches in this country because men and women are being disfranchised, the parties who have introduced this Bill, and other Bills almost as drastic, must take full responsibility; it is unworthy of the hon. member for North Waterloo to state that the trouble created by this Bill is attributable to us.

My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has given us a piece of logic which I cannot very well digest. He says that the foreigners in the West and in Ontario and other parts of this country would be excellent and loyal citizens under a union government, but they are disloyal under the present Administration.

Mr. TURRIFF: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member said that if a union government had been formed this Bill would be absolutely unnecessary. What am I to understand from that? I am sure my hon. friend, with his well-balanced mind, must see that when he tells us that under a union government this law would not be necessary it means nothing else but that the creation of a union government would make loyal those whom he to-day brands as disloyal. I cannot understand or accept any such logic. If they are loyal and true to-day to the institutions of this country, then, no matter what kind of a government we have, they will be loyal to-morrow, because they are still the same people. Therefore, I cannot understand the reason by which the hon. member for Assiniboia is bringing himself to support this measure, and support the Government that is behind it.

Mr. TURRIFF: I must ask my hon. friend not to put words in my mouth that I did not use. I did not say that any settlers in the West or any other place were disloyal. I am voting against this Bill. My hon. friend is altogether wrong. He is away off.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know whether I am wrong or away off, but I do know that my hon. friend is not on the track where he used to run. So I think it is he that is off, and being off in one thing, he may be off in the whole. My hon. friend is not quite at home in the new element with which he has surrounded himself, he is not quite comfortable upon the diet on which he feeds.

A good deal of what would be regarded as deception outside of the House has been practised upon us by hon. gentlemen opposite in explaining the origin of this Bill. We were told at every turn that this Bill followed the Australian Bill. There is one peculiar provision in our Act to the effect that if a man goes into a booth to vote with a grey coat on, and white shoe laces, the presiding officer can declare him to be an alien and not entitled to vote, whereas if the same alien appears in a black coat and with black shoe laces, his appearance would justify the presiding officer in saying that he is not an alien, but a British subject and entitled to vote. When we found fault with that absurdity we were told by the Secretary of State that the provision followed word for word the terms of the Australian Act. I refer any hon. member of this House to page 5 of the Australian Act, a copy of which I had in my hand to-day, but which the Secretary of State required for some purposes of his own, and I have not got it now. There is only one copy of the Act in the city of Ottawa, I believe. If you will turn to page 5 of the Act you will see that there is no such provision in the Australian Act at all. The presiding officer in Australia has nothing to do or say as to the appearance of the men who appear before him to vote. So that when the minister stated that he had followed the Australian Act in that respect, he was deceiving us. Another thing is that there is nothing in the Australian Act creating a new franchise or machinery for a new Act. The old Act is followed in every particular. If it is thought a man is not entitled to vote, he has to take the oath when he comes up to vote, as has been the case in this country at all times. I submit, therefore, that it was not fair for the Secretary of State to take advantage of the fact that there was only one copy of the Australian Act in Ottawa. It was not right of him to say that he had a precedent in what was done in Australia, when such was not the case. I trust such practices will not be followed any more in this House, and that the minister will take an early opportunity of putting himself right. Perhaps he has been misled. When a minister makes a statement in Parliament there should not be the slightest doubt that he gives the facts, particularly when dealing with an Act of Parliament of another country.

I also wanted to deal briefly with the breach of faith on the part of the Government in this matter of votes for women. We were told that there was no time to bring about the changes that were necessary in order to give the vote to the women. The Government seems to blow hot and cold at the same time. In 1916 the Government was asked to provide Dominion-wide prohibition in Canada, and the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister told us it would not be fair to pass a Dominion prohibitory law when the provinces themselves had not adopted prohibition, and they passed a law to aid any province which had passed a prohibitory law. If they were true to that principle they would now extend the franchise to the women of any province who have the right to vote at provincial elections. They were willing to follow the provinces on the question of temperance, when it was to their interest to do so; but now when it is a question of following the same principle, in taking advantage of the provincial franchise for women, that does not suit them at all. They do not want the women of this country to have a voice in the selection of the next Parliament. So they say: We will not follow the principle we adopted in 1916, but will disfranchise these women altogether. No matter what technical objection may be raised, I submit that our law clearly gives to women the right to vote in a Dominion election unless they are prevented by officers of this Government. There is no question but that the law gives the women of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario the right to vote. Section 6 of the Election Act says:

> For the purposes of any Dominion election held within the limits of a province, the voters' lists shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which, on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion election, were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of that province, for the purposes of provincial elections.

Section 10 of the same Act states the qualifications of voters, and I say emphatically that, on the face of it at all events, this covers the cases of women to which the local legislatures have given the vote. The section says:

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Nothing can be clearer than that. These two sections give the women of the Dominion of Canada the right to vote, but for some reason or another—perhaps for the reason that they fear the judgment of these women—the Government refuses to give them the franchise. This Government is supposed to be a democratic government, which is supposed to represent a free people, which is supposed to have its life for the constitutional term of five years, and under that constitution it is compelled to go back to our free people to pass judgment upon it. It is not an act of bravery or a constitutional act for this Parliament, or this Government, to change the condition of things from that which existed when it received the mandate from the people. It should go back to the same free people that elected it. But it has changed the law, and has put itself in the position of the man who is on trial for a crime, and who arrogates to himself the right to make the law under which he is to be tried, to appoint the judge who is to pass judgment upon him, and to select the jury which is to try him. That is the kind of government we have to-day, a government which has thrown aside the constitutional right which the people of this country have been enjoying; and now that they are before the bar of public opinion, and when the trial is on and the indictment is about to be made, they take to themselves the power of naming the jury, naming the judge, and making the procedure under which they are to be tried. I submit that is not fair treatment for the people of this country, and I believe that the people will not tolerate any such doctrine or any such principle, but that that freedom which characterizes our people, that freedom of which we are so proud, will be maintained, and that any one who endeavours to contaminate, the streams of justice and freedom in this country will go down with the stream and perish forever out of sight.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): I would not at this late hour and at this late date in the session presume to occupy any of the time of the House were it not that during the debate the other evening unfortunately some charges were made against me by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). Under the rules of the House it appeared impossible for me to make any explanation, however——

Mr. PROULX: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is not keeping to the subject under discussion. The question before the House is the Franchise Bill.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Rainville): I will take note of the point of order raised. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has just said a few words, not sufficient for me to make up my mind.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman should wait until I transgress the Rules of the House before he rises to a point of order. In this House we are supposed to have a certain amount of free speech. It is unnecessary for me to point out that according to the Rules of the House members of His Majesty's service are not supposed to have aspersions cast upon them. In the discussion of the Franchise, naturally hon. gentlemen get a little warmed up, and they say things to each other which, perhaps, may be a little aside from the question. During the course of the debate I addressed a remark to the hon. member for North Cape Breton. I asked him if he would permit me to put a question to him. Hon. members will remember that instead of extending to me the courtesy of allowing me to ask him an innocent question, or in any event a question pertaining to the measure before the House, he jumped up in a passion and said he would not be interrupted by me, and that I was the "chucker-out" of the Conservative party, or something to that effect. Of course, that is a term which is, to my mind, insulting, to a certain extent. However, that is altogether aside from the question. Naturally, when I got an opportunity the other evening, I returned in kind, and gave him a name. Now, unfortunately the Rules of the House do not permit of my explaining what a mud-gun is, or I would explain it. If I gave an explanation I would be immediately called to order. In reply, he cast some reflections upon my character as an officer of His Majesty's forces, to which the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) answered yesterday. If there is one thing that this electoral law has to do with, it is with this war. It is well known that the intention of this Act is to permit of our having a war-time election. An electoral law is always intended to return a Parliament for a definite purpose. Parliament has a perfect right under the Constitution to make its own electoral laws. The Constitution is society at rest; the electoral law, such as we have now before us, is society in action, the state in action, and for that reason this electoral law is intended to give the people of this country an opportunity of casting their votes and having their say, as to whether the men at the front are going to be supported or not.

10 p.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some of the people.

Mr. CURRIE: That is the issue. Three or four weeks before the next election, there will be only that one issue before the people of this country. We must submerge all questions of economics for the moment. I confess that as a hide bound protectionist I have had to surrender all my tenets in the presence of the common danger, and many a Liberal has had to surrender his theories of free trade in presence of the common danger. For that reason, when an hon. member rises in his place in this House and casts reflections upon a member of the House who is debating this Bill, it comes within the purview of these rules. The hon. member for North Cape Breton stated that I was up to my neck in mud in a dugout whilst my men were fighting. There are thousands of soldiers in the dugouts in Flanders to-night. The dugouts in my day were not what they are now, concrete bombproof dugouts. The testimony of my men in regard to my conduct in the war is ample, so far as I am personally concerned. That testimony speaks for itself. I never was in a dugout during a battle, unless it was to carry a wounded man into some of the little shelters that were then termed dugouts. Many of the poor men that I carried into those dugouts during the battle were afterwards bayonetted by the Germans, to whose relatives my hon. friends opposite are so anxious to give the vote. They will never come forward to give testimony as to what I did on that occasion. I will meet them perhaps; I am assured that I will meet them, in the future; but in this world they can never give testimony as to what I did for them. It was impossible for me to be with all my men but I was with a certain number of them in the front line. I never left the front line throughout one of the greatest battles in history. I remained all the time during the battle until I was ordered to retire. I have the "order" to retire the remnant of my battalion still in my possession and when we retired I was the last man to leave the trenches. I am only stating the facts. It is very difficult for a man to stand up and boast or blow about his own actions. These are not things that a man feels like boasting about to the public. It is not pleasant for me to think about them, and it was not necessary for me to go about the House blowing about the number of men I had slain. The scenes that I have witnessed are too terrible for me to speak of even to my best friends. As to this question of a dugout, there were no dugouts. They were all blown up in fifteen minutes after the action started, just as the British are blowing up the dugouts to-day. They were only frail structures of mud. Therefore, that charge falls to the ground. I remained with my men.

The Government have in their archives the reports of other officers with regard to myself. They have the reports of the officer of the 7th who took command when Hart McHarg was slain; He reported to me and his report is in the Militia department. I was on the furthermost line in the second battle of Ypres. I met the second in command of the 10th, who is now a brigadier-general, and he also reported to me. His men were being sent down to assist the remnant under me that was still holding out. At that time he had, out of a great battalion, something like 150 men left. He wrote in his report that he had reported to me, a moment later he was wounded and carried off the field. I was with my battalion then and that was only an hour or so from the time that we were ordered out. How could I have been away back four or five miles from the firing line?

The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) has done me justice on several occasions. I did not know that he had sent my name in for promotion There is one thing that I have not sought and that is promotion. Because of political consideration or because of being a member of this House I never asked the minister for a single favour in the way of promotion. When I was going to Valcartier I went in to bid my chief good-bye. He said "Col. Currie, you shall have a brigade". I said: "No, Mr. Borden, I would prefer to go with the men I am bringing with me and I want to go as a colonel". In those days promotions were not as much sought as they are to-day. We all thought that the best place to win our promotion was on the field. Never, since I have come home, have I importuned with the Minister of Militia for any promotion. When I left France I was fifth in seniority of the first division. I was asked to come home by the Government, I did not ask to come home. I was asked to come home by the Government to give some information and to assist in recruiting here. I came home. Little did I expect that when I came I would find so much excitement in the country and that I would have to meet the charge of having run away from my men. I never asked the minister to give me any promotion. I was in the West for a month after he returned and did not know anything about those beautiful lies they were passing around about me. The minister told me that he was going to promote me as I should have been promoted automatically. According to the customs and rules of the service, whilst I was in the King's service on active service and had done nothing wrong, I was entitled to be kept in my position under the Militia Act. Promotion comes according to seniority. When they were giving promotion to others in the service my promotion should have come automatically. But my promotion did not come automatically. Others were put over me in the Militia List and others given command over me at home who were never at the war. Naturally, I did not feel that I was dealt justly with in that regard. Still, I make no complaint. I did not earn any subsequent promotion in the field and I do not think I should say anything about it. I have covered the question of my promotion, of my conduct in the field and of my service.

I tried to serve in accordance with the best traditions of the British House of Commons. I thought that if I did anything wrong it would be a big reflection on this House. I went to the war in the first place so that it could not be said, in so far as the House of Commons was concerned, that it was a nest of slackers that never gave any service to the war in contradition to the fact that the British House of Commons has given over 150 members to the war. This House has given a number of members to the war but it has not looked to its ancient dignities and rights in the honours which it has conferred upon its members who have gone overseas. Some of the members who have gone abroad and served have not been given the opportunities for service which might very well have been given to them. A member who goes to the war makes a great sacrifice. There are members of this House who have raised one or two regiments and sent them over to the war and gone over with them. One hundred years ago, if a man raised a regiment for the King's service, he would have been made a baronet or a knight for that deed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They make them knights and barons for much less than that now.

Mr. CURRIE: They have to be munition makers or something else. It is not a soldier member who gets rank and title now. Many members of this House who went over in good faith have been recalled without being given an opportunity for service. I regret very much that such should be the case, and I do not think that they were given the opportunity to which they were entitled. However, the opportunity of service came to me, and I served for weeks and months in the trenches, day in and day out, when there was constant action and death constantly calling. There never was a day that somebody was not wounded or killed. During that whole period there never was a court of inquiry on me or any complaint against me in any manner, shape or form. There was no court-martial asked for or ordered. Unlike some hon. gentlemen opposite, who have been preaching politics a good deal lately, I did not undergo any court of inquiry and I did not need to be whitewashed by a court-martial to keep me from being cashiered out of the service.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have opposed, not only this measure, but virtually everything in connection with the war since the beginning of this session. We have had constant obstruction, of course, of a constitutional kind, and when we glance over the gentlemen on the other side of the House who have been most prominent in this obstruction, we find the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). The hon. member for North Cape Breton said I had remained quiet for a long time in the House.

I remained quietly for a long time in the House because I did not wish to interrupt or to lengthen the session. I knew the need of reinforcements, the importance of carrying this war on, and I did not wish to prolong the debate. But if you ask yourself what have these three gentlemen done for the war; the mothers, the sisters, the women of Nova Scotia who sent their sons and brothers to the war, the women of New Brunswick—let them ask themselves if those three men have done their duty so far as their children are concerned, and ask the reason. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has a son. Has he been at the war distinguishing himself? Is he sleeping in a dug-out up to his neck in mud at night? Nothing of the kind. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) should be the last man in this House to say a word about the war. His son has been tucked away out of sight during the war. Months ago he should have been at the war along with the other brave Highlanders from Cape Breton. The Highlanders are supposed to be a brave race, and I must say the majority of them are; but there are occasional degenerates amongst them. The exceptions only prove the rule.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not think the hon. member has any business to refer to my son. He is in khaki receiving his training, getting ready to go to the front as speedily as he can.

Mr. CURRIE: I thought the hon. gentleman would make that statement. He was old enough to have gone with the First Division. He takes on his khaki and uniform as an officer now when this conscription Bill is introduced in this House. He does not want to take his chance going over as an ordinary conscript. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) remains silent and his case is on a similar level.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the hon. member will allow me I will answer him.

Mr. CURRIE: I want an explanation from you as a Scotchman.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The attack the hon. gentleman is making shows the kind of soldier he is, and shows the colour of his liver.

Mr. CURRIE: Make your explanation.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I will not say it is white, because that would not be parliamentary; but I will say this to the hon. gentleman, that it is a mean and cowardly thing——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: —for any gentleman to attack a young Canadian who is not present here to defend himself.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Speaker, I think that interruption was altogether uncalled for.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He has mentioned my son and I should be given a chance to answer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am not going to break the rules, I am going to make a short explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Speaker ruled that in order the other night.

Mr. CURRIE: I want the hon. gentleman to explain why his son is not in khaki, that is what I want.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I will explain it if my hon. friend will give the opportunity.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will use language in accordance with the dignity of the House of Commons.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My son was one of the first to enlist in the town in which he lives, at the time the war broke out. He offered himself for service and he was turned down by the medical authorities at that time as not being fit for service. He was anxious to do something and still persisted in his offer and they accepted him and sent him with a company of the 85th Highlanders to Canso to do service in connection with guarding the cable stations there. He remained there about fifteen months carrying out such instructions as were given to him by the military authorities, and at the end of that time his company was dismissed or sent back and another company was put in place of the Pictou company to do service at Canso. Consequently he returned home. The National Service was started about the same time. He received a card from the National Service and filled it up offering to do anything that it was in his power to do, was quite willing to perform any duty that the Militia Department might assign to him I am sorry to say that his health has not been good of late and that he has recently come out of the hospital after a serious operation. That is the story so far as my son is concerned, and I think the hon. gentleman who has been boasting of his courage cannot say that it is a courageous thing for him, to attack in this House a respectable young Canadian who is not here to defend himself.

Mr. CURRIE: I trust Mr. Speaker, you will observe that there is about eight minutes of my time being taken up with interruptions. All I have to say to these three members is that they have sat here all session sneering at returned officers and soldiers on this side, attacking this Bill, the Military Service Bill, and the Soldiers Voting Bill, and when you come to listen to their excuses for their sons, what do they amount to? They are the fathers of "home guardsmen," that is all they are.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to say that what the hon. member says is contemptible.

Mr. CURRIE: Not more contemptible than the charge that the hon. gentleman made against the hon. leader of the House earlier in the session.

Mr. OLIVER: That has nothing to do with to-night's performance.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) sent to the front a boy who gave up his life and who was not in the home guard; he gave up his life in Flanders. The hon. member favoured compulsory service surely in several speeches which he made in this House, but when a Bill was introduced for that service he turned his back upon it and became a politician, much to the astonishment of his friends and best neighbours.

I have a word to say about the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We know that there has been plenty of interruption in this House and plenty of obstruction. Every effort has been made to prolong this session so that the session would end automatically with the death of Parliament without anything having been done so far as conscription is concerned. The leader of the Opposition did not take very much part in the obstruction himself, but he gave the lead to his party, and that is that he is opposed to conscription. The boys at the front well know that. The men at the front know the need for reserves to make up for casualties and sufficient to enable some of those who have been at the front from the beginning to come home on a few weeks furlough, which none of them have been able to do. The right hon. leader of the Opposition has not only burked everything in this House, but he has sat in his seat for four weeks when his followers in Montreal were using dynamite and threatening daggers to public men in this country, but never once did he get up and denounce these men and say they had nothing to do with the Liberal party and were not his followers. But the public must have surmised, and come to the conclusion, that the official Liberal party has several ends to it, that it not only has a constitutional party or a constitutional end, but that it has a force party,—a party that endeavours to intimidate people in this country, to threaten the lives of members of the Government, with dynamite and daggers. I ask him, how can any soldier at the front vote for a party of that kind?

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. CURRIE: How can anybody in this country vote for a party tied up to an outfit such as that in Montreal?

Mr. OLIVER: Is the honourable gentleman aware that two of the dynamiters arrested are ticket-of-leave men let out by the Minister of Justice a short time before they coommited the crime—possibly for the purpose of committing the crime?

Mr. CURRIE: You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that I have about two minutes.

Mr SPEAKER: The deputy Speaker, who has been in the Chair, informs me that the hon. member has two minutes.

Mr. CURRIE: I will occupy my two minutes in stating that I think it is time, —after four weeks in this House— that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) spoke. He stood with me on a platform in Ottawa after I returned, and I was very proud of him when he spoke in favour of the war as he did, asking the people to support our boys at the front. Why did he not keep up that record? I say when he now sits for four weeks in this House, when men are cheering for him in Montreal and threatening to use dynamite against innocent people, why has he not rebuked them? It is too late now, after the Bill is through, for him to come through and say he had nothing to do with it.

I have read a resolution passed up in Lambton at a convention, the other day in which they said they wanted the Liberal candidates to win the war as Laurier wanted them to and they said: They were all for conscription the same as Laurier was. Sir, the speakers outside this House supporting the right hon. leader of the Opposition are those who have spoken for him with dynamite in Montreal. Not one single argument has been advanced by him or his speakers on the public platform in my province or in any English-speaking province to show that his heart was in the war or that he wanted to support the men at the front.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, it was not my good fortune or bad fortune to hear the whole of the speech of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie). I came in when he was referring to a young man, the son of an old friend whom I have known personally from boyhood up to the present time. If my words would mean anything, there never was a more unseemly and unwarranted attack upon a young man than the attack of the hon. gentleman upon the son of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). This young man was one of the first to enlist, was eager to do so, and is not in the force to-day because his health would not permit of it. He had to go to the hospital to undergo a serious operation which disables him for the service. That ought to be sufficient for the hon. gentleman. If he has any manhood in him he will not rest where he has left the matter, but will apologize to the young man, who is just as worthy as himself to wear the King's uniform—and if he does not wear that uniform it is through no fault of his, but because he cannot do so; otherwise he would be in the trenches to-day. As to myself, my record is before the House. It has been before the House since the commencement of the war. Everybody knows it; I have been in favour of the war. I have been and am against conscription. As to the attack made upon me by the hon. gentleman that the men to-day who are using dynamite in Montreal are my friends, all that I have to say to him is, that the men who are using dynamite in Montreal belong to the criminal classes. There is only one of them to-day who is not of that class and that is Mr. Lalumiere, the man who took part in the election when Mr. Coderre, now Judge Coderre, went before the electors after the resignation of the late Mr. Monk. When the hon. member says men are cheering for me in Montreal, there are some who have done so, but does the hon. gentleman not know that some others at the same meeting cried, "Down with Laurier"? If the hon. gentleman does not know that, he does not read the papers. It is a matter of public record, and everybody knows it except my hon. friend. I think I have been too long in public life to defend myself from these attacks. I have been endeavouring all my life to fight a square and honest battle. The charge made against me on the floor of this House, where I have sat for more than forty years, is shown by what I have said to have not a shadow of foundation. I do not want to meet such people as he has referred to. I do not belong to the class of men who have come from the penitentiary. I have nothing to do with them, and I do not know any of them. All I have to say is that I shall continue in the future as in the past, to try to perform my duty as a British subject and a Canadian to the best of my judgment and ability. It cannot be expected that in a free country like Canada we should all see alike upon these matters. No man's heart is deeper in the war than my own. But because I do not agree with other men upon the policy of conscription, gentlemen say my heart is not in the right place. That is a matter of judgment. Whether I am right or wrong to-day, my conduct and position is before the Canadian people, and I am quite willing to leave it there.

But, Sir, I did not rise at all for the purpose of defending myself. Those who have been in the House for the last six years, and those who have been here before that, know that on no occasion did I ever take notice of any personal attack made upon me. I rose to discuss the question now before the House, and in the few minutes I have at my command it is impossible to survey the whole situation, and I shall confine myself to the question now before the House. The indictment which we make against the policy of the Government, and against this Bill, is that it is a breach of faith. Our position, which I lay before the gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as upon this side is this: The exclusion which it is sought to make of men who for the last fifteen years we have recognized as fellow-countrymen is an absolute and unwarranted breach of faith. This accusation has been resented by members of the Government and by their followers, and by none more vigorously than the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett). It was not my privilege to hear the speech of the hon. member for Calgary the other day, but I read it with great care and attention. I thought it was a very high-class address, but it seemed to me to be based upon an absolutely fallacious foundation. He said very truly that citizenship and franchise are not convertible terms, that a man may be a citizen and yet not be an elector. To this no exception can be taken. All this had already been enunciated by the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) who in the course of the debate stated that no pledge had been given to any class of citizen for the franchise except, possibly, to the Mennonites and Doukhobors. Indeed that is perfectly true. The Doukhobors and Mennonites were especially given an exemption from military service, and all that it implies, and all this was done by Order in Council cited in this Bill, on the 13th August, 1873, by the Government of Sir John Macdonald, as far as the Mennonites are concerned, and on the 6th December, 1898, by the late government, as far as the Doukhobors were concerned. These two classes of His Majesty's subjects, the Mennonites and Doukhobors, are exempted from military service. They have enjoyed the privilege of exemption ever since they came into this country. Now they have to purchase their release from military service by forsaking their franchise. If they keep their franchise they lose everything that they have been given by these two Orders in Council. It is true that the same privileges are not given to the other aliens, who are enfranchised, but what does it matter to-day? Even if such a solemn declaration of exemption as has been given to the Mennonites and Doukhobors, were given to these aliens, they would not be any more advanced, because the solemn promise made to the Doukhobors and Mennonites is to-day treated as a scrap of paper—in fact, it is not worth the paper on which it was written; it is of the same value as the signature of the King of Prussia on the treaty which guaranteed the independence of Belgium. It was observed so long as it suited the purposes of the King of Prussia, now the Emperor of Germany, but when he found that treaty in his way, he simply set it aside, as we are doing with the solemn promises which we gave to the Doukhobors and Mennonites.

But, Sir, it is not on this ground that I rest the assertion that I have made that we are breaking faith with those we brought into this country when we pass this Bill. What I submit to the hon. member for Calgary is this: when we invited these men, and sent out agents to Germany and Austria to bring them to Canada, when we gave them naturalization, there was an implied pledge that never, under any circumstances would their origin be a reproach to them, that they would never be debarred from all privileges of British citizenship, and there would be no abridgement of any privileges given to them.

Does my hon. friend dispute that position? Does he think it is right that, having by naturalization given these people the privilege of citizenship, we should, by telling them that they can be citizens, but not electors, set aside one of those privileges? Why can they not be electors? It is admitted by the Prime Minister and by everybody who has spoken in this debate that those who have been naturalized since April, 1902, no matter what country they came from, have behaved splendidly and have fulfilled everything expected of them. The only reason these men are disfranchised now is because they are distrusted, because it is believed that they cannot be trusted with the privilege of casting their votes according to their conscience. The member for Calgary knows as well as anybody that under British institutions every man has always had the right to say what he wants to say and to do what he wants to do, provided he is within the law. This privilege, however, is now to be denied to certain persons. What reason is given for this course? My hon. friend went further, and tried to justify the action of the Government by saying that these men should not be trusted, because, according to some authority, the name of which he did not give, blood is the most potent incentive of the actions of men. I am not sure that I agree with his philosophy. Blood is certainly a powerful tie; we all admit that. But there is a tie still more powerful, and that is the tie of home; the associations connected with home are more potent than ties of blood. When a man leaves his country to settle elsewhere, though the land of his ancestors may be dear to him, the land of his children is still dearer. When a man leaves a country he does so because he is not satisfied with the conditions that he leaves behind him; if he were satisfied he would remain in the land of his ancestors. He leaves, he comes to Canada; he is welcomed; he comes upon invitation; he is given all the privileges enjoyed by other citizens; he is entitled to become an owner of property and to have the franchise. Suddenly we tell him: We cannot trust you any more. It is quite true that "citizenship" and "franchise" are not synonymous terms. But it is true, also, that citizenship is the basis of franchise. My hon. friend pointed out that Nova Scotia and Quebec had adopted laws effecting an abridgement of the franchise in respect of some classes of His Majesty's subjects—for instance, person employed by the Federal Government. That is true, but I am not aware that this law of exclusion has worked to the advantage of anybody. I am not aware that the Government which introduced or the legislature which adopted such a law ever derived any benefit from it; on the contrary, I believe that all such legislation of a restrictive character has rather proved a boomerang than helped the Government which introduced it.

But my hon. friend brought forth an argument which was really of some consequence. Discussing the status of these German citizens of Canada, he asserted that they were still Germans and that, therefore, they should be deprived of the franchise. In connection with this point he made an argument, which I could not exactly follow, with regard to the amendment to the naturalization law which is to come into force on January 1, next, under the Act passed in 1914. Our naturalization law as it now stands is effective only within Canadian territory. If a man of foreign birth becomes naturalized in Canada and goes to another country, he is no longer a Canadian citizen or a British subject. No matter what country he goes to—United States, England, a foreign country—he is not a British subject; he is a foreigner. The effect of our law after the 1st of January, 1918, will be that a man who is naturalized in Canada will be a citizen of Canada and a British subject no matter what part of the British Empire he goes to. I hope that similar legislation will be introduced in other Dominions, providing that wherever a naturalized British subject shall go he shall continue to be a British subject.

The member for Kingston laid down a new doctrine, to which I am unable to agree; that under the law of Germany a man could have a double nationality—he could be a British subject in Canada and a German subject in Germany. My impression all along has been that the German law claimed jurisdiction over the German subject, no matter where that German subject was naturalized. My hon. friend says that there is an international law on this point.

Mr. NICKLE: By the law of 1870, if a German had been continuously out of Germany for ten years he lost his nationality. The law of 1913 changed that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I shall not dispute that point with my hon. friend. My impression has been that the German law always claimed jurisdiction over the German subject, even when he was naturalized elsewhere. There is no international law on this point, so far as I know. Every nation has its own law in respect of naturalization. Great Britain foregoes her claim upon anybody who goes abroad and becomes naturalized in another country. Other nations do the same, but some nations, including Germany, do not follow that plan. Under the German law, once a German a man is always a German; at all events that is the law to-day. I do not speak of my own knowledge in this matter; I simply speak of my impression of it. But I notice that the member for Calgary the other day said that if a citizen of Germany is naturalized in Canada, he remains a citizen of Germany and would be liable to be shot if taken prisoner in the theatre of war. This is what he said:

> Ceasing to be Britons, if they were taken prisoners in the front line trenches, they would be shot as traitors, because they owed military allegiance to Germany and Austria.

I think that the member for Calgary is right in that respect. If we sent a man of German origin to the front, he would, if taken prisoner, be treated as a deserter and accordingly might be liable to be shot. Our own Naturalization Act has been cautious on this point. The certificate of Naturalization says:

> This is therefore to certify to all whom it may concern, that under and by virtue of the said Act ..... has become naturalized as a British subject, and is, within Canada, entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada, with this qualification, that he shall not, when within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject (or citizen) previous to the date hereof, be deemed to be a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject (or citizen) of that state, in pursuance of the laws thereof, or in pursuance of a treaty or convention to that effect.

In other words, we do not pretend in our Naturalization Act to claim jurisdiction over a subject when he goes to his own country. We cannot do that unless his native country divests itself of jurisdiction over him, or unless there was a treaty between the two countries, and so far as I know there is no treaty between Great Britain and Germany. So I think the position which was taken the other evening by my hon. friend from Calgary is perfectly sound. If we were to send a man of German origin to the trenches, and if he happened to be taken prisoner, he might be treated as a deserter by Germany. What is the conclusion we are to draw from this? The Military Service Act which we passed the other day makes no reservations on this point. Section 2 says:

> Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section 3 of this Act (that is, between the ages of twenty and forty-five) shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada, either in or beyond Canada.

This means that every man of military age, whether he is a British subject by birth or naturalization, is liable to be conscripted. Take the case of a boy six years of age, who happened to come to this country with his father in April, 1902. He would now be twenty-one and a voter, and liable to be conscripted. I agree with my honourable friend from Calgary that it would be unthinkable, it would be murderous, if we were to send such a man to the front when there was a possibility of him being treated as a deserter by our enemies if he were taken prisoner. The measure before the House takes care of that in the following provision:

> All persons who are by the terms of paragraphs (g) and (h) of section 67 of this Act disqualified from voting, with such of their sons as on polling day are not of legal age shall be, and shall be held, exempt from combatant military and naval service.

In other words, a man who is liable to be conscripted can purchase his release by renouncing his privileges as a citizen and as a voter. That, I think, is a proper interpretation of the Act. My hon. friend from Calgary argued that a man of the class I have just described could be conscripted unless he renounced his privileges as a voter. I take a different view from my hon. friend both in his premises and in his conclusion. It seems to me that this man ought not to lose his privileges as a voter. He has left Germany and come to this country. He has become interested in this country, so much so that he desires the privileges of British citizenship. The Government which he has left still claims the right of life and death over him. It seems to me that this man ought to be treated as a British subject. His heart must be somewhere, and his heart would probably be where his home is. I would say this to my hon. friend from Calgary: there is far more to be gained by trusting people than by distrusting them. And if I object to this legislation, it is not so much for its present effect, as for the effect it will have in the future. We are striving to make Canada, young nation as we are, a great and powerful nation. We have long realized that to do that by ourselves would be a long and painful task. We have opened our door to the whole world, and have sent our agents everywhere. I have here a pamphlet in the German language urging Germans and Austrians to settle in Canada: we offer them everything we have. Many of these people have come to our country; they have settled here and behaved well, and we cannot break faith with them. The Germans have committed crimes in this war that have no parallel in the last fifteen hundred years, but the blame is to be attached not so much to the German people as to the government of Germany. For my part I have not lost faith in the German people. I rather hope with President Wilson that the German people themselve will help to finish the war and deal with their own government. I have faith in the German people; I have faith in our fellow-subjects of German origin in this country. These men have been proud of their new allegiance up to the present time, but will they have any reason to be proud after this day? Will they have the same pride in their new country as they had before? Do you believe, Sir, that the legislation we are discussing to-night is going to tend to make them more happy and more British than they were before? Sir, we must take the human heart as it is. The treatment those men are now receiving from men who claim to be their fellow citizens will have very far-reaching effects. The Government may win a temporary triumph; this measure may help to win the election. But the Government's gain will be the country's loss. If this be the Government's conception of how to make Canada a great country, it is not our conception on this side of the House. Our conception is to trust to the human heart and appeal to its better sentiments. If we cannot win by that method we do not want to win on any other basis.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, from the commencement of this debate I have not taken any active part in it but I have been a pretty diligent listener. I have a few general remarks with which I would like to trouble the House. I shall not follow closely the line of argument which has been taken by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with the object of making a reply to him. I am quite willing to let the statements which have been made by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) and the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) go against the statements which have been made by my right hon. friend. They can be digested, and members of the House can come to their own conclusion.

The general remarks I have to make are along this line. Should I be going too far if I make the statement that in approaching this question some of us make the great mistake of not taking the proper relativity of questions into account? What I mean by that is: too many of us, I am afraid, have been arguing this question upon normal lines, as if the condition of affairs in the world, and the condition of affairs in Canada particularly, were the same as they were twelve years ago, ten years ago, eight years ago, or four years ago; and we are stickling for what we call privileges and rights and the permanence of certain phases of our political constitution, just the same if there were no cannons roaring and no great war in the world. That, I think, is the fundamental weakness of much of the argument that comes from the other side. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) or some other hon. gentlemen on the other side have asked the question: what is this Bill for; what is the purpose of it?

Mr. OLIVER: I did not ask the question.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: And they have made the answer: "It is to win 11 p.m. the election for the Tory party; that is what it is for, and it is for nothing else." I do not think that is a reasonable position to take. I might make the retort to them that as far as profession of opinion and purpose and policy is concerned, taking the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government, there is one efficient war party in this country, and there is one war party which is not efficient, and if this Franchise Bill enables the efficient war party to win the election, and win the position to carry on what they have been carrying on for the last three years; if it helps to win for the Government it helps to win for the country and for the Empire. I have been at the inception of this Franchise Bill; I have watched it in its first discussions; I have followed it through all its stages. I have been a member of the Council and the Government which has worked with this Bill, which has brought it to its stage of perfection, whatever that may be considered to be, and which has launched it before this House. Speaking for myself, I do not think I ever had the idea that it would be a particularly pleasant thing for the Government of the day to introduce a Bill which would have the effect of disfranchising citizens of this country, who formerly had the franchise. I have not been particularly impressed that it would be a thing which would add very much, taking this year, and next year, and future years, to the prospects of the Liberal-Conservative party as a party. I have not viewed it along these lines, but I will tell the House along what lines I have viewed it. I have viewed it along the line, which I consider the proper line, of putting as much punch and power behind the war government of this country, whatever Government it may be, as it is possible to put. I think there is necessity for that.

If I may be allowed an expression of my own opinion, I am sorry that we have ever been forced to hold an election in Canada in the midst of the turmoil and the burdens of this war. Aside from all questions of constitutional right, and constitutional practice, to my mind there is a condition in the world and a condition in Canada which might have been better met in this country by all of us coming to the conclusion that we could do without for another year exercising the right of ballot and devote ourselves entirely and wholly to the prosecution of the war. I am sorry that we have had to go to the country and hold an election during this war period, but it is not my fault. It is not the fault of the leader of the Government, it is not the fault of the Liberal-Conservative party. That we have to go to an election is the fault of my right hon. friend who sits opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if it is the fault of anybody. He had it all within his own power, and if he had done as he did a year ago, his party would have followed him, and we would be without the turmoil of an election. But now that the election is imminent, and must come, it is a war election, and nothing else. We are not in this election into which we are now entering to determine the question of permanent suffrage for any class of people in this country. We are not voting upon and determining what shall be the tariff policy of this country. We are not determining by our votes what shall be the policy of the Administration in any civil line. Now when we make the first step, and as we make every other step until the day upon which the votes are to be cast and counted, we are more and more determining the war policy of this country, and only the war policy of this country. That is the way I look upon it.

Now, if it is to be a war election, this measure which is before us is a war franchise measure. We would not have had it if there were no war. We all admit and believe that. We have this War Franchise Bill because we have a war, and because this is an election which is to be particularly and preeminently fought out with reference to the policy which shall prevail in carrying on the war. Let us take a step further. If we are in the throes of a war election, and if that election is to decide the measures which shall be taken and the efficiency with which the war policy shall be carried out—and I think that view is held by the members of this House and by the country at large—we can only have an efficient war policy carried out with due regard to what we have already done, with due regard to the men who are at the front, and with due regard to their support, through one method, and that is the method of selective conscription.

Do we think that or do we not? The votes of this House, with 27 of them from the other side, affirm that most solemnly in this House and the votes of this House, with 27 from the party led by my right honourable friend voting along that line, reechoed the sentiment of this country—a sentiment that a man with red blood in his veins ought to have due respect for. They did not echo the sentiment of the slacker, of the soap-box orator on the streets of Montreal or in any other city. They did not represent the policy of Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Lavergne. They did not represent the policy of dozens of members on the other side of the House who supported my right honourable friend and who subscribed to the idea that Canada had done enough. There is no one here more glad, or more proud that Canada has done what she has done for the success of this war, than those who cast those votes, and by and large they represent the sterling national, loyal sentiment of this country from one end of it to the other. That, then, is the position to which we have come.

This franchise is meant to strengthen that sentiment. That is the purpose of this franchise and that is the purpose which I think it will achieve. Have we not a right to strengthen that sentiment? You say that 300,000 of our men have gone out from this country—the pick of its citizenship? That is true. Of these men, only a certain proportion can by any possibility give their votes. Not a single one of them can use his legitimate and usual influence in this country towards the determination of what the policy of the Government shall be. The dust of thirty thousand of these men lies silent on the other side of the ocean. Others are imprisoned, others are interned, and others are incapacitated in various ways.

When this country comes in a few months to register its voice as to whether those men shall be supported and this war shall be efficiently carried on; when upon the register at the poll is found the name of John Smith, a loyal citizen of Canada who has taken the oath of allegiance to his sovereign, has enlisted in the forces, has gone to the front and has made the supreme sacrifice, and when he is not there to answer for it at the poll, his wife is there. She, who gave the husband of her youth, the support of her family, the father of her children says: "My husband has passed over in doing his duty, his name is called and I am here to answer." There is not an honourable gentleman on that side of the House and there is not an honest, straight forward, lover of his country in the whole domain of Canada, who would refuse that appeal of the wife of the husband who had given his life and was no longer here to say what should be the policy that should follow his sacrifice.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have admitted the justice of that appeal and they have little or no objection to this part of the Bill. But they cavil and find fault. They forget again, as I said at the first, that this is an abnormal condition of things under which we are acting. Although the mothers, wives, sisters and daughters of the soldiers who have gone into active service are admitted to have the right to represent their kith and kin, they will cavil, as my hon. friend from St. John does. He does everything possible to defeat this Bill, to minimize its importance, to raise objections to it, and to excite prejudice against it by doing what?—by saying: You have not been consistent; if you give to some women the right to vote, you should give it to all. The hon. gentleman opposes this measure because we did not go so far as to give it to all. There is where, I think, he makes the mistake of not taking into account that this is an extraordinary condition under which we find ourselves and that we are not legislating under normal conditions.

There is one point I want to make about that. There are noble, devoted women outside of those who have sent relatives to the front, who have done splendid service, but there are degrees in service and in sacrifice. There is the service and sacrifice of sympathy, which while it is not one of personal interest in the war, it is yet sympathetic with those who go to the front. There are hundreds and thousands of women who have made sacrifice and done service through sympathy. But there is a degree that is still higher, and these women would be the first to acknowledge it. That is the service and the sacrifice which is not simply emanating from sympathy, but which comes from heart strings wrung, which looks out of tear-bedimmed eyes, which comes from sleepless nights and anxious days, which comes from the part of flesh and blood and family that is far from them and which is exposed to constant danger. No one doubts that this kind of sacrifice and service is far higher than the other. That is the distinguishing line upon which we base this franchise Bill, and we trust to the good common sense of the people of this country to do away with those little refinements which the hon. member for St. John is so fond of indulging in and upon the main, broad question of distinctive right say that, "This is all that can be expected in war time, this is a right we freely concede to them and we will await our time until under normal conditions the whole franchise of this country can be put upon a permanent basis."

Let me go on to the other part of my right hon. friend's speech. My right hon. friend speaks of disfranchisement. You would think to listen to the speech of my right hon. friend to-night, that before a single Buckowinian or Slav started from his home in Europe, we sent an accredited member of this Government to sit down with him and that we concluded a treaty, signed, sealed and delivered, as to what he should get when he came to this country. An attempt is made to prove that because a man has certain information put into his hands in regard to the country to which he comes, that country enters into a solemn compact with him as an individual which might be comparable to a contract or treaty entered into between sovereign powers. Of course, nothing like that takes place. The man who leaves his distant home leaves to better himself. Probably the last thing he thinks about is what vote he is going to get or what voting power he is going to have in the country to which he goes. He goes to that country, becomes a citizen, has all its privileges. What is the use of trying to make it appear that those who are disfranchised under this Act are shorn of every right and privilege they had in this country? The man simply is asked to stand aside when the destiny of this country is being determined, to stand aside for the time being on account of relationship, of possible prejudice, of possible active sympathy with the enemies of this country.

That is all that he is asked. He keeps his liberty—not a bit of it is infringed upon. He has his security, he is as safe now, under all the laws of this country, as he was before; he has all his betterments, his prospects, his rights and his privileges. The simple one thing that he is asked to forego for this one war election is, when his own kith and kin are the enemies of this country and blood flows between them in one common vein, to consider that he is in a position where it is better for himself and better for this country that he shall stand aside for the time being. Why, if a jury is being called to try a man for his life, and one of the jurymen on being challenged allows it to become clear that he has a prejudice or has expressed an antipathy to, or an opinion adverse to the case of the man on trial—although he is a citizen, although he has all his rights, he stands aside without question and does not feel that any hardship is inflicted upon him. In this great national trial, when the destinies of this country are being decided, he is asked to do the same thing and to stand aside. He is not asked to fight, he is not asked to be a combatant, he is simply asked to forego one right; and I want to say that, so far as I judge it, it is the best thing possible for the man himself, and that it will in the end conduce more to a feeling of amity and of good will than if he were thrown into the arena of a political contest, to become the object of appeal by both parties. I believe that on that account he is in a position which lends itself more to future amity and good will than if he became a contestant in the political contest as it was going on.

My time is up and I shall take my seat, but before I do so, just one word. While this closure has been going on, I have come to the conclusion that this Parliament and every future Parliament would be wise if it adopted some rule by which we should keep discussion down to about twenty-five or thirty minutes for each member. By that means we should have a better House, we should have better debate, and we should do our work in one-half the time.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (North Renfrew): In regard to the last remarks of my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) so far as he is concerned I agree. I am inclined to think that when he is compelled to condense his speech into about twenty-five or twenty-six minutes, he gets at what he wants to say better than when he takes a long time to build a foundation on which he does not base his argument. My right. hon. friend has fallen into the habit lately, which has not deserted him in his twenty minute speech, of lecturing. He has not forgotten his old university days when his chief occupation was to lecture students. He looks over at us on this side of the House—and this is not the first time—and says we have lost our sense of proportion, we have not the interest in the war. I want to tell him that he does not know what interest in the war is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAHAM: In the heart of hearts, where the heart strings are torn, he does not know what interest in the war is; and he has no right to lecture us in the House, any of us who have as much interest in the war as he possibly can have. I do not object to him advising, but when he takes on his air of lecturer to men on both sides of the House as to our lack of sense of proportion and not giving this war the prominence it should have, I say he is assuming a role for which he is not qualified.

My right hon. friend says he hates very much an election in war time. He was a party to sending ballots to Europe to have an election in war time, and he sat in the Government and allowed money to be expended, without authority I believe, to print ballots and rush them over to the Old Land to prepare for an election in war time, when we were in the midst of an appeal for recruits.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would remind my hon. friend that that was done in pursuance of an Act of Parliament, and it was my hon. friend's advocacy of the passing of such an Act in the first instance that induced the Government to take it up.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my right hon. friend is not nearer right on most things than he is on this, I am not surprised that some people in his party are crying for leadership. There was no necessity for sending ballots to Europe for an election because there was an Act on the statute book. We have an Election Act on the statute book, but we are not peddling ballots, not having an election always. This Act was put on the statute book to provide for an election if it was called, and the fact that the Government intended to call it was proven by the other fact that they sent the ballots to Europe to be prepared for the election. My right hon. friend lectures us because he tells us that his party is the party to put the punch into efforts for the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: The way the hon. gentleman wants to put the punch into war efforts financially is by voting in this House to give a value to common stock that hon. gentlemen opposite themselves voted had no value, and to mulct the country in millions of dollars. The way the hon. gentleman wants to put the punch into war efforts is to vote to give his friends both in Toronto and Quebec millions in the Quebec and Saguenay railway, so much so that the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) revolted at it and had to vote against it. Another way in which he wishes to put the punch into war efforts is by voting a quarter of a million dollars for new telephone services merely for political purposes throughout Canada because an election is coming, although we had the pledge of the Finance Minister and the Minister of Public Works that no new work would be undertaken while the war was in progress.

Sir, the finances of this country are very important at the present time, and I want to say that the Government has at this session voted to squander millions of the people's money in a direction not at all required, at least during the war, and has taken the punch out of war efforts more than anything that the Opposition has done or could do.

Mr. LALOR: The Globe and Star did not say so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not particular what any paper said. I am making my own remarks and am prepared to stand by them. The Minister of Trade and Commerce also referred to the disfranchisement of certain citizens of Canada on the ground that it was for the safety of the State, and it has been said to me quietly that the reason I opposed this Bill is on account of a certain German vote in a certain constituency. I want to tell the House now for the first time that nearly all that German vote went for this Government's candidate, and a good many did so at the request of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was afraid of the drop of poison being infused into the body politic by my being returned. I want to tell him that the members of the Government now who speak so disparagingly of the German vote sent at least twenty men into the German settlement to live with the German people during the by-election in South Renfrew, and the Germans nearly all voted for the Government.

Mr. EDWARDS. They did not send the ballot papers.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, my hon. friend might have captured them on the way. The German vote, as we may call it, or the alien enemy vote as described by my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), in the West is not of German origin, or is not a real German vote as he described it, as coming under the law which he read as passed by Germany. The great majority of the vote referred to in the West I am told is Austrian and not German. So that the law my hon. friend read to-night as to their retaining their dual nationality does not apply to the vast number of men in the West, because these men are not Germans.

I want to refer to those of German origin in our own province of Ontario. The matter brought before the House by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) the other night but it was brought up by the latter gentleman at fifteen minutes of two when this House was in committee, when there was no way of saving the franchise of these men in Ontario who have been here from twenty to forty years, but who have not gone through the formality of being naturalized. They always thought, up to the last municipal election in the city of Kitchener, that they were British subjects, and were always treated as such. I want to point out that I brought this subject to the attention of the committee in plenty of time to have this Act amended if I had had any support, but I got no support whatever from either of these two hon. gentlemen, although the question applied particularly to the counties of Waterloo and Perth—more so than to the county of Renfrew. On the 10th September, when we had plenty of time to have the Bill amended before we got to the third reading, I made the following remarks:

> There are men in this country who came from other lands, took up their residence here, and for twenty years they have been voting in Canada. Hon. members in this House can call them by name. They are good citizens, and they believed they had the right to vote. That right of citizenship was never questioned by either side of politics. When this war broke out, they discovered that, although they had been voting for many years, they had never gone through the formality of becoming naturalized. Being loyal citizens, and to show that they were true to the Union Jack and the British Empire, they immediately took out their naturalization papers.

I was wrong in that, and that matter was explained to-day. I said further:

> But they have only been naturalized two or three years. And although they have been building up this country, paying taxes and raising their families, although they are a credit to the country, by this Bill they find themselves disfranchised, and marked among their neighbours as men unworthy to be trusted with citizenship.

That was some days ago.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman has not mentioned what people he is referring to. He has not used the word "German." Was he frightened to use that word?

Mr. GRAHAM: I said they were not Germans; they were Austrians. If the hon. gentleman reads my entire remarks he will find what I was talking about.

Mr. MORPHY: Pretty dry reading to wade through all the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman has done drier things than that since last September. I want to submit this question on the third reading. These men are in a different class from men of alien enemy origin who have come over to this country within the last few years. These men have been here for many years, spread over the province of Ontario, and exercising all the rights of citizenship and the rights of franchise. No person ever questioned those rights, and they never dreamed that they did not possess them. They look upon this measure as depriving them in an arbitrary manner of some right which was never disputed for many years. I think these men who have resided in Canada for a number of years, who voted regularly as citizens, might be allowed to retain their franchise. The men of the province of Ontario of German origin are among the best men we have in the province. Those of us who have gone through Ontario from end to end and have met these men would never dream of putting them in a class where there was the least semblance of disloyal utterance or action. And, if it is not too late yet, I would gladly support the Government in some amendment which would permit these men to retain their rights. I have appealed to these men and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has appealed to these men. We have addressed many audiences standing side by side and they have responded, they have contributed; and it seems hard that these old citizens of Canada should by this Act be deprived, notwithstanding their loyalty and devotion, of that which perhaps men hold among the dearest things of life, the right to exercise their franchise.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman mean men who are not yet naturalized?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If so, they never had the right.

Mr. GRAHAM: You are talking technically and legally, but as a matter of fact, possession of almost anything gives you ownership after a number of years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. GRAHAM: Speaking technically, these men never had the right, but they have exercised what they believed to be a right, and exercised it wisely for the last 30 years. They not only thought they had the right, but their neighbours thought it also. Neither this Government, nor any political party ever objected, because these men have been here so long they are landmarks in the section in which they reside.

Mr. LALOR: Does the hon. gentleman think anybody is going to prevent them voting more than before?

Mr. GRAHAM: They would be violating the law if they voted.

Mr. LALOR: They are in exactly the same position.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend says that, although he is going to support the law, he believes it is going to be violated. I say these men ought to have the right to vote as they always had, and I believe it is possible to frame the Bill to accomplish that object. What I object to generally, regarding this law—it was hinted at to-night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it was intimated by the Secretary of State the other night, is that hon. gentlemen opposite are proceeding upon the principle, that there is but one loyal party in Canada. We are back to the days of the Family Compact, when a few people got together and said that the loaves and the fishes, the rights and the privlleges, of the people, indeed, everything belonged to this one party. Nothing was left to the remainder of the people except the duty of paying the taxes that the Family Compact levied upon them. According to the language of ministers, the principle is laid down that this Bill is expected to assist in electing friends of this Government and that in doing so it will assist in carrying on the war. If this is not the case, why prevent so many people in Canada from voting? Sir I resent that. I do not think it is fair for a member of the Government to insinuate such a thing in this House. The time has gone by in Canada when thinking men will listen very seriously to that kind of talk; the history of Canada points in a very different direction. Under the leadership of the present leader of the Opposition, the first step towards closer union between the motherland and Canada was taken in the Imperial preference. During the years that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) was in charge of the Finance Department, he talks about an Imperial preference; his friends passed resolutions upon the subject, but they never took it into their active consideration. The first step, therefore, to give the motherland a preference in the Canadian markets was taken by the present leader of the Opposition. Moreover, the first man as head of a Canadian Government to provide troops to go across the water and help the motherland was the present leader of the Opposition. His predecessors had had similar opportunity, but had declined to take advantage of it; and some of the men who assisted the present Government to get into power in 1911 left the Liberal party on account of the then Prime Minister's action in that respect. The loyalty of the Liberal party in Canada should not be reflected upon. The history of the grand old Liberal party in the motherland is replete with incident after incident, act after act, showing that this party has been at the head of nearly every loyal movement launched in that great country. I resent being lectured on the ground that the Liberal party is not loyal. Since the beginning of the war gentlemen on this side of the House have supported every war measure that the Government brought forward, but they do balk at supporting a measure that is not a war measure; a measure that is devised to assist the Government in the coming election.

Mr. STEVENS: What about conscription?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend need not ask me anything about conscription. He talked about it where it was popular, but I supported conscription although in my constituency it was not popular.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the reason why you oppose it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oppose what?

Mr. STEVENS: You oppose it because it is not popular in your constituency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Wake up.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. gentleman has been asleep; I did not oppose conscription. Since the beginning of this war there have been no Liberals and no Tories so far as the sacrifice of the people is concerned. Members on this side of the House have done what they thought was right. I resent the imputation made by ministers that because a man happens to vote for a Liberal at the coming election he will be voting for a party that is not truly loyal and devoted to the interests of the Empire. We have disagreed on this side of the House as to details, but no one has shown more loyalty or more devotion to the Empire in the matter of carrying on the war than the leader of the Opposition. There is an endeavour to spread throughout the country the idea that the Tory party is the only party that is in favour of carrying on this war. That is not in the interests of the war; as a matter of fact, it is detrimental to the carrying on of the war enthusiastically—and hon. gentlemen know it.

In this war we are engaged in a great struggle; Grits and Tories, young men and older men, forgetting the differences at home, are struggling side by side for what they believe to be the best for mankind. Apparently we have come to the time when hon. gentlemen opposite are playing upon the feelings of the people throughout the Dominion in respect of that war for party purposes—and that is why this Bill is introduced. If this Bill meant winning the war or assisting to win it, I would support it. But no argument has been submitted to show that the Bill is designed to be of any assistance in carrying on the war. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made an eloquent appeal, as only he can, for the wives of the soldiers. Sir, we are all in favour of that. We are in favour of giving votes not only to the wives and female relatives of soldiers, but to the wives of their neighbours who are doing all they can to further the cause that we have at heart. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in favour of restricting the franchise; we are in favour of extending the franchise. The Governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, led by friends of hon. gentlemen, have granted to the women of their respective provinces the right to vote. We have always accepted the provincial qualification, but when it comes to winning the war, this Government balks at accepting the provincial qualification—as if the noble women of these provinces were not as competent to vote in time of war as they are to vote in time of peace. Is the wife of the man who has contributed largely to patriotic and other funds connected with the war, to be denied the vote? Is the washerwoman who has sacrificed out of her mere pittance fifty cents a week for the Patriotic Fund not entitled to cast her ballot simply because she has no relatives to go to the front? Hon. gentlemen seem to have forgotten those words of commendation, "She hath done what she could." Sir, these women have done what they could. It is their misfortune that they are not able to send sons or brothers to the front. But their spirit has shown itself beyond doubt; if they had had relatives, those relatives would have gone to the front. It is not to the credit of this Government that, for some reason which they have not mentioned, they have deprived the women of these various provinces of the franchise that they would enjoy were it not for this Bill.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to speak on the third reading of this Bill through any desire to hear the sound of my voice in this Chamber. I should not participate in this debate if I did not feel that the occasion was a most serious one. During a session in time of war, the discussions of questions that have come before this House have been greatly prolonged from day to day. If I expressed my opinion of some of the speeches that have been made, I am afraid, Sir, that you would call me to order.

The third reading of the War-Time Elections Act comes in conjunction with the two measures that have recently been put through the House, the Military Service Act, and the measure giving the soldiers the right to vote. The War-Time Elections Act is surely a necessary one, considering the conditions that confront the people to-day.

Since this war began there has been a strong feeling throughout Canada that we should have no election in this country as long as the war lasted, and no one voiced those sentiments more strongly than hon. gentlemen opposite and the Liberal press of the country. As the war went on, I believe that that feeling became even stronger. It is not so very long ago that the right hon. leader of the Opposition, protesting in the city of Toronto against the idea of holding an election during the war, said that he did not purpose opening the portals of office with a bloody key. A year ago a measure for the extension of the life of Parliament was passed unanimously by this House; we have practically reached the end of that extension. I say that if there was one reason then why there should be an extension of the life of Parliament, there are a hundred reasons for extending it to-day. Hon. gentlemen may say that there was no Military Service Bill before the House last year. Let me tell them that there was a Military Service Bill on the statute book at that time, and it was far more rigid than the one recently passed by this House. The measure recently passed was most reasonable compared with the Act on the statute book at that time.

I have listened to the right hon. leader of the Opposition and some of his colleagues to-night, and I say that the sentiments they have advanced are not in accordance with the sentiment of the people of this country, as I understand it. The right hon. leader of the Opposition stated a few minutes ago that this measure was a breach of faith with a portion of our population, and he went on to say, "My faith is in the German people," referring, of course, to the Germans who had come to this country. His statement to-night reminded me of a statement he made in the old Parliament Building not so very long ago, when the proposal of the Government for the building of three dreadnoughts was under consideration. He said:

> There is one fact in the situation which, I think, shows that there is no intention on the part of Germany to attack England, and that fact is the German Emperor.
> The German Emperor is undoubtedly one of the great men of the present age. By intellect, by character, by moral fibre, he has shown himself wonderfully endowed. In the first years of his reign some of his utterances sent a shiver through those who had the peace of the world at heart. Many believed that he was, perhaps, hankering for the glamour of military glory. But as he advanced in years, and as crisis after crisis came, his potent influence was always directed towards peace. And the day may come when, like his illustrious Uncle, our late King, he may be called the peace-maker.

I have always said that the man who has no regard for the country from which his ancestors came is not the best kind of a citizen. I believe that many of the people who have come out from Germany and settled in this country are prejudiced against our cause; their sympathies are naturally with the country from which they came. I say that no hardship or injustice is being done to these people by passing this Act at the present time. When the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) say that an injustice is being done to these people who have been here for twenty or twenty-five years, they are saying something that is not in accordance with the facts, for these men will not be affected in the slightest degree by this Act. It is only those who have come here since 1902 who will be affected, and if these people who have been here twenty years are not naturalized now, it is their own fault.

Furthermore, when the hon. gentlemen opposite say we are doing an injustice to a large portion of the women of this country by depriving them of the franchise, they are making an equally erroneous statement, because the women of this country have never had the franchise, consequently, they cannot be deprived of it. No one in this country has protested more strongly against the granting of the franchise to the women of this country than the leader of the Opposition. In this House, not so very long ago, he protested against forcing the franchise upon the women of the province of Quebec, and he wanted a sort of patchwork affair conferring the franchise upon some women here and there. The Bill is granting the franchise to the wives, sisters and mothers of the soldiers who have gone overseas. It is a recognition of the services that have been rendered by these men. When you think of what these men have endured, and then think of the abuse hon. gentlemen opposite have heaped on some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have offered their services, fought in the trenches, and done everything possible to help win the war, I can come to no other conclusion but that it is a guilty conscience that made the hon. member for South Renfrew get up in this House and make the statements he did a few minutes ago, when he accused us of charging the Opposition in this House and the Liberal party with disloyalty. I have never said that they are disloyal. But I do say that the Liberal party in this country, and I know many of them, are ashamed of their leaders at the present time.

I want to say on behalf of the women of this country that they are not claiming that an injustice has been done to them in recognizing the wives and sisters and mothers and daughters of those who have gone to fight the battles of the Empire and of the 30,000 men who have already fallen in battle. On the contrary, many of them who were most active in urging that the franchise be granted to women have come forward and said that they are heartily in accord with the measure that has been introduced, and are prepared to wait for an extension of the suffrage until the war is over. But they say it is a right and proper thing that the soldiers' women relatives should be given the franchise.

Other speakers have pointed out the influence that 300,000 soldiers could exert in an election if they were present in Canada. As they are absent, it is only right and proper that their representatives here should have some say in the election. This is going to be a war-time election, and it necessitates the passing of a War-Time Elections Act. If there was no war on, hon. gentlemen opposite might have some cause for complaint. The right hon. leader of the Opposition says that this measure involves a breach of faith with those who have come from enemy countries and settled in Canada. Do these people expect the franchise at this time? They are not called upon to serve this country as combatants.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are protesting against compulsory military service. I say that the state has demands on the citizen which the citizen cannot escape when the life of the nation is at stake. It is the duty of every citizen to render every possible service to the state. It is the duty of the Government to see that that service is rendered, but not by going to those who are opposed to military service and asking them whether they would approve of it or not. Compulsory military service has been on the statute books for fifty years, and hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding the efforts which have been made by the right hon. leader of the Government ever since he came back from the Old Country to form a union government by which we could avoid an election, have persistently refused to co-operate. They insisted on an election. They hoped that by reason of the disloyal element—and there is a disloyal element in this country—they hoped by a union of that element with the slackers and the hide-bound partisans whom they expected to support them, that they would gain the ascendancy, and that the leader of the Opposition would be able to open the portals of office even with a "bloody key."

I can quite understand that they feel to-day it would be a tremendous disadvantage to them if the female relatives of the soldiers overseas were recognized and given a voice in this election. They realize that many of those who are in sympathy with them are not going to be permitted to poll their votes in this election, by reason of the fact that those people are not going to be called upon to serve in the war, and consequently are not going to be entitled to a voice in a war election. Canada is facing the most serious condition that ever confronted any people in this world, yet we are sitting here to-night, after a session of eight months, treating matters in a manner which I believe is not very much to the credit of some hon. members. Only a few minutes ago I heard the right hon. leader of the Opposition endeavour to censure an hon. member (Mr. Currie) who had served at the front, for certain remarks he had made here. The right hon. gentleman did not censure one of his supporters a short time ago when he made a statement with regard to the attitude of that hon. gentleman, sneering at a man who had raised a regiment in this country, and who had fought in Flanders and done everything he possibly could. The conscience of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) must have been troubling him when he said that the Opposition in this House were charged with being disloyal. The situation is so serious that we cannot afford to treat it lightly.

I read an editorial in the Toronto Globe this evening, which shows there is a possibility of the Canadian divisions at the front being reduced, and that instead of the fifth division, which has been in England for some time, being sent overseas, drafts are being sent from it, and if conditions go on as they are at present, considering the number of casualties and the number of recruits, it is only a matter of a short time until the four Canadian divisions at the front will be reduced to three, then to two, and then, perhaps, disappear altogether. The issue at the present time is, are we going to continue in this war, or are we going to drop out of it? If we are going to treat this matter seriously we must realize that we are at war and are to have a war-time election. If we are to be forced into a war-time election we must take measures to see that the enemy within our country—and such there be—are not given an opportunity of throttling the men who are fighting our battles at the front. Let us see that the influence of those men overseas will, to some extent at least, be preserved by granting to their near relatives the right to exercise the franchise in this election.

If I had time I could refer to certain statements which have been made here by different members of the House. The right hon. leader of the Opposition spoke about unseemly attacks. Let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, if a more unseemly attack was ever made in this House or outside of it upon the Prime Minister of any country at a time when that country was at war, than was made upon the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) by the hon. member from St. Mary's (Mr. Martin), who said:

> If anything happens in Montreal I shall be very sorry because I do not like trouble, but if any trouble happens the soldiers will be responsible for it.

Further on he said:

> If anything happens, if blood flows in the streets of Montreal or in any other city, the fault will be with the Prime Minister and with those who helped him pass the law.

Those are the sentiments of the supporters of the right honourable leader of the Opposition, yet he does not reprove the men who make such statements but casts aspersions upon the actions of a man who has served at the front, and whom I saw leaving Valcartier with as fine a regiment as ever left the shores of any country, a man who acquitted himself in one of the most difficult positions in which anyone was ever placed in a manner which has never been found fault with by any of the men who were with him; yet some politicians who wished to ruin this man's reputation endeavoured to make it appear that he had not done his duty on that occasion. Does the right honourable leader of the Opposition censure his followers for an attack of that kind? Does he censure the honourable member from St. Mary's when he makes an attack upon the Prime Minister of this country? No. But he finds it convenient and it suits his cause to make the attack he has made here to-night. When the honourable member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) endeavoured to reprove the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) as he did here to-night, he never presented a more sorry spectacle in this House.

In conclusion, I want to say that I consider it would have been a crime if we had not passed a War-time Election Act. It would have been a crime that would forever redound to our shame if we had allowed anything to happen in this country that would curtail our effors in this war, if we had allowed such a combination as I have referred to, and allowed the Opposition to attain the objects they hoped to attain as a result of that combination. The War-Time Election Act is before us and I am sure it will satisfy the people of this country.

Mr. F. N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, before the Prime Minister went to England he declared on several occasions that conscription would never be resorted to here. When he came back, he had evidently changed his mind. It is plain that he found conditions on the other side such as to indicate that more effort and more force would have to be put into this war. They said their sole intention was to win the war. Let us review what has taken place since that time and see whether the action has justified the pretension. We are told that actions speak louder than words. If we analyse the actions and means resorted to by the Government, we shall find that it is not the winning of the war that is uppermost in their minds but the winning of the election. The right honourable Minister of Trade and Commerce told us practically that they were the only true and loyal people in this country, that they have been the loyal party and the only party capable of putting the necessary energy, force and drive into the war. He further told us that the people were behind them in this matter. If the Government believe that they have the confidence of the people and that the people are behind them as the win-the-war party, why are they resorting to such methods as these? Why do they resort to the expedient of disfranchising a lot of people who are true and loyal citizens and proceed to enfranchise a lot of other people who never asked to be enfranchised, never thought of it and do not want it? When the right honourable Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) came back from England he said that he believed that the time had arrived when we should put forth a greater effort, and that that effort could not be put forth without a coalition Government, because he declared that a conscription Bill could not be legitimately carried out by any one party. I am not going to give the Prime Minister credit for having any great amount of diplomatic ability, but I still think he is too shrewd and wise to have gone about the formation of a coalition government in the way in which he did if he meant what he said. He said that he had come to the conclusion that we had to have more recruits, that a greater effort was to be put forth and that the first step in that direction was the formation of a coalition government. If he believed that, instead of going into this House and announcing his conscription measure, why did he not call my right honourable friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) into his councils, give him his confidence and state to him the conditions which he found. The conditions which the Prime Minister says he found overseas were very different from what he believed them to be before he went away. When he went away he said that conscription would not be resorted to, but when he came back he said that conscription was necessary. If the right honourable gentleman had believed that, the first thing he, as an intelligent and sensible man, would have done, would have been to call in the leader of the Opposition and lay before him the condition that he found overseas and say: Now, cannot we come to some arrangement for the formation of a coalition, or union government so that we may carry this war to a successful conclusion? He did not do that. He first announced his conscription measure, knowing well that the leader of the Opposition was a man of very strong views upon some things and that he had an aversion to compulsion in any form. He knew he was a man who had spent nearly his whole life in trying to bring the different elements in this country together by persuasion, and that he would not favour a resort to force unless it was finally and absolutely necessary. Did that show that the leader of the Government wanted a coalition government? It did not. The fact of his announcing a policy that he knew beforehand the leader of the Opposition was opposed to, instead of taking him into his confidence, would indicate that it was not a coalition, or win-the-war government that he had in his mind, but that what he desired to do was to bring about a dividing of parties in this country.

Then he brings in the Military Voters' Act. Nobody finds any fault with the proposal to give every soldier of Canadian birth a vote. He is entitled to it. Nobody would object to the wife, sister, mother, or daughter, of a man who had lost his life being enfranchised. It is only common sense and reason that the man who is at the front should have the right to vote. He has the right to vote under this Act, and that being so, why should five or six of his sisters have the right to vote? I have in my mind the case of a young man who is at the front. He has seven sister and a mother. He will have a vote himself and the seven sisters and the mother will each have a vote—nine votes in all. Is there any reason for this unless you give votes to other women? There are men enlisting in the Canadian ranks who never saw Canada but who enlisted on the other side. They probably wanted to go to the war, and like intelligent people they enlisted where they got the best pay. They did not enlist for the sake of getting the vote, they were not asking for the vote. These men have never seen Canada and have no interest in Canadian affairs. They are interested, as British subjects, in winning the war and they did not enlist for the purpose of getting the vote. They may vote wherever they are placed by the machine. Does that indicate that the Government believe that the people are behind them? They tell us that they are the only true and loyal people, that they are the only people who can carry this war to a successful issue. They say that the people of Canada are behind them. Yet they resort to these methods.

Mr. MORRIS: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. McCREA: No sir; I am talking now. The next matter brought up in this House probably had nothing to do with military matters, that was the question of the formation of a coaliton Government. The Government wanted somebody to join them and take the curse off their shoulders, the Canadian Northern Railway Bill. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in this House on different occasions stood up almost with tears in his eyes—I was not very close to him and my sight is not good, but from his trembling voice I think he had tears in his eyes—and deplored the fact that when they came into power they inherited a terrible load of woe in the railway system. Probably there is something in that, that railway construction had been overdone. But I ask if the fact that we have had more expenditure on railways, which in some cases paralleled each other, than was really justified, is a reason for passing legislation to place a value on stock that has no value according to the report of a Commission appointed by this Government.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the rules of the House are being transgressed.

Mr. McCREA: I think I am as near my subject as you were. You talked about yourself, saying you were at the front when other people said you were hiding.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman should come back to the subject.

Mr. McCREA: I am nearer to it now than he was; he spent his whole time talking about himself. During the discussion of the Canadian Northern Railway Bill, the Minister of Finance read out a list of the directors of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I do not know what connection the Canadian Bank of Commerce has with the Canadian Northern Railway Bill, but he read that out. I wish to say that I am not now and never was a director of the Bank of Commerce, but if I was, that would not be a justification of my voting to rob the people of this country to reimburse either the Canadian Northern railway or the Bank of Commerce.

This Franchise Bill disfranchises about 50,000 people ratepayers property owners, naturalized citizens, many of whom have taken the oath of allegiance. If I understood the Prime Minister rightly, he intimated that for such of those as were naturalized and had taken the oath of allegiance and had always behaved well, some way of qualifying might be found. I was wondering if they would take the oath of allegiance to the Tory party instead of to the King, it would not be a better qualification to give them a vote at the present time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is worth taking into consideration.

Mr. McCREA: The Canadian Northern Railway Bill, whatever the award may be, whether it is one dollar or $30,000,000, is just so much money stolen from the people of this country, and the Quebec and Saguenay railway is very much in the same category. This franchise Bill proposes to enfranchise all the female relations of soldiers, whether the soldiers are alive and voting for themselves or whether they are dead. I think every fair-minded man would say without hesitation that the wife or sister of any man who has lost his life at the front should have the right of voting; but I do not believe that the women whose sons or brother are at the front are much concerned about voting. I have one son at the front, and he is not one of the rear guards in London either; he is in the front line in France and has been since May. I trust he is still living. He has a mother at home.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What is his view on conscription?

Mr. McCREA: I do not know what his views on conscription are, but if he is like his father he is in favour of all just and fair measures, and I think he is likely to follow his father's example. I wish to tell you that his mother is not worrying about votes. She is knitting, working for him and other boys, most of her time when she is awake and dreaming about him when she is asleep. She has troubles enough without worrying about politics or about how the vote will go, and I think it is heaping injustice on the women of this country to ask them to take a part in politics. They have troubles enough at this time without being called upon to take part in the political struggles of this country. However, I have no objection to the mothers, sisters, daughters or other womenkind of soldiers having a vote. But I say it is an injustice, and I think you will reap the reward of your injustice when the time comes—I am not worrying about this thing—it is unjust and unreasonable and a blot on the fair name of Canada, to send agents to foreign countries and invite men to come to this country and settle, promising them that they will have the right of citizenship and enjoy all the privileges of British subjects, and at this particular time, when the Government is heaping on all kinds of taxes, and our taxation is only beginning, and although we place this burden on these men not allow them to have anything to say as to how the money shall be spent. It is the fact that this Government feel down in the bottom of their heart and their soul that they have not the confidence of the people of this country that they are placing this unfair, unjust and disgraceful legislation on the statute-book.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (St. James, Montreal): I rise again to protest against the passing of this Bill. I said on one occasion that I represent the city of Montreal where there are a lot of law-abiding citizens who will be affected by this Bill which disfranchises thousands of men who have been accustomed to live with us, paying their taxes, and being as law-abiding citizens as the best class of citizens in Montreal.

People imagine that men in the city of Montreal may be all alike. It is not so. Those who have been attacking the Government have been attacking Sir Wilfrid Laurier and myself in the same manner. These men do not count. I am speaking on behalf of quite a number of Jews of German descent, and many others. I have received many communications from these gentlemen asking me to protest. They are not very quiet men and they are not going to take this matter as easy as the electors of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) do. I do not know whether that hon. gentleman has authority to speak for the electors and to say that they would be satisfied with what he appealed to the Prime Minister to give them. The men in Montreal of whom I speak are not going to be satisfied with that. On one occasion my hon. friend from North Waterloo told the House what his people were doing. He said that a thousand men in North Waterloo enrolled, and 300 of those who went to the front were boys of German descent. Is he asking that these people should have the right of citizenship, but no vote? Is he content with the statement of the Prime Minister that he would pass an Order in Council and give them some right of living, but not the right of representation, though they pay taxes? The Government continue to collect taxes from these disfranchised people in Montreal just the same, and yet all these people will have no right to vote. I call this Bill a measure of expediency. You have only to look at three or four pages of the Bill, and you find nothing but enumerators. We see provision for thousands of enumerators, and they are to be given the right to do whatever they please. We never had such a thing in our province. In my constituency there are many polling subdivisions. One polling subdivision has only four electors, but there will be an enumerator for that subdivision. In one part of my ward there are nine polling subdivisions, with 196 electors. There will be nine enumerators for that district. There will be 3,000 enumerators in Montreal, friends of the Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They will get their work in.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: You bet they will work up to the day of the election, because they have the right to send anybody to the poll to vote. The returning officer, with the enumerator, and some assistant returning officers will prepare the list, and hon. gentlemen can see where we will stand with an election at this time. This Bill, as I have said, is a measure of expediency, to win an election. To win the war is another question. The war will not be won by this Government or the other government. The hon. gentleman from North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) read from some paper a statement that the women of his county were not opposing the measure, but were satisfied, and that statement was placed on Hansard. He showed himself so satisfied in every way with the Bill that I am convinced it is more partisanship than anything else that satisfies him. I desire to place on record a protest against the Franchise Bill, and I take the report in to-day's Montreal Gazette. It reads:

At a meeting of the Equal Suffrage League in the Royal Arcanum Chambers last evening, the various speakers criticised the Federal Government and Sir Robert Borden over the Franchise Bill which is at present being discussed in the House of Commons. Although the meeting was not of a political nature, the presence of a few men gave it the air, at one stage, of a partisan gathering. The business before the meeting was the report of Mrs. Rose Henderson of the reception by Sir Robert Borden of the deputation which went to Ottawa early in the week to advance their views on the new Franchise Bill. After everything had been said about the franchise question, discussion drifted until toward the close, Food Controller Hanna came in for some sharp criticism.

About thirty persons attended the meeting, most of whom were women. All, with the exception of two men, seemed to be in sympathy with the views expressed and the action which had been decided upon.

None of the ladies who spoke claimed to be close relatives to soldiers on active service and consequently enfranchised by the proposed law.

In speaking of the delegation's work at Ottawa, Mrs. Rose Henderson declared that they had gone down to meet the Prime Minister on short notice, as the Franchise Bill was being rushed through, and they wished to discuss it with the Government leader before it finally passed. She said that the deputation felt that the bill was anti-democratic, and was a direct refutation of the facts, for which men have been sent overseas. "I don't think such an autocratic measure has ever passed the Canadian House of Commons, as this one," said Mrs. Henderson. "According to the terms of the bill a large proportion of men will be disfranchised, while there is also a tremendous discrimination in the case of women. Why is it that women who have worked for the Red Cross and for the Patriotic Fund are deprived of the vote by this measure?"

Continuing, Mrs. Henderson stated that the deputation wanted to know why the Government could only trust soldiers' relatives, and not Canadian women who have been doing more than their share to help win the war. It was for these reasons that they decided to go to Ottawa and ask Sir Robert to explain.

Mrs. Henderson then gave her report of the meeting with the Prime Minister. She said that he gave them a long lecture on how and why they were to be discriminated against. Women, said the Premier, are not citizens. Until they came into full possession of citizenship, he did not see how they could have the ballot. He also declared that according to the Imperial Council meeting in 1914, certain naturalization laws had been passed, and as a result of these any woman who married a man of foreign birth or citizenship had to accept the naturalization of her husband, that is, if a Canadian-born woman married a German, she herself became German. Because of this, Sir Robert considered it an injustice to give these women the ballot. However, after this he assured the delegation that if he was returned to power at the coming elections, he would give the women a limited franchise.

[Mr. L. A. Lapointe.]

On asking the Premier what he meant by a limited franchise, they were answered that a woman to qualify for the ballot after the war would be required to reside in Canada for a period of five years, and also have educational qualifications. The latter would be most important. The delegation then asked Sir Robert if the women whom he had enfranchised by the new Bill were required to possess these qualifications, but he replied in the negative.

Mrs. Henderson then declared that the delegation, therefore, came to the conclusion that the new Franchise Bill was not a measure of right, but simply an expedient measure; not so much to win the war as to win the election. She said it was ridiculous to have women of Russian or Polish birth who could not speak a word of English, and who had only lived in Canada perhaps for a few months before the war, given the right to vote, while women who have been living here all their lives and who have been working for the good of their country were deprived of it.

Sir Robert Borden, continued Mrs. Henderson, agreed that the present Bill was an injustice to the women of Canada. He showed that even his wife, who had been doing a good deal of patriotic work, and the wife of Hon. Martin Burrell, would be unable to vote. He said that the measure would have to go through, and the only thing the women of Canada could do was to wait and hope. Sir Robert said that many soldiers have died on the battlefield and as a result their principles and ideas should be expressed through their widows or nearest relatives.

Mrs. Weir, who spoke next, said that according to the outlook it seemed as if a military caste was being formed in Canada. She told the audience that the latest rumour she had heard was to the effect that the Government had told the soldiers in France that if the present Government was returned to power, all the soldiers would be given free passage and six months' leave of absence.

Mrs. Henderson, who presided, replied that there was no doubt but that the Government is trying to get elected by every possible means. "The Government," she continued, "has set a bad precedent by depriving a number of peaceful citizens from voting at a time which they consider to be a crisis. What is to prevent a government in the future from saying that there is a tremendous crisis when they desire to pass an important measure, and take the vote away from some other people who happen to be interested in the question contrary to the Government's wishes?" said Mrs. Henderson.

Mr. A. Lanouette, the first gentleman to speak, said that the Franchise Act was certainly an injustice, and also an insult. "It is nothing else than a political action. It is power they want, and power under any circumstances." In his opinion the Equal Suffrage League ought to organize immediately, agitate, and call public meetings similar to the one in Verdun last week, to place the issue before the people. "An open air meeting looks pretty good," he said.

"We might be arrested," said Mrs. Weir.

"No danger in Verdun—all the policemen are our friends," he answered.

After this one man in the audience sharply attacked the meeting for criticizing the Government during such a crisis. He said that everybody should join together at a time like this and help win the war. The question of votes for women could be argued out after the war had been won, because "if we did not win we would be a crushed people and nothing would matter," he said.

Mrs. Rose Henderson then took the matter of public meetings up, and it was decided that a meeting be held at the corner of Ethel and Church streets, in Verdun, on Saturday night. Another meeting will be held on Phillips' Square on Monday evening. Speakers will be secured to address the audiences, and both sides of the franchise question will be discussed.

You can see that there is going to be quite a lot of discussion in Montreal about that. The article continues:

After the question of meetings had been decided upon, discussion drifted towards the food question and the food controller. Mrs. Henderson gave a vivid picture of conditions among the poorer classes in Montreal, where people had neither bread nor butter. 'We have a food controller who is a huge joke," said the speaker. "The only thing he is controlling is the appetites of the people. He advocates eating fish on two days of the week, and as a result fish dealers raise their prices on those days." The food controller, in Mrs. Henderson's opinion, has failed lamentably, and until a really capable man was given charge of the question she did not think that things would take any turn for the better.

It is useless for me to appeal to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with regard to this Bill, because they have made up their minds that it shall go through. When the Bill was in committee we offered many suggestions by way of amendment, but only those that had been prepared in advance by the Secretary of State could pass. We suggested that in the city of Montreal the polls be kept open until seven or eight o'clock in the evening, but the Government would not accept that suggestion. Everything was cooked in advance; everything was ready, and as a final touch the gag was applied.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the right to vote is not a natural right, nor has it ever been so regarded by any legislature or any state. It is conferred by legislation and never anywhere upon all the people. Speaking generally, persons under twenty-one years of age have not been given it, nor have judges. Aliens, Indians, criminals or those being maintained by public charity. At our last election in 1911 only one-quarter of the people in Canada were entitled to vote, and that right had been given to them by legislation. Consideration must always be had to the conditions existing in the country. The question of the franchise is a matter not of theory, but of conditions. No statesman establishing a government in Central Africa would think of enfranchising the natives. It is generally conceded, I think, that our cousins across the line were unwise in granting the franchise to the coloured man before he was fairly qualified to exercise it. Conditions affecting the interests of the State determine to whom the right to vote shall be given. To-day very exceptional and abnormal conditions prevail. What are they? The safety and independence of Canada, the honour and integrity of the Empire, and the liberties of humanity, are in danger. If the Central Powers finally win the war everything for which life is worth living will be lost by us. The question to be determined in this election is as to whether we shall continue in this war or whether the war shall cease so far as we are concerned.

For three years a majority of the people of this country of both political parties have struggled valiantly for the preservation of these priceless possessions. Loyal Liberals have shown no less anxiety than Conservatives to win this war, and to that end have contributed of men, means and service no less generously than Conservatives. All classes alike mourn the loss of loved ones fallen. Parents, wives and children in all ranks of life in common sorrow weep for those who never shall return but they all find solace in the thought that their men died bravely in a rightful cause; others suffer with anxiety for those still surrounded by death and danger.

The war is the thought uppermost in the minds of people everywhere, and one has to come to Parliament to find anyone worrying about anything else. But here we find men obsessed with the illfounded anticipation of the enjoyment of the pride of office. Some months ago I expressed the opinion that there were men more anxious to win the treasury benches than to win the war, and the opinion I then expressed has since developed into a firm conviction. These men, however, will be rudely awakened to find that the paramount question is, shall we continue the contest and maintain to the end the glorious record our brave men have already won for us or shall we at home declare to the world that we are unworthy of them, that we are sluggards or worse? Shall we sacrifice our all, disgrace our country in the face of the world, dishonor our heroes dead and desert our soldiers living? Our national honor is involved. Shall we go forward or quit? That is the issue to be determined within the next few months by the electors to be designated by this Bill.

Could the people of this country rest in the conviction that whatever the result of the approaching election, the Government of Canada will continue a vigorous participation in the war, they might properly consider questions of lesser magnitude. Were they satisfied that the leader of the Opposition and his followers are as determined that Canada shall continue to do her duty in this war as are the leader of the Government and his supporters, they would probably rest content with a peace time election, for their chief concern would be attained whatever the result, and the extension or restriction of the franchise would not be of so much importance. But they are not so satisfied. On the contrary the evidence seems conclusive, as well concerning the attitude of the leader of the Opposition himself, as that of his chief supporters, that for Canada's effective contribution in the winning of the war it is essential that the Government be sustained. It is well known and everywhere admitted that Sir Robert Borden and all the supporters of the Government will, to the last ounce of strength, sustain our brave men fighting, while all the anti-war elements in the country will be ranged up behind the leader of the anti-war Liberals, himself encouraging their attitude, at least to the extent of refusing to denounce it. If the Government is sustained the war will proceed with renewed vigour; if the Opposition win, our participation in the war will virtually cease. Is there any doubt about that? Does any sane man believe that the leader of the Opposition could or would vigorously prosecute the war, relying chiefly for support upon men avowedly opposed to it, supplemented by all the anti-British, pro-Germans, slackers, and all those Liberals more partisan than patriotic, in the country? Water cannot rise higher than its source. Can any one of clear vision imagine the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), reviewing a battalion for overseas, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) being standard bearer, and commanded by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), who boldly tells us his constituents are ready to rebel rather than obey the law, and that he is ready to lead them?

Mr. L. P. GAUTHIER: I never said that.

Mr. CROTHERS: On page 2662 of Hansard the hon. member (Mr. Gauthier) said:

> Before resuming my seat I shall be very frank with the House. I want to make a few remarks in the name of my people. This is one of the most solemn hours of my life. It may be the last opportunity I shall have of addressing the House of Commons and my country. I say to the Government, if you press this measure through, my people, declaring that this Government has no mandate, will use the very Bill itself to fight the matter out. We acknowledge that in this fight there will be pain and suffering. We may have to go to the direst consequences. My people are willing to go to the limit if you impose upon them such a piece of legislation; I believe they are right, and I will do as they intend to do.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Is that rebellion?

Mr. CROTHERS: That means they are prepared to rebel rather than obey the law. The leader of the Opposition accepted, with apparent approval, that statement from one of his leading supporters—at least we have heard from him no expression of reprimand, disapproval or repudiation. He is willing to receive in silence any influence such perfidious utterance may bear him.

But has the leader of the Opposition himself shewn any burning anxiety that we should earnestly participate in the war? It is true he has asserted in this House and elsewhere that he is in this conflict to the end. But one may safely predicate what a man will do to-morrow from what he did yesterday. This war cannot be won by honied words or cheap and sonorous phrases. Deeds avail rather than words. "By their fruit shall ye know them." Instead of doing anything to strengthen us in the conflict, his conduct since the beginning of the war has tended to encourage the enemy. He has never lost an opportunity of declaring to the people of Canada and to the world that everything done by the Government, whether in prosecuting the war or otherwise, was all wrong. Everything proposed by the Government is villainous in his eye. Since the war session of 1914 I do not remember him to have expressed approval of a single thing done by the Government. Did such conduct on the part of the leader of the Opposition tend to strengthen our hands in the great struggle?

I well remember his declaring in this House in 1910, "If England were in danger, yea, if she were even menaced, I would go upon every platform in my native province and urge my compatriots to shed their last drop of blood for the preservation of British liberty." Noble sentiment! But when the testing day came, where was he found? Sniping, faultfinding, obstructing, preaching bi-lingualism, encouraging disunion and opposing conscription.

Both England and Canada for the last three years have been menaced and in danger, but what real anxiety has he shown for the preservation of British liberty or Canadian safety? None whatever. In this conflict a patriot more anxious for his country's weal than for his personal advantage would cast about to find where his services would be most effective, and, having found it, proceed to render them with all his strength. Had he so acted, we should have found him doing in Quebec in 1915, 1916 and 1917 what in 1910 he said he would do, namely, go upon every platform in his native province and urge his compatriots to shed their last drop of blood for the preservation of British liberty. Had he fulfilled that promise, there would have been no need for conscription. A man possessed of a burning desire to attain a certain end manifests it in deeds, and is not content with words, however eloquent. For months he has had time and strength to lead and encourage obstruction to the Military Service and other Bills, but he has had during the last years no time or strength to induce his people in Quebec to do their duty. " By their fruits ye shall know them." According to his lieutenant from South Renfrew, the hon. gentleman who spoke this morning, and whose speech delivered at the picnic a few days ago was reported, if the leader of the Opposition were made leader of the Government he will take off his coat and proceed to the province of Quebec and fulfil his promise of 1910, and secure recruits by the thousands. That is, he will do his duty if you make him leader of the Government, but, as leader of the Opposition, no such duty devolves upon him. The hon. member for South Renfrew is the gentlemen who with 26 others a few days ago said that conscription was necessary to reinforce our men at the front, and voted for conscription. Yet to-day he is going to the country as supporting a man who is opposed to conscription. He said that conscription was actually necessary to enable us to continue the war. Now he is supporting a man who says: I will not have anything to do with conscription. That is, he will do his duty if you make him leader of the Government, but as leader of the Opposition no such duty devolves upon him. Strong evidence of patriotism and statesmanship that.

1 a.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Whose speech is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not reading from a conviction for manipulating and misappropriating trust funds in connection with the purchase of a saw dust wharf.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. If the hon. gentleman is in his right mind to-night he is guilty of slander of the worst possible description.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The statement he has made has not a particle of truth in it——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is absolutely false in every particular——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have not noticed the hon. minister (Mr. Crothers) accuse any one.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We all know what he referred to——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CROTHERS: How quickly he recognizes an old accomplice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: ——and I repeat it is an act of slander unworthy of any member of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I repeat it in the strongest language possible. The hon. gentleman ought to know better.

Mr. BUREAU: Let him read his conscription speech . He had not time to make it.

The DEPUTY MINISTER: The hon. minister has not referred to any particular member on the other side of the House. I do not think the hon. member for St. John has the right to call it slander.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rose to a point of order, and I characterized the remark as slanderous——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —and false——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —and cowardly——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —and I repeat it. You cannot get away with stuff like that.

Mr. CROTHERS: The reference I made was proved to the hilt in this House a few years ago. I will not take the time to go over it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I deny that absolutely, Mr. Speaker. The hon. minister must know his statement is false, or he ought to know——

Mr. CROTHERS: The sterling people of this country will not be deceived by any such buncombe.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, my time is not up yet. The leader of the Opposition has several times said that the introduction of the Military Service Act threw the apple of discord into this House, that it would make for disunion between the two races in Canada, and that every effort should be made to preserve union and harmony between them. "Preserve" is not the proper word in that connection——

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (translation): I rise to a point of order. I see that the hon. gentleman is reading his speech, which is not allowed by the rules of this House.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (translation): Would the hon. gentlemen be kind enough not to interrupt?

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (translation): I ought to be allowed to rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (translation): If the hon .gentleman does not stop interrupting, I shall have to name him.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (translation): You may name me if you choose, but that does not give the minister the right to read his speech.

Mr. BOIVIN: (translation): Should not the hon. member for Montcalm be allowed to rise to a point of order, as any other member of this House?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (translation): The hon. gentleman is not rising to a point of order; he is stating that the time of the hon. minister has expired.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (translation): I am not stating that the time of the minister has expired; I say that the minister is reading his speech.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was about to say "preserve" is not the proper word——

Mr. LAFORTUNE (translation): I demand your decision upon this point of order.

Mr. CROTHERS: "Preserve" is not the proper word in that connection, because such union and harmony has never existed, does not exist now, and never will exist until our patriotic vision—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CROTHERS:—embraces the Empire as well as all Canada—until we all become nationalists in the true sense of the word.

as distinguished from provincialists and racialists—until we all realize that we are living in the twentieth rather than in the eighteenth century.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Will the hon. Minister kindly use his notes as reference.

Mr. CROTHERS: It is vain to say—

Mr. BOIVIN: I rise to a point of order. A ruling has just been given to the effect that the hon. Minister had no right to read from his notes.

Mr. SPEAKER (having taken the Chair): The rule is a member cannot read his speech. He is permitted to have reference to his notes.

Mr. CROTHERS: We have had to listen to members on the other side of the House during the last week and during the last month who have read their speeches in full. Some hon. gentlemen do not appear to appreciate what is being said. I was about to say, it is vain to say at the same time, that one is in favour of conscription and is supporting the leader of the Opposition who is opposed to it.—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. CROTHERS: —and who if he were returned as leader of this House would not adopt conscription and could not get any recruits by any other means, so that, those who are in favour of conscription cannot consistently support the leader of the Opposition. That is confirmed by a statement I read a short time ago in the Toronto Globe, the leading and most influential Liberal paper in Canada. Let me read what it said on the eighth day of this month, that every man in this country who is opposing conscription is encouraging Canada to drop out of the war.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time is up.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of any honourable gentleman on the other side of the House having anything to say of an uncomplimentary nature about this Bill, I will trespass upon the attention of the House to say something complimentary. Anybody who has heard the debate to-night would not realize that there was a question as to whether or not there should be a franchise Bill in this country. Hon. gentlemen have drifted far afield in discussing the Bill and the reason is plain. They are so mortally afraid to condemn the policy that they are afraid to say anything about it. There has been but one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who has demurred to soldiers' wives being included amongst those who should have votes, and that one hon. gentleman is the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea). I challenge any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House to say that he objects to the wives, daughters, sisters and mothers of the soldiers having votes. They will not do it because they know it is right and while they argue by the hour that females generally should have votes they have not sufficient confidence in themselves to move an amendment to that effect. It is all humbug and hon. gentlemen opposite realize that. They are living on humbug and nothing else. One knows that from listening to their speeches in the House. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) addressed the House, and when he was getting towards the close of his remarks, as Hansard will show, he turned around to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and to hon. gentlemen from the West and from different parts of Canada, who had supported the Government on the conscription Bill, and declared that they were all voting to save their own necks and that there was no principle in them. There was not one of them who had the common honesty to get up and say that he was voting on principle on the matter. Yet, they will go out to different places in this country and tell the people that their vote in the House was not an honest vote and that while they voted for conscription they did not mean it but that they were only trying to tune up to popular opinion in the country. That is what these hon. gentlemen say whenever they meet their friends. There is no question about that. It is published in the press of this country and they have not the manliness to deny it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member—

Mr. CARVELL: Let him go on; there is no other man in the House who will go as far as he does.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: We know his size.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will please take his seat when the Speaker rises.

Mr. CARVELL: I beg your pardon.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member (Mr. W. H. Bennett) to modify his language.

Mr. CARVELL: Let him go on, we do not mind.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: They have not the manliness to deny it.

Mr. CARVELL: He is the only man who can get up and make any kind of a statement in this House.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Let the political sewer-pipe from Carleton county possess his soul in patience.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that remark ought to be taken back.

Mr. CARVELL: Let him go on. He is entirely irresponsible.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I will withdraw it in the House, but I will make it outside the House at the earliest opportunity. There was a meeting held in Toronto by a number of Liberals and the proceedings of that meeting were published by the Toronto Telegram of August 30.

Mr. PROULX: What is the question before the House?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: What did the genial member for Prescott ask?

Mr. PROULX: I asked what was the question before the House.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The question before the House is whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere in their opposition to this Bill. If I prove by this precedent and occasion that they are not honest in other matters—I mean consistent—then they are equally dishonest here. I am going to prove, because the hon. member for Prescott was at the meeting, that in the position which they took on conscription they were inconsistent and nothing else.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does Sir Clifford Sifton say about it?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I presume that whatever Sir Clifford Sifton says he will stand back of, as I will stand back of what I have to say here to-night. Now let us come to this meeting. The record I am going to read from is as true as any gospel that was ever written, and not one of these gentlemen who have returned from that meeting will dare deny a word of it. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) and the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) were both there, and when they hear me read those statements they will not deny them. Why will they not deny them? There were thirty other men, candidates in the province of Ontario at the present time, and these hon. gentlemen know that if they stood up and declared that the statements I am going to read are untrue they will be contradicted by the others and it becomes a question of veracity. The hon. member for Russell will not do it, because I know him too well and he is too shrewd for that. Let us take the statement of one of those gentlemen, the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McMillan).

> We came up here from Ottawa expecting that we might give our friends some information, but we find that instead of giving information, we have been getting it. I never was more surprised in my life than to hear what we have listened to so far this afternoon. We were given to understand that the whole province of Ontario was for conscription. Now we find that we were misled.
> Candidate Forester: You should have consulted us.
> Mr. McMillan: Yes; I admit that. I tell you frankly that if we had known some time ago what we know to-day, several of us would not have voted the way we did.

They were all voting to save their own necks and every one knows it, including the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) knows it as well as I do. Let us go on a little farther.

> We thought the people were all in favour of conscription, but, evidently, that is far from the fact. I may say that as I have a large French element in my community, and also a large body of Scotch electors, I voted for the referendum, and also for the Bill, so as to try and not offend either, but again, I say frankly, if I had known what we have heard this afternoon, my vote would have been given differently.

Three cheers for political humbug! Could you imagine that a man would stand up and have the effrontery that the hon. member for Glengarry had when he made that statement? The statement is true and no hon. gentleman opposite will deny it. Well, now, let us have another one. We heard to-night, with all the force that he is capable of putting into his utterances, from the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). "I stood up in this House and voted for conscription, I advocated it on principle and I will advocate it again on principle." What did the hon. member for South Renfrew say at that meeting?

> Referring to some of the criticism offered, Mr. Graham remarked that "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth". In explanation of his own position, Mr. Graham said he had voted and acted as he did with the knowledge and approval of his leader.

Sir, this was the game: the Laurier anti-conscription cry for Quebec and the Graham cry of conscription for Ontario, and the hon. member for South Renfrew states that deliberately, before he voted and spoke in that way, he had the thorough approval of his leader to do it. I am going to read something that will at least cause a little spirit of joy to my friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). The hon. member for Edmonton has made sundry and divers remarks in the House that would tend to show that he was not altogether satisfied with the conscriptionists on that side, and I want him to know that he had the sympathy of one of the candidates, Mr. Hyslop from Huron, because Mr. Hyslop said:

> I think that the situation brought about is a most deplorable one. I do not know how they got into it, but the opinion in our part of the country is that they must have been soft-headed to allow themselves to take the attitude they did.

Where is the average elector in Ontario and in this Dominion to-day, when he sees this flim flam game being played by these gentlemen from one end of this Dominion to the other—as the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) said, in the vain endeavour to save their own necks? Here is what one gentleman said:

> Win-the-war party? This is not a win-the-war party. Every gentleman says here the whole aim is to win the election. That is the policy of the party.

There was a candidate from North Essex who said:

> Like other gentlemen who have spoken, I regret the diversity of opinion that exists, and I am confused on account of it. In fact, for a month or more past I have been like Eliza in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," floating along, jumping from one cake of ice to another, and now I want to strike shore somewhere, and I want to land soon.

Not one gentleman opposite has dared to make a denial of these matters, and the reason they will not deny these statements is that there are a number of these candidates, and if they dared to make denial some of the candidates would say: For the love of Heaven, what kind of men are these men when they deny what they said in open meeting? Why are these gentlemen down upon the franchise Bill? The reason is because they find that where they expected a win on an appeal to the passion of Germans and Austrians in the Northwest, they are not going to win. I looked up the returns in the last election, and I find that in the riding of Humboldt, where the present member (Mr. Neely) had a majority of 4,218, at some of the polls there were overwhelming majorities for the Liberal candidate. I shall give some examples, placing the figures for the Liberal candidate first in each case: 46—0, 36—0, 40—2, 72—2, 21—0, 80—1, 54—0, 59—0, 58—1, 68—1, 4—1, 42—0, 62—1, 43—0, 33—0, 56—0. In sixteen polls out of 188, 811 votes were cast for Mr. Neely and only 9 votes for his opponent. In order to show you how distinctly German and foreign the names are, let me read the names of some of these polling places: Mozart, Natika, Mueller, Ponnas, Carmel, Leofeld, Forner, Florek, Galicia. "Why do the heathen rage?" That is why the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) loses his temper; that is why, when any reference is made to any political crime that has ever been committed in the calander of the Grits, he jumps up and says: you must not refer to me. The hon. gentleman lost his temper, lost his head altogether. That is why the heathen rage, because they know that kind of vote is to be cut out. Corresponding figures and names for Mackenzie are: Clova, 47—2; Calder, 65—13, 126—8, 47—10, 30—5; Phein, 71—4 35—3, 79—1, 52—3, 60—2; Insinger, 119—22; Shebo, 119—35; Tuffnell, 83—10; Drobot, 92—5; Gourality, 80—13; Janson, 73—16; Veregin, 105—12; Canora, 113—46; Buchanan, 156—39— Deniss, 73—8; 88—13, 75—3, 62—5, 51—6. In 24 polls out of 86, Dr. Cash received 1,881 votes and his opponent 284.

The Minister of the Interior in the late Government used to go around among these people, and although he had denounced them as being such a wild and corrupt people that, as to the Galicians, the only thing you could leave in safety in their sight was a red hot kettle; times change; he became Minister of the Interior and went in among these people and said: "these are the sheep of my hand," let them all have votes. Let us come to Saltcoats. Corresponding figures for that constituency are: 64-2, 57-8, 35-8, 43-4, 28-7, 52-4, 75-4, 65-6, 53-11, 43-5, 40-2, 40-9, 30-9, 113-36, 58-19, 49-8, 36-1. In 17 polls out of 71 Mr. MacNutt received 781 votes and his opponent 143.

These hon. gentlemen know how they carried elections in that country for years, and the best proof as to the illiteracy of a number of these people is that in the records of the polls where these enormous votes were made, 120 to 0, you will never find a spoiled ballot. Why? Because, owing to their ignorance, the deputy returning officer had to mark their ballots. There is the truth of it. Were they at the Winnipeg convention? I was not there, but I will say one thing to my hon. friend, that those who were at the Toronto convention are mighty sorry they ever were there. I have this to say about the Winnipeg convention, that I think there is a spirit of uneasiness in hon. gentlemen ever since it took place. These gentlemen talk about their being a loyal party, about their being the party behind the war, the party who have been doing all they could for the country, with the approval of their leader. They have been conducting in this country for the last two years a campaign for election purposes and election purposes alone. On the 31st of March, after this House adjourned, where were to be found two of the lieutenants of this party opposite? In the far West, setting the heather afire to give their friends the idea that there was a prospect for them to win in an election. They had a meeting at Edmonton. I have an extract from that great family journal, the Edmonton Bulletin, owned by the hon. member for Edmonton, a truthful journal. Here is the report from that paper:

> E. M. Macdonald received an ovation. He devoted himself to an exposure of the mistakes and errors of the Federal Government. He said in its conduct of the war it had lost the trust of the people and that in its extravagance, its waste of public money, in its support of the profiteers and of the makers of rotten boots and rifles which were a positive source of peril to our soldiers at the front, it was no longer entitled to the respect of Canadians.

Mr. OLIVER: That is a reliable paper.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: That is a reliable paper. Fancy the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) denouncing the Ross rifle. The hon. gentleman from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says that is a truthful paper. Picture the member for Pictou standing up in this House, by the hour to champion the Ross rifle, but when he gets off in the west, in Alberta, he denounces it as an instrument that was murdering the Canadian soldiers at the front. Let us have an end to this humbug forever.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I had not intended to take part in this debate this evening, but being, naturally, of a kindly disposition, and recognizing that hon. gentlemen opposite are in somewhat of a quandary as to who shall speak next—

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: About twenty men on this side want to speak.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Why do they not speak?

Mr. EDWARDS: They will get the opportunity. If there are that many members to speak, I am surprised at the lack of consideration shown by the hon. member for North Sydney (Mr. McKenzie) in occupying so much time himself, and allowing those hon. members no opportunity to say a word. As no one rose to speak when my hon. friend sat down, I waited a reasonable time, and thought I would help them out. The hon. member from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) found fault with the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), because he said he had not approached the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in a proper spirit in regard to coalition. He said that the Prime Minister should know, that the leader of the Opposition was a man who had spent all his life in an earnest endeavour to bring all classes of race and creed in this country to a coalition of amity and perfect love. I could not help thinking, when he was making those remarks, that some of the past history of the right hon. leader of the Opposition had entirely escaped the memory of my hon. friend from Sherbrooke. I thought of some of the past political history of the country, when the leader of the Opposition, instead of being a man of peace, was going to shoulder his musket, and fight on the banks of the Saskatchewan. It did not seem to me that that was in keeping with the statement of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, that the leader of the Opposition was a man of peace, and trying to bring all classes of people together. I thought also of the time when this country, as a part of the Empire, was engaged in the terrible war, and when there was every reason why men on both sides of politics should lay aside their political differences and try and bring the people together, the right hon. leader of the Opposition brought up on the floor of this house a question which he must have known as well, or better than any other man in Canada, was bound to create dissension and discord, and that was the bilingual question—a question which he raised in Parliament, not with any intention to bring about amity and concord between the races of this country, but in my humble judgment, with the deliberate intention of consolidating his own province behind him in the next election. I also call to mind, in this connection, many utterances by the leader of the Opposition in regard to the independence of this country, in regard to England, and British connection, and British institutions, which could not have been intended to have the result, and which could not have had the result, of causing the different races of people in this country to live in greater amity and accord. Another remark made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) caught my attention, in regard to giving the vote to women. That did not exactly suit the hon. member for Sherbrooke. He rather took exception to the fact that some soldier overseas might have five or six relatives on this side of the water who, under this Bill, would be enabled to cast their ballot in the coming election. He mentioned the fact incidentally, not in any boastful way, of his own son being overseas, and I congratulate him on the fact that he has a son overseas, who, I dare say, is doing noble work in this great cause. He said the mother of that boy did not desire a vote, and was not worrying about votes. I can understand that the mother of that boy is thinking of the boy overseas, but it seems to me that this Bill is giving some worry to the member for Sherbrooke, (Mr. McCrea) because I cannot conceive it possible that the mother of that boy, thinking of him overseas and the danger he is going through, and knowing that he should have proper support, will cast her ballot in favour of a candidate, even though that candidate were the father of her boy, who did not want to send proper support to the men at the front. What is worrying the member for Sherbrooke, and worrying honourable members on the other side of the House is the fact that they know down in their hearts, that these women who are spending sleepless nights, their eyes filled with tears and their heart wrung with anguish because of their boys overseas, having been given the ballot will cast their votes in support of this Government, because they know they can trust this Government to keep faith with the boys at the front. That honourable gentleman took exception to the fact, as had others, on that side of the House, to some men, British subjects, who, for some years, have been living in the United States, coming over into Canada, putting on uniforms, going across the seas and fighting. They take exception to these men being given the ballot. They are British subjects, living on the other side of the line. They say they have no interest whatever in this country. But can they say truthfully of a man when he chooses to risk his life in defence of a country, that he takes no interest in that country? It is all right for these British subjects to come from another country into Canada to put on the uniform and go overseas to fight for the defence of Canada, but they say it is not right for these men to fight in defence of Canada with the ballot. We on this side of the House say if they see fit to go overseas and defend Canada with their bayonet, they should also have the right to defend her with their ballot and prevent the country getting into the hands of men not in sympathy with Britain and British institutions, and with the cause of our boys overseas.

The honourable gentleman also referred to coalition. I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, to every honourable gentlemen in the House, and every man in Canada, could any gentleman have done more than has been done by the Prime Minister of Canada, in endeavouring to secure a coalition or union government? From the beginning of the war the right honourable gentleman at the head of this Government has shown that he had before him but one object and purpose in life, and that was the winning of the war.

He has been prepared to sacrifice himself; he has shown that he has had no personal ambitions; his only aim has been the successful prosecution of this war. He made the leader of the Opposition such an offer as, I venture to say, never before was made by the leader of a government to the leader of an Opposition in any civilized country in the world. He offered him, an equal footing, a fifty-fifty basis of coalition. He did his utmost to further this proposal, but the leader of the Opposition would have nothing to do with it. Why? Because the leader of the Opposition and many hon. gentlemen on his side of the House were opposed to conscription. We have the statement of General Sir Arthur Currie, the head of our Canadian troops in Europe—a Liberal, by the way—that assistance is imperative if we are to maintain the proud position which our boys have won for us upon the fields of France and Flanders. That statement is backed up by the statement of the editor of the Globe, Stewart Lyon, the accredited correspondent of the Canadian press overseas, a man who a few months ago was opposed to conscription, but who, having seen conditions on the battlefield as they really are, has arrived at the conclusion that there is only one way to support the boys at the front and that is by adopting compulsory military service. We have further the evidence of other men, who are non-partisan, and have been impressed by the conditions at the front, and who regard conscription as the only means of giving proper support to our boys overseas. We have also, in support of the contention that conscription is the only means of giving our boys proper support, the attitude of twenty-seven Liberal members of this House, who by their votes and by their speeches have shown that in their estimation the leader of the Opposition is to bring about the passing of conscription If these gentlemen meant what they said; if their votes really meant anything they should have backed up this measure; they should have backed up the Government in every step taken to bring about the passing of conscription and to keep in power the party that will best make that Conscription Act effective. An election is pending; the issue at the election will be the question of compulsory military service. There is no other issue before the country. The question is: shall we enforce conscription and get the necessary men to support our boys at the front? The attitude taken by the leader of the Opposition is that if the people of the country should, through an election or referendum, express themselves as being in favour of conscription, then a measure of compulsory service should be adopted. But what if a referendum should have an opposite result? The men who are overseas should receive no support; that is the only conclusion that can be drawn from his argument. that is impressed upon the minds of the women of Canada, especially those who have relatives fighting in the Canadian forces overseas.

It has been said by different gentlemen on the other side that the purpose of this Bill is to win the election. If hon. gentlemen mean that, then we must conclude that they oppose this Bill because they think that by retaining on the voters' list those whom we propose to disfranchise, and by keeping off the lists the names of the wives, daughters, and sisters of soldiers, they will be enabled to win the election. Viewing the matter from that standpoint, let us suppose an election is on. The leader of the Opposition, at the head of the anti-conscription party, is reviewing those who give him their support in that election. We will suppose also that the Prime Minister, who is in favour of conscription, is reviewing before him those electors and voters who are favourable to his side of the case. Let us look at the two crowds as they pass before the leaders. In the crowd passing before the leader of the Opposition, you find the anti-British element from the province of Quebec.

The member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) may smile; but you would find that element there. I do not say that the member for Sherbrooke is anti-British, but I am telling him where he will find himself in this election. You have men in that crowd who tried to murder Lord Atholstan and to blow up his house with dynamite.

Mr. BUREAU: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that he will find men in that crowd—pointing to the Liberal party—who tried to murder Lord Atholstan. Those people belong to the hon. gentleman's crowd.

Mr. SPEAKER: I followed carefully the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac. He was not referring to hon. gentlemen on my left as a crowd; he was referring to those whom he considered were supporting the leader of the Opposition and he was going over a list of them.

Mr. BUREAU: We deny that they support the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. EDWARDS: We will find in that crowd—I am using the word "crowd" without offence; I do not know what other word I can use—

An hon. MEMBER: Aggregation.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is a good word. We will find in that aggregation which is passing in review before the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau).

Mr. BUREAU: And he will not be ashamed of it, either.

Mr. EDWARDS: If we judge by their actions how these men will vote, we shall find in this aggregation the soap-box orators and the dynamiters from Montreal and other parts of Quebec. We shall find in this aggregation the men who threatened to blow up the Parliament buildings and to murder the Prime Minister. We shall find also in that crowd Austrian and German reservists who failed to get out of this country in order that they might use their bayonets against our Canadian soldiers. We shall find in that aggregation the anti-British and foreign element in this country, the element who are opposed to Canada's doing her utmost in the war. You will find also the element who are opposed to Canada's keeping faith with the boys overseas. You will find in that aggregation men who in various parts of the country are tearing the Union Jack to shreds and stamping it under their feet. But you will find in the aggregation passing in review before the Prime Minister the red-blooded men of this country whose relatives are overseas, the men who are willing to back up the boys at the front. You will find by the thousands in this aggregation men who are willing to support this Government; the wives, mothers, daughters and sisters of soldiers, who will cast their votes at the polls with a view to seeing that the mantle of shame is not thrown over this country's honour through the return to power of hon. gentlemen opposite. A man is known by the company he keeps, and hon. gentlemen opposite in the election which is coming on will be in one aggregation or the other. For my part I do not want to be found in that crowd or aggregation which will be supporting and trying to put into power in this country the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. F. R. LALOR (Haldimand): At this late hour my speech will be very brief. I have had great pleasure in listening to the speeches that have been made on this side of the House this evening, and particularly to that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). Since his eloquent explanation of the position of the Government with regard to this Bill hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have been struck dumb. It is true the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) attempted to make a reply, but you could see that he was very much annoyed and very disappointed to hear the true position of the Government placed before the electors in the eloquent words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite that that eloquent speech which we listened to to-night, though it lasted for no more than twenty minutes, will be heard on every platform in Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific during this election, and if the facts as presented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce do not sway and carry the loyal and patriotic people in every constituency in this country, with the exception of the province of Quebec, I shall be very much mistaken. I believe even now the people know the facts pretty well. I think they have the leader of the Opposition and the party that supports him pretty well sized up both in Ontario and the West and the provinces down by the sea. When the election comes on and the people hear the matter fully discussed, I think hon. gentlemen opposite will be almost as dumb in this country as they have been in this House for the last two hours. I do not know whether it is a realization of the position they occupy in the minds of the people of this country, or the forlorn hope they will lead in the next election that has struck them dumb or not, but they must be a very disappointed party, because it is not so very long ago that they wanted an election at once, because they thought they were almost sure to win. Now things have taken on a different aspect.

Mr. McKENZIE: The sooner the better. Bring it on to-morrow.

Mr. LALOR: We are going to bring it on before very long, and we hope we shall have our friend from North Cape Breton back with us, because we want some one opposite to keep the leader of the Opposition from getting lonesome.

The hon. member for South Renfrew has made some remarks about the German voters in this country, in a speech that was designed to influence, if possible, the German electors of Ontario and other provinces of the Dominion. The fact is that the measure now before the House does not change the position of the old German settlers in Canada one iota; they are in exactly the same position they always have been in, and no one knows that better than the hon. member for South Renfrew. Every one knows that no man in this country could vote unless he had taken the oath of allegiance and was enfranchised, and that is the position to-day. I represent a constituency where there are a great many Germans, and I resent any suggestion that this class of honest and respectable settlers and citizens should be disfranchised by this or any other Act of this Parliament. There is no better class of settlers in the county I represent than these fine old German settlers; there is no better class of settler in all Canada than these men who came here forty or fifty years ago. There is no part of my county I enjoy visiting more, or where I have more enthusiastic and loyal supporters than in these communities of German settlers in the county of Haldimand, and I would go down to defeat in my county rather than have these men disfranchised. I am sure it is not the intention of the Government, or the intent of this Bill, that these men should be disfranchised. I am making this statement so that the German people in my county may know that the Government have no such intention, and that any insinuations to that effect are untrue, because these settlers are in exactly the same position they have always been in as regards the franchise in this country. They are honest and law-abiding citizens, and among the best farmers in the county of Haldimand. I am on record as having made speeches in this House in defence of the German people of my county, even before the war broke out, and there is nothing that I ever said on their behalf that I propose to retract or change in the slightest degree.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are not very much in favour of extending the franchise to the female relatives of the soldiers overseas. True, they have not come out very strongly in opposition to it, but they try to becloud the issue by agitating that the franchise be extended to the women of Canada generally. I am very proud indeed to know from statements that have been made here this afternoon and from press reports that the women's organizations throughout Canada, through their presidents and vice-presidents, have told the Prime Minister of this country that they do not want the franchise at the present time, and would prefer that the female relatives of the soldiers overseas should be given that honour. It is estimated that at the next election 500,000 women will be enfranchised and vote at a federal election for the first time in the history of Canada. I am in favour of a general enfranchisement of women when the proper time comes, but this is not the time. It is a war-time election that is coming on. It was stated this afternoon, or at all events during this debate by an hon. gentleman opposite from the province of Quebec, that the women who will vote at the next election do nothing but draw pay from the Government. I do not know whether he was alluding to the wives of soldiers or not, but if there is any class of people in this country who are entitled to the franchise and will do honour to it, it is the female relatives of the soldiers who have gone overseas.

As members of Parliament instances come before us almost every day. When I heard the gentleman make that statement, I thought of one of the women in my town whose husband is unfortunately in the asylum. She depended upon a young man for her only source of livelihood—a splendid well-educated boy. He went to the front and unfortunately made the supreme sacrifice. Is that woman entitled to a vote? Would any man on this other side of the House insinuate that that woman does not do anything but stay at home and draw pay from the Government? I say it is a shame that the man who represents a great constituency as does this gentleman should stand up in the House and make such a statement as that. It is not to his honour, nor to the honour of the Parliament of Canada. This is only one instance among many. I had a letter to-day from a Presbyterian clergyman in my town, telling me of an aged couple in the western portion of my county whose son had just made the supreme sacrifice. Surely women of this class are entitled to consideration, more than any other class of women in Canada. I believe all the women of Canada are proud of the fact, and will be proud of the fact that the franchise has been extended to those of them who are relatives of the soldiers overseas. We have instances of a good deal of division on the other side of the House, and I want to speak in all kindness with reference to it. Twenty-seven Liberals voted with us on the Conscription Bill. The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) said to-night that when he voted for conscription he so voted with the approval of his leader—

Mr. CARVELL: And we have received a lot of credit for it to-night, have we not?

Mr. LALOR: Those who so voted did it conscientiously, and will get credit from their electors—

Mr. CARVELL: We have not got it from the Tory party anyhow.

Mr. LALOR: Twenty-seven Liberals supported the Government on the question of conscription. I want to give them credit for it, and I think the people of Canada will give them credit for voting honestly and conscientiously; they did not do so, because they thought they would lose votes if they did not. They supported it conscientiously and honestly, because they thought it was the right thing, and that the policy of the Government should be the policy of winning the war.

Mr. MARTIN: We thought the people of Canada were against conscription, and they are against conscription, and you will see it at the next election.

Mr. LALOR: The hon. gentleman says we will se it at the next election——

Mr. MARTIN: Sure.

Mr. LALOR: We expect that in the province of Quebec the Liberals will come back to this House with the pretty strong following——

[Mr. Lalor.]

Mr. MARTIN: Not in my case. I will not run any more.

Mr. LALOR: But your representation from the other provinces of the Dominion will be mighty slim when the election is over. I want to tell the Mayor of Montreal (Mr. Martin) there is nothing which has so moved the people of Canada as the riots and the anti-conscription meetings in the province of Quebec——

Mr. MARTIN: What the hon. member says is not true; he does not read the papers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MARTIN: I am trying to do everything possible——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MARTIN: —to stop these anti-conscription meetings. The hon member does not know what he is saying——

Mr SPEAKER: If hon. gentlemen do not resume their seats when I stand I shall certainly name them. No member may interrupt the hon. member who has the floor except by that hon. member's permission.

Mr. LALOR I cast no reflection upon the Mayor of Montreal. I do not insinuate anything in reference to himself, but he is mayor of the city and he should enforce the law——

Mr. MARTIN: And he will be mayor again.

Mr. LALOR: It is his duty to enforce the law as mayor of the city. He knows whether it is being done or not, and we know of the riots about which we read in the papers every day. We know of the anti-conscription meetings which are held attended by thousands of his fellow French Canadians——

Mr. MARTIN: And English too——

Mr. LALOR: —and we have read their speeches and listened to some of their statements in this House. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) referred to one of them to-night. What is going on will help carry this election, because people will not stand for that sort of thing. The Conservatives, and the Liberals as well, throughout the Dominion of Canada, are loyal people, with good red blood in their veins. They have sent their sons and their husbands overseas to fight our fight, and to do honour and credit to the Empire and to the Dominion as well, and they have done credit to it. They do not like to hear of the condition of affairs in the province of Quebec, and of the small number of enlistments there. I was speaking of the men on the other side of the House—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member not to refer to hon members as "men on the other side of the House". It is not parliamentary.

Mr. LALOR: I want to say to the members on the other side of the House who have supported conscription, and have stood by it honestly and constantly, that they deserve the credit of this House, of their constituencies, and of the country, and I believe they will get it without any question of doubt. There is just one other matter to which I wish to refer, and that is, union government. I have always been in favour of union government. I believe that the great problems we have, not only of sending men overseas, but the financial problems, the problem of our returning soldiers, and many other great problems in this country, are such that we should have had a union government in Canada. I believe the Prime Minister has made every honest effort to bring about such a government. He has offered the Opposition fifty-fifty—one-half of the portfolios. That offer has been refused. I am sorry indeed, as a member of this House, and as a good Canadian, that we have not had a union government in Canada. However, the offer has been refused, and now I presume it will be a party election, which is most unfortunate. I regret that we must have an election at all. I am sorry hon. gentlemen opposite did not see their way clear to extend the life of Parliament until after the war, thus avoiding all the turmoil an election will bring about, and all the feeling that will be aroused by that election.

ORDER IN COUNCIL—ENEMY NATIONALITY.

Copy of an Order in Council approved September 13th, with regard to conditions under which naturalization may be granted to persons who have resided for a long time in this country, although of enemy nationality.—Sir Robert Borden.

FIRST READING OF SENATE BILL.

Bill No. 132, to amend The Companies Act.—Mr. Meighen.

TRIBUNALS UNDER MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I regret having to again ask the Government to lay on the Table the list of tribunals to be appointed under the Military Service Act.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): The proclamation establishing the tribunals was officially published in the Canada Gazette of September 12th, and I am producing a copy of the Gazette.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask if copies will be placed in our postoffice boxes?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: I am laying it on the Table now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the Official Gazette goes to each member of Parliament.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understand so, but we never see it. It comes as a newspaper, and is usually thrown in the waste basket.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid we cannot force hon. gentlemen to read it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: May I ask if this list is subject to amendment, or correction, or increase?

Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. If conditions should make it necessary it would have to be done. There is a provision in the statute to the effect that it may be done from time to time.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difficulty about the Gazette going to members is that it goes to our home address, and we are in Ottawa.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You are expected to be at home by this time.

Mr. GRAHAM: But the fault is not ours. We have had business here.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will see if I can arrange to have special copies sent to hon. members.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: According to what has been published in the newspapers, there seems to be a serious deficiency in the establishment of these tribunals. For instance, it would appear that there were to be 165 tribunals established in the city of Montreal, but there is no indication as to their exact location. It would be somewhat different in the rural districts, for instance in the county of Montmorency, tribunals would be established at St. Anne de Beaupré, Chateau Richer, and so on. I presume this detail has not been looked into.

Mr. DOHERTY: In Montreal and, I think, the larger cities, the intention was that the particular location should be determined by the Registrar, after making inquiry to see what would best suit the convenience of everybody. It is not as easy to fix particular locations in a city as it would be in villages and towns. The intention was that the Registrar should make arrangements for suitable places, and then we would give special notice as to the exact locations.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will it be possible to have any corrections made? A gentleman called upon me last night and pointed out that he thought there was not a sufficient number of tribunals in his riding, as the distances were very great. I sent his suggestion to the Prime Minister this morning, but I should have sent it to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have already stated in answer to the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) that if conditions show additional tribunals are required they will be provided. This can be done under the statute.

Mr. BUREAU: Might I ask the minister if the population has been taken into account in the establishment of these tribunals, and if so, how many thousands of population has been determined upon as being entitled to a tribunal?

Mr. DOHERTY: If my memory serves me correctly, it was estimated that there should be, generally speaking, a tribunal for about 7,500 of population. Of course, in the larger cities it would not be necessary to have as many as that would represent, because of the greater density of population and the greater facility with which people could reach the places established. I understand it was estimated that for every 7,500 of population the largest number of men who would be liable to this call would be about 500. Every one, I presume, will not ask for exemption and 500 ought to be the maximum of the possible cases which one tribunal would be called upon to deal with.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understood that a tribunal, if they had a large population or area, could meet in one part of the tribunal area and then move to another without any higher authority intervening?

Mr. DOHERTY: They will have authority to move from one part to another where there is a sufficient gathering of people at different parts and where such movement will more effectually meet the general convenience.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is, within their own area?

Mr. GAUVREAU: Will that only be in the large cities or will it apply to the rural districts also? In Temiscouata there are five tribunals and they are quite distant from each other. Could one of these tribunals proceed to another place and sit there at any time it liked?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, any of the tribunals will be authorized to move from place to place when the exigencies require it. The purpose is to settle the location which shall be the headquarters of the tribunal.

Mr. BUREAU: The minister says that it is supposed that no more than 500, out of 7,500, will make an application and that in the cities, the population being denser, they will not have to go far to get to a tribunal. It is not only the question of how far they will have to travel to get to the tribunal that I am interested in for there is also the question of the time taken to hear the applications. The question raised by my hon. friend from Temiscouata is a proper one. Take cities such as Hull, Sherbrooke, Three Rivers, Shawinigan or Grand'Mere, which have a population of from 22,000 to 23,000. It would not be so much the inconvenience of getting there as it would be the question of the time that the people would require to take to submit their evidence and have their applications settled. How many tribunals are there in Three Rivers which has a population of 22,000? There are a great many people working in the mills. We have the munition factories, paper mills and various other industries. There should be quite a number of applications. I do not think one tribunal of the kind mentioned in the proclamation will be sufficient. I do not think proper time will be afforded to give due consideration to all the applications. My demand for information is not so much as to the distance to be covered by each one who desires to go before the tribunal as it is to the time which it will take to enable the people to make their applications and to have them properly considered.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no finality about this list. Tribunals may be established from time to time and after the tribunals have proceeded to their operations, if there is reason to believe that there is need for further tribunals, they will be provided. I was under the impression that there was more than one tribunal provided for Three Rivers but I do not speak with any certainty. My own impression would be that more than one tribunal would be required but I will make inquiry. These things have not been dealt with personally by me but the hon. member can feel quite satisfied that a sufficient number will be provided.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I notice that in St. John county the parish of St. Martin's has been omitted altogether. Perhaps the minister will take notice of it? I think the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) will agree that there should be a tribunal in St. Martin's. There is one in the parish of Simond's but St. Martin's is a very important section of the county.

Mr. HAZEN: They thought maybe, that one tribunal would be sufficient for the two parishes of St. Martin's and Simond's. I would be disposed to believe that the parish of St. Martin's being the more distant there should be a further tribunal for that parish. It might suit the convenience of the people of Simond's to come into the city because they all come in to do their business. However, I think the matter ought to be looked into.

Mr. MURPHY: There has been an intimation in the newspapers that a scale of fees has been determined for the members of the local tribunals. Is that correct?

Mr. DOHERTY: The matter has not been absolutely settled but I will be able to give the hon. gentleman a positive answer on Monday.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They are not fees, are they?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a question of remuneration of some description.

PRIVILEGE.

Statement by Mr. Boivin denying imputations.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In his remarks last evening the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) is reported in Hansard to have spoken as follows:

> I was surprised the other night to listen to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Shefford (Mr. Boivin), who seemed to treat with scorn the sacrifices which the relatives of the soldiers had made in this war. He said they stayed at home and drew separation allowances from the Patriotic Fund. He must have come from a district where men have not gone overseas in large numbers.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) also used somewhat similar language. I would ask these hon. gentlemen to read my remarks in Hansard of Monday last, and they will be convinced that I did not treat with scorn the sacrifices made by the relatives of soldiers. In my remarks I was making a comparison between the sacrifice made by some soldier's wives and the other women of Canada, who, since the beginning of the war, have given of their time, energy, and means to the cause of the soldiers, but who have had no sons to offer to the cause. I realize as well as any hon. member of this House, with the probable exception of those who have sons of their own at the front, the enormous sacrifice which mothers and sisters must make to see their loved ones take up arms in defence of the Empire. I resent such interpretation being put upon my remarks, and such imputation being cast upon me, that I would ever think of treating with scorn the sacrifices made by the relatives of soldiers.

WAR TAX UPON INCOMES.

RULING BY MR. SPEAKER ON THE RIGHT OF THE SENATE TO AMEND A MONEY BILL—AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE CONCURRED IN.

On the Order:

Resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White for the concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 117, an Act to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain incomes, (resumed from Friday, September 7).

Mr. SPEAKER: On a previous occasion when this motion was under consideration, two points of order were taken by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, (1) that the Senate has no power to amend a money Bill, and, (2) if the Senate makes such an amendment, in view of rule 78, the House is bound to insist on its privileges and reject the amendment.

As to the first point, it is beyond question that, in view of section 53 of the British North America Act, Bills appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost must originate in the House of Commons; and there is no doubt that the Senate has neither power to increase the tax or impost nor to change the incidence of the burden of any such tax or impost in any such Bill originating in this House; but the question whether the Senate can make such amendments as have been made in the Bill now under consideration is a point of constitutional law in respect to which it would I think be improper for me to undertake to give an official decision. Matters of such high constitutional import are for the House and not for your Speaker to determine.

With respect to the second point, viz., that Rule 78 prevents the House from entertaining the present motion, while this rule is an affirmation of what this House considers its powers and prerogatives, there is nothing contained in it or any of our rules which prevents this House from adopting as its own, amendments such as this now under consideration. In the year 1874, amendments of the Senate to a Bill originating in this House were concurred in with the reservation that such action was not to be construed as a waiver of its rules and privileges. While the action of this House in the year 1874 was with respect to a Bill dealing with Dominion Lands, and the present Bills deals with taxation, in my judgment the principle involved as to the authority of this House to waive under stated conditions its rights and privileges is the same.

I need only say with respect to Rule 87 that it has no bearing upon or application to the present case.

After careful consideration, I am of the opinion that the motion of the Minister of Finance is in order, but should it be accepted by this House I shall give directions to the clerk to make a special entry in the Journals of the House to the effect that this House, while disapproving of any infraction of its privileges or rights by the other House, in this case waives its claims to insist upon such rights and privileges, but that the waiver of the said rights and privileges in this case is not to be drawn into a precedent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have nothing to say as to your ruling, Sir, but I would suggest that, instead of the caveat proceeding from the Chair, it should be part of the motion itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: With respect to the point raised by the right hon. member, there is no objection, so far as I am concerned. I may say that I am guided in taking the action I have taken by similar action on the part of the Speaker of the British House of Commons in respect to an analogous case some ten years ago.

Mr. MURPHY: Does the precedent to which Your Honour has just referred also extend to the entry which you purpose to have made in the Journals of the House, as emanating from the Speaker rather than from the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have used the exact language of the Speaker of the British House of Commons, except that I have added a line taken from the entry made in the journals of this House in 1874.

Mr. MACDONALD: I desire to call the attention of the House to what I think is an important change made by the Senate in this Bill, and which provides that a hearing by the board in regard to the question of the amount of tax to be assessed should be held in camera at the request of the taxpayer. The discussion upon the wisdom of accepting that amendment was cut off by the consideration of the point of order which the Speaker has just decided. It is true that there may be cases in which it would be desirable that that should be done, but I do not think it should be open to every person who may be subject to income tax to insist upon a hearing in camera. It is left to the taxpayer to insist upon a private hearing of the proceedings before the board or Exchequer Court. In the ordinary courts, in cases in which it is desirable that the proceedings should be held in private—and the law permits that in some criminal cases of very serious import—the matter is left in the discretion of the court. Here the person taxed has full discretion, no matter what the tribunal may think. It is questionable if it is not desirable to have these proceedings in public, so that the public, who are contributing to the taxes, may know what grounds are raised by parties as reasons for being exempted from this taxation. Very peculiar circumstances might arise under such a provision. No one will want to have his assessment considered in public if he can have a private hearing by simply asking for it. The result will be that all proceedings will be held in secrecy, and the country will not know, this House will not know, no one will be able to tell, except the gentlemen composing the tribunal and the parties to the case, on what principle the thing has been decided.

It does seem to me, therefore, that this is not a wise measure, and that some discretion should be left with the tribunal and the court to determine whether or not the rule as to the trying of the case in public should be departed from in this particular instance. We are practically legislating here that the proceedings before a tribunal, in order to ascertain what the assessment of any man should be under the income tax measure, shall be held in private. I do not think that is wise legislation, and I think the House ought to hesitate before declaring that all these proceedings shall be held in private.

[The Speaker.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should have preferred that this amendment had not been made by the Senate. However, as far as I can ascertain by inquiry, there is not much probability of their receding from it. There is some force in the observations which my hon. friend has put forward. On the other hand, it can hardly be supposed that a board of referees composed of responsible and reputable men would be likely to adopt one principle in one case and another principle in another case. Certainly that would not be urged for one moment with regard to the Exchequer Court of Canada. The House may therefore reasonably conclude that there will be an application of the same principle to all cases. The view of the Senate is doubtless based on the consideration that it might be very detrimental to the interest of the taxpayer, not in all cases but in certain cases, if publicity were given to his business affairs to the extent that would be necessary if the proceedings were held in public. It is not desirable that an inquisitorial proceeding of this kind should be conducted in such a way as to be attended with detriment to any man's business. The object of the Bill is to procure a fair assessment, and we have, as a guarantee that this will be done, an investigation by the Board of Referees in the first instance. Then the Crown has the opportunity of an appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada if it should appear that the determination of the Board of Referees is not in the public interest.

Mr. NESBITT: Is it only in case of dispute, or in all cases, that the matter is referred to the Board of Referees?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Board of Referees is appointed for the purpose of determining the assessment, and there is an appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton): My view is very much the same as that of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and perhaps I have other reasons, which I should like to give to the House. We all know that it is a matter of history that the rich man never pays his fair share of taxation, as compared with the poor man; I do not care whether it is income taxation, or ordinary taxation by a municipality. The man who owns a small home or a little piece of property is obliged to pay taxes upon it. The assessor can see his property and it is assessed for at least as much as it is worth, compared with the assessment of other property. But the difficulty about the rich man is that his property is not visible, the assessor cannot see it, and is compelled to take the man's word as to what his income is. I think cases of this kind which occur in connection with municipal taxation illustrate what is likely to take place in connection with the income tax. We know that there are many people in every municipality in Canada who deliberately and persistently keep their taxation away below what it ought to be by not furnishing proper returns to the assessor. I am not casting aspersions on anybody, but am speaking generally. There is no doubt that the rich man will be just as anxious to pay as little taxation under this measure as under any scheme of municipal taxation, and if you allow these investigations to be held in camera the public will never know what is taking place. I realize there may be cases where people might pry into the private affairs of some individual, but that is one of the misfortunes incident to the case. A man with an income of $25,000 or $50,000 a year may declare in his statement that his income is $10,000, and his statement goes, because no publicity is given to it, and the average man who would be interested in seeing that this man paid his fair share of taxation is not given an opportunity of being present to find out just what he is paying. Later on, you may possibly get a return from Parliament showing what the taxation was, but if the same policy is adopted by the Government in regard to the income tax as was adopted with regard to the Business Profits War Tax, not only will the public have no opportunity of knowing what is taking place when the taxation is imposed, but they will not know later on what taxation any particular man pays. I have persistently tried this session to find out what taxes have been paid under the Business Profits Tax, and how certain firms and corporations had made their profits, but the Finance Minister has deliberately refused to bring down this information except upon an order of the House. If I want to get this information I can go to his office, he says, and they will give it to me as a member of Parliament. When I asked him if that meant that I could give the information to my constituents I got a very curt answer, implying that if I did that I should be violating his confidence. I could not accept information of that character, so I gave him a list of four or five firms, all of whom have been doing business in my province, but none of which has paid the Business Profits War Tax. If I went to the minister's office I presume I could get the information I desire, but in such a way that he would consider I had violated his confidence if I made the information public. Therefore I did not act on his suggestion, and I and my constituents do not know to-day whether these people have paid anything or not.

If a similar policy were adopted by the Government in respect of the income tax, neither the people of the community nor the representative of those people in Parliament would be able to find out what is going on. I feel very strongly on this question of income tax; it is one of the few policies of the Government with which I am heartily in accord. I have been preaching income tax since August, 1914; at every session of Parliament I have advocated it, and I am glad indeed that the Government have acceded to the popular demand by introducing this Bill—though it is not anything like as comprehensive as I would like to see it. I am so glad, however, to see the principle established that I am willing to accept whatever hon. gentlemen have brought down, in the hope that later on a large proportion of our revenue will be raised by this direct method of taxation. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the financial condition of Canada has so changed during the last three years as to revolutionize our whole method of taxation. The time has gone by when we can continue to raise money by means of customs and excise or other indirect methods of taxation. We have to get down to direct taxation, and to adopt a system so efficient, straight and above board that every man will know whether or not his neighbour is paying his fair share of taxation. The moment you allow these assessments or appeals to take place in camera, you take away from the people the right of compelling the rich man to contribute his fair share of taxation. This is one of the most important questions that has come before Parliament this session. I think that the House should disagree with the proposed amendment, even to the extent of demanding a conference with the Senate. I am sure that if the matter were put before them; if they were shown the tremendous importance of this matter to the people, they would be willing to give it reasonable consideration. If this amendment is adopted, many people will not pay their fair share and many will pay nothing at all.

Mr. NESBITT: They have to go before the tribunals. Will the tribunals pass them?

Mr. CARVELL: The tribunals will not know who they are; the tribunals have no discretion in the matter. Take my own case. I believe that under the Act I should be called upon to submit to some sort of statement to the board of tribunals. None of my neighbours know what statement I have submitted; that is all kept quiet. The tribunal will not bother itself very much about it unless some one takes an interest in the matter, and nobody can take an interest in it, because nobody can be present at the hearing. The result is that I get through with the statement that I submitted to the tribunal. If the statement is an honest one, well and good; if it is a dishonest one, there is no check upon me. And suppose I submitted no statement at all? For the reasons that I have given, I strongly object to the amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): If it was in the mind of the Senate to prevent the disclosure of private affairs, I do not think that their amendment accomplishes that object. There could hardly be any disclosure of private or personal affairs at the hearing of an appeal by the Exchequer Court; the appeal would, of necessity, be on a question of principle. I cannot conceive of an appeal to the Exchequer Court having reference to anything else than the question whether the taxpayer was liable under a certain section of the Act or upon a certain portion of his income. The taxpayer must, in the first instance, fill out the necessary form. If the board are of opinion that additional information is desirable, they can compel him to furnish that additional information or to make a further return; and the board may require the production upon oath by the taxpayer of any information in reference to his income. In that case there might be a disclosure of private affairs, but that would very seldom happen. In view of the fact that persons would seldom be required to make a disclosure of personal affairs which would be undesirable or objectionable, it is a pity to establish any in camera proceedings in connection with the administration of this Act. It sounds peculiar to say that there should be an appeal to the Exchequer Court in camera. I do not think that we should permit the adoption of the principle; I do not think that any taxpayer would ask for it. Any matters coming before the board either as a review board or as an assessment board, or before the Exchequer Court, would in very few cases require objectionable disclosures of private affairs. A dispute might arise as to the interpretation of a section or clause of the Act, or whether the income from some foreign investment was liable to taxation. The appeals and reviews will largely relate to matters of principle, not to matters of detail; no taxpayer will object to that. I agree with the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) that we should insist upon adherence to the Act as it left this House, and that we ask for a conference with the Senate on the question.

Mr. BUREAU: Mr. Speaker, I do not see that the argument that private business of any kind would be disclosed is very strong in this case. If a man were compelled to disclose some process or secret in connection with the production or preparation of a certain commodity, that would be objectionable. But in this case a man goes before the court; he says he has an income of $10,000. If he is carrying on an honest business, I do not think that he should be ashamed to disclose how he is getting his money. On the other hand, people who get incomes which are not exactly legitimate might be induced to stop carrying on business the nature of which they are afraid to disclose to the public. The principle of having these things carried on behind closed doors is wrong. I simply desire to put myself on record as being absolutely opposed to having these appeals or investigations as to income held behind closed doors.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion be adopted?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Mr. CARVELL: If there is no agreement, I want a vote taken.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is no agreement.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT.

MARKING OF PACKAGES CONTAINING HUMAN FOOD AND OTHER COMMODITIES.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 120, to amend the Inspection and Sale Act. He said:

I called this order for the purpose of having it discharged from the Order Paper. I wish to make a statement as to why that is done. I had not any very strong idea that the measure could be perfected and placed on the statute books at this session. My primary idea was to introduce it, have a discussion upon it, and then distribute it widely. That idea will be carried out. As hon. gentlemen will remember, it deals with marking the contents of packages and containers. While there is a very general, and in fact I might say almost complete, adhesion to the principle, it works out in different ways in different industries, and different wholesale and retail operations, so that it requires a good deal

4 p.m. of investigation and technical information—using "technical" in the sense of the information which is in possession of those who are actually carrying on the operations. The Bill is being widely distributed, and the different interests are asked to send in their recommendations and comments with reference to it. After the election is over and we are back again in this House I hope to introduce a very perfect Bill. I move, therefore, that the order be discharged.

Mr. GRAHAM: Can a private member introduce a Bill of this kind?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He might introduce it.

Motion agreed to, and order discharged.

THE DRY DOCK SUBSIDIES ACT, 1910, AMENDMENT.

SECOND READING OF BILL.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 134, An Act to Amend the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, 1910.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the hon. minister please explain?

Mr. HAZEN: The Bill was explained to the House by the Acting Minister of Public Works when it was introduced and received its first reading, a few days ago. I am sorry my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is not in his place, as I believe he has made a special study of the measure. He stated on that occasion that he thought it was a measure which was entirely in the public interest. The changes contemplated by this Bill are not very numerous. The principal changes are made for the purpose of making financing easier for those gentlemen who are willing to engage in the construction of dry docks. It is claimed by many who have looked into the matter and who are willing to erect dry docks in different parts of the country where they are needed, that under existing circumstances it is impossible for them to make the necessary financial arrangements to carry out the work. The interest allowed at the present time by way of subsidy upon the money which is put into those dry docks is four per cent per year for a period of thirty-five years. It is proposed to make the interest four and one-half per cent a year for the same period, and further, that that interest may be paid half-yearly instead of yearly, as is now the case. The section would read:

(a) if of the first class, a sum not exceeding four and one-half per cent of the cost of the work as fixed and determined under subsection two of this section, half yearly during a period not exceeding thirty-five years from the time the Governor in Council has determined under this Act that the work has been completed.

Then there is a new paragraph added, which provides that no securities can be issued against the subsidy until it has been established to the satisfaction of the minister that not less than $1,000,000 has been spent on the work, and the material upon or for such dock. Under the original statute, when $1,000,000 worth of work and material had been provided, the minister might allow the issue of securities up to seventy-five per cent of the work actually done and material delivered on the site shown to be free from actual incumbrance. It also provides that the payment of the subsidy may begin when the work done and the materials provided amount to $1,000,000. At present the payment of the subsidy cannot be made until the dock is actually completed. In other words, they do not commence to get any aid under the present Subsidy Act until the dock is actually completed and ready for operation.

Mr. CARVELL: Assuming that the $1,000,000 has been expended and authority has been granted for the paying of the interest on a certain specified amount—

Mr. HAZEN: That is the subsidy.

Mr. CARVELL: —then, supposing the work was not proceeded with—would the department still continue to pay that subsidy, or would the whole thing lapse until the dock was finished?

Mr. HAZEN: The Government would have to take its chance, of course, with regard to that. If the work ceases, the Government would not have to pay the subsidy, but it would have already made certain payments. If people were constructing a dry dock and had spent $1,000,000 in work and materials, the payments of the subsidy would begin when that $1,000,000 had been spent.

Mr. CARVELL: And would continue even if the work ceased?

Mr. HAZEN: If they had put $1,000,000 into the work, it is a pretty fair indication that it would be proceeded with and finished.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And the subsidy would be allowed if the minister was satisfied that all claims were to be paid?

Mr. HAZEN: Of course the minister would have to be satisfied that all claims were paid before any bonds were issued. This clause makes the payment of a partial subsidy absolute, whether the dock is completed or not. There are two other changes of a minor nature in the first part of the Act. One provides that the width of the docks shall be increased from 110 feet to 125 feet, and the other provides that the depth of the docks shall be increased, so that the water over the sill shall be 38 feet, not 37 feet as under the present Act. These changes are made in accordance with the representations of the Admiralty, and are rendered necessary because of the larger size of the vessels which are being built to-day.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Rainville): I might call attention to the fact that this is the second reading of the Bill. Perhaps those questions would come up more properly when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the Government is acting wisely in increasing the rate of interest to four and one-half per cent. Investment in dry docks has not proven very attractive to capitalists.

A Dry-dock Act has been on the statute-book since 1882. Various attempts have been made to construct dry-docks under its provisions but no dock of the first class has been built. Under the Act as first passed the subsidy was at the rate of three per cent of the cost. It was afterwards increased to three and a half per cent, and then to four per cent. Even with the increases from time to time, there has been very little done in the way of taking advantage of the offer. Some docks of the second class have been constructed; for instance one at Collingwood. I think that was followed by a second one of the second class. There is also a dock at Port Arthur. Then there is a floating dock at Montreal, and one at Prince Rupert. A graving dock of the first class is pretty expensive. The cost would run up to $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 and the capitalists have not found the proposition sufficiently attractive to take hold of it. In view of the high rate of interest to-day, I should think that four and a half per cent would be a reasonable rate of interest to prescribe. With regard to the other change, that bonds may be issued when $1,000,000 has been expended, I observe by the Bill that the proportion is only 75 per cent. My experience was, when I was a minister that one of the serious drawbacks against capitalists taking hold of the proposition was that the investor felt that his security ought not to be dependent in any way on the ability of the company to operate the dock. Under the original statute it was provided that, if at any time the company should cease to operate the dock, the interest on the subsidy should cease. The matter was brought to the attention of the late Government when I was Minister of Public Works and Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance. The Government recognized that objectionable feature of the statute and a change was made by which it was provided that when the Government accepted the work and engaged to pay the interest that should be irrevocable and should continue for the period specified whether the dry-dock was operated or not. Provision was made that the Government should take charge of the dry-dock and operate it, charging up any expenses of operation to the company, but notwithstanding, the paymeent of the subsidy should continue for the specified period. As I understand, the only change that is now made is that an agreement is made by you to pay the subsidy on what you might call progress estimates, no payment to be made until the expenditure has reached the sum of $1,000,000. I should suppose that the margin of 25 per cent ought to be reasonably sufficient to ensure the full completion of the dry-dock, and also that it would be a desirable change make because you can understand how difficult it would be for any company to finance the whole $5,000,000. It makes it an easier proposition if bonds on progress estimates can be financed during construction. On the whole I would think that the change is a reasonable one. The subsidy is limited to cases where, in the opinion of the Government, a dock of the first class is necessary in the public interest. I very heartily approve of the Bill. I think there is one slight change that ought to be made.

Mr. HAZEN: You want to put in the words "per annum?"

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I have that noted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): What is the policy of the Government with respect to the construction of a dry dock at Halifax? There has been, in the annual estimates, for some years, a sum for the construction of a dock there, and I have always understood that it was provided for the reason that it would be required partially for naval services. I also understand that on many occasions the British Admiralty have urged the construction of a dock of the first class at that port. When this resolution was introduced, I said that the policy of paying a certain rate of interest for a period of years on an issue of bonds was calculated to encourage purely promotion schemes, which was undesirable. The chances of an expensive dry dock being a very profitable project in Canada are very slight indeed either on the Pacific or Atlantic coast. I did urge on that occasion that great care should be taken by the Government in entering into contracts for the construction of dry docks. A dock, for instance, should not be constructed at Yarmouth, N.S., or somewhere on the St. Lawrence under the Act, simply because some promoter represents to the Government that he desires and is in a position to construct such work. That would be bad policy. The point I wished to make, however, was that if it is the policy of the Government, or the desire of the British Admiralty to have a dock of the first class at the port of Halifax, primarily or partially for naval purposes, the question then arises whether or not the Government should build the dock of Canada in conjunction with the British Admiralty. I have an idea that if the Government secured the services of a reputable contractor to build the dry dock upon the basis of cost, plus a small percentage of profit, in the end a very substantial amount would be saved in the construction. I would not be surprised but that a competent contractor, building on a force contract basis, could build a $5,000,000 dry dock for at least $1,000,000 less than would be required by a company. I fear it is the practice of private companies, when constructing dry docks to increase improperly the cost of construction. I would like to present that view to the minister, and I would like to know if the construction of a dry dock at Halifax for naval and commercial purposes has been considered as a matter of policy by the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: There is now a subsidized dry dock at Halifax which, of course, is the naval station on the Atlantic coast, and a very important point. That dock was built with aid from the Government of Canada, the British Government, the Government of Nova Scotia, and the city of Halifax. It has served a very useful purpose, and during the war has been extremely busy all the time. It is not, however, a dock of the first class. The first-class dock of to-day is 1,150 feet in length, and the standard fixed under this Bill is 125 feet width at the base. The Halifax dock is about 600 feet long. It is most desirable, in the interests of Canada and of the Empire, that there should be a large dry dock at an important naval station such as Halifax. That matter has been considered by the Government. I understand that my hon. friend suggests that the tendency of an Act such as this will be to induce promoters and speculators to embark upon enterprises of this sort. I do not think there is much danger of that occurring, judging from what has taken place in the past, because, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), no dry dock of the first class has been built under the provisions of the Dry Dock Act up to the present time, and I doubt whether, even with the changes being effected now, promoters, people not bona fide interested in the development of shipping, will be induced to go into enterprises of this sort, because the maintenance of a dock after construction involves large expenditures, and unless those who build such docks can see a fair prospect, after completing the dock and supplying the plant, of doing a considerable volume of business at a fair profit, it is most unlikely that they will put their money into such an enterprise.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no guarantee of principal.

Mr. HAZEN: No. All they get is this amount for a period of thirty-five years, and the amount is barely sufficient, if it is sufficient, to pay the interest on the full amount. Thus they must desire a considerable revenue from the operations of the dock. It is very desirable that, at Halifax on the east coast, and at some point on the west coast, Esquimalt or Vancouver, there should be first-class docks, in the interest of the defence and of the trade of Canada, and also of the larger interests of the Empire. The matter has been considered by the Government, and no doubt by previous governments, and when the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) then Minister of Public Works was in England in March and April last, the matter was taken up with the Imperial authorities. He had many interviews with officials of the Admiralty, the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office, and urged the necessity, from the standpoint of the Empire itself, of constructing docks on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, of a size that would make them available for the accommodation of the largest war vessels and commercial vessels now afloat. The hon. member for Winnipeg has just informed me that he has some interesting correspondence on that subject which he had with members of the British Government, but that it is impossible for him to lay his hand on it this afternoon; and he has suggested that the matter be allowed to stand until the next sitting so that he may have an opportunity of giving that information to the House in more detail than he can do to-day. Under those circumstances, I suggest that we pass the second reading, with the understanding that we go into committee on the Bill at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Public works chargeable to income—St. John harbour, extension of and repairs to Negro Point breakwater, $250,000.

Mr. NESBITT: How much is there in the main estimates for this?

Mr. HAZEN: Nothing.

Mr. MURPHY: Is this a new work?

Mr. HAZEN: It is an extension of an old work.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister explain it?

Mr. HAZEN: The acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Reid) is away to-day, and has asked me to bring the matter before the committee. It was before the committee on a previous occasion and there was some criticism of it. A good many years ago, during the time that the constituency of St. John was represented by the late Hon. Isaac Burpee, it was decided to extend this breakwater running from the western shore of St. John harbour to Partridge island.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring before you the question of the irregularity of the present proceedings. I do not think the committee is properly constituted. There was no motion for the Speaker to leave the Chair. On every day except Thursday and Friday, the Speaker can only leave the Chair on motion put. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) rose to his feet and was desirous of making some remarks. Under the rule, the Speaker leaves the Chair without motion put on Thursdays and Fridays.

Mr. HAZEN: My understanding was that on Saturdays the same rule prevailed as on Fridays, and I think that will be found in the motion to take Saturdays.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The motion, which I have before me, reads that the order of precedence on Saturday shall be the same as on Fridays. That does not change the rule that on all days except Thursday and Friday the Speaker can only leave the Chair on motion put.

Mr. HAZEN: I have been proceeding on the idea that on Saturdays exactly the same procedure shall be followed as on Fridays.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend will see how important it is.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps it would be well to get the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That might be done.

Mr. HAZEN: We might pass the item and then report progress and obtain a ruling, without prejudice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But if the committee is not properly constituted, what would be gained by passing the item?

Mr. HAZEN: I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

And the House having resumed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, the occasion for the committee rising was that it might be clearly understood what is the proper course to be pursued on days other than Thursday or Friday. I raised the point that we could not go into Committee of Supply on Saturday without a motion put that you leave the chair. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) said that he was under the impression that it was quite proper for us to go into Supply to-day without question put, and I think he was sustained in that view by the clerk assistant. The motion passed on the 22nd of June was as follows:

> On motion of Sir Robert Borden, it was resolved, that on and after Saturday, the seventh of July, proximo, and on Saturdays until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon; and the order of precedence on Saturdays shall be the same as on Fridays.

I maintain that that does not in any way affect the rule of the House that on Thursdays and Fridays you leave the chair without motion put, but on other days the motion must be put.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not in a position to give a reasoned opinion at the moment on the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John. I left the chair, taking it for granted that the procedure on Saturdays would be precisely the same as upon Fridays, and under Rule 17C I left the chair without putting any question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If the motion of the Prime Minister had been that the procedure on Saturdays shall be the same as on Fridays there would be no difficulty, because the procedure on Fridays is that you leave the chair, Sir, without any question being put. But his motion was not as to the procedure, but as to the order of precedence. The motion simply provided that on Saturdays the same order of business should prevail as on Fridays. As a rule, the Government, at the beginning of a session, takes Tuesdays and Fridays, but on all other days the business of private members has precedence.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the point raised is one of considerable importance and requires careful consideration, I would prefer to take the matter under advisement and have time to give a reasoned opinion. At the moment, if pressed for a ruling, I would rule that I can leave the Chair on Saturdays without question put.

Mr. HAZEN: There is no disposition to press your Honour for a ruling at the moment. I think, without prejudice, we might by unanimous consent of the House go into Committee of Supply, and His Honour might be able to give his ruling on the point of order raised next Monday.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps that would be better.

SUPPLY.

The House resumed in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. HAZEN: I had started to say that a number of years ago, when the Government of Mr. McKenzie was in power, steps were taken to protect the harbour of St. John from storms by the construction of a breakwater extending from Negro Town point on the western side of the harbour across to Partridge island at the entrance of the harbour. That breakwater has been constructed for a certain distance, but there is a gap remaining between the end of the breakwater and Partridge island. The intention always was that that gap should be filled, as will be seen by any hon. gentleman who has curiosity enough to go to the Public Works Department and look at the plans that have been on file there for many years past. An agitation, however, arose on the part of the schooner owners and others, who complained that if the gap was closed they would have to take a longer route around Partridge island in order to enter the harbour, and as a result the work was delayed for many years. The agitation has now entirely ceased, and to-day there is no opposition by any interest in the community, to the construction of this work.

Mr. NESBITT: Do they know about it?

Mr. HAZEN: It has been talked about for twenty years. There is a universal feeling that the closing up of this gap is essential to the safety of the port and for the protection both of the private wharves and those wharves that have been constructed of late years at considerable expense by this Parliament.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What has caused this change of view?

Mr. HAZEN: At the present time practically all the vessels coming into the harbour are propelled by steam or gasolene. There is not a fishing boat that comes up from the island or along the shore that has not a gasolene engine in it, and there is consequently little trouble in running the mile or two extra to get around the island. In addition to that, the schooner trade is not as important as it was in years gone by. The necessity for this work had been recognized, I think, for very many years past. It has been recognized by those interested in the business of the port, and the construction of the work has been urged from time to time by the Board of Trade and other public bodies. In 1914, some time before the outbreak of the war, tenders were invited for the construction of the extension to this breakwater. The tenders were received soon after the outbreak of the war. It was stated in the House the other day that the work was not proceeded with because the Government thought the tenders too high, but that was not the case. It was not because of the price at all, if I recollect the circumstances, for the officers of the department considered the price fair and reasonable; but the work was not gone on with, because the war having broken out, it was thought desirable to retard construction of all public works as much as possible. Conditions to-day, however, are such that I think it is imperatively necessary that the work should be proceeded with.

Mr. NESBITT: Has the war stopped?

Mr. HAZEN: Not at all. I am talking about other conditions, as the hon. gentleman would have heard if he had been patient for a moment. A great deal of dredging has been done in the harbour of St. John. Lying across the harbour and forming a natural breakwater, to a certain extent, was what was always spoken of as the Beacon Bar. This formed a natural obstruction to the waves as they rolled through the gap. This bar has practically been all dredged away during the past five or six years for the purpose of giving a better entrance to the harbour and better facilities for shipping generally. That obstruction having been removed, the waves caused by westerly gales now come with great force through that gap in the breakwater. On several occasions they have come across the harbour and caused damage to private wharves on the east side. In addition to that, striking against another obstacle, they are deflected back into the berths which have been in the course of construction at West St. John for some years, causing injury to the docks, and, on one or two occasions, rendering them unsafe for shipping. Sometimes the ships have had to be moved out of the docks and taken into the stream. The expenditure made by the Dominion Government at St. John during a number of years past, while running into large sums, has been bringing in considerable revenue. As a result of the construction of these wharves it was possible to send through the port of St. John last year exports to the value of over $200,000,000, an amount which exceeds the value of the goods exported from the port of Boston during the same period. Further than that, last year the wharfage dues at St. John amounted to over $100,000, or four per cent on an expenditure of $2,500,000. This would largely cover the interest on the expenditures made there up to the present time. It is anticipated that during next winter the receipts will be much larger because shipping will be more extensive. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has spent a considerable sum in improving yard room and extending sidings along its line between Montreal and St. John. I am informed that the company will be in a position next winter to handle about 15 or 20 per cent more trade than it was able to handle last season. If this work is not carried on, there will be great danger in two respects. The privately owned wharves on the east side of the harbour may be seriously damaged—some were damaged last winter and the winter before. Then there is the danger of damage to the wharves that the Government has constructed at very considerable expense, and of injury to ships lying in the docks during storms which in some winters are of a serious character. For these reasons it was thought advisable to put this item in the estimates this year and to call for tenders for the work. For my part, I wish that the work could have been delayed; I am sorry that it is necessary to ask the country to make the expenditure at this time. But having regard to the importance of the shipping interests at the port of St. John, to the importance to the whole country of having the wharves maintained in safe condition and of giving the necessary protection to the harbour generally, it is only right and proper that this work should be proceeded with if it can be proceeded with at a reasonable figure. Tenders were asked for the work again this year. In 1914 the lowest tender—I speak in round figures—was something over $800,000. This year the lowest tender was about $738,000. There is another tender $50,000 higher, and there are six or seven, all of which are considerable higher than the two to which I have referred. I understand from the Public Works Department that the tenderers are people of reputation and financial ability. The lowest tender is even lower than the lowest of 1914. The work would have been proceeded with had it not been for the conditions caused by the war, which has lasted much longer than we anticipated at that time.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the contract been awarded?

Mr. HAZEN: No, it cannot be awarded until the item is adopted by the House.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the departmental estimate of the cost of the work?

Mr. HAZEN: About $200,000 higher than the two lowest tenders.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has said that some dredging was done, a bar was removed and this work made necessary. Was the dredging done at the place that we are now proposing to fill up?

Mr. HAZEN: Oh, no, it is inside of the breakwater. The engineers insist upon the necessity of this work. They say that in the future, in order to secure the needed protection of the harbour, a breakwater should be built from the eastern side of Partridge island running towards the eastern shore in the direction of Red head. However, for the present the work proposed will be very useful. It will protect wharves of very great value on the east side of the harbour; it will protect the Government docks on the west side and the shipping that comes to that port. It would be serious indeed if disaster should occur to any of the ships loading valuable cargoes to be carried overseas. The enormous development of the port of St. John in the last few years, and the revenue which is being collected through the Department of Marine and Fisheries in the way of wharfage dues, constitute in themselves a justification for proceeding with this work. In normal times I am satisfied that there would not be the slightest objection to its being proceeded with.

Mr. NESBITT: This is a partial vote; the total expenditure the minister estimates to be $738,000?

Mr. HAZEN: This is a partial vote. A vote has been kept in the estimates practically every year since 1914, because it was felt that some time the work would have to be proceeded with.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Some years ago when I was Minister of Public Works my attention was called to the importance of this work. We were then deterred from going ahead with it only because of the large expenditure that would be involved. Of course, as the minister states, the business of the port has increased enormously since that time, and any expenditure that is reasonably necessary to protect the wharves and the shipping is thoroughly justified. I think the minister omitted to mention one reason why this work should be proceeded with. The dredging which has been done in the harbour on the west side has been at Beacon bar, to which my hon. friend referred. A further harbour improvement has been the deepening of the channel leading out from the harbour to the sea. The depth of the channel has been increased to about 28 feet, so that larger steamers may enter and depart without waiting for the rising of the tide. But the channel runs past this open space between the end of the present Breakwater and Partridge island.

The depth of the channel, of course, is very much greater than the depth of the space between the end of the breakwater and the island. The result is that, when storms come from the southwest, a great deal of silt is carried in and deposited in this deep channel, which is being dredged. That must necessarily injure the channel and will add very greatly to the cost of construction of the breakwater in again deepening the channel. There will, therefore, be a very great saving in connection with the keeping of the channel at the proper depth by the construction of this breakwater. That is quite an important point which should also be considered. I am sure the minister will agree with me as to that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I very greatly regret that I am compelled to disagree with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), and also with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. They make out a good case for certain improvements in the port of St. John, but the same kind of a case could be made out for an improvement in almost any other part in eastern Canada. I should consider myself derelict in my duty if, at this period of the session, in view of the tremendous financial obligations of this country, I should silently assent to the proposition that money which has been obtained from the people of this country through taxation for war purposes of that kind. Already during this session, on the estimates that have been brought down, we have voted appropriations for different purposes with absolutely no regard for the terrible financial position in which this country is placed. We hear much talk about "winning the war" and about this, that and the other thing being done for the purpose of winning the war. We have taxation to win the war. We have a Franchise Act to win the war. Any man of intelligence, of course, knows that all that is mere talk.

Before the war the total interest obligations of this country did not amount to more than $15,000,000. To-day the financial obligations of this country involve an annual expenditure of from $110,000,000 to $120,000,000 in interest upon mortgages which have been placed upon this country. In addition to that, we have an annual charge of $30,000,000 for pensions to our soldiers. That means that the preliminary obligations of this country, before we can spend a dollar for anything else, will amount hereafter to from $140,000,000 to $150,000,000.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend is in error in stating that the total annual interest charge is $110,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: That amount is correct.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the interest at 5 per cent on over $2,000,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The debt of this country has not yet reached $1,000,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am sorry for my hon. friend. He has not been following the facts.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend will take the Canada Gazette, which contains the statement of the debt of this country at the end of July, he will find that the amount of the debt at that time was $1,542,000,000.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I refer to interest-bearing debt.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is interest-bearing debt.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, that is the gross debt.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is the interest-bearing debt. My hon. friend will find on the other side certain assets. The debt of this country, which is concentrated in bonds and debentures, is interest-bearing, and that is the statement. My hon. friend will also remember that we added $650,000,000 of debt to the obligations of this country in assuming the obligation to pay the interest upon that amount of money, including the bonded indebtedness and the existing interest-bearing indebtedness of the Canadian Northern. I put the figures on Hansard about two weeks ago in the presence of the Minister of Finance, and he did not question them.

5 p.m.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: My hon. friend knows very well that all that this country is liable for is the difference between the net earnings of that system and what may be necessary to pay the interest on its funded debt, which difference has never yet exceeded $15,000,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend, in the first place, forgets that, in regard to that obligation, we have to pay the interest upon the bonded indebtedness. Then there is bank indebtedness which is in the vicinity of $100,000,000. Then there are the equipment bonds and there is other current indebtedness, all of which I put in detail upon Hansard some two weeks ago. In addition to that, if my hon. friend will take the capital expenditure which has been voted this year, he will find that to-day the bonded indebtedness and the current indebtedness of this country, upon which indebtedness we have to pay interest, is in the vicinity of $2,250,000,000.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: I will ask my hon. friend to read my statement. I will later on give him the page of Hansard on which I made the computation. I say that is so. If we have to raise $140,000,000 or $150,000,000 in this country every year before we can spend a dollar for carrying on the ordinary affairs of the country, while I know this is a splendid public work and while I have nothing to say as to the arguments put forward by the representatives from St. John on its behalf, the time has come in this country when we must cease expending on building breakwaters or other public works of that description, money which is obtained from the people under the guise of war expenditure. Any one who looks these things squ rely in the face knows that next year the Minister of Finance of the day will have to bring down an Income Tax Bill so as to include incomes of $500, and every one knows we shall have to resort to a land tax in order to raise sufficient money to meet all our needs. If that be so, why should we listen to the eloquent member for St. John who tells a beautiful story about the conditions at that port? Other hon. gentlemen representing other constituencies could, although perhaps not as eloquently as my hon. friend from St. John, tell a story that would appeal very strongly to the sympathies of us all. But at the same time, if it be the case that you have to keep on taxing the people almost beyond bearing in order to get this money, it is time we stopped building breakwaters and such things. If what I have stated is the exact financial condition of the country—and it is so—then we have no business to vote money for such purposes as this.

Mr. NESBITT: I understand from the minister that he has in the main estimates an appropriation of $100,000 for this work.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not this year.

Mr. HAZEN: Not this year.

Mr. NESBITT: I understood the minister to say so.

Mr. HAZEN: I said we had kept that amount in the estimates for some years. It is not in this year's main estimates.

Mr. NESBITT: I was going to suggest that, on account of the lateness of the season, $100,000 would perhaps be more than could legitimately be expended on the work this year. Even, although that amount is not in the main estimate, I still think what my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has said, is correct, namely, that we keep on voting every few days some large amounts of this kind towards the construction of public works that could possibly be done without during the war. These items are like drops of water—each one unimportant, but all combined making a great total. We have already this year reached a very large figure as the total expenditure for public works, some of which could very well have been done without.

It is not necessary that the items should be mentioned again, because we spoke of some of them at the time they went through. I agree with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that this is a public work in favour of which, perhaps, much could be said. The minister told us that agitation had been carried on against it for about twenty years, but that the agitation had been given up. I imagine it was given up because people had become tired. If you constantly propose doing a thing for a certain number of years, everybody gets tired of objecting. However, that may be, when you consider that work had been contemplated for twenty years and it was not found necessary to undertake it, I think it could go for a while longer. The probabilities are that the storms mentioned by the minister will not occur again. In any event very little of this money can be utilized this year. It is getting late in the season now, and the nights are becoming cold. I think the minister might very well drop this item until another year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was a little puzzled over the minister's statement in regard to this expenditure. He said the bar was dug in the other channel. I cannot understand how the digging of a bar in the other channel would bring more water into this channel which we are going to fill. Of course, I do not understand the geography of the district, and consequently I would not venture to make any criticism on that point. The minister led us to believe that a bar had been dredged from some channel in the harbour, and the water came in and destroyed the wharves. Now he proposes to fill a place where no bar was ever dug.

Mr. HAZEN: No, my hon. friend is mistaken.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Altogether apart from that, this is a new work. The minister will remember there was a very distinct understanding that no new works would be undertaken at the present time. Many new works throughout Canada have been discontinued on account of the war. It was understood that the works which were cut out of the estimates should have first place after the Government resumed the construction of new works. This improvement means an expenditure of about three-quarters of a million dollars, and I think we should not embark on it at the present time. There is a great deal in what my hon. friend from Pictou has said to the effect that we require all the sinews of war we can get for the purpose of carrying on our part in this great conflict, and that we should not ask people to contribute money to a work of this kind which has been advocated for, I think the minister said the other night, forty years. If the people have been able to do without it that long, I do not see any reason why it should be gone on with now. We are asking the people to buy post office bonds amounting to $25—notices are published throughout the country asking the women and children to save their money and invest it in those war bonds, and women in isolated places are saving all the money they get for their eggs and chickens until they can accumulate $25 which they will invest in a war bond. We are now proposing to spend 10,000 of these war bonds in order to give the minister sufficient money to build a breakwater in St. John harbour. He is asking a quarter of a million dollars now, but he will want three-quarters of a million before he gets through with the work. I wish to enter my protest against this item.

Administration of Justice—Yukon Territory —Allowance to John Black for performing duties of judge of the Territorial Court for 16½ months, $687.50.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the minister would give a short statement as to the origin of this somewhat peculiar item.

Mr. DOHERTY: Mr. Black is clerk of the Yukon Territorial Court, and legal adviser to the commission. For two periods during which Mr. Justice Macaulay, who is the only judge in the district, was absent on leave, Mr. Black was appointed acting judge and performed the duties of the judge. These two different periods together covered sixteen and a half months. It is proposed to allow him the difference of $41.66 per month, between his actual salary in the office which he permanently holds, and the judge's salary. It was thought fair and equitable to allow him this for taking on these additional and heavier duties during the absence of the judge.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the minister tell us how much Mr. Black has drawing from his own position at the same time.

Mr. DOHERTY: The judge's salary is $5,000 a year. The monthly difference between that and the clerk's salary is $41.66, so that it would be just a matter of calculation to determine his salary.

Mr. CARVELL: Is not Mr. Black Commissioner to the Yukon?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, he is the Clerk of the Yukon Territorial Court and legal adviser to the commission.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are less than 9,000 people in the Yukon and it costs us about $1,000,000 to look after them. With all due deference to the gentleman who may be holding the office of judge, I cannot accept the proposition that we should spend any more money there under present conditions.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not in a position to say just what the administration of the Yukon costs as a whole. At the same time we are only dealing with this item of $687.50, which I consider a reasonable allowance to this gentleman for taking on those additional duties during the absence of Mr. Justice Macaulay. I think we could hardly be taxed with extravagance for recognizing this absolutely reasonable claim under the circumstances.

Mr. NESBITT: Will the minister tell us what Mr. Justice Macaulay was doing during those sixteen months? Was he on a holiday?

Mr. DOHERTY: He had leave of absence I think. With regard to one of the occasions I quite recall the facts. Mr. Justice Macaulay was given leave on account of the condition of his health and that leave was prolonged by the fact that on his way home he met with an accident on the train which caused quite a long sojourn in the hospital.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are paying a colossal sum of money for the maintenance of less than 9,000 people in the Yukon. It will be a matter of computation as to how much a head that would be. That is not merely the population of Dawson, but of the whole Yukon Territory. The judge there does what an ordinary police magistrate does in any eastern town for $800 or $900 a year, and glad to get it.

Mr. NESBITT: The division court clerk could run it.

Mr. DOHERTY: It would hardly be suggested that it would be desirable that we should have no Superior Court judge in the district. The judge has been called upon to deal with capital cases and some cases of very great magnitude on the civil side. When this Administration came into power there were three judges in he Yukon.

Mr. MACDONALD: But there were very many more people.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the dimunition had practically taken place at the time, because shortly after we came in we felt justified in doing away with two of these judges. We have but one judge, and, at Dawson, he performs the duties of a High Court judge, and also performs the duties of a magistrate sitting at the trial of criminal cases. There was some criticism of the fact that he should occupy the two positions, but still, from reasons of economy, we have thought it well to maintain that condition of affairs. The length of the absence of the judge in one case was certainly due to unavoidable causes. I think the circumstances justify the allowance. I have simply the direction of judicial matters the total expenditure in connection with the administration of the Yukon Territory is not within my control.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not see any objection to passing this vote. It seems very reasonable that this man, who is performing important duties over and above those that he is ordinarily paid for, should receive some consideration for it. But it is quite obvious, if the Yukon Territory can get along for sixteen and a half months without the presence of a Superior Court judge, the presence of a Superior Court judge during all the time is not necessary.

Mr. DOHERTY: That absence was in two different periods.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand that. I do not wish to criticise the Government adversely as to maintaining a judge of the High Court as well as this gentleman who seems to be considered competent to do the work. They have to face a condition of decreasing population. But decreasing population means decreasing responsibility and decreasing litigation. They are not to be charged with extravagance because they are maintaining a position that existed previously, or as if they had created that condition. They are, to a certain extent, the victim of circumstances. But the conditions being such, the question arises whether the High Court business of the Yukon Territory could not be done by a visiting judge quite as well as by a resident judge when we have there an official who, I presume, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, is competent to carry on the ordinary business of the court. I do not urge that the Government should make any particular changes, but the higher the standard of the judge who is responsible for the decision of cases the better for litigants and everybody concerned. It is not reasonable to expect that you could get the highest class of judge for High Court work in Dawson for $5,000 a year. It would be more economical and would really give better administration if, in due course, the work of the low-paid resident judge in Dawson were displaced by the work of a proportionately more highly paid judge who could visit Dawson from time to time to attend to the High Court work. Dawson is not inaccessible now; it is as easily reached as almost any other place. It is only a matter of four days from Atlin, where there is judicial work carried on. There is not now the necessity of maintaining a high-class judicial establishment and a full staff in Dawson that there was in times gone by.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that is quite true, but the opportunity for making that change will only arise to practical advantage when there is a vacancy in the position of judge. The judge is permanently appointed, and if we should make the change now I do not think we would be entitled to refuse to pay him his salary.

Mr. OLIVER: When a vacancy occurs at some other place on the bench it might be useful to remove the present incumbent in the Yukon. It is not necessary that the change should occur immediately in the Yukon.

Penitentiaries—To provide for a bonus of $100 to each penitentiary officer who was in receipt of a salary of $1,000 or less on April 1, 1917, $26,500.

British Columbia—To pay a compassionate allowance to Mrs. Mary Jane Mackenzie, widow of the late George Mackenzie, industrial guard, $1,200.—$27,700.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the explanation of this bonus?

Mr. DOHERTY: In view of the high cost of living, it has been decided to grant to those employees of penitentiaries who draw salaries of $1,000 and under a bonus to tide them over this year. It is not an increase in salary, but a temporary payment for this year. It is in line with what has been done in several other departments and what was done by the amendment to the Civil Service Act in the case of some of the inside civil servants.

Mr. OLIVER: On what basis is the compassionate allowance to this widow fixed?

Mr. DOHERTY: This is not under any fixed arrangement; otherwise we would not need to ask the vote. The circumstances make this case very exceptional. Under the penitentiary law, a man who is retired for illness is entitled to a gratuity which represents a proportion of his salary for the number of years he has served. That proportion is arrived at by taking the salary of the last three years. The husband of this widow served for over thirty-two years in the British Columbia penitentiary. He died from a sudden attack of heart disease, leaving his widow, with a large family of little children, in abject property. Had he been retired through illness, he would have been entitled to a gratuity of, I think, $1,700 or $1,800; but as he died suddenly his case does not come under the Act. On inquiry I find that it is most unlikely that other cases of a similar kind will occur, so that this will not be establishing a precedent. It is a compassionate allowance pure and simple.

Mr. OLIVER: I hope I shall not be accused of suggesting extravagant expenditures to the Government when I say that, while I feel we should be careful as to the amount of money we expend, I also feel that in the cases of many classes of officials of the Government we should have some system by which consideration will be given to them if they retire because of physical unfitness, or to their dependent families in case of death. Many of the great institutions of the country have adopted that principle. In the case of penitentiary officials and others where special trustworthiness is required and where the remuneration is by no means large, I believe the public interest would be served by carrying out the principle now invoked in the case of men retiring owing to physical unfitness. Where a faithful man has left a dependent family it would not be going too far to give to that dependent family the full amount of the so-called gratuity to which, under the system adopted in the penitentiaries, the man himself would have been entitled had he been retired because of physical unfitness.

Post Office Department—civil government—To provide for an increase in salary of the superintendent of Mail Contracts Branch to $4,500, $750.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is a matter, not relating to this item, which I should like to bring to the minister's attention. The town of New Glasgow is desirous of having a letter carrier system adopted in the town. I do not know whether it comes within the limits of population and revenue prescribed by the department but the town has increased in population and importance very considerably of late years, and I think it should be granted a letter carrier service. Has the minister received any reports from his officials on the subject?

Mr. DOHERTY: We require a population of 12,000 and a revenue of $20,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps the minister would inquire whether he has received any application from the town itself, and let me know on Monday.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to make inquiry.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I cordially support this increase in salary. I have known this officer for many years, and have always found him painstaking and most obliging and satisfactory in every way. I do not think this is at all too much for a man of his ability. I should like to say a word on a matter which I brought up in the House last year when the Post Office estimates were up. I do not know whether any attention has been paid to the matter by the department or not, but I think that some consideration should be given to those places that are distant for a considerable number of miles from railway stations, by getting automobiles to carry the mail in place of the old-fashioned system of couriers. In Nova Scotia the railway runs through the centre of the province, and there are practically no branch lines, and many villages have grown up at a distance from the railway stations. Rural delivery is not satisfactory on a route of forty miles or more, with people settled all along the route, because by the time the mail arrives at the end of the road it is very late. One thing these people want is a sufficient number of post offices along the route, and also a quick delivery by motor car. There is no doubt that it would be a great convenience. It has been taken up already in some places by private enterprises, but I should like to see the department ask for two classes of tenders; one for a service carried by a motor car, in the summer especially, and the other, for a service carried in the old-fashioned way. If this was done the minister would be able to see the difference in cost. Personally, I do not think it would cost a great deal more to have the mail delivered by automobile. The livery stable people very often have charge of these long routes, and in the summer season they could use their horses for other purposes. I can assure the minister that it would be a great accommodation to these people to have the mail delivered by motor car especially in the summer season. In places where the automobile has been adopted by private enterprise people are now getting their mail at four o'clock in the afternoon, whereas they did not get it until nine o'clock at night under the old system. The minister will see that the automobile delivery would be a great advantage, and if it can be done at not too great a cost, I think it should be done.

Mr. DOHERTY: This work is done under contract, of course. We do not furnish horses and wagons or motor cars for the carriage of the mail, and therefore it would be a matter of ascertaining whether we could find people who would contract to deliver the mail by automobile, and who would not charge an unduly greater price than is charged by the men who now have the contract. I shall be very glad to look into the matter of comparative cost, and if the difference in cost is not too great I would be disposed to agree with my hon. friend as to the advantage of adopting the other method.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think there should be very much difficulty about it. The deputy minister knows that the department specifies the class of vehicle that is to carry the mail—a one-horse or two-horse rig and so on. It would be an easy matter for the department to stipulate that during certain months of the year the mail shall be carried by automobile.

Post Office Department—To provide for an increase in salary of the superintendent of Mail Contracts Branch to $4,450, $750; to provide for an increase in salary of the accountant to $4,000, $500; to provide for the salaries of two clerks in First Division, subdivision B: one at $2,700, one at $2,300, $5,000; to hereby promote G. A. D. Mailleue, F. M. S. Jenkins and T. M. Oliver from Third Division, subdivision A, to Second Division, subdivision B, at $1,250 each, and Joseph Marier at $1,200, $4,950; to provide for the promotion of thirty-two clerks from Third Division, subdivision A, to Second Division, subdivision B, $1,600—$12,800.

Mr. OLIVER: I notice that it costs $4,950 to promote four men, and only $1,600 to promote thirty-two men. How is it that one party comes so much more expensive than the other?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that in the case of the four men their salaries are $1,200 each. Their promotion to a higher class involves an increase of $50, and their promotion leaves vacancies in the division they have just left. If the vacancies in the lower class are not filled, of course the money will lie there. But putting these clerks into this class necessitates providing salaries for clerks in the class from which they are promoted. Thirty-two clerks in the Third Division, subdivision A, are, under the Civil Service Act recently passed, entitled to promotion to Second Division, subdivision B, and to provide for that $50 each is required for thirty-two men.

Pensions — European war—further amount required, $2,000,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What amount has already been voted for pensions?

Mr. HAZEN: I have a statement from the Board of Pension Commissioners showing the amount that will be required for the year. The total amount required is $8,000,000, made us as follows:

1. Pensions already granted—
Amount paid for pensions in Canada and England for months of April, May and June, 1917.....	$1,253,470
Estimate of pensions to be paid from July 1, 1917, to March 31, 1918..	3,021,637
	$4,275,107
2. New Pensions—
New pensions estimated at $1,800 per month from July 1, 1917, to March 31, 1918, at average of $400 per pension per month..	$2,700,000

The average of $400 per pension per month is based on past business; 1,000 pensions for April, 1917, working out at $450 per annum, and at the same number for May, 1917, working out at $380 per annum.

3. Gratuities (for disability—Class 6)—
Gratuities paid April, May and June, 1917 .. .. ..$ 29,400
Estimates from July 1, 1917, to March 31, 1918, average $300 per month for 9 months at $50 per gratuity.. 135,000
——————$ 164,400

$ 7,139,507

4. Estimated expenses of administering pensions—
Salaries, rentals, etc... .. .. ..$ 470,000

The total has been put, in round figures, at $8,000,000. The amount of $2,000,000 is further required, in addition to the amount provided in the main estimates, in order to meet expenses up to March 31 next.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is the maximum amount allowed to a totally disabled soldier?

Mr. HAZEN: According to the report made to the House last year, and made effective by Order in Council under the War Measures Act, in the event of total disability a private gets $480.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no change?

Mr. HAZEN: There has been no change up to the present, but the Prime Minister has stated to the House that he intends under the War Measures Act to increase that amount, having regard to the advance in the cost of living and to other considerations.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Can the minister say how much the increase will be?

Mr. HAZEN: No, it has not been fixed. In fact, it has not yet been definitely considered.

Mr. OLIVER: My information is that there is grave reason for complaint in respect of the action of the pension commissioners in dealing with claims involving less than total disability. Perhaps it would be better, under all the circumstances, if we did not pass the item now, because it is a matter of very great importance and might very well be the subject of some slight discussion in the House.

Mr. HAZEN: If the hon. gentleman wants the item to stand over until next day that will be all right.

Civil Government—departments various—To pay to each of the officers, clerks and employees in the Second Division, who obtained the ordinary annual increase during the present year on or subsequent to the first day of April, 1917, and previous to the coming into force of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1917 an additional amount of $50, $29,825; to provide for any increase of salary under the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1917, not otherwise provided for therein, $32,500—$63,325.

Mr. HAZEN: That is to carry out the legislation which was passed this year, which, hon. members will remember, gave the $100 increase instead of the $50 increase. The original estimates were based on the statutory increase of $50. This is to make up the difference.

Progress reported.

Prince Edward Island—William W. Stanley, Esq., merchant, Charlottetown.
Alberta—John M. Carson, Esq., Barrister at Law, Calgary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is Nova Scotia mentioned in that list?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No registrar has yet been appointed for Nova Scotia. I think some inquiry has been made of a gentleman in that province as to whether he would be willing to undertake the duties. I presume no reply has yet been received and for that reason no appointment has yet been made.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE moved:

That the recommendations contained in the third, fourth, and fifth reports of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be concurred in,

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) to allow that motion to stand until we have had an opportunity of examining the reports.

Mr. CURRIE: The fourth report is the only one that deals with the question of public printing. The third and fifth reports might go through.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know what they are.

Mr. CURRIE: They simply deal with the documents that should not be printed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would recommend that the motion should stand. I am not so sure that it does not embrace a portion of a report which the Printing Committee made and which is ultra vires. I suggest that the motion stand until to-morrow and in the meantime I will inquire into the report.

Motion allowed to stand.

THE PROCEDURE OF THE HOUSE.

RULING BY MR. SPEAKER ON APPLICATION OF RULE 17C WITH RESPECT TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SPEAKER: On Saturday the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) raised a point of order that the Order of the House of the 22nd of June made upon the motion of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden):

That on and after Saturday the seventh of July, proximo, and on Saturdays until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and the Order of Precedence on Saturdays shall be the same as on Fridays.

did not make rule 17C, which provides that

On Friday when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply or of Ways and Means Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question.

also apply to Saturday. I find, on examination of the Journals, that the practice of the House has not been uniform since the adoption of the new rule, though under similar conditions in sessions previous to the present one there are only two instances when a motion has been made to go into Supply on a Saturday. I do not consider, however, that the rule has been long enough in existence to support the view that the House has adopted any particular practice upon the question, especially as the point has not heretofore been raised. The wording of the Order of the House of the 22nd of June merely relates to the Orders of Precedence, which is regulated by rule 25, and I do not think that its terms are wide enough to include rule 17C, which is a rule of procedure specifically confined to two named days. In my opinion, therefore, the point of order taken by the hon. member for St. John was well taken.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

CASUALTIES REPORTED FROM AUGUST 16 TO 31, 1917, INCLUSIVE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The other day the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Edward Kemp) gave us some information with regard to the casualties in the Canadian Expeditionary Force and he promised to bring down a detailed statement.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: In answer to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I beg to present the following statement:

HOLIDAY FOR OVERSEAS FORCES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking a question, may I direct the attention of the right hon. the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) to a cable despatch which appeared in all papers on Thursday last, the 13th inst., and which is as follows:

Adelaide, South Australia, Sept. 13--The Director General of Recruiting states that arrangements have been made to send 50,000 of the original Australians home for the holidays, irrespective of whether similar reinforcements are sent. The Director General believes that the visit of these gallant men will give a great stimulus to recruiting.

I would like to ask my right hon. friend it he has any information in regard to the subject of this cablegram; if so will he communicate it to the House, and whether any such steps as that which is alleged to have been taken by the Australian Government is contemplated by this Government with reference to the Canadian troops?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have no official confirmation of the particulars of this despatch. I shall make inquiry by cable and ascertain whether there is any foundation for it.

EXEMPTION TRIBUNALS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GAUVREAU: According to news received from my riding, the judge is under the impression that the person to be chosen for appointment to the local tribunal must have residence in the place selected for the tribunal. Is that the law, or can he be chosen from another place than his place of residence?

Mr. DOHERTY: The law makes no provision requiring that a man should be taken from the locality. It is a matter for the judge in making the appointment to appreciate the qualifications of the man. If I were asked for a personal opinion, I should say that, generally speaking, a thoroughly competent local man might present advantages that another would not.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

REGULATIONS AS TO OFFICERS ON LEAVE IN CANADA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Militia): The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), on Saturday, inquired whether any new order had been made regarding officers who had returned from overseas and who wished to return to civil life. The only militia order that could possibly have any bearing on that question was issued on June 26, 1917. A circular letter has also been sent out, bearing date 29th August, 1917.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps the minister would read the circular letter.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It reads:

Department of Militia and Defence.

Circular Letter.

Ottawa, 29th August, 1917.

(H.Q. 54-21-50-44.)

From—The Adjutant General, Canadian Militia.

To—All Officers Commanding Districts.

Retention of officers in Canada on leave.

Sir,—I have the honour, by direction, to inform you that the following cable has been received from the C.O.M.F. authorities overseas:—

"Do 1266—August 15th—Owing to number of officers now available here considered officers now on leave in Canada number approximately 250 should be given opportunity of being retained for duty there or to resume civil occupation if they so desire. Not desirable in my opinion officers on leave on medical grounds should be returned unless fit for general service expiration of leave. Requested names of officers retained should be cabled this headquarters."

2. In view of this cable it is requested that you will please furnish Militia Headquarters, as soon as possible, the names of all those officers, C.E.F., at present in Canada on leave from overseas, and who are still on the strength of the C.O.M.F., who wish to return overseas, and those who wish to remain in Canada.

3. With regard to those who remain in Canada, it should be explained to them that, if possible, they will be given further employment but if you have no employment available for them they will be struck off the strength of the C.E.F., and, if eligible, transferred to the strength of the C.E.F. Reserve from the date on which their leave expires.

4. It is requested that in ascertaining the opinions of the officers in the District under your command that the purport of the cable received from England, and the whole matter should be made clear to them.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) W. E. Hodgins, Major General,
Acting Adjutant General.

PRIVATE BILLS.

GORDON DIVORCE BILL NOT REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Resuming the debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Edwards, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Bill No. 126, intituled: "An Act for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon," and the proposed motion of Mr. Steele in amendment thereto (resumed from September 7.)

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I was addressing the Chair when the hour for Private Bills expired on the 7th September. I wish merely to add that I think every member has received a complete copy of the evidence. Having gone over the matter with some care, and having given it the best consideration I am able to bestow on it, I feel that my vote in the committee was fully justified by the evidence. I think the respondent has been guilty of such conduct as to entitle her husband to the divorce asked for. I think, on the other hand, there has been no evidence of condonation on the part of the husband sufficient to deprive him of the relief he now seeks. During the married life of these parties there have no doubt been occasions when both have been more or less blameworthy. But the acts of adultery charged against the wife in these proceedings all took place after a separation which had been agreed upon between the parties. I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that this petitioner is entitled to the relief which he asks.

The adoption of the amendment, which proposes to refer the Bill back to the Private Bills Committee for further consideration, would probably result in killing the Bill for this session. This unfortunate petitioner had a Bill before Parliament in 1915, but the time elapsed and no conclusion was to come to. He came again this year in good time—the evidence was taken in the Senate in June—and it would be a grave hardship if the House did not take some action on it at this time, instead of referring it back to the committee, which will probably not meet again during the present session.

Amendment (Mr. Steele) declared lost on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. CARVELL: Before this vote is taken, I want to point out the unfortunate position in which I find myself with regard to this Bill. I do not know whether I ought to vote or not, but I desire to show the utter absolute nonsense of granting divorces by the Parliament of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: —and the necessity of having a divorce court, if divorces are to be granted. I suppose that I am to blame in this matter. I should have taken the trouble to read the evidence, but I am pretty busy, and I have not had the time to read it. I am asked to sit here as a judge, and render a decision on such a serious matter as dissolving the marriage contract between man and wife, and I have to do that without the faintest knowledge in the world as to what I am doing. All I can do is to accept the judgment of those who have dealt with the case. I understand the Bill has received the endorsement of the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House of Commons. I presume they have gone over the evidence. I must take it for granted that these committees have given the case their best consideration and while I understand these committees were pretty nearly evenly divided, yet the majority in both committees decided in favour of granting divorce, and all I can do is to accept the decision of the majority of those committees, and vote accordingly, or else retire from the Chamber. I take this occassion to point out the absurdity of the whole proposition.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is aware that a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons is endeavouring at the present time to bring about some reformation in the procedure to which he refers. I do not think the question to which my hon. friend has addressed himself, would arise on this particular Bill until the House goes into committee. I voted against the amendment because when the House goes into committee there is opportunity to discuss the evidence and consider whether or not the Bill should be reported. If the committee, with the evidence before them, come to the conclusion that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the granting of the divorce, then this House would not be justified in reporting the Bill. If, on the other hand, the majority of the committee decide that the evidence is sufficient, the Bill should be reported, and go through, in the ordinary course. That was my reason for voting in favour of referring the Bill to committee.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: When the Bill was before the committee I voted against granting the petition for two reasons: the first was that the evidence was not before the House. I also voted against it because I had heard part of the evidence discussed and I believe the parties should be left where they were. The woman is not an angel, as hon. gentlemen will see by reading the evidence, and the man is certainly not a very good man.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): The question before the House is purely judicial. This House is acting in a judicial capacity, in a line with the action of a court of appeal dealing with the decision of a court of first resort. In the trial of the case, the judge has the opportunity of seeing the witnesses, of observing their demeanour and forming those impressions which, in a case of this kind, ought to be the deciding element in any matter where there is a conflict of testimony. I entertain much the same views as my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) with regard to the almost ridiculous method by which in certain provinces in Canada people have to come to Parliament in order to dissolve the marriage ties. But, pending some reformation and some change, we have to perform our judicial duties in that respect. I have the utmost confidence in the gentlemen who compose the Senate Divorce Committee. The chairman of that committee is a well known and distinguished member of the bar in my own province, a man in whose integrity and capacity I have the greatest confidence. I believe the members of the tribunal which deals with these matters in the Senate are the best judges of the evidence. I think we in this House ought to accept the conclusions arrived at by that committee, unless we have evidence indicating that they were departing from the general rules and principles which guide them in divorce cases. Unless a lobby is made, or pressure brought to bear, or some efforts are put forth to influence individual members of this House in particular cases, we should, I think, be disposed, if we were performing our duty, to accept the verdict of the men who compose that Senate Divorce Committee. It would be wrong to adopt any other course, unless hon. gentlemen had given the greatest possible attention to the evidence, and had undertaken to perform those functions which a judge of the court of appeal would perform, in reviewing the evidence taken before a subordinate court. I have not done that, and I believe few hon. gentlemen in this House have read the evidence. I think the sound rule is that we should accept the decision of the men who have passed judgment upon this evidence. It is a well known principle of law that appeal tribunals will not reverse the decision of a court of first instance, and more particularly the verdict of a jury, where the demeanour of the parties, their character, their antecedents and all these questions are at the very basis of a proper determination. That principle should be followed in regard to divorce cases.

Every hon. gentleman who has taken part as counsel in divorce cases before the courts of this country knows that these are the determining factors in the decisions in such cases. In view of the fact that our function is a purely judicial one; that we are acting as an appellate tribunal, it is the bounden duty of this House, there being no evidence that the other court, the Senate, erred grievously or overlooked some important consideration in coming to the conclusion which they did, to accept the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): I do not accept the suggestion of the member for Pictou that the House of Commons is an appellate tribunal taking cognizance, as it were, of an appeal from the Committee of the Senate or the Committee of the House of Commons. In my judgment, we are the tribunal. We as the House of Commons delegated certain functions to the Private Bills Committee. These functions having been discharged, it is for us to consider whether or not the Committee of the House of Commons properly discharged their functions, having regard to the evidence which was submitted to them for their consideration. I do not desire to enter into any examination of the evidence that is to be found in this rather bulky volume which has been placed on the desks of members of the House. I desire to say only that I read the evidence carefully and I cannot satisfy myself that any evidence has been disclosed to justify the House of Commons in passing this Bill. The most that has been alleged against the respondent is matter of inference which has been explained. No direct evidence is alleged against her of having committed the only offence for which we should be justified in passing this Bill. The suggestions which have been made by the witnesses for the petitioner have been completely set aside by the absolute denial of the respondent herself and of the other witnesses, persons whose names were associated with hers. That being the case, there is nothing for this House of Commons to do but to vote against the Bill.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, when this Bill was before the House on a previous occasion I was strongly of the opinion, as I always have been, that it is not proper for the House to interfere with the rulings of the committee; that this House should not discuss these divorce cases or turn itself into a divorce court. After reading the evidence, however, I have reached a conclusion quite in line with that held by the majority of the legal gentlemen who have spoken. I wish the House to note this: there was a judicial separation between these parties before a judge, and this woman was granted alimony amounting, I think, to $1,000 a year—an amount which was subsequently reduced to $800 a year. This woman is entitled to that alimony now, and if she has been so wicked that it is necessary to have a divorce the facts in the matter should have been first brought before the judge who granted the alimony. The judge could have deprived her of the alimony, and the husband could then have come with clean hands to this House and to the Senate and said: "the courts have virtually thrown out this woman's case; I want the House now to give me a divorce." If the House passes this Bill it will be interfering with a decision of the courts—and I should be the last person in the House to say that the judge did wrong. If this husband has a case against the woman let him go and get the alimony cancelled. From a reading of the evidence it seems to me that the idea on the part of the husband is to get the House to grant him a divorce so that he may avoid the payment of $800 a year to his wife. This House, therefore, should proceed slowly and cautiously. The husband had recourse; he could have gone to the court, asked for a review of his case, and, upon the evidence that is now before us, requested that the alimony be struck off. He has not done that. He has passed by the courts; he comes to this House and wants us to give him something which he knows the judge would not give him. For that reason I intend to vote against the second reading of the Bill in this House. This man ought to have another year during which to pay alimony to this woman—and to see whether he can find greater grounds for divorce than those which he has submitted. I repeat that he should go before the judge who granted the alimony; if the judge decides that the woman is unworthy, he will strike off the alimony and the husband can come here with clean hands and ask for a divorce.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with a previous speaker who called attention to the pitiable state of the law in this country, when a body such as this has shown itself to be is asked to grant or to refuse a divorce. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. J. A. Currie) is opposed to this divorce on certain grounds which he has stated. He is going to oppose this divorce and expects others who have listened to the chanting strains of his voice to vote in the same way upon the grounds that he has put forward. The only possible objection to be taken to the grounds that he put forward is that there is not the slightest shadow of foundation in fact, good, bad or indifferent, for practically anything that he said. The hon. gentleman said that the wife brought action for alimony; that the action was heard before a learned judge, and that alimony was granted. I hold in my hand the judgment of the court in the case which was tried, and I may point out that the good lady did not bring action for alimony; therefore the judge did not grant her alimony. My hon. friend wonders why the petitioner did not go to the judge and get his divorce from him. Perhaps no better reason could be given than the fact that the judge in an Ontario court has no more authority to grant a divorce than the doorkeeper of the House of Commons has. The hon. gentleman speaking against the second reading of this Bill, seeks to prevent a man from obtaining what, if the evidence entitles him to it, is his right, not a favour. He opposes the granting of the divorce upon grounds which are absolutely and wholly without foundation.

Mr. CURRIE: I did not say that the woman could go to the judge and get a divorce. I said that the man could have his case reviewed by the judge, and that if the judge thought that the woman had done wrong, he could deprive her of the alimony. Then the husband could come here and ask for a divorce with clean hands. That is all I said.

Mr. NORTHRUP: The hon. gentleman has re-stated his position. He says that the man should go back to the judge and get him to cut down the woman's alimony, if it could be shown that she had committed wrong. As a matter of fact, the judge found that she was guilty, and he pointed out that he had no authority under the laws of Ontario to grant a divorce. The amount which she was being paid, $100 a month, was being paid to her under an agreement with her husband, which agreemen is printed in the evidence before the House. Under that agreement she was to receive $100 a month unless she should be guilty of some act entitling him to a divorce. The learned judge found that she was guilty; he did not feel that he could deprive her of the whole of the $100 a month, so he cut the amount down to $800 a year. Inasmuch as the motion before the Chair is that we go into committee, perhaps it would be out of place for me now to occupy the time of the House in going into evidence. May I point out, however, that this case has been before our Ontario courts; a judge has made a certain finding. The evidence has gone before a committee of the Senate and the committee has found in the same way; the evidence has gone before a committee of this House, and they have made a similar finding.

When we find all these bodies deciding that the petitioner has a case and when we find the rule of procedure laid down as it is in Bourinot Third Edition, page 787, it should be only an exceptional case in which the House should depart from the general principles that guide them in the consideration of Private Bills and it should interfere as little as possible with the decision of a committee that has fully studied the question. Under all these circumstances, I think this House might well allow this Bill to pass into the committee stage, where, if necessary it can be discussed. I sincerely hope that hon. gentlemen, who are opposing this divorce, will appreciate the situation in the Senate when they at first decided not to print the evidence, which is most painful, most humiliating to one of the parties, evidence which any hon. member cannot discuss in this House without loss of self respect and evidence which I would be exceedingly sorry to see placed upon the pages of Hansard. I hope, when the matter comes to a vote, the Bill will be allowed to carry. When it goes into the committee stage, I hope those hon. gentlemen in the committee who, under no circumstances, would vote for a divorce, will abstain from voting. If those hon. gentlemen who have not read the evidence will abstain from voting, and if only those hon. gentlemen who have read the evidence will vote, either for or against the divorce as they think the evidence justifies, then I have no hesitation in saying that the divorce will be granted.

Mr. MORPHY: I cannot for a moment agree with the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) in his presentation of this case to the House. I quite agree that it is very difficult, unless one reads the evidence thoroughly to appreciate and understand the case. The evidence in this divorce case is the bulkiest that, in my recollection, has ever been presented to Parliament. The feature of the case that presents itself most keenly to my mind is the remarkable difference of opinion which has existed in those bodies which have had to do with the Bill. In the Senate committee I understand the vote in favour of reporting the Bill was either five to three, or three to two. In the Private Bills Committee of the House the vote in favour of reporting the Bill was nine to eight. When two representative committees have had so much doubt that the division has been practically equal, it forces my mind to the conclusion that, before this divorce is granted,—not that hon. members should abstain from reading the evidence, as is argued by my hon. friend from East Hastings,—but that when so much is at stake, every hon. member should consider it his bounden duty, before he votes in favour of this Bill, to read the evidence and to justify his vote by the knowledge gained from that study. My hon. friend from East Hastings is making a most specious argument when he suggests that hon. members who represent the people should abstain from the exercise of their functions in regard to a Bill fraught with such tremendous consequences to both parties to this issue. When there is such a cleavage in two bodies, showing a division of opinion and that men who have heard and read the evidence have great doubt, would it be safe to grant a divorce? If this Bill be carried, it may be carried by the vote of an hon. member who has never read the evidence, who has seen none of the witnesses and who knows nothing whatever about the matter. I cannot conceive it possible that, in the Parliament of Canada, any such haphazard, reckless method, as is asked for here of deciding a question, should become effective. It is only apropos to discuss a little of the evidence at this stage to bear out the opinion I hold. Gordon the husband admits that he has no personal knowledge of his wife's adultery. He says that this evidence is derived only from paid private detectives employed by him to follow his wife. After having entered into an agreement with her that she should not be put under espionage, that she should live as a feme sole, free from any of his espionage, he immediately put private detectives on her track and kept them there for two years. Lord Halsbury, in speaking of the evidence of private detectives, says that the court looks with strong suspicion upon such evidence. That is the only evidence presented, as I see it, in this case.

Mr. NORTHRUP: Not at all.

Mr. MORPHY: That class of evidence covers the only main points relied upon in this case. What are the main points? In the first place, these people were married and lived together for about ten years, and had two children, the boy about fourteen years old and the girl about twelve years old now. During the whole of that period there is no contention of any immorality on the part of the wife, but there were temperamental disagreements. During these disagreements, this man, who is said to come before Parliament with clean hands has been proved, on the evidence itself, pages 93 and 94, to have behaved brutally towards his wife. I ask the hon. gentlemen supporting this Bill to point out where there is any denial in toto of this brutality. This is a man who, it is claimed, with clean hands, is asking this, the highest court in the Dominion, to grant him a decree. In equity and good conscience, that cannot be done if the things given in evidence are true. This high court of Parliament is not going to extend its beneficence and judgment in favour of one guilty of such brutality. Surely we have come to a pretty pass when men of that kind have the temerity to ask Parliament for relief, if those actions of his are true, as the evidence shows they are.

The couple finally separated under a written agreement which the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has referred to. By that agreement Mrs. Gordon was to obtain $1,200 per year. He was to keep the children, and she to see them daily, Sundays and holidays excepted. On one occasion he refused to give her this money, and she was compelled to bring action against him in court; and to get her rights under that agreement she had to pay $100 in costs to a Toronto lawyer. After the separation under that agreement he assaulted her twice, and she had him summoned to the Toronto Police Court (the evidence will be found on page 100). She was fighting all the time for protection against this man, who sought to drive her from home by assaults and brutalities. Would it be surprising if a woman did not keep virtuous under such circumstances as those? But the evidence apparently shows that she did keep virtuous. With all due deference to those who take a different view, I can discover no direct evidence that this woman was guilty of any impropriety warranting the petitioner in suing for divorce.

The detectives that Mr. Gordon put upon his wife's trail for a period of over two years—he paid them, instead of paying his wife the alimony she was entitled to—found that there were two occasions upon which the petitioner relied to prove adultery. The first occasion was on a visit she paid to a dressmaking establishment in Toronto, in the company of a respectable gentleman, an acquaintance of hers for many years, whose name I will not mention, but a man of good standing and of respectable family. The other occasion was when she went into the vestibule of this same gentleman's office. No charge had ever been made by the husband against this gentleman. He stood in the light of day absolutely as a friend and nothing else. In the whole two years, the detectives who had been on Mrs. Gordon's trail day and night could discover only two occasions on which she was seen in company with this gentleman. The evidence disclosed that on the first occasion they went to this dressmaking establishment at a reasonable hour in the evening, Mrs. Gordon carrying a parcel, and it is pointed out that in Toronto the ordinary dressmaking establishment, not the higher class ones, has no delivery van, and the people are in the habit of carrying with them the material that is to be made up. The allegation is made that this was a house of ill-fame. That is an inference, and an inference only. The Toronto police had watched this place, but had never come forward to say that it was such. But whether it was so or not, I contend that before this woman should suffer for going to a dressmaking establishment, which, perhaps, possessed a name other than a good one, it is incumbent upon Mr. Gordon to show that his wife knew it. She swears that she knew nothing of the kind. There is not a tittle of evidence to show that his wife knew it was a house of ill-fame, even if it actually was such, and I submit that the evidence is to the effect that it was not a house of that kind. Mrs. Gordon denies absolutely that she knew anything against the house. There was no impropriety or even noise observed around the place by the police when Mrs. Gordon was there. It was not a disorderly house. Gordon asks the committee and this House to infer knowledge upon the part of Mrs. Gordon. I submit that it would be ridiculous to ask us to draw such an inference.

The other occasion was one evening when Mrs. Gordon and this gentleman entered the building on Adelaide street, near Yonge, where his office was, in order to get an umbrella. The petitioner asks the committee to infer that Mrs. Gordon went up three flights of stairs to this man's office, and there committed the act complained of. But there is not a tittle of evidence furnished even by the private detectives to show that she went up three flights of stairs. She swears she never left the vestibule, but stood there while he got his umbrella, and then they both left together. These are the two chief acts relied upon by the petitioner to show, purely by inference, that he deserves the relief for which he is praying.

Mr. NORTHRUP: How long does she swear she was there?

Mr. MORPHY: I do not care how long. My hon. friend can fix it for himself any way he likes. The evidence is entirely unsupported; there is no corroborative evidence of any kind; there is simply the fact that the woman entered the vestibule.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I understand that she was in the vestibule for only a very short time, about six or seven minutes.

Mr. MORPHY: There is a conflict in the evidence between Mrs. Gordon and this gentleman on the one hand, and the detectives on the other. But I would have regard to the dictum of Lord Halsbury, who states that the evidence of paid detectives must be taken with a great deal of suspicion, as they are paid to get a conviction. Their work is to earn their money, and as was pointed out the other night, a private detective in Toronto who went in search of liquor, as he passed through one establishment took three five dollar bills and put them in his pocket. He was sent to jail for it.

Mr. THOBURN: It was $20 on the last occasion.

Mr. MORPHY: My hon. friend seeks to make a point of that. It just shows what slender reeds some gentlemen will lean upon. Is it worth while for a public man to allow his mind to get warped and have a fixed view of a certain set of circumstances, which may have one meaning or another? Is it wise for him to leave room for doubt? Under circumstances where there is room for doubt, I say it is unsafe to grant a divorce. There should be some clear evidence before a deliberative assembly should take away the character of a woman who is now supporting her own children. It is a serious proposition to my mind, and one fraught with grave consequences to the rights of the people of this country. If this woman did go up three flights of stairs to this gentleman's office, which she denies, and did sit at a table in his office, there was absolutely no harm in it, if she was not guilty of an act of impropriety. I cannot conceive why some hon. gentlemen are taking such an interest in the defamation of this woman. I do not find any basis for it in the evidence.

Have hon. gentlemen such high morals that they will not grant other people the right to say that there is another kind of morals which will protect a woman against an injustice? If so let them be as free and frank as possible in this case. Let them view the matter free from all narrow bias and let them approach it with a sense of fair play and justice with regard to what the evidence proves and not overstate what is inferred or inferrable from the evidence itself. One of the strongest points in favour of this woman is that during two years of watching by detectives paid by Gordon two acts alone are found which offer any suggestion of guilt. If the woman is as bad as the man's ruffianly conduct shows him to have been, there would have been plenty of evidence brought forward, but in the absence of such evidence are we to condemn her and her children, to put the brand of Cain upon their brows and to tarnish their reputations for life? Surely hon. gentlemen will see that in this case, where the committee divided 8 to 9 in one House and 3 to 2 in the other, we must be careful before we sanction a measure which will dishonour the name of the woman who has been so brutally used by this petitioner. They even brought in the fact that on one occasion this woman took a drink of liquor. She took a drink of liquor. Could the process of defamation go farther? Every scintilla of evidence is raked up to show that she even took a drink. That shows the combing—the fine combing—of all the acts of this woman to enable the petitioner to get around his obligation to pay her $1,200, or $800, a year as provided for by the agreement between them. "If Albert Edwin Gordon," speaking without reading, "discovers at any time after this deed of separation is executed and delivered, that there is anything in Mrs. Gordon's conduct which will entitle him to get a divorce, her alimony ceases." It is a splendid thing for him to get out of this $800 a year if this Parliament will help him. He will be relieved of the payment of this money and the woman will have to go out into the world to support herself and her children. What a splendid man this is, purporting to come here with clean hands to ask Parliament, the highest court in this Dominion, to give him freedom upon such evidence as he was presented and in order that he may save himself the payment of $800 a year. That agreement seems to have been conceived and devised to entrap this woman. It was done with the mean, astute purpose of setting a deliberate trap to get this woman into such a place that if he could find out anything about her he might be relieved of the alimony and of all conjugal rights and duties. The whole thing looks suspicious. Let us not lose sight of the character of this man who seeks relief here, as his character is shown by the evidence. This man ought to be in jail for the crime he was a party to against his wife. Why was he not prosecuted? He should be prosecuted now. Clean hands, Mr. Speaker—how can this Parliament grant this man's petition on the evidence which is not denied. The woman was in fear of her life. With a man who is battering her up against the wall, pulling her hair and assaulting her continously, a woman is not a free agent. She cannot be condemned because she would tell one story to-day and another to-morrow. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Northrup) says that she fell on a hair pin. Yes, knocked down by her husband. That is the evidence; there is no question about that. For the last nine or ten months this man, although bound to pay this woman money, has not paid her a dollar. He has defaulted on his own agreement in addition to his other foibles and shortcomings. He refuses to pay her but he has plenty of money to pay somebody to procure this evidence. She is not in a position to take steps to secure legal redress. She has no means. She is absolutely helpless unless she gets the money that he owes her but will not pay. I submit that under these circumstances, and having regard to the doubt as to the evidence and the fact that the committee in one House divided 3 to 2 and in the other 8 to 9, to the fact that many hon. gentlemen have not read the evidence and to the further fact that my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has condemned the practice of asking the Parliament of this country to grant divorces, the House should hesitate before voting in favour of this Bill. The hon. member for Hastings has made the argument that this House is not competent to deal with a matter like this and yet he asks this House to give judgment when many hon. members have not read the evidence. I believe the day has not yet come in Canada when a matter of this gravity will be decided by Parliament without the members having a personal knowledge of the evidence. I am strongly opposed to and will vote against this Bill in all its stages.

Mr. GRAHAM: When this Bill was up several evenings ago I voted to have it referred back to the Private Bills Committee because members had not read the evidence. Some of them, I regret to say have not done so yet. I have read nearly every bit of evidence and I am more convinced than ever that this petitioner is not entitled to succeed on that evidence.

Mr. THOBURN: It was not my intention to go into the merits of this case until the Bill was in committee, but after hearing the statements of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), I feel it my duty to this House to give them some information. Having had the privilege of hearing the evidence, seeing the petitioner and the respondent, and hearing the matter thoroughly threshed out in the Private Bills Committee, I could come to no other conclusion than that the petitioner was entitled to a Bill of divorce. To put the case as briefly as possible, this couple were married and lived together, perhaps not under the happiest conditions, for ten years. At the end of ten years they separated. The point I wanted to make was that the father and the mother of the respondent had lived in their home for a certain length of time. When the mother heard that they had separated, she went to the home to take care of it. That led me to believe that the petitioner could not be the bad man that the hon. member for North Perth tries to make him out. The respondent herself admits, according to the evidence, that there was a time when she threw a plate of hot porridge over his head.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Awful!

Mr. THOBURN: There was another time when she could not get into the house as quickly as she wished, and she took her umbrella and smashed the window. These incidents would not lead you to believe that she was as good-tempered as the hon. member would have us suppose.

The whole question hinges upon the respondent resorting to a house which was proven beyond doubt to be a house of ill-fame. No one could come to any other conclusion after reading that evidence than that it was a house of ill-fame.

Mr. MORPHY: A dressmaking shop.

Mr. THOBURN: I think it ill becomes learned members of this House, members of the Bar, to throw slurs upon the actions of the detectives of this country. But I am going to eliminate the evidence of the detectives altogether. And then what do you find? Two merchants, one living in the same building that this woman occupied, and another right opposite, what is their evidence? That it was a house of ill-fame. What was the evidence of the plain-clothes detective, not paid by Mr. Gordon himself, not paid by anybody that I know of? The evidence of the detective was that it was a house of ill-fame. I say that this has been established beyond a doubt. The evidence has not been denied by the respondent that she frequented that house on several occasions in the middle of the night and remained there an hour and a half or two hours and a half. Will the hon. member for North Perth tell me——

Mr. MORPHY: A dressmaking shop.

Mr. THOBURN: Dressmaking? A woman going to a house with another man in the middle of the night under the guise of going to a dressmaking establishment? I am astonished at a man of the standing of the hon. member for North Perth trying to make hon. members swallow such gush as that.

An hon. MEMBER: He meant night dresses.

Mr. THOBURN: It might have been night dresses. That is acknowledged by the respondent. Take the other occasion when they went to this house, the insurance building. What do they go to the insurance building in the middle of the night, in the middle of the month of I bruary for? An umbrella! In that building, behind locked doors according to the evidence—will you tell me what a man and a woman were doing in that building in the middle of the night, behind locked doors, looking for an umbrella? Consult the meteorological records for that month and you will find that on the very night they were there for the umbrella it was several degrees below zero. It is not necessary for me to go any further. Everything I have said is borne out by the evidence as printed, and if time would permit I would quote evidence to support every statement I have made.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: I move that the committee rise.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I second the motion.

Mr. NORTHRUP: Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GRAHAM: No discussion on the motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to on division, yeas 18, nays 15.

The committee accordingly rose without reporting.

ARMY AND NAVY VETERANS' INCORPORATION.

THIRD READING OF BILL.

The House in committee on Bill 131 (from the Senate,) to incorporate the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. BRADBURY: The Bill before the House is one applied for by the Army and Navy Veterans of Canada. This is one of the oldest organizations in Canada, having been formed in Winnipeg a short time after the Fenian Raid. After the Northwest Rebellion an amalgamation was made, and they called themselves the Army and Navy Veterans. Since this war started they have rendered very efficient services. They have recruited, through their organization, over 5,600 men—over five battalions. Three years ago they secured a provincial charter in Manitoba. There are branches of this organization all over Canada. They are asking now for a Dominion charter. They have done splendid work. The Bill has been examined very thoroughly in the Senate and before the House of Commons Committee.

Mr. OLIVER: Are there any special powers or provisions in the Bill?

Mr. BRADBURY: I do not think so. The incorporators are: Major-General John Hughes, Major-General Henry N. Ruttan, Captain Sir Hugh John Macdonald, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Daniel Hunter McMillan, Judge David Marr Walker, Lieutenant-Colonel George Frederick Carruthers, J. Hilliard Leech, K.C., Major George F. R. Harris, Judge George Patterson, Lieutenant William Allen Shepard, and a number of others. The objects of the Bill are: To unite fraternally all persons who have served as soldiers or sailors under the British flag, and are entitled to become members under the constitution and by-laws of the association, into a body of retired soldier and sailor veterans of a non-partisan and non-sectarian character, for purposes of good-fellowship, mutual improvement and assistance, and patriotic endeavour and service to the Empire;

To increase the public influence of veterans by organization, by parades and by giving as an entity expressions of opinion upon public questions affecting the rights of veterans or concerning the welfare of the whole or any part of the Empire;

To stimulate the spirit of patriotism in Canada and to promote, on sound and enduring principles of equality of rights, a Greater Britain, by a closer unity and co-ordination of the Overseas Dominions with the Mother Country;

To assist the Empire when occasion requires in enlisting recruits for His Majesty's forces;

To acquire, maintain and operate clubs, homes, and meeting places for the benefit of veterans, and to furnish, stock and equip the same with such furniture, furnishings, plant, animals, implements, equipment appliances, libraries, and means of entertainment and amusement, as may by the association be considered desirable.

Mr. MACDONALD: Practically all the incorporators reside in Winnipeg. What relation has this proposed incorporation to the association of veterans of the present war being formed in portions of the Dominion east of Winnipeg?

Mr. BRADBURY: Not any. It is a different association altogether.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the situation of the men who are veterans in the present war been considered, with relation to this association? It would seem to me, with all deference to the character of the men mentioned as incorporators—and one can take no exception to them—that if it were a Dominion-wide organization it would be better to have such an organization, which will have the impress of Parliament upon it, more widely representative of the different provinces of the Dominion. The effect of this legislation is to create an incorporated body of army and navy veterans in Canada, with the incorporators residing wholly in Winnipeg. The Association is Dominion-wide in its character. We should have people from all the provinces connected with it. No one can take exception to the general purport of the measure. I can foresee a difficulty which might arise from some of the men definitely connected with the present war, who might say: "We want incorporation." Although it would not necessarily conflict with other associations, yet this would put the Parliamentary impress upon a body purely local in its character.

Mr. BRADBURY: It is the purpose to have organizations all over the country, and they have many of them now. They have branches in Ottawa and Toronto, and in every town in the North West. It is the old organization, and all they are asking is for Dominion authority. They have been doing very useful work.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am not taking exception to that. My hon. friend misapprehends my point. Organizations have been formed in different places throughout Canada by men who have served in the army and navy during the present war. The names of these bodies are pretty much the same as the name of this proposed organization. Has this measure been approved by the men who are veterans of the present war and amongst whom organizations have been formed in the eastern provinces?

Mr. BRADBURY: I do not think that that matter was considered at all. This is an old association; it has been in operation ever since the Northwest Rebellion.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the object of their getting incorporation now?

Mr. BRADBURY: Because they are spread out all over the Dominion. They have been doing splendid work; they have recruited about five battalions in the Northwest through their own efforts. This incorporation is not intended to clash in any way with any of the other institutions to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend may say that it is not intended to clash, but it will clash. The men who have lately returned from the war may feel that their needs and interests and aspirations would be better served by an organization connected more particularly with their own achievements. They may feel that they have ground for complaint if we commit to a local organization in Manitoba the title "The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada." If, for instance, the army and navy veterans of Ontario want incorporation, they will not be able to get it under the title of "The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada" because Parliament will have committed that title to this Manitoba organization. If they desired to obtain the rights and privileges of such incorporation, they would have to join the Manitoba association, made up of men who are veterans of other wars. After the closing of the House we shall go back to our constituencies, and we shall find there organizations of men who have returned from the front. They may say: why did you incorporate these gentlemen in Manitoba under the title "The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada?" We want to have an army and navy organization of men who have fought in the present war.

Mr. BRADBURY: There is an army and navy organization of the Empire in Toronto; there are various army and navy organizations. We are asking for the name "The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada." By this name the organization will be distinguished from other organizations already existing.

Mr. MACDONALD: "In Canada" would include veterans of any war.

Mr. BRADBURY: These men are really the pioneers in this line; they have done excellent work; they have spent a large amount of their own money with a view to promoting the interests of the Empire. There is not likely to be any clash between this organization and any other similar body. They do not intend to do the work which is the object of the organization formed in Ottawa—that of looking after the rights and interests of returned soldiers. They are, however, forming clubs and libraries all over Canada for war veterans; that is the purpose of the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: Are most of these incorporators residents of Manitoba?

Mr. BRADBURY: I think they are.

Mr. OLIVER: There seems to be some merit in the view of the member for Pictou that an organization which is assumed to be Dominion-wide—

Mr. BRADBURY: This is only the parent organization. They have other organizations all over the Dominion.

Mr. OLIVER: If they had in the list of incorporators representatives of these organizations in other parts of the Dominion, then what my hon. friend contends would be quite clear. But it does look as if the Manitoba organization were attempting to forestall other organizations in the use of this somewhat desirable name.

Mr. BRADBURY: For years they have had that name as a provincial organization.

Mr. MACDONALD: On behalf of the veterans of the present war who are scattered all over Canada, I object to this worthy organization in Manitoba, made up of Fenian Raid and Northwest Rebellion veterans, appropriating the corporate title of "The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada." The boys who come home from the present war are primarily entitled to that corporate title, and I object to its being appropriated by this other organization.

Mr. BRADBURY: Hundreds of men who have returned from the war belong to this association in Manitoba.

Mr. MACDONALD: Every province has its army and navy veterans who do not belong to this association.

Mr. BRADBURY: There are branches of this association in Toronto and in Ottawa. This is the parent organization.

Mr. MACDONALD: If this is to be a Dominion-wide organization, there ought to be in the list of its incorporators the names of representative men from other provinces of the Dominion who have returned from the front.

Every hon. member knows there are in every province organizations of men who have been to the front in the present war. Those organizations have various names. They are entitled to be called the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada. Some of these organizations may ask: What right has Parliament to give that corporate title to these people of Manitoba?

Mr. OLIVER: These gentlemen asked for the name first, and perhaps they are entitled to it on that ground.

Mr. CURRIE: Army and Navy Veterans' organizations have been formed in every province, in many cities and towns. They are all organizations for old veterans of the Fenian raid and veterans of the North-west rebellion. All those gentlemen named in this Bill belong to that association. The associations in Winnipeg and in Toronto are very active, and I do not think they will interfere with the veterans of this war who are called the Great War Veterans and who do not admit anybody to membership who has not been to 5 p.m. France or Flanders. There are other associations such as the returned soldiers, who admit to membership those who have not been to the front. I understand this is to become the parent organization of other organizations of the same name throughout Canada, and as they had this name originally, it is only fair that they should retain it now. They are a very fine body of representative men of all the provinces. Col. Denison, Col. Ryerson and many of the leading officers of Ontario are in the Ontario organization. If there was any objection to this Bill, some of the Ontario men—and I think there is an assocation of Army and Navy Veterans in Ottawa—would immediately have made a protest.

Mr. ROGERS: The objection raised by my hon. friend is covered by section 3 which says:

> The head office of the association shall be in the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, or in such other place in Canada as may from time to time be determined by the association.

The association is not confined to Winnipeg. The Winnipeg veterans lead the way, as the people of Winnipeg, of course, do in all matters.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUBSISTENCE ALLOWANCES.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Are soldiers employed in the Canadian offices in London, England, in receipt of $1.50 per diem billeting allowance, and do all privates get the pay of Orderly Room Clerks?

2. If so, why are Canadian Expeditionary Force men, who are unfit for further overseas employed in the offices in Ottawa, not placed on the same footing?

3. Has the Government any intention of placing these men in Ottawa on the same basis as those in London? If so, will the extra pay be made retroactive?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: 1. Soldiers employed in the Canadian offices in London, are men returned from the front, unfit for further military service in the field. They are graded for pay as civil clerks and allowed the equivalent of $1.00 a day for subsistence.

2. Soldiers employed in the Government offices, Ottawa, are mostly men discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and are paid as civil employees. Those not yet discharged draw a civil rate of pay in addition to their military pay and allowances.

3. The remuneration to those employed in Ottawa is considered to be quite as high as to those employed in the London offices, having regard to the higher cost of living in London; consequently, there is no intention to grant any billeting allowance in addition.

BATTLEFORD POST OFFICE INSPECTOR.

1. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a Post Office Inspector for the Battleford District?

2. Is it the intention to give this appointment to a returned soldier?

THE DRY DOCKS SUBSIDIES ACT, 1910, AMENDMENT.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid the House went into committee on Bill No. 134, to amend the Dry Docks Subsidies Act, 1910. Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 2—Dry docks of first class:

Mr. ROGERS: When we were considering this Bill last week I promised to make a statement regarding the correspondence and interviews I had when in London with the British Admiralty, respecting the construction of dry docks at Halifax and Esquimalt. Shortly after our arrival in London I took this matter up with the British Admiralty in the hope of having them consider the project favourably. On March 15, 1917, I addressed the following letter to Sir Edward Carson:

Savoy Hotel, March 15, 1917.

My dear Sir Edward,

I would like very much to have an opportunity of seeing you for a moment respecting some correspondence which our Government have had with the Admiralty respecting the dry dock at Esquimault, on the Pacific.

If you would have your secretary let me know at the Savoy when it will be possible for me to see you, I would be very pleased.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) R. Rogers.

The Rt. Hon. Sir Edward Carson, K.C., M.P.,
The Admiralty.
London.

To that I received the following reply from his secretary:

Admiralty Whitehall, 17-3, 1917.

Dear Mr. Rogers,

Sir Edward Carson asks me to say that he will be very glad to see you if you can conveniently call on him at the Admiralty at 3.30 p.m. on Monday next (19 March).

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) G. N. Steel.

I availed myself of this opportunity and called on Sir Edward. I spoke to him of the number of dry docks which the government of Canada were building, or were helping to build by way of subsidy, and he asked me to give him a memorandum of the exact position in order that he might take the matter up with his colleagues. I accordingly wrote him on March 21, as follows:

Savoy Hotel, London, March 21st, 1917.

Dear Sir Edward Carson,—

In my judgment there is very pressing need for action on the part of the Admiralty in respect to two dry docks—one at Esquimalt, on the Pacific, and one at Halifax, on the Atlantic.

The Government of Canada have undertaken and are now at work on several dry docks at our general shipping ports in Canada. For example, we are building a magnificent dock at the Port of Quebec. We have provided a magnificent floating dock at the Port of Montreal; we have also provided a splendid dock at Fort William, another at Sault Ste. Marie, another at Kingston, and are now constructing a very large one at St. John, N.B. We are also preparing for the construction of a very large dock at Vancouver. These docks, however, are not at points convenient to naval requirements.

By consulting your records you will at once see that Esquimalt and Halifax are two points in Canada that are of direct interest to the Admiralty. Our people do not like to see our British ships being taken to the Port of Seattle or elsewhere on the American side when repairs are required, by reason of the fact that the Admiralty has no dock suitable to receive large ships at either Esquimalt or Halifax.

I do wish you would have this matter looked into, and I am satisfied if you do you will have no hesitation in recommending the immediate construction by the Admiralty of a dock at Esquimalt and another at Halifax.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) R. Rogers.

The Right Honourable Sir Edward Carson,
First Lord of the Admiralty,
London, England.

Sir Edward Carson and the Admiralty staff, after looking into the matter, concluded that the request of the Canadian Government was a reasonable one, and on April 4, Sir Edward wrote me the following letter:

Admiralty Whitehall, 4th April, 1917.

Dear Mr. Rogers,—

Sir Edward Carson asks me to tell you that we are sending to the Treasury to-day a further letter urging the very great importance of providing a dock of sufficient capacity, both at Halifax and Esquimalt. The First Lord thinks that, knowing this, you might wish to write or speak to Mr. Bonar Law to the same effect in the near future.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) G. N. Steel.

In discussing the matter with Sir Edward Carson on a previous occasion, the question had arisen whether it would be possible to get Mr. Bonar Law to provide the necessary money for the construction of these two docks.

The Admiralty, after going into the matter very fully, decided that they were prepared to go on with a dock at Esquimalt and a dock at Halifax. But the question was to secure the money from the Treasury Department. That letter was written to me and a few days afterwards I availed myself of the opportunity of seeing Mr. Bonar Law and discussing the matter with him. He was very favourable but he required to get some further information from the office of the Admiralty. I wrote Sir Edward Car on the following letter on the 17th April:

Savoy Hotel, London,
April 17th, 1917.

My dear Sir Edward Carson:—

I had a favourable talk with Mr. Bonar Law on the question of dry docks at Halifax and Esquimalt, and I am sure if you would have your department take up the question again there is every chance that it will be approved by Mr. Bonar Law's department.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) R. Rogers.

Minister of Public Works for Canada.

Sir Edward Carson,
First Lord of the Admiralty,
London, England.

In view of the fact that the Treasury Department appeared to ask for further information, the following letter was addressed to me by Sir Edward Carson on the 18th April:

Admiralty, Whitehall,
18th April, 1917.

Dear Mr. Rogers:—

In reply to your letter of yesterday, I write to tell you that the Admiralty have just received a further letter from the Treasury asking us for some additional information about the question of the proposed dry docks at Halifax and Esquimalt. We shall be replying to this letter as soon as possible—and I hope, in view of what you say about the favourable talk which you had with Mr. Bonar Law, that we shall succeed in getting the Treasury to give their sanction to the scheme.

I will of course let you know as soon as we get the Treasury decision.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) Edward Carson.

Then on the 19th of the same month I addressed the following letter to Mr. Bonar Law:

Savoy Hotel, London,
April 19th, 1917.

My dear Mr. Bonar Law:—

I am growing anxious regarding the matter or dry docks at Esquimalt and Halifax, about which I spoke to you a few days ago.

I sincerely hope you will be able to give me a favourable answer.

Yours sincerely
(Sgd.) R. Rogers.

The Rt. Hon. Bonar Law,
London, England.

On the 21st of April I received the following letter from Mr. Bonar Law:

Treasury Chambers,
Whitehall, S.W.,
21st April, 1917.

My dear Mr. Rogers:—

I have your letter of the 19th of April about the Esquimalt and Halifax docks. I am in communication with the Admiralty and I shall send you a reply as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) A. Bonar Law.

After that I had one or two further interviews with Mr. Law. I saw him the day before we left England and he promised favourable consideration. They are very busy over there but I hope he will take the matter up and press it upon the Admiralty. I am satisfied from the conversations and interviews I had that the Admiralty are entirely agreed that the building of these two docks is a work belonging to themselves and I am very hopeful that it will be carried out.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In the event of the Admiralty not carrying out the suggestion, has the Government any intention of going on either by itself or jointly with the Admiralty?

Mr. ROGERS: We have had several applications under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act from certain persons who are anxious to build dry docks, especially at Halifax and Esquimalt, and we always stood prepared to accept any sound proposition for the building of a dock under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act. But there always was complaint that the Act was not sufficiently favourable. As I understand the Bill now before the House, it is to provide more inviting conditions for those desirous of investing in a dry dock.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There has been no further communication with the Admiralty since the date of the last letter?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. CARVELL: Personally, I am very much pleased to hear the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers). I have always felt that dry docks were a great necessity. I would like to know whether, as a result of three years of war, we have really suffered from the lack of a dock at Halifax or Esquimalt. It would seem that, if ever, there must have been great need during that time. I realize that the Government could not give detailed information. Would it not have been a great advantage to have had a dry dock at Halifax or some other place on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. ROGERS: During my term as Minister of Public Works we received many complaints, especially with respect to the number of ships that had to go to Seattle to have repairs made by reason of the fact that there was no suitable dock at Esquimalt to receive them. We at one time started to build a dry dock at Esquimalt, but the war came on and then we got into correspondence with the Admiralty and it has rested there since.

Mr. CARVELL: Would that be true of the East as well as the West?

Mr. ROGERS: Not so much in the East as in the West, because ships that come to Halifax almost always have their dry dock work done in England.

Mr. REID moved:

That paragraph (a) be amended by inserting after the words "per cent" the words "per annum."

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there a dry dock under construction at Levis?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it nearing completion?

Mr. REID: It will be ready this fall.

On section 4—section 3 not to apply to existing contracts:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Might I suggest to the minister that, if possible, there should be arrangements made for the establishment of a ship building plant in connection with each dry dock so that the men could be kept constantly at work.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

COMPANIES' ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Mr. Meighen Bill No. 129 (from the Senate), to amend the Companies Act so as to provide for the incorporation by Letters Patent of Corporations for "purposes other than that of gain," was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1, short title:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Ordinarily an Act of the importance of this would scarcely demand the attention of the House at this stage of the session; but this Bill comes to us from the Senate, where it has engaged attention since the beginning of June. As the Bill is a necessary Bill and in one sense a very important Bill, it seemed desirable to proceed with it in this House, as otherwise the labours of the Senate would have been lost. The purpose of the Bill is to amend the Companies Act so as to embody in it principles that of recent years have been embalmed in legislation in Great Britain in their Companies Act, and for the most part have also been accepted by our provinces. Our own Companies Act, as a consequence, has become rather out of date; at least it has got to be entirely out of consonance with the provincial Acts. This Bill is intended to bring our Act more into conformity with the Imperial legislation and with provincial legislation.

The first principle introduced is a provision for the incorporation of associations without share capital, and, associated with that, a provision for the incorporation of companies with shares without any par value. With regard to the first of those two principles, there is a Bill now before this House, from the Senate, providing for the incorporation of voluntary associations. That Bill will not be necessary if this is passed. The method proposed for the incorporation of associations without share capital follows the Industrial and Provident Associations Act of the United Kingdom.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the proposed amendment cover such a Bill as was put through the committee this afternoon regarding the Army and Navy Veterans?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I did not know that that was put through, and supposed that if this Bill passed it would not be necessary.

[Mr. Pugsley]

The provision for the incorporation of companies with shares without par value is the introduction of a principle that has found its way with very great success into enactments of various states, California, Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, Maine and Massachussetts, and of the state of New York, which took the lead in 1912. In my review of the Act, I came to the conclusion that this principle was of an importance transcending that of the others. It seems to me it has in it possibilities looking to the elimination of undue capitalization, that will be of very great value.

The third principle has regard to prospectuses. Hitherto there has been no provision, practically, limiting the issue of prospectuses and their contents and the regulation of prospectuses. This is to provide for such regulation and for the liability of directors who are named in a prospectus. It provides that every prospectus shall be filed with the Secretary of State, and that the memorandum of agreement shall be embodied in it, signed by all who are named thereon and named as directors to be, or on the authority of their agents, which authority must, in that event, be filed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the English section pretty well followed in that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to that, it follows with slight alteration the section of the British Act of 1908. This legislation has been adopted without substantial modification by Ontario, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and to a modified extent, by Nova Scotia. This Bill simply brings the Dominion Act into conformity with more advanced legislation in the United Kingdom and in some of the provinces of Canada, and more definitely fixes the liability of directors and regulates the contents and filing of prospectuses.

Mr. CARVELL: How far does it go with respect to the liability of directors?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is covered by section 43 A. Section 43 defines what a prospectus is. Section 43 A reads:

"43a. (1) Every prospectus issued by or on behalf of a company or in relation to any intended company shall be dated, and that date shall, unless the contrary be proved, be taken as the date of publication of the prospectus.

"(2) A copy of every such prospectus, signed by every person who is named therein as a director or proposed director of the company, or by his agent authorized in writing, shall be filed for registration with the Secretary of State of Canada, on or before the date of its publication, and no such prospectus shall be issued until a copy thereof has been so filed for registration.

"(3) The Secretary of State of Canada shall not register any prospectus unless it is dated, and the copy thereof signed, in manner required by this section.

"(4) Every prospectus shall state on the face of it that a copy has been filed for registration as required by this section.

"(5) If a prospectus is issued without a copy thereof being so filed, the company, and every person who is knowingly a party to the issue of the prospectus, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty dollars for every day from the date of the issue of the prospectus until a copy thereof is so filed. Imp. Act, 1908, s. 80.

Then section 43 B follows. I suppose the hon. gentleman does not want me to read that section.

Mr. CARVELL: No; this follows the English Act very closely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. The liability is continued by clause 43 D on page 10, which reads:

"43d. (1) Where a prospectus invites persons to subscribe for shares in or debentures of a company, every person who is a director of the company at the time of the prospectus and every person who has authorized the naming of him and is named in the prospectus as a director or as having agreed to become a director either immediately or after an interval of time, and every promoter of the company, and every person who has authorized the issue of the prospectus, shall be liable to pay compensation to all persons who subscribe for any shares or debentures on the faith of the prospectus for the loss or damage they may have sustained by reason of any untrue statement therein, or in any report or memorandum appearing on the face thereof, or by reference incorporated therein or issued therewith, unless it is proved—

"(a) With respect to every untrue statement not purporting to be made on the authority of an expert, or of a public official document or statement, that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did up to the time of the allotment of the shares or debentures, as the case may be, believe, that the statement was true; and

"(b) With respect to every untrue statement purporting to be a statement by, or contained in what purports to be a copy of or extract from a report or valuation of, an expert, that it fairly represented the statement, or was a correct and fair copy of or extract from the report or valuation: Provided that the director, person named as director, promoter or person who authorized the issue of the prospectus, shall be liable to pay compensation as aforesaid if it is proved that he had no reasonable ground to believe that the person making the statement, report or valuation was competent to make it; and

"(c) With respect to every untrue statement purporting to be a statement made by an official person or contained in what purports to be a copy of or extract from a public official document, that it was a correct and fair representation of the statement or copy of or extract from the document, unless it is proved—

"(i) that having consented to become a director of the company he withdrew his consent before the issue of the prospectus and that it was issued without his authority or consent; or

"(ii) that the prospectus was issued without his knowledge or consent, and that on becoming aware of its issue he forthwith gave reasonable public notice that it was issued without his knowledge or consent; or

"(iii) that after the issue of the prospectus and before allotment thereunder, he, on becoming aware of any untrue statement therein, withdrew his consent thereto, and gave reasonable public notice of the withdrawal, and of the reason therefor.

It follows the British Act, which dates back to 1891.

Mr. CARVELL: This seems to refer to 1908.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The last Imperial Act was passed in 1908; it was a Consolidation Act.

Mr. CARVELL: There are decisions in the law books going back ten years.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Directors' Liability Act was passed in 1900, the result of the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Peek vs. Derry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Directors' Liability Act in Great Britain dates back to 1891.

The next important principle in this Bill is the provision for the reduction of capital. Hitherto, it has been held not to be possible for companies in Canada to be incorporated with a devolution of power to reduce their capital stock. That is to say, a company can be compelled to maintain its capital stock at the level provided for by its incorporation, so far, of course, as its subscriiptions have reached that amount. Consequently, it has not been possible for companies to be incorporated with power to pay off, for example, preferred stock. This Bill provides that companies may be incorporated with such power under conditions and subject to stipulations contained in this measure.

The next clause in the Bill provides for information as to mortgages. In Great Britain there has been provision for this for some time. However, in the United Kingdom it was more necessary than in Canada, because in Canada we have our provincial laws, providing for the registration of all land mortgages at Land Titles Offices, and for bills of sale and chattel mortgages at our court houses and other registration points. But even in Canada a company has been able to issue what are known as floating mortgages, and no provision is made for their registration. Furthermore, owing to the fact that lands will be held in different counties, and, consequently, the registration will be at different land titles offices or registration offices in the different court houses, very considerable difficulty is entailed in locating and collecting the various mortgages.

Mr. CARVELL: In the Maritime Provinces, where we have not the same registration system as they have in the West, we have to record those mortgages in full in, perhaps, half a dozen registry offices, and it is a great expense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a very cumbersome proceeding. This Bill provides that Dominion companies must file all mortgages with the Secretary of State, where a record shall be kept of all encumbrances against all companies incorporated by Dominion charter.

Mr. CARVELL: Is that the only registration necessary?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it seems to me we would not have power to make that the only registration. The provincial law would still compel registration as before, but this is additional to the other registration. Section 69 L reads:

"69L. The provisions of this Act respecting the registration of mortgages, charges or other securities shall be in addition to and not in substitution for the provisions of any statute of any province of Canada or of any foreign country in respect thereto."

The next principle covered by the amendments contained in the Bill is that of investigation and audit. There has been a difficulty in connection with getting investigations. If I remember correctly, under the law as it now stands, one-quarter of the shareholders may apply to a court for an investigation into the affairs of the company. For the most part, that provision has been a dead letter, and it has been felt that an easier and more readily available method should be provided. This Bill provides that the Secretary of State, unpon representation from such number of the shareholders as, in his opinion, may in a special case warrant his doing so, may cause investigation to be held. This provision will tend to much greater care on the part of companies and much greater likelihood of use by a majority of directors of the power vested in them. If my memory serves me correctly, there is a similar provision in the Bank Act.

Mr. CARVELL: In section 11 of the Bill, section 92 of the amended Act is made to read as follows:

[Mr. Meighen.]

(1) The Secretary of State of Canada may appoint one or more competent inspectors to investigate the affairs of any company and to report thereon in such manner as the Secretary of State of Canada may direct—

(i) In the case of any company having a share capital, on the application of shareholders holding a proportion of the issued stock of the company warranting the application.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am proposing an amendment there.

Mr. CARVELL: Where there is no share capital, that provision seems to be reasonable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As the law now stands there is no provision for compelling a company to audit its accounts. Every respectable company, of course, does not audit its accounts—annually, I think. The provinces have such provisions; I think the United Kingdom has such a provision. It is clearly interest that companies incorporated under Dominion statute shall be compelled to audit. Furthermore, there is a provision in the Bill for protection against change of auditors without due notice.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why a provision against the change of auditors without notice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The provision is that before a change of auditors can be made, there is to be notice of the shareholders' meeting.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are selected at the annual meeting anyway, are they not?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They may be. The Bill also provides for annual returns to the Secretary of State—not annual returns of shareholders, because that would entail a tremendous obligation on many companies and be of very little value. Furthermore, such a provision could be easily contravened by the holding of shares in trust, and the like. It is eminently a Bill for the House in Committee; I think we might now take it up clause by clause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill is quite an important one. The Secretary of State says that it is eminently a Bill for the House in Committee; I think I may qualify that by saying that it is eminently a Bill to be first considered by a committee of the House. It is difficult to follow this Bill in its entirety without giving some study to it first. I suppose it is almost too late now to appoint a special Committee to go through it. I should like very much to see the Bill become law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Senate had it before the Committee on Banking and Commerce for some months. If they had not, of course we could not assume the responsibility of such detailed and prolonged study of it as would be necessary.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I introduced a Bill this session which had been prepared by a Committee of the Dominion Bar Association. The circumstances were such during the latter part of the session that I did not think the Bill would receive the consideration which it deserved; therefore I abandoned the promotion of it this session. Furthermore, I did not like the Bill which had been prepared. It was too much of a scissors and paste preparation; there were many incongruities in it; it would not have been satisfactory. I hope that at the next session, whether hon. gentlemen who are promoting this Bill are here or not, somebody will see that a new Companies Act is passed. The amendments proposed by this Bill are, on the whole, in the right direction. I have not a copy of the British Act before me, but I am under the impression that the incorporation of companies for patriotic, religious, and philanthropic purposes is provided for in one section of the British Act. I do not see why there should be any further provision than one clause giving power to incorporate such institutions under the Act. It is well, when we are basing our Companies Act upon the English Act, that we should follow the English Act as closely as we can, because then a vast amount of judicial interpretation is available from the English law reports. It is not advisable to introduce any new matter if it is at all possible to avoid doing so. In respect to the issue of share capital without par value, I have never been able to see much good in that. The first time I ever heard the suggestion was from the report made by Mr. Hadley, chairman of a commission appointed by an ex-President of the United States in respect to the capitalization of railways. There may be something to say in favour of shares without nominal or par value in the case of railways, although I have never heard its value demonstrated. It has never been used in England, and it has never been used in any of the provinces of Canada so far, and I have been informed by New York lawyers that it is not considered of very much use in that State. I do not believe it will ever accomplish the result which the minister suggested it would. The prospectus clauses are commendable, and they should be in our Act. I presume that clause in our Companies Act, which created what was called "statutory fraud"—it is the old section 48 of the English Companies Act that still remains in our Companies Act—is struck out. That is the provision that if you fail to file any paper, for instance, any contract, the company and its directors were held liable for fraud, whether there was fraud or not. It was eliminated from the English Act many years ago, but we still continued it in the Dominion Act. I am sorry the allotment clauses of the English Act were not put in this Bill, but still that would have made the Act much longer, and perhaps make it more difficult for us to pass it at this time, but I hope that some day they will be inserted. We frequently have companies organized in Canada that commence doing business before having sufficient capital subscribed. The English Act prohibits the commencement of business by any corporation until it has actually had subscribed and paid into the company the amount of money which the prospectus states would be necessary before they would go to allotment, or, in other words, before they would commence to issue shares. However, that is not in this. With respect to the reduction of share capital, clause 54A has the usual provision for inserting the words "and reduced" after the name of the company, pending the time until the Secretary of State passes upon the application. I have never been able to appreciate the necessity for the addition of these words. When the resolution is passed resolving to reduce the share capital, you must, until that is actually accomplished, have the words "and reduced" after the name of the company, and they become a part of the name of the company. I know that is in the English Act, and has been there for a long while, although many text-book writers in England regard it as rather anomalous and unnecessary. I think we should not have that clause in our Companies Act at all. I am not, however, going to ask to have it struck out now. This Bill would never get through if we were to be extremely critical of all these clauses. Does the minister know if there is any provision in our Act for paying off preference shares?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is not now. That is one of the purposes of this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some of the provincial Companies Acts provide a summary method of paying off preference shares.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The practice in many places in Canada is this: Preference shares are issued by taking power in the memorandum or articles of association for paying off preference shares at a certain rate when the company is in a financial position to do so. As a matter of fact, the procedure in most cases is wrong and shares cannot be redeemed in that way. I think Ontario has some special provision for paying off preference shares without going through this procedure. I do not think any company should be compelled to go through all this procedure indicated by clause 54 in order to pay off preference shares when they have taken the power in their articles or memorandum of association to do so. Preference shares are shares just like common shares, it is true, but I think, when in their memorandum or articles of association, or both, as it is sometimes done, the power is taken to redeem preference shares, the company ought to be permitted to do so on the approval of somebody, possibly on the approval of the Secretary of State or by an order of the court. I am not going to suggest that the clause be struck out. It is a most cumbersome provision, and I do not think we should adopt it into our Companies' Act.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 3—Companies incorporated for certain purposes. Proviso, inter-insurance contracts.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any necessity for having this proviso?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is some doubt as to the power of a company incorporated by charter under the Companies Act to engage in inter-insurance. I understand that it is a modern method for companies to band together and insure each other.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not carrying on insurance business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, it is in a way. They are insuring other companies, and we want to make it clear that they can do it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it desirable to add this proviso? If this re-insurance is a species of insurance, it is better that the companies should not have this power. Who has raised this question? It has never been raised in the courts.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the business of insurance strictly speaking, I would think, but it is a species of insurance all the same. I understand that Mr. Wegenast, who has had considerable to do with company law and is somewhat of an authority, is anxious that this protection be granted. The subject, I understand, has been litigated in the province of British Columbia.

On section 4—New sections added:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the word "sporting" in the English Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to move a rewording of this section. I move that:

> The words in subclass 1 of section 7a, being now, part of section 4 of this Bill, commencing at the beginning and ending at the word "gain" in the fifth line of such subclause be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> When the application is for the creation of a corporation to carry on in more than one province of Canada without pecuniary gain, objects of a national, patriotic, religious, philanthropic, charitable, scientific, artistic, social, professional, or sporting character or the like.

I do not think the word "sporting" is in the British Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It seems altogether out of place here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that we frequently have application for such charters; for instance, from the Canadian Lacrosse and Hockey Associations. I do not see any reason why they should not come in, if they are otherwise entitled to get their charter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But it seems to be contrary to the spirit and origin of this section, which is for the convenience of corporations organized for religious and philanthropic purposes. A sporting association is an entirely different thing and should incorporate under the provincial companies Acts. There is no particular reason why they should have special privileges.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let me say a word on behalf of these amateur athletic associations. The trouble with amateur sporting associations is that they have not been properly managed during the last few years, and professional sport has driven them out. Take the National Lacrosse Association, for instance, which spreads all over Canada. In the old days there was an amateur lacrosse club in every hamlet and town in Canada, and in my opinion, if these amateur associations had been organized under a proper charter and had been properly managed, amateur sport would not have had to give way to professional sport. I am not objecting to professional sport, but there is undoubtedly a certain development of physical and mental manhood in good amateur sport. These sporting associations are not confined to one province. The rugby football championships, for instance, before the war, were, nearly always decided between Montreal and some Ontario club. I submit that these sporting associations ought to be incorporated in the simplest possible manner. No person makes any money out of them, but many patrons subscribe for the sake of the sport. I am of the opinion that "sporting" in its true sense has its proper place in this Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I can understand that national, patriotic, religious, philantropic and artistic organizations might want to operate in all provinces of Canada, but I do not see that sporting organizations are on the same plane at all. Sporting is not a business, as contemplated by this Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: None of these are businesses.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The question of jurisdiction as between the Dominion Parliament and provincial legislatures could not arise. The only place a sporting organization would need a charter would be in the province of its domicile. There is nothing in our law to prevent them going out into other provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Scientific organizations can do that also. Is there not just as much reason to include sporting organizations as these others?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, because frequently the work of religious organizations is spread over all the provinces, and these organizations are really carrying on a work. There is nothing for a sporting organization to do except to hold property somewhere. They may proceed from one province to another playing games, but that is not business. I do not think we should encourage the incorporation of sporting bodies under the Federal Companies' Act, but rather under the provincial Acts.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and I cannot agree on this point. Take the National Hockey Association, for instance, which plays its championship games in Vancouver and Victoria.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is nothing to stop them doing that.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know. But they have a central body that decides all disputes. These ought to have a central power, so that men from every part of the Dominion would be entitled to a voice on account of their responsibility for the work and welfare of the federal organization. I have had a great deal of experience, in my younger days, in lacrosse, football and hockey and I see a great benefit in allowing these organizations to have a charter that would be Dominion-wide and to get it in the simplest manner possible.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is no good to them; it does not help them to do anything.

On section 7 B—Issue of shares without nominal or par value:

Mr. GRAHAM: An insurance company does not come under this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; it has to get a special charter. This is out of the New York State Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Going back to section 7 A. Do you permit these associations to use the word "limited"?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not incumbent upon them under section 33 of the main Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I mean companies organized for patriotic and philosophic purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They do not need to use it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not see anything in the section which relieves them from it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend will look at what is now sub-sub-clause (a) of sub-clause 6, page 3, he will see that section 33 does not apply. Consequently they do not need to use the word "limited". Section 7 B is a clause providing for the incorporation of companies without any par value to their share capital.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that an American statute?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is. It was suggested first in the United States in 1892 by an eminent company lawyer by the name of Stetson. It was further discussed at the meeting of the Bar Association in 1899. Then it was adopted in Germany and other European countries. Belgium, amongst other countries, practises this style of company incorporation. It was first put in force on this continent in the State of New York in 1912. The example there has been followed by the State of Delaware and six other states and it is working, I understand, very well indeed. It appeals to me as the wisest way of incorporating a company. The fixing of the par value at $100 of a share of stock is not in itself a valuation. It tends to deceive the public. We speak of a company having a capitalization of $10,000,000 when perhaps the stock is only worth ten cents on the dollar. The capitalization of the company in such a case is not $10,000,000; it is only $1,000,000. The issue of a share certificate of the par value of $100 means nothing to the ordinary man buying it. The labourer, or the man who is not acquainted with company law, has the idea if he is getting it below $100, that he is getting a bargain. I never could see any reason for issuing stock with a par value at all. I do not pretend to know as much about company law as some hon. members in this House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The result will be the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The result is the same in the end. For any one fully acquainted with all the facts and able himself to grasp what he needs to grasp, it is all right, but it is the other fellow who has to be protected. This would lead to the elimination of over-capitalization.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not believe it is going to do that at all.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The practice which has been in vogue for the last few years in New York has been to incorporate companies without attaching a value to the shares.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Very little of that has been done so far.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It has been done very largely lately, and one of the best examples of it is that given by the Cuba Sugar Company, and other examples are afforded by other large companies of a similar character. They simply state the number of shares—so many preference shares at seven or eight per cent—and then 2,000,000 common shares.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It will bring about the condition that the Secretary of State is trying to avoid. If the company has a capitalization of $50,000,000 par value with a large reserve and it desires to increase its capital issue, it will not like to do it without some reason for so doing. Large companies could reincorporate under the Act without a nominal or par value being given to their shares and they could issue a billion shares.

[Mr. Meighen.]

The value is soon established by the earnings of the company, it is true, and the market quotations for each year may not be so high; but this can be used actually to increase your capital stock. You simply have more shares.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You do not need to have this, you can increase anyway.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Frequently corporations do not like to do that; they do not like to antagonize the public in some cases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would not the same restrictions apply here?

On section 6—tariff by Governor in Council:

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be some expense in the administration of the Act in connection with the filing of returns, prospectuses, etc., and it seems reasonable that the companies should bear the cost of the administration, as they get the benefit.

On section 43 C—Obligations of companies where no prospectus is issued—meaning of "private company":

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be observed that in subsection 2 the date before which this section shall not apply is given as the first day of September, 1917. I move to amend that to read "the first day of January, 1918."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there such a thing as a private company under our Act, as there is in the English Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is covered by subsection 3 of this section. We are establishing the power of restriction by this Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: They will exist after this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 43 D—Liability for statements in prospectus:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the British Act, followed in Ontario, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and Alberta. In Nova Scotia the Act is modified. I may say that in Quebec the company law has followed year by year the Dominion Companies Act. Whenever our Act was amended, the Act of Quebec was amended in the same way, and as a consequence there has been less confusion in that province. In the other provinces an entirely different course has been pursued.

On section 54—By-law for reduction of share capital:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the section which enables a company to reduce its share capital. I understand the Justice Department gave an opinion that a company incorporated under our Companies Act had not power to reduce its share capital, and while there has been a not very strict application of that opinion in the working out of the law, it was thought well that companies should have that power, and should have it inserted in their charter. It has application to preference stock.

Mr. BENNETT: The Canada Northwest Land Act is the best example of that.

On section 54B—objections by creditors and settlement of list of objecting creditors:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I know the department here favours the control of companies by the Department of the Secretary of State. Personally, I think the English system is preferable, and that the corporations should be practically under the control of the courts. When you come to secure a reduction of the capital of a company, it is clearly a case for the intervention of the courts, because you have a conflict between minority and majority interests. For instance, a company may wish to pay off some preference shares that are outstanding. Another lot of shareholders may say the company should not pay them off and that it would be better business policy for the company to continue paying dividends on the preferred shares, and keep the capital. At any rate, you are apt to have a conflict between minority and majority shareholders, and the creditors. The rights of creditors is the principal and important question involved in the reduction of capital.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Otherwise it is a domestic matter.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And it is clearly a case for the courts. I am not going to press my objection to-night, because I should be very glad to see the Bill go through, as it will improve the Act very much; but, should I be in the next Parliament, I shall endeavour to make amendments to this Bill, especially in respect to the matter we are now considering. I prefer the intervention of the courts in most of these matters, and the majority of the provinces have followed the English Act in that respect, and for the sake of uniformity I should think it better for us to follow that Act. It is too far to come to Ottawa from the extreme eastern and western provinces to secure some matter which might very easily be secured in the courts. I want to put myself on record as saying the Department of the Secretary of State, being a political department, is not the proper tribunal to determine a difference between majority and minority interests, or a matter which relates to the rights of creditors. I am not objecting to the administration of the department, I am speaking of the principle.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I quite understand that. I need not say I was in the department when the clause was framed, but the whole scheme of the Act seems to be to provide for the determination of these questions by the Secretary of State. Other questions just as important as this are being dealt with by him. Those who are acquainted with the working of the present Companies Act think this arrangement will be more expeditious. Perhaps, if I am Secretary of State next session, I will agree with the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not blame companies for liking things as they were under the Companies Act, because it was not an Act at all, it was merely a pretense.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I certainly agree in the main with what has been said by the hon. member for Halifax as to the necessity of leaving the jurisdiction, if possible, with the courts, subject, of course, to filing the order with the Secretary of State. I do not think it can be regarded as sound to vest in an official here powers of the character indicated in the sections under consideration, and which, in England, have not infrequently engaged the attention of the court of appeal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is like a winding-up procedure to some extent.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: To some extent, of course.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And that is under the courts.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But in view of the lateness of the session, and the desirability, if we are going to get the Act through, of attempting to amend it, I am not going to do more than express an opinion, feeling at the same time that the Secretary of State is quite right in endeavouring to maintain in his office a complete record of all the companies that have federal incorporation, and to be enabled, if possible, to supply on request as complete information as the records of the company can furnish with respect to capitalization and the manner in which it has been dealt with. But it seems unfair to parties residing at a great distance from Ottawa to subject them to the delays involved in this system. I am not saying that matters that arise will not be dealt with, but I have some doubt about the question of expedition. For instance, shareholders in Vancouver, who desire to reduce the capital of their company, for reasons that may be best known to themselves, will have considerable labour before they succeed in having a request ultimately disposed of. But if the matters were dealt with by the courts certain notices would be given and the case would come before the judge. Then the filing of the order here would give the Secretary of State all the information. The rights of the creditors would be adequately protected by notices given and by the judicial determination of the matter. But I am not going to urge the change; I merely express myself as favourable to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax, rather than to the provision in the Bill.

On section 54c—order confirming reduction:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I spoke this afternoon about the words "and reduced" in 54a. I should like to see them struck out.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: So would I.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But that could not be done without disarranging the whole section. These words are absolutely valueless.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is in order to conform very closely with the English Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The English Act with respect to the reduction of capital is very unsatisfactory to English practitioners. They object to it very much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 54c is the British Act and the British Columbia Act.

On section 54e—penalty for concealment of name of creditor:

Mr. CARVELL: That is a pretty stiff penalty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It should be stiff.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You cannot make it too stiff and have the provision successful.

[Mr. R. B. Bennett.]

Mr. CARVELL: The provision is that a director or officer of the company who conceals the name of the creditor entitled to object to the reduction shall be liable to a penalty of five years' imprisonment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This very point was threshed out fully in the Senate Committee. A very much lighter penalty had previously been provided—six months' imprisonment. One of the largest company men in the Senate, Senator Nicholls, of the General Electric, was most insistent that the provision would be valueless unless a substantial penalty was provided.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is no question about the seriousness of the reduction of capital; that has been well indicated by the observations of the member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). If the creditors are not made aware of the fact that capital is to be reduced, the result, of course, is very disastrous to them. It is, therefore, of primary importance that every opportunity should be given to every creditor to protest against a reduction of capital. Moreover, the Act provides that the Secretary of State, if satisfied in respect to every creditor of the company who is entitled to object to the reduction, may issue supplementary letters patent confirming the reduction on such terms and conditions as he thinks fit. Therefore, the concealment of the name of a creditor would not only affect the interests of the crediors themselves but might to some extent impair the entire usefulness of the action of the Secretary of State. I think a severe penalty is very essential.

Mr. CARVELL: The penalty is for wilful concealment.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The Bank of Yarmouth case is an authority on that point.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the penalty in the English Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Six months' imprisonment.

Mr. CURRIE: I did not understand that this Companies Act Amendment was to be gone on with this session. The Bill stands in the name of the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White).

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, in the name of the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. CURRIE: The Finance Minister was communicated with, and he told several newspaper proprietors that the Bill would be taken up by the Private Bills Committee.

These men desire to be heard before the committee and the Government or the Cabinet in respect to several of the clauses proposed to be amended. The Retail Merchants' Association also wish to place representations before the Government before this Bill is finally passed. They communicated with the Finance Minister on the subject, and it is not any breach of confidence for me to produce the letter that the minister wrote in reply to the secretary of that association. It is as follows:

Ottawa, September, 5, 1917.

Dear Mr. Trowern:—

I have yours of the 4th instant with reference to the Act amending the Companies Act. Your representations will receive our careful consideration. It is possible that the Bill may not be proceeded with in the Commons on account of congestion of business there.

Yours faithfully,

W. T. White.

The Finance Minister told me that the Bill would not be proceeded with. I was very much surprised when I heard from Mr. Trowern that the Bill was being taken up at this late day in the session.

Mr. CARVELL: What are the sections of the Bill in respect of which the parties to whom my hon. friend refers would be injuriously affected?

Mr. CURRIE: There is one amending clause in this Act enabling co-operative companies to be established all over the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no such clause. It was in apprehension of that that the persons to whom my hon. friend refers asked that the matter be considered.

Mr. CURRIE: The other section to which objection is taken is that which does away with the advertising of incorporation. Several newspaper proprietors communicated with me on the subject, they wanted to send a deputation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What do you think about that yourself?

Mr. CURRIE: I think it is a proper thing.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To cut it out?

Mr. CURRIE: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the good of compelling companies to spend money advertising in newspapers the fact that they have been incorporated?

Mr. CARVELL: If they were compelled to put in only an ordinary notice of eight or ten lines stating that certain gentlemen had been incorporated under the Companies Act, it would not be so bad; but when they have to print columns of material which the average man would not understand if he did read——

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And which nobody does read.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think that the newspapers need business so badly as all that.

Mr. CURRIE: That is the ground that the newspaper proprietors are taking, and in justice to them they should be heard. Half a dozen of them have told me that they do not desire any changes to be made in this Act. This Bill proposes to do away almost entirely with the present method of incorporating companies and to adopt what is known as the Ontario Act. A number of clauses in the Ontario Act, while they may do very well in provincial legislation, should not be incorporated in a Dominion Act. For instance, one clause provides that a list of shareholders must be sent annually to the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is struck out.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Neither names nor amounts are required by this Bill.

Mr. CURRIE: In view of the fact that the public were given to understand that the Bill would not be gone on with, I do not see the necessity for going on with it at this late hour in the session. It is a very important Bill, one that should go before a special committee and be just as carefully considered as the Bank Act. On several occasions since I became a member of this House attempts were made to bring about amendments to the Companies Act, but on each occasion nothing was done. Now it is proposed in the dying hours of the longest session of the longest Parliament that we have had to go on with these important amendments to the Companies Act. I should like the Government to consider whether it is good policy to make these changes. I have not had time to read the Bill, but I have received a dozen letters with regard to it. I have given people the assurance that the Bill would not be gone on with.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the hon. member not realize that this Bill was carefully threshed out in the Senate?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: For five weeks, off and on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The newspaper men were all heard.

Mr. CARVELL: A Bill like this is particularly within the province and jurisdiction of the Senate. Some of the best business men in Canada are in the Senate; indeed, we are supposed to have none but good business men in the Senate.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Do not look at me.

Mr. CARVELL: I am looking at my hon. friend because I anticipate that he will be there before long. Legislation of this character adopted by the Senate is entitled to careful consideration at our hands. It is in proper accordance with our parliamentary system that the Senate should initiate legislation of this kind. Now that they have dealt with the Bill, I feel almost like accepting it in toto. Any practising lawyer who has any company business realizes that the Companies Act of Canada has been almost hopeless. Ontario has a good Act; some of the western provinces—Alberta, for instance—have up-to-date Acts. In my practice I look upon the Dominion Companies Act as almost obsolete, and for that reason I am very anxious to see this Bill go through.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may say, for the information of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that in view of the tremendous pressure of the legislative programme of this session, I am not surprised if the Minister of Finance was under the impression that he would not likely reach the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the Minister of Finance really had reference to the Bill which I introduced in the House.

Mr. CURRIE: No, to the Companies Act of the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill I introduced was practically a new Act, and I had arranged with the Minister of Finance to refer it to a special committee. Later on we agreed that it would not be pressed at this session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is also a Bill No. U2 of the Senate amending the Companies Act.

Mr. CURRIE: The Bill referred to is this Senate Bill, there is no question about that whatever. There is nothing in the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) that the Senate has considered this Bill, when we realize that the Senate, in amending a money Bill, the other day forgot that there was such a thing in history as a fight between the King and Parliament as to who should grant Supply, and caused as great inconvenience thereby. That should prevent us in this House from viewing too seriously the fact that the Senate has been considering this Bill for a long time. There was a time when the Senate left Finance Bills alone. Of recent date, however, the Senate has given itself over to considering that the question of the finances of the country rests entirely upon its shoulders, and a week or ten days ago serious discussion was undertaken in the Senate in regard to Supply, and senators there held the view that the Senate has a perfect right to deal with Supply. They claim that this House has only made a rule dealing with Supply, and they ignore altogether the fact that there was a revolution in England and a change in the constitution which placed the granting of supply in the hands of Parliament. Parliament in England has never given the privilege of granting supply over to the House of Lords, and I am certain this Parliament will not give it over to the Senate. This Bill has been the subject of a great deal of discussion in the Senate. The matter was given considerable publicity in the press. Many of us do not read what the press says about things that happen in the Senate, because we are so much taken up with what we say ourselves. Other hon. members have asked me when the Companies' Bill was to be taken up in the House of Commons. If the Companies' Act is to be seriously dealt with in this House it should go before a special committee, if we want a revision of the Act at all. The Senate has sent a few amendments here which appear to be quite harmless, but the Act they propose is a most drastic change of the Dominion Companies' Act. In view of the fact that the Companies' Act has received a great accession of strength from decisions of the Privy Council and the courts as to jurisdiction, it would be a wise thing for the Secretary of State Department to take up the whole matter during the interval, and at the next session of Parliament introduce some Bill that will be workable and readable. I wish again to protest, because I notice that the advertising clause still remains struck out, and for that reason I think the newspaper proprietors should have been heard before this House. Newspaper proprietors and the public generally have no influence whatever with the Senate, and in that case, what is the use in their appearing before a committee of the Senate, unless it is to log-roll and lobby senators into passing Bills to help out leading financiers in the country? Every one knows that the House of Commons is amenable to public opinion; it is a representative body, and for that reason I think a Bill of this kind sent over by the Senate at this late hour of the session should be withdrawn.

On section 69a—registration of mortgages and charges:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move to amend section 69a by striking out the words "September" and "seventeen" in the second line and substituting therefor the words "January" and "eighteen."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: This is a drastic section. The trust deed must be lodged with the Secretary of State. The section says:

> Every mortgage or charge... shall, so far as any security on the company's property or undertaking is thereby conferred, be void against the liquidator and any creditor of the company, unless the prescribed particulars of the mortgage or charge, together with the instrument (if any) by which the mortgage or charge is created or evidenced, are delivered to or received by the Secretary of State of Canada, for registration in manner required by this Act within twenty-one days after the date of its creation, but without prejudice to any contract or obligation for repayment of the money thereby secured; and when a mortgage or charge becomes void under this section the money secured thereby shall immediately become payable.

That is the decision of the House of Lords on that point. Twenty-one days, however, from the date of creation of the mortgage to file the same seems a very short time in this country where enormous distances are to be covered. Does not the Secretary of State think twenty-one days a very short time? I had a case in which it was necessary to register a trust deed in four provinces, and in order to comply with all the laws of the different provinces, it was necessary for me to get a special order of the court, before I got through, because of the difficulty of getting in and out of the land titles and registry offices.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Twenty-one days is the English time, but my hon. friend is quite right. We ought to allow about a week extra on account of our distances.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have in mind thirty days or more. I did not like to suggest more than thirty days because the minister might regard it as too long. If you take a trust deed that affects a company like the Canada Cement Company which carries on operations in Manitoba, Alberta, Quebec, and Ontario—and I think it had some property at one time in British Columbia—it takes a great deal of time to register such a trust deed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the words "twenty-one" be struck out of line 6 of section 69 A on page 16, and the word "thirty" be substituted therefor.

Mr. CARVELL: I have not read this clause carefully, but unless there is some provision by which duplicates could be used, even thirty days is not enough. Take a trust mortgage involving, as very often happens, land in four or five different counties or even provinces. Under our system of registration in the Maritime Provinces, where we have no Torrens system such as exists in the West, every document must be registered and copied out at full length in the registry office.

A trust mortgage of twenty or thirty pages of typewritten matter, as would ordinarily be the case, could not be registered in three out of four of the registry offices in the Maritime Provinces without causing delay too long for this period of thirty days. But if duplicates or triplicates could be used, the difficulty would be overcome.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: In all the trust deeds now created the provision is made, usually in the last paragraph, that duplicates may be used as originals. I am a little doubtful whether or not the language should not be made a little clearer by inserting in line three, after the word "with," the words "an original of." The very point my hon. friend from Carleton has just mentioned, occurred to me just as he got on his feet.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move:

> That in line 3 of page 16, after the word "with" there be inserted the words "an original of."

Mr. CARVELL: I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is great value attaching to this, because it enables those desiring to know what obligations are outstanding, to apply to the Secretary of State and get the information for the whole of Canada

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move:

That the word "twenty-one" in lines 19 and 23 of page 16 be struck out and the word "thirty" substituted therefor. Also that in line 41 of the same page the word "September" be struck out and the word "January" substituted therefor; and that in line 42 of the same page the word "seventeen" be struck out and the word "eighteen" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move:

That the word "seven" in line 35 of page 18 be struck out and the word "fourteen" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Referring to page 17, subsection 4. We have no provision in the Canada Companies Act with reference to allowing commissions or discounts, but there is such provision in the English Act. It permits a company to pay a commission to any person in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally. Of course you could sell mortgage bonds at a discount, and you might always be able to sell debenture shares at a discount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I believe there is a corresponding provision in our Act.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: We use in some instances the word "bonds," and in others the word "debentures." "Bond," of course, is not as common a word in England as it is here. In the United States the word "bond" is used in preference to the word "debenture." I do not think we should get away entirely from the use of that word "bond."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The interpretation clause includes "bonds."

Mr. MEIGHEN: A commission may be paid on all bonds and debentures, but not on shares.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Have we a section in our Act permitting the sale of shares below par?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This does not refer to shares, but to bonds or debentures.

Mr. CURRIE: If this clause passes, the underwriting agreements for the taking of bonds would have to be filed with the provincial secretary, and I do not think the banks would approve of that. Such information has never been disclosed in any country in the world.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that the Bankers' Association have thoroughly scrutinized this clause, and have no objection to it.

Mr. CURRIE: Is there a Companies Act in Canada or anywhere else which compels one to disclose the amount of commission paid on the sale of debentures or bonds?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is such a provision in the English Act, and in the British Columbia Act.

On section 69C—Filing of accounts of receivers and managers:

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: This subsection runs concurrently to some extent with the provisions of the law relating to the receivers or officers of the courts. The receivers, being officers of the courts, have to account, of course, to the courts for the receivership. It would seem to me that all the Secretary of State might reasonably ask would be the filing with him of all such accounts as were regarded as necessary by the courts of the province in which the receivership was taking place. I do not think we should put them to the expense of doing too much of that sort of thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This receiver stands in the position that the debenture holder does; he is not a liquidator appointed by the court at all.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I had occasion only once in my life to work out the provisions of the law in a case in which the debenture holders took possession. It was under an English trust deed. We did not have a liquidator—only a receiver—and the receiver was an officer of the court. He had to file his accounts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is if he is appointed by the court.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, but he took possession for the debenture holders, and under the trust deed he had to go to the court to put himself in propor position. No one would have thought of trying to follow the provisions of the trust deed without going to the court. If he had done so he would have found himself up against all kinds of difficulties and no one would have paid any attention to him. However, I am not going to raise any difficulty about the filing of reports because I think they should be filed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think this would obviate the necessity under the present law of filing the reports with the court, but when a record of all encumbrances against the company is kept by the Secretary of State's office, there should also, analogous to the practice in the registry offices, be a record of satisfaction.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Section 60D seems to give recognition to the court of the province. The court comes in there and the Secretary of State has power to order the making of an entry of satisfaction under section 69E. Under that section you have to have it done every six months, whereas it would seem that it would be amply sufficient if such report were made at the termination of the receivership or when the entry of satisfaction was put in. It does not make any difference but it is putting them to needless expense. However, it is not a matter that is vital.

On section 69G—Penalties:

Mr. CARVELL: This does not invalidate the deed but it simply provides a penalty for officials failing to register these instruments.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The other section did that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This penalty is very much in contrast with the penalty provided in the reduction-of-capital clauses.

Mr. CARVELL: Two hundred dollars a day is quite a penalty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that the penalty provided for by the reduction-of-capital clauses ought to be reduced. You ought to keep them uniform.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is not so serious as the other offence; there is very great disparity between them.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The penalty should be very much lower than $200 a day. What is the penalty in the English Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not recall the penalty in this case but I do in the other. Where we provide a five years' punishment they simply make it a misdemeanour and do not provide a punishment at all. Ours, of course, is simply the maximum. Here is the English Act that corresponds with this law and it provides that any person upon conviction shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £50 for every day during which default continues.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: All these sections refer to debentures. As a matter of fact we only issue debentures in this country once in a blue moon.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "Debentures" includes bonds.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Where is the definition of that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not in the Bill.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the point I am raising.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is in the Provincial Companies Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: What is the difference?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is a very great difference between a debenture and a bond. Speaking generally, used in the sense in which it is used here, a debenture very often means something unsecured by a specific instrument.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: It all depends on the document itself.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Certainly. You can have debenture and a bond. On the American continent the word "bond" is usually used to mark a security that is emitted by a company and secured by a trust deed and mortgage on property.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As a matter of fact they are practically one.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: But if you are going to sell them in New York a five per cent gold bond is the word they use. Go down there and talk about selling a debenture and they at once think you are dealing with an English security. We must not pass a Bill that is going to preclude us from using the word "bond."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We can fix that by amending the interpretation clause. Say: "Debenture" includes "debenture stock and bonds."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 69 of the Act authorizes the issue of bonds, debentures or other securities.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: All these sections deal with a security called a "debenture" as if it were the only class of security that might be emitted by a corporation secured under the provisions of a trust deed. It would be fatal to the administration of the Act, having regard to what we have to call our securities for the purpose of marketing them, probably, in the United States, if we insisted upon the use of the word "debenture" instead of the word "bond" with which they are familiar in that country. They use the words "municipal debenture" and they also use the word "bond" with respect to industrial and other securities. They also use the term "debenture stock" with respect to securities issued by railway companies under certain conditions as distinguished from debentures as used with relation to English securities, the English word being always "debentures" and ours "bonds." As long as the Under Secretary of State satisfies the minister that the use of the word "bond" has not been disparaged by this legislation I am satisfied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That might be amended by adding the word "bonds" to 69a near the bottom of page 15.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, to paragraph 2f.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) refers to its special application to the provisions which are added to section 69 of the present Act. Section 69 of the present Act provides for the issue of bonds and debentures. The point raised by the hon. member for Calgary is that the Bill ought to use the words "bonds and debentures" throughout.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am referring to it as touching on these specific sections only; they limit it to the word "debentures."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it would be most important to use both words, "bonds and debentures," or "bonds or debentures." You could add another clause to the interpretation clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have no interpretation clause in this Bill. That is in the main Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is in the main Act, but it would apply to this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could, of course, add a new clause amending the interpretation clause of the old Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We might add to the interpretation clause of the old Act a sub-clause (h) "debenture includes debentures, debenture stock and bonds."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that not the definition in the old Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no definition; otherwise the objection of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) would not be substantial.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: You claim there is a difference between "bond" and "debenture"?

[Mr. R. B. Bennett.]

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: In some particulars. "Debenture" we say should include "bond."

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: There is a definition in the Companies Act, and if you amend this it might change the meaning of other parts of the original Companies Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had occasion to go into this question of the difference between bonds and debentures about four years ago, and I came to the conclusion that while, geographically, there is a difference in the ordinary understanding of the words, the term "debenture" is founded more on the note without specific security, while "bond" is founded on the notion of the basic specific security on which it rests. But I cannot see how a court could distinguish between them now.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And yet the character of the instrument must at all times determine the character of the security based upon it. The word "bond" is based on the old assumption that the individual was by this bond bound, and the bond was based on a specific security. The debenture originally had no security necessarily behind it, and hence you have no security specifically charged. You frequently had the use of the words "municipal debenture," being a charge on all the property of the municipality without specifically describing it as such, and you frequently got the word "debenture" referring to a floating charge more accurately than "bond." Without going into the historic side or attempting to define the exact difference between them at common law—and there are decisions in the Court of Appeal and one in the House of Lords—the real fact is that the words "bond" and "debenture" have become more or less interchangeable in use. In America they prefer to use the word "bond" with respect to securities that are emitted by a company secured by a specific charge or mortgage in trust upon its property, together with a floating charge; and "debenture stock" has the attributes of a bond or debenture and in addition to that, certain voting powers in the event of certain contingencies arising. Hence it is that the four per cent perpetual debenture stock of the Canadian Pacific railway may, under certain conditions, exercise voting power.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is like a deed.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the specific attribute of debenture stock, and that is why "stock" is different from "debenture," because "stock" implies exercise of voting power, and common stock or common shares carry with them always voting power.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In certain events.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Always, unless there be certain limitations placed upon a certain class of shares such as Bethlehem Steel the other day. The word "stock" implies a power to vote and assist in the control of the enterprise; "debenture stock" means a security with the attributes of a debenture plus the right, under certain conditions, to exercise voting power and thereby control the corporation. But to eliminate the use of the word "bond" in this country would be destructive of the very purpose for which this Act is being framed; for if I undertook to create in a trust deed purely debentures and never had the right to create bonds, I am satisfied that, with respect to certain enterprises with which I am quite familiar, you would have exceeding difficulty dealing with them, and especially if you were issuing, say three series of bonds. I have in mind two companies both of which have issued three series of bonds as authorized under trust deeds. The issues may be up to $3,000,000. They have exercised the power to issue to the extent of three-quarters of a million dollars under series A, three quarters of a million dollars under series B and three quarters of a million dollars under series C. If we come in and pass this Act and call these securities "debentures," and debentures only, we shall bring about a state of affairs that I think the law officers would say would not be what was intended. Rather I think that "bond" and "debenture" should be synonymous, "debenture" being the English term and "bond" being ours.

Mr. CURRIE: Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that there is no quorum.

Mr. REID: There is a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a quorum, twenty-three or twenty-four.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have sent over a suggested amendment to the Secretary of State.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps we could return to sub-clause 2 and add that there be added thereto the following as sub-section (h), "'debenture' includes bonds."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "'Debenture' includes debenture stock and bonds."

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: "'Debenture' includes debenture, debenture stock, and bonds."

On section 69 K—Payments of certain debts out of assets subject to floating charge in priority to claims under the charge:

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: This gives preference claims the right to be paid out of floating charge property; that is those having prior claim in point of law, wages and, under certain conditions, rent.

Mr. MACDONALD: The language is rather peculiar "the debts which in every winding-up." There ought to be some more definite indication that this refers to wages or rent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One would think it should be just "in winding-up." I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend. The British Act used the words "every winding-up."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is wrong with it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It does not seem good drafting.

Mr. MACDONALD: In England, there are questions of winding up, but they have only one jurisdiction there. Here it might be urged that the Act is broad enough to cover any provincial winding-up act. It is intended to avoid litigation.

Mr. CARVELL: We would have no jurisdiction to interfere with provincial legislation or a provincial company.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Unfortunately we have power to interfere with provincial companies. The courts have held—and the decisions have been sustained—that a liquidator under the Winding-up Act cannot bring an action except with the consent of the court, and the court must be the one where the original order was granted. I had to come to Ontario to get a right to sue in a winding-up proceeding which was started out West.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It seems to me we cover the case by striking out the word "every" in line 34.

Subsection amended and agreed to.

On section 10—Restrictions on appointment or advertisement of director:

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the theory at the base of this proposition? You have a prospectus issued with provisional directors, and you preclude their appointment, except under certain conditions. What is the genesis of that proposal? I should think there would be no necessity for it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes, men's names have appeared upon prospectuses when these men were not really directors, and this is to obviate the possibility of any difficulty of that kind. The consent must be filed in the minister's office.

Mr. MACDONALD: This does not appear to be taken from the English Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it is the Imperial Act.

Mr. CARVELL: Does this change the method, so common in many portions of Canada at the present time, of organizing a company out of the stenographers in an office?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the purpose of this section, combined with the former section.

Mr. CARVELL: That is what I thought, and I think the provision is very salutary one. I think it is a mistake to allow people to form joint stock companies with purely fictitious directors.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not the reason of this section.

Mr. CARVELL: I think any body of men forming a joint stock company and receiving the legal right to become an entity should come out in the open; the people would know who they are.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This section follows on to be consistent with the previous section which prevents the well known practice of forming companies out of stenographers, or stool-pigeons of one kind or other, and then holding out to the country in the prospectus, that some eminent man is to be director.

Mr. CARVELL: That is it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unless he is named in the first place, and his consent filed, that cannot be done.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under the English Companies Act, you can incorporate with the office clerks, but they have provisional directors only, and the Act makes provision for that. We have no such provision. I do not see how it would prevent the arrangement which the hon. gentleman from Carleton hoped it would prevent.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes, it will.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. CARVELL: Take this in connection with the previous section.

Mr. MACDONALD: To what section does the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On page 6, section 43, 43A, 43B, 43C, 43D.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is only when you propose issuing a prospectus.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman suggests it may be done when there is no prospectus issued?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, it would be a good provision to enact that, before any person can be named as director in a prospectus, his name must be filed, but I do not see how it would prevent the organization of a company with a provisional board of directors by the use of office hands, and I do not know that it is desirable to prevent that. That is not the object of the section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the office hands have the stock, and there is no appeal to the public by prospectus, nobody requires to be protected.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no objection if there is no prospectus issued to the public. I think this is a proper section, coupled with section 43B, because the damage is not done by the ordinary small business corporation that is being created and which is not issuing a prospectus, but by the flotation of the big companies which start out with flaming headlines. I think these provisions are all right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that after the word "prospectus" in line 10 section 10, the words "or in any notice in lieu of prospectus" be added.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where did subsection 2 of section 10 come from? Is it original?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is out of the English Act. In fact the whole section is practically word for word with the English Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: The result of these combined sections is that the practice of a solicitor putting his stenographers in as provisional applicants is done away with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This provision prevents a company from offering for sale shares, debentures, or bonds, while pretending to the public that certain parties are directors when as a matter of fact they are not bona fide directors. It does not go so far as to say that a company may not be composed of certain persons named as provisional directors, when, as a matter of fact, the permanent directors are well known to be others entirely. That could be done so long as there was not an appeal to the public.

On section 92—investigation of affairs of company:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that the word "warranting," in line 33, page 22, be struck out and that the following be substituted therefor: "as in the opinion of the Secretary of State of Canada warrants," and that the words "in the opinion of the Secretary of State of Canada" be inserted after the words "members as," in line 37.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 94a—appointment and remuneration of auditors.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the company fails to appoint an auditor at its annual general meeting, why should not the directors have the power to appoint, rather than the Secretary of State?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The auditor is primarily to be elected by the shareholders. If the shareholders omit to elect an auditor it would appear to me to be better to leave it to the Secretary of State than to the board of directors.

Mr. CARVELL: Auditors are appointed by the shareholders, not by the Government.

On section 94b—powers and duties of auditors:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is copied word for word from the British Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This provision will not apply to private companies?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, this provision applies to private companies.

On section 105—Annual meeting.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The balance sheet provision is entirely too cumbersome and exacting in its demands for any other than a public company of some magnitude. It is entirely too much to ask small companies in remote communities or small companies with a few shareholders in large cities, incorporated under this Act, to give all the information required in this balance sheet. The trouble is that the provision will be disobeyed. It is too much to ask companies that have a capital of $100,000 and perhaps six shareholders to go through all this formality and prepare a balance sheet with all these details. Auditors are not accustomed to preparing a statement containing all that information. During the last few hours I have been reading the report of the Canadian Locomotive Company, and its balance sheet, published in a newspaper, contains a very clear statement of assets and liabilities, and it gives the report to the shareholders certified by the auditors, indicating the profits, depreciation account and matters of that kind. Under clause (j) of subsection 2 of this section, the balance sheet must show the amount of common shares, subscribed for and allotted and the amount paid thereon, showing the amount thereof allotted for services rendered, for commissions or for assets acquired. After a company is once launched, who has any interest in those things? The people who have succeeded to the company may not know anything about these matters. The Secretary of State has all this information before him on the incorporation of the company. I have in mind a statement I saw from one of the largest companies of Canada the other day in response to an inquiry addressed to it. The statement was that the present officers had no such knowledge. What abuse is sought to be remedied, as against an auditor's certificate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: First of all, these very provisions have been in operation in Ontario for some ten years, I understand, with very considerable satisfaction.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I am told that they are more honoured in the breach than in the observance by small companies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not that information. Furthermore, they are as recommended by the Institute of Accountants for Ontario.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have no doubt as to that or that they would be recommended by any other Institute of Accountants that my hon. friend will ever hear of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume they are just as anxious for detail work as anybody else. At the same time, there is nothing impracticable in this, or they would not want to do what they could not get done. Each provision was threshed out with great care, and, in particular, the clause to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What good is it going to do, for instance, in the third annual report of the company?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not impossible that between the second and third annual reports of the company shares might have been sold for just such a consideration as is stated in the clause. One of 10 p.m. the objects of the amendments to the British and Ontario Acts which we endeavoured to embody in our Companies Act by this Bill is to provide for full disclosure and publicity with regard to all shares allotted for services rendered, for the purchase of assets and so on, in order that every one connected with the company may know where the shares of the company are going and what they are going for.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is right, too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not impossible that between the second and third annual report of the company there should be shares allotted for services rendered.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The directors could not do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have seen it done.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Under the Dominion Act, I would not like to see it done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have understood it to be the law that it could be done.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Not unless it is approved by the shareholders.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In what province did the minister see it done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In Manitoba.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would be a very risky thing to do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is evidently the opinion of the framers of this measure that it can be done, because this clause applies to companies already formed.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is the real objection to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why should not a company already formed be compelled to make disclosure of these facts?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT. This is what I call the impertinent side of the inquiries of departments. A company is launched, shares are sold and have been in the hands of the public for ten years. Now because a very well-deserving department desire to pry into the way in which a company has carried on its business since its inception, they make a provision that a class of men who may know nothing about the matter must dig into the past history of the company in order to supply the department with the information. What purpose does that serve? I have in mind a company about which there was much controversy and difficulty. The directors are asked to lay before the department a statement covering matters that occurred seven, eight, nine or ten years ago, and some of the books may not be in order as they once were. I saw a report of one of the biggest firms in Canada saying: We have no longer the custody of the books, and we cannot give this information. If it is determined that all this information must be given—and to that I see no objection—provision should be made that the information is to be given as from the date of the last report. Is this department suddenly seized with such a zeal for the public interest that, after letting ten years go by without any such legislation to prevent this being done, it is now going back ten years in order to find out what was done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is for the shareholders and not for the public.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It has to be communicated to the shareholders in so far as they desire, and under such conditions that means the widest publicity. We need not mention names, but there is a company that has been the subject matter of much discussion in this Parliament, so that we know what we are speaking about. Information is requested as to the issue of common shares and securities. These are matters long since forgotten. Why in 1917, should the department be zealous to have this information disclosed in a report when it was all known when the company was incorporated? If you say "since the date of the last annual report" I am in entire accord with what the minister says, as this makes a new departure.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If that is added to clause (j), it should also be added to clause (k).

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. CARVELL: In regard to clause (j), my hon. friend speaks of the small companies with $100,000 capital. There is not much stock given away in promoting a company of that kind, because that is usually a partnership of a few people who organize themselves into a company. I do not think there will be more than one case in a hundred where any hardship will be worked. I do not see any reason why you should not give the amount of the preferred shares and all the other information.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Having been given once, that should be sufficient.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but we are branching out on entirely new lines in Canada. A great many things will happen in this country within the next ten years that never happened before. We have had a business profits tax for the first time in our history, and now we have the income tax. It is these incorporated companies who are the very ones that will contribute under these new methods of taxation, and I think it quite proper that the very fullest publicity should be given. I think the department should have power, if necessary, to investigate right from the very beginning, and see on how much actual stock the company should be allowed to pay dividends; in other words, it is getting after the watered stock.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is too late after it has been sold to the public.

Mr. CARVELL: It is being worked out in Ontario, and they have had no difficulty there. It would be a good thing for all companies if they kept such a record as this provides for. I have in my mind a fairly small company in which I happen to be a stockholder and a director. It was practically a partnership organized in the form of a joint stock company. We went on year after year without a proper set of books, although the books we had told us what we were spending, how much we were taking in, and what our net profit was. But when I came to make out the statement required under the Business Profits Tax Act, I found that our balance sheet was entirely deceptive, and I could not ask the department to rely upon it. I think a great many people in Canada found themselves in the same position.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You probably had no certificated auditor.

Mr. CARVELL: We have auditors sufficient for our purpose. We were not the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, or anything of that kind, but we were handling a fair amount of money every year, and I am happy to say were earning good dividends. As I was saying, our books told us exactly what we were making, but when I came to make up the statement in connection with the business profits tax, the statement was not logical at all and required a good deal of explaining and amending. I am in favour of this provision, although I realize that many of the conditions will be onerous to small corporations.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend would not desire to make paragraphs (j) and (k) retroactive.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not at all particular about it.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have in my mind another company, which I think would have some difficulty in supplying the information. But assuming that they could. I do not see why Parliament, starting on this new departure, should make the provisions retroactive, because it would in many instances affect people who are no longer shareholders in the enterprise. It would simply mean that information would be furnished that would not advance the public interest in the least. Once the shares are listed and sold, once you can buy and sell them on the open exchange, the questions that (j) and (k) deal with cease to have any public interest and become matters only of private concern. I think my hon. friend will agree with that.

Mr. CARVELL: I do.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is another point which I mentioned to my hon. friend from Perth a few moments ago. Paragraph (e) deals with "expenditures made on account of future business." Now that is a direct invitation to a statement that is incorrect. It is one of the most deceptive things that could possibly be put in a balance sheet. It would include such things as advertising, sending men out and appropriating $20,000 for this, that, or the other thing. Then paragraph (g) deals with "goodwill, franchises, patents and copyrights, trademarks, leases, contracts and licenses." Goodwill, franchises, patents, copyrights and trademarks, are usually carried in balance sheets at a nominal figure or else at a figure that is being constantly reduced. The figure is often introduced in the balance sheet originally for the purpose of enabling watered stock to be taken care of. The Ogilvies' figures on this account now stands at one dollar, and has done so for the last five years. In another company the figure has been reduced from 800,000 to 650,000 in three years. I cannot quite follow what is in the mind of the Government in dealing with leases and contracts in this paragraph. I also submit that paragraphs (j) and (k) should be limited to information since the last balance sheet.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I rather agree with the hon. member for Calgary when he says that we should make these requirements as simple as possible. In the first place, we must recognize the fact that very few companies in Canada are administered strictly according to law. Corporations in this country are very loosely administered, and it is almost impossible for it to be otherwise unless the company has the constant services of a legal advisor—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: And a highly skilled chartered accountant.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: —in order to see that the requirements of the law are complied with. In England some men make a profession of acting as secretary to companies. One man will be secretary to twenty or a hundred, or, perhaps, two hundred companies. He gets accustomed to the legal requirements and carries the companies through all their troubles. The difficulty in Canada is that our minor corporations, not the larger ones, do not pretend to comply strictly with the law. I think the simpler we make this the better. The majority of companies incorporated under this Act could not understand subsection 105 if the directors and officers were all laymen. I like the idea of the section, but I think it would be better, at the beginning, to make it quite simple and let it grow up. I think the objection of the hon. member for Calgary to sections (j) and (k) is substantial. We should not require a company to continue year after year to include in their statement the fact that at the inception of their business so many shares were issued against services, or against property. If that is done once I think it should be sufficient.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am prepared to accept that suggestion. I wish to make clear that this is no attempt on the part of the State Department to pry into the affairs of companies. On the contrary, the officials of the department would be very glad to be relieved of this duty. The Senate, however, insists very strongly on these two clauses remaining exactly as they are. I beg to move:

That at the end of paragraphs (j) and (k) there be added the words "since the last annual meeting."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that is the way it is in the English Act.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes. I did not mean that the State Department was being unnecessarily given to inquiries, but only that that would be the proper designation, this should not be kept on for years. It was not a personal application to any individual.

Mr. MORPHY: I would like the Secretary of State to distinguish the words "classes and assets and liabilities" in subsection 3. Here it is put cumulatively but it seems to me that it would be more intelligent if the word "and" were changed to "of."

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That should be "of."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it should be "or."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the Secretary of State propose providing these forms which will be for sale?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would presume so. The forms which we purpose providing for under section 105 are for the purpose of affording information not to the department but to the shareholders, and doubtless they would do that themselves.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any penalty in connection with section 105?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. CARVELL: Section 113 provides a penalty.

Mr. MACDONALD: What happens supposing the balance sheet is not presented?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: There is a provision by which the charter is lost if they do not do certain things within a certain number of years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Inasmuch as these provisions are obligatory on the company, a shareholder can take proceedings to enforce their observance. I would direct the attention of the committee to section 113 which provides that:

Every one who, being a director, manager or officer of a company, or acting on its behalf, commits any act contrary to the provisions of this Act, or fails or neglects to comply with any such provision, shall, if no penalty for such act, failure or neglect is expressly provided by this Act, be liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty of not more than one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or to both such penalty and imprisonment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Where does that section hail from? Is it made in Ottawa?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has no parentage at all; it is new.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think that is a pretty dangerous provision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not come to it yet.

On section 13—annual returns:

Mr. MEIGHEN: We provide the forms there.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I observe that you have not adopted the provision of the Ontario Act which requires a return as to the name of each shareholder of the company and the amount of the shares unpaid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was in originally but was struck out. It entailed a tremendous amount of work and is easily evaded. All the company has to do is to syndicate its shares in the name of a trustee. They will do that to avoid the trouble of making such a return.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: That has not been the experience in Ontario.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But you have not as large companies as we have here.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: We have some of the largest companies in Canada.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Not incorporated under the Companies Act of Ontario?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Yes.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Most of them have taken Dominion charters under this new Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I suppose fifteen or twenty times a year my office writes down to the provincial secretary's office for the names of shareholders in different companies. That assists us in the way of executions and services. How are we to get that information if we cannot get it in that way? It is not a good reason to say that it is too much work for the company. It is a safeguard for the public, and we are legislating in the public interest.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why should you know if I own a share in a company any more than you should know whether my wife had purchased a new hat during the last sixty days?

Mr. CARVELL: What the public is interested in is the company and not the men who happen to own the individual shares in the company. In New Brunswick the shares of a company are not taxable. If I own a dozen shares in a company I do not pay any taxes on them; the taxes are paid by the company itself. The public wants to know how much the company's assets and dividends are. If it be a public utility company it wants to know that it is not earning more money than it ought to earn, and we treat it as a corporation and not as a number of individuals.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I was not referring to the question of taxation but to the question of executions and the recovery of debts from men who hold shares in companies. There is no way of ascertaining what they do hold except by an examination for discovery. There must be a very good reason for not requiring this information to be filed.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: With reference to local companies the reason is very clear, but with reference to a Dominion company there must be the greatest possible measure of protection not inconsistent with some reasonable measure of domestic secrecy in the transaction of its affairs. It will be observed that by section 106 we make provision for every matter of interest to the public with respect to the company itself. The point mentioned by my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) is not one that the public has much concern in because if you have an execution against a man the chances are that he has no shares standing in his name. If there is an execution against him he is going to get rid of his shares.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If he has any shares, under this Act he does not need to get rid of them. He may have a thousand shares in the company and he may not have half of them paid for. Unless I can find out what shares he has and what he has paid I do not know what interest he has in those shares. I cannot find out from the return how much is paid up or what interest he has in the shares of the company.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Can you not examine him?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: That means commencing an action, and after the action is commenced you may find that only ten per cent has been paid on the shares. As it is now I write to the provincial secretary and he sends me all this information.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: With five thousand shareholders that would be a serious obligation on the company.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: No, they could have a printed list as in the case of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the object is consistent at all. We should not say that a company should supply this information in order that a judgment creditor chasing a debtor may find out whether the debtor has anything worth suing for. The creditor may ascertain that by a motion for discovery against the debtor. There are three reasons for striking it out; first, to avoid unnecessary disclosure; second, to avoid a great deal of work; and third, because it is the most easily evaded of all requirements. I wish to move to add at the end of paragraph (i) the words "since the last annual return".

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: "Since the last annual meeting".

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume if one says "since the last annual return", if there had been no return previously it would be right from the beginning.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think "return" is better.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No, because then you have to start at the beginning of things. You require a return of the total amount paid by way of commission in respect of any shares, bonds or debentures or allowed by way of discount in respect of any bonds or debentures. That starts the whole history of the enterprise. It is retroactive legislation going back perhaps twenty years. The next provision, the number of shares forfeited, is also retroactive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the interpretation not be that on the first call, as no annual return has been made before, there would be nothing to comply with under paragraph (i); but the next time there would be, and then the objection of my hon. friend is overcome.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Absolutely. If my hon. friend thinks that is sufficiently clear, it meets the very point I am making.

Mr. GLASS: Reverting to section 105, is there anything imposing on the corporation the requirement of having the statement which is laid before the meeting of the shareholders printed and circulated to shareholders who may not be there? It seems to me that all of that information should be available to any shareholders, even if he is living at a distance and unable to be present.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A shareholder can be represented by a proxy who can send him the information. Companies would object to circulating printed statements of their affairs, as it would amount in the end to newspaper advertising.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. GLASS: If a shareholder is unable to be present at a meeting and does not happen to have a proxy, but at some future date desires to see that statement, is it available for him?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes, at ten cents a hundred words, the exact cost of it.

On section 14—Section 113 amended—Penalties:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It seems to me that the penalty provided by this section is excessive.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The penalty of one thousand dollars or imprisonment for one year or both is a maximum. It may be only a dollar.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should not like to see it within the power of any court to impose such a serious penalty.

Mr. CARVELL: It might be an ordinary country magistrate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are many things directors may neglect to do, and they are sometimes not of any importance. The shareholders may not object, as a matter of fact, or, perhaps, none would object, with the exception of one man, who, possibly, may have some personal grievance against one or more directors, and with this weapon in his hand he may make it very disagreeable for them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are offences coverable by this section that would be inadequately penalized by a lesser maximum. The hon. senator from Montreal, or from Hochelaga, whom every one will recognize not only as a very eminent lawyer, but a particularly capable man on a Bill of this kind, spoke at great length in the Senate, insisting strongly on the clause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The fact that we do not find it in any Companies' Act would make one suspicious of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We had a corresponding section in our own Act. It is true this is not borrowed from any other Companies' Act.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are many things which the directors or officers of a company may fail to do without doing any injury to the company, or to any of its shareholders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They are covered by the word "wilful," which precedes the characterization of the offences described in most of these sections, and, therefore, it would have to be wilful to come within that section. It is not in this section, but it appears in most sections dealing with offences.

Mr. CARVELL: About the only section this applies to would be 105 and 106.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You have penalties provided already. Suppose the directors fail to hold the annual meeting, I do not think it should necessarily follow that they should be liable to a penalty of any amount.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Why not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They may have very good reason. They may have been absent from the country. There are scores of provisions in the Companies' Act which are never carried out, and really are not expected to be. They are there more for protective than for practical purposes.

Mr. MORPHY: While I agree, in a measure, with the reading of the section, it looks very much more drastic than it really is. The penalty, on summary conviction, is a fine of not more than $1,000. It might be one, two, or ten dollars. I do not think it makes any difference if you reduce it to four or five hundred dollars. No ordinary magistrate would want to impose more than ten or twenty dollars for a technical offence under the Act. I think that section and the enforcing of it should be at the instance of somebody who is a shareholder in the company. I do not think it is right to put a section of that kind in the statute book which would leave it open to a blackmailer or a man without the shadow of an interest who happened to get the knowledge of some particular omission by a director of a trivial matter in which he had no concern from personal spite to lay a charge, and would compel the magistrate to impose a penalty and costs. I suggest that that section be amended in the 34th line, after the word "Act" by inserting the words "on complaint of a shareholder or other one interested in the company."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or a person canvassed by an officer of the company?

Mr. MORPHY: A person who is affected by the neglect. There might be no special damages, but there are multifarious things which have to be done, and some of these things might be neglected. This section is very general and broad. It seems more a case for the issue of a fiat by the Minister of Justice or Secretary of State, before a prosecution can be held.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought before a conviction was entered the consent of the Secretary of State might be required.

Mr. MORPHY: I am rather opposed to fiats going after complaints are lodged. I believe that before a dollar's worth of expense is incurred under public acts of this kind, the fiat should issue. It is the basis of the complaint.

Mr. GLASS: Might not some one other that a shareholder be prejudiced by the non-performance of some provisions of the Act? A creditor's interests might be just as important as the shareholders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Does any one feel the clause is dangerous as it is, or that it would be safeguarded by an amendment to the following effect: "Provided no action shall be entered under this section except with the written consent of the Secretary of State of Canada"?

Mr. MORPHY: No information or complaint should be laid.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Or no proceeding taken.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Take the case of the old Eaton Company, which did not have the word "Limited" after it; some enterprising young man started proceedings under which he got half the fines throughout Ontario. I think this section is capable of abuse, and the suggestion of the Secretary of State seems to meet the case, and overcomes the difficulty. My hon. friend to my right (Mr. Morphy) does not think any too much of that suggestion, but I think it the easiest way to meet the difficulty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would strike it out altogether.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have penalties for almost everything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should not like to strike it out, I will move to add the following words:

Provided no proceeding shall be taken under this section without the consent in writing of the Secretary of State for Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 113 is a new one; I do not know that a similar section may be found in any Companies Act. It is a dangerous provision, and I do not think that it should be left in. Why not strike it out? If necessary it could be taken up next year.

Mr. CARVELL: The member for Halifax and myself do not often disagree, but I do think that the provision made by the Secretary of State meets all objections. I cannot conceive of the Secretary of State—I care not whether he is Grit or Tory—sanctioning a prosecution against a company for failure to carry out certain requirements of the law unless there was a real failure; unless some person was substantially injured by the company's neglect.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Further application of this Act:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that at the commencement of this section the following words be added: The sections added or substituted in the principal Act by".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Should there not be a provision that the Act shall not come into force until January 1, 1918? It is usual in company legislation to fix a future date upon which the Act shall become effective, in order that companies may be given an opportunity to understand its provisions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is necessary that the incorporating sections of the Act be available right away. The compulsory clauses of the Act do not take effect immediately in any case.

On section 92—Investigation of affairs of company:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that in subsection 1, subclause 2, the word "company" be changed to "corporation", and that the word "company's" in line 37 be changed to "corporation's". A company which has no share capital is called a corporation.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would it not be well to have a form in the schedule to the Act for returns?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is intended to have forms to comply with section 106, but they are not to constitute an appendage to the Act.

Bill as amended reported, amendments read the first and second time and concurred in.

FORBIDDEN CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

"THE FIDDLERS"—STATEMENT BY HON. FRANK OLIVER—AMENDMENT NEGATIVED.

On the motion of Hon. J. D. Reid for Committee of Supply:

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I desire to draw the attention of the House to a matter that I brought up some time ago, and I would like to have an opportunity of dealing with it at some little length tonight. It relates to the prohibition of the book called "The Fiddlers." When I brought this matter to the attention of the House on a former occasion, I asked the Government to specify the portion of the book that was in contravention of the Consolidated Orders in Council regarding censorship. It was a very plain and simple question, but I have not yet received an answer to it. Instead of an answer, the House was favoured by the Prime Minister with a statement by Surgeon-General Fotheringham, who made a long report to the Prime Minister, which the Prime Minister presented to the House. The purport of the report was that this book contained reflections upon the conduct of Canadian soldiers, and, therefore, it was undesirable that it should be circulated in Canada. The fact, if it be a fact, that the book is according to the description of Surgeon-General Fotheringham, does not bring it within the censorship regulations, and, therefore, the prohibition of the circulation of the book by order of the Government or the censor is a trespass upon the rights of the people of Canada that should not be committed by its Government. It is to be supposed that, when a Government has the full power to make a law, as it has in the passing of regulations regarding censorship, having made provision for the prohibition of undesirable books or other literature, it should be willing to be bound by law that it itself has made, and that it should not undertake to exercise for the suppression of free speech or of the circulation of literature a power that it does not possess by any authority of any body, not even of itself. I might perhaps read to the House the conclusion of the report by Surgeon-General Fotheringham in regard to this book. He says:

> It is submitted, please, that the above criticisms on the character of the pamphlet in question are fair and represent the general unreliability of the pamphlet as a whole. If I may be permitted to express an opinion based upon my personal knowledge of the situation among the Canadian troops in France and Britain as regards alcoholism and venereal disease it would be that the circulation of statements such as fill the pamphlet in question, among the people of Canada is most undesirable, and should be prevented by any measures open to the authorities, having regard to the interests both of the troops themselves and of the Canadian public.

It will be observed that the Prime Minister does not make that statement. It is made by a gentleman holding a responsible position under the Government; but the Prime Minister takes the responsibility of placing that statement before the House on the authority of this official, and therefore I am compelled to hold the Prime Minister responsible for that statement. The statement is that the Government, owing to the character of this book, is justified in using any measures open to the authorities to prevent its circulation in Canada, and that such prevention would be in the interest both of the troops themselves and of the Canadian public. The attempt is made by Surgeon-General Fotheringham and the Prime Minister to create the impression that this book is printed for the purpose of libelling the Canadian forces in England. There is no such purpose in the book, either directly or indirectly. The book is for the purpose of calling to account the Government of Great Britain for permitting the destruction, in the manufacture of alcohol, of grain required for food, a subject that is surely entitled to be criticised in any free country, a matter of public administration in regard to a matter of grave public interest. That criticism, I am credibly informed, is not subject to prohibition in England, in Great Britain, in the United Kingdom. There the book is freely circulated. But in Canada it is made subject to the censorship. Just to give the House the character of the book, on page 4, under the heading "The Shadow of Famine," the writer says—

11 p.m.

Mr. EDWARDS: I rise to a point of order. Is it competent for the hon. gentleman to quote from a book, the circulation of which has been prohibited in Canada? By placing an extract on Hansard he is circulating the contents of a book which has been prohibited in this country.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Without having had an opportunity to consult the authorities, I should say that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. OLIVER: If I may speak to the point of order, I would say that I claim the privilege of Parliament. Under that privilege I claim the right to read this book. I claim there is no prohibition upon the reading of this book by a member of Parliament within the walls of Parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS: If the point of order is well taken, surely the hon. member cannot discuss it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member has not read anything from this book yet, so far as I have heard, and he cannot be called to order until he has done so.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There can surely be no objection to discussing the point of order. What is the purport of the order of the censor in reference to this book? Does anybody know what his order was? I suppose it was that this book was not to be circulated. But that certainly should not prevent a member of Parliament discussing the book, or the wisdom of the act of the censor. How can the point of order be sustained?

Mr. EDWARDS: I take precisely the same view as the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). I would say that the hon. member for Edmonton was quite in order in criticising the censoring of this book, and I only rose to a point of order when he undertook to place on Hansard the contents of a book which had been prohibited in this country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This prohibition does not extend to Parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does my hon. friend suggest that a member of Parliament is above the law of the land?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, the censor can censor newspapers and censor Hansard, but surely he cannot prohibit discussion of any matter in Parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is not the point. My point is that the hon. gentleman has no right to place the contents of this book on Hansard, when the circulation of the book has been prohibited in this country.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Parliament has full control of Hansard, and it is up to the Debates Committee or the Government, whichever is the proper authority, to prevent any particular issue of Hansard being circulated, if that is desired. But certainly we have the right to discuss the action of the censor. We have also the right to let this matter be placed on Hansard, and then it is for the government to decide whether this particular issue of Hansard shall be circulated or not. I have often heard the Prime Minister intimate that certain things should not be reported in Hansard.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The censor is not empowered, under the Order in Council to prevent Parliament from speaking. That is one thing, and preventing the circulation of a book is another and an entirely different thing. I frequently notice in the British Parliamentary reports, debates respecting the acts of the censor. I cannot give any concrete case, but on many occasions I know that specific acts of the censor have been discussed in the British Parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for Halifax persists in misstating my point of order, and I say that advisedly, because he must have understood what I said. My point is not that the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has no right to discuss the acts of the censor, but that he has no right to quote from a book the circulation of which has been prohibited under heavy penalties in this country, thereby circulating through the medium of Hansard the very material which the censor has declared must not be circulated.

Mr. SPEAKER (having taken the Chair): I am taken somewhat at a disadvantage in not having been able to follow the discussion from an earlier stage. As I understand it, on the motion to go into Supply the hon. member for Edmonton rose with a view to discussing a publication called "The Fiddlers." In my judgment it is not competent for an Order in Council to override the authority of Parliament, and it seems to me that it is peculiarly a matter for Parliament to determine what shall be done as to the discussion on a given matter in a given case. With the facts I have before me, I do not think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) is well taken.

Mr. OLIVER: I desired to read only a short extract from the book to show that it was not of the character it was represented to be by the report of Surgeon General Fotheringham. It is a criticism of the policy of the Government of Great Britain in regard to a matter of serious importance, and not a criticism in any degree of the conduct of our troops in England. I will read just a short extract from page 4, under the heading, "The Shadow of Famine":

"We have to face this grim menace," says Lord Davenport. "We are taking no chances," says the Prime Minister, and the nation will hope there is some meaning in the words. It is the tragic irony of this solemn time that so many men in high places have talked like kings and ruled like jesters.

The nation looks to Mr. Lloyd George to be equal to his words.

The Prime Minister blames the late Government that let slip the greatest opportunity in British history, for helping famine on; but it will not do. The new Government has been bringing famine nearer every day; it has allowed the destruction of enormous quantities of food, and those who are guilty of this crime have no stones to throw at others. The Prime Minister came into office with the food shortage in sight; it was his first duty to build up the great reserve of food we might have had now in our granaries if the drink trade had not destroyed it. We could have laughed at submarines, for our barns would have been filled to overflowing, and we could have lived in comfort for a year if no ship reached us.

Let us see how much food drink has destroyed since the war began. We will take it from August 4, 1914, to April 30, 1917. It is 999 days of the war. The quantity of grain and sugar destroyed for drink has been:

	Tons.
Grain for bread..	4,400,000
Sugar for beer	340,000

It is not easy to realize what this means, but it will help us if we think of one or two examples.

The biggest thing ever set up on earth is the great Pyramid. It is 80,000,000 cubic feet. The food destroyed by drink during the war would make two great pyramids, both bigger than the pyramid of Egypt.

The longest British railway is the Great Western. It is over 3,000 miles, but it would not hold the food destroyed by drink since the war began. If every inch of it were crammed with wagons, the Great Western railway would need hundreds of miles more line to hold the train loads of food destroyed.

So vast is this incredible quantity of food destroyed by an enemy trade while famine has been coming on. We should have saved it all if Parliament had followed the King, and it would have given the whole United Kingdom its flour rations for nearly a year.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to the fact that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SPEAKER: I see myself that there is a quorum present. The hon. member may proceed.

Mr. OLIVER:

Take it at its minimum scientific food value, and on the basis of our rations in April, 1917, it would have given us:

	Weeks.
Flour for the whole United Kingdom...	43
Sugar for the whole United Kingdom...	33

Our three war Governments, confronted with the increasing certainty of at least a three years' war, have allowed the drink trade to destroy this vast reserve of food. It will not do for Mr. Lloyd George to blame his predecessors. He has carried on their policy of food destruction. In the first four months of 1917 he has allowed the destruction of 400,000 tons of grain to bolster up this trade in drink. It would give the United Kingdom its bread rations for thirty days; it would make all the difference till the harvest is over.

Another paragraph, page 15, reads as follows:

And now we have a new idea from the Food Control Department; it is a coloured poster of a Union Jack and a big loaf on it and "Waste not, want not," printed in big type. It was being printed on the day the Prime Minister told the nation that America had found it is no use waving a neutral flag in the teeth of a shark. It is an eloquent and true saying, but it is also true that it is no use waving platitudes from copy books in the teeth of a wolf at the door. The Prime Minister says he is taking no chances. Let us be quite sure. We once had a Government of which men said its motto was "Wait and See." Are we better off, or are we worse, with a Government that sees and waits?

I think these extracts give a very clear idea of the purpose of the book. I notice that the report of Surgeon-General Fotheringham placed before the House by the Prime Minister has no good foundation but that it is an attempt to justify an action taken by the censorship under the authority of the Government for which there was no authority at all.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that there is nothing objectionable in the book?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not say there is nothing objectionable.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. gentleman find much that is objectionable in the book?

Mr. OLIVER: Not to me. But I can easily understand that it is very objectionable to the distillery trade of Canada as it is to the distillery trade of England.

Mr. MORPHY: I refer to the reflections upon the Canadian soldiers.

Mr. OLIVER: There are no reflections in the book on the Canadian soldiers—absolutely none made and none intended. To make it quite clear that there is no authority for the suppression of this book I will read the sections of the Order in Council which describe what constitutes objectionable matter that would bring it within the terms of the Order in Council.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, I would call your attention to the fact that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SPEAKER: I direct the clerk to take down the names.

The deputy clerk having taken down the names:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Oliver) may proceed; there is a quorum present.

Mr. EDWARDS: Might I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how many constitute a quorum?

Mr. SPEAKER: Twenty, including the Speaker.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to read the terms of the Order in Council under which the prohibition of the book is supposed to have taken place.

Whenever in this order the expression objectionable matter is used it shall be construed to mean and include:

(a) Any information with respect to the movements, numbers, description, condition or disposition of any of the forces, ships or aircraft of His Majesty or any of His Majesty's allies, or with respect to the plans or conduct or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations by any such forces, ships or air craft, or with respect to the supply, description, condition, transport, or manufacture or storage of war materials, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification of any place, or any information of such a nature as is calculated to be or might be directly or indirectly useful to the enemy, and

(b) Any photograph, sketch, plan, model or other representation of any naval or military work or any dock or harbour work, of such a nature that such representations thereof are calculated to be or might be, directly or indirectly, useful to the enemy, and

(c) Any false report or false statement concerning the causes or the operations of the present war, and

(d) Any report or statement intended or likely to cause disaffection to His Majesty or to interfere with the success of His Majesty's forces or of the forces of His Majesty's allies by land or sea, or to prejudice His Majesty's relations with foreign powers, and

(e) Any report or statement intended or likely to prejudice the recruiting, training, discipline or administration of any of His Majesty's forces or the operation or administration of any Act or Order in Council concerning National Service.

(f) Any report or description or purported report or description of the proceedings of any secret session of either Senate or Commons of Canada held in pursuance of a resolution passed by such Senate or Commons except such report thereof as may be officially communicated through the Secretary of State of Canada, and

(g) Any report or description or purported report or description of the proceedings at any meeting of the Cabinet of Canada, and

(h) The contents of any confidential document belonging to or any confidential information obtained from any government department or any person in the service of His Majesty.

I submit that there is nothing contained in those sections that warrants the prohibition of the circulation of this book. Yet, notwithstanding that fact, the circulation of the book is forbidden or prohibited under penalty of the imposition of a fine not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years, or both fine and imprisonment. I submit that such penalties should not be invoked except in case of infraction of the laws as laid down, and when the Government undertakes to bring within the range of this punishment actions that are not offences under the law, the Government is taking a position that cannot be characterized in modern language. This is particularly strange because this book is printed in England, is circulated in England and, so far as I am aware, is not prohibited in England. It is not prohibited in Australia. It is only in Canada that it is prohibited. I have here an advertisement which appeared in the British Weekly, a high-class publication of England:

The Fiddlers, a new book by Arthur Mee, author of Defeat. Drink in the Witness Box. Startling indictment of the British Government and the liquor trade. Playing with the greatest enemy force outside of Berlin. The facts about the food crisis. How drink has broken down the nation's food reserves. The ruin of our soldiers' homes. The war upon the soldiers' children. The effect of drink on the war by land and sea. How the drink trade is imperilling the Empire—with the truth about what a great Canadian paper calls The Blackest Tragedy of the War. A remarkable map of the allied countries and prohibition, showing how the allies are stopping drink to win the war. With cartoons, tables, new facts, and hundreds of witnesses to the way in which drink is prolonging the war. Published by Morgan & Scott. For sale everywhere the English language is spoken except in Canada.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Is that in the advertisement?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, that is part of the advertisement. As to the general question of the propriety of circulating arguments of this character dealing with the conduct of affairs by the Government, I have here the consideration given by the Presbytery of Manitoba to a similar book similarly prohibited, by the same author, and dealing with the same subject. The advertisement for that book as it appeared in Australia is as follows:

The book of the hour, Defeat; the truth about drink and the betrayal of Britain, by Arthur Mee and J. Stuart Holden, with an introduction by Dr. Saleeby. The book that stirs and burns. Two-color frontispiece. Price sixpence, all booksellers. For quantities apply to N.S.W. Alliance, Macdonell House, Pitt Street, Sydney. Write Box 390, G.P.O., Sydney, N.S.W.

In regard to that book the Manitoba Presbytery has the following:

And, whereas the presbytery is of the opinion that, even in the strain of war, the suppression of facts and conditions concerning a grave moral issue, however serious those facts and conditions may be, is more dangerous to the common weal than their frank disclosure and more likely to prejudice recruiting, etc., by the want of confidence thus created;

And, whereas the presbytery believe such action on the part of the Army Council and of the Canadian censor to be an undue and wholly unnecessary interference with the liberty of the subject and in direct conflict with the very principles of liberty for which Canada is fighting.

Therefore, be it resolved, that this presbytery protests most strenuously against such prohibition, and demands that the embargo upon this book be at once removed.

I may perhaps be permitted to read from what purports to be a petition presented to the Prime Minister of Canada, signed by 64,000 mothers and wives of Toronto, as follows:

1. That mothers and wives of Canada, in giving their sons and husbands for King and Empire, asked and received from your Minister of Militia this only assurance that, in sending them into the ranks, we were not thereby irrevocably thrusting them into the temptation of strong drink.

2. We appreciated, in the depths of our hearts, your action in abolishing the wet canteen from the Canadian militia. We believe the wet canteen established in the ranks at the front to be a double danger, robbing our King of the success in arms which in these days comes only to the brave heart that is controlled by a clear head; and robbing us and our Canada of the manhood which we gave into our Empire's keeping.

We do not believe that the King will refuse the aid of Canada's sons; nor that he will appreciate your patriotic efforts the less, if you keep faith with us and make known to His Majesty, his ministers and commanders, that our boys are sent forth on the one condition that the dispensing of intoxicating liquor shall be prohibited in the ranks.

Dealing with this same subject, Mr. Arthur Mee, in the London Daily News of July 11 says:

The Incredible Facts.

1. We have seen a ship that might have carried 550 tons of wheat bring instead 550 tons of rum to be drunk in 1920. The Government told us this was stopped, but the Government's statement was not true.

2. There is wheat enough in the Empire waiting for us to fetch it, to last us a year, but we have no ships to bring it; yet we have had ships, since the submarine menace reached its height, for carrying brewers' vats over thousands of miles, and ships enough to bring hundreds of thousands of cubic feet of hops to a land clamouring for bread.

3. We ask in vain for sugar; our growing children and our wounded soldiers cannot get it, our home-grown fruits must waste for want of it; 40,000 tons of it were sunk not long ago. But every day our brewers waste over a hundred tons of sugar, and they are to waste hundreds of tons a week more.

4. We are fining people £5 for destroying a loaf, but this trade is destroying 450,000 quartern loaves a day, and is now apparently to destroy 100,000 more.

5. We have enormous stocks of alcohol that could be used for munitions, and the Government appoints a committee to consider if it should be used, and so save bread. The committee has eleven members, of whom seven are distillers, and not one is a chemist, or a scientist, or an industrial expert; and this distillers' committee reports that it is not in our interest to save grain by using this hoarded alcohol!

6. This trade has not lost a penny through the war, but this very week the House of Commons has made it a present of £1,000,000.

The Board of Education teaches our children that beer cannot nourish us, but the trade which has taken 150 quartern loaves from every British cupboard since the war began is to burgle our cupboard still more, and turn our bread to beer.

Not even war can keep the grip of Nemesis from those who bring famine in their train. It is hunger and not thirst that makes a revolution.

Mr. Mee has also written an open letter to the War Council in which he says:

Gentlemen, you are conducting the greatest war of freedom in the history of mankind, and it is permissible to ask, as the Russian people are asking, if liberty is truly the end of all these things.

Quite clearly our drink question, as the greatest flour-milling paper in America says, is no longer a football for the game of British politics. With the fate of the Allies depending on food supplies, Canada and Russia and America, all prohibiting the destruction of grain for drink, may well be astounded at the spectacle of a War Council in Britain that tolerates the destruction of 450,000 loaves a day for beer.

Even fiddling like that we must stand at home, but what the British Empire will not stand is the smashing of its birthright. There is in circulation in this country a book that tells the truth about drink and the war. It gives the evidence on which the King declared that this trade prolongs the war, on which Lord Kitchener refused to touch drink as long as the war should last; on which the Prime Minister assured the nation that drink is more our enemy than Germany.

It is 'Defeat or Victory?" now brought up to date in its companion book, "The Fiddlers," and it is found in the homes of a million of our people. It is found throughout the Empire, too, for the prohibition of the Army Council was too late. But the news now comes from Canada that under the Defence of the Realm Act any person found with this book in the Dominion may be fined £1,000 and imprisoned for five years.

Is the Defence of the Realm Act really to be reduced to the depth of becoming the Defence of the Drink Trade Act? Is this trade really to enjoy the protection we give to the army? Are free Canadians to be imprisoned unless they burn this book which is freely read in England? If this is the price we are to pay for proclaiming the truth about drink there are ten thousand thousand Britons who will know the reason why.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that there can be no argument about the purpose of the book, or the purpose the author has in issuing the book, and it will be evident that he backs up his book by other publications. It is further obvious that, in the realm of England the right of free speech and free argument has not been suppressed, but it is clear that in this hitherto free Canada the right of public argument has been suppressed, so far as this Government can suppress it.

Mr. CURRIE: Who is the author of this book? Is he an Austrian or a German, or where does he come from? Where was he born?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman spends the whole evening reading statements of an obscure writer in England, wasting the time of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: The writer is very far from being obscure. He is one of the greatest writers in England, and an Englishman. As a Canadian, I, for one, protest most strongly, in the words of this English writer, that this Government of Canada has no right to use the authority that Parliament has placed in its hands for the purpose of preventing the circulation in the Dominion of Canada of information that will be to the prejudice of those who conduct the distilleries and breweries, in this country. Has the Government sunk so low that it has used its authority in that way? And, having done so, it comes before Parliament with the report of Surgeon-General Fotheringham presented by the Prime Minister in the attempt to make the people of Canada believe that this book was written as an attack upon the soldiers of Canada. I say no more discreditable exhibition was ever made by any Government in any country. My information is that there are many good men and true throughout this Dominion of Canada who have informed the Government that they hold copies of this book, and they defy Government to put in force the terms of the Order in Council. It is up to the Government, either to withdraw that Order in Council, or to enforce it. I move in amendment:

That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"In the opinion of this House, inasmuch as the book called "The Fiddlers" does not contain matter in contravention of the terms of the consolidated Orders in Council respecting censorship, but is a work inspired by high moral purpose and calculated to direct public attention to the evils of the liquor traffic in the United Kingdom, it should not be suppressed."

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I am afraid I cannot congratulate my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) on the fairness of presenting this amendment at this late hour of the night, without notice to the Government. He gave no notice, so far as I am aware of it, and I think I should have been aware of it if any notice had been given.

It concerns a subject with regard to which, of course, the entire Government have the usual constitutional responsibility, but which has been peculiarly under the review of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) had gone home long before we arrived at this particular order. The Prime Minister also, who has taken some interest in the question, had gone home before we had arrived at this order. Still, without notice, this amendment is brought upon us. No notice was given to the Administration; none of us were in possession of the documents appertaining to the motion. None of us were in possession of the book itself, or of the report of officers of the Government—either of the press censor or of Colonel Fotheringham—referring to it. We are asked to meet an amendment so precipitated. This much I know positively: the action taken in this matter was fully recommended in writing by the chief press censor for Canada, Lieut.-Colonel Chambers. I cannot understand the attitude of any hon. member who would assume for a moment that when he made that recommendation Lieut.-Col. Chambers had any ulterior motive—indeed, any motive at all save that of discharging to the best of his judgment and ability the duties of chief press censor. I do not know what is being done at present in England in regard to this matter. I rather think that the Minister of Justice would know he was conducting inquiries with the British Government with a view to ascertaining their attitude towards this publication. I know that he got a reply of some indefiniteness, and that he sent for more information; what information he received, I do not know.

This book is calculated to do harm here in Canada in a way that appertains to us peculiarly, but that does not appertain in the same way to Great Britain. It contains foul libels upon the soldiers of this country. I did not have the matter particularly under my review, but I remember an assertion in the book that a large proportion of the returned soldiers of Canada were to-day in insane asylums or afflicted with insanity by reason of disease brought on by drinking in Great Britain. A more utterly libellous and scandalous assertion could not well be conceived by any one. There are in the book other assertions approaching that—to put it mildly—in the grossness of their inaccuracy. It is true that many portions of the book have not peculiar application here, but the people have no way of telling or measuring the accuracy, the correctness, or the fairness of the assertions in the book that appertain only to Great Britain. Our information is, to put it mildly, that many of these assertions are grossly exaggerated; that they will create a false impression throughout the country as to conditions overseas. But it was with particular regard to the assertions in the publication relative to the soldiers of this country—assertions reported to us by our own reliable authorities to be absolutely false; assertions which those who ought to know should recognize as absolutely false—that the recommendation was made and followed. I do not think that we should be doing our whole duty in this country if we permit, untrammelled and uncorrected—at all events, without some restriction—a book to receive circulation which does so libel our overseas men, which does so falsely paint conditions overseas. Final action with regard to this—whether or not it has been taken I am not in a position to say just now—was withheld pending the receipt of the information that was cabled for. As the Minister of Justice has arrived, I shall not pursue the matter further. I do emphasize again, however, the unfairness to the House and to the Government of introducing after eleven o'clock at night, without any notice, a motion upon a subject entirely foreign to that which for the most part is now before Parliament.

Amendment negatived on division, and motion to go into Committee of Supply agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suggest to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) that the committee should not proceed to-night.

Mr. REID: There are just three items of the Minister of Inland Revenue. We are leaving a number of other items—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think that three items, or even one item, ought to go through for the Minister of Inland Revenue. I do not think that it is necessary to proceed even with those to-night.

Mr. REID: If we had had notice of this other amendment—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Hon. gentlemen on this side had no notice either. It was a matter of public importance.

Mr. OLIVER: It was thoroughly understood on Saturday that I desired to move the motion which I moved to-night. It was a matter of decision by the Speaker; the House was thoroughly aware that I had a motion to move in the matter.

Mr. REID: The hon. member may h ve given the Speaker notice; he certainly never gave the Government or any member of the Government notice.

Mr. OLIVER: I was ruled out from making the motion. The House was aware that I would make a motion in the matter upon the first opportunity upon going into Supply. This is the first opportunity.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I understand it, the hon. member endeavoured to move the motion, but it was ruled out on the ground that Supply was taken up automatically on that day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that the Prime Minister himself was paired with the hon. member for Edmonton. I am certain that had the Prime Minister known that the motion was to come up, he would have remained in the House.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not know that we were going into Supply to-night. If my hon. friend desires to go into personal matters, I may say that when I paired with the Prime Minister I had intended to go home, not anticipating that we should take up Supply to-night.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is admitted that we had no notice of the nature of the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no.

Mr. REID: If the hon. member objects, we will rise now.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 12 midnight.

Tuesday, September 18, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS OFFICIALS.

OFFICIAL DEBATES BRANCH.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 12th instant, to abolish the office of secretary of the Hansard section of the Reporting Branch of the House and to appoint an official shorthand reporter to that section in grade B of the first division, under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, be concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is that the recommendation of the Debates Committee of the House?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This is entirely under the Civil Service Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand the Committee on Debates agrees to that?

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

REPORTS OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE OF BOTH HOUSES DISCUSSED.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe) moved:

That the third report of the joint committee of both Houses on the printing of Parliament be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to direct attention to that portion of the report of the committee which is printed at page 1064 of the Votes and Proceedings:

3. That the recommendations contained in the second report of the special committee appointed to consider, inquire into and report upon the reception, treatment, care, training and re-education of the wounded, disabled and convalescent returned soldiers of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, presented to the House of Commons on Tuesday, July 17, be not concurred in.

Obviously such a report is ultra vires of the Printing Committee. The matter was not referred to that committee, and if it were, the committee would not have power to make such a recommendation. The recommendation contained in subclause 4 of 239 would appear to be open to similar objection.

Mr. MURPHY: I drew the attention of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) to this matter last week, and I understood a correction was to be made.

Mr. CURRIE: Apparently, in the preparation of this report for the committee, the secretary did not make the matter sufficiently clear. The words "for additional printing" should be inserted after the word "recommendation." The House will understand that the reports of this Returned Soldiers Committee were published from day to day. That committee made this recommendation which was referred by the House to the committee on printing:

Your Committee also recommends that the Preliminary, and this Report and the Minutes of Proceedings and evidence submitted herewith, together with a suitable index to be prepared by the Clerk of the Committee, be printed in both languages in blue-book form for distribution, and as an Appendix to the Journals of the House.

What the committee on printing had to pass upon was whether it was advisable for the report to be published in blue-book form and reprinted in French, and also added as an appendix to the Journals of the House. To do that would cost the country about $40,000, and as the report has already been printed and every one interested can get a copy, the committee did not see that there was any necessity to add to the expense by issuing the evidence in blue-book form and adding another foot or two to the Journals. For that reason the committee deemed it advisable not to concur in the recommendation that was referred to it. We alone have the right to say what shall go into the Journals of the House, for instance, and the committee, after due consideration, decided that sufficient printing had been done to meet the necessities of the case. I would ask for leave to amend the report by inserting after the word "recommendation", at page 1064, the words: "for additional printing."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would the hon. gentleman also explain the fourth paragraph?

Mr. CURRIE: That refers to a report presented to the Senate on the inspection of food. It dealt largely with the manufacture of whole wheat bread. Sir James Lougheed considered it advisable to have pamphlets dealing with the manufacture of whole wheat bread printed, and we concurred in that for five hundred copies, at a probable cost of about $150.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That would require the same amendment as to additional printing.

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, that should be there also, and I would ask permission to insert the same words in clause 4.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps the resolution might pass with the proviso that the report would be considered as amended by the insertion of the words "as to additional printing" in subsections 3 and 4 of section 239. It would appear from the statement of the hon. gentleman that, in both these matters, there was a recommendation in regard to printing, which was referred to the Printing Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: To have such a motion in order, it would have to be regarded as a clerical error.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The whole matter dealt with in the report is very much involved, and my attention was only drawn to it yesterday. It is a very important question, and I suggest that it be deferred until to-morrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no objection. I think the motion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Currie) is now pretty clear, although I confess I did not understand it when I first read it. As I understand the explanation, certain questions as to the printing of the second report of the special committee mentioned were referred to the committee on printing, and they took the matter into consideration and made this recommendation. Paragraph 3 of this report would express the meaning intended to be conveyed, if after the word "recommendation" the words "for additional printing" were inserted. The same insertion should be made after the word "recommendation" in paragraph 4. The report of this committee deals altogether with the question of printing, which was properly referred to it in each case. However, the matter may stand until to-morrow.

Consideration of the third report of the Joint Committee on Printing deferred.

Mr. CURRIE moved: That the fourth report of the joint committee of both Houses on printing of Parliament be concurred in. He said: this report deals with the printing of Parliament and of the various departments. It contains suggestions, but makes no recommendations. A report was made last year, and a further report this year which is to be found on page 1094 of the Votes and Proceedings. For several years the committee have been endeavouring to bring about some reduction in the cost of printing which has increased very greatly in recent years. It will be seen from this report that in 1913 the cost of the printing of Parliament was $1,274,870. As a matter of fact, in five years it had increased from half a million to over a million and a quarter, and now in 1917 it is up to two and one-half millions dollars. We do not see that this expenditure is of any great importance, as far as information to the public is concerned. A report was made by the King's Printer with regard to the cost of printing of the various departments, which is referred to in this report. For instance, here is a report on the high cost of living. When that volume is completed and printed in French the cost to this country will be something like $40,000. That item was given me by the King's Printer. Already $26,000 has been expended on the English edition, and, with the French edition and the other two volumes, the total cost will be $40,000. That sum of money will uniform four battalions of infantry, or it will provide four aeroplanes fully equipped. It will build four drill-halls, or four public post offices. Such unnecessary expenditures are being made annually, and there seems to be no one who can turn off the tap.

There is another report here on the Wabana iron mine which is in Newfoundland. The Mines Department, which is a great sinner in respect to additional increase in the cost of printing, has spent something like $5,000 publishing a big book with regard to a mine not in Canada, and with which Canada has nothing to do. There is also a great deal published in regard to other matters which it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand. Volumes are published on the hydrometric survey of rivers away up on the Hudson bay which no one is interested in. This book is not only published once, but annually. This question of the cost of printing has been referred to us by this House to see if we can make some suggestion in regard to it. We have suggested that the map-making of the country should be placed under one bureau, and that there should be standard maps. At present each department gets a fresh map, and there are hundreds and thousands of maps published which are of no use, whereas, if there were a standard map, reference could be made to it.

Then another matter for consideration is the material that is printed. We consider that the Government should take from the ranks of the Civil Service an editorial committee of, say, three men, to consider such questions and make suggestions. This editorial committee would meet and decide with regard to the publications in any department, and nothing but the personal order of the minister would override their decision. As near as I can ascertain, 80 per cent of the printing is done without reference to the ministers of the different departments. If there were an editorial board of that kind, the various departmental officers, if they wanted to publish anything in regard to the Wabana iron mine would make a report, which would come before the minister, giving an estimate of the cost, and the minister would consider whether it would be in the interest of the country to spend ten or fifteen thousand dollars in useless work. That committee would also prevent duplication. We have been endeavouring to prevent duplication in the various departments. Some of the most expensive documents issued by the Government are those dealing with trade, and we are endeavouring to arrange so that there will be only one publication dealing with trade, whereas at present there are two or three. The Census Branch issues a publication dealing with the trade question, and the Customs Department publishes two or three volumes dealing with other such matters, and the Department of Trade and Commerce issues other publications. This matter has been going on previous to this Government coming into power, nothing has been initiated by this Government to create additional cost. We think there should be something done to improve the system and that this proposed board should have the supervision of these matters, and refer to the chief of the department any publication in that department that they did not consider it advisable to print. The report is before the committee. There is no recommendation that requires an expenditure of money.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The effective suggestion which has been placed before the House by the committee is this:

> The most effective way to bring about economies in Canadian Parliamentary and Departmental printing is, in the opinion of the committee, to create an editorial board of three members of the Civil Service, thoroughly conversant with public affairs, and with a knowledge of Departmental workings. This board should have plenary powers to order such excisions of "copy" of Departmental reports, leaflets, bulletins, memoirs, etc., or to refuse to sanction the printing of any report if, in their judgment, the public interest would not be seriously affected by such refusal.
> It would be the duty of the Board to call upon the Deputy Head of any Department or Branch of the Public Service created by Parliament, whose requisition and "copy" for printing were under consideration, to show cause why any proposed reductions in "copy" should not be made or the printing thereof suspended entirely, and only upon direct written authority of the Minister of the Department interested should the decision of the Board of Editors be countermanded.
> The Board should present a report of its operations annually to Parliament within three weeks after the opening of each session thereof, such report to give the dates when first and last "copy" of every departmental report is received, and specifying the reductions in text, and the reasons therefor. In cases where the decision of the Board has been overridden by the Minister of any department Parliament shall be advised.

The suggestions in the three paragraphs which I have just read are worthy of attentive consideration; that consideration will be given. I have already discussed the subject to some extent with my colleagues, and I feel confident that we shall either adopt the report of the committee as it has been presented to the House, or modify it to the extent of having two or three members of the Government associated with the members of the Civil Service in the editorial committee referred to. That might, perhaps be desirable. However, we have not reached a fixed conclusion on that point. I am confident that some effective way of carrying out the suggestions of the committee will be found.

It is pointed out in the report that in some of the departments the recommendations made last year by the committee have been pretty fully carried out. In other departments, it is thought, there is still room for improvement. This report will be commended to the consideration of the permanent head of each department with a view to having the suggestions of the committee carried out in their entirety in the respective departments, unless there is good reason to the contrary. It is possible that in making some of these comments the committee did not have before them absolutely full information as to the subjects which are dealt with, but generally speaking I believe that the suggestions are worthy of consideration, which will be accorded.

As to the increased cost of printing during the last five years, it is due in part to the increased printing rendered necessary by the war and in part to the increased cost of paper, which has been very great, especially during the past two years. I have no objection to the House concurring in the report which the committee have made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not sure that I approve the recommendations made with regard to certain information which is annually given to Parliament. The information given to Parliament by any department is under the responsibility of the minister; he prepares his own report every year, and he may supplement that report by other information which he thinks it advantageous to publish. I do not think that we can gain anything by taking away the responsibility of the minister in this matter. I see here that several—I will not say criticisms, rather reflections, are made with respect to some of the publications. The report of the committee says:

> "Economy" will have to be Canada's watchword for many years to come, and the printing Bills of Parliament and the public Departments present a fertile field for action in this regard. That our great neighbours to the south realize this in connection with Congressional publications is shown by the decision of the Senate of the United States to cut down this year its printing bills by $470,000. This has been brought about by reducing the bulk of some reports and suspending entirely the publication of others.

Well, that is a matter for the minister. He is giving the information to the public; it is for him to see that that information is as concise as possible. It does not follow that the giving of the information should be entirely suppressed. Then the report goes on to mention the United States reports which have been cut down:

> Among the latter may be mentioned: Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce, Annual Report of Foreign Commerce and Navigation, Report of District of Columbia Health Office, Bulletins of the Bureau of Ethnology, annual report ditto; Bulletins of the Bureau of Fisheries, Geological Bulletins, Geological Professional papers, Geological Water Supply papers, Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences, Nautical Almanac, Annual Report of Bureau of Soils, and many others.

Some of our publications are similar to these. The Department of Trade and Commerce issues a good many reports; according to this recommendation, the precedent of the United States should be followed and many of those reports should be cut down. The report of the committee says that in the United States the monthly summary of foreign commerce has been eliminated. We have something like that here; it is a very useful publication, and should not be cut down. We have also a report of foreign commerce and navigation; I would say the same about that report. If we find that departmental publications are too bulky or give useless information, we can call attention to the matter, but for my part I should not like to suppress the publication of these reports or to take away from the minister the responsibility of having them brought down in proper form.

Mr. CURRIE: It is not the intention of the committee to take any of the responsibility from the minister. The formation of an editorial board will not have that effect; it will not interfere with the duties of the minister or the functions of the departments. It will endeavour to cut down the size of the volume by better editorial work and it will point out to a minister, when any of his officials send in a volume for publication, whether any other department has published a similar volume. The Conservation Commission, for instance, is issuing very extensive reports covering matters that have already been covered by other departments. The editorial board would have supervision in that regard. The committee had no intention of interfering with the duties of any of the ministers or the work of any of the departments; the only desire was to see that more supervision should be exercised with a view to preventing too great a cost in the publication of these reports. The Auditor General's Report, for instance, has been published in English and in French. The department has decided to publish the headings in English and in French and to put the whole thing in one volume. For years we have been spending about $25,000 more than was necessary on that report. The intention of the committee was, according to the request of Parliament, to bring in a report with a view to a reduction in the cost of printing. We are at war, and it is necessary for us to economize. On behalf of the committee, I thank the Prime Minister for his suggestion that the departments should be asked to give consideration to the report.

Motion agreed to, and fourth report of the committee concurred in.

Mr. CURRIE moved:

That the fifth report of the joint committee of both Houses on the printing of Parliament be concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What does this report deal with?

Mr. CURRIE: This is a recommendation that, in the absence of the sittings of the Printing Committee, the joint chairmen may have the power to order publication of any documents that may be sent from the House. That is done every year.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNED SOLDIERS—IDENTIFICATION BADGES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir SAM HUGHES: At the front, officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the various divisions are, by authority, allowed to wear distinctive badges. Soldiers from those divisions returning to Canada have been in the habit of wearing them. Recently, by somebody's order, not always carried out in the most courteous manner, officers, non-commissioned officers and men, on reaching Canada, have been brusquely told to remove those badges. I would ask the Minister of Militia by whose authority that is done and why?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The badges to which my hon. friend refers are what are known as identification badges of the divisions at the front. The badge appears on the arm or sometimes on the back of the tunic. They are not badges for distinguished conduct in the war. I understand the badges for the Victoria Cross and the Distinguished Service Order are not on all fours with these badges. The order is an order of the Imperial Army, and requires those badges to be removed when the soldiers leave France if they are on leave. I have only heard of one case in this country in which a soldier has been spoken to on the street, and there was no attempt at that time to speak to the soldiers in a discourteous manner. It was the provost-marshal who spoke to the man about his wearing the badge being against the regulations.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have twenty instances, and I want to know why soldiers are not permitted to wear those badges in Canada.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: It is an order of the Imperial Army, and the Canadian Army follows that order in that soldiers remove those badges when they leave France.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have never seen such an order for the Imperial service, although I have tried very hard to find it. I have known officers returned to England being ordered to wear those badges.

FIRST CONTINGENT DISTINCTIVE BADGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe): I would ask the Minister of Militia if an order has been promulgated permitting soldiers of the First Division to wear their blue shoulder strap? There is an Imperial order in England to that effect. I understand that some provost-marshals have ordered soldiers to take off their blue shoulder badge or, if they are in the artillery, their red shoulder badge.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I am unable to answer my hon. friend's question to-day. I will endeavour to obtain information regarding it.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 132, to amend the Companies Act. —Mr. Meighen.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT.

The House proceeded to the consideration of an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 66, to amend the Judges Act.—Mr. Doherty.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): This Bill, as introduced into this House, provided simply salaries for an additional High Court judge of the province of Saskatchewan, as required by the legislation of that province, and for a County Court judge in the province of Ontario similarly required, and it made a regulation as to the travelling expenses of judges and as to the application to circuit court judges in Montreal of the provinces providing for inquiries applicable to the present County Court judges.

The Bill as it left this House was approved by the Senate in its entirety, but that honourable body added a number of amendments dealing with the general subject of the duties of judges. I am not prepared to say that certain of those amendments in principle might not be accepted, but before we could accept them I think they would require considerable modification from the very general terms in which they are expressed, and the very general effect given to them. They raise a very important question which it seems to me can hardly be dealt with suitably by this House in considering amendments introduced by the other House to a Bill of this nature, and especially at this stage of the session, when it is difficult, if not impossible, to give to these important amendments the consideration they deserve.

The first of these proposed amendments is to repeal certain legislation enacted in the year 1906. That legislation, which amended previously existing legislation, made special provision for the payment of full pensions to judges after they had reached a certain age and had served a certain number of years upon the bench. The amendment before us proposes to repeal the legislation of 1906, which would leave the law as it stood previously to that time, and provide for the payment of a two-thirds pension only, in cases where a man had served fifteen years or had become incapacitated by illness. Speaking for myself, I would raise no objection to the proposed repeal, but for the fact that it raises an important question as to the protection and preservation of the rights of judges appointed under that legislation. The only proviso in the amendment protecting any vested right is one to protect the rights of judges who have actually retired under that law and are in receipt of their pensions.

The next amendment deals with section 33 of the Judges Act, which in general terms prohibits judges from engaging in any other occupation or business. The proposed amendment would prohibit the judges from performing any duties outside of their judicial duties. I am not prepared to say that there would not be an advantage in making more precise the prohibitions at present existing, but the prohibition as adopted by the Senate is very widely beyond the mark, because it is obvious that there are some duties that man must perform, even though he be a judge, which are not judicial duties.

The other amendments follow, I think, upon this last-mentioned one. They contain a prohibition against the judge receiving a remuneration for the performance of any duty outside of his judicial duties. As the section stands, he is already prohibited from performing any such duty, and the amendment makes certain limitations and restrictions to the general prohibition proposed, in favour of duties imposed by the provincial legislatures.

I am not prepared to say that in principle these amendments have not a great deal to commend them to the consideration of this House, but it seems to me quite clear that before we could accept them they would have to be modified in very important particulars in their wording. As I have already said, they bring up very important questions in connection with the independence of the judiciary, which I think deserve very careful consideration before such serious modifications in the law are made.

Although I have had no formal conference, I have had some communication with the hon. gentlemen of the Senate and they seem disposed rather to share the view that these important questions could be dealt with in another manner. For these reasons, I beg to move:

That the amendments made by the Senate to this Bill be not concurred in, and that a message to that effect be sent to that honourable House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Please read the amendments one by one.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must present the motion as I have it, unless the minister consents to alter it.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no objection on my part if it is thought desirable, but the same reasons apply to all the amendments.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the nature of these amendments?

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment is:

Page 1, line 32.—After clause 4 add clauses 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9, as follows:

5. (1) Sections 20, 22, as enacted by section 3 of chapter 39 of the statutes of 1908, and 25, as enacted by section 9 of chapter 28 of the statutes of 1913, of the said Act are hereby repealed; but such repeal shall not be construed to affect the pension of any judge who before the passing of this Act has resigned or been retired.

(2) Section 26 of the said Act, as enacted by section 9 of chapter 28 of the statutes of 1913, is amended by striking out the words "sections 24 and 25" and substituting therefor the words "section 24."

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why is section 25 left out? As I understand the amendment, it limits the pension a judge of a Superior Court shall receive after a certain length of service, or after he has reached a certain age, to two-thirds of his salary, but it leaves the law as at present, regarding the right of a judge to retire after a shorter period in case of illness.

I am inclined to think there is a great deal of good sense in the amendment which has been made by the Senate. If the country provides that after a reasonable term of service a judge may retire with two-thirds of his salary, and enjoy the leisure a judge is no doubt entitled to enjoy upon retirement, the country would be treating him with a fair measure of justice, and I, for one, would be disposed to support the amendment which has been made by the Senate.

Mr. MACDONALD: I agree with my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). There are instances throughout the country where judges have reached the age when it is known to the Bar they are not able to give that full service to the country which ought to be expected from them, but they carry on a little longer than they otherwise would with the hope of getting their full salary on retirement. One does not need to particularize these cases, because I am quite sure hon. gentlemen know of them. This is not a desirable state of affairs. It is a good rule and in the interests of the country, and would be more satisfactory in the administration of justice, that judges should retire after the period of service fixed by the Act, with the certainty of getting two-thirds of their salaries, and that they should not get any more by prolonging their stay upon the Bench. I do not very well see why the Minister of Justice would not accept an amendment of that kind.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The amendment which it is now sought to strike out of the Judges Act was introduced, I think, in 1908, and there was a subsequent amendment in 1913. The considerations upon which that legislation was submitted to Parliament were very much along the line just placed before the House by my hon. friend from St. John and my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). It was supposed that the operation of the Act in question would bring about the retirement of judges after a certain period, and under conditions when that retirement might be considered to be in the public interest; that is to say, it was believed at that time, whether rightly or wrongly, that a judge sometimes continued in the discharge of his judicial duties for a longer period than was consistent with the public interest because of his desire to retain his full salary by continuing in office, which desire, from his standpoint, might have been emphasized by the condition of his personal affairs. Then it was supposed that if a judge had given a certain service, or reached a certain age, and if he was in a position to retire upon his full salary, a condition then thought undesirable would be remedied, and the very thing which my hon. friends desire to avoid would be avoided. I am not at all confident that the operation of the statute has been precisely along the lines anticipated when this 4 p.m. legislation was first introduced, and I believe there is good reason for reconsidering it. At the same time, I do not think it can be reconsidered in precisely the form which has been suggested, nor do I think it desirable that we should undertake the revision of the Act by the method which is suggested here, namely, an amendment to a Bill of this character. We must remember that one of the most important principles with regard to the independence of judges—and no one could overrate the importance of that consideration—is permanence of tenure of office during good behaviour, and fixity of remuneration. It is therefore apparent that continued or repeated changing of the salaries of judges, or of the pensions to which they become entitled upon their retirement, is undesirable. For that reason also, I think it important that the principle of the amendment and the method of the amendment should be very carefully considered, and that it would hardly do for this House, with the hurried consideration we can give the matter at present, to deal with so important a subject now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not rise to a point of order, but so far as my experience goes, when a Bill comes amended from the Senate, the question is first put upon one amendment, then upon the second, then upon the third, because the House may concur in one, and not in another.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will look up the point. As I view it at present, I think it is open for the House to concur in or reject the amendments as a whole. In any event, the motion is in respect of the first amendment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my right hon. friend is perfectly correct, as a matter of procedure. We are proceeding with the amendments one by one. There are five different sections added to the Bill, and we are taking them one after another. I think the matter had better be postponed, for another reason. When we do not concur in an amendment made by the Senate to one of our Bills, it is usual that we should accompany the non-concurrence with the reasons. My hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) has stated the reasons in his observations, but it seems to me, practice requires that they should be more formally stated, and should be embodied in the motion presented to the House. I would therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the matter be taken up on another day, when the motion would embody the reasons which would lead the House to the conclusion that the amendments be not concurred in. What I say would apply to the section as to which we have already expressed non-concurrence—that is it should be regarded as still open, for the purpose I have mentioned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

MILITARY VOTERS ACT, 1917.

SENATE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved: That the House do concur in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917. He said: The first amendment is to section 1 and consists in striking out the adjective "complete" before the word demobilization. That refers to the application of this Bill.

The next amendment is to section 2 paragraph (c) and corrects the name of the Royal Naval Air Service. The words "aviation service" had been used in the Bill.

Then there is a group of amendments made in order to place an officer in the same position as a private with reference to his discharge from the army. An officer is not discharged, but is either permitted to resign or his services are dispensed with.

There is an amendment to section 2 striking out the word "other" which had evidently crept in through a printer's error.

There is an amendment to section 13 dealing with the duties of the returning officer as to sending his report to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. As the Bill left this House that section provided that he should do this after the sixth day after he had made his final addition. The amendment of the Senate consists of inserting the word "immediately" before the word "after." There is no doubt that was the intention, and the insertion of the word "immediately" makes that clear.

Amendments concurred in.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

SENATE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY moved: That the House do concur in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 53, respecting Insurance. He said: The only amendment is to paragraph (h) of section 134. That paragraph, as it left this House, provided that if the policy provides that written notice of injury must be given to the company within a specified period after the date of the accident causing such injury, such period shall be not less than thirty days.

The Senate has amended that section by substituting "20" for "30." That is the sole amendment.

Amendment concurred in.

SALARIES OF RAILWAY COMPANY EMPLOYEES.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved: That the House proceed to Public Bills and Orders, for the purpose of taking up Order 37, Bill 103, from the Senate, concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies. He said: This Bill has been passed on previous occasion by this House, but was rejected by the Senate. It has now been passed by the Senate and sent down to us. The provisions have relation to the wages or salaries of persons employed on railways. These provisions are embodied in the Railway Act which is now before the Senate. I sincerely hope that Bill will pass the Senate, although there is some controversy about certain clauses. If that Bill should not be passed by the Senate, it is desirable that the measure before us should be passed by this House, and for that reason I desire to take it up to-day.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden Bill 103 concerning the salaries or wages of employees of railway companies, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—R.S., c. 37; a. 259 amended. Payment of wages.

Mr. CARVELL: This Bill seems to be an exact counterpart of a section which we added to the Consolidated Railway Act, which provides that the employee shall be paid semi-monthly. I am heartily in sympathy with the provision.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In case the Railway Bill should not pass the Senate, I think it is desirable this legislation should be enacted, but I shall not move the third reading of it at present, in the hope that the Railway Bill will pass the Senate, because it would be undesirable to have the same enactment in two different Bills.

Mr. CARVELL: I feel that it would be a great misfortune if the Consolidated Railway Bill did not get through the Senate, especially as I understand there is no question about the provisions of that Bill, excepting two matters, which are very largely—I was going to say—personal and local affairs. One of these matters is some sort of a quarrel between the Hydro-Electric in Ontario, and the Toronto Electric Light Company and the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. The other difference is between the Bell Telephone Company and the Independent Telephone Companies. The special railway committee occupied six or seven weeks in considering this measure, and representatives of labour unions and other interests in Canada attended the meetings of this committee and took part in the discussion, and I think it would be a great misfortune if all the time and labour of the special railway committee and of these gentlemen representing other interests should go for naught, and that the Bill should not become law. I simply opposed these clauses as a matter of principle and had no personal interest, but if it should turn out that these two clauses were the only hitch, surely they will drop them and let us have the Bill, because I think there were very many important changes embodied in that measure which the business of this country demands. Nothing has happened in my somewhat lengthy Parliamentary career that has pleased me any more than the sense of public duty which seemed to inspire the special committee of this House which considered that Bill. There were no politics in it. I never saw an instance, from the beginning to the end, where political feeling played the faintest part in the consideration of the measure. Every one was actuated by the desire to make that Bill as perfect and workable as possible, and the underlying principle of the whole Bill was that wherever there was a question of dispute between corporations and the public, it was invariably left to the Railway Board to decide, and while I do not know that they want any bouquets or compliments from me, I may say that I think the Railway Board to-day is an institution of which this country should be proud. I feel that we are safe in leaving disputed matters to a board of that kind, and, therefore, if the Senate cannot agree on those two clauses, I hope an arrangement will be made by which the remainder of the Bill will become law, and those two matters can be taken up next session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I agree with the hon. gentleman in regard to the good service rendered to the country by the Board of Railway Commissioners. It is beyond question that the members of the board are inspired by a strong sense of public duty, and give the best of their energy and ability to the work with which they are charged. It would be a great pity if the work of the special committee, which reported the Railway Bill to the House, should be lost. I am very glad to hear what my hon. friend has said of the work of that committee. It is entirely in accordance with what I have heard from other sources. It is most desirable that the Bill should be passed. I can assure my hon. friend that I have impressed that point as strongly as is in my power upon those now dealing with the Bill. It is my hope that it may get through. If it should not pass, it is important that this provision, and possibly one or two other provisions which were inserted in the Railway Bill, should become law. I do not think any explanation of the provisions of the Bill before us is required. It is a very simple Bill.

Section agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day. This is in order that some additional provisions which are not controversial in the Senate may be considered and perhaps added to the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

SUPPLY.

CLAIMS UNDER PELAGIC SEALING TREATY.—VICTORIA, B.C. SEALING COMPANY.

On motion of Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for Committee of Supply:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I take advantage of this motion, Mr. Speaker, to bring to the attention of the House a matter of very great importance. I should have brought the matter up earlier in the session had it not been for the fact that upon previous occasions when the House was going into Committee of Supply I was unable to arrange with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. J. D. Hazen) for a discussion of the matter upon days convenient either to him or to myself. In this respect I do not blame the minister, whose department the matter specially affects. He spoke to me last week expressing his desire that the question should be discussed, and regretting that personal reasons compelled him to leave here on Saturday.

The matter which I desire to bring to the attention of the House is the right of the Victoria Sealing Company, of British Columbia, composing nine-tenths of the people engaged in the sealing industry in Canada, to participate in the fund which is to-day in the hands of the Government as a result of the Pelagic Sealing Treaty which was entered into at Washington on July 7, 1911. In order that the House may fully understand the matter, it will be necessary for me to read from public documents at some length, but in a comprehensive way I shall state at the beginning the facts of the case.

On the date which I have mentioned there was a gathering at Washington of representatives of the United States, Russia, Japan, and Canada—the latter acting on behalf of Great Britain—and there was entered into what is known as the Pelagic Sealing Treaty. Under that treaty, in consideration of British subjects giving up the right to sealing in the Pacific ocean, Canada was to receive a certain percentage of the value of the seal skins taken by the United States, Russia, and Japan at their respective rookeries in the Northern Pacific. The treaty was for a period of fifteen years from December 15, 1911, or so long thereafter as the treaty should not be terminated by either one of the contracting parties giving twelve months' notice of their desire to bring it to a conclusion. For the period of fifteen years British subjects refrained from engaging in pelagic sealing, and there will be paid to Canada in respect of that period an amount approximating $7,250,000. Already $200,000 have been paid by the United States to Canada on account of the amount payable to Canada as a compensation for her refraining from engaging in the sealing industry. There existed in British Columbia at that time what was known as the Victoria Sealing Company, which had been formed in the year 1900 by British Columbia sealers, all British subjects engaged in the sealing industry. This company controlled 43 out of the 46 vessels on the Pacific coast engaged in the sealing industry.

The money received by the Government of Canada under the treaty mentioned was not to go into the treasury, but to compensate those who had been engaged in the industry, and who, by reason of Canada's undertaking, were prevented from further engaging in this very profitable means of earning money and of developing an industry. Out of that $200,000 there has been paid out, as the result of certain recommendations made by Mr. Justice Audette, the sum of $60,000; the balance is in the hands of the Government. That amount of approximately $60,000 was not paid to the company to which I have referred; they claim that it should have been paid to them. Under the facts which I propose to present, I submit that this Government should provide for the payment of that money to the Victoria Sealing Company. Not only should the remainder of the amount received be paid over to them, but also whatever amount should be arrived at, upon a proper assessment of damages based upon those considerations, not purely of law, but of equity and fair dealing, which, according to our legal authorities, bind the Government in their dealings with subjects in cases of this kind.

The complaint is that the Government retain that money, and apparently propose to retain future moneys paid in on that account, without any regard to these owners of 43 vessels which had been engaged in the sealing industry. I wish to press upon the Government the wisdom of providing for an assessment of damages. Had we been able to bring the matter to the attention of the House at an earlier date, which unfortunately we were not for the reasons

I have mentioned, we should have asked the Government to provide that the matter be left to a committee of the House for investigation. Or, if that were not done, a tribunal might be constituted to assess the damages on the basis I have stated.

That the House may be properly seized of the facts, I may be permitted to give some general information upon the subject. By a Treaty between Her late Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, an agreement was come to whereby the matters in dispute between the two powers relating to the Behring sea fisheries were submitted to a tribunal which met at Paris in 1893. On that tribunal Great Britain was represented by the late Lord Hannen and the late Sir John Thompson, then Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada; the late Sir Charles Russell, former English Attorney General, and afterwards Lord Chief Justice of England, and Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, who at that time was Minister of Marine and Fisheries of the Canadian Government, were counsel for the British Government. The claim put forward on behalf of the United States at that time was to the effect that the Behring sea was a "mare clausum," or closed sea, and that, therefore, the British sealers had no right to fish there. Having regard to the principles of maritime law which applied to different nations as to seas which were known as closed seas within the terms of international law, power was given to the Paris tribunal to decide the question, and it was also agreed, in the event of their denying the claim of the United States, that they should make such regulations as they might deem advisable for the preservation and protection of the Behring sea seal fisheries.

The events which led up to the arbitration are: The sealing industry of British Columbia began in 1873 by the fitting out of a few vessels for hunting seals in the North Pacific ocean and the Behring sea. It gradually grew in importance until, at the time of the Paris arbitration, there were 59 sealing vessels sailing out of the port of Victoria, and the industry supplied occupation and profit to some 1,500 people. During the period above-mentioned, the only other people who engaged in seal fishing in the Behring sea to any extent were subjects of the United States. There was, however, a considerable difference in the manner of killing the seals as between British subjects and the citizens of the United States. I do not want to go into the details of pelagic sealing, but it is necessary for the purpose of understanding the matter to know that the seals have their "rookeries" on shore, to which they resort for breeding purposes, and none of these rookeries are situate in British territory, but are situate in the territories of the United States, Japan and Russia. The British sealers, therefore, were obliged to pursue their industry entirely on the high seas, whereas the American sealers did most of their killing on land, the privilege of doing which the United States Government leased to certain of its citizens, just as we give canning licenses to men who engage in the lobster industry or fishing licenses to those who engage in that industry. In the year 1886 armed revenue cutters of the United States began to seize all British sealers operating in the Behring sea, and the British sealers appealing for protection, their right to pursue their calling on the high seas was supported by the British Government. Diplomatic negotiations took place with the United States Government, and in the year 1891 a temporary modus vivendi was arrived at whereby a partial and temporary prohibition of sealing on the high seas was agreed to, somewhat similar to the permanent prohibition which was finally determined by the arrangement at Washington in 1911. At that time the position taken by Great Britain was expressed by the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, then the leader of the British House of Commons, who, in announcing to the House the arrangement arrived at, said:

> I am going to do a friendly act in the interests of a friendly power, but if I do that and interfere with certain men and their business, I shall pay compensation out of the British Exchequer, upon proof being made to the commissioner as to how far they have been affected by that partial prohibition.

At that period of our history in connection with this question, the British Government laid down the proposition that the parties who had been engaged in this industry, the continuance of which was interfered with by arrangements with a foreign power, should, in equity and right, receive compensation by reason of the fact that they were debarred for the time being from pursuing their lawful occupation. The result was that following the policy announced by Mr. Smith, the sum of $200,000 was paid out of the British Exchequer to the Victoria sealers as compensation for the partial and temporary prohibition which involved the loss, in the year 1892, of a portion of the sealing season to them. The significance and importance of this Act on the part of the British Government, having regard to the present situation, cannot be too strongly emphasized, because it settles beyond all question the fact that the policy of the Imperial Government was to admit the right of compensation to those temporarily debarred from pursuing their lawful business.

In 1893 the Paris tribunal met, and the right of the British sealers to fish in the Behring sea was sustained. The contention of the United States that the Behring sea was a closed sea was held not to be correct, and compensation for the illegal seizure of British ships by the American revenue cutters was later assessed and paid by the United States. The total compensation awarded amounted to the sum of $425,000, all of which was paid by the United States Government, and afterwards paid by the British Government to the men who were engaged in the sealing industry in Victoria, B.C. Although in this case the compensation related to illegal seizures, we have the recognition of the right of compensation to people engaged in this industry as a result of their being deprived for a time of the opportunity of engaging in it. In consequence of what was called the Paris Award, certain regulations were drawn up and promulgated by the tribunal whereby a close season for sealing was established, also a protected zone of sixty miles radius from the Pribyloff islands, where lay the American rookeries, within which sealing on the high seas, or, as it is called, pelagic sealing, was entirely prohibited. This prohibited zone covered the whole waters of the North Pacific within which it was possible for seals to be found in paying numbers, and embraced an area of some 5,000,000 square miles of open ocean. The regulations also prohibited the use of guns in killing the seals, and allowed spears only, and made sundry rules greatly to the detriment of the Canadian sealers. Lord Hannen, one of the British representatives, assented with great reluctance to those regulations, but Sir John Thompson, also a member of the tribunal, declined to sign or be a party to the terms of the regulations as they had been recommended. Those who were in the sealing business in Victoria endeavoured to continue their business in spite of these regulations, and in the year 1900 they formed themselves into what is known as the Victoria Sealing Company in order to effect economies in operation. But in spite of this, it was impossible to carry on the industry with profit, and it gradually dwindled until 1908 when four vessels, not included in the Victoria Sealing Company, which began sealing in 1903, prepared to defy all regulations and restrictions and did, in fact, carry on sealing operations in systematic defiance of the regulations until 1911, after which British ships ceased to leave the port of Victoria for the sealing grounds and the old British industry of sealing on the high seas became a thing of the past—killed by regulations.

It is important at this juncture to note that the exception to which I have just referred, namely, those four vessels which continued to engage in the sealing business in defiance of the regulations, as I am instructed, are the only four which have received any compensation as the result of the inquiry of Mr. Justice Audette, which fact naturally would strike one as being amomalous in a great many ways. Of course, on the face of it, they were legally engaged in sealing, but actually they were engaged in sealing contrary to the regulations which had been promulgated by the Paris Tribunal. The Victoria Sealing Company, which had their vessels tied up at the wharf because they were observing the regulations, are the very people who have not received any compensation.

Up to the time of the regulations the Japanese had not engaged in pelagic sealing, but seeing the advantage that they, as outsiders not being parties to or bound by the regulations, would have in sealing in the prohibited zone around the Pribyloff islands and the coasts of British Columbia, they at once started to seal there with such persistency, encouraged and bonused by their own Government, that the seals were in danger of being exterminated if the sealing were not stopped. In 1897, the United States Government, fully appreciating the futility of the regulations owing principally to the action of the Japanese, sought the help of the British Government to put an end altogether to sealing on the high seas in the Behring Sea.

It will be recalled that about this time there were other questions of dispute between Canada and the United States, and a conference was held in the city of Quebec in the year 1897, at which among other things the Alaskan boundary, the tariff, and other questions were discussed. The Imperial Government in that year delegated to the Canadian Government the task of representing them in their negotiations with the United States in regard to the settlement of all these international questions, and it is a matter of history that that was the first occasion on which the British Government had ever committed to Canada the right to carry on negotiations on her behalf. These negotiations in the past had always been conducted by direct representatives of the Imperial Government. There was a long-continued period of negotiations in 1897 which culminated in the Pelagic Sealing Treaty made in Washington on the 7th of July, 1911, between representatives of the United States, Russia, Japan and Canada as representing Great Britain, whereby Canada in consideration of British subjects in this country and in other parts of the Empire giving up the right of sealing on the high seas, was to receive a certain percentage of the seal skins taken by the United States, Russia and Japan during a period of fifteen years. It is estimated, and I think the amount is correct, that under that agreement Canada will receive $7,250,000 in the fifteen years. Shortly after the treaty was made, the United States made an advance payment of $200,000.

In order that hon. gentlemen may fully understand the exact position of the Victoria Sealing Company it is necessary for me to go back a little in order to connect up my argument. It will be remembered that the Canadian Government had from the very beginning of the negotiations in 1894 insisted that a great injustice was being done to the Victoria sealers, and when the United States took up with Canada the question of the abolition of sealing on the high seas, the Canadian Government at once asserted the right to compensation of the sealers engaged. A joint high commission of representatives of Canada and the United States to deal with the various questions at issue between the United States and Great Britain was then appointed and met at Quebec.

At the same time, to show the importance of the sealing industry, a valuation was made by an appraiser named Captain Taylor, of Halifax, N.S., on behalf of the Canadian Government, of the vessels and outfits of the Canadian sealers with a view to compensating them for the loss of their industry. Captain Taylor arrived at a valuation of $553,129.70, and on that valuation being placed before the Joint High Commission on their re-assembling in Washington, the American representatives made an offer to Sir Louis Davies, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that our sealers should retain their vessels and outfits and receive from the United States the sum of $450,000 for the loss of their business. On the recommendation of Sir Louis Davies the sealers of Victoria agreed to accept this amount, but the agreement was not carried out, because a discussion arose as to the delimitation of the Alaska boundary on which the commissioners could not agree. Diplomatic negotiations dragged on for some years, and the Victoria sealers in the meantime at the instigation, or at all events with the full knowledge of the Canadian Government, continued to send out a few vessels from Victoria every year for the purpose of keeping the question alive pending the final settlement of the question of compensation with the United States.

In 1909 the question of the abolition of ocean sealing was taken up again, with the result that the Imperial authorities in March of that year sought the opinion of the Canadian Government, who replied on March 20 through Earl Grey, then Governor General of Canada, that they would be willing to agree to such abolition on condition that compensation be paid to the Canadian sealers by the United States. In January, 1909, the British Ambassador at Washington, writing to the Governor General of the day, as to communications with the United States Government, speaks of compensation being paid to Canada in consideration of the discontinuance of sealing by the British Columbia vessels for a certain period. Now manifestly the only reason that Canada has received this $200,000, which is a first payment of the amount she is to receive during the period of fifteen years under the agreement, is that somebody is to be compensated for the loss of business brought about by the observance of these regulations. This money was not given to Canada for the purpose of going into the Canadian treasury. It was given for the purpose of enabling this Government to compensate the people engaged in the sealing industry.

Two months after this date, in 1909, Earl Grey cabled to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as follows:

> In answer to your telegram March 27, Ministers adhere to position that they are ready to enter into agreement for suspension of pelagic sealing on condition that compensation will be given to Canadian sealers by the United States, who are owners of Pribyloff and other islands known as seal rookeries.

Later on in that year, the Governor-General, when in Victoria, was waited upon by a deputation of sealers in regard to the matter. Earl Grey intimated at that time that he desired to inquire what was the minimum amount the sealers would accept as compensations, and whether they would agree to be paid in instalments extending over a term of years. The sealers replied that they would accept the sum of $500,000 spread over a term of years, provided the payments bore interest. The Governor General asked them to put these terms in writing. Accordingly this was done in the autumn of 1909, and this understanding was made the basis of the negotiations which culminated in the agreement of 1911.

I am troubling the House with these details for the purpose of endeavouring to satisfy the Government, from information which seems to me to be unquestionable, that were it not for the fact that the Victoria Sealing Company had these vessels and were working in touch with the Canadian Government, giving statements as to what they would be willing to settle for, the negotiations in regard to this matter which terminated in the international arrangement of 1911 would not have been gone on with. It will be noticed in this connection that the suggestion made by Earl Grey was that the terms of compensation were not necessarily based upon a definite specific amount, but, in view of the arrangement which was afterwards made, by which the payments made by the United States Government were to be yearly for a period of fifteen years. His Excellency at that time contemplated that the sealers would receive payments yearly as the payments came from the United States. Matters remained in that position, with the Victoria Sealing Company, owning these vessels, sailing such a number of them as the Canadian Minister of Marine and Fisheries deemed proper for the purpose of keeping their rights. From the further data before us it will be seen that in 1911, when the negotiations were on, the whole question of compensation was coming to a head and the conclusion was to be arrived at as to what the compensation was to be. In that particular year no sealers left Victoria, B.C., because no one knew what was going to be done in the way of settlement, and matters therefore remained in statu quo. It is urged that because in 1910 and 1911 none of these sealing vessels which were at the wharf prepared to go out did go out as a matter of fact, they were not entitled to receive the money. In view of the history I have detailed of the facts and circumstances in connection with this, it will readily be seen that the dealers understanding their position at that time would not have been justified in going out, as they probably would have thrown an apple of discord into the whole question, in view of the negotiations which were going on at Washington. The treaty was entered into on February 7, 1911, and the Pelagic Sealing Treaty was finally consummated on July 7, 1911. Previous to that, there is on record as a public document a letter which was written by the Prime Minister of the day 'Sir Wilfrid Laurier), now the leader of the Opposition, to Sir Joseph Pope who represented Canada in connection with these negotiations. It is important in a matter of this kind, which does not involve any question of internal politics, but which was more a matter of international arrangement, to see the position taken by the Premier of the day upon the question. He writes to Sir Joseph Pope on May 8, 1911:

Prime Minister's Office, Canada,

Ottawa, May 8, 1911.

Sir:—

The Governor in Council having designated you as the Canadian delegate to the International Conference shortly to meet at Washington, with a view to concerting measures for the protection and preservation of the fur seal in the North Pacific Ocean, I think it well to address to you a few confidential observations for your general guidance.

Canada, having, by separate treaty recently entered into with the United States, accepted the principle involved in assenting to a temporary cessation of Pelagic Sealing within a circumscribed area in return for a pecuniary consideration, your attitude towards proposals for an extension of this agreement to cover the Asiatic side of the North Pacific Ocean should be that taken in the prior negotiations, namely, that Canada is prepared to abstain from the exercise of her undoubted right, only in return for adequate consideration.

You will not fail to impress upon the members of the Conference that Canada's relation towards this differs essentially from that of the United States, Russia, and Japan. They as rookery-owning powers, are naturally desirous to suppress sealing at sea, and thereby enhance the value of their property on land. Canada's interests, on the other hand, lie wholly in the ocean. Any general agreement between the powers for the suppression of pelagic sealing should therefore provide for the admission of Canada to a share in the land-take on the Russian and Japanese Islands. You are aware that in a conference between Russia and Canada, which took place in London in 1904, the Russian government, through its representative, formally declared itself willing to join the United States in making such compensation to Canada.

You will keep me fully informed of the course of the discussions and of the progress of events. Before agreeing to any arrangement of a binding character, you will communicate with me the proposals in which you are invited to concur, and await instruction from this Government.

You are at liberty to show this letter to Mr. Bryce.

I have, &c.,

Wilfrid Laurier.

The doctrine that was at the basis of the negotiations was that Canada should have compensation for the men who 5 p.m. were engaged in the industry. In the Minutes of the Privy Council of Canada of May 10, the following words occur:

> The minister further submits that any agenda paper of this conference should recognize Great Britain's exceptional position as a non-rookery-owning power, by including within the scope of the discussions the question of compensation to Canada for temporarily foregoing pelagic sealing in the interests of the powers owning rookeries.

We come now to the point where the treaty was made, and where this arrangement, involving $7,250,000 for fifteen years, and a payment of $200,000 into the hands of the Canadian Government, was determined upon, for the purpose, not of compensating Canada for anything, because the Canadian Government was not making any particular loss, but her citizens who were engaged in the industry and who were making a loss because they were prevented from further engaging in the industry. It is true the Canadian Government, representing the people of Canada, would be entitled to receive some compensation over and above what went to those who were actually deprived of their occupation, having regard to the fact that others of her citizens would be prevented from engaging in that industry for the balance of the period, but that fact alone does not mean that the Canadian Government should put the money, metaphorically speaking, into its own pocket, and say that those who had been engaged in the industry and created the condition under which it was possible to get this award should not receive a cent. That, however, is the way we are regarding this matter.

The change of government in Canada, coming in 1911, the matter was taken up by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who proposed to determine this question by having an inquiry made by Mr. Justice Audette, of the Exchequer Court. It will be remembered that the Victoria Sealing Company, which term I use as covering 43 out of the 46 vessels engaged in the industry—although I think the number of 43 was somewhat decreased before the inquiry was held—at the period when the compensation was fixed by the United States Government, comprising nine-tenths of the people engaged in the industry, were continuously pressing the matter upon the attention of the Government and urging their right to be compensated. The course taken by the Government was that on June 10, 1913, they passed on Order in Council, which recited the following important facts:

> Under the Pelagic Sealing Treaty of the 7th of July, 1911, between Great Britain, the United States, Japan, and Russia, the nationals of these countries are prohibited for a period of 15 years, from the 15th of December, 1911, from engaging in Pelagic sealing or the hunting of seal otters in that portion of the North Pacific Ocean north of the 30th Parallel of North Latitude, including the seas of Behring, Kanchatka, Ohkotska, and Japan, beyond three miles from the shore lines of their respective countries, also the ports, harbours, and territory of these nations are closed to any vessel or person for any purpose connected with the Pelagic Sealing in the waters mentioned, during the term of the Treaty. That by the Paris Award regulations of 1893, which were made effective by Imperial and United States legislation in 1894, serious restrictions were imposed upon the operations of British and United States pelagic sealers, which restrictions, it is represented, made the business so unprofitable that several Canadian pelagic sealers and sealing vessels were forced to abandon the industry.

That recital is a most significant one, because the Government, by Order in Council, recognized that the effect of these Paris regulations was to prevent the engaging in the sealing business of those who formed the Victoria Sealing Company and who were the real sealers on the coast. It goes on:

> That certain Canadian citizens claim to have been damnified by the above mentioned treaty and regulations, and to be entitled to compensation:
> That it is desirable that a thorough investigation of all claims flowing from or arising out of the Pelagic Sealing Treaty and the Paris regulations aforementioned should be made:
> The Minister therefore recommends that Honourable Louis Arthur Audette, Assistant Judge of the Exchequer Court, be appointed a commissioner under chapter 104 of the Revised Statutes of Canada for the purpose of investigating all such claims; that for said purpose he be authorized to receive claims, to take evidence in regard thereto, to hear counsel on behalf of the claimants, if such claimants so desire, as well as on behalf of the Crown, if it be decided that the Crown should be represented by counsel; that the said Commissioner be authorized to visit British Columbia and such other places as he may deem necessary for the purpose hereof, and that as soon as possible thereafter the said commissioner report to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries his proceedings under said commission, together with the evidence and his opinion, having regard to the said treaty and regulations, and the evidence of each case as to what person or persons, if any, is or are entitled to be paid compensation by the Crown for damage resulting from such treaty or regulations, and what amount each of such persons is entitled to be so paid.

It will be noticed that while His Lordship Mr. Justice Audette was created a commissioner under the Inquiries Act, his powers were those simply of making inquiry and reporting to the Government; not of making a decisive award in any way, but simply expressing his opinion. And in the commission which was issued to him he was directed:

> To report to our Minister of Marine and Fisheries of Canada—

Not to the Government.

> —the result of your investigation, together with the evidence taken before you and any opinion you may see fit to express thereon, as provided by the said Order in Council—

The result was that Mr. Justice Audette had power to make inquiry into this matter, which covered a long period and necessarily embraced a lot of detail. As is evidenced by his report, it seems as if every Indian on the coast had put in a claim in connection with this matter, and a perusal of the list of names found in his report indicates that it was eminently proper that some inquiry should be made. The point I wish to make is that I do not think the Order in Council or the commission to Mr. Justice Audette empowered him to deal with this question in such a way as to finally dispose of the rights of those claimants or as to absolutely bind the Government by his decision. His opinion only, upon certain questions, was what the Government desired. He proceeded to make this inquiry. He was appointed in 1913, and he did not report until 1916. Indeed, the correspondence under my hand shows that Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, counsel for the claimants, the Victoria Sealing Company, never received a copy of the opinion of Mr. Justice Audette until the summer of 1916. The commission came to Victoria in July, 1913, December, 1913, and July, 1914, and it was asserted by the Victoria sealing people, through their representatives, that the learned judge intimated to them early in the inquiry that he regarded their cases as one which entitled them to compensation, and that the matter was one which should be settled upon the broadest grounds of justice and equity and not on purely technical questions of law. Indeed, the Government appointed Mr. Curran of Montreal to act as counsel for them in connection with the inquiry, and in the report of the proceedings, as I am instructed, Mr. Curran made certain statements with reference to the position of these Victoria sealing people who had been the major influence in this industry at all times and had kept in continued touch with the Government from the very beginning of the whole matter. Mr. Curran, at the sitting of the commission in Victoria and referring to the offer of $450,000 to the Victoria Sealing Company in 1898—and let me again recall the fact that Sir Louis Davies conferred with these very people, who claim they should receive some compensation to-day, when he was dealing with Washington at that time and that amount was fixed—Mr. Curran said:

> I think we may infer that it was intended to distribute the money among the owners of the vessels although the Canadian and the United States Governments did not have anything arranged . . . there was always a chance of a slip occurring. . . At any rate the $450,000 was intended to settle the claims of the members of the Sealing Association.

In other words, of the Victoria Sealing Company. Mr. Curran proceeded:

> So the suggestion I made was that the capital of the company would be recouped to themselves for the losses suffered on account of fortuitous circumstances which I submit would be a fair way of settling the matter. It is not my province to go into that question.

The commissioner at that time made the following remarks:

> It was embodied in the blue books that had it not been for the tenacity of the Victoria Sealing Company remaining in existence Canada would not have been in as good a position to make this treaty with the United States. If they were in business before 1894 it makes a much more meritorious case because they have been interfered with in their walk of life—to my mind that is the very crux of the case. . . . It was the Victoria sealers who made it possible for the Canadian Government to have any say in the matter. They would not have any more say only for them than they would have in Mexico if the sealers had never entered into business or if they had been driven out of it. The Canadian Government would not have had any claim under this last treaty—that is the way I look at it, that the sealers were restricted out of the business and now the Government is getting some money out of that business on their account—which the Government would not have gotten in any other way—the sealers ought to be compensated for the loss they were put to. . . I will find that the regulations were most hurtful to the Canadian sealing industry.

There was used in the hearings a rather curious document emanating from the Marine and Fisheries Department which suggested three or four different ways in which this matter could be settled; and it is important, as this is a public document, a copy of which I have, that we should see what was the view presented in the statement of this case by the gentleman who presented it, an official of the department.

This memorandum was prepared by Mr. Found. He says:

At the time this treaty went into effect (1911) the following four Canadian schooners were engaged in pelagic sealing.

And he gives the names.

These vessels were especially adapted for Pelagic sealing and would be of little use for any other purpose, as they are, owing to the treaty, prevented from continuing in their business, the undersigned submits that the owners thereof are entitled to reasonable compensation.

At the same time that these four schooners which, mark you, were sealing contrary to the regulations and in spite of the law which said they should not seal as I remarked before in dealing with this matter. He goes on and speaks of the Victoria Sealing Company as having 35 vessels laid up in the Victoria harbour, and he gives the names of the vesels in detail. Dealing with this question of their being compensated, he says:

Besides the above vessels there were when the Treaty went into effect 37 sealing schooners laid up in Victoria Harbour; 35 of these belonged to the Victoria Sealing Co., one to Mr. Joseph Boscowitz of Victoria and the other to Mr. Jacobson of Victoria. None of these vessels had engaged in sealing since the season of 1909 and many of them not for several years prior to that. All of them were built or purchased and specially arranged for the express purpose of Pelagic Sealing in the waters covered by the Treaty and each of them has operated in these waters. No doubt they were laid up for a time because their operation was not found to pay; but they could have been made ready to engage in the industry at any time that might be deemed expedient. Under the Treaty however, they are precluded during its pendance from being so used and they are not suitable for other work. However, in view of the International negotiations that have been in progress for many years looking to the cessation of Pelagic Sealing in the North Pacific Ocean and Behring Sea the owners of sealing vessels in British Columbia have had reasonable ground for believing that if they retained their vessels they would be ultimately be compensated therefor. One of the matters before the Joint High Commission in 1898 was a proposal for the cessation of Pelagic Sealing. The Commission with a view to ascertaining the value of the fleet appointed two expert valuators, one from Canada and the other from the United States to go to Victoria and after a through examination of the vessels place a value on them. The Canadian expert valued the entire British Columbia fleet at $1.35 per ton register.

Under all these circumstances the undersigned is of opinion that the owners of these vessels are entitled to compensation though not to the same extent as the owners of those that were actively engaged in the business when the Treaty became effective.

He goes on further to deal with this question.

From a straight business standpoint, in view of the above, it might be urged that the company is really entitled to compensation, as sealing was engaged in because those who went into the industry thought they could make money, and when they ceased to do so, they retired from the field, but it must not be overlooked that the conditions in the present instance are anomalous. In the first place, though there has been no definite promise of compensation to the sealers there has ever since the Joint High Commission in 1898 and for some years before, been a feeling on the part of the sealers that if they would hold on they would be compensated to go out of business.

This is the report of the official of the Marine and Fisheries Department.

And therefore morally there is in the opinion of the undersigned no question but that the company should receive compensation, and that such should be as generous as possible, compatible with conditions.

Then he goes on, and the curious thing about this memoranda is that apparently he prepares three different kinds of reports, making three different recommendations as to the value to be paid.

Mr. BURRELL: What is the date of that?

Mr. MACDONALD: July 7, 1911. It will be noted that that report of Mr. Found was made practically at the time of entering into the treaty, and therefore is of more significance, because those were the conditions under which the treaty was entered into, with the full knowledge and belief that these gentlemen composing the company were going to get compensation. A specific recommendation which he made in regard to that reads:

Article 11 of the Treaty provides for an advance payment by the United States to Great Britain of $200,000 on account of seal skins to which Great Britain is entitled under the Treaty. This money has already been paid over to Canada and can be made available by authority of your Royal Highness for the payment of compensation to those damnified by the Treaty. No doubt the object in securing such advanced payment was to enable the necessary compensation to be paid without drawing on the treasury.

In the opinion of the undersigned, in the light of the conditions obtaining such sum will provide liberal compensation to those directly affected by the Treaty and should not therefore be exceeded.

The undersigned has therefore the honour to recommend:

(1) That compensation be paid out of the $200,000 received from the United States government under the Treaty and that the total amount paid in such connection do not exceed that sum.

He varies that recommendation by a more liberal interpretation in another part of the report, which I will not read to the House. I am quoting from Mr. Found's statement in regard to the matter, because it proves conclusively that the Government officials in Canada, who had everything to do with the question of working out this treaty arrangement, recognize unequivocally, as between man and man, according to the principles of morality, equity, and justice as administered by a court of law, that the Victoria Sealing Company were entitled, upon that basis, to receive compensation. There can be no manner of doubt about that.

Now, Mr. Justice Audette acting as a commissioner, finally made a report on this matter, after long delay, on the 10th day of January, 1916. It is complained on behalf of the sealing company, and on behalf of Sir Hibbert Tupper, that the first knowledge he received of the finding of Mr. Justice Audette or his opinion rather, was some statement in a fishing magazine, at any rate, it was not until the summer of last year that they were able to get the document printed in answer to a return in this House. He deals with the various classes of cases that were submitted to him. He divides that classification submitted to him into four. Therefore, it may be stated that he disposes of the sum of $60,000 out of $200,000, but he declines to give any sum to the sealing company as compensation, notwithstanding the facts I have mentioned in detail to the House in regard to the whole question. He says:

> Having thus passed in review the general heads of complaint put forward by the sealers against the regulations, and approaching the consideration of this claim in a spirit of justice connoting the idea of doing what in equity and good conscience is fair and just, and after giving this branch of the commission special care and labour, as it involved both large amounts and a large number of claimants, I have come to the conclusion and find that the Canadian sealers are not entitled to be paid any compensation by the Crown for alleged damage resulting from the said regulations.

Of course, his opinion is nothing more than an opinion, because no jurisdiction, authority, or power, was conferred upon Judge Audette to make any final decision in the matter. It is in accordance with that opinion, which was afterwards affirmed by an Order in Council made by the Government last year, that I appeal to the Government and this House to look into this matter, and deal with it upon the broadest principles, and upon the most generous lines.

It seems to me that one cannot look over these facts presented here and say that the Government can be doing their full duty if they disregard the fact that this money came into their hands simply as trustees for Canadian citizens.

It is not the money of the Government of Canada; the Government holds it in trust for those who were entitled to compensation and who were damnified in any way by the operation of these regulations.

The learned judge based his conclusion that the Victoria Sealing Company was not entitled to compensation upon several grounds. First, he said that the provisions of the Paris regulations were analogous to any other restrictions imposed upon an industry by a State for the benefit of all those engaged in the industry. He says in effect that the men engaged in the sealing industry have no more right to complain of the Paris regulations than men engaged in the salmon or lobster industry have a right to complain about a change made in the fishing season. I submit that that is very narrow ground to take on an international question. To say that matters affecting the interests of people engaged in this international industry should be settled on the same basis as matters affecting people engaged in an industry such as lobster fishing, which is carried on only during certain months of the year, is hardly taking broad grounds. I do not think that Sir John Thompson, Lord Justice Hannen, Sir Charles Russell and Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, when they sat in Paris and promulgated these regulations, were looking at this matter from that viewpoint. Matters affecting those engaged in this international industry ought to be settled on the same high plane as that taken by the plenipotentiaries of the great powers who met first in Paris and afterwards in Washington.

The learned judge stated as a second reason for his conclusion that the Paris regulations did not provide for any compensation to the sealers. This was primarily the reason why the Canadian Government insisted at the 1911 conference at Washington that the compensation should be given. It was because these Paris regulations provided for no compensation that Sir John Thompson objected to their being put in operation. The Government of the day, as shown in the letter that I read from the then Prime Minister, Sir Joseph Pope, pointed out that no arrangement could be made except on the basis of compensation. These Paris regulations were passed in the interests of the United States sealing people. When in 1911 the matter was being dealt with, it was suggested that, the industry having suffered on account of these regulations, some compensation should be provided.

The learned judge, in his opinion, said further that the sealers had no legal rights that could be enforced against the Crown. That, of course, is a legal truism. But the relation between Sovereign and subject is put very clearly in the illuminating judgments given in England in a case having relation to a treaty under which money was to be similarly disposed of. The judgments are those of Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Lush in the well-known case of Rustomjee vs. the Queen in the Exchequer Court of England, and, on appeal, of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge. Chief Justice Cockburn said:

> The effect of the . . . treaty—

He is referring not to the Pelagic Sealing Treaty, but to another.

> —is . . . simply this, that it places the fund at the disposition of Her Majesty for Her Majesty at her discretion to cause distribution of it to be made as shall make good the claims which her subjects have against the foreigner from whose Government the money is received.

Mr. Justice Lush said:

> No doubt a duty arose as soon as the money was received to distribute that money amongst the persons towards whose losses it was paid . . . ; the distribution when made would be the act of a sovereign in dispensing justice to her subjects. . . For any omission of that duty the sovereign cannot be held responsible. The responsibility would rest with the advisers of the Crown, and they are responsible to Parliament and to Parliament alone.

And lastly on appeal, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge said:

> We do not doubt that on the payment of the money . . . there was a duty on the part of the English Sovereign to administer the money so received according to the stipulations of the treaty. But it was a duty to do justice to her subjects according to the advice of her responsible ministers.

These are the principles upon which funds of this kind were disposed of, according to English decision; and these are the principles which should guide the Canadian Government in dealing with this question. I again assert that the money which the Government have received and which they will receive from time to time during the next fifteen years is not the property of the Government of Canada per se; it is in their possession as trustees along the line of the decisions to which I have referred.

It must be borne in mind that if it had not been for the Victoria Sealing Company, the Canadian Government would have had no claim to compensation. Besides those owned by the company, only four vessels, operated by Japanese and Indians, were engaged in the sealing industry in British Columbia, in defiance of the regulations. I have pointed out that in 1911 the 35 vessels of the company were tied up at the wharf, prevented from sealing on account of these regulations. Had it not been for that fact, the Government of Great Britain would have had no case for compensation in the negotiations at Washington, because there would have been nobody to compensate.

With regard to the opinion of Mr. Justice Audette, I wish to read a telegram sent by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries from Vancouver on May 20, 1913. It is as follows:

> Telegraphic report of Commission re sealers in effect bars out all claims save those affected by treaty 1911. Kindly wire if scope not intended to include the claims of those affected by regulations under Behring Sea Award.

To which the minister replied, on May 21, 1913:

> Telegraphic report incorrect. Commission will enquire into validity of claims under Behring Sea Award and report to Government as to whether or not such claims should be entertained.

So that it was the intention of the commission to consider these claims and to have a report upon them. Then there is various correspondence in which Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper as counsel for the sealers complains that he was not advised as to the filing of the report; that not until it had been brought down in the House last year, during the midsummer, and finally printed had he received a copy.

On February 28, 1916 an Order in Council was passed approving of the opinion given by Mr. Justice Audette. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper came to Ottawa and on November 1, 1916 he advised the Victoria Sealing Company as follows:

> During my visit in Ottawa I had a conversation with the Prime Minister and all I can say is that he seemed favourably disposed, so far as he was personally concerned, to allow a rehearing, but felt it would be necessary to convince the Minister of Marine that the sealers' request be complied with. I think I have already told you the idea the Minister of Marine entertained, viz.: that Audette made an award or a judgment and that this was final.
> I think I successfully pointed out to the Prime Minister that this was not a proper view; that by the Order in Council and Commission Audette was appointed a commissioner to take evidence and if he saw fit, to report with the evidence his opinion.

It would be unfortunate, in a case of this kind, if the Government or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries undertook to hold that Mr. Justice Audette's report on this matter was in the nature of a judgment which was final. It can be readily seen, from the Order in Council which I read and from the commission issued to Mr. Justice Audette, that it was not intended that he should dispose of the matter in the same way as a court would dispose of it, and in the second place, it would be most unfair to those gentlemen who had created a case for the Government in this international matter which had formed the subject of consideration at Paris and Washington, if they were to be told here: There is no appeal from this inquiry; we, the trustees for this money, will not listen to a request from you to be classed as a cestui que trust; we have created a tribunal, and although your claims are based upon the broadest grounds of justice, equity and fair play, yet, we will not consider those matters upon that basis, and we will simply hang upon the decision of Mr. Justice Audette upon the point, and let the matter stand.

The result was that on the 21st of November, 1916, Mr. Adams of the Victoria Sealing Company wrote to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as follows:

On the 26th of April last the Victoria Sealing Company, Ltd., sent you a protest against the findings of Mr. Justice Audette regarding the Sealing Commission, for which he was appointed commissioner. A reply to the petition that a rehearing of the matter be given has never been received by this company, although the shareholders have been anxiously looking for it all this time. Would you kindly let us know whether the petition for a rehearing is to be granted, or whether it is refused.

To this letter the deputy Minister of the Naval Service replied on November 29:

I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 22nd ultimo, calling attention to the protest of the Victoria Sealing Company, Limited, against the findings of Mr. Justice Audette in connection with the Pelagic sealing claims, and the request for a hearing in the way of appeal before the Governor in Council or otherwise.

In reply, I am directed to state that as the claimants were given full opportunity to substantiate their claims before the commissioner, and the award was made in the light of the evidence submitted, it has been decided after careful consideration of the matter, to accept the award of Mr. Justice Audette as a final closing of the case.

Then there is this letter written on December 16 by the Victoria Sealing Company to the deputy Minister of the Naval Service:

Re Victoria Sealing Company.

Sir:—

I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 29th November, 1916. I observe you state that the award was made in the light of evidence submitted and that it has been decided to accept "the award of Mr. Justice Audette" as a final closing of the case. I desire respectfully to call attention to what may possibly have been overlooked in this connection, namely: there has been no award. In this connection I refer to the Order in Council of the 10th June, 1913, which appointed Louis Arthur Audette, assistant judge of the Exchequer Court, "a Commissioner under Chapter 104 of the Revised Statutes of Canada for the purpose of investigating all such claims . . . and that as soon as possible thereafter the said commissioner do report to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries his proceedings under said Commission together with the evidence and his opinion."

I also refer to the Commission which appoints Audette "to be our Commissioner to conduct such enquiry," and again: 'We do hereby require and direct you, our said Commissioner, to report to our Minister of Marine and Fisheries of Canada the result of your investigation together with the evidence taken before you, and any opinion you may see fit to express thereon."

Counsel for the Crown on the opening of the Commission stated he had been "requested by the Dominion Government to represent the Government upon the discussion of these claims before the Commissioner." He added: "I may say at the outset that the Government does not recognize any legal obligation or technical liability"; and again he stated that as a representative of the Government together with those who represented the claimants he hoped they would be able to "give Your Lordship something upon which to base your report and finally to enable the Government to satisfy the claims and compensate those who have been injured by these international enactments."

The Commissioner also on the same occasion said: "I think we have gone beyond the question of liability or rather of legal liability. We know there is no legal liability. My idea is to do what in equity and good conscience would suggest itself. You are more in the bounty and grace of the Crown here than anything else. But you must show some reason why you make a claim and you must have some reason which would appeal to any one on a question of justice and equity.

In matters of much smaller importance when Mr. Justice Audette is acting in the capacity of a judge, there is a provision for an appeal to a higher tribunal, and since in this case he was simply appointed to take the evidence for the information of the Government, and if he deemed fit, to express an opinion, the Victoria Sealing Company, Limited, ventures to press its claim that before the case is finally closed those interested may be permitted to show cause why his opinion should not be adopted by the Government.

To this letter the deputy minister replied at a later date, and, quoting from the Order in Council, said:

In accordance with this, the Commissioner submitted his report and gave his opinion as to the persons entitled to be paid compensation and the amount of such compensation. The Government, after consideration of his report and findings, approved of them by Order in Council of the 28th of February last, and since then those entitled to compensation have received it. As I previously informed you, it has been decided to accept the disposal of the claims that has been made as a final closing of the matter.

Later on, as a result of the intervention of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper on the question, the Prime Minister wrote to Mr. Adams, the secretary-treasurer of the Victoria Sealing Company, on January 6, 1917:

In reply to your letter of the 22nd November last I beg to say that the report of Mr. Justice Audette and the petition for rehearing had been referred to the Hon. Arthur Meighen, Solicitor General, for report.

I have given the facts in the record as they come before me, and apparently the matter is in this position: that the Government have referred it to the Solicitor General for report. I am not here to criticise, and I do not wish to be understood as doing anything but putting before the House and the Government the case in regard to a very important international matter, and to ask the Government to take it into their very serious consideration, because it is a matter that has been the subject of consideration of three international tribunals. We had, first, the Paris tribunal of 1893; then we had the conference in Quebec in 1898, and then we had the final adjustment in 1911, all being based, so far as I can judge from those documents, upon the fact that the Victoria Sealing Company were, in the first instance, the major people in the industry; that they were paid compensation at one period on account of the regulations interfering with them, and that at this later period they were unquestionably prevented from engaging in their business by reason of the regulations based upon the Paris award. Were it not for the fact that they were damaged by reason of the operation of those regulations, the Canadian Government would not have had a case to obtain a single dollar from the American Government, with the exception of what they might have had for those four other isolated vessels which were fishing illegally. It is a curious way in which to dispose of an international trust, to provide for a payment of money to men who disregard the international agreement and fail to compensate those who observed the regulations to which the good faith of the country was pledged, who kept in touch with the Government of the day from time to time, and who dealt with the situation, having regard to those principles upon which international matters should be dealt with.

I submit that the Government ought to regard this question as still open, and take such course as they may deem fit. Once they recognize the existence is a valid claim they should assess what would be considered reasonable damages. The Victoria Sealing Company simply asks that the Government of Canada shall keep faith with them, and that the compensation agreed to in 1898 through Sir Louis Davies, again agreed to in 1909 with Earl Grey, and admitted to be their just due in 1913 by Mr. F. Curran, Crown counsel, before the Royal Commission, shall be paid to them by the Government of Canada as the funds come in from time to time. The company only recently discovered after a long period of time that the Order in Council had been passed.

So the matter stands this way: The Canadian Government, having been entrusted by the Imperial Government for the first time in history with the conduct of negotiations involving a question of foreign policy and justice as between the Crown and its subjects, has exploited the injuries of British subjects to obtain on behalf of those subjects compensation amounting to $7,250,000, and having from time to time over a period of twenty years, by words and acts, given those subjects to understand that they would be fairly and equitably compensated, now turns round like a defaulting trustee and denies any part of that compensation to those on whose behalf they received it.

Had the reasons given in the report of the commissioner been contained in a judgment in a case between subject and subject, there would have been a right of appeal where the grounds of the decision could have been reviewed. That appeal could only turn on the broad principles on which this matter ought to be determined, and not upon any narrow ground, not upon any technical provision of law.

It does seem to me that it would be a disgrace to Canada if, after our dealings on this question with the various nations interested, after utilizing this particular company as one institution which gave us the right to compensation, we should turn round and say to that company: We will pay you nothing because you cannot sue the Crown. The Government should proceed upon the broad principles laid down by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge and the other justices in England in connection with the other treaty to which I have referred. The Government should act in a manner comporting with the dignity of the sources from which this money comes, and comporting with the dignity of the distinguished men who carried on these negotiations. I ask from the Government, who are the custodians of this money, consideration of the request of this company, which I have endeavoured to present, not with any harshness or in any spirit of criticism, but simply as a case which I believe deserves the fairest possible consideration from the Government.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): At six o'clock the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) had just finished presenting to the House a question of some interest, a question which has been discussed here on one or two other occasions. He asked the Government for further consideration of the matter in so far as it conferred a compensation on certain parties to whom he thought compensation should be given. The minister concerned and his department gave very careful consideration to this whole subject, before Mr. Commissioner Audette was appointed to investigate the question and also after that appointment; and they have also given very careful attention to the findings of Mr. Justice Audette, and in those findings they concur. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) regrets not being here, and has asked me to deal with the matter in his absence. The hon. member for Pictou has argued that as a result of the Pelagic Sealing Treaty of 1911, a large sum of money will accrue to the treasury of this country, money which does not strictly belong to the people of the country generally, but which should be directed simply as a matter of compensation to those who have been engaged in the seal industry for many years prior to the treaty. He spoke particularly of the Victoria Sealing Company as being the parties chiefly interested. He has pointed out that they were not compensated, whereas the four or five other vessels which were, according to his assertion, sealing illegally at that time were compensated. In the first place, I can hardly agree with either of these contentions of my hon. friend. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in traversing the whole history of the matter, interesting as it is, but I want to touch on one or two points which, unless explained, might not be as clear to the House.

The United States acquired the Pribiloff islands as a part of Alaska, by purchase from Russia in 1867. Five years later she gave a lease for twenty years to the Alaska Commercial Company of the exclusive sealing rights on these islands. At that time and for some years afterwards there was no pelagic sealing of importance, so the lessees had a monopoly of the industry, resulting in very large profits to them, as well as to the lessors, the United States Government. In the early eighties some Canadians took up pelagic sealing in a more consistent way, and as good profits were made the industry soon grew. The lesses and the United States Government, seeing formidable competitors appearing, tried to stop them. The United States Government took the ground that Behring Sea is mare clausum and that as the seals were born and spent an important portion of each year on their islands, they were actually their property. In 1886, acting on the assumption that Behring Sea was a closed sea, they seized some Canadian sealing vessels in that sea many miles from land. The House will recall the diplomatic negotiations which followed at that time. No seizures were made the following year, but as pelagic sealing kept on growing, further seizures were effected in 1888 and in 1889. Vigorous diplomatic correspondence ensued, and in 1891 a modus vivendi was entered into, with a view to preventing further overt acts during negotiating, by which Behring Sea was closed to pelagic sealing and land killing was restricted to the number required to provide food for the natives on the islands, seal meat forming an important portion of their food. This modus vivendi was continued in 1892. The negotiations finally resulted in an agreement to submit the whole question to arbitration, which arbitration took place in Paris in 1893. A condition of the arbitration was that the question of the natural history of the seal should be considered with a view to the proper protection of the herds. Canada's contentions were absolutely upheld. Pelagic sealing was vindicated as a legal method of hunting, and the United States was required to pay heavy damages for the seizures and interference made; but regulations for the protection of the seals, since known as the Paris award regulations were also provided by the arbitrators. These regulations restricted the use of fire-arms to rifles outside of Behring Sea, and prohibited the use of fire-arms altogether in such sea, and also provided a close season for Behring Sea during the months of May, June and July.

During the first year the regulations were in operation there was a very large catch of seals, but every year subsequently the catch diminished very rapidly. It was obvious to everybody who studied the history of seal life that the regulations could only retard the extinction of the sealing industry, and it was very questionable whether they could permanently save it if pelagic sealing was followed. I need not go into the reasons except to mention that the killing of the seals on the rookeries enables the killers to select the male seals, whereas in the pelagic sealing there must be indiscriminate killing of the females as well as the males, and in the end the absolute extinction of the whole industry. As I have stated, the industry began to fail rapidly after 1894, and fell into such a bad way that British Columbia sealers got together and finally in 1900, formed what is known as the Victoria Sealing Company, because they realized that if all the sealing vessels which were then in existence went out in the indiscriminate loose way they were then going out, the whole business would be put an end to in a very short time. At that time there were 46 British Columbia sealing vessels, of which 43 were embraced in the Victoria Sealing Company. Year by year fewer vessels were sent out. In 1904 only 16 vessels were sent out by the company; in 1908, 4 vessels; in 1909, one vessel; and subsequently none. So that for two years before the treaty of 1911 was effected the Victoria Sealing Company had ceased to be a factor in the industry. While the Victoria Sealing Company dropped out of the business entirely after 1909, a few independent British Columbia boats continued in it.

Had it not been for the continuation of these few boats in the industry, carrying on active sealing operation, there practically would have been no reason for the United States entering into this treaty of 1911, so far as Canada is concerned. It was therefore obvious that the best interests of all concerned would be served if an arrangement could be made by which the non-rookery-owning powers—the powers that had not an interest in the land operations of sealing—could fairly share in the business and have pelagic sealing done away with altogether. To this end, negotiations were taken up and resulted in the eminently satisfactory treaty which we are now discussing, of July 7, 1911, by which Canada receives 15 per cent of the gross number of skins taken on the United States and Russian sea islands, and 10 per cent of those taken on the shore islands, without incurring any expense as to the management of the herds. The treaty also provided for an advance payment of $200,000 on account of the skins which Canada would be entitled to under it, the object, no doubt, being to pay compensation to be paid under the treaty without drawing on the treasury. The treaty is for a term of 15 years, but it is expected that it will be continued indefinitely thereafter.

Following the adoption of the treaty, claims for compensation began to pour in, not only on account of it but also owing to the Paris award regulations, and for various other reasons. It was finally decided by the Government to appoint Mr. Justice Audette of the Exchequer Court a commissioner to investigate all claims flowing from or arising out of the pelagic sealing treaty of 1911, as also arising out of the Paris award regulations of 1894. His instructions will be found in the Order in Council passed appointing him. Some 1,605 claims amounting to over $9,000,000, were submitted to Mr. Justice Audette, and in order that the claims might be properly investigated without avoidable trouble or expense to the claimants, Judge Audette went to Victoria, British Columbia, and also to Halifax and Sydney and Ottawa, holding meetings at each place. Evidence under oath was submitted and counsel was employed by the Government to see that its interests were properly considered, as well as by the claimants with regard to the claims under the Paris award regulations, among which were those of the Victoria Sealing Company. The commissioner found they could not be paid, and he concluded his reasons for so finding in the following words:

> It is conceded by all parties that the sealers have no legal claim. Their claims do not originate in tort, as in the case of the illegal seizure of the vessels under the British flag in 1886. This commission originated absolutely in the benevolence, grace and bounty of the Crown; and while I am not here holding the scale of justice on strict legal rights, but with rights emanating from equity and good conscience, I am unable to find that the sealers were in any manner injured and damaged by the regulations that would entitle them to compensation. It would be contrary to the principles of natural justice to declare these claimants entitled to recover, where no pretence of right in law, equity or good conscience (ex aequo et bono) has been made out.

It has been contended that because the nation is recovering a large amount in consideration for the entering into the treaty of 1911, a monetary condition which would never have been obtained but for the regulations which kept the seals alive up to that time, that the sealers should recover. A most erroneous view to take under the circumstances. Whatever amount is recoverable—or recovered—under the treaty, forms a national fund absolutely at the disposal of the sovereign under constitutional principles, and which falls into the Canadian exchequer, and it is not even in any way earmarked to compensate the sealers under the treaty of 1911, and indeed, asserted with much more certitude not to compensate under the regulations which were made under the Paris Award in 1893 and which did not provide for the payment of any money but only sought the protection of the herd.

If the Government were using moneys derived from the treaty of 1911, as claimed by some counsel, to pay the claimants under the regulations—moneys coming from two countries that had nothing to do with the regulations would thus be used. Hence it could not be done.

Having thus passed in review the general heads of complaint put forward by the sealers against the regulations, and approaching the consideration of this claim in a spirit of justice connoting the idea of doing what in equity and good conscience is fair and just, and after giving this branch of the commission special care and labour, as it involved both large amounts and a large number of claimants, I have come to the conclusion and find that the Canadian sealers are not entitled to be paid any compensation by the Crown for alleged damage resulting from the said regulations.

The commissioner found that the only persons entitled to compensation were those who were engaged in the industry in 1911, with certain minor exceptions, such as hunters who were prevented from hunting in that year, owing to sickness or otherwise; also, the ships which were engaged in that year. The total amount of the compensation awarded was $60,663.75. The commissioner's report was approved, and these claims have been paid and it has been decided not to re-open the question. It is curious to note, as showing the arguments which appealed also to the Japanese Government, that in compensating their claimants they dealt only with those men who were actually engaged in the industry when the treaty came into eeffct in 1911. It is quite obvious that this large fund, which, we hope, will accrue to the country from the preservation of these seal herds, belongs, not in particular to one person or another who may at one time or another have been engaged in the sealing industry, but belongs to the people of Canada in recognition of a right which they had to conduct pelagic sealing, and because that right has been extinguished or is abolished—has been given up by the whole people of Canada—therefore Canada is entitled to the compensation, and not those individuals who may have been engaged in the industry at one time but who, on account of regulations and conditions which were established to preserve the seal industry, and without which the industry would have become extinct, were compelled to abandon the industry. The Government therefore decided that the only people strictly entitled to any compensation are those who, at the time of the affirming of this treaty, were actually engaged in the business, and to whom, therefore, the contracting parties had to say: You cannot conduct sealing operations any longer.

With respect to the gentlemen of whom my hon. friend spoke to-day, it can only be again observed that they actually, by the conditions which existed at that time, had gone out of the business entirely two years prior to the contracting parties entering into that treaty. I can add nothing further than to say that this is the view taken by the minister and the department and the view generally taken by the Government. I cannot give my hon. friend any assurance that the Government would think it right, wise or advisable, after the whole matter has been thoroughly gone into by Mr. Justice Audette, a special commissioner who heard all evidence presented on behalf of the claimants and who had made a certain report, to appoint another commission to investigate the work of Mr. Justice Audette. We feel that he dealt with it fairly and justly, and, on the whole, the Government feel that it must adhere to that report.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend (Mr. Burrell) who has charge of this department in the absence of the Minister of Naval Affairs concluded his observations by stating that he could not give any assurance that the Government would take into its favourable consideration the claim put forth this afternoon by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) on behalf of the sealers of British Columbia. My hon. friend from Pictou did not expect any assurance to that effect to-day, but I still express the hope that the consideration of the Government will be more favourable in the future in regard to this question. It is impossible to deal fairly with this question, in my judgment, if we deal simply upon the strict letter of the Treaty of 1911. In order to do full justice to the whole question on behalf of the people of Canada and of the sealers of British Columbia, I think it is imperative that we should go very much beyond the Treaty of 1893 which resulted in the passing of the regulations which are at the source of all the complaints we have now to deal with. Up to 1873 there was no such thing as pelagic sealing. As stated by my hon. friend, when the Pribyloff Islands belonged to Russia, and after their acquisition by the United States, the method of taking the seals was to kill them on the land. I am prepared to concede that perhaps this method was more conducive to the maintenance of the herd than any other. But my hon. friend will grant that the seal belongs to everybody, and not to one class of people in particular. In 1873, when some enterprising Canadians in British Columbia undertook to go into what was known as pelagic sealing—that is the hunting of the seals on the high seas—they were absolutely within their rights. This industry became profitable. But the possessor of Pribyloff island, the American Government, and the lessees of the American Government, looked upon the pelagic sealers as intruders, interlopers and trespassers. The habits of these seals are peculiar. They live in the high seas in winter and resort to the land in May, June and July for breeding purposes. When August comes they disperse again to the ocean and come back to the island the following spring. When they were dispersed on the ocean the British Columbia sealers pursued. In this, as I have said these sealers were perfectly within their right, and the only objection which was made was that pelagic sealing tended to deplete the herds. As stated by my hon. friend the objection was that the sealers who killed on the land destroyed only the young males, whereas on the high seas not only the young males but also the females were killed. But, as the pelagic sealers were absolutely within their rights, the protest of the American owners of the islands did not impress them. As has been stated by my hon. friend, in 1886 the American authorities chose to seize several of the sealers. They claimed, as has been stated by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and repeated by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) that the Behring sea, where the seizures took place, belonged to the United States. This contention was rejected by the commission, and rightly so. I believe upon this point that the commission were unanimous. If I remember rightly the American counsel claimed that pelagic sealing ought to be altogether forbidden. The tribunal did not agree to this, but simply passed certain regulations to limit the pelagic sealing, and make it more difficult. These regulations were four in number. First, a close season was established lasting, if I remember well, from May to August or September. There was a shoal of sixty miles along Pribilof island where the seals breed. A zone was established around this shoal within which pelagic sealing was absolutely prohibited. Then, the use of certain weapons was prohibited; and, lastly, the use of steam vessels was also forbidden. With these restrictions—the season, the zone, the weapon, and the vessels—the operation of the sealers was greatly limited, and undoubtedly they suffered damage. There cannot be a shadow of a doubt that they suffered damage. They made complaints and representations to the Canadian Government. I may observe to my hon. friend that, if the award was unanimous as to the right of Canadians to engage in pelagic sealing, the award which established these regulations was not unanimous. Sir John Thompson, the appointee of the Canadian Government on the Board, did not agree to this part of the award. The fact that a man of the eminent authority of Sir John Thompson would not agree to these regulations is a very strong point on behalf of the sealers, and it is, to my mind, conclusive evidence that the sealers had a just cause of complaint when these regulations were made. Therefore, it will be easily understood why the sealers made complaint to the Canadian Government representing that they had been unfairly dealt with, and were entitled to compensation. That was in 1893. The matter was taken into consideration by the government of that day, but no conclusion was arrived at. In 1898, when the Joint High Commission was appointed to settle many questions that were then pending between Canada and the United States—the Atlantic Fisheries, the Alaskan Boundary and others—this question of the seals was taken up by the Government. The Canadian representative brought the matter to the attention of his fellow-members of the commission, and claimed compensation for the British Columbian sealers. It is to be observed that the fairness of this claim was not disputed by the American commissioner; on the contrary, it was accepted as fair, and witnesses were examined by the commission to ascertain what would be the amount of compensation to which the British Columbia sealers might be fairly entitled. The matter, however, did not reach a conclusion, because the commission adjourned, and took up the consideration of the Alaskan boundary question, and the sealing question was never resumed. The matter stood where it was. The British Columbian sealers never ceased to make complaint to the Government, representing that they were entitled to compensation for the loss of their industry.

In 1909, when the Canadian Government was approached by the United States Government on the subject of the entire suspension of pelagic sealing, the Canadian Government agreed to the suspension of pelagic sealing for fifteen years, but only upon the condition that compensation should be given to Canada for the loss of the right which she was sacrificing.

Mr. BURRELL: Was that in 1909?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes. The commission was appointed in 1910, if I remember rightly, and the final treaty was passed in July, 1911. It was stipulated as an absolute condition by the Canadian Government for the giving up of the privilege of pelagic sealing that compensation should be afforded, and that condition was accepted by the United States authorities. Generous terms of compensation were granted; fifteen per cent of the value of the catch of seals killed on land, and an immediate advance of $200,000. What was the object of this compensation? My hon. friend says that it was a consideration for Canada's giving up her right to use the high seas for pelagic sealing. But Canada would not, for a sum of money, have given up such a right as that upon the high seas. The Canadian Government could not have been blind to the fact that people were engaged in that industry; that the industry had been seriously damaged year after year by the regulations which had for their object the restricting of pelagic sealing. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the Canadian Government could not ignore the claim of these men who had been engaged in pelagic sealing and whose rights had been so restricted. For my part, I always thought that the best way of investing this money would be to compensate the men who had suffered from these regulations. These men who built schooners and manned and equipped them for use in pelagic sealing were absolutely within their rights; they were absolutely as free as anybody else was on the high seas. Suddenly the Canadian Government said: You shall not carry on your trade any longer. The commissioner who was appointed, Mr. Justice Audette—a man of eminent ability, I admit; a man upon whose judgment I rely—

Mr. BURRELL: Before my hon. friend leaves that point, may I ask him whether he has considered what would have happened if the sealing had been carried on after 1911 as it was from 1895 down to 1911? The evidence is that if there had been no treaty, these people would have been put out of business by the absolute extinction of the seal herds.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The result of these regulations was to make the business less profitable, and the sealers who had organized themselves into a corporation went less and less into the business. It is said that for three or four years before 1911 they had ceased to send schooners out on the high seas. But they never ceased to make application for compensation in respect of the damage that these restrictions had caused to them. If they went out of business, what was the reason? Simply that the regulations had made sealing unprofitable. That is to say, they suffered in consequence of the regulations imposed upon them.

Mr. BURRELL: That may be so, but if these regulations—which, after all, have had some effect in preserving the herds—had not been enforced, the sealers would have gone out of business sooner, because no seals would have been left.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Many industries which have flourished for a time in newly discovered districts have in the course of time exhausted their material. The ore of many a mine has become or may yet become exhausted, and when exhausted no claim can be made from the state; but if while there is ore in the mine the miner is prohibited from working by the state, the latter receiving profits from the prohibition, the miner, out of the profits derived by the state, ought to receive compensation. So in this case. These men were exercising a right. Possibly in the course of time the sealing would have been exhausted; I am very much afraid that a great deal of our wild animal life will be exhausted in the course of time. But so long as the trade is there, it can be taken hold of; and if the trade is suddenly cut off by legislative action, it seems to me there is just claim for compensation on the part of those whose rights are affected. I may be told that there is no legal claim; that the Government can in this case exercise its right of eminent domain. I admit that, but the sealers never had the pretension to claim from the Government any legal right in the matter. I put it simply on the ground of good conscience: since the Canadian Government has received several hundred thousand dollars, by way of compensation, which are now in the public treasury, is it not right and fair that the men whose business has been destroyed by the action of this Government, whatever its motive may have been, should be compensated? It is not to the honour of Canada that the Government received this money from the American Government and has not compensated the men whose money has been put into the sealing industry. These men built something like seventy schooners, which have remained idle; the money which they put into their business has been absolutely lost. Yet they have received not a single dollar of compensation. Moreover, their schooners are useless for any other purpose than that for which they were designed and built. In view of the fact that the Government has received a large sum of money in consequence of the very impediment which they have put in the way of these men, in fairness and equity the Government should compensate them for the money they put into the business. By action of the Government of Canada—with the purpose of which I am in sympathy—the business of these men was completely destroyed; therefore, out of the money received by the Canadian Government by way of compensation these men should be the first to be compensated.

I have read with care the judgment of Mr. Justice Audette. It seems to me that he takes a narrow view of this matter. He seems to have approached it more or less from the point of view of narrow justice, as it were, rather than from the point of view of, as he says, good conscience and equity. Well, every man may have his own opinion about what is equity, and justice, and good conscience. The application of a definite law dealing with a specific matter is one thing, but in this case no question of law is involved.

It is altogether within the discretion of the men who are now in office to say whether those people shall be compensated or not. If it were a case of taking money out of the treasury for those people, I might say that the Government should not be asked to put their hands into the treasury in order to compensate them, but this is money paid by the American Government for the destruction of those people's industry. There is absolutely no question on that point. Having received the money on that basis, equity and good conscience make it imperative that the money so received should go first to compensate the men whose business has been destroyed. Will this not appeal to the judgment of the gentlemen who are on the treasury benches? Up to the present time, they have refused to depart from the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Audette. My only objection to his opinion is that he takes too narrow a view. This is a matter which is of no personal concern to any one of us. I do not know who the claimants are. I saw Captain Adams only once in my life. I was, however, in office when this treaty was negotiated. I gave the matter my best consideration, and I thought then that when we received money as compensation, the first men to be paid out of that money ought to be those whose business and livelihood had been destroyed, and whose good money had become worthless. For these considerations, I hope, although my hon. friend will refuse to give an assurance that those men will be more equitably dealt with than in the past or that their claims will be considered, that the Government will reconsider their attitude upon this matter, and see that after all, if we are to treat this matter in equity and good conscience, we should give those men the money.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, were it not for the fact that a great many people from the county which I have the honour to represent here were interested directly in this industry which is now under discussion, I would not venture to add a word to what has been so ably presented to the House by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Pictou, and replied to by the Minister of Agriculture. As early as the year 1887, several vessels from the Atlantic coast went around Cape Horn and engaged in this business on the British Columbia coast. Ever since then, until the industry was closed out by international regulations and regulations of this Government, the owners of those vessels kept in touch with that industry. Amongst those men were Captain Charles Hackett, Captain J. W. Peppett, Captain Cutler, Captain Ryan, Captain Frank Hackett, Captain Desmond, Captain Bissett and Captain LeBlanc. Some of them were absolute owners of the vessels, and all of them were interested in the business which they followed. From 1887 down to 1893, and since then down to 1911, at the consummation of the treaty mentioned by several hon. gentlemen here to-day, they conducted a profitable business in the sealing industry with their headquarters in British Columbia. As has already been fully explained, for international reasons and for the purpose of conserving this very valuable industry, and conserving the lives of those seals, it was thought proper to enter into negotiations, and an agreement was made by which that industry was closed out. Those men had a vested interest and a vested right in that industry, just the same as the Minister of Agriculture has a vested right in a certain industry in British Columbia. And I presume that if those who are engaged in the fruit industry of British Columbia were, for some reason, prevented from engaging in that industry, he would ably advocate their rights. I think he would say that if those who have put their money into orchards, or mines, or fisheries in British Columbia were, for some international reason, cut off from their employment, and if moneys were paid into the treasury of Canada as a compensation and consideration for the closing down of those industries, those who were in those businesses and whose occupations were so cut off should be the first to be considered in the division of that money. The interpretation given to that treaty by the leader of the Opposition should receive due consideration. If a certain document is in writing or if a certain statute goes through Parliament, the man who wrote the document or who drafted the Act or had a hand in putting it through Parliament, has perhaps no more to say as to the proper interpretation of it than anybody else, because a judicial interpretation must be given as to the meaning the words in it must bear. But when international negotiations are conducted, as the negotiations in regard to this treaty were conducted, and when all the motives and ideas are not put into writing, the views of the then Prime Minister of the country, who was one of the parties to those negotiations, and who knew what the negotiations were, should be considered when the matter is discussed. We are told by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, but who was the Prime Minister of this country at the time this treaty was negotiated and received the approval of His Majesty and passed into an international bargain, that the intention was that, so far as that agreement curtailed the profits of any people engaged in the sealing industry, they should be compensated as far as the money received would go. That is the interpretation given to the treaty by the man who negotiated it. That being the case, that being the idea conveyed to those people by the Government of the day and by the Prime Minister who negotiated the agreement, it is incumbent upon those who succeeded him in office to carry out that policy. The Government may say: If we had been in power at the time, we would not have made such an agreement; we would not have stopped the industry, we would not have interfered with the people who were working in it, and if we had interfered with them at all, we would not have paid them any compensation. But the King and the power of the King were represented at that time by the Prime Minister of that day, and he made a certain arrangement. It is, therefore, incumbent upon the Government of the day to carry it out. This principle has been recognized in this country before. Hon. gentlemen in this House, and particularly hon. members of the Government, remember the treaty of Washington, in connection with which there was what is well known as the Fisheries Award. There was paid into the treasury of Canada on account of the award the sum of $5,000,000. The Government of the day did not think that was money that they could apply in the ordinary way; they considered it was something that belonged practically to the fishing industry of this country. What happened—and what is the law to-day—was that at least a certain amount of that money was placed at interest, and the interest of it is paid as a bounty to the fishermen of Canada. Everyone knows that the fishermen of Canada on both coasts receive a bounty. That money comes to them out of this Washington treaty fisheries award. Because the treaty of Washington permitted a condition of things that meant interference to some extent with the fishery business, the money that came to the Government by reason of the concession given to American fishermen was divided amongst the fishermen of Canada, and is being divided in that way to-day. The taking of this money which we get for the sealing industry and establishing some equitable basis upon which it will be divided amongst those people whose interests are affected by reason of the treaty, would be only carrying out, and perhaps extending to a certain degree, the principles that were established by the Government of the day in connection with the award paid to this country under the treaty of Washington.

I submit, therefore, that it would not be doing anything new if the Government took this money and made such an equitable division of it between the corporations and the men who were engaged in this business on the basis of the facts as they were ascertained.

As I understand the findings of Mr. Justice Audette, they do not go the full length of the principle involved in this question. I understand his position to be that no person has any claim on the Government for any part of this money, and that no person could at law establish a claim against the Crown for it. I need not tell you, Sir, or any member of the Government that you cannot establish a claim against the Crown except by statute; that is, unless there is an Act of Parliament fixing that obligation upon the Crown. Mr. Justice Audette could have made a finding of that sort at the start. The moment he discovered there was no such statute he could have said that it was useless to go any further. But that was not the idea of starting the investigation, and perhaps I am doing him an injustice in saying that that was his conclusion, but, nevertheless, as I understand it, that was his conclusion.

The Government, as representing the Crown, are mere trustees of this money. They receive the money in trust for a certain specific purpose, and it is their duty to divide it properly and equitably upon the basis of the facts as they appear. In the colony of Newfoundland and in the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Nova Scotia, and particularly that part of Nova Scotia to which I belong, there were hundreds of people engaged in this industry. Many vessels were bought on the Atlantic coast, taken around the Horn and engaged in the sealing business on the other side. But all these people were put out of business by the treaty. I submit that when there is in the hands of the Government money that was paid to them under a treaty that put an end to this industry, the people who were engaged in it have a claim in equity, and justice, and good conscience against the Government. I submit that if it is found that Mr. Justice Audette's decision is not wide enough, or that he has not gone sufficiently deep into this question, further investigation should be made, and a further opportunity to be heard should be given to the people whose interests are affected. If the Government should find that they are mere trustees for this money, and that it was to be given to the people who were engaged in this industry, I trust they will not permit any mere technicalities to stand in the way, but will deal with the matter broadly and properly as the justice of the case demands.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): It appears to be common ground that there is no question involved here of a legal right on the part of those whose cause has been pleaded here this afternoon. The question is one entirely of what ought to be done in equity and good conscience, and the question was so submitted to Mr. Justice Audettte, and so dealt with by him. The contention of hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support of some further recognition of this claim seems to me to rest, if I may say so with all respect, upon a misapprehension of what it was that this money was paid for. Their reasoning would lead one to believe that they look upon it as money paid for damage suffered in the past. Now a glance at the treaty of 1911 will show that what was paid for was the foregoing by Canada, on behalf of her citizens, of the right to carry on pelagic sealing for a period of time in the future. The loss, therefore, that was being compensated for was a loss that might occur to people in the future.

9 p.m.

Mr. MACDONALD: Here was the Victoria Sealing Company with its vessels all prepared, but they were unable to carry on their business by reason of these regulations. The minister must not forget that the basis of our contention in the negotiations with the American Government was the fact that in the past there were deprivations of that character.

Mr. DOHERTY: I was coming to the position, as I understand it, of the Victoria Sealing Company, but I think it is well to get clear at the outset what this money was paid to us for—because until we know what it was paid to us for, it is impossible for us to ascertain who has any particular or specific claim upon that money as distinct from the claim of the whole public of Canada, for whom the Government received and holds this money. What was paid for, was the foregoing for fifteen years, then in the future, of the privilege on the part of Canada, as representing all Canadians, of exercising the right of pelagic sealing. Now that right of pelagic sealing that we agreed to forego for that period of time in the future was the right to pelagic sealing as that right could legally be exercised at the time the treaty was entered into; that is to say, the right to pelagic sealing subject to the regulations of the Treaty of Paris. That right had been so limited and so restricted by the regulations of the Treaty of Paris that this Victoria Sealing Company in particular had, as I understand the facts, abandoned the business.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, the Victoria Sealing Company never abandoned the business.

Mr. DOHERTY: Ceased to carry on the business.

Mr. MACDONALD: By reason of the fact that the regulations of the Treaty of Paris prevented them from doing so.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is precisely what I am pointing out. The regulations of the Treaty of Paris made it not worth while for the Victoria Sealing Company to carry on the business, and that was the condition when the treaty was entered into whereby Canada, on behalf of her people, renounced the right of carrying on the business under the treaty which is now in question, and received compensation for her renunciation of the right to carry on the business under those conditions. That right to carry on the business was open to every Canadian citizen just as fully as it was to the Victoria Sealing Company, and the compensation was to Canada as a whole for foregoing something in the future.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not necessarily, it was not so stated.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the treaty. What did we do? We agreed to forego the right to pelagic sealing for fifteen years to come, and for that we were to be paid this proportion of the catch that was to be got in those fifteen years to come.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not in the fifteen years to come, because there was no right to make it.

Mr. DOHERTY: We agreed to forego the right. Our people had the right to carry on the pelagic sealing, subject to the regulations of the Treaty of Paris.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, my hon. friend is not correct in that, because, if he will permit me, the conclusions of the Treaty of Paris say that we could carry that on in the open sea, but it was of no value, seeing that we could not reach the rookery.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. DOHERTY: This is all a question of pelagic sealing. If that was of no value at all, it cannot have been of any value to the Victoria Sealing Company any more than to anybody else. Whatever its value was, much or little, that is what we had in 1911, and that was the only thing we could forego, because we could not forego what we had not. The United States Government undertook to pay this compensation to this country, as the representative of all its inhabitants, for our renunciation of the exercise of that right, whatever may have been its value, for a period of time to come. That right, as it stood at that time, the thing that we agreed to forego, was a right which in the judgment of the Victoria Sealing Company was not worth while for it to exercise, and it had ceased to exercise that right. The Victoria Sealing Company therefore stood in the same position as any other citizen of Canada who did not find that under the conditions it was worth while to carry on that business. When we come to deal with consideration of individuals, we have to remember that the money we have is not the price of anything that happened in the past. It is the price of our foregoing a right for the future, and whoever would be affected fairly and equitably in the future by that remuneration of ours, ought to get compensation, and fairly enough those who were actually exercising this right at the time we agreed to forego it, have been considered and have been compensated. The refusal is as regards the people who, three or four years before, made up their minds it was not worth their while to exercise the right—

Mr. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: —demonstrating therefore that they would not be among the class of people affected by the fact that we renounced that right for the next fifteen years.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the argument my hon. friend is making, he is excluding altogether the fact that this company kept its ships tied up by the wharf on account of the understanding with the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: With all respect, I think my hon. friend is quite mistaken when he says that those people who sent their ships out did so in violation of the regulations of the Treaty of Paris. I think the best demonstration of the fact that they did not violate the treaty is that they were able to carry on operations with impunity, and were never seized. They went out in the exercise of the rights of pelagic sealing, subject to the regulations of the Treaty of Paris, and they thought it worth their while. They are, therefore, among the class of people who, presumably at all events, would have gone on if this last treaty had not been passed, and they are the people who in a particular manner, different from all other citizens of Canada, are affected by our renunciation of that right. They are fairly and equitably the people who ought to be compensated, and they are the people who were compensated. But to carry the argument made on behalf of the Victoria Sealing Company to its logical conclusion, if that company is entitled to remuneration on the grounds stated, then it seems to me that anybody who at any time had carried on the business of pelagic sealing, ought to get compensation, because that ground is that though they had ceased to carry on the business, and though it clearly appeared that they were not going to carry it on in any way during the fifteen years covered by the treaty they had at some past time carried on the business of pelagic sealing. That was the matter that was submitted to Mr. Justice Audette. I think that there can be no claim upon those moneys on the part of those people as being deprived of something they otherwise would have had in the future is most clearly established by the fact that when it is sought to support their claim—and I refer particularly to the very interesting and very forcible speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—it all has to be made to rest upon the damage it is claimed they sustained by reason of the regulations under the Treaty of Paris. Well, those regulations were passed and were in force for a number of years before this treaty, and those regulations were made by competent authority to control the carrying on of that business, and the loss that resulted to the Victoria Sealing Company or anybody else from the enactment of those regulations—

Mr. MACDONALD: There was nobody else so far as Canada was concerned.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend from North Sydney (Mr. McKenzie) has just been telling us of a large number of people in his part of the country who were engaged in pelagic sealing.

Mr. MACDONALD: They were in the Victoria Sealing Company.

Mr. DOHERTY: Very well—the Victoria Sealing Company, including everybody else. What I was endeavouring to say when I was interrupted was, that the case had to be sustained as a case of damage to these people by pointing out the damage suffered following the regulations of the Treaty of Paris. With regard to those regulations and the damage which resulted from them, those people who were carrying on the industry were in precisely the same position as any fisherman is towards fishery regulations which may be made in this country, and I do not think it would be suggested that if this country, in the exercise of control of its own fisheries, makes regulations for the preservation of the fishery industry, that those who, in the long run, are going to be benefited by those regulations, by the conservation of their industry, would be entitled to claim damages because they are prevented from making a wholesale slaughter of the fish. That was the situation of the people engaged in the sealing industry as towards the regulations of the Treaty of Paris. They were engaged in this trade, and the permanence of the trade depended upon proper regulation being made. Proper authority made the regulations, which were in the interest of everybody engaged in the industry actually or to be so engaged in the future, and I confess I have difficulty in seeing how a claim for damage resulting from the enforcement of those regulations could very well be enforced—I am not speaking legally, but should be recognized as a matter of fairness and justice. But, whether it should or should not be, surely it cannot be pretended that these people should be made better off because subsequently the entire pelagic sealing industry was suppressed; and if they are to share in this money which is the price of that suppression for the future, they will be better off than if this treaty never had been passed. If they should be so compensated, then these people would actually be better off by reason of the renunciation made by this treaty because they would get compensation for past damages arising from another cause, and not at all from the passing of this treaty, which they never would have been entitled to if pelagic sealing, subject to the regulations, had remained open to everybody.

The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) refers as a precedent to what was done with the moneys awarded under the Washington treaty, and says that certains portions of those moneys were invested to provide for money for those engaged, after its passing up to the present time, in the fishing industry. The case is absolutely different. There the money is being utilized to compensate people who, in the conditions created by the treaty, existing subsequently to the treaty, are carrying on their business at a disadvantage. They are people particularly affected by the result of the treaty in a different way from every other individual Canadian. But here we are asked to apply that money not to indemnify anybody affected by the consequent effects of the treaty but somebody that suffered a damage by reason of something that was done years before.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is that not merely a question of degree? In the fishery case they were at a disadvantage but were permitted to go on; but in the other case they were stopped altogether.

Mr. DOHERTY: Being permitted to go on they are a class of people directly and particularly affected by the continued operation of that treaty, and therefore, if we get compensation for foregoing on behalf of the people of Canada the right under that treaty to carry on certain fishing operations, I can see the fairness and equity of applying some of that money to compensate people who, by reason of that treaty, are hampered in the industry they carry on. I am not contending that people who were carrying on the industry at the time of this last treaty and were cut off from doing it should not have compensation to the extent of the damage they proved, and they have had it. I was just pointing out that the case we now are dealing with differs in every respect from the case of the fishermen to whom my hon. friend from North Sydney refers. I quite appreciate the sympathy of hon. gentlemen with these gentlemen who are interested in the sealing industry, but I must confess that, eliminating the question of legal obligation, trying to judge it as a question of what is fair and reasonable, I do not see that the Government of Canada, which has received this money in trust, just as all the moneys of Canada are in its hands in trust for all the people of Canada,—

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh no, this is a special trust.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is precisely where I join issue. It is in trust for all the people who, during those fifteen years are deprived of this privilege, and I am prepared to concede that in equity and fairness, if there is any individual Canadian who shows that by Canada's renunciation of that right for that fifteen years he suffers a damage or an injury distinct and different from that which is suffered by the whole public, he ought to get compensation.

Mr. MACDONALD: What better case could my hon. friend have in considering the matter of damage than that of a company which has tied up at the wharf six schooners especially built for the sealing industry and which is unable to use those schooners under the Paris regulations, and has not used them for fifteen years?

Mr. DOHERTY: They were unable, under the Paris regulations, to use them and that was their settled and defined position; and this treaty did not make them any more unable to use them, it left them precisely where they were in that regard. We are asked to compensate a man for being prevented under this treaty from carrying on a business that, in the conditions that existed before this treaty, he was unable to carry on.

What I have sought to make clear is that the damage to these people, in so far as they were damaged, resulted from what had taken place years before this treaty, and that this treaty left them neither better nor worse off; and this money was paid to us for the foregoing of a right, subsequent to the execution of the treaty that these people, by their own admission, were not in a position, by reason of anterior events, to exercise or avail themselves of.

Mr. MACDONALD: How could it be possible by the law of Canada settled under this international agreement, for anybody to set up a claim during the fifteen years for the right to legally go out and seal in Behring sea and assert that they had vessels or schooners or anything of that kind, when it was well understood, it was known as a matter of public law, that it was impossible for anybody to go sealing?

Mr. DOHERTY: They were all subject to the regulations. The right that they had was to go out and fish subject to the regulations. On their behalf and on behalf of all the people of Canada, Canada renounced that right, and anybody deprived of the right which he was exercising to fish under the regulations was entitled to compensation. All of those who went so far towards showing that as to show that they were carrying on the business under the regulations, got compensation.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where is the rest of it going?

Mr. DOHERTY: The rest of it belongs to Canada in the right of the whole of the people of Canada. None of us can go pelagic sealing.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the regulations under the treaty of Paris put an end to pelagic sealing, what had we to give up by this treaty of 1911?

Mr. DOHERTY: It did not put an end to pelagic sealing, it regulated and restricted pelagic sealing. If they had put an end to pelagic sealing then we would have had nothing to give up, just as the hon. gentleman says: It is not quite conceivable that if we had had nothing to give up, our American friends would have undertaken to pay us something approximating $7,000,000 for that nothing. We had something to give up, and there were people carrying on pelagic sealing subject to the restrictions and regulations, and that is the right we had.

Mr. MACDONALD: Only four. What does the minister say to the consideration of this matter given by Mr. Found in this report to the Naval Department?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have heard the reading of that report, and it would seem to indicate that Mr. Found was under the impression that something ought to be paid to these gentlemen. I have difficulty in accepting that conclusion, although I have not carefully read the report. I have read with considerable care the report of Mr. Justice Audette, and I may add that before the matter was submitted to the commission I had occasion to go with some degree of care into the consideration of this question, and for what value that may have, I may say that the conclusion of Mr. Audette was by no means a surprise to me. The impression I had formed was that that was the only conclusion that could properly and fairly be reached.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the hon. gentleman think that, from the standpoint of equity, justice and fair play, a company with whom the Canadian Government was negotiating right along, with whom the Government had conferences immediately preceding the treaty of 1911 as to the question of compensation, a company who had vessels prepared to go sailing, which were tied up to the wharf at Victoria, would have no bona fide reasonable claim for consideration upon the Government of the day, and for some allowance out of this fund which is paid to those who are to be prevented from sealing, realizing that nobody else would, in all human probability, prepare facilities for the purpose of engaging in sealing during the next fifteen years, that are to come during part of which time sealing is prohibited?

Mr. DOHERTY: We look at the matter from different angles. I do not think it would be equity, justice and fair play to the people of Canada in general if we took their money and gave it to some one for whom we were sorry because some years before—

Mr. MACDONALD: What interest has the man in the interior in sealing?

Mr. DOHERTY: None special to himself. But here is $7,000,000 belonging to Canada, which the man in Ontario has a share in, just the same as the man in British Columbia, and the only reason put forward so far I can see for paying the money to these particular individuals is that, unfortunately for them, they invested money in an enterprise which, by regulation of competent authority, was made unprofitable. That seems to me to be the situation, and we are asked to take the money of the people of Canada and pay to these people for foregoing the right to carry on pelagic sealing under unprofitable conditions not by reason of this treaty, but of the position created by previous regulations. We are asked to take the money of the whole of the people of Canada and pay it to these gentlemen because we are sorry for them.

Mr. MACDONALD: The whole question is a relative one. You can well understand that a man in British Columbia would not engage in sealing in Nova Scotia, or a man who was interested in the cultivation of soil in the prairies, who knew nothing about seas, would not engage in sealing in other parts of the Dominion. But if you have a case where the people have the vessels which are actually engaged in the enterprise tied up to the wharf, prepared to go out, but prevented from going out by reason of regulations made by this Government with a foreign government, does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the owners of the vessels in close proximity to the place where the sealing can be carried on have no equity by which they would be given the first right to participate in the fund? The Government having agreed to a fifteen-year prevention of sealing, nobody else in Canada would ever engage in it in that period.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have tried to say what I mean to say.

Mr. MACDONALD: I know what the hon. gentleman has to say, but he has not met my point exactly.

EXPORT OF POTATOES.

Mr. CARVELL: I wish to call attention of the House very shortly to a matter of which I gave notice to the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) yesterday, regarding the duty on potatoes. Some two or three weeks ago I asked the Government if it was their intention to make potatoes free under the provision of the United States Tariff Bill and under the War Measures Act. I was promised consideration, and as nothing was said about it, on Thursday last I asked the Government the question. That question and the statement respecting it made on behalf of the Government are as follows:

Mr. F. B. Carvell (Carleton, N.B.): A week or so ago I asked the Government if they would not consider the advisability of removing the duty on potatoes, the effect of which would be that our potatoes would have the right to enter the United States free of duty. I was promised consideration of the matter and I would now ask the minister if he is able to give an answer.

Sir Thomas White: The matter referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) is one relating to the tariff. Announcements of that kind are not discussed in advance for reasons which will be obvious to the House. I am unable to make any statement with respect to the matter except to say that any action the Government may take will be announced in due course. It is impossible for me to make a statement in reference to the matter at the present time.

While the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is usually very courteous, I thought he was rather testy about the matter, and I was rather surprised at the attitude he assumed. Therefore, I thought it in the interest of my constituents that I should give this matter some little publicity before prorogation. I do not intend to move an amendment, because I realize that such a motion on going to Supply would be treated as a vote of want of confidence, and this is a matter of such great importance to my constituents that I am not going to offer an amendment and have it voted down. On the other hand, I want to present the case to the Government, and see if they will not act and do justice to the great body of people in the Maritime Provinces especially, and people all over central Canada as a whole. I do not know that it is necessary to state that the cultivation of the potato is by far the greatest agricultural industry in the Maritime Provinces. In the last two years the value of this crop in the Maritime Provinces has far exceeded any other agricultural product, and I think I should be safe in saying, all other agricultural products put together, though possibly this last statement may be a little extreme. In my own constituency last year according to the best of figures I could obtain, they received something like seven or eight million dollars for the potatoes which they disposed of. In that item I include the counties of Victoria and Carleton, because that is the constituency, a part of which at least I now represent. These two counties are by far the greatest potato-producting counties in Canada. But all the other counties along the St. John river, and to a very great extent on what we call the North Shore, and around the county of Westmorland, are great potato producing counties. In addition, there is the province of Prince Edward Island, where, if they had proper transportation facilities, the crop would far exceed that of any other portion of Canada, and I believe, of the North American continent. The House will see, from my cursory statement, that the potato industry in the Maritime Provinces is an important one, and any legislation affecting the production or price of potatoes is a matter of prime importance to the people of that portion of Canada. To give you some idea of the importance of this industry, I shall read to the House a statement which I received to-day from the Commissioner of Customs:

Totals	2,872,738	$3,299,092	1,325,559	$2,314,417

I have computed the duty upon potatoes imported during the periods mentioned. The duty on the potatoes imported in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, would amount to $109,371, and, during the five months ended August 31, 1917, $86,227, a total of about $200,000.

You will see that during the last fiscal year out of 568,170 bushels of potatoes imported, 567,759 bushels came from the United States. Practically the whole of our import, therefore, is from the United States. During the first five months of this year, out of a total of 431,139 bushels imported, 431,119 bushels came from the United States. That is to say, with the exception of 20 bushels, all the potatoes imported into Canada during this fiscal year came from the United States. When you come to the exports, the proportion is nearly the same, except in the case of Cuba. We exported to Cuba last year practically a million bushels of potatoes, of a value of $1,225,000, and during the first five months of this year we exported 166,000 bushels valued at$325,000. To the United States we exported 1,645,155 bushels valued at $1,837,583 during the last fiscal year, and during the first five months of the present fiscal year 1,136,366 bushels valued at $1,941,638. A considerable proportion of the exports that I have mentioned would be of the crop of 1915, but a very large proportion would be out of the crop of 1916. We are safe in saying, therefore, that considerably over 2,000,000 bushels of potatoes were exported from Canada to the United States last year—it would probably come nearer 2,500,000 bushels.

Mr. EDWARDS: Can my hon. friend say how much of that was from eastern and how much was from western Canada?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I have not the figures. I telephoned the Commissioner of Customs to-day and I am giving the statement as I have it. I am satisfied, however, that practically the whole of that export would be from the eastern portion of Quebec, and the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. BURRELL: Quite a lot from the West.

Mr. CARVELL: There may be some from British Columbia.

Mr. BURRELL: And Alberta.

Mr. CARVELL: There would be nothing from Ontario last year.

Mr. EDWARDS: There was a shortage in Ontario and a surplus, I understand, in the Prairie Provinces.

Mr. CARVELL: I have tried to get the data, but have failed; I am giving the House the information that I have. A very large percentage of this business must have come from the Maritime Provinces and eastern Quebec. No portion of Canada has made such tremendous strides in the production of potatoes as the province of Quebec from Lévis eastward, and, to some extent, westward. It is wonderful what the people of Quebec are doing, especially on the southern bank of the St. Lawrence river from Lévis all the way to the Gaspé peninsula.

We know that practically all the potatoes that are imported into Canada come in the early summer, before our potatoes are available. So that the duty of $200,000 that we pay on potatoes imported into Canada is paid at a time when we are compelled to import new potatoes because none of our own are available.

When you consider that those are the prices of the exporting country, and add to that the cost of transportation and the cost of two or three profits, you will find that, by the time you get the potatoes to the consumer, instead of the cost of those potatoes being increased by $200,000, the increase as a result of that duty will be nearer $400,000. Those early potatoes are consumed very largely by people who are able to buy and pay for them, so that the increased price of them does not impose a hardship upon the ordinary labouring man that would be imposed by increased prices of many other articles through increased duties. It, however, greatly increases the cost of living in Canada under present conditions.

I wish to direct the attention of the House particularly to the question of the export of potatoes. In New Brunswick our farmers are raising, not a few hundred bushels but thousands of barrels. Many farmers in my constituency last year raised from 1,000 to 3,000 and 4,000 barrels each —we reckon our potatoes altogether by barrels instead of by bushels. Therefore, when you add a small amount of ten cents, or fifteen cents, or twenty cents a bushel, you have made a wonderful change in the income of the farmer. The duty on potatoes going into the United States is ten per cent ad valorem. If potatoes are worth $2 per barrel, as they are in New Brunswick today, and we send them over to the United States, if everything went properly, we would pay twenty cents a barrel for the purpose of getting those potatoes into the United States; or in other words, the farmer would get twenty cents a barrel more than he can possibly receive under present conditions. That is the way in which it works out. I am not going to argue now whether the importer or the exporter pays the duty, because that very largely depends upon the special conditions existing regarding each particular transaction, but so far as we in the Maritime Provinces are concerned, there is not any question about the matter—the Canadian farmer pays the duty. I live within ten miles of the boundary line and our farmers live up and down along that line, and potatoes are being raised on both sides of it. In Aroostook you will find that potatoes are worth the value of potatoes on our side of the line plus the duty. There is no use in making any argument about the matter; those are the facts. A man can argue as much as he chooses, but those who go into the Maritime Provinces and get to know what they are speaking about would not listen to him.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. MORPHY: What is your market, and how are your potatoes transported?

Mr. CARVELL: Our potatoes in New Brunswick go practically altogether to New England points, and they go almost wholly by rail. Potatoes from Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are carried by water to a great extent. In Nova Scotia, a limited trade has been carried on for many years, but that with the West Indian islands trade is only a bagatelle as compared with the trade with the United States. We have, however, a big trade with Cuba, and that goes partly by water and partly by rail. I am satisfied, if you investigate the details of the returns, you will find that a great proportion of the potatoes sent to Cuba last year, which came from my constituency and along the river St. John, were shipped by rail to Boston and from Boston to Cuba by water. That is the ordinary route of travel. I have one client and constituent who last year, to my knowledge, sold considerably over $100,000 worth of potatoes to Cuba alone and they all went by rail to Boston and thence by steamer. I have another client and constituent who must have handled $50,000 worth of potatoes in the same market, and from my knowledge, I believe a large proportion of those potatoes came from New Brunswick. I find that during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1917, and the first five months of this year, we have sent to the United States about $3,800,000 worth of potatoes upon which we have paid a duty of 10 per cent, or $380,000. We have simply contributed that amount of money to the revenues of the United States. In addition to that, we have sent to Cuba over $1,500,000 worth of potatoes, practically all of which went through American ports. If the duty were removed from potatoes going into the United States, we would save the duty on that portion as well, because the United States have a preferential treaty with Cuba—that is, potatoes from the United States can be sent into Cuba at a lower rate of duty than potatoes coming from any other part of the continent. If potatoes were made free into the United States, of course our potatoes would all go to the United States and none of them direct to Cuba, they would be exported to the United States and then when they were properly in that country they could be sold to Cuba or wherever the buyers chose to send them. The result would be that all the potatoes going to Cuba, as well as to the United States, would go free of duty, and that would mean, on the figures I have given, about $500,000 of extra money in the pockets of the people of New Brunswick.

Mr. MORPHY: What advantage does the hon. gentleman find in shipping potatoes to Boston? Is there an increased price to any extent, and what is it?

Mr. CARVELL: There is an increased price and an increased market. Last year potatoes reached an exorbitant, outrageous price.

Mr. MORPHY: But in an average year?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not take last year as a guide, because when farmers are getting $6 or $7 a barrel for potatoes they have no cause to complain of tariff regulations or regulations of any other kind. I am dismissing that from my argument, and I am trying to discuss the matter under ordinary conditions.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the difference in quantity and value between the potatoes exported from Canada to the United States and the potatoes imported from the United States into Canada?

Mr. CARVELL: It is very great. Take the year ended March, 1917, and the first five months of this year. During that period we imported from the United States 1,000,000 bushels, and we exported to the United States about 2,800,000 bushels. You would have to add to that, if you want to get a real understanding of what the difference would be in case the duty were removed, the quantity of potatoes which we sent to Cuba and which would amount to 1,150,000 bushels. I am speaking in round figures. Therefore, the quantity of our export to the United States would be easily four times the quantity of our imports.

Mr. WRIGHT: That would be for last year, not for an average year.

Mr. CARVELL: I am taking last year and the first five months of this year. Prior to 1916 very few of these were sent to the United States, because after the passing of the Underwood tariff, under which potatoes were practically free—there was only a ten per cent ad valorem duty—certain very shrewd Yankees who live about forty or fifty miles from my home conceived the idea of throwing mud at the Canadian potatoes by claiming that they were afflicted with a disease known as powdery scab. It was all a myth; there never was any powdery scab, but just the ordinary scab that we have seen on potatoes ever since we were children. But these gentlemen scared their Government and our Government and everybody else, and I think I am safe in saying that it cost this Government almost $100,000 to fight the disease. Regulations and a rigid inspection were put in force and it was almost imposible for us to ship our potatoes across the line. But last year, when the United States wanted our potatoes, they did not bother very much about powdery scab or about regulations and inspection. They wanted our potatoes and were glad to get them. So last year would be the first in a great many years when trade flowed freely without any unnatural barriers. I admit that the valuation is very, very far in excess of what the same volume of business would amount to in an ordinary year.

Coming back to the question put by the Minister of Agriculture, I stated that according to the reports furnished by the department practically a million bushels of potatoes were imported in the two years I have been discussing. We exported in the same period to the United States about 2,800,000 bushels, and to Cuba 1,500,000 bushels. Altogether we exported practically 4,000,000 bushels. So far as I know, the regulations regarding powdery scab and inspection and all that sort of thing are not being adhered to at the present time, and trade flows as freely as it naturally can, except for the duty. The United States customs authorities fix an arbitrary figure in arriving at the valuation. As I understand it, they do not take the invoice price of each carload of potatoes, but place an arbitrary figure upon potatoes from a certain area. At the present time that arbitrary figure for the Maritime Provinces is $3 a barrel, Actually our farmers are only getting $2 a barrel. The result is that under their method of assessing the duty is increased by fifty per cent. With that exception, trade is flowing as it naturally would under ordinary conditions.

Mr. MORPHY: What justification is there for them doing that?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not complaining. It is a regulation of the United States Government, and I suppose they have their own reasons for it. I do not mean for a moment to say that they are doing it to be unneighbourly, or anything of that kind.

Mr. MORPHY: What does our Government do in return?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know. I only happen to know this because a few days ago

I received a letter from an organization in New Brunswick, known as the New Brunswick Potato Exchange, who are really the greatest potato dealers in Canada, pointing this out to me, and wanting to know if something could not be done to remedy it. The result of this method of determining the duty by the United States is that we pay a great deal more than we really should.

10 p.m.

I would not attempt to say what the surplus in the United States will be this year, but I know it will be very large. As regards Canada, I have been told by gentlemen interested in the business that, without taking the Maritime Provinces at all, the surplus in Canada will be six or seven million bushels. If that be true, it is perfectly safe to say that we shall have a surplus in Canada of at least 10,000,000 bushels, because in the maritime province alone I think we shall have a surplus of about 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 bushels. So if I am right in the information I have received—and if I am not the minister can correct me—the surplus this year will be easily 10,000,000 bushels. In other years, when there has been a shortage of potatoes in Quebec and Ontario, we have been able to ship out potatoes there, but when there is no shortage in Quebec and Ontario, we have no market for our potatoes except the United States. Let me give the House an illustration of what that means. In the spring of 1915, there were, I think I am safe in saying, from half a million to a million bushels of potatoes sold in New Brunswick at 15 cents a bushel, and tens of thousands of bushels were thrown on the dump because there was not stock enough to eat them up. The reason for this condition was that there was no demand for potatoes in Quebec and Ontario, and we were debarred by the regulations from sending our potatoes to the United States. The House can readily see the importance of having the United States market open to us. If the provinces of Quebec and Ontario want potatoes, we have them for them, but if they do not want them, unless we can sell to the United States or Cuba, we have absolutely no market and are in exactly the same position we were in in the spring of 1915.

Mr. MORPHY: Do the farmers of New Brunswick make potatoes their sole production?

M. CARVELL: I am sorry to say that they do, to a greater extent than they ought to. I know for a fact that one of my constituents made $20,000—and this was clear profit—from forty acres of land.

Mr. HANNA: That was an exception.

Mr. CARVELL: I admit that if the price of potatoes was always the same as last year's price, I would not be arguing for a remission of duty or anything else, but would be asking the Food Controller to get busy as quickly as he could. But this year, as I said before, there is an enormous surplus in Ontario and in the West and in the East, and unless we have access to the United States market we cannot sell our product. Fortunately, we have access now, but we are compelled to pay ten per cent duty. As I pointed out it really means 15 per cent because of the way the value is assessed. If hon. gentlemen will look at the United States tariff of 1913 they will find the free list starting at item 387. Item 581, page 54, deals with potatoes, and is as follows:

581. Potatoes, and potatoes dried, desiccated, or otherwise prepared, not specially provided for in this section: provided that any of the foregoing specified articles shall be subject to a duty of ten per centum ad valorem when imported directly or indirectly from a country, dependency, or rather subdivision of government which imposes a duty on such articles imported from the United States.

In other words, potatoes are free unless they come from a country which imposes a duty upon potatoes coming from the United States, in which case the duty is ten per cent ad valorem. The section of the United States tariff dealing with wheat, item 644, is as follows:

644. Wheat, wheat flour, semolina, and other wheat products, not specially provided for in this section: provided that wheat shall be subject to a duty of 10 cents per bushel, that wheat flour shall be subject to a duty of 45 cents per barrel of 196 pounds, and semolina and other products of wheat, not specially provided for in this section, ten per centum ad valorem when imported directly or indirectly from a country, dependency, or other subdivision of government which imposes a duty on wheat or wheat flour or semolina imported from the United States.

It will be seen, therefore, that the latter part of these two clauses are identical. The law was made exactly the same regarding wheat, wheat products, semolina, and potatoes. Under the War Measures Act, as hon. members are well aware, during the recess of the present session of Parliament, and only three or four days before Parliament re-assembled, the Government passed an Order in Council placing wheat, wheat flour, and semolina on the free list. I shall not go into that question again, because it has already been discussed in the House. At the same time I think I have a right to argue, and I am sure no hon. gentleman will disagree with me, that having the right to do this with wheat and wheat products, they have the same right with regard to potatoes. Therefore, it comes down to a question of policy. The law is there and the machinery is there. All it needs is a simple Order in Council which may be passed in ten minutes at any time, and potatoes can be made free.

If they are made free coming into Canada, we can send our surplus product into the United States free of duty. As I pointed out during the last year and a half this has meant a tax paid by the people of my province, and very largely of my constituency, amounting to about half a million dollars. This year we shall be in a much worse shape than we were last year, because we must sell our potatoes to the United States and Cuba, as there is no other market for us. What I want the Government to do, and what in my judgment they should do, as a matter of fair-handed justice is: treat us the same as they treated the West, pass an Order in Council removing the duty on potatoes coming into Canada, and automatically you will remove the duty on potatoes going into the United States from Canada. Then, if another year the Government, whoever they may be, feel that conditions have changed and that it is not in the best interests of the country to retain potatoes on the free list, all they have to do is to repeal the Order in Council and the law comes back automatically to what it is at the present time. I am not asking the House or the Government to amend the Tariff Act. I am simply asking that as a measure of justice to my constituents during the present season—and the crop is being harvested now—an Order in Council be passed, placing us in a position to send our product to our only market, and realize therefore the best price available. I think that with the quantity of potatoes in the Maritime Provinces to-day, which must be sent to the United States and Cuba—which for the purpose of my argument is the same thing—it will mean at least $400,000 that we would save which otherwise will have to go into the coffers of the United States. This is a lot of money, and means a great deal to the farmers of eastern Canada.

I do not think I have anything further to say upon the subject. I have tried to discuss it in a fair, non-partisan and business-like manner. I have pointed out the conditions existing, I have pointed out the law as it is, and indicated the remedy. I simply ask the Government to give us the remedy for the present year. You need not change the Tariff Act. I sincerely hope the Government will take these representations into consideration, not within the next month or six weeks, but immediately, and will pass the necessary Order in Council so that our people may get the best price possible for their product. We shall have no market in Ontario, in Quebec, or anywhere else except in the United States and Cuba, barring, of course, a few thousand bushels—a mere bagatelle—that go to the West Indies.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Last year when the potato crop became a somewhat serious question in the province of Ontario, I obtained some figures in regard to the production of that very important vegetable, which figures I would like to submit for the consideration of the House. Potatoes are entirely different from wheat. What I mean by that is I do not think the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) is quite logical in saying that inasmuch as the Government removed the duty from wheat and wheat products, they should for the same reason remove the duty on potatoes. Wheat will keep from one year to the next; potatoes must, practically speaking, be disposed of in the year they are grown; they will not keep indefinitely. The price of wheat is not fixed in Canada, but in Great Britain. This is not the case with potatoes, the price of which is regulated by the supply on this side of the Atlantic. I think my hon. friend also makes a mistake in assuming that the only market the Maritime Provinces will have for their potatoes is in the United States and Cuba. I think he is mistaken in assuming they will have a market for their surplus potatoes in the United States. Let us look at the figures of the production of this very important article for the years 1915 and 1916, and compare the production in those two years.

In 1915 the total yield of potatoes in Canada was 62,604,000 bushels. In 1916 it was only 61,128,000 bushels, or a decrease of 1,476,000 bushels. Let us see where that shortage took place. It did not take place in the Maritime Provinces. Prince Edward Island produced 2,828,000 bushels more in 1916 than in 1915; Nova Scotia produced 2,185,000 bushels more than in 1915; and New Brunswick 1,716,000 bushels more than in 1915. That is to say, the Maritime Provinces in 1916 showed an increased production over 1915 of 6,729,000 bushels of potatoes. The province of Ontario, however, in 1916 showed a shortage of 6,250,000 bushels from the production of the previous year; while Quebec showed a shortage of 2,800,000 bushels. Thus the shortage in Ontario and Quebec more than overbalanced the increased production in the three Maritime provinces. Under normal conditions Quebec and Ontario should have supplied a market for the over-production of the Maritime Provinces. Let us look at the production in the West. Manitoba showed an increased production in 1916 over 1915 of 1,600,000 bushels, and Saskatchewan an increase of 850,000 bushels, while Alberta showed a shortage of 500,000 bushels and British Columbia a shortage of 1,100,000 bushels, as compared with the previous year. In other words, Ontario and Quebec together showed a decrease from the previous year's production of over 9,000,000 bushels; the western provinces showed an increase over the production of the previous year of 850,000 bushels; while the Maritime Provinces showed an increase of 6,729,000 bushels. We were in the position, in Ontario, and in Quebec to a lesser extent, of having a very great shortage in a very important crop. Ordinarily we would have been helped out in Ontario by the Quebec crop, which as a rule is quite large. We did not have an opportunity to bring potatoes from the western provinces, although they showed some increase.

The United States in 1916 showed a shortage of 75,000,000 bushels from the previous year. There seemed to be a general shortage on this continent except in the Maritime Provinces and one or two western provinces. In England there was a shortage of 13,250,000 bushels; in Ireland, a great potato producing country, a shortage of over 47,000,000 bushels; and in Scotland a shortage of over 6,500,000 bushels; while the potato crop was also short in Italy and Switzerland. Totalling the figures, we find a shortage in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom in 1916 as compared with that of 1915 of 153,000,000 bushels. Consequently for any surplus that we had in the western provinces or in the Maritime Provinces we had a very serious competitor in the United States. There was a shortage throughout the United States, and consequently a demand for potatoes from any source. Taking one year with another, the nineteen northern states, the principal potato producing states of the Union, produce over 60 per cent of the crop of potatoes in the United States. But they fell away below the average in 1916—some 44 per cent—and more than 50 per cent below the average of the previous five years.

Let us consider this for a moment. The situation in Ontario last fall was this: There was a great shortage of potatoes here and the prices went up rapidly. I could have bought all the potatoes I wanted about potato digging time in the fall for $2 a bag. But, like every person else, I thought that price was pretty high; it was a great deal higher than we had been accustomed to paying in Ontario, and people held back and did not put in a supply. The cold weather came on and we could not bring potatoes from the Maritime Provinces or from the West without risk of frost and the price went up out of sight. That explains the high price of potatoes in Ontario and Quebec last year.

My hon. friend seems to think—and I do not wish to question his sincerity in the matter—that the solution of the difficulty, so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, is the removal of duty so that potatoes may pass readily from the United States into Canada or from Canada into the United States. I do not agree in that conclusion. I recognize that the potato crop in the Maritime Provinces is a very important crop, and I suppose that if the potato growers in the Maritime Provinces were making an average of $500 an acre, or a clear profit of $20,000 on every forty acres of potatoes, they would not do much grumbling whether they had a duty or not. I do not suppose the hon. member wants us to infer that they are making that on the average. I will admit that in the ordinary year there will be little prospect of Maritime Province potatoes coming in any great quantity into the province of Quebec.

There will be a greater market in Ontario than in Quebec. I know that Maritime Province potatoes have come into Ontario for years and years, I think to a larger extent than into Quebec, because we raise less potatoes in Ontario than they do in Quebec. But, in view of the fact that they have just as good soil for raising potatoes in the United States as we have in Canada, and that the principal potato producing states in the Union are the Northern States, which produce over 60 per cent of the total output of that country, taking one year with another, where is there going to be any relief? If we happen to have a shortage in Ontario and Quebec, as we had last year, there will be just as good a market in Ontario and Quebec for Maritime Province potatoes as in the United States. If there happens to be a shortage in the United States, potatoes will go that way. On the other hand, in the United States, where, taking one year with the other, they have invariably a very large surplus—up in the millions of bushels—if the barriers are taken down, the potatoes will go from the United States into the Maritime Provinces, or other provinces of Canada, where ordinarily the Maritime Provinces would be looking for a market.

Mr. MACDONALD: We raise a surplus of potatoes in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. CARVELL: It would be "carrying coals to Newcastle."

Mr. EDWARDS: If you say there will be no market for United States in the Maritime Provinces because you have more than you require, I say that, taking one year with another, the United States have more than they require for their own use, and taking potatoes to the United States will be "carrying coals to Newcastle." If the argument holds in one case it will hold good in the other. If the production of potatoes in the United States is chiefly confined to the Northern States, you have your competitors right at your door. Taking one year with another, there is a large surplus of potatoes in the United States. They are looking for a market. They ship their potatoes to all parts of the world, wherever they can find a market for them The position is somewhat similar in regard to hay. You will see a great difference in the price of hay, sometimes a dollar or two a ton, within a distance of a hundred miles. There will be a remarkable difference in the quotations at Toronto and the quotations at Guelph. Locality cuts a bigger figure in fixing the price of potatoes than anything you can name. In various parts of Ontario the price of potatoes varies greatly. Potatoes were selling at $4 a bag in Kingston when you could buy all you wanted in Pembroke for $2.75 or $3 a bag, and Pembroke is only a short distance away. But they happened to have a very good crop in that locality There will not be the relief the hon. gentleman anticipates from the removal of the duty.

The hon. gentleman may say "what objection have you? If it is not going to be much of a relief it is not going to be much of a damage." That is a fair argument, but my main objection is a question of principle. I think if we accede to the demand from one section of the country, for instance from the Maritime Provinces, in regard to potatoes, another section of the country will make a demand in regard to some product which abounds in that section. I do not think that is a good practice to follow. I maintain that we have to take into consideration climatic conditions. The climate of this country and the climate of the country with which we have to deal have to be considered. Our farmers are handicapped in this time of world competition because we compete with countries thousands of miles away which formerly we did not consider rivals. We must take into consideration the climate of Argentina, for instance, and the climate of certain parts of the United States, if we are going to be true to our own people. I say it is not a proper principle to enunciate that we should have free trade with this country, or free trade with that country. It might be all right, if conditions were alike in other respects, but the tariff is a means to a certain extent, of equalizing conditions which are rendered unequal because of a rigorous climate in one case and a mild climate in another. In Ontario and Quebec we have to provide against the frost, whereas our competitors to the south of us do not have that expense, by reason of the mildness of their climate. I do not think there will be anything like the relief the hon. member anticipates by making potatoes free, and I think it is introducing a dangerous principle.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings P.E.I.): The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) deserves a great deal of credit for bringing this question to the notice of the House and asking the Government to take some action immediately to relieve the situation in the Maritime provinces. We in the Maritime provinces--and I speak more particularly for Prince Edward Island—did not feel the necessity for a market in the United States during the past two years for our potatoes but conditions this year are such that there is practically no other market for the surplus product of the Maritime provinces. We either have to sell in the United States, or not sell at all, because potatoes are not wanted in Ontario, or in the western provinces, or in any part of Quebec. A small quantity may, and probably will, be wanted in Newfoundland, but only a small proportion of what we have to dispose of, and, therefore, the market of the United States is the only market we have in the universe.

There is a market in that country for our surplus potatoes—not at a high price this year, but at some price, because 90,000,000 or 100,000,000 people consume an enormous quantity of potatoes. I believe that the crop in the United States this year is estimated at about 420,000,000 bushels. The member for Carleton estimates—I think his estimate is low—that we shall have a surplus crop in Canada of 10,000,000 bushels. There will be a surplus crop of 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 in the Maritime Provinces, 3,000,000 of which will be produced in Prince Edward Island. Of course, we can feed some of this surplus crop to the stock, but there is not enough stock to consume anything like the whole of it. The crop this year will be as good as that of last year, when we had a splendid market in Ontario, in some parts of Quebec and in the United States. Ontario seldom takes any considerable quantity of potatoes from the Maritime Provinces, at any rate from Prince Edward Island; ordinarily they produce almost enough for themselves. In order to produce potatoes or any other commodity successfully, a steady market is much more necessary than a market that may give a high price one year and an exceedingly low price the next two or three years. That is one reason why the market of the United States, so far as potatoes are concerned, is so valuable to the farmers of the Maritime Provinces. When the importing country is very short of the product imported and must get it at any price, the importer pays a large portion of the duty. But when conditions in a country like the United States are such as they are this year; when they have a large crop and do not find it necessary to import our potatoes, then the exporter pays the duty on potatoes sent into that country. Why is it that we can find a market in the United States for our surplus potatoes? Because of the fact that eight or ten million bushels of potatoes more or less will make no appreciable difference in a country which has a crop of over 400,000,000 bushels. The United States market will not be greatly affected by our surplus potatoes being sent into that country; therefore they can take our surplus produce, at some price.

Mr. CARVELL: And they are taking it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: And they are taking it; as a matter of fact it is the only place to which we can ship our potatoes at this time. The farmers of Prince Edward Island will get a very low price for their potato crop this year, no matter what the Government may do, and an addition of five or six cents a bushel to the price that they would otherwise get would be of immense benefit to them. A few days ago I happened to be in Boston and, talking to some potato buyers there, I noticed that in figuring up the price that they could pay for potatoes, they invariably deducted the duty. I do not see any reason why the Government should refuse to grant the concession asked for on behalf of the farmers of the Maritime provinces. In the month of April last the Government by their provision for free wheat, gave the farmers of the West access to the United States market for that staple product. Every body admits that that was a great advantage to the western farmer; it was asked for by representative men from western Canada, grain growers and other bodies, as well as members of Parliament representing that part of the country. The right to send wheat and wheat products into the United States free of duty must be of great advantage to the people of this country, otherwise these strong representations would not have been made in favour of Government action. Why, then, does the Government hesitate to act now? I trust that the Government will not hesitate further; I do not think that on principle they can reasonably do so. They should not hesitate to relieve the farmers of eastern Canada and the maritime provinces of the payment into the United States treasury of at least $400,000. I am satisfied that the removal of the duty upon potatoes entering the United States this year would mean $150,000 to the farmers of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does my hon. friend contend that the maritime province farmer pays the duty imposed by the United States if he sends his potatoes into that country?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I certainly do, under present conditions. The member for Carleton stated most emphatically that the difference between the price of potatoes in New Brunswick and the price of potatoes in Maine, across the boundary line, is simply the amount of the duty.

Mr. CARVELL: I am a potato grower myself, and I keep in close touch with matters of this kind. I say most emphatically that there never was a time during the last two or three years—during the last five years, for that matter—when potatoes in the State of Maine, ten miles from my home, were not worth more than potatoes in my country just to the extent of the duty. Even when potatoes were worth $7 a barrel in my town, they were worth $7.70 to $8 a barrel ten miles away in the State of Maine. No matter whether the price is high or low, the difference between the price in the State of Maine and the price in the county of Carleton is simply the amount of the duty.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it not a fact that my hon. friend and others on his side of the House have constantly argued that when products are imported from the State of Maine into Montreal and other parts of Quebec, the consumer invariably pays the duty, and that if they go the other way the exporter pays the duty? Hon. gentlemen are advancing a double-barrelled argument.

Mr. CARVELL: I have not the right to argue the matter now, but I have stated upon a pretty good business knowledge of the facts what the condition is as it exists to-day in regard to the marketing of our own potato crop.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The hon. member for Carleton has answered the question proposed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and the question proposed by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright). I stated in the early part of my remarks—I think the hon. member for Frontenac was not paying attention—that, under the conditions we had last year when potatoes were a necessity in the United States, when the crop there was exceedingly small as compared with the crop in Canada, when they had to get potatoes almost at any price, they paid the duty; but under present conditions, when they are under no necessity whatever of importing our potatoes and when we are under the necessity of sending our potatoes into the United States if we are to sell them at all, I believe we take the price less the duty; that is, we pay the duty.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is, when they have more potatoes of their own than they want

Mr. HUGHES: More than they want, but not more than they can use.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is what your argument comes to.

Mr. HUGHES: That is a matter that my hon. friends can convert into an academic question if they want to do so, but at the present time we are up against a condition and not a theory. The United States is the only country in the world in which we can dispose of our surplus product this year. My hon. friend from Frontenac stated a few moments ago that we should not expect a market in the United States for potatoes for the reason that the nineteen northern States constitute a large potato growing area which is very similar in climatic and soil conditions to the Maritime Provinces—I think that was his argument. Straitway however, he claimed that we could get a market in Ontario whose climatic and other conditions are surely more like those of the Maritime Provinces than are those of the United States. There is a good deal of similarity between the northern States and Canada in regard to soil and climatic conditions, but the northern States of the United States find a market for their surplus product in those southern States that do not produce sufficient potatoes for their own use. The need thus created by the sending of potatoes from the northern States to the South leaves a market for our potatoes in the northern States.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Carleton to the embargo placed by the United States upon our potatoes in 1913 when the Government of that country thought our potatoes were diseased.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. member really think they thought that?

Mr. HUGHES: I do.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not. I know personally the men who put up the whole game.

Mr. HUGHES: I hold the Americans were justified in so thinking because our Government so informed them. That was more than a mistake on the part of our Government—it was a crime.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend is making rather strong statements which I am afraid he cannot substantiate.

Mr. HUGHES: But I can substantiate them. In the autumn of 1913, when this matter was being considered at Washington, an officer of the Department of Agriculture attended the conference there and stated that our potatoes had the disease known as powdery scab. The inference, therefore, was that those potatoes should be excluded from the American market, and the Americans took us at our word. The Department of Agriculture sent men called professors to Prince Edward Island. I do not know whether they went to the other Maritime Provinces.

Mr. CARVELL: They did go—right into the cellars.

Mr. HUGHES: Those professors claimed they found a disease there. Events, how-ev r, have proved that there was no disease. When those gentlemen who knew the Latin names of plants—and that I am afraid is all they did know—came amongst us and told us that our potatoes were greatly infected with powdery scab, we, in our innocence, thought they were telling us facts.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend has stated that in the fall of 1913, the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada sent a man down to Washington, and that at a conference there he told the authorities that our potatoes had the disease known as powdery scab. Will he give us the name of the official so that we can trace the matter up? I doubt the accuracy of his statement very much.

Mr. HUGHES: I am not responsible for the fact that my hon. friend doubts the accuracy of my statement. I am prepared to hear him make such a remark, but I will give him the name of the official, and then, perhaps, he will not be such a doubting Thomas.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is the best way to get at it.

Mr. HUGHES: If my hon. friend had asked me for the name without expressing a doubt as to the accuracy of my statement, it would have been more gentlemanly. The name of that official is Dr. Gussow.

Mr. CARVELL: A gentleman who will not have a vote at the next election.

Mr. HUGHES: I was making a few remarks about those gentlemen who came to our province to tell us that we had diseased potatoes. During the last year or two, and particularly during last year, we have not seen one of those professors in that province, and at the same time we have not seen or heard of powdery scab. The professors took their departure and the powdery scab went at the same time. To illustrate what those gentlemen knew about the business, I think it was in the fall of 1912, fairly late in the season, that two of them visited a farm in Brudenell in which potatoes are largely grown, and they inspected the cellar of Robert Stewart. I am just mentioning the names so that there will be no mistake about the matter. They told him his potatoes were badly diseased with powdery scab; that under no circumstances should he use them for seed, and that if he did so, he would not only ruin his own farm but greatly injure all the farms in the neighbourhood. The next year two other potato professors came along and this time they came in the month of September. When they visited us in the previous year the potatoes were all dug and in the root houses or in the cellars. On this occasion, they inspected the fields. Mr. Stewart had paid no attention to the two professors who visited him in 1912. He knew there was no disease in his potatoes more than there had been for forty years. He planted the same seed. The next year when these other two gentlemen came there, they gave him a clean Bill of health. They said that his was the only farm in the neighbourhood that had no disease.

Mr. CARVELL: Were those two professors the same men that visited the place the year before?

Mr. HUGHES: No—two other professors. I think it was in the fall of 1913 two gentlemen came to the province and I remember their names. They were Prof. Adams and Prof. Holmes or Holmden. Professor Adams came from Ireland, and knew all about powdery scab and diseased potatoes generally. He led off by telling the farmers what caused the disease, and among other things mentioned that a moist climate and lime in the soil were both favourable to the disease. He said that the disease would likely be prevalent in Prince Edward Island owing to our damp climate, but the fact of there being no lime in our soil was in our favour. The next professor who came to the platform told the assembled farmers how to eradicate the disease if they were unfortunate enough to have it. It was a difficult thing to eradicate, he said. If a farmer crossed a field of potatoes that were infected with powdery scab, and did not scrape the soil off his boots when he left the field, he would likely carry the disease to another field. He must not use in any other field a plough or a harrow or any other implement that had been used in a field where there was powdery scab. He must stop growing potatoes on that land for five, or six, or seven years. One way of preventing the disease was to spray the root houses, or the places where the potatoes were stored, with a solution of formaldehyde. If that could not be obtained, the next best thing was to sprinkle the cellars and the outhouses with a lime whitewash, washing the ceilings with lime and water. I was present at the meeting and asked him how lime in the soil could produce the disease, and lime in the cellar kill it. He said he would answer that question the next evening, but the next evening he was thirty miles away. I was there, however, and asked him the same question, and he said that the chairman should not allow questions of that kind to be put, but only nice, easy questions. These and many other incidents that I could mention so disgusted the farmers with the professors who came to enlighten them that they absolutely refused to listen to them. Fortunately, none of those gentlemen have visited us for the last year or two. I do not know whether these professors are still in the department or what they are doing, but if the minister has no use for them, I would suggest that he send them to the war. He has not sent them to our province for the last year or two, and the people are very much pleased in consequence.

The point I wish to bring to the minister's attention is this: it is of the very greatest importance that under present conditions every obstacle to the free entry of our surplus potatoes this year to the United States should be removed. The Government can remove all obstacles by an Order in Council taking the duty off American potatoes coming into Canada, and if it is found desirable to revoke that Order in Council next year it could be done, but I do not believe it would be done. It is a most important thing for the people of the Maritime Provinces, and particularly for the farmers of Prince Edward Island, to have free access to the United States market for their surplus potatoes. Prince Edward Island is admirably adapted for growing potatoes. We have a friable, loamy soil, easily drained, no extremes of heat or cold, and an abundance of sea manure in the bays and rivers obtainable without money cost by fifty per cent of our farmers. It is the most profitable crop our farmers have, and the farmer himself is the best judge of that. There is no industry to which he will so readily give his labour as the growing of potatoes, provided he is reasonably certain of a fair price every year, and that, I maintain, can only be assured by having free access, or as nearly as possible, to the American market. I sincerely trust the Government will carefully consider this matter in the light of present conditions. If they will only treat the farmers of the Maritime Province in the same 11 p.m. way that they have treated the farmers in the prairie provinces, if they will only give us the same chance, we shall be satisfied.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (St. James, Montreal) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, from the discussion which has been going on from both sides of this House about potatoes and other food stuffs, I am led to believe that I may pertinently discuss here and now the high cost of living.

Upon that subject, indeed, I have heard in this House, for at least four or five months past, most elaborate speeches well supported by documents. For my part, I believe something should be done without any further delay in order to control the cost of living in this country.

When this question was debated, some have sided with the farmers, fearing that the latter could not sell their produce high enough, and others did assert that the farmers were in no way at fault, but that the blame should be laid upon the forestaller or middlemen, upon the cold storage proprietors, etc. In fine, many arguments, but no solution.

A food controller, it is true, has been appointed. He has been in office for three months already. Has he succeeded in doing anything? No!

On this very day, he is sitting in Toronto, together with some experts appointed by the Government to investigate into the O'Connor report; but, meanwhile, matters are becoming serious in Montreal, where the population is getting stirred up and certain newspapers, La Presse among others, are beginning a campaign in favour of the citizens of Montreal.

In its evening edition of to-day, Mr. Speaker, La Presse says:

> According to calculations made recently and based upon excellent data, there were, in the beginning of September, in the various Canadian Cold Storage warehouses, 14,948,540 dozens of eggs; 20,480,809 lbs of butter; 19,693,704 lbs of cheese; 13,648,782 lbs of beef; fresh or frozen; 566,895 lbs of corn beef; 10,302,645 lbs of pork, fresh or frozen; 19,689,874 lbs of cured pork; 1,619,137 lbs of ham; 10,856,548 lbs of lard; 1,543,558 lbs of bacon; 15,546,732 lbs of fish; 1,844,207 lbs of poultry. These figures, which show to what extent the provision forestalling is going on throughout the country, become even more eloquent when compared to those of the previous year, and indeed everybody knows how little restraint was shown in 1916, by the monopolizers in their work of accumulating provisions in their cold storage plants to the detriment of the consumers. These quantities are held in 180 cold storage plants, that is 88 per cent of the total number of warehouses. In 1916, the stored up quantities were as follows: eggs, 9,713,824 dozen; butter, 11,960,164 lbs; cheese, 12,251,431 lbs; beef, 8,373,037 lbs, pork, 20,194,226 lbs; bacon and ham, 9,838,981 lbs; fish, 6,926,991.
> In the face of such figures, there is no wonder if from every section of Canada alarming cries are being raised. There is no wonder that our leading citizens, as shown in the interviews we have published yesterday and by those we are giving out to-day, are asking Mr.

Hanna, the food controller, to come at last to a decision and adopt stringent measures in order to stop this forestalling and make it so we can get foodstuffs at prices somewhat less inaccessible.

The commission appointed by the Government to investigate the report made by Mr. W. F. O'Connor, the high cost of living commissioner, as to the prices of bacon and of ham, opened its sittings yesterday in the Toronto City Hall. A preliminary meeting had already been held six weeks ago. The whole session was taken up yesterday, just to receive the reports of the Government auditors who have been, for the past six weeks, examining the books of the William Davies Co., for the period extending from 1913 to March 1917. The reports show an enormous increase both in the volume of the transactions and in the profits realized since the beginning of the war. Mr. C. E. Fox, the company's general manager, has declared that the company's surplusages have been, leaving out the deductions to be made, of $340,905 in 1913; $377,350 in 1914; $906,428 in 1915; $1,757,180 in 1916; and of $1,723,600 for the present year. The profits have been as follows: in 1913, $166,826; 1914, $164,665; 1915, $580,750; 1916, $1,539,473; 1917, $1,379,904.

When Mr. Fox was asked how it was that bacon was being sold at a lower price in England than in Canada, he simply replied that the quality was not quite the same.

Mr. Contant, ex-chairman of the Montreal Board of Trade, a man of some standing, gives a very simple interview, but it is most timely and to the point. He says: "The matter is very simple, nothing for us, but everything for overseas."

That is true. We have been discussing here, and we are still discussing all the time, the best means to adopt in order to transport the provisions across the ocean. A few minutes ago, the tariff question came up; some fear that it might be taken away, as far as potatoes are concerned. They pretend to discuss the foodstuff question from the agricultural and trade standpoint, but the fact is the only object in view is to favour transportation more or less, nothing else.

Mr. Contant further says:

Mr. Hanna has done nothing, or, rather, I believe he has done something, but not for us. He seems to have only one concern, that is that they may not be wanting in any way, in England. But, as to the cost of eatables here!

Mr. Alphonse Racine, one of Montreal's largest merchants and a number of the consulting board of the Food Commission, also speaks in the same sense. He says that nothing is being done.

This question, says he, cannot be discussed without a careful study. But, if you speak about coal, I think I am in a position to tell you that our supply is at present larger than it was last year, at the same date. Besides, I think I may also state that the fuel controller has taken the necessary means to secure us the coal we shall need this winter. You may say that coal is not scarcer than last year, but on the contrary it is in larger quantity and that those who believe in a dearth are mistaken.

However, Mr. Speaker, coal is selling at exorbitant prices in Montreal. Why cannot these gentlemen agree upon an acceptable price?

Mr. J. A. Paulhus.

The manager of the firm D. Hatton Company cannot see of what use has been the appointment of Mr. Hanna as food controller. "There will always be only one way to settle those question of high prices," says he, "it is the simple move of demand and supply. If the people think certain foodstuffs are being sold to them too high, there is a very simple remedy, let them refuse to buy any food costing too dear, such as eggs, and let them buy something else. The food forestallers who are asking too big prices shall then be compelled to come down. But why do not the people buy fish in larger quantities? Fish costs less than meat and it is easily digested."

Mr. J. E. Normandin.

Mr. J. E. Normandin, of the Normandin Optical Co., says that he has vainly tried to find it out, he cannot yet see what good the food controller, Mr. Hanna, has done for the country. "It is evident," says he, "that he has thought more often of the oversea people than of the citizens of Canada."

The opinion of the mayor of Montreal is also well known. It has been recorded more than once. Many a time, he has risen up in this House to criticize, more or less, the way the public are being treated as to the cost of living.

The Mayor's opinion.

Before leaving for Ottawa, yesterday afternoon, the mayor of Montreal had time enough to say a few words to the representative of La Presse on the food question.

As all those who have thus far spoken to us, he was most explicit in his declaration and stated he was much dissatisfied with the methods followed by the food dictator, methods which he considers both inefficient and too lacking in vigour.

"It is not sufficient," said he, "to tell the consumers: 'On such and such a day, you shall eat so and so.' They must, moreover, be put in a position to follow such advice, by seeing to it, that the prices be not too high and by preventing the improper forestalling which causes a fictitious scarcity of available supplies.

"He should have forbidden the slaughtering of young cattle, of calves, lambs and young pigs, in order to maintain the herds.

"He should also have prevented the trusts from accumulating foodstuffs in cold storage, thus leaving them in sufficient quantities so that the prices be not raised too high. And then, there is no need waiting after the trusts for lowering those prices: the Government and the food dictator have full power to lower them themselves. But nothing of the kind has been done.

"Nothing has been efficiently regulated. They were satisfied to bother the people by asking them not to eat of this nor of that, while the articles of which they are deprived are verily more plentiful than ever, such as beef and bacon. The latter article cannot even be exported to England any more. Then, whom do they want to favour, by preventing the Canadian consumers from buying it?

"And meanwhile, all the provisions are reaching incredible prices. A single Montreal dealer has thousands of eggs in storage and we must pay them as high as sixty cents a dozen. Potatoes are being sold at ridiculous prices.

"The lack of real control of victuals is a sinister farce, a national crime."

Alderman Dubeau.

"The war has been lasting more than three years," remarked the representative of Lafontaine Ward, "and during all that time, the Government have done nothing, either to prevent the rise in the prices for provisions, or to regulate their price, such as it has been successfully done by the Food dictators in France and in England. Recently, realizing that general elections were soon at hand, the Government have appointed a food dictator, to befool the people into believing that conditions would soon be improved. Mr. Hanna has been in office for several months already and not a single article of food has fallen in price: on the contrary, several have gone up, such as milk, eggs, etc. He has ordered meatless days: that has been a failure. He has prohibited the use of bacon: England wants no more of it. The bacon accumulates in the warehouses and the price is kept high. Some have asked the introduction of oleomargarine, on account of the high price of butter: the Government refuse. In fine, the food controller, up to date, has been an immense humbug!"

Alderman Vandelac.

The representative of St. Jean-Baptiste Ward protested against the fact that the store-house owners hoard up foodstuffs, allow them to deteriorate and even to rot completely, while the Government are doing nothing to take advantage of that abundance in bringing about a decline in prices.

"Certain store-house owners," did he assert, "keep these establishments full all the time. They have sheds in the country-places, where they put the surplus which could not find any room in the city storage plants. Thus, they always have an abundant supply from which they take only what is strictly necessary for consumption, so that the prices don't go down and that the consumer be forced to give his last cent to feed and clothe himself and his family."

Alderman Blumenthal.

The representative of St. Louis Ward straightforwardly declared that the Government was taking the wrong course in the food control question.

"They are incessantly talking of over production," said he, "but that is hardly necessary, for we produce in abundance and more so. Let them now tell us about an equitable distribution among the people of the results of that production. It is all right to export and to leave us only what we need: nobody complains of that. But where just recriminations are heard, that is when we are asked exorbitant prices for every thing sold us, without any possible justification as to any scarcity whatever in the foodstuffs.

"Let us take fish, for instance: is there any thing more common? Anything which can be procured with a smaller effort? And, yet, the Government permit it to be sold at ridiculously exaggerated prices. It is about time to put a stop to this."

It is true that Mr. Hanna, the food controller, advises us to eat fish, to buy fish; he goes as far as telling us it is easily digestible; but, Mr. Speaker, fish is as dear to-day, if not dearer than meat. I do not know what the matter is, but fish is controlled in some way, or the Government do not facilitate its transportation from the Maritime Provinces to Montreal and other ports of the country.

There are still other interviews in the article of La Presse which I have just read. There is that of Mr. Arthur Lamothe, secretary of the Carpenters and Joiners District Council; those of Mr. Alfred Côté, of Mr. J. A. Laflamme, of Mr. Moïse Printemps, of Mr. Edmond Berthiaume, of Mr. N. Lafleur and of Mr. O. Proulx. All are in the same sense as those I have just quoted.

There is at present in Montreal a feeling of indignation on that subject, and in the editorial of La Presse, that feeling is well described. I am anxious to see it entered in Hansard, so that the whole country may know it.

A COMEDY WHICH IS BECOMING DIGUSTING.

The general clamour against the food dictator is still increasing; that outcry rises from the suffering masses who have not, unconsciously or unwillingly, been protected against the odious speculations of which they are the victims, as much if not more than ever before. And the Government who has appointed Mr. Hanna is, naturally held responsible for the inertness of its own creature. It is no longer a feeling of ordinary discontent, it is one of wrath, of that popular wrath provoked by badly kept or discarded promises, by deluded expectations, by indefinitely tolerated extortions, by an unbridled debauchery of forestalling, by the impudent arrogance of the trusts directly or indirectly encouraged, by the deplorable manner of proceeding on the part of the food dictatorship, that seems solely, engrossed in preserving for speculation the most needed alimentary articles, without any concern whether, tomorrow, the working man, at home, will not starve, or whether the small-salaried people will not die of starvation, on account of not being able to get the food they need.

Threatens to resign.

Mr. Hanna is being censured even by members of his advisory staff. Thus it is that Alderman Weldon, who represents the city of Montreal upon the consultative board of the food dictator, is not afraid to publicly declare that his office is more honorary than honourable, and that he will promptly offer his resignation, if he is not very soon given an opportunity to help along his fellow-citizens and his country. He does not consider that the food control, such as it is now operating, is actually helpful nor efficient. It acts far too slowly, without any appreciable result for the consumer.

The workingmen are deceived.

On his part, Commissioner Ainey declares that Mr. Hanna's inertness is to be regretted. When the Montreal Trades and Labour Council asked for the appointment of a dictator, it was in order that the latter, not only regulate the export conditions and the food distribution, but also that he should fix prices in such a way as to put a check on the unbridled speculation of the profiteers. The workingmen have been deceived in their legitimate expectations.

A deadly trick.

Commissioner Côté qualifies the food dictator's appointment as a "deadly trick," whilst in public meetings, in Montreal, the Government is charged with becoming the accomplice of the speculators and of the profiteers, letting Mr. Hanna starve the people, while prices are on the rise and foodstuffs are being hoarded in the cold storage warehouses.

An odious accumulation.

The public are justified in demanding that the foodstuff prices be regulated, especially so when they are imposing upon them restrictions from which they are already suffering enough on account of the excessive prices exacted from them for articles of prime necessity. What occult power is there to prevent Mr. Hanna from doing his duty, or what are the influences that cause him to hesitate between the protection the consumers are entitled to and the speculators' interests? The Order in Council which has appointed him dictator, gives him full power to investigate the prices of provisions and also to regulate them; what use is there for him to preach us the great principle of demand and supply, when he knows that this economic equilibrium has ceased to exist, ever since the beginning of the war, that it has been destroyed by the very people who are making a greater show of it in order to impose upon us more odiously. Is it reasonable, for instance, to pay bacon fifty cents a pound, in order that Mr. Flavelle may realize, in 1917, the enormous gain of $1,397,903, when such profits had seemed satisfactory, in 1913, when they were $16,826? Why does Mr. Hanna allow the hoarding of foodstuffs in the profiteers' cold storage plants, when the prices are always going up? On the 1st of September, indeed, 130 cold storage plants, throughout the country, contained 14,948,540 dozen of eggs; 20,480,809 lbs of butter; 19,693,704 lbs of cheese; 14,215,677 lbs of beef; 29,989,515 lbs of pork; 14,019,243 lbs of lard; leaving out mutton, lamb, fish and poultry, of which large quantities will be lost through the fact of not marketing them in time.

I have already stated, when I began these remarks, the quantities of pork hoarded in these establishments.

During the same time, the food dictator puts on the salaried lists specialists in domestic economy to prepare bills of fare for our housewives, when the greater part of the foods set down on these menus are inaccessible to ordinary purses, and are no longer, on account of their exorbitant cost, to be seen on the table of a large number of workingmen and of petty employees. Wheat porridge, with milk and sugar, has become a luxury; milk is hardly sufficient for infants' food, when some can be had, and sugar is only used to sweeten the bitter taste of light tea. The ham and eggs which figures on the bill of fare of a "war breakfast" prepared by the domestic economy specialists of the food dictator, is a sort of heart-rending irony, with eggs at 60 cents a dozen and ham at about the same price a pound; it is a pasha's dish. And what about roast beef, roast veal, pork chops, poached eggs, butter for gravies, marmalades which have doubled in price in less than a year; green peas, the canning of which is forbidden; onions which are only sold by the pound; fruits which cost much dearer than their nutritive value; syrups, which we must give up because it takes sugar to make them, and molasses which has become a luxury.

All these articles, however, are to be found on the economic menus of the food dictator, prepared for the benefit of our Canadian housewives, without even attempting to give them a chance to buy at a reasonable price what is needed to make up those bills of fare.

Is such a comedy not becoming most outrageous?

I have taken much time, Mr. Speaker, but I was anxious to lay such a state of affairs before the eyes of the public, and I shall continue to do so until the end of the session. On that point, I have the support of all those who suffer and who pay, not only of the Montreal population, but of the whole of Canada. I contend that this Parliament has not gone far enough to relieve the people on that stand. I say Parliament, for we also, on the Opposition side, have had some faults, but the blame is especially upon the Government side. We have spoken too often, Mr. Speaker, but have done very little.

We have often heard, for instance, the hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), making fine speeches of economic trend upon this question of high cost of living; all have made nice promises, the whole matter was to be settled. Everything has been settled, that is true, but in the manner described by Mr. Contant, that is to say, every thing has been settled to cross the ocean. Whether it be the fault of the trusts or of these hoarding cold storage owners, in order to foresee a coming increase in prices, it matters little; for my part, I charge the Government with being the main cause of the evil. They are invested with full authority and they should have done their duty in the difficult circumstances we are going through. They should have done more than appoint a man who does nothing but go to and from Quebec to Toronto, from Toronto to Victoria and from Winnipeg to Vancouver, just to look over reports made by certain people whom he has called upon to check and control certain facts; he does not, however, take the trouble to fix the price of such or such article of foodstuff necessary to mere living. In a word, he is satisfied in doing nothing.

As I have just stated I shall not lose a simple opportunity, from now until the end of the session, even to-morrow perhaps, to draw the Government's attention upon this subject and to communicate to the House newspaper extracts, in order to open the eyes of the Government upon this question.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Excise—Salaries of officers and inspectors of excise, and to provide for increase depending on the result of excise examinations—further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. PROULX: Is there any provision in that for the appointment of new officers?

Mr. SEVIGNY: No, this is for increases only.

Progress reported.

WAGES OF EMPLOYEES OF RAILWAY COMPANIES—RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

House in Committee on Bill No. 103, an Act concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies. Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

Mr. REID: I have a number of amendments to the Railway Act which I wish to insert in this Bill. The object is to have them in the Bill in case the Railway Bill should not pass the Senate. The first amendment is:

Paragraph (e) of clause 34 of section 2 of the said Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:
"including any such compensation payable under the provisions of any Act of the Parliament of Canada or of any provincial legislature providing for compensation to workmen for injuries or in respect of an industrial disease."

Mr. GRAHAM: As I understand it, the sections the minister is asking us to put in this Bill have already passed both Houses.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: And would be in the new Railway Act?

Mr. REID: If it passes. The intention is just to get this up to third reading, and if we find the Railway Act will not pass the Senate, then we will ask the House to give this the third reading and send it over to the Senate. On the other hand, if the Railway Bill passes the Senate we will not ask for the third reading of this Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: As we are providing in the general Railway Act that any of the provincial laws regarding compensation for workmen's injuries shall apply here, I wish to point out that I had a rather peculiar case in my own practice within the last week or ten days. A man was killed on the Transcontinental railway under conditions which in my judgment would be negligence on the part of the Government railways. I filed a notice of the accident with the Railway Department, as provided by our statute, and I received a very courteous letter from the department claiming that they were not subject to any laws of the province of New Brunswick regarding compensation, and therefore they returned my notice to me. It seems to me if the ordinary railways of the country are subject to the laws of the province for the protection of workmen, especially in such a serious matter as where a man is killed, such as was the case here, the Government railways should either be liable or should treat the matter as if they were liable.

Mr. REID: In the Railway Act that has passed both Houses that was included was it not?

Mr. CARVELL: The Government railways were not included in that. The understanding was that they were to be included, and then the officials of the department claimed it would require a separate Bill, and that Bill has not been introduced. The Government railways are still under the Government Railways Act. As we are providing for this very case in the Railway Act, it seems a hardship that the Government railways should not come under the same provision.

Mr. REID: I agree. It is a matter that may have to be taken up next session.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. REID: I wish to move the following amendments:

Section 50 of the said Act is amended by adding the following at the end thereof:

"But where such regulation, order or decision requires any act, matter or thing to be done for the safety of the public or the employees of the railway no extension shall be granted without hearing on notice."

Subsection 1 of section 246 of the said Act is amended by inserting immediately after the word "maintained," in the third line thereof, the words "along or."

Section 269 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following paragraphs:

"(d) With respect to the length of sections required to be kept in repair by employees of the company, and with respect to the number of employees required for each section, so as to ensure safety to the public and to employees;

"(e) Limiting or regulating the hours of duty of any employees or class or classes of employees, with a view to the safety of the public and of employees; and

"(f) Providing that a specified kind of fuel or a specified kind of power or method or means of propulsion shall be used on any or all locomotives and trains in any district."

Subsection 2 of section 274 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"(2) Where a municipal bylaw of a city or town prohibits such sounding of the whistle or such ringing of the bell in respect of any such crossing or crossings within the limits of such city or town, such bylaw shall, if approved by an order of the Board to the extent of such prohibition, relieve the company and its employees from the duty imposed by this section."

Subsection 1 of section 276 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"276. Whenever in any city, town or village, any train not headed by an engine is passing over or along a highway at rail level which is not adequately protected by gates or otherwise, the company shall station on that part of the train, which is then foremost, a person who shall warn persons standing on, or crossing, or about to cross the track of such railway."

Subsection 1 of section 292 of the said Act is amended by adding at the end thereof:

"Any conductors or other employees making a report to the company of the occurrence of any such accident shall as soon as possible after such accident notify the Board of the same by telegraph."

Section 300 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"300. (1) A superior or county court judge, two justices of the peace, or a stipendiary or police magistrate, in any part of Canada, a clerk of the peace, clerk of the Crown or judge of the sessions of the peace in the province of Quebec, within whose jurisdiction the railway runs, may, on the application of the company or any clerk or agent of the company, appoint any persons who are British subjects to act as constables on and along such railway.

"(2) Every person so appointed shall take an oath or make a solemn declaration, which may be administered by any judge or other official authorized to make the appointment or to administer oaths, in the form or to the effect following, that is to say:

"'I, A.B., having been appointed a constable to act upon and along (here name the railway), under the provisions of the Railway Act, do swear that I am a British subject; that I will well and truly serve our Sovereign Lord the King in the said office of constable, without favour or affection, malice or ill-will; that I will, to the best of my power, cause the peace to be kept, and prevent all offences against the peace; and that, while I continue to hold the said office, I will, to the best of my skill and knowledge, discharge the duties thereof faithfully according to law. So help me God.'

"(3) Such appointment shall be made in writing signed by the official making the appointment, and the fact that the person appointed thereby has taken such oath or declaration shall be endorsed on such written appointment by the person administering such oath or declaration."

Subsection 1 of section 306 of the said Act is amended by striking out the word "one" in the fifth line thereof, and substituting therefor the word "two."

Section 308 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

"308. The company may for the better enforcement of the observance of any such bylaw, rule or regulation, prescribe a penalty not exceeding forty dollars for any violation thereof, and such penalty shall be enforceable on summary conviction."

Subsection 3 of section 310 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"(3) No such bylaw, rule or regulation shall have any force or effect without such sanction or after such sanction has been rescinded."

Paragraph (d) of section 393 is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"(d) Whenever in any city, town or village, any train of the company not headed by an engine is allowed to pass over or along a highway at rail level which is not adequately protected by gates or otherwise, the company does not station on that part of the train, which is then foremost, a person who shall warn persons standing on or crossing or about to cross the track of such railway."

Section 394 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) No employee shall be liable to such penalty if he proves that the carrying out or observing of the rules of the company was the cause of such obstruction, and in such case the company and its superintendent or other officer in charge of the operation of the railway, or of the division thereof upon which such obstruction occurs, shall each be guilty of the offence mentioned in this section and liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars."

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD: How does my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) feel about this? Is he satisfied?

Mr. REID: He feels all right.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister who is talking just now has five portfolios around him, but he cannot speak for the member for East Lambton. He ought to let the member speak for himself.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister is sure these amendments are all right in order?

Mr. CARVELL: I have checked them up, and they are all right.

Mr. REID: Mr. Gisborne assured me he had made an exact copy of the Bill as passed in the Senate, and he pinned the amendments in order as I have placed them before the committee. My understanding is that they are an exact copy. I should like to let the Bill stand for third reading, until we see what may happen in the Senate.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would have to go back to the Senate.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do you think it will have to go back to the Senate?

Mr. REID: I am not thinking anything.

Mr. MACDONALD: You ought to think. Do you think the other Bill is coming down, or do you think it is not?

Mr. REID: I hope so, but I want to be prepared.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not think the hon. gentleman hopes so; I think he does not want it to go through.

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact they are divided over there. Part of the Senate want the Bill to go through, and another part is standing it off. There is a division of interest. One interest is very anxious it should go through, and the other interest is anxious it should not be passed. This is a kind of a compromise, to half-please both parties, and to get rid of a very vexatious clause referring to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company.

Mr. REID: I think every member in this House would like to see the Bill go through.

Mr. CARVELL: Minus the two clauses.

Mr. REID: There is a fight over there, and these amendments before us are very important to the railway employees, and for that reason we would like to be sure they are passed.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I think I should answer the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). I am quite as anxious as he is that the Consolidated Railway Bill should become law, and while it is true the Bill has been brought in in the manner in which it has, I still have every confidence that the Senate will see their way clear to passing the Consolidated Railway Bill during this session. I cannot help but believe that they will see that the Bill is in the public interest, and should become law, and I am merely voicing the sentiments of every member in this House when I say we are all most anxious to see the Bill passed this session. I want to take this opportunity to thank the members of the committee on both sides for the non-partisan manner in which they conducted the proceedings of that committee. They worked very strenuously in connection with the legislation, and I would sincerely regret to see the Consolidated Railway Act defeated.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the minister is very doubtful about it. I admire the optimism of the hon. member for East Lambton, but here we have a peculiar situation. If the Government, who control the majority in the Senate want the General Railway Act to go through, all they have to do is to crack the whip, as they did in the case of the Canadian Northern, the Franchise Bill and sundry other Acts, and the Bill would go through automatically. My hon. friend the leader of the House is an artist about these things, and he knows how to do it, if he would simply exert himself, but he is not exerting himself. He is not applying the same strategy in dealing with the matter as he did in the Canadian Northern Bill. My hon. friend from East Lambton does not realize the resourcefulness of the hon. minister. If he would put the proposition up to the Minister of Finance, and the other ministers, that this Railway Bill should go through the Senate, there would be no necessity for the passage of the Bill now before us. I really think he has not exerted that powerful influence which I am sure he could exert in relation to that important measure.

Bill reported as amended.

Amendments read the first and second time and concurred in.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Wednesday, September 19, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

FRENCH-ENGLISH SIGNS AND FRENCH SIGNS ON POST OFFICES.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Under what Act of Parliament, Order in Council or other authority are French-English signs put up at a number of post offices outside of the province of Quebec?
2. Under what authority are purely French signs put up on the post offices at Verner, Ont., Edam, Sask., and other places outside Quebec province?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Under instructions of the late Postmaster General the Hon. Mr. Casgrain, that English signs only should be used in exclusively English communities, French signs only in exclusively French communities, and both French and English signs in mixed communities.

2. Answered by number one. In Edam instructions were that both French and English signs be used, and English and French signs were issued. As to Verner the inspector's report was that it was located in a purely French community.

MAXIMUM OR FIXED PRICE OF WHEAT.

*Mr. OLIVER:

1. Is $2.21 a bushel for No. 1 hard wheat a maximum or a fixed price to growers?
2. What commission is the elevator or commission agent allowed to charge?
3. Is commission charged to Canadian dealers the same as to export purchasers?
4. How many commission profits can be added from purchasers and consumer, or from miller to baker?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I may say, in answer to question No. 1, that the fixed price per bushel for No. 1 hard wheat is $2.21. The answer to No. 2 is that such commissions and fees as are allowable to elevators that come under the Act, and are usual in exchanges to members of exchanges, have not been interfered with. The answer to No. 3 is that Canadian dealers and export purchasers are on the same footing. It is impossible to answer No. 4, as it would all depend upon the transmigrations of the wheat from the Dominion following the seller until it reached the purchaser, but a farmer can cart his wheat to the loading platform, put it on the car, send it to Fort William, and pay no fees or commisions of any kind. If he uses the elevators he will pay the elevator fee, and if he uses middlemen, he will pay them their commission.

OFFICERS OF NAVAL SERVICE AT HALIFAX.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond) moved:

For a return giving the names, rank, pay, nature and date of employment and previous service of (a) all officers employed in or connected with the Naval Service at Halifax, including patrol service; (b) all civilians appointed since November, 1911. Also giving a list of the number, names and rate of pay of returned soldiers or sailors included in (a).

He said: I beg to amend this notice of motion, in accordance with the understanding arrived at with the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Hazen), by striking out all the words after the word "service" in the fourth line. I wish to strike out the part of the question which asks for the names of the men and returned soldiers. My hon. friend the Minister of Naval Affairs spoke of the difficulty in obtaining the names, which would make a very large list.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is the amendment in accordance with the understanding arrived at between my hon. friend and the Minister of Naval Affairs?

Mr. KYTE: That is my understanding, but if there should be any misunderstanding, I do not ask that the return be brought down. I merely wish to have the motion passed, so that if the minister or his officials find no objection to it the return may be brought down.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will let the motion pass with that understanding, although I would prefer that the hon. gentleman should do as I suggested the other day, have given me the form in which he proposed to have the motion submitted.

Mr. KYTE: That is the form.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, but I asked the hon. gentleman to give it to me so that I might submit it to the deputy minister, who would know much more about it than I do, and I would have come back with the information. But I am content to let it pass as amended.

Mr. KYTE: I entirely overlooked the matter. I intended communicating it to the Prime Minister, but it escaped my mind.

Motion as amended agreed to.

OFFICERS OF NAVAL SERVICE AT SYDNEY, N.S.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. KYTE moved:

For a return showing the names, rank, pay, nature, and date of employment and previous service of, (a) All officers employed in or connected with the Naval Service at Sydney, N.S., including patrol service; (b) The number, names and rate of pay of returned soldiers or sailors included in the above service.

He said: I desire to have this motion for return amended in the same way, by striking out all the words after the word "service" in the fourth line.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

APPROVAL OF CERTAIN ORDERS IN COUNCIL AS REQUIRED BY STATUTE.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior) moved:

That the following Orders in Council, laid on the Table on the first day of February, 1917, be approved:

Orders in Council which have been published in the Canada Gazette, between 1st January, 1916, and the 31st December, 1916, in accordance with the provisions of section 77 of "The Dominion Lands Act," chapter 20, 7-8 Edward VII.

Orders in Council which have been published in the Canada Gazette, between the 1st January, 1916, and the 31st December, 1916, in accordance with the provisions of "The Forest Reserves and Park Act," section 19, of chapter 10, 1-2 George V.

Orders in Council which have been published in the Canada Gazette, between the 1st January, 1916, and the 31st December, 1916, in accordance with the provisions of sections 6, and 2, chapter 45, 3-4 George V, 1913, entitled "The Railway Belt Water Act."

Orders in Council which have been published in the Canada Gazette and in the British Columbia Gazette between 1st January, 1916, and the 31st December, 1916, in accordance with provisions of subsection (d) of section 38 of the regulations for the survey, administration, disposal and management of Dominion Lands within the 40-mile Railway Belt in the Province of British Columbia.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will the hon. minister explain these Orders in Council to the House? We have forgotten what they were.

Mr. ROCHE: I am afraid that will take a long time. There are several dozens of them. The Orders in Council were laid upon the table of the House, in accordance with the provisions of the statute during the first fortnight of the session, and, as a rule, it is a formal matter to have Parliament approve of them.

If I were to enter into an explanation of every Order in Council passed, I am afraid that we should not have much time for any other work.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have heard long discussions upon some of these Orders in Council in times past. I am quite prepared to believe that they are all right, but I should like to know what they refer to. For instance, the following Orders in Council are referred to in my hon. friend's motion:

Orders in Council which have been published in the Canada Gazette, between 1st January, 1916, and the 31st December, 1916, in accordance with the provisions of section 77 of "The Dominion Lands Act," chapter 20, 7-8 Edward VII.

I am sure that no member of the House except the minister himself knows what these Orders in Council are about. If my hon. friend will tell us in a general way what they are, we shall be satisfied.

Mr. ROCHE: I agree that unless members of the House had looked up the Orders in Council as they were laid upon the Table, they would not be acquainted with them. I shall give an explanation of some of them.

P.C. 3093. Order in Council, 6th January, 1916. This order applies to Dominion lands within the railway belt mainland, in the province of British Columbia. Provision has been made by previous orders of the 17th of October, 1914, and the 19th of June, 1915, for reckoning as residence spent on a homestead the time of an entrant on active military service, who made entry prior to enlistment, and for the issue of patent to such homesteader if disabled, or to his legal representative in the event of death.

This order provides that in case of an entry made after enlistment, or date of recall to the colours, that such entry may be protected during the continuance of military service, and for three months after discharge.

Similar provisions to the above have been passed under the authority of the Dominion Lands Act. The Dominion Lands Act does not apply to the railway belt in the province of British Columbia, which is governed by regulations passed by the Governor in Council, under authority of chapter 56, R.S.C.

P.C. 217. Order in Council, 4th February, 1916. This order applies to Dominion lands within the railway belt mainland, in the province of British Columbia. This order may be divided into two parts.

1. It extends to Dominion lands in the railway belt, British Columbia, the provisions of Order in Council of the 26th August, 1908, which provides that homestead entries taken up under the Dominion lands Act may be made by proxy.

2. It provides that proxy entries made for Dominion lands in the railway belt, by any person serving with the forces of Great Britain or any of her Allies, is to have the same standing as if it had been made in person.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What about the Orders in Council with respect to the Forest Reserves and Park Act?

Mr. ROCHE: This Order in Council covers a number of amendments in the details of the forest reserve regulations which were found to be necessary after they had been in operation for a little over two years. The amendments make better provision for dealing with fire, provide for making more clear certain portions of the provisions of the regulations in regard to timber permits, for extending for not more than one year the time of a timber sale where it is considered in the public interest, to make clearer some of the provisions in regard to grazing, and to provide specially for cases where cattle graze for part of a season on the forest reserve and for the remainder of the season on lands outside, for slight amendments to the hay permit regulations so as to prevent confusion with the regulations on Dominion lands outside of the forest reserves, and for extending the right to a permit for a period not to exceed five years where improvement of the meadow is made by the permittee by drainage or otherwise; for altering the regulations in regard to fishing so as to make them more fully in agreement with the general fishery regulations.

Some regulations are also made by Order in Council in regard to Dominion lands adjacent to waterfalls on the Winnipeg river. Some time ago we changed the Dominion Lands Act so that in the future lands adjacent to water-powers should be leased, not sold. This Order in Council refers to mines and minerals under such lands adjacent to water-powers.

Motion agreed to.

EXEMPTIONS UNDER MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): I wish to call the attention of the Government to the following letter which has been circulated in connection with the Military Service Act. The letter is in French; I shall read the English translation:

(Translation.)

Ottawa, September 11th, 1917.

Dear sir:—

I have the pleasure to inform you that the regulations made under the Military Law exempt the farmers, their families and industrials in good faith.

I have at last succeeded to win my point, and it is only justice.

You can without any fear, whatever, present your unmarried sons to the Tribunals. Instructions are given according to what I now tell you.

I hope the farmers will do their utmost for the largest production of all that is necessary to feed the populations.

With my best wishes, believe me,

Yours truly,

J. H. Rainville.

This letter has been sent by the Deputy Speaker of the House to a large number of farmers in Quebec province, especially in the county of Chambly-Vercheres. I wish to know from the Government whether the statements contained in this letter are true, whether regulations have been made along the line indicated therein and whether the Deputy Speaker of the House has been authorized to make known these regulations before they have been communicated to Parliament.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not follow very carefully the reading of the letter as my hon. friend gave it. My impression is that the regulations have not yet been fully completed. Doubtless the hon. gentleman who wrote the letter is giving his impression of what the regulations may be. However, I shall look at the letter as it appears in Hansard and, if necessary, speak again on the subject.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it the intention of the Government to pass regulations exempting any particular classes of British subjects from military service?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The proposed regulations will come to us from the Military Service Council, with the approval of the Central Appeal Judge. They have not yet been presented to the Government; therefore I do not know whether any such regulation as my right hon. friend suggests is to be submitted to us.

QUEBEC ELECTORAL LISTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (Montreal, St. James): I desire to ask the Secretary of State (Hon. Arthur Meighen) if it is the intention of the Government to have electoral lists printed according to law? I quote section 15 of the Dominion Elections Act:

It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, immediately upon receipt by him of any such certified copy of a list of voters, to cause it to be printed by the King's Printer, and he shall thereafter retain such certified copy of record in his office.

The electoral list for the city of Montreal, which was revised in January, has been sent by the registrar of the city of Montreal to the clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The list, which is to be the basis of the list that would be used according to the new Act is in force and should have been printed—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I will explain.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order in proceeding to make any argument. If he chooses to ask a question, that is permissible. I feel like allowing more latitude now, because there is a possibility that this session may terminate some day; otherwise I would insist upon this and similar questions going on the Order Paper.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I want to make my point very clear. In view of section 16 which says:

Immediately after printing such list, the King's Printer shall send by registered mail twenty copies thereof to the sitting member for the electoral district to which the list belongs, and twenty copies to the defeated candidate at the last Dominion election therein.

Is the Government going to provide—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member can put a simple question which will embrace the whole matter——

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I am going to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can ask: Does the Government intend to follow the provisions of the electoral law?

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I said I wanted to emphasize my question. There are different ways in which one can——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Unless the hon. member puts his question, I shall ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Is it the intention of the Government to send out to the candidate, or to the defeated candidate, or to the members for the different constituencies of the city of Montreal the list which they have a right to be put in possession of according to the law? That is my question.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Secretary of State): I need scarcely say that, whatever the law is, it will be fully complied with, but the hon. member should observe that the section which he read, and which he stated to be section 16 of the Act, is included in part I of the Act, and, under the War-time Elections Act, part I is suspended for this election. Consequently what he reads is not the law in so far as it appertains to the coming election. The lists, however, for the province of Quebec are to be used subject to well defined modifications and the lists for that province, that is the provincial lists, I understand, can be obtained, from the custodians on payment of a small fee. Those, however, are not the lists that will be used in the Dominion election. The modifications referred to have first to take place, but the War-time Elections Act provides that the list finally to be used shall be supplied to the different candidates at the dates mentioned in the Elections Act, both when completed by the enumerators and when revised.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Another question. I want to find out from the Secretary of State if the War-time Elections Act has any retroactive effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; it has no retroactive effect.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Then we have a right to have our lists.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

COUNTY COURT JUDGE, DISTRICT NO. 6, NOVA SCOTIA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Has any decision been reached by the Government regarding the appointment of a county court judge for district No. 6, Nova Scotia?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The recommendation was sent to His Excellency some days ago. I presume it has been approved, but I am not quite sure. The Minister of Justice does not happen to be in his place at present. I am now informed that the recommendation has been approved. The gentleman recommended for the appointment is Mr. Daniel McNeil, K.C., of Inverness.

EXHIBITION OF WAR TROPHIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: May I be permitted to draw the attention of members of the House to the extensive collection of trophies of the war which have been presented to the Government of Canada by the President of the French Republic and by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom? It might be noted that the collection of trophies includes other smaller articles which have been in part acquired as gifts from individuals and in part acquired at trifling outlay. Part of this collection was exhibited last week in Ottawa for the benefit of the Canadian Red Cross Society and was visited by considerably over 20,000 persons. I have made arrangements that this exhibition, which is in Lansdowne park, shall be open to the members of this House and of the Senate during the remainder of the week, and I hope many of them will take advantage of the opportunity of seeing those interesting objects. I took occasion the other morning myself to go very early and spend fifteen or twenty minutes in looking at this collection, and I was very amply repaid and should have liked to be able to devote a much longer time to the purpose.

The collection includes an armed biplane which has been in service in France and which, I believe, has been twenty or thirty times across the German lines; two of the famous "seventy-five" French field guns; a large gun captured at Vimy Ridge. That gun is very interesting because it bears on it the obvious marks of a direct hit during that action. The collection also includes several types of machine guns, trench mortars, anti-aircraft guns, a complete range of shells and thousands of other objects. I should not omit to allude to the collection of posters, proclamations and prints of all the belligerent nations, I think, which illustrate the appeals made to the people of the several nations of the Allies and enemy nations as well. One very interesting poster, which is to be found amongst those on exhibition is an original poster announcing the condemnation and death of Edith Cavell.

I should fail in my duty if I did not, on this occasion, express the very warm appreciation of the people of Canada and their Government for the generosity of the French republic in donating those articles to Canada, and in assuming the heavy charges incidental to conveying them to this country. It should be added that only a portion of the collection has yet reached Canada. The larger trophies from the British naval and military authorities have not yet arrived, but I am sure hon. gentlemen will find the collection most instructive, and I hope that arrangements may be made so that those trophies can be seen by the people of all parts of the Dominion.

WAGES OF EMPLOYEES OF RAILWAY COMPANIES.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—THIRD READING.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the House do now proceed to Public Bills and Orders for the purpose of taking up Order No. 21, Third Reading of Bill No. 103.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That Bill No. 103, concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies be read the third time.

He said: I have still strong hope that the Railway Bill, as passed by the House of Commons, will be passed by the Senate, although as I explained yesterday, some of the clauses are found to be very controversial there, and, in consequence, a great deal of delay has been entailed. I think it is desirable that this Bill should be read the third time and sent to the Senate with the amendments which were passed last evening. If the Senate should pass the Railway Bill, they need not concur in this Bill, because all those amendments are covered by the Railway Bill as it passed the House of Commons.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

If, on the other hand, the Senate should fail to pass the Railway Bill, then I have strong hope that it will accept this Bill with the amendments which we have added to it, so that the provisions which are properly regarded as very important by the railway employees in this country may be brought into force.

Mr. GRAHAM: Last night the Minister of Customs, who was leading the House, told us that if we reported this Bill it could stand for third reading until we ascertained if the Railway Bill was going through the Senate. If the Railway Bill is going through the Senate, there is no reason why we should give this Bill a third reading. If the Senate would just leave the Franchise Act where it is, and devote their attention to the Railway Bill, we might get that measure through.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. D. Stewart in the Chair.

Pensions payable to militiamen, and on active service, as follows: Northwest Rebellion, 1885, $14,000; general, $30,000—$44,000.

Mr. REID: I have received from Mr. J. W. Borden, Paymaster-General, the following memorandum on this item, which stood for explanation:

Ottawa, 18th September, 1917.

The Honourable J. D. Reid,
Minister of Customs,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:—

I am advised by Mr. Forsythe, Clerk of Estimates, that you require information in regard to an amount of $44,000 that was placed in the Main Estimates of 1917-18, to cover pensions payable to the militia men on active service, Northwest Rebellion, 1885, $14,000, and general, $30,000.

This may be explained by reference to pages P90 and P91 of the Auditor General's Report for the year 1915-16, from which it will be seen for that year pensions for the Northwest Rebellion, 1885, were $13,581, and for militia pensions generally, $7,582.

The increased amount for the latter class of pensioners was estimated on account of the large number of militia men, who were on guard in Canada, and whose pensions would be payable out of this appropriation. There was no way to clearly estimate the amount, and it was thought that $30,000 would cover any possible pensions which might become payable.

Yours truly,

J. W. Borden,
A/A. & P.M.G.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not know that there were pensions payable in respect of the Northwest Rebellion except for disability.

Mr. REID: Our Pensions Act has reference only to soldiers who have enlisted for service overseas. There are men who have been wounded or injured on home guard duty, and any pensions that are granted to these men appear in this item, and not under the regular pensions vote.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not understand it at all. One part of the minister's explanation was that pensions to men who had served in the Northwest Rebellion and had suffered physical disability, not being covered by the regular pensions vote, required a special vote. That I can easily understand. But I do not recall that the amount of pensions in respect of physical disabilities incurred in connection with the Northwest Rebellion is nearly so large an amount as this in the item. I do not understand my hon. friend's reference to pensions payable because of home guard service. I do not object to the payment of pensions that we owe, but I should like to know what we are paying these pensions for.

Mr. REID: There are two big pension items still to be discussed, and perhaps we could put this item through, and allow discussion on it to take place on either of the two other items, when the officials of the department will be here.

Mr. MACDONALD: I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton that the House ought to know upon what terms these pensions are being paid. The essential basis of a claim to a pension in connection with the Northwest Rebellion or any other service is that physical disability should have been incurred. The minister speaks of a pension arrangement for the encouragement of men who have not volunteered for overseas service in the present war, but have been employed on home service. The minister ought to tell us under what regulations these pensions are being paid. We have a Pensions Board, constituted after careful consideration by a committee of the House, which drafted the conditions, which were afterwards promulgated by an Order in Council, under which men who had gone overseas were entitled to a pension. If there is an Order in Council providing for the payment of pensions for home service, the House ought to know about it. I have not heard of it before.

Mr. REID: As I understand it, men on home service are paid under the Militia Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: Under the Militia Act?

Mr. REID: Under the Militia Act. This $20,000 was increased on account of so many more pensions that would be necessary because of the home guard. That was the explanation, as I supposed, but, as I stated a minute ago, we will probably be an hour or so on these pensions, and I will take the matter up with the officials, and be in a position to give full information in regard to it before we leave the subject.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like the minister to obtain from his officials a list of those who are now receiving pensions in connection with the Northwest Rebellion, and also a copy of the conditions under which those pensions are paid. I would also like to get a statement of those who are receiving pensions on account of disabilities sustained in home service. I see no reason why there should be any such large amount as $30,000 provided for pensions for men who are on home service, because they are not engaged in any enterprise involving danger to life and limb. Any disability they might sustain would probably be the result of accident. I think we should have some further information on the subject.

Mr. REID: I do not agree with the hon. member for Pictou that pensions should not be paid to those on home service.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not say that. I would simply like to know the conditions under which the minister is undertaking to pay them. I fancy there may be conditions under which a man might get a pension, and I think those conditions should be before us so that the House and the country may know what they are. A man engaged in home service is not engaged in an enterprise that would endanger life or limb. It seems to me any pension granted to him would be as compensation, more or less, for accidental injury.

Mr. REID: That is right. I will have the information for my hon. friend very shortly.

Pensions—European War, $8,000,000.

Mr. PROULX: At the beginning of the session the Prime Minister told us that a Pensions Bill would be introduced. Has the Government abandoned its intention of doing this?

Mr. REID: Yes. We are not going to pass a Pensions Act this session. The Pensions Act will remain over until the meeting of the new Parliament.

Mr. PROULX: Will the regulations be changed or enlarged? There are certain regulations now governing the Board of Pensions Commissioners, and there are cases which are not met by those regulations. I had an instance of this in my constituency last summer, the case of a foster-parent. I brought the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister early in the session, and he said a Pensions Bill would be brought down, and that it would go before a special committee, and that I might lay the case before that committee. Does the minister know whether it is the intention of the Government to change the regulations?

Mr. REID: The regulations have been enforced by the Pensions Board up to the present time. I could not say whether it would become necessary to change them between now and the meeting of the next Parliament. They will not be changed unless there are some cases which really must be disposed of. No doubt cases will arise, such as the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) has stated, that cannot be dealt with by the Pensions Board. The present Pensions Board has full charge of the enforcement of the pension regulations, which regulations were prepared in accordance with the recommendations of the Joint Committee of the House last session. If there are cases which require the amending of the regulations, and such change is recommended by the Board of Commissioners, of course the matter would be given every consideration.

Mr. NESBITT: If I remember correctly, the Prime Minister stated a short time ago that he would not amend the Pensions Bill this year, but that the Government would pass an Order in Council increasing the pensions on a percentage basis. Will the minister tell us what the percentage was, and has the Order in Council been passed?

Mr. REID: The Order in Council has not been passed as yet.

Mr. OLIVER: I have received a communication from an association at Edmonton, comprised of responsible citizens, whose purpose is to give special attention to the requirements of the families of soldiers on service, or the needs of those who have rendered service and have returned. This statement has been forwarded to me by the Hon. Mr. Rutherford, who is Director of National Service for Northern Alberta. I have already brought to the attention of the House certain recommendations of this body of citizens, and submitted them for the consideration of the Minister of Militia, who promised to give his best attention to these recommendations. The memorandum which I then placed before the House was in the nature of a general statement, and it is now the desire of the committee to support that statment by mentioning a number of cases, and by giving some more specific information. I would like to read what the committee says in regard to one class of cases, referring to instances where the pension is insufficient at the present time, considering the high cost of living. They say:

> It is useless to specify in this class when one considers that the average family budget as shown by the report of the Department of Labour for food, rent, fuel and lighting is over $12 per month and steadily rising. It is readily seen that the present pension rates are inadequate except where the widow is young and strong and without children, then she can supplement the pension, but where there are children or where the widow is not in robust health, the $32 per month is manifestly inadequate. One case that has come particularly before the committee is that of Mrs. Elizabeth Daynes. This widow has had to sell certain articles of her household furniture to buy the food and medicines necessary for herself and young child, to make it possible for her to live while in receipt of $38 per month as pension. These facts may be verified by affidavit, if necessary.

I think it is desirable to place before the committee the representations made by this body of responsible citizens in regard to the present scale of pensions. The case I have just cited relates to the support of the family of a deceased soldier. I would urge that the Government take proper steps that the pension rate shall be increased, having regard to the increased cost of living.

When the pension scale was recommended by the committee of last year the scale was recognized as the minimum. There were differences of opinion between members of the committee as to the amount, and while all the members of the committee agreed finally to the presentation of the report, it was not because there were not varying views held. Of course, it was necessary that the committee should agree. I think I am perfectly justified in saying that this recommendation was the minimum recommendation. Taking into consideration that the pension scale is a minimum recommendation and that the cost of living has increased since that time, I would urge that in due course a reasonable increase be made in the pension scale.

Mr. REID: I agree that everything should be done that can be done for those who have served at the front or who have been injured or whose families have suffered from their being at the front. It was with that object in view that the joint committee took the question up last session. They came to certain conclusions which have been adopted and put in force. The pension list is going to be a very large item. It is increasing by leaps and bounds as the war proceeds and if this war is to last a long time the pension list will be very large. But the question is an important one and it should receive the fair consideration of this House. The conclusion which has been arrived at is that the matter should be left over until next session for final decision. In the meantime the Government will take the matter up and do what they think is right to put it in proper shape; and it will carry on the work until the House meets again. Not having had time to prepare a proper pension Bill or to go into the question this session, we are just asking for a vote such as we have put in the estimates in order to pay the pensions that it is now necessary to pay from day to day.

Mr. PARDEE: There is a matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the Government and that is the system of paying sums of $100 or less to men injured and who are classed as under twenty per cent fit. Several cases have come to my notice in which this system has worked the very greatest hardship. Perhaps being under twenty per cent fit is not always a real disability but there are cases where men who have been adjudged under twenty per cent who are possibly not able to do a day's work and who will not be for a long time to come. A case was brought to my attention last week in which a man was adjudged to be under twenty per cent fit; he received $75 and that is all he will get. The man is practically disabled; he will never be capable of doing a day's work again. That is one of the provisions of the Act that needs amending.

My own opinion is that any man who comes back here and who is found twenty per cent unfit, but permanently injured, and who is not as good a man as he was when he left, should not be given a maximum payment of $100, but he should be awarded a pension by the State. I believe there are some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who agree with me. Any man who has served, and who comes back less fit than he was when he went away, is entitled to be taken care of by the State so long as he lives if he requires that care. It is a simple matter of justice and humanity on our part. I would like to present that view to the Government as strongly as I can.

I would also like to ask the Government whether or not there is any intention to adopt an insurance scheme in connection with the pension system. I understand in the United States they have a method of insurance which is carried on by a deduction from the allowance of the pensioner of a certain amount per month, the Government paying the difference between the amount deducted and the amount necessary to carry the premium. That was somewhat discussed when we had the commission of inquiry in the hospitals matter. No agreement or decision was arrived at because we did not seem to have the necessary information to enable us to become fully seized of all the aspects of the matter. It would appear to me to be a very reasonable thing to do, and I hope that between now and the next session of Parliament the Government will take the matter up and see if some such scheme can be devised so that the men and their dependents will feel that they will be taken care of and that later on the families of soldiers will receive an amount increased to the extent of the insurance. It would give the returned soldier a comfortable feeling to know that, while a certain small amount was taken from his pension and the balance of the premium was made up by the State, his dependents would later on reap the benefit.

4 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is before the United States Congress at the present time a Bill, or Bills, dealing with the matter. The legislation which comes out of Congress will afford very valuable information for the consideration of the Government between now and the time of meeting of the next Parliament. I have every sympathy with this system of insurance as one method at least by which that proper provision can be made for our soldiers who have gone overseas and that may be taken as one element or factor. I do not know whether there has been any extensive system of insurance adopted by any other country, but that matter will be looked into.

Mr. CURRIE: As one interested in soldiers, I have made it my business to follow up cases where complaints were made in reference to pensions. With reference to the subject that was brought up about a man serving at home, I know of one case in which a man whilst training for the expeditionary force contracted appendicitis. He was operated on and died. His wife and children should and are receiving a pension. I think the appropriation referred to in the first item called would be to provide pensions for cases of this kind. I know another case where a very strong healthy young soldier was on a march in Canada, and slipped on a stone in the road, sustaining injuries with the result that his foot had to be amputated just above the ankle. Cases of that kind occur constantly. The Pension Board's policy as far as I can see, is one for which I have nothing but commendation. We should look at the matter in a purely non-partisan manner. I know many cases which have been dealt with promptly. Colonel Labatt served at the front as an officer, and his sympathies are entirely with the wounded returned soldier. Considering the tremendous amount of work he has undertaken in organizing that department, and considering the great numbers of cases which have come before him, the work the board has done has been marvellous. If a case is a clear one, and a pension is required, there is no delay whatever. In some cases, questions may arise as to whether pensions should be granted or not on the amount. At first there was great difficulty in getting these matters threshed out, but now the Pension Board has officers in various localities, and if complaint is made at the Pension Board that the pensions are necessary or inadequate, or anything of that kind, an officer is immediately sent to investigate the matter, and if any irregularities are found relief is immediately given. It may take a long time to adjudicate upon some cases. The hon. member for Prescott referred to certain cases, but as far as the Pensions Department is concerned, it is certainly not their fault if those who are suffering disability do not receive their pensions promptly. The hon. member for West Lambton has referred to cases where men are dismissed with small gratuity if their disability is under 20 per cent. I know of several cases where men were discharged without even pensions, and it subsequently developed that they were suffering from gas when they arrived here and when they were discharged. To my knowledge, a number of these soldiers subsequently developed tuberculosis as a result of gas, and every one of these soldiers, after reference had been made to the Pensions Board, was returned to service and pay, treated in military hospitals as if he had never been discharged, sent to Gravenhurst or other places to recover, and pension was granted. In addition to that, some of them died, and provision has been made for their widows and children, in spite of the fact that they were discharged and considered at one time to have no claim on the Government. I give these instances to show the sympathetic manner in which the Pensions Board deals with these matters.

With reference to the increasing of the pensions on account of the high cost of living, in numbers of cases it is difficult for the parties to get along with the pensions allowed them, and in each case where the pension was not sufficient if application was made by the men to the Government, the man or the woman, as the case may be, is provided with some form of employment, which supplements the pension, so that they need not want for daily bread. Whether it is wise to increase the pensions to a greater amount than at present allowed is a question. I quite agree that, if conditions remain as at present, it will be necessary to increase the pensions considerably. I think I am quite safe in saying that, because I know many cases where children and widows have not received sufficient pension to permit them to live in a respectable manner, but we must also remember that it is possible that some change may come over the scene, and, instead of food and living soaring to the top as it is now, prices may drop, in a few years, and the cost of living may be greatly reduced. So far as the administration of the Pensions Board is concerned, I do not think a single case has been brought before them, to my knowledge, in which they did not grant prompt relief. I can speak in the highest terms of the efficiency of that board, and I do so gladly because the officer who is the active member of the board is an old comrade-in-arms of mine, and I know his heart is right in regard to looking after the returned soldiers. There has not been one single case that I have brought to his attention that he has not dealt with promptly and justly. Numbers of cases have been called to my attention from all over the country, because a number of the soldiers seem to think they should send a letter to me, if they have a complaint, and the attention of the board has been promptly given, and justice done. In many cases justice has been done where possibly, if they had not looked upon the case in a sympathetic manner, they would not have granted any pension. The conditions which now obtain are giving great satisfaction to the returned soldier, and the number of complaints made in recent months has been greatly reduced. There is a certain class of soldier who did not serve at all, but malingered, who claims a pension. I refer to those who suffer from imaginary rheumatism, and that sort of thing in England. I find, as a rule, some of these are inclined to be chronic grumblers. Fully 98 per cent of the men in receipt of pensions are men of established character and first-class men in every shape and form. There are always one or two in a thousand who give the public the impression that they do not deserve anything, and I trust the public will deal kindly with their cases, and not take their complaints seriously, realizing that the Pensions Board is doing everything possible to ameliorate the suffering of the wounded and sick soldier, looking after the widow, and seeing that the orphan is brought up by the state as it should be.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry that on this occasion I find it impossible to altogether agree with what my hon. friend has said. I notice in the newspaper to-day an item stating that the Ottawa Great War Veterans' Association had a meeting last evening and discussed the action of the Government in granting gratuities in lieu of pensions to returned soldiers. The matter was thoroughly discussed, and the action of the Government unanimously condemned. My opinion is entirely in line with the view expressed by the hon. member for West Lambton, namely, that in many cases trifling gratuities have been granted where men have suffered a serious permanent disability. That is an abuse of the power of the Pensions Board. It is not the fault of the pensions scale, nor of the Pensions Committee of last session, nor is it the fault of the Government that framed the Order in Council passed on the recommendation of that committee. It is the administration of the Pensions Board that is at fault. When they disregard the fact that a man is suffering from a disability that permanently decreases his earning power, and give him a gratuity of $25, or $75, or $100 and turn him loose, they are not treating him fairly, or, as the country desires he should be treated. I know of a man who received a permanent injury to one of his legs, so that he walks through life with a serious limp, and he was given a gratuity of $25.

I know many other cases in which men have suffered disability which did not entirely incapacitate them, but which seriously reduced their earning power or interfered with their possibilities in life. Yet the Pensions Board dealt with these men simply by the payment of a small gratuity. I do not consider that that is in line with the spirit of the country; I do not think it is in line with the intention of the Government. I know that it is not in line with the views of the committee that had to do with the drafting of the scale of pensions.

Mr. REID: The regulations concerning pensions were made in accordance with the recommendations of a committee of this House. The Board of Pension Commissioners have forms to be filled in by persons disabled. Upon these forms, which may be filled in by a clergyman or a doctor, a certificate is made as to the condition of the man, whether he has any other visible means of support, and so on. Upon this report the Board of Pension Commissioners act. In a case that occurred in my county, the person who filled in the blanks stated that the man in question had other means of support, and on that report the Board of Pension Commissioners could not do otherwise than act as they did. If representations are made to the Board, however, that full justice has not been done in any given case, the board will take the matter up again, reconsider it, and see that justice is done. Pension and gratuity claims are coming in in large numbers, and they must be dealt with according to the best evidence available in order that settlement may be arrived at as soon as possible. Every case is subject to revision by the Pensions Board; the facts may be re-examined and the conditions again looked into. The Board have special officers to deal with such cases. If any member of the House or, indeed, any person outside of the House hears of a case where injustice was done, I am satisfied that the Board of Pension Commissioners, upon the matter being brought to their attention, will take steps to see that justice is done. There may be cases where persons would be probably ignorant of the law or, for other reasons, would not be able to take up their own cases; it is only fair and right that we should interest ourselves in such matters.

Members of the House and private citizens generally should take every step to see that justice is done to those who are entitled to consideration under this Act. I desire only to emphasize my impression that the Pensions Board are anxious to see that justice is done to all; I know that justice will be done if all these matters are brought to their attention.

Mr. MORPHY: The difficulty as I see it is that we are not now discussing principles that should govern. I should like to have an expression from the Government on the point whether men who have sustained 20 per cent disability as a result of the war and who have been paid $25, $50, $75 or $100, are absolutely shut out from any further claim. The estimate that a man has 20 per cent disability to-day may be quite correct, but the seeds of weakness in his constitution may at no distant date grow into a 40 per cent disability. It is unfortunate if a man who is in need of money, taking advantage of what he understands to be the law, should submit himself to an examination, receive $50 or $75, and be absolutely shut out from any further claim in the future. The minister speaks very nicely, but I think that there should be something more than the nice words. I believe that public opinion will not stand for injustice to any returned soldier through settlement being made upon a basis of 20 per cent disability, if the seeds of weakness in his constitution afterwards cause him to sustain a 50 per cent disability.

Mr. CURRIE: I did not say that.

Mr. MORPHY: I am not referring to the member for North Simcoe, or to any other gentleman in that regard. Some member of the Government should announce the principle that these men may come back and that their cases will be given further consideration if necessary. Even doctors may not know whether the 20 per cent arrived at as a result of examination is the real extent of the disability from which a man is suffering. Certainly the man himself does not know, and it would be a great act of improvidence to make a settlement upon a basis of 20 per cent and shut the man out from further consideration. Many soldiers who return are not normal; in many cases their judgment is not as strong as it was before the war. Moreover, we must guard the soldier against his own improvidence, if necessary; we must not, simply in order to expedite settlement, take advantage of a man who is not in normal condition. When a man is injured in a railway accident, the settlement claims agent calls upon him as quickly as possible after the wreck or the accident; the injured man accepts $100, $200, $300, as the case may be. Some have avoided this speedy settlement and subsequently obtained thousands of dollars through a verdict against the company. There must be absolute frankness, absolute openness; there must be tender care on our part to guard against improvidence and to do what this country ought to do for men who have offered themselves as sacrifices in the interests of their country.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The complaint of the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) was, perhaps, justified in the first part of the administration of the pensions. I believe that under the former rule, and according to the recommendation of the general Committee on Pensions, if a man's disability did not exceed 20 per cent he could be paid off in a lump sum by way of gratuity.

When the matter came before the Returned Soldiers' Committee, the committee was almost unanimously of opinion that the grading should be in tenths and not in fifths, for this reason: You might have a man who was injured nineteen per cent of the extent of total disability, and he would be paid off with a gratuity of perhaps $100. If he was injured one per cent more, however, he would be paid $8 a month for the balance of his life. In my opinion there is too much of a discrepancy between those two disabilities, and if the grading has not been made in tenths, I strongly urge that the grades of disability should be divided into tenths instead of into fifths. There is no reason why a man who is injured to the extent of 19 per cent should be paid off with a lump sum of $100, whereas a man who is disabled to the extent of 20 per cent should receive $8 a month for the rest of his life.

It is said that a man who is not totally incapacitated on account of deafness cannot be given a pension; that he comes under the 20 per cent class. That is to say, he might be deaf to the extent of nine-tenths in both ears, and he would still be under the twenty per cent class and would not be entitled to a permanent pension, but would be given a gratuity. There is no justice in that. If a man is incapacitated to the extent of nine-tenths of his total hearing capacity, he would be useless for many occupations in life.

Mr. OLIVER: I have had many instances of that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: He might be useless for the occupation in which he was formerly engaged. Therefore, there should be more provision for a soldier incapacitated to that extent.

There is another question to which I wish to refer, which, while it does not directly affect the question of pensions, affects the total amount that we shall have to pay. I refer to the medical examination in the first instance. The medical examiners in the first instance were, in many cases, not as strict as they should be. At the beginning of the war large numbers were anxious to enlist, and we were all anxious to see them go. But when we are going to raise another 100,000 men, the medical examiners should be men of the highest calibre and of the greatest experience, and they should be appointed permanently. The system of one week appointing a medical board composed of certain men and another week a medical board composed of certain other men who do not get the experience of the first board for the short time they have been working, is a very bad system, and will entail a responsibility for millions of dollars on this country. I would, therefore, suggest that the men who are appointed for the purpose of examining the 100,000 men who are shortly to be enlisted, should be men of the greatest experience. It costs something like $1,500 to equip a man, train him, send him overseas and get him ready to go into the trenches. If we pay $1,500 for a medically unfit man who is worse than useless when he goes into the trenches, we are doing an injustice to the country by taking him in the first instance. The men who are enlisted should be men of the highest possible efficiency. In addition to a medically unfit man being worse than useless when he goes into the trenches, when he comes back to Canada, he has a fair claim to a pension from this country, because he has been passed as medically fit. In such a case, how can you conscientiously get over his claim that he offered himself; that he was passed by the medical officers provided by the Government who in effect, said to him: You are a fit man? That being the case, he has a prima facie case for a pension. I cannot urge too strongly upon this House that the medical examiners for those 100,000 men should be thoroughly experienced and efficient.

Mr. NICKLE: There is a certain misapprehension existing in the minds of hon. members of the committee as to just what the claims for pensions are. With the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) I was a member with others of the Pensions Committee of last year, and I am not so carried away with enthusiasm for the work of that committee that I am prepared to say that it was perfect. A good beginning was made, but it is capable of much improvement, and I think, when the next session of Parliament is convened, very radical improvements will be made, if a committee of this House gives the matter further attention. I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) that the committee of last year made a mistake in dividing the pensions only into six classes: five classes and a gratuity. The Great War Veterans' Association, and the experience of last year has taught those who have given any consideration to the subject that we should have at least eleven classes; ten classes and a gratuity and that it is very unfair to the man who suffers a disability of 19 per cent, that he should be paid off with a gratuity not exceeding $100, whereas a man who has a disability of 21 per cent—I am using arbitrary figures to illustrate my argument—should receive a pension of $8 a month or $96 a year. It is well understood and recognized that it is right that we should have at least ten classes. I think it also can be said that it is recognized that no man should be compelled to accept a gratuity unless he chooses to do so. If a man has suffered disability and desires recognition on the part of the State for the sacrifice he has made for his country, he should have an opportunity of taking either a pension or a gratuity. If he wants to take a gratuity, he should have a right to take it, but if he prefers to take a pension, then he should have the right to do so.

In regard to the point raised by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), if he will be good enough to turn to paragraph 8 of the committee's report of last year, he will see it is distinctly stated in that paragraph that a man is not estopped by the taking of any gratuity or pension at the time the award is made. Paragraph 8 says:

> Each case shall be subject to review at the end of a year from the time the pension is first granted, except in those cases where the disability is obviously permanent, and then there can be no further review.

In the working out of that provision, it was found that many men had been improperly or prematurely discharged; that there had not been a keen appreciation of the disability the men had suffered. As a result, an Order in Council was passed by which it was provided that, if any man could show that he had been improperly or prematurely discharged, he was entitled again to be admitted to hospital and have his case medically treated, and then when the time came for his again being discharged his right to a pension was considered as if he had never before been before a court of review. That means that if a man, at any time within a year, reaches the conclusion that he has not received adequate consideration, he has a right to apply to the board for special consideration, and if fresh complications have set in, and if he can show that those complications are the result of service, he can go back to hospital and have his case reviewed.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Is the 20 per cent class retroactive?

Mr. NICKLE: No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Will it be retroactive?

Mr. NICKLE: I can hardly answer the question of the hon. member, because I do not know what the policy of the next Parliament will be. It will be within its jurisdiction to say whether or not the new Act shall be retroactive. Answering the question my hon. friend has raised in regard to deafness, the gentleman who brought that matter to his attention must have laboured under a misapprehension, because I see by referring to paragraph 12, class 4, which determines what certain disabilities are, it is provided that total deafness shall be considered a disability of 40 per cent. Total deafness of one ear entitles a man to a gratuity. If a man were totally deaf in one ear and were substantially affected in another, he would come out of the gratuity class and go into class four.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If a man is nine-tenths deaf in both ears, that is partial deafness in both ears, and he comes under the 20 per cent class.

Mr. NICKLE: If a man is almost totally deaf in both ears he would certainly go in class 5, because provision is made that if totally deaf in both ears he shall go in class 4, and class 6 includes those totally deaf in one ear only. It would only be in a case of trivial deafness that a man would go in the gratuity class.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I put this question distinctly to the officers who appeared before the Soldier's Aid Commission, and they said that under the wording of the Act a man might be deaf in both ears to any extent short of complete deafness and still be entitled only to a gratuity. Will my hon. friend show me the clause showing that a man who is partially deaf in both ears is entitled to anything more than a gratuity?

Mr. NICKLE: It is impossible for me to point out the clause, because there is no such clause in the report. In each of the classes a few examples are given as to what constitutes the disability of that class. For instance:

> Class 5—Disability 20 per cent and less than 40 per cent—pension 20 per cent of Class 1.
> For example—Loss of one thumb. Anchylosis of elbow, knee, shoulder, wrist or ankle.

Anything not covered by specific instances in that report is within the discretion of the medical officers of the Pensions Board. They must determine the disability. That disability being determined, the pension is awarded in accordance with the schedules set out for the various classes.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is one encouraging feature about this debate, and that is that members on both sides of the House have shown a sincere desire to deal squarely by the soldier and his dependents. I am very glad indeed that the Pensions Act will not be put through this session, because I think we shall learn a great deal from experience by leaving it over until next session. No matter how carefully we might frame this Act, it would not cover all the cases that might be brought to our attention, and, therefore, I think it is a good thing to leave the matter open for a few months.

Personally, I think a mistake was made in ever recognizing the gratuity principle at all. I do not agree with the hon. member for Kingston that a soldier should have the option of choosing between a gratuity or a pension. A returned soldier when he comes back from the front is either 100 per cent fit, or he is not. If his disability is less than 20 per cent, he can accept the gratuity. Now in many cases it would be utterly impossible for any board to say that a 20 per cent defect would be entirely removed in two or three years, or that it would not have increased in that time to 40 or 50 per cent. Suppose we give the soldier the option of accepting a gratuity or taking a pension. If he accepts the gratuity, you are through with him; that is the point about it that I do not like. I do not think we should ever be through with the soldier, or that he should ever consider that the State is through with him.

Mr. CURRIE: The debate has shown that such is not the case. Even if a man gets a gratuity he can come back again.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Not after one year.

Mr. EDWARDS: If the soldier accepts a gratuity, that is the end of the matter so far as he is concerned. Now, if a soldier who has accepted a gratuity developed some disease which could be traced back to his service in the war, as he went about the country people would say to him: "You are not looking very well." "No, I developed this trouble through the war, when I served my country." People will naturally ask him: "Are you getting a pension?" "No, they only gave me $25," or $50 or $65, as the case may be. "That is all I get out of it." If one case of that kind can go through the country representing himself as having been finally disposed of by a gratuity of $25 or $50 or $100, and if the man is not as fit to perform his duties as he was before the war, I say it will be a dishonour and a disgrace to this country. I contend that every man who comes back from the front, no matter how slight his disability—I do not see how you can figure it on a 5, 10, 15 or 100 per cent basis—if he can show before a board that he is in the slightest degree less efficient than he was before he performed his service to the country, he should receive a pension in consideration of his lessened ability to provide for himself and his family, and he should be allowed to come before a board year after year to say either that he is entitled now to more than he used to get, because his disability is increasing, or that the board should declare him to be entirely fit, in which case, of course, he would not ask for a pension. I think the gratuity was a mistake from the start, and I think it continues to be a mistake to pay off a man with $25 or $50 or $100, as the case may be. He is either as efficient as he was before the war, or he is not. If he is as efficient as he was before, he does not want anything. If he is not as efficient, are you going to meet that condition by paying him off with a gratuity of $75 or $100? It strikes me as ridiculous, unreasonable, and illogical.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Coming back to the point I was discussing before, Class 6 is as follows:—

Class 6—Disability under 20 per cent, a gratuity not exceeding $100.

For example—Total deafness in one ear. Partial deafness in both.

Partial deafness in both ears means partial deafness in both ears, and I submit that a man may be nine-tenths totally deaf and still be in Class 6, and therefore not entitled to anything more than a gratuity of $100. I claim that it is not fair to pay off a man so afflicted with a gratuity of $100.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I should like to refer to the deductions which have recently been made in pensions. Since the Order in Council of June 30, reductions have been made in the pensions of men permanently injured in the war. Now I think that is absolutely against the provisions of the Order in Council, Section 8 of which is to the effect that each case shall be subject to review at the end of a year from the time the pension is first granted, except in those cases where the disability is obviously permanent, and then there shall be no further review. That is, if a man was receiving $11 a month, he could not at the expiration of a year, if he was permanently injured, have any reduction made in his pension. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that the injury is permanent, my information is that the pension has been reduced by the commission from $11 to $8 a month. It is evident from the provision of the Order in Council that if a man has a permanent injury and receives a pension, the pension remains as it was originally and must not be decreased. The idea of decreasing the pension is obviously against the meaning and purport of this Order in Council, and of the resolution which was passed in this House last May, and I would like to get the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in regard to it. There are a great number of cases in which those pensions have been reduced without any just cause or reason; they were reduced in contravention of the wording of this Order in Council.

Mr. CURRIE: Take the case of a man who comes back from the front, suffering from rheumatism which he has contracted in the trenches, say he is discharged and given a pension of forty per cent disability. Under treatment, he may recover. We all know rheumatism sometimes improves, and the man may be disabled by it for six months, and then he is all right. I think it would be very unjust if the rule did not apply both ways, because I feel there would be some cases of imposition. Speaking of deafness: it is extremely difficult to establish the degree of deafness from which a man may be suffering. As a matter of fact virtually every gunner and every bomber at the front becomes partially deaf after being there for a while. If you followed the rule you would give a pension to every one at the front. I do not think the boys would want that sort of thing. I know some fellows myself who are partially deaf, but who have not mentioned the fact. They take it as part of the game. In regard to optional gratuity, I know of a case where a man came over from France on duty, and when he arrived here he was in perfect physical condition. He was ordered to go back to the front, and as soon as he received the order he developed a very bad case of rheumatism in the back. If he was boarded once, he was boarded fifteen times, but the doctors could not find anything wrong with him. The X-ray revealed nothing out of the ordinary. Still he could not move around. He got a gratuity, and inside of three months he was married, and is now carrying on his business just the same as he ever did. It was better to pay that gratuity than keep the man in the hospital for months and months, and then finally discharge him with a pension. The fact that he got a gratuity enabled him to recover and carry on his business the same as he always did. I know of many cases of imposition along these lines.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: But, that is not the wording of the Order in Council. The Order in Council provides that a man who is permanently injured shall receive a pension, that is, a man who is suffering from an injury which will continue for the rest of his life. The wording of the Order in Council is that such a man is entitled to receive a pension, and that pension shall not be reduced. At the same time, the commissioners have reduced these pensions. Once a man is permanently injured, he comes under the Order in Council and gets his percentage, and that is not to be reduced. In reducing these pensions I believe the commissioners have been contravening the provisions of the Order in Council.

Mr. NICKLE: It is quite impossible to answer every specific case without knowing all the facts in reference to it. Dealing with the question of permanent disability—and I am now referring to class 2 of the scale as defined by the committee last year—take the case of a man who had lost both feet, that would be a permanent disability and he would be entitled to eighty per cent pension. Assuming further that at the time he came up for medical examination, in addition to the loss of both feet he was suffering from the results of a bullet wound through his lung, or was suffering radically from rheumatism, the commission would have put him in the 100 per cent class. Then, a year after, when he was re-examined, it might be found that his rheumatism was entirely better, or that his lung had been healed, in which event he would be put in the 80 per cent class in respect of his permanent injury. I quite understand and I am in accord with what my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. A. A. McLean) has stated: If the disability is permanent, such as the loss of a hand, the loss of both feet, loss of tongue, loss of one foot, and so on, the injured man would get a pension, and the commissioners would have no right to lessen it. But, if in conjunction with such disability there is some other form of disability which yields to treatment, so that the man only suffers from the permanent disability, then he would fall within the class of which the permanent disability is given as an example.

Referring to the argument of the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Middlebro), if I may use the expression without using it offensively it is almost special pleading to say that partial deafness in both ears, no matter how excessive it may be, entitles a man only to a gratuity. When you read the paragraph in relation to class 4, you find it says that total deafness entitles a man to a pension of forty per cent. This, read in conjuntion with the disability allowed under class 6, clearly means that if a man is suffering from total deafness in both ears he gets a pension of forty per cent. If he is suffering from a trifling partial deafness in both ears, he may get a gratuity. If the deafness is of such character that it falls within the description of "total deafness in both ears" the man would come under class 4. My hon. friend says the word "trifling" does not appear in the report. That is perfectly true, but common sense must be applied to the construction and interpretation of the report, and I should be amazed to find that the pension commissioners had in mind that a man who is hurt, even in the slightest degree, is only entitled to a gratuity. Until a specific instance of the kind is brought to my attention, I shall not be inclined to believe it.

Now, as to whether or not a gratuity should be granted. One of the examples given as entitling a man to a gratuity is the loss of the index or other finger. Supposing a man lost a finger and says "I do not want to be bothered with this pension every three months, or every month; give me $150 down which will enable me to buy a team of horses, and I can start work." If the individual is all right otherwise, I see no objection to his being given the $150. On the general principle of gratuities, I think the committee of last year made a mistake. I think we erred in saying that if a man suffered less than twenty per cent disability he should receive an amount not exceeding $100. That was not enough, and I think we should frankly admit where we have made mistakes so that we may lay the foundation of better things for the next year. Say a man lost a toe, or the top of his ear, or the tip of his nose, or some comparatively trifling thing which in no way impairs his earning capacity, why should he not be entitled to receive a lump sum if he so desires? I have given three months of my time to the study of the subject during this session.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman say that if a man has a piece off his nose it is a trifle?

Mr. NICKLE: I am only trying to give what I would call instances of trifling disability. On the general principle of pensions, you might discuss them from now until to-morrow morning and then go on and discuss them all day to-morrow and the House would not be very much nearer a conclusion than it is no now. My suggestion would be that the committee should agree to let this item pass on the distinct understanding that when the next Parliament meets a strong committee will, early in the session, take the whole question up, get the best evidence available and try to reach some conclusion which will do justice to all. I think the spirit of the House and the spirit of the country is that justice should be done to these men. We have one object in view and that is to see that everything that is fair and right is done by Parliament.

Mr. WEBSTER: What is the largest amount of gratuity paid?

Mr. NICKLE: Under the present regulations, which are, in view of the Order in Council, based on the report unanimously adopted by Parliament last year, the greatest gratuity that may now be paid is $100 where a man suffers a disability not exceeding twenty per cent.

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot agree that we should postpone further discussion of this question for the sake of taking it up at a succeeding session. Not having the advantage of having at my back a military voters' Bill and a franchise Bill, I may not be here next sesion, and I would like to do what I can on behalf of those who have served the country at the front. It is part of our responsibility to deal with the matter on their behalf, and I would like to discharge my share of that responsibility.

Mr. NICKLE: It never occurred to me that the hon. gentleman would not be here next session.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend, I have no doubt, is so satisfied that he and his friends are thoroughly entrenched that our condition did not enter his mind. I do not think that the point raised by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy) was altogether apprehended by the hon. member for Kingston. He spoke of those who had been awarded a gratuity. The reply to that was that if they had been awarded a gratuity on a certain condition of disability, on a change in that condition of disability, that award would be revised. That was not his pcint. Having been awarded a certain gratuity on a certain disability, he suggested that they might secure a revision of the award even though there was no change in physical condition, his contention being, and I think correctly, that in many cases men accepted a gratuity without provident consideration. A man returns from the front, he is glad to be free, he is able to resume the society of his friends, he does not want to be ranked as a kicker or a squealer, he is offered a small gratuity and he accepts it. The point that the hon. member for North Perth had in mind was that all gratuities should be subject to revision without consideration whether there was a change in the physical condition or not.

5 p.m.

Mr. NICKLE: In the report to which my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) was a party last year there was a provision that there should be the right of appeal at any time, I think, within a year. A man only gets a pension if he is discharged. If he gets a pension and if at any time within a year he desires to appeal he can do so. At any time within a year there is a review if he desires it.

Mr. OLIVER: I still think that the review within a year was only for the purpose of taking into consideration a change in condition.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: These Orders in Council provide that:

> All pensions awarded to members of the forces shall be determined by the disability of the applicant without reference to his occupation prior to enlistment.

The cases that I refer to were the cases of two men permanently injured. One lost his heel and another had an injury called anchylosis of the shoulder. They received $11 a month. The injuries to these men were obviously permanent. In the month of June these men were reduced from $11 to $8 a month. I had the certificates of independent medical men to whom these men went and who certified that their injuries were permanent. I claim that under clause 8 of the Order in Council they could not reduce the pensions of these men. It is true that if a man contracts rheumatism it would not be proper to continue his pension because that would not be a permanent injury. But these were injuries to the body, real injuries which will remain during the lives of these men. Yet the commission reduced the pensions. Once a man gets a pension he gets it for life. One of these men cannot move his arm beyond a certain height and he cannot engage in the business in which he was employed previous to going to the war. I understand that in England a man's previous occupation is taken into consideration when pensions are granted. But this clause was put in saying that a man's capability to engage in his previous occupation would not be taken into consideration. For that reason clause 8 was enacted to provide that where the disability was permanent there should be no reduction. I would ask the commissioners to take these two cases into consideration. I think they have read this provision wrongly and that they should not reduce men who are permanently injured as are the two men of whom I speak.

Mr. NICKLE: The commissioner explains how this particular case, of which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLean) has just spoken, arose. Prior to the present regulations becoming law the pensions were divided into four degrees. There was a difference of $11 between each degree. At the end of the year, when the report was made law by Order in Council, all cases were reviewed and some of the degree pensions under the $11 clause were found to fall within clause 5—that is, the twenty per cent disability pension—with the result that in some few cases a degree pension of $11 enjoyed under the previous law was reduced to $8 under the law now in force. But the commissioner tells me there has been no reduction of pensions awarded for permanent disability under the Order in Council.

[Mr. A. A. McLean.]

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: He is wrong in that case. Those men were assigned a pension over a year before the Order in Council was passed.

Mr. NICKLE: That is my point.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I say that under this Order in Council the board had no power to reduce it.

Mr. NICKLE: That is exactly my point. Under the old law there were four degree pensions, each one varying from the one below it by $11. When this Order in Council No. 1334 was passed, it divided the pensions into six classes. Some of those in degree 4, drawing $11, fell into class 5, where their disability was 20 per cent, and that entitled them only to $8. In other words, under their degree of disability, their pension was $11, because there were but four classes, but under order 1334, when there were six classes, they were just over 20 per cent, and under 40 per cent, and they, therefore, received $8, being a reduction of $3, but there have been no cases of reduction under 1334 where the disability was permanent and without other complications. It was only a reduction in the degree of the pension.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: This has the effect of reducing the permanent pension of these men, although they were put on a permanent basis under the old law. I think when the law was passed the effect of it was not understood, and I think an exception should be made in the case of those two men.

Mr. NESBITT. As a member of the committee that adopted the present pension scheme, I may say I think we did remarkably well, considering our experience. This pension Order in Council is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians. It can be rectified, if we find it is not a proper measure. So far as I have listened to the argument and statements of the different members this afternoon as to their troubles, I confess I think that these men should have allowed a review as to the gratuities. I am not in accord with the statement that gratuities should not be allowed in every case. Somebody has mentioned that we should have divided it into tenths, instead of fifths, because some people are on the borderland between two classes. If we divided it into twentieths, they would still be on the borderline between two classes, so that I do not think that would get over the trouble. It is quite possible we should have reduced this to a tenth of disablement. We discussed that at the time, if I am not mistaken, but we thought after 20 per cent a gratuity would fill the bill. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Kingston that we made a mistake in fixing the maximum amount of gratuities at $100. I think all cases should be subject to review where there is complaint that an injustice has been done. I think the commissioner should be allowed to review downward, as well as upward, as far as that is concerned. There might have been too high a pension granted, in the first place, for something that was alleged to be permanent which was not really permanent. That is why I think review should be allowed in all cases. So far as my experience has gone, there has not been much complaint. No doubt there has been some complaint. I have several times brought instances to the notice of the commissioners, and, so far as I know, they have given prompt and diligent attention to the cases. Some one has said this afternoon that a good deal depended upon the local board. There is no doubt about that, and I do not see how it could be otherwise. Let all these men be sent before the commission, and let the commission review their cases, or let the commission go to these men and make a review. I have no doubt the Board of Commissioners will gain a great deal of wisdom as to the kind of Bill to be passed, when the Government makes up its mind to bring in a permanent Bill. In the meantime I think the commissioners should be open, at all times, to representations by reliable people as to the condition of any particular soldier, and if they were not satisfied with the finding of the local board, they should have that man appear before them. One of the commissioners might visit different points, instead of sitting in Ottawa all the time. If I am not mistaken, one of the commissioners went to Hamilton at one time, to look into some cases where there had been dissatisfaction, I understood from him that everything was made satisfactory before he left Hamilton. In such cases, perhaps, the commissioners might find it convenient to make investigations themselves. It is a vexed question, and I think the commissioners should maintain an open mind. Under the present Act, and as far as the present Order in Council is concerned, at the time we compiled it we did the very best we could in the interest of the men who have gone overseas, and I am sure in most cases the Act worked exceedingly well, I know one case where a man had his leg cut off very near the hip, and he asked to have his case reviewed. I do not know whether the case was reviewed or not, but if it was not it should have been, because his leg was cut off so close to the hip that it was a very exceptional case and he could not wear an artificial limb. I knew of another man who had pains in his head, and he did not know what caused them, but maintained that it was the result of service at the front. I think that case was reviewed. Cases of that kind will arise, and we will have to leave them very largely to the judgment of the commissioners.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am at the disadvantage of not being a member of this board. I presume the hon. gentlemen who compose it used the best judgment they could bring to bear upon this very important and intricate question. As in every other line of business, they should follow precedents. For instance, in the legal profession it will not do for a man to start to hew out a course for himself, and ignore all the cases that have been decided in the courts for generations. He must bring himself into line with precedent and practice, and that remark applies to the medical profession. Men have followed precedents in the treatment of cases as they have been dealt with by men in the profession for years, and it will not do for a medical man to ignore the experience of others and the effects of certain treatment.

The Government has the advantage of precedents established by other countries in dealing with cases of this kind. I should like to bring to the attention of the Pensions Board one or two considerations connected with the application of the word "disability." There are so many kinds of employment in the world that disability in one case would not be so great as disability in another, even though the injury might be the same. For instance, if a medical doctor lost a finger or sustained serious injury to one of his hands, his usefulness in his profession would be practically gone. On the other hand, if the same thing happened to a lawyer, the disability would not be so great, particularly if the right hand was not injured. But if the lawyer's hearing or eyesight is affected, the disability which he thereby suffers in the practice of his profession cannot very well be compensated. In the case of men engaged in mining occupations, of whom there are many in my part of the country, the use of every faculty is essential. These men have to go down hundreds, sometimes thousands of feet under the ground; they have to walk miles underneath the surface of the earth before they get to their work; they have to handle explosives and tear down the face of the coal in the mines. If a man of that class is deprived of any one of his senses, he becomes at once useless to himself and, if he works in the mine, a great menace to those who work with him. No manager of a mine would care to have in his employ a man who suffered any disability. Accordingly, the board would have to exercise judgment in dealing with such cases as distinguished from cases of men engaged in other occupations—merchants, lawyers, engineers, persons following any other calling which is not a dangerous one. That which applies to miners applies also, in some degree, to fishermen and lumbermen. I should like to know from the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) who has taken a great interest in this work, how the classifications of disability are arrived at? Is the class into which a man is put decided by a medical expert? In a matter of such far-reaching importance we cannot move too cautiously in attempting to arrive at a definite rule as to how these men shall be dealt with. Further, I suppose, assuming that the physical disabilities are the same, that a man with a family will receive different consideration from that accorded to a man who has no dependents.

Mr. NICKLE: In regard to the first question, the table of disabilities was arrived at by the Pension Commissioners, gathering together the best information that they could get throughout the world, from workmen's compensation boards and other like bodies, as to how far any specific disability impaired a man's usefulness. Having collaborated these tables, they got a board of three of the most experienced men that they could find in Canada, together with a representative from the Workmen's Compensation Board, and prepared a table of disabilities covering practically every specific disability of which one could think. After the actual physical impairment of the man is determined, reference is made to the disability table, which defines the percentage of disability that the theoretic individual suffers; then the practical and the theoretical are brought together, with the result that the class into which the man would fall is decided.

As to my hon. friend's second question, if he will return to the report of last year he will see that the pensions scheme as originally worked out makes a specific allowance of so many dollars, according to rank and class, to a married man. There is a further provision that so much shall be allowed for each child in the family. I read from paragraph 14:

> That the disabled member of such force, up to and including the rank of lieutenant, entitled to a pension in the 1st, 2nd or 3rd class, in addition to his personal pension, be entitled to draw $6 a month for each child; of the rank of captain, $7 a month for each child, etc.

The larger the family, the larger the monthly allowance in respect of the children.

Mr. KYTE: I should like to draw the attention of the committee to this item which I see in this evening's Journal:

> It is understood that the new pensions for soldiers which are to be created by Order in Council will show not less than a 25 per cent increase. Lack of time prevented a measure being introduced in the House to grant increased pensions; therefore it will be done by Order in Council soon after Parliament prorogues.

I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether any such Order in Council has been passed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN; No. All these conjectures in the press as to what the increase is to be are entirely without foundation, for the simple reason that the Government have not had opportunity to consider the matter. My hon. friend will realize that, during a very busy session of Parliament such as this, with the great demands upon our time and energies which are entailed in the prosecution of the war, we really have not had an opportunity to give matured consideration to the subject up to the present time. It is our hope and our intention, shortly after the prorogation of Parliament, to take the matter up and come to a conclusion about it. We shall then have the advantage of all that has been said in this House on the subject, the advantage, also, of knowing the views which have been communicated to us from time to time by those members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who have returned to Canada and who have studied the subject with a good deal of thoroughness.

Mr. KYTE: I did not bring the matter up for the purpose of finding any fault.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know that.

Mr. KYTE: I wished to have a statement from the Prime Minister. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction throughout the country as a result of discrimination in the rates of pensions allowed to privates as compared with the rates allowed to officers. A very strong argument has been made this afternoon in this committee on behalf of granting as generous pensions as possible to returned soldiers on account of the increased cost of living and the difficulties they will have in making ends meet in their domestic arrangements. As a rule an officer is a man who occupies in the business world a position which is very much better than that of a private. Generally speaking, the men who are given commissions in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces are professional men, men who are engaged in business and largely those who are in the enjoyment of incomes apart altogether from their military income. The private is usually a man who depends entirely upon his daily labour for the support of his family, and when he gives up his ordinary avocation and joins the forces every source of income he formerly enjoyed is cut off. The necessity of adequately providing for the family of the private is just as great as the necessity of adequately providing for the family of the officer. Under those circumstances, I do not quite appreciate the reason for such a great difference in the scale of pensions between those two ranks. There may be very good reason for the distinction, and for the moment I am not criticising the Pensions Board or whoever it is that is responsible for drawing up the scale. But if there is any possible way by which the difference might be narrowed down so that the private could get a larger pension than he is now getting in comparison with the pension paid to the officer, it is very desirable that some such readjustment or recasting of the scale of pensions should be undertaken.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is, of course, aware that the scale of pensions as now in force was fixed upon the unanimous report of a committee of this House at the last session. That scale was brought into force by an Order in Council, failing legislation which it was not possible to pass at the last session. There is a good deal in the view which my hon. friend has put forward, but I do not know that I can follow him absolutely in all that he has suggested, because I myself know of a great many men, in the enjoyment of very good incomes, whether from business or professional work, who have enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force as privates. I know some of them have been subsequently promoted, first to the rank of non-commissioned officer, and afterwards, on the field, to a commission. I do not, therefore, feel that there is any absolute rule which could be laid down precisely along that line. At the same time it is to be observed that the pensions were fixed, in the first instance, upon the basis of considerations which have more relevance to a permanent force rather than to a force of the character which is doing battle now for Canada and the Empire. It is not in contemplation, so far as I am aware, to increase the pensions of the officers. The increase which was spoken of is to be confined to the pensions of privates, and probably of non-commissioned officers, so in that way it is hoped that the purpose which my hon. friend has in view will, to some extent, be attained.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to refer to the remarks of the Minister of Customs in regard to the attitude of the Board of Pensions Commissioners. I do not wish to suggest that that board have prejudicial or ulterior motives against the claimants for pensions, but, in my judgment, they misapprehend their proper duties. From the instances I have seen, my conclusion is that the Board of Pensions Commissioners look upon themselves rather as the watch-dogs of the treasury than as a board appointed to see that the justice which the people of Canda want to give to those who have served them well, shall be given. They appear to me to be on the defensive all the time instead of being on the aggressive. Their attitude is rather that of men who are defending the treasury against raids by the returned soldiers than the attitude, which I conceive to be the proper one, of men whose business is to see that the returned soldier gets what is coming to him according to the wishes of the Canadian people. During the course of this discussion and during previous discussions, it has been held out that the Board of Pensions Commisioners are ready to consider and to reconsider claims that may be made to them. That is all very well. I wish to put this view before the committee as urgently and emphatically as I can, that, if that is the attitude of the Board of Pensions Commissioners, namely, that they will consider the cases that come before them, that is not an attitude in consonance with what I consider to be their duty. I take it that the obligation of the country to the soldier arises out of the service the soldier has rendered, and out of the consequences which he has suffered in the rendering of that service, and it is not a matter of whether the soldier or a friend or somebody else brings the case to the attention of those in authority. The purpose of the people of Canada is that, when a soldier has suffered disability because of his service, that disability shall be recognized by the State adequately according to the law as laid down by whoever may have laid it down. When the soldier gives up his civil rights, when he not only becomes the servant of the State, but places himself absolutely, as to person and will, at the disposal of the State, the State is thereby obligated to see, on its own behalf, for the protection of its own honour, that any prospect that has been held out to the soldier in connection with the offer of his services shall be carried out to the letter, and without any demand on his part. I am speaking now on the basis of the argument as it has been put before the House to-day and on former occasions.

I am assuming that there is a condition in which claims have to be pushed before the Board of Pension Commissioners. There should be no such thing as pushing a claim before the Board of Pension Commissioners. When a man has suffered a disability, preceding his discharge there should be a full consideration of his case by the Board of Pension Commissioners, who should render their judgment, so that as soon as the soldier is discharged his award would be awaiting him without any question and without any necessity for his making an appearance or presenting a case, and without any consideration of whether he had friends or not. If I may be pardoned the use of the slang term, "it does not listen good to me" to hear member after member declare in this House that the cases he has brought before the Board of Pension Commissioners have been favourably considered. My contention is that there should be no necessity for any such action by any member of Parliament, or by anybody else, and when a condition exists where such action is necessary, and I presume it was necessary in the interests of those concerned, it discloses to me a condition that is undesirable and not in accord with my understanding of the proper functions of the Board of Pension Commissioners, or with the will and wish of the Parliament and people of Canada. It is out of that attitude of mind that has grown this question of improper and insufficient gratuities. I feel strongly on this point for several reasons. One is because there has been a tremendous rendering of service on the part of the country in which I live, and I feel, therefore, a particular interest in those who have suffered because of their service. I feel a further interest as a member of this House, as representing the people, to see that the honour and good faith of the Parliament of Canada are absolutely kept with those who have served with honour and credit and with such terrible losses to themselves. It is for these reasons that I urge strongly this view, and that I present to the House my opinion that in the whole consideration of this question of pensions the tendency has been to unduly scale down the pensions to which the men were entitled.

A committee of the House drafted a certain scale of pensions, I repeat that this was a minimum scale, even at that time. That scale has been placed in a position of still greater inadequacy by the subsequent increase in the cost of living, and the great failure to meet conditions as they are has been on the part of the Board of Pension Commissioners in unduly scaling down pension claims; that is, giving a man 60 per cent when he should have had 80 per cent, or giving him a gratuity when he should have had 20 per cent. I wish it to be understood that I am taking this position, not with any view of making undue criticism of the Pension Board or of the Government or of any person, but because I am deeply impressed with the conditions as they appear to me, and I think I should be doing very much less than my duty, on my responsibility as a member of this Parliament, if I did not present my views to the House in all possible frankness.

Mr. NICKLE: The sincerity of the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) is my only excuse for rising. The practice is this: Before a man can be discharged a medical board determines whether or not he has suffered a disability. If they report that he has suffered a disability on account of the war, a report of his condition goes to the Pension Commissioners, who determine what pension the man is to have. By an Order in Council passed on the 24th of February, 1917, it is provided that no man can be discharged who is suffering from a disability, until his pension has been determined. The Pension Commissioners notify the hospital where the man is that his pension has been determined, and he is as a rule discharged at the end of the next month, and his cheque for the first month's pension is awaiting him at his home. This procedure was necessitated by unfortunate circumstances that arose in the early pension administration, under which men were discharged before their pensions was determined. Sometimes a month or so would elapse before a discharged soldier would get his first cheque, and there were undoubtedly cases of hardship in that way. Since attention was directed to that fact, the Order in Council has been passed, and the result now is that no disabled man is discharged until the Pension Commissioners say that they have determined his pension. When that has been done, he is discharged on the last day of the month or the first of the next and his cheque is awaiting him when he gets home.

Mr. KYTE: There has been a good deal of complaint from returned soldiers in the county of Cape Breton. I have in mind the case of a man who wrote me two weeks ago, who returned from the front four months ago. He received no military pay and no pension, and in order to support his family he had to go back and work in the mines under conditions that were extremely onerous; the work was very difficult indeed for him to perform. I should like to know what is the procedure with regard to soldiers who have returned disabled. Do they go to Halifax to be examined by a medical board, or are they examined locally, to determine whether they are entitled to a pension?

Mr. NICKLE: When a man lands in Canada he is examined at Quebec or Halifax, and sent to the military district from which he enlisted, where, assuming he requires treatment, he goes under the care of the Military Hospitals Commission. The procedure from that time on is, as I have outlined to the hon. member for Edmonton.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to draw attention to certain further memoranda forwarded to me by the Citizens Committee of Edmonton. I have already read the memorandum in which they make the assertion that the present pensions of dependents of deceased soldiers are too low, and in which they mention a particular case. They also bring forward two other classes of cases which are a little out of the ordinary but which should, I think, be brought to the attention of the committee. They are cases in which no pension has been granted under the strict interpretation of the Pensions Regulations. In reference to the case of George Lennox Buchanan, they say:

> This is the orphan son of a soldier who was undergoing a term of imprisonment, and who had shown such good conduct that his term was shortened. Upon release he enlisted, went overseas and was killed on active service. His wife is also dead. The child referred to was adopted under the provincial regulations governing the Department of Neglected Children of Alberta. This was a real act of charity on the part of George Buchanan and his wife, who adopted the child. They have no children of their own and are an old couple. At present the boy has a splendid home, but they have no resources and at their deaths could leave no estate. The foster father feels that this child should receive pension, and is willing to execute any trust whereby any pension or sum of money granted on behalf of the child should be kept for his sole use and benefit in order that he may receive a proper education.

The point is, the orphan son of a deceased soldier was adopted by an old couple, who are able to provide for the child while they live, but who are certain not to live very long, and before the child would be able to earn his own livelihood he would be left destitute.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Was the adoption before the father enlisted?

Mr. OLIVER: No, it was after the death of the father, on the death of the mother.

Mr. NICKLE: As I understand it, it was on the death of the mother, but before the father enlisted.

Mr. OLIVER: I could not say definitely as to that. The only information I have is what is contained in the memorandum.

Mr. NICKLE: The commissioner tells me he remembers the case quite distinctly. The child was regularly and legally adopted by this couple when the father was in prison. When the father was released, he went to the war and was killed. The commissioners took the position that as under the law the father was released from any obligation to the child, the parental responsibility having been assumed by the couple adopting the child, no pension was paid in respect of the death of the father.

Mr. OLIVER: I have no personal knowledge of this case. The memorandum was sent to me through the mail, and I present it just as it came to me. The explanation given by the hon. member from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) is an explanation which does not, to use a slang expression, "listen good" to the ordinary people of the country. The father of this child, whatever he was, gave his life for the country, and the country owes something to the child, at least that is the way the ordinary man looks at it. I want to assure the committee that the gentlemen who sent these representations are a committee of the prominent citizens of Edmonton, who have gathered together for the purpose of looking after such cases. It is not a partisan committee in any sense of the word, and it has nothing to do with politics. They also mention the case of Mary L. Richmond, to which they refer as follows:

> Oliver C. Richmond, the son of this woman, enlisted and went overseas, serving some time at the front, and was then invalided home and died some time after his return. It seems there is some difficulty in getting the pension for this mother, claiming that the boy had a pre-disposition to tuberculosis, and that if he had not gone to the front he would not have died. The facts are, he went, came home and is dead, and there seems to be some finesse on the part of the doctors as to whether he really died because of exposure at the front or not. One doctor stated that there were latent conditions, which, to quote his own words, "were lit up by the strain of the soldier's service at the front." There is no doubt that this woman is entitled to a mother's pension for her son, who at the time of his enlistment was proceeding to his examinations in law and would have been a great support and help to her in years to come.

I have no doubt the Board of Pension Commissioners found reasons under the law for not granting the pension in this case, but assuming the facts to be as stated, and I have no reason to think otherwise, their action does not appeal to me—and I do not think it appeals to citizens generally—as a case of keeping faith with those who have rendered the most praiseworthy service to the country.

Mr. NICKLE: That is one of the classes of cases to which I alluded earlier in the afternoon when I said I thought the committee, with the limited knowledge they had at their disposal last year, overlooked a very serious situation which is going to arise in a great many instances. By our report, we make provision only for the case of those who are solely or mainly dependent on the deceased soldiers. The committee did not take into account at all the question of prospective dependents, such, for instance, as the case of a widow who was educating her son and spending possibly the savings of her husband's lifetime, or his insurance money, in order to give the boy the advantage of a proper education. In the drafting of this report the committee laid down as a condition precedent to the granting of a pension to a dependent, as distinguished from a pension to a wife who receives pension as of right, that it was only granted where the mother or other dependent was wholly or mainly dependent on the deceased soldier. If the legislation had come to the House this year, that is one of the aspects of the question which would have required very careful consideration, and in my judgment the House would have had to decide what policy should be pursued in relation to this prospective dependency. It is a most serious question, and it comes back to the point raised by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) in regard to insurance, as to whether or not it was advisable that something should be done by which a compulsory insurance might be put into effect so that there would be something available for those who were left in the event of the man being killed. In my judgment, the committee failed to make provision for just the class of cases to which my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has directed attention, and which in many instances have resulted in great hardship throughout the country.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems there is some difficulty in getting a pension for this woman, because her son had a predisposition to tuberculosis. Supposing that under the literal interpretation of the recommendations of the committee last year, this woman would not be entitled to compensation I sill think that the business of a judge is to render justice and not merely to interpret the law. His interpretation. I still think that the business of a ing justice, and I think, much more than in the case of the judge, the business of the commission is to render justice and not merely to interpret the law. However, I wish to say that without prejudice. I am merely taking a position which I think is in accord with the general view of the people of the country.

There is another point that this committee raises that will have a serious bearing, particularly when compulsory service is instituted. It is a very serious matter. We have found serious cases under the voluntary system, and they will be very much more serious, I am afraid, under the compulsory system. These are cases where people have financial obligations, and they have no means of carrying them when they have no resources other than the pension. I will give a few instances. I am quite aware that they are outside of the ordinary matter of pensions. We have never considered these cases as being entitled to pensions, but in Great Britain, under the Compulsory Service Act, they are taking into account such cases as these. Under our proposed Compulsory Service Act we will also be warranted in taking note of such cases as the following:

Hannah Lord.—This woman's pension is $32 per month. Previous to the enlistment of her husband, they purchased a lot for $600 upon which $400 has been paid. Interest and taxes for two years are still unpaid.

Amy Bloomer.—This woman's pension is $34 per month. Previous to the enlistment of the soldier they purchased a lot for $2,400, upon which they erected a store and barn for $2,600. There is a mortgage against this property for $2,000, interest overdue $95, taxes about $94. There is no income from this property at present, nor will there be any until times "pick up" in this city. The total income of this widow is $50, including the pension. The $16 per month will be reduced as years go by. The widow stated to our committee that unless some help could be obtained until times get good again, she will lose her equity in this property.

Mary E. Marsden.—This woman's pension is $56 per month. She owns a house and lot valued at $5,000 against which there is a mortgage of $1,200. The widow states that she can just live on the pension she receives, and can pay the taxes after severe sacrifices, but cannot see how it is possible to redeem the property before foreclosure.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What has been urged by my hon. friend will be taken into consideration by the Government. It seems rather particularly relevant to the cases of men who enlist under compulsory service. My hon. friend says that the question has been taken up and dealt with in England under their Compulsory Service Act.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall have an examination made as to what has been done in Great Britain in that regard for the purpose of assisting us in arriving at a reasonable and fair conclusion as to what could be done along the same lines in this country.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER: For the purpose of calling attention to the matters that were brought forward by the Citizens' Committee at Edmonton, I will read a statement of the classes into which these cases are divided.

Class "A"—Cases where the soldier's widow has property encumbered or mortgaged and is unable to discharge the indebtedness from savings from Pension Fund allowance.

Class "B"—Cases where pension is insufficient at the present time with regard to the high cost of living.

Class "C"—Cases where no pension has been granted owing to strict interpretation of the pension regulations.

These are the three classes of cases which I have already placed before the House, and in regard to which there has been some measure of discussion. I wish to instance another case which came under my notice, not in regard to pensions, but in connection with the administration of the Patriotic Fund—and I allude to it merely to establish the fact that a very serious situation may arise in regard to the equities in encumbered property when the Military Service Bill is put into force. The case I refer to is that of a woman whose husband volunteered early in the war. They had a house and lot assessed at $6,000 upon which there was a mortgage of $2,500 The mortgage matured, subsequent to the man's enlistment. The mortgagees foreclosed and claimed possession of the property. The soldier's wife contested the action and retained possession by occupation. The matter came to my attention through the fact that the woman was a claimant on the Patriotic Fund, and her Patriotic Fund allowance was withheld, to either be diverted or to compel her to pay rental to the mortgagees. I bring that instance before the committee, not to discuss the administration of the Fund, but to show how such cases may arise—where a man not only suffers the ordinary disabilities incidental to serving his country instead of serving himself, but is penalized in large amounts. This case is not one of pension at the present time. But if the man had been killed the woman would have lost not only her support but her property because of the patriotic service rendered by her husband.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The case my hon. friend mentions is one that is not peculiar to his own community. There has been a considerable number of these cases in the West, and my little investigation at a distance by correspondence leads me to believe there is in these cases no greater hardship—outside of casualties in the field—than that endured by those who remain at home, owing to conditions following upon real estate in western Canada having assumed its present aspect. I should like to know to what conclusion my hon. friend's investigation leads him.

Mr. OLIVER: Before six o'clock I read the recommendation of the Edmonton Citizens' Committee, forwarded by the Hon. A. C. Rutherford, and I made the suggestion, of which the Prime Minister approved, that the same condition is found to exist in England under the Compulsory Military Service Act and that they are taking some means to minimize the hardship. I do not know what means they are taking, or how far they are carrying it. I think the proposition is that the Government shall assume the responsibility up to a certain limited amount.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: These are cases of compulsory service.

Mr. OLIVER: I was alluding to this on account of the Military Service Act coming into force. I think that we as a country should not give less consideration, but if possible even more consideration, to those who are called up than to those who volunteered freely. It is hard to make such a statement, but I think that proposition is fair.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They would probably, having regard to the terms of the regulation be exempt here when they would not in England.

Mr. OLIVER: That may be. I thought it was only right to draw attention to this fact, and to urge, as the committee at Edmonton has urged, that the cases that have already occurred under voluntary service should receive such consideration as is within the scope and possibilities of the Government. There is another resolution of this committee that I desire to place before the House. It reads:

> That the pension of a widowed mother be the same as that of a wife, provided her son or sons who has or have been killed in action or died on active service were at the time of enlistment or subsequently thereto her sole support.

I do not know how far this goes beyond the present regulation, but I have read it for the purpose of putting it before the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: The question of pensions is a very important one, and no matter what policy Parliament adopts that policy will not be easily carried out. There must of necessity be cases of injustice at some points. It ought to be, and I believe it is, the policy of Parliament and of the Government to render these cases just as few and far between as possible. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), I think, made some reference this afternoon to insurance.

If I am rightly informed, the men who are to be called upon under the Military Service Act will not be in as good a position as the men overseas have been in the matter of protecting themselves by insurance. I was informed yesterday that several of the leading life insurance companies had instructed their agents to solicit no more insurance on single men, or widowers with families, who were between the ages of the first class to be called. In other words, the insurance companies do not propose to take any risks upon the first 100,000 men who will be called up. It is quite probable that if the required number of men is not secured by the first call, the same attitude will be taken by the insurance companies in reference to the men liable to service in the next draft. This may have something to do with the question of pensions, because the men drafted will not be in as good a position to protect those whom they are leaving behind, no matter what means they have, as were those who have already gone over. Previously, policyholders were at liberty after the expiration of three years, to go wherever they liked; their taking part in the war had no effect upon the amount of their premium. Those who enlisted later had to pay a larger premium or have their policies cancelled. The fact that the insurance companies have asked their agents not to accept any more applications from men between the ages—

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is not universal, is it?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know; this information came to me yesterday. This condition will make it all the harder for those who go to protect those whom they leave behind, and it will impose upon the State a greater burden and a greater responsibility.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They are endeavouring to select for military service unmarried men in preference to married men.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am speaking of unmarried men liable to call under the first class, and widowers without families, between the ages of 20 and 34. I wish the member for Kingston to answer two questions. First, when a man reverts in rank, will his family, if the occasion arises, receive pension on the basis of the rank that he held when he left Canada, or on the basis of the lower rank subsequently assumed? Second, what is the position of men, so far as pension is concerned, who, having enlisted with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, subsequently became attached to the British forces? Will they have to rely upon the British Act in the matter of pensions?

Mr. NICKLE: The British Act.

Mr. REID: If a man who reverts in rank is killed, the widow gets a pension based upon the rank held by her husband when he landed in England. But if, holding the lower rank, the man is wounded, he would, according to the present regulation, receive pension based upon the rank that he held when wounded. That is a matter that should be reconsidered. The resolutions read by the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) are certainly worthy of very serious consideration; they go to show that the whole matter of pensions should again be gone into. The present regulations, as I stated earlier in the day, were all worked out by a committee of the House. When these regulations were made, the members of the House were of one mind in their desire to see that the provisions were fair and just and in the interests of those overseas. But, like any other regulations, it is a hard thing to make them perfect. They must be taken up from time to time and amended; the difficulties arising under their operation must frequently be considered. Any persons who feel that they have a grievance or a claim to make will certainly communicate with the member for their constituency, who knows just what should be done in the matter. In fact, even if we had amended the regulations, we should still have cases of injustice—not intentional on the part of the pension commissioners, but arising naturally in connection with the administration of the regulations. The Government simply carried out the report of the committee in appointing the Board of Pension Commissioners. We feel that the Act should be amended; that certain cases under which claims arise should be considered; that any errors should be corrected. Under the present Act any person who considers that his case had not been justly dealt with has the right to appeal within one year.

Even if there have been cases in which the time has elapsed, the committee that will be appointed to decide on an amended Bill under which the pensions will be administered can easily insert in it a clause to cover such cases. We are all agreed on endeavouring to do what is right to those who have gone overseas and to make the Act as perfect as possible. The Board of Pension Commissioners, however, must do what is fair, not only to the soldier, but to the country. There have been presented to the board cases in which the parties had no right whatever to pensions. While I would not want to say that there have been many such cases, there have been some, and, therefore, it is necessary for the board to investigate every case very closely. I also believe there are a number of cases in which an injustice has been done to the soldier, but that injustice has generally been caused by the way in which the papers have been filled out on behalf of the soldier by other parties. I know of a case in which a clergyman filled out the papers, and the board, on the information given to them in those papers, could not have acted otherwise than as they did, but when the matter was drawn to their attention it was at once looked into and when it was seen that there had been injustice the injustice was remedied. At the next session of Parliament all these matters must be taken up, and during the recess the whole matter can be taken up, and the report of the committee of last year revised and improved upon in such a way as to minimize as much as possible the causes of complaint. Even if the Act is framed in accordance with the best ability of Parliament, it will be found that complaints in regard to its administration will still be made.

Mr. OLIVER: I would not wish to delay the committee longer on the subject, and I quite appreciate the spirit in which the minister (Mr. Reid) has spoken. As he says, we are all desirous of seeing that these men receive their rights according to the wishes of the people of Canada. At the present time, however, we are not working under an Act of Parliament; we are working under an Order in Council that is capable of amendment at the discretion and on the responsibility of the Government. So, if we consider the enactment not to be final, we are in a better position to-day to meet new and unforeseen circumstances by amending the Order in Council, than we would be if we were working under an Act of Parliament. I would respectfully suggest that that fact might be taken into consideration, and that where there is found to be a class of cases not provided for under the present Order in Council, an amendment might be made to it in order that justice might be done. I would not, for one moment, wish that the Board of Pension Commissioners should not look into every case very carefully. I fully appreciate the fact that they have a responsibility to discharge towards the country in protecting the public moneys, but my complaint was—and I am going to take the liberty of repeating it—that their attitude is that they are rather the guardians of the treasury than the champions of the disabled soldiers. My point is that their main duty is the championship of the rights of the soldiers. The protection of the treasury is part of their duty, but it is rather the second than the first duty. The Board of Pension Commisioners should create a sympathetic atmosphere in and through their administration, so that the disabled soldier and his friends would feel that, instead of his having to go up against opposition, he was appealing to friends who were making it their business to see that he got justice. I know it is not possible to please every one. I know there are people who make improper claims. I quite appreciate the difficulties that any Board of Pension Commissioners must encounter. But I make the straight and plain criticism that I do not think there has been created that atmosphere of sympathy with the soldier that would lead to more satisfactory administration, and that in the end would work out very much better for the country.

Mr. REID: Criticism on this matter is necessary, and will do a great deal of good. This is a matter of great importance. Very many good citizens of this country have gone to the front and made tremendous sacrifices, and on account of those sacrifices many are now dependent upon the pensions awarded. If, therefore, there is any suggestion or criticism that can be made in this House, should be made. After discussing the matter with the three Pension Commissioners, my impression is that their sympathies are with the soldiers, but any one who has a grievance would probably find fault with them. Criticism of the kind offered is a good thing, because it shows the board exactly what may be thought of their work, and it will do no harm. The Government, therefore, court criticism in this matter. It must be dealt with and decided upon by members on both sides of the House. We are trying to carry out the decision of last year just as it was put through this House, except for amendments of the Order in Council which experience has shown to be necessary and which we have the power to make. There are not many cases of injustice, but there are some that have come before the ministers, and, so far as the Government are concerned, they will do what they can to remedy any injustice.

At the same time my hon.friend can readily understand that when Parliament has decided on certain regulations for administering pensions, the Government would naturally hesitate to make any serious changes in those regulations until the whole matter had been laid before Parliament.

[Mr. Oliver.]

The Prime Minister in his remarks this afternoon intimated that these matters would all be considered. They will be considered, and the discussion that has taken place here to-day will be read by every minister of the Government, and anything we can do towards remedying any grievance will certainly be done between now and the day when Parliament next meets, when this whole question will be taken up and finally dealt with.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am sorry I did not have the opportunity of being in the House earlier in the afternoon when this matter was under consideration. I had the honour of being a member of the committee which considered the question of pensions last year, and I recall that the feeling of the committee was that in regard to a great many question we were necessarily working in the dark, and that it was necessary that there should be a revision during the present session of Parliament of the recommendations which we made. I notice that the Minister of Finance has had on the Order Paper since June 11 a resolution which apparently he intended to move, to provide for the revision which we expected last year would take place. A great many questions came before the committee on which it was felt that we could not pronounce with any finality. We felt that a year's experience in working out the problems that arose, together with the experience of the members in regard to their constituents, would help in perfecting an Act this year.

I also desire to recall that it was unanimously agreed by the committee that the men who were to compose the Pensions Board should be chosen after consultation with the leader of the Opposition. That understanding was embodied in the first report presented to the House. But at the request of the Chairman of the Committee, the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), it was agreed that as the terms of the report were to form part of an Order in Council, that recommendation should not be made, it being understood, however, that in accordance with the wishes of the committee the idea would be carried out. I regret to say that the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) did not carry it out, though I personally called his attention to the matter in a letter I addressed to him, and although the fact of this understanding having been arrived at was stated in the House when the matter was under discussion on the very day the House adjourned last session. I think it would have been very much better if the Prime Minister had carried out the idea. The Pension Board ought to be composed of men, and administered under conditions entirely free from political influence. The suggestion that there would be any politics in connection with the administration of the pensions regulations would only be an injury to the Government responsible for carrying them out. I have no hesitation in saying that I regard the Prime Minister as not having carried out his word on this subject. As I have already said, the statement that this understanding had been arrived at was made in his presence at end of last session; and where a thing of that kind is done by common consent all parties should show good faith in the matter.

I have no fault to find with the personnel of the commission. I think that the gentlemen who compose it have approached the consideration of the problems before them with the highest possible ideals, and with a desire to render the best public service. But I cannot help regarding it as most regrettable that the intention of the committee, as expressed, was not carried out, and that the commission, which might have been composed practically as it is now, was not appointed in accordance with that understanding. My hon. friends who were members of that committee will recall that what I am stating in that particular is absolutely correct.

I think it is unfortunate that the Government did not submit the pensions regulations for revision at this session of Parliament. I charge the Government with being negligent in their duty in permitting this motion to stand on the Order Paper for over three months without calling in the aid of the Pensions Board and the services of the committee which sat last year, or some other committee of Parliament which had given some study to the question.

Mr. ROSS: The Canadian Northern was more important.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend says the Canadian Northern was more important. I do not think it was. I think that the proper regulation of pension matters is of the very greatest importance to the people of this country. I think that the whole terms of the Order in Council and the report of the committee that was made last year could well have been revised in the light of the experience we have all had in the meantime. The thousand complexities which human nature presents in the ordinary affairs of life do not begin to indicate the tremendous problems with which I have come in contact in my experience with the men of my own constituency who have gone to the front, and in regard to their friends at home who have been bereaved. Problems have arisen which I had no conception of when, as a member of the committee, I studied this question last year.

This whole question of pensions is wrapped up with the question of the treatment of the men who have gone overseas, and their conditions of service. I think Canada is paying the boys at the front entirely too little money; I think we should pay them more. I think the Government should have taken up long ago the question of insuring the men who go to the front. That problem ought to be taken into consideration in working out the details of any pension scheme. Apparently, in regard to both these problems the Government is prepared to let matters remain as they are. In comparison with the United States, which has organized in a splendid way in every department that is necessary to maintain their position in the war, this Government shows in a very poor light, in whatever branch of the war you care to mention. The policy of this Government has been haphazard from the beginning. "Anything for the moment," has been its policy.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is a real scold.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend need not worry. He is one of those seraphic beings who could not say anything no matter what the Government did. I would point out that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have criticised the Government in the matter of pensions are simply carrying out the suggestion which the minister made a short time ago, when he said that this Government would not know what to do unless they had some criticism in order to help them along the right path. I am, therefore, performing a duty in the interests of the Government. I say that it is a scandal that this whole question of pensions should have been allowed to stand as it is. My hon. friend intimates that there is going to be an Order in Council to increase the pensions. That should have been a matter for consideration by hon. members of this House, and for a committee of this House, entirely apart from any question of party.

There is another matter. With reference to the rules incorporated in the Order in Council, I think we should have given, and should give now, to the Pensions Board, wider discretion in regard to the numerous cases which are liable to arise and which will prove exceptions to the general rules we laid down. I have in mind one or two instances. A father whose boy has been killed at the front, or has died as the result of injuries received or disease contracted or aggravated while on active service, is entitled to a pension in class 3.

I have in mind the case of a poor old workingman in my county. Two of his elder sons were married. One of the younger boys upon whom he largely depended for getting along worked in one of the industries nearby. This boy went to the front and was killed. The man's wife died in the meantime. His second son volunteered and went to the front, and the younger boy did not give his father half of his pay. The result is, the old man is practically destitute. Under the conditions and rules which have been laid down, the Pension Board cannot see its way clear to give him anything. This is an instance in which the pension commissioners ought to have wider discretion, and if the opportunity had been afforded us to deal in review with the regulations which were laid down last year, I would have urged, if I had been on the committee, that wider discretionary power should be given to the commission to deal with such cases. Another case is that of a widowed mother, one of whose boys went to the front and was killed. Her husband died in the meantime. She has another son, sixteen years old, who is not much good. She is in receipt of a pension under the regulations, which will cease the moment that boy reaches the age of seventeen or eighteen, and he will probably turn out to be no good whatever. This poor woman is bereft of the one who might have been able to help her, and under the regulations she is cut off from receiving any pension. If wider discretion were left with the board to deal with cases of this kind, undoubtedly she would be looked after. Let me give still another case. A man who had been through the South African war volunteered for service overseas. While training in Halifax he was thrown and broke his kneecap. Of course it was impossible for him to go overseas. He was allowed a pension and he still walks lame, and will be lame for the rest of his life. Before he enlisted he was a coal miner, and of course it is impossible for him to engage in coal mining again.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. NICKLE: Was he injured on this side of the Atlantic?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, but he was in the overseas forces, and he would have been entitled to a pension, so that the case comes within the purport of these regulations. While the shell manufacturing was going on he got some work in that industry, but this is now stopped. I received a letter from him the other day in which he tells me that on the principle of bad luck never coming singly, he has received word from the Pension Board to the effect that, basing themselves upon some medical report, he is not to receive any more pension. I have no doubt the Pension Board is dealing with this case in accordance with the regulations. I intend to call upon the board for the purpose of giving this man's name, and the full particulars. The net result of the whole thing is that he is lame for life and cannot engage in his usual occupation, and his pension is being cut off because, I apprehend, the board is tied down by the letter of the law as incorporated in the Order in Council. The Government are taking full responsibility for this law; they have not consulted Parliament in regard to the matter and apparently have decided that they would not do so. They propose to deal with the question by Order in Council. With all the complexity of the problems that must come before any Parliament in this country, we have allowed a year to go by without any revision of those pension regulations. I regard this as very unfortunate. The difficulty will not be met by simply increasing the amount of the pensions. There must be a total revision of these regulations along certain lines, and the Government, with an election upon them and with all the problems to be dealt with in the next six months, will not be able to give this question the consideration to which it is entitled. I believe the Pension Board is determined to do what is right, and I believe we may safely trust them. At the same time, I regard it as most unfortunate that the Government has allowed a year to elapse without dealing with the problem, and that we are now coming to the end of this Parliament with a law which is practically a year and a half old, without the benefit of the changes suggested by the experience which has been gathered in the time intervening, and that we cannot look for any immediate improvement or change in the law upon a permanent basis or upon such lines that calm deliberation and intelligence and care applied to the framing of a law would produce.

Mr. REID: My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) first complains that in the appointment of this commission he understood the committee had suggested——

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not understand it; I knew it.

Mr. REID: My hon. friend says he knew the committee had recommended that the leader of the Opposition should be consulted in the appointment of this commission. This is the first time I have heard of it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let me say to my hon. friend that it was stated in Parliament on a motion to adopt the report of the committee. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries moved the adoption of the report last year, and I seconded. If my hon. friend will look at Hansard he will see that my statement is correct.

Mr. REID: I do not doubt my hon. friend's statement at all. He also told us he had written a letter to the Prime Minister. This is the first I have heard of it. Probably I was not in the House when the discussion took place. If the Prime Minister had that understanding I am quite satisfied he must have overlooked it, and that he had no intention whatever of not fully carrying out any understanding which may have been arrived at. In any event, even if a mistake were made so far as the understanding is concerned, my hon. friend agrees that the three commissioners who were appointed were men in whom the people of Canada had every confidence. I think that in making the selection the Prime Minister chose men whom no person would criticise as being unfair in the administration of those pension regulations. So far as concerns the submission of the Bill at this session, I may say that the notice on the Order Paper referred to by my hon. friend was simply a notice of a Bill authorizing the appointment of the Board of Commissioners, not of a Bill to establish the rate of pensions. The reason no Bill was submitted this session is that we have not had an opportunity of submitting one. I think every member of this House will agree that we have had most important legislation from the time the Prime Minister came back in May down to the present moment, legislation that had to go through, legislation that could not wait. The financial Bills and the other Bills had to go through; there can be no doubt about that. Even the Canadian Northern Railway Bill, to which my hon. friend refers, was a Bill which had to go through, otherwise there would be a financial crisis in the country.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is going to make one anyway.

Mr. REID: No, it will not.

Mr. MACDONALD: It will make a worse crisis than if nothing at all had been done.

Mr. REID: No. That Bill had to go through, and the other Bills had to go through, and this session has been kept busy. I believe that in the twenty-six years that I have been here there never has been as much important legislation passed as during the present session.

Mr. MACDONALD: There never was so much bad legislation.

Mr. REID: It is all good legislation. The present pension law is administered in the same way as if it had been a law passed by Parliament. Anything that is necessary to meet the situation or to provide amendments can be done by Order in Council, and the Prime Minister stated that some matters that were brought to his attention to-day, and other matters, were being considered by the Government. Hon. gentlemen will admit that with this House continuously in session, and ministers busy here all day and up to late at night, it was impossible to take many things that were urgent.

Mr. MACDONALD: You are the only minister who does any work.

Mr. REID: No. they have all been working very hard. This question will be taken up and dealt with and we will carry the matter along until Parliament meets again. The hon. gentleman speaks of what the United States have done in the short time since they have been at war. He knows that when this war came on there was no preparation. We had to initiate everything and get the organization started. The United States knew this war was going on and they were getting ready for the war that they would eventually get into. They have had the advantage of our experience and of that of other nations. I believe that the Government and people of this country have done more in this war than the Government and people of any other country in the world. I do not take second place to any country or government. The people and Government of Canada have done everything possible to further their participation in the war. The question of an increase in the pensions is being considered and an increase will be given. The present rate of pensions was unanimously agreed to by the members of this House and now all agree that the question of the rate of pensions should again be considered. The Government are considering the matter and will come to a conclusion as to an increase in the pension. When we meet again the House will be in a position to reconsider and readjust the whole matter. A matter of this kind is very important to the men at the front, to those whom they have left behind and to the people of the country as a whole. Criticism with regard to it is good. While the criticism of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is very severe, we are still glad to have it. This criticism will result in good and we will consider the different suggestions which have been made.

9 p.m

I was surprised to hear my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) say that there was a possibility that he might not return. We all like to have him here.

Mr. OLIVER: I presume that is why my hon. friend insists on putting through the Military Voters' Bill and the War-Time Elections Bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am in thorough sympathy with this vote and I do not wish for a moment to delay its passage. But the minister slid over one or two questions that I did think he ought to have dealt with. On two or three occasions the question of insuring the lives of soldiers was brought up by speakers, and I do not think that the minister has given any answer on that question. It is a matter of the very greatest importance, and if it is true that the insurance companies have refused altogether to accept risks on the men who are liable to be called out, then it is a question upon which the Government ought to take some action. I recollect that at the time of the South African war, the late Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper proposed a scheme by which the lives of the soldiers were to be protected by life insurance. I do not think his scheme was ever carried out, but I remember that he advocated it. I have seen in the press that in the United States the premium of insurance on a soldier is very low. Something like $3.50 or $4 a month for $5,000 is what is being paid by soldiers who have been recruited under the new Military Service Bill of the United States. I have no doubt that some arrangements have been made by the Government of the United States with the insurance companies by which they are protected financially. Why is it that our Government have not done something? Is it not of the greatest importance that the men who can afford to pay life insurance should have an opportunity of insuring their lives before they are drafted? I join with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) in condemning the Government for having allowed this question of pensions to lie over since the 11th of June without having dealt with it. Why did they not deal with it? Surely they have had time enough to take this question up since the 11th of June. Look at the resolution placed on the Order Paper by the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). I think the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) was a little astray in what he told us to-night. He explained that this proposal was simply for the purpose of appointing a commission and of making certain regulations governing the commission, but that it did not give them any power to deal with the question of pensions. If he looks at the proposal on the Order Paper he will find that he is altogether mistaken in regard to the effect of it. This is the proposal:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to establish a Commission to be known as "The Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada," consisting of three Commissioners, and to provide for salaries and expenses in connection therewith, and to empower the Board to award pensions, allowances, and gratuities to any persons who have served in the military or naval expeditionary forces of Canada during the present war and have been disabled on such service, and to their children; and to the widows, children and dependents of such persons when death occurs during or was due to such service; the said pensions, allowances and gratuities to be paid out of moneys appropriated by Parliament for the purpose.

You will see that the resolution deals not only with the appointment of a pension commission, but with the whole question of pensions. There is no doubt that the Government deserves to be condemned for neglecting this important matter all through last summer. It should have been dealt with. There are a number of other things in connection with the military affairs of this country on which the Government has fallen down and with which it has not dealt. It has fallen down on the question of national service; on the question of recruiting; on the question of raising the soldiers' pay—which has been brought up in the House a number of times—on the question of pensions, and has devoted all its time for the last few months to schemes of a very low order, tampering with the franchise, as any one can see by the measure now being forced through the Senate. The Government has had plenty of time to attend to questions of that kind, but apparently not time to attend to important questions in relation to our military forces, which should have been attended to. What has the minister to say about the insurance policies?

Mr. REID: The hon. member for Edmonton raised the insurance question this afternoon. He referred to the fact that it had been brought to the attention of the Government and the Prime Minister informed him that the whole matter would be taken into consideration.

Mr. COPP: It seems to me a regrettable fact that great hardships have arisen, and will arise in the future, in regard to pensions, unless the Government takes steps to put the law on a better basis. I have at this moment received an answer to an application for a pension from a widow in my county. The case seems to me a very hard one indeed. As the hon. member for Pictou was speaking I was reading the letter I received from the Board of Pension Commissioners refusing the application for the pension. The situation is this: Some fifteen years ago this woman was left a widow with six young children. She had a small farm and kept her family together until they grew up. One married, and two sons were left at home. One enlisted and went to the front, returned and was discharged. After he recovered his health he re-enlisted and went overseas the second time. He had been there only a few months when he was killed. The eldest son is at home working the farm, but he may leave at any time and get married, or anything may happen to him, and if anything happens, this widow will be absolutely alone. The board refused the pension, and they were probably right according to law. I have no fault to find with the Board of Pension Commissioners, I have had occasion to go to the board during the last two or three years and have been treated with the greatest courtesy, and I think they would do the best they could under the circumstances. The answer I have received from them to-night is that the law reads "wholly or mainly dependent upon;" and, they cannot get around that point. They practically admit, although they do not say it in so many words, that it is a hardship. Reading between the lines, I would say they consider the case one in which relief should be given. This woman is poor. Her son has given his life in defence of his country. And now, because of some words in the law, the commissioners are debarred from considering the question of granting the pension which she deserves, and which I am sure the commissioners think she deserves. If such is the law—and I presume it is—it is very unfortunate that Parliament is to be prorogued without placing upon the statute-book a law giving greater latitude to the commissioners, permitting them to investigate each particular case, and deal with each case on its merits. This case, I am sure, deserves the greatest consideration. I understand the Minister of Customs, who has charge of these estimates, to state that while no law is being passed this year to amend the Pensions Act, these cases will be provided for by Order in Council. I sincerely trust such an Order may be passed as will give relief in this and other cases on the same footing.

Pensions payable to militiamen and on active service as follows: Northwest Rebellion, 1885, $14,000; general, $30,000.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for Edmonton wanted a list of those receiving pensions under the item "Northwest Rebellion, 1885."

Mr. OLIVER: No, I did not wish for that. All I wanted was to know how it came that we were voting this particular sum of money for the Northwest rebellion.

Mr. REID: We pay it every year to the Northwest Rebellion veterans.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it not different from the item last year?

Mr. REID: No, it is the old item. We have it every year. The whole list is in the Auditor General's Report. The question was as to the militia pensions generally.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood the minister to say that part of this money was for the Home Defence, or Home Guard Service. I desire a fuller explanation in regard to that. Besides, there is an increase of $24,000 since last year. That is what particularly claimed my attention.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman will remember the letter I read from the Militia Department, in which it was said that the increase was on account of men on the Home Defence. There is one general pension account as it were. On account of the large number of men serving in the Home Defence force, the pension list is increasing. For instance, a member of the Home Defence force, while guarding one of the locks, was killed through no fault of his own. His case would come under the Militia Act.

Mr. OLIVER: The item shows an increase of $24,000, which, I assume, is entirely in respect of pensions on account of disability during service in the home defence force. The size or extent of the home defence force, the circumstances under which it is maintained, and the kind of service it renders, are things which are not generally known. What are the circumstances that call for this extra payment of pensions? Is the scale of pensions in this case the same as that provided in the case of overseas service, or is it the old scale that prevailed some years ago?

Mr. NICKLE: The old scale.

Mr. REID: Militia pensions generally are for all those in the militia engaged in active service, but not overseas. A great number of men have been employed in guarding canals, elevators, railways, bridges, public buildings, and so on. Accidents are bound to occur among these men, and the pension list accordingly increases. These pensions are dealt with as they have been for some years, by the Militia Council on the old scale. I think that a return was brought down giving the information asked for by my hon. friend up to a certain date. The only information that it would be necessary for me to furnish in response to his request is that covering the period since the bringing down of that return.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not insist upon that. But what I find strange is that in this home defence force there should be an increase in one year of $24,000 for pensions. The war has been going on for three years, and it is rather unaccountable that there should be a fourfold increase during the year.

Mr. REID: That is information that the hon. gentleman should have. The letter that I read this afternoon from the Paymaster General gave the estimate of the amount required during the fiscal year. Of course, the whole of the amount may not be used, but it is necessary to provide an amount to cover all possible requirements.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend told us this afternoon that this vote was for pensioners under the Militia Act. The pensioners we have under the Militia Act are officers.

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: Very largely. I know some officers at headquarters who have been pensioned under the Militia Act.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is wrong when he says that only officers are pensioned under the Militia Act. Under the Pay and Allowance regulations which took effect September 1, 1914, it was provided as follows:

> The following rates of pensions will be granted militiamen wounded or disabled on active service, during drill or training, or on other military duty, provided the disability was not due to his own fault or negligence.

These regulations provide for pensions to men of the first, second, third and fourth degrees, of the following ranks: rank and file; sergeant; squad, battery or company or sergeant-major; squad, battery, or company quartermaster-sergeant; colour sergeant; staff sergeant; regimental sergeant-major; master gunner; regimental quartermaster-sergeant; warrant officer—

Mr. MACDONALD: Those are members of the permanent force?

Mr. REID: No, those are all on active service, and as I have stated, there are many men on home service in this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: How many?

Mr. REID: I do not know, but the return, up to a certain date, has been brought down. I have not the later information. If my hon. friend desires it, I will write to the department for the information.

Mr. OLIVER: All we want to know is how this very remarkable increase in the estimates, in regard to this particular item, comes about. We really ought to have that information because the increase is a very startling one. While I would not wish to be too suspicious, when we see the figures of the estimates performing such startling gymnastics, we necessarily become suspicious.

Mr. REID: The hon. member, of course, knows the way in which these pensions to men on active service are dealt with. Every claim for a pension by a militiaman must come before the Militia Council and be passed by them. The Militia Council make a recommandation to Council. The matter then goes before the Treasury Board which must examine and pass upon the pension, and then it goes before Council in which the matter is taken up. The hon. member, therefore, from his own experience in regard to these matters, will, I think, agree with me that there is not much opportunity for money being improperly expended. I feel, of course, as the Paymaster General has stated, that he has put in an amount that he would be sure would cover any amount that would be required for any one injured on active service. This includes not only the regular active militia, but the extra men who have been put on or enlisted in the active militia for home guard duty.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why does the minister not put the whole of the pensions under the one control? There is no use in having these side pensions administered in this way. There is no reason why they should not be transferred by Order in Council.

Mr. REID: These pensions are, as I have stated, administered by the Militia Council, but they are all paid through the Pensions Board.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why should they not be altogether under the Pensions Board?

Mr. REID: That matter will probably be taken up later on. That raises the whole question of pensions, and I cannot answer as to the question of policy.

Mr. NICKLE: I think I can clear up the matter. The report of the special committee of last year dealt with the question of pensions for members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The committee recommended, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) will remember, that a commission be appointed to take charge of and administer that particular branch of the pension work. The militia pensions to which the hon. member refers are not pensions to officers who have retired after long service, but are pensions paid to members of the militia in Canada, such as the home guard, who suffer disability. The hon. gentleman will remember that, when the documents were referred to the committee of last session, there was in effect a scheme of pensions by which $264 was granted to members of the rank and file. That scheme of pensions was not affected by the report of the committee in so far as it affected the members of the Canadian Defence Force, the Home Guard, and so on. The report of the committee dealt only with the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. As I understand the practice at the present time, the Pensions and Claims Board of the Militia Department determine what pensions shall be paid to members of the Canadian militia, and the payment is then made through the Pensions Board. The whole matter as to the centralization under the one commission rests until legislation is introduced in this House. But the pensions to officers are commonly known as the pensions under the Act of 1901, that is, pensions for long service.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are those voted separately, or are they included in the general vote?

Mr. NICKLE: They are voted separately, I understand.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the minister arrange to give us to-morrow a list of the parties who are receiving pensions under this vote?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Penitentiaries—To provide a further amount necessary in consequence of the error in item No. 414 of the Supplementary Estimates, for a bonus not exceeding $100 each to penitentiary officials and employees whose salary was $1,000 or less on April 1, 1917, $6,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did not this item stand for some information?

Mr. NICKLE: This item was put in to cover an error in the original estimate. Provision was made for the payment of a bonus of $100 to those whose salaries were $1,000 or less. There were in the penitentiaries about 60 industrial guards who were left out of the count in the estimate, and this is simply to cover an error in the computation.

Mr. COPP: Does that apply to all the penitentiaries in the Dominion?

Mr. NICKLE: It is general in its application.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not happen to be here when the item amounting to $26,500 of which this is a part, was taken up. I am not opposing the increase or bonus of $100 to those guards, although I see no reason why it should be limited to the guards and should not be given to the men on the clerical staff. If you simply regard this matter from the standpoint of the amount of salary paid to the guards in the penitentiaries, you will not be considering it as it should be considered.

In addition to the salary of $800 or $900, as the case may be, every guard receives two suits of clothes, an overcoat, cap, boots, and so on. He is allowed two weeks' holidays during the year, and a gratuity is provided for which is equivalent to the Government keeping insurance in force, so to speak, to an amount anywhere from $1,200 to $1,800, according to the length of time the guard has served and the salary he has received. For instance, a man drawing $75 a month who had served twenty years would draw on retirement a lump sum of $1,500. Frequently, men have retired and drawn that amount, and then gone into some other occupation.

Mr. NESBITT: Do they pay anything towards it?

Mr. EDWARDS: Nothing whatever. I have in mind the case of a guard who, upon retirement at his own request, drew a gratuity of $1,200 or $1,500—I forget just which—and was afterwards taken on the staff, although he had been retired. There is really supposed to be only one reason for a man retiring, and that is physical or mental unfitness for his position. One would naturally suppose, therefore, that if a man retired on account of physical or mental unfitness and drew a gratuity, he would not be replaced on the staff, but there was at least one case where that occurred, and the man is on the staff at the present time. I do not think the principle of giving a gratuity to the guard is a right one. I think their salaries ought to be regulated in some such way as the salaries of civil servants. Giving a gratuity to a man makes him a slave to his superior officers. Under those conditions a man is afraid to express an opinion lest he incur the displeasure of his superior officer, who might report him in such a way that it would be impossible for him to obtain a gratuity, or perhaps compel him to retire on grounds other than those of ill-health and thereby lose the gratuity which he had earned during his years of service. It does seem to me that the logical and reasonable thing to do would be to fix a minimum salary and then allow a certain amount for good conduct, and let the salary advance to certain maximum. There would then be an incentive to a man to do his best. He would get paid as he went along, and when he retired he need receive no gratuity or pension of any kind. When this matter was under discussion before, the Minister of Justice referred to the case of a man who had been employed for a great many years in one of our western institutions, and who died very suddenly of heart disease. Dying suddenly in that way, without any opportunity of putting in a claim for a gratuity, there was nothing coming to his family, notwithstanding the fact that this man had served for thirty-two years. As the Minister of Justice pointed out, that was a case of extreme hardship. The man's family did not have anything to live on, and there was no gratuity coming to them because the man had not retired on account of illness. But if twenty-four hours before his death, he had made up his mind to retire, and had made application accordingly on the ground of ill-health, he would have drawn $1,700 or $1,800. But, being suddenly stricken with heart disease, there was nothing coming to him, unless the government granted a compassionate allowance. The case was dealt with in that way, and very properly, by Parliament. That case seems to me to prove conclusively that the present system is asolutely illogical and unfair.

I know of a case where a man by the name of Young, who had been a guard for many years, was taken ill. He did not send in his resignation or apply for his retiring allowance because he expected to get better and return to his work. He withheld sending in the necessary papers to Ottawa until just a few hours too late. The man died. The papers did not get here in time, and his family was deprived of an amount which they would have obtained if the papers had arrived here a few minutes sooner.

Mr. NESBITT: On what basis are gratuities granted? Is so much counted for every year's service?

Mr. EDWARDS: Supposing a man's salary during the past three years had averaged $75 a month, and he had been employed as a guard for twenty years. Upon retiring he would receive one month's salary for every year he had served; that is, twenty times $75, or $1,500. I think I have stated it correctly.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: But if he dies, his family gets nothing?

Mr. EDWARDS: Absolutely nothing, unless the Government grants a compassionate allowance, as they did in a case last week. Speaking on that case the Minister of Justice said: "On inquiry I find that it is most unlikely that other cases of a similar kind would occur; so that this will not be establishing a precedent." That simply means that the Minister of Justice is under the impression that there will not be any more guards die of heart disease and thereby be excluded from obtaining the pension they would have received if they had retired in the ordinary way.

Mr. NESBITT: You cannot tell that.

Mr. EDWARDS: No, I don't think so. However, to return to the matter of the guards and their salaries. In addition to their salaries they get these articles of clothing which I have mentioned, and that is not all. I think I am right in saying that when they are on duty at the prison they have to take some of their meals there. These meals they get at about twelve and a half or thirteen cents each. They also get a great many things from the prison at a much lower price than ordinary people can get them elsewhere. For instance, most excellent bread is made at the prisons, and all the guards have to do is to put in a requisition for whatever bread they want for themselves and their families, and they get it at several cents a loaf less than the ordinary citizen has to pay. This provision for gratuity is equivalent to a paid-up insurance policy. Taking all these things into consideration, I do not think I am extravagant in saying that you are adding $150 a year to their salaries in the way of these perquisites. The work they perform is not heavy work. True, there is a certain element of danger connected with it, but it is not work which requires very great education, and the salaries of these men are as good as if not better than the salaries of the clerical staff. There are hundreds of employees in the various branches of the public service whose hours are very much longer than those of the penitentiary guards, and whose work is very much more particular, yet they are receiving less salary than those men. It is said this is not an increase in salary, but simply a bonus granted because of the high cost of living at the present time. We may call it a bonus for the time being, but I am satisfied that once they receive this grant it will be very hard to cut it off. The probabilities are that it will never be cut off. I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to the granting of this $100 to them, but I think consideration should also be given to the clerical staff who, in my judgment, are not overpaid.

There are one or two other matters in connection with the penitentiaries to which I would like to call attention. In the first place there is the lack of suitable prison employments. This was referred to by Mr. Douglas Stewart, Inspector of Penitentiaries, in his reports. He states that this is one of the principal difficulties with which the penitentiary officials have to contend. I think that difficulty could be largely removed by making use of the services of prisoners to produce many articles which are required in our Government buildings throughout the country, articles of furniture, for instance, and for the manufacture of rural mail boxes, as well as a hundred and one other things that could be mentioned. I know this suggestion will be met with the old song that we are "competing with free labour." But this is a State institution, maintained at the expense of the State, and the State should have a right to make use of the services of these men to produce such articles as it may require. Some departure has been made from the ordinary routine during the last two or three years. We have made use of prison labour to a certain extent in improving the roads around Kingston. Might I impress upon the minister that I think the convict labour of the Kingston penitentiary might very well be used in rebuilding the piece of road which was taken over by the late Government from Cataraqui bridge up through the military camp. The Government has to maintain this piece of road, and I see no reason why the prisoners could not be employed in maintaining it. There is any amount of material there, but men are scarce. I do not know how this will be received by the minister, but I recommend it to his careful consideration.

One of the principal causes of trouble in our penitentiaries at the present time is that the men are not allowed to have tobacco. They get it in an underhand way, and there has been a good deal of difficulty on that account. Guards have been charged with taking money for conveying tobacco to the prisoners. I think one of the best means of putting an end to that trouble would be to allow the convicts a limited supply of tobacco. However, that is a matter upon which opinions may very widely differ.

Many years ago Sir John Thompson proposed erecting a penal institution to take care of youthful convicts under twenty years of age. That movement ended with Sir John Thompson's death. I think it is a matter that we might very seriously consider. I notice by the last prison statistics that we have, those for the year ended March 31, 1915, that 187 convicts twenty years of age and under are in our various penal institutions. Some of these might have been serving a second or third term but I think it very unlikely. I would assume that most of them were in for the first time. I do think that these young men can hardly be expected to leave those institutions any better than when they went in. Suppose they are first offenders, they are brought into contact with old criminals, men who have spent a good part of their lives behind prison walls. I do not think we are giving these young fellows a square deal, a fair show. The object of imprisonment is twofold. A man must be taught that he must expect to be punished if he violates the laws of the land. But surely that is not the sole and only object of sending him to prison. It may be the first thing to consider, but we should also consider the possibility of turning that man out at the expiration of his sentence with the prospect of becoming a good and useful citizen. If young lads twenty years of age and under could be sent to a separate institution, located somewhere between Kingston and Montreal, and kept by themselves, there would be a better chance of their becoming useful citizens than there is when they are housed with men of all classes as they are at the present time. In that connection, it is very interesting to note that in the Kingston penitentiary 3.7 per cent of the convicts were less than twenty or only 21 out of a total population of 559. At St. Vincent de Paul there were 72 out of a population of 447—over 16 per cent—were under twenty years of age. Dorchester about 14½ per cent of the population was under twenty; in Manitoba 12½ per cent and in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan between 5 and 6 per cent. I am not going to undertake to give a reason for that; I frankly admit I cannot give a reason. But the figures arrested my attention. I could not help but note such a large percentage in St. Vincent de Paul and Dorchester penitentiaries—16 and 14½ per cent as compared with 3.7 per cent at Kingston. That is something for which there may be an explanation but it does not occur to me. The percentage of convicts in various institutions who are put down as intemperate is also worth noting. In this connection Alberta has the best record, less than three per cent of its prison population being put down as intemperate, while at St. Vincent de Paul the number is 48½ per cent, Kingston, 37½ per cent; Manitoba, 40 per cent, and British Columbia 6·8 per cent. I am told that since the passing of prohibition in Ontario and in other provinces where prohibitory measures have been passed, a very marked effect has been noticeable upon the prison population, that it is much less than formerly. The lessened number of convicts is attributed to a very large extent to the difficulty people have at the present time in getting liquor. I think possibly that is true.

10 p.m.

If I might refer again to the matter which is uppermost in my mind in connection with our penal institutions, I would like to impress upon the Minister of Justice and the members of this House the importance of seriously considering the erection of a separate institution for boys under twenty or twenty-one years of age who are first offenders. I honestly believe that such an institution will more than pay for itself, even if you consider only the matter of dollars and cents. But if you estimate its value upon other lines, the possible reclamation of young men who may become useful citizens, it is impossible to state in terms of money its value to the country. We ought to do all that we possibly can as representatives of the people to reclaim any of those fellows where it is possible to reclaim them. I do not think that there is any man entirely so bad that there is no good in him, and perhaps we might turn that around and say that there is no man so good but there is some bad in him. I think there is some good in every man, and you will get it out of him if you go the right way about it. I do not think that a boy who is sent to prison for the first time has a fair show to come out of that institution and become a useful member of society, having to mix, as he does, with criminals of all classes. I believe that as men who are interested in our fellow men we ought seriously to consider, as Sir John Thompson did, the erection of such an institution as I have mentioned to take care of the young men who are found in our various penal institutions. That is the main reason why I rose to speak to-night. I sincerely ask the members of this House to give the matter consideration.

Mr. NESBITT: I certainly think a great many of my hon. friend's remarks are very timely, and I rise to endorse what he has said in regard to separate institutions, such as the prison farm, where the younger men who are not steeped in crime can be given employment. The theory of the present day in reference to prisons is that they are just as much for reformation as for punishment. They have made a marked success at Sing Sing along that line, and certainly nothing could be more successful than the efforts of the Hon. Mr. Hanna in establishing a prison farm at Guelph. He has had wonderful success in reforming a great many men who were sent to prison. My hon. friend's remarks along that line are very much to the point, and I think the minister will give them serious consideration.

I desire to ask the minister whether the men working at the penitentiary are paid anything? In many institutions they pay the prisoners a certain amount for their work, and when they go out into the world they are not entirely destitute. I understand they give them a suit of clothes when they leave the penitentiary. Advocates of prison reform in the United States lay great stress on the advisability of paying the men something so as to give them a start in the world when they are discharged. Is there any system of that kind in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: At present the convict is not paid anything for his work.

Mr. NICKLE: I cannot say whether or not the committee has been particularly impressed with what the hon. member for Frontenac has said with reference to wages paid the guards and employees of the Kingston penitentiary. While certainly he did not criticise these employees in so many words, I do not think I would be outside the mark in saying that he almost damned them with faint praise. With reference to the remuneration paid to a man for services, it makes a great deal of difference from what angle you view the subject, and I am rather inclined to think that the hon. gentleman from Frontenac viewed this matter from the point of view of the man who lives in the country, rather than the point of view of the city man. The ordinary guard in the Kingston penitentiary—and I think, similarly, in other penitentiaries in Canada —receives $800 a year. He has to work 365 days and loses practically part of each Sunday. He gets two suits of clothes, a pair of boots, a hat, and other perquisites, and is allowed to take advantage of the bakery and buy bread at cost. When you consider what it costs to live in Canada today, and what the industrial workers outside are getting, I do not think any member of this committee will contend that a man receiving $900 a year—as that is the remuneration of the guard, with $100 added —is being exorbitantly paid for his services. We must have regard from the point of view of the work these men have to undertake. It is a position of great trust, in which a man, if he is dishonest, can make a great deal of money by trafficking with the convicts. You expect honesty and efficiency, and you expect the guard to keep himself neat and tidy when off duty. Last autumn or early last spring a delegation of the guards came to my house, and some of them explained to me that, living as they could, they were going behind $4 or $5 a month, without meeting clothing expenses of their family or doctor's expenses. I regret, as well as the hon. member for Frontenac, that the clerical staff has not had an increase. They are doing their work well, and many of them are not paid adequately for their services, but the Government laid down the principle that no man in receipt of more than $1,000 salary should receive the bonus, and those on the clerical staff, being all paid in excess of $1,000, could not take advantage of the regulation. The vote is not limited strictly to the industrial guards, but it is limited to those whose salary does not exceed $1,000. The hon. member for Frontenac has said in one breath that the gratuity system practically amounted to an insurance policy, and in the next breath admitted that it was not an insurance or superannuation, but a gratuity paid to a man, for years of service, who does not resign, but is relieved from service, the man's conduct having been good. If a man dies in the employ of the penitentiary no superannuation is paid to his wife. If he resigns he gets nothing; he severs his connection with the penitentiary, and gets what is coming to him, and that ends it. If he dies in the ordinary course of human affairs, nothing is paid to his widow. It is not an insurance. The Government simply says to the penitentiary guard: "If you do your duty faithfully and well, and if you live beyond the allotted span of life, and become so worn out in the Government service that you are not fit to continue the performance of your duties, then we will give you a gratuity, something to live on, in your declining days. But this provision cannot be taken advantage of by the wife or family of the guard.

I might say—and I think the hon. member for Frontenac will bear me out—that this year the convicts of the Kingston penitentiary have done more than usual of constructive work. They have built a magnificent roadway in front of the penitentiary proper, and partially in the village that lies to the west of the penitentiary. They have done more farm work than usual, because the cry for increased production made available land that did not belong to the penitentiary, but which was placed at the Government's disposal by the owners, so that a crop might be raised on it this year. I think I am safe in saying that more work has been done this year than in former years. But when it comes to the question of turning the convicts over to work in gangs on general road construction, I think the hon. member for Frontenac and I do not see eye to eye. In my judgment the work for the convict should be work of a constructive character, from the point of view of the upbuilding of the convict, the development of habits in him that would be useful; and he should learn a trade. Then, when he leaves the institution, he could turn his knowledge to advantage. I may not be right in my conclusion, but I think that many men return to the penitentiary after having left it because they are not able to earn a decent living outside. I have always thought that if a man left there instructed in a trade so that he could earn a living, he would not drift back into the penitentiary. But if we are going to make it an industrial drudgery, the man is no better when he leaves than when he went into the institution. My idea is that the great work in which these men should be instructed is agriculture. The cry from one end of the country to the other is for assistance on the farm. If, after the war is over and things are more or less settled, the Minister of Justice could see his way to buy large tracts of land adjacent to the several penitentiaries and give the men instructions in scientific agriculture, I think he would take a long step towards solving our penitentiary problems. Many men, if they were instructed as agricultural labourers, would leave the cities and go into the country. They would be in a new environment; they would be removed from their old haunts and from the temptations to which they had previously been subjected. I sincerely trust that this matter will not escape the attention of the Minister of Justice. With regard to tobacco, some people may say that it is a luxury. I have talked with many inmates of penitentiaries, and I know that many of them get tobacco against the rules. It is sent in to them; there is a certain amount of traffic in it. If the men are going to get it; if they are willing to break the rules to obtain it, it seems to me that it would not be unwise for the Government to make some provision by which the men could get a definite allowance of tobacco as a reward for good conduct and faithfulness or service. Some of the men tell me that the withholding of tobacco from them is a terrible deprivation. The cost of supplying tobacco would not be excessive, and I think the advantage would be great.

When you come to the youthful offender, you are face to face with a mighty problem. Those who profess to speak with confidence on the subject of the criminal say that the youth of the criminal does not always indicate the enormity of the offence; that some of the worst men in the penitentiaries are those serving their first terms; that some of these are the most abandoned of the immates of the penitentiaries. I do not believe that you can make your line of segregation on the basis of age. If there is to be segregation, the less hardened of the criminals should be removed to an institution where they will not be subjected to the contaminating influences of what are called hardened criminals. I should like to see something done along the line of education. So many of these young boys that drift into the penitentiaries hardly know how to read or write; some cannot even sign their own names. It does seem almost a crime that young fellows sixteen, seventeen and eighteen years of age are incarcerated for three or four years during the constructive and acquiring period of their lives, and then turned out at the expiration of their term no better than they were when they went in. I agree with the member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that the object of our penitentiary system should be punitive; but it should be reformative as well. I sincerely trust that when the opportunity arises the Minister of Justice will give his attention to the problems that I know he realizes must be solved, and will endeavour to do something to better the conditions of the criminal population of our country.

Mr. EDWARDS: I repeat that I am not opposed to the granting of this bonus to the guards. I pointed out, however, that their pay, generally speaking, was better than the pay of many men in other branches of the service who had longer hours and greater responsibility. To that statement, which has a bearing upon the question of salary, or bonus to these men, the member for Kingston did not take any exception, although he came to the conclusion that I was opposed to the granting of an increase to the guards of the institution. That, of course, will go on record, and I trust that it will bring to him the reward that he expects it will. Of course I am not responsible for what the hon. gentleman thought; Hansard will show what I said.

In the matter of gratuities, I should have thought that a gentleman so well posted in these matters as the member for Kingston would have been more familiar with the subject with which he was dealing. He said that this gratuity was given not to those who voluntarily resigned their positions, but only to those who resigned on account of illness, who had reached old age in the service, or whose condition of health compelled them to retire. My hon. friend is entirely in error in that, because gratuities have been given in more than one case to guards who resigned not on account of ill-health. The Minister of Justice will bear me out in that assertion.

Mr. NICKLE: Of course, I did not profess to cover every class. I understand that gratuities are at times granted when guards are permitted to resign to promote efficiency.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend is now giving us a supplement to his former statement. Of course, I can only take his remarks as he gave them. My point is that his former statement is entirely incorrect

Mr. NICKLE: Partially.

Mr. EDWARDS: No, entirely incorrect. He said that this gratuity was not given to guards who voluntarily resigned their positions.

Mr. NICKLE: I say that yet.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am in a position to state that that is incorrect. During the present year guards who have resigned not because of ill health or decrepitude have applied for gratuity and have received it. I can give the names if necessary. I am more than pleased that the member for Kingston, who has given this matter a great deal of study, has agreed with one or two of the assertions that I made. It is a satisfaction and an encouragement to me that he agrees with me in the matter of supplying tobacco to the convicts. I was sorry that he did not see fit to express a definite opinion in regard to the employment of convicts in work for the State, in the making of furniture and other things in general use in various departments of the Government. There is nothing in the breaking of stone to improve the mental, moral or physical condition of the convict. That has been going on as far back as I can remember; the practice still prevails in all these institutions. I do not agree that it would be wise to get agricultural employment for all the convicts, because many of them are unsuited to agricultural work. Many of them are mechanically inclined. There is a farm connected with each of these institutions which I think, will give employment to most of those among the convicts who are suited to that kind of work and who can be benefited by engaging in it. Hundreds of convicts could be employed in learning trades, making furniture, manufacturing things which the State must buy in large quantities, such as rural mail boxes, and the like. It is only necessary to visit one of these institutions and observe the difference between the convicts employed on the stone piles and those employed at making brooms or some other kind of work to realize the great benefit that is to be derived from utilizing the convicts in some constructive employment. Work on roads is very useful; it is work in the open; the convict has something to show for his labour and something to look forward to. Various penal institutions on the other side of the line recognize the benefit of engaging these men to work on the roads. I understand that the convicts are often taken many miles from the gates of the prison in order that they may be employed in this way. I mentioned that piece of road near Barriefield camp because it is a government road. It is a road which has been taken over by the Dominion Government and which has to be maintained by the Dominion Government, and when prison labour could easily be employed it is reasonable that it should be employed in maintaining a piece of property owned by this Government.

To the other and main point to which I referred, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) did not give his attention, that is, the building of an institution for the care of boys of 21 years of age who are first offenders, and I would like to have an expression of opinion on that point from the Minister of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY: Different matters have been touched upon, and perhaps I might say just a word or two with regard to them. I shall be very glad to express to the committee the opinion I hold with regard to providing means whereby certain institutions might be created for different classes of offenders, and I shall deal with that after I have said a few words about other matters that have been mentioned. With regard to the question of gratuities and its bearing upon the particular case in which a compassionate allowance was granted, I would like to point out that in no department of the Civil Service is there provision made for compensation to surviving relatives of employees. In some of the departments, with regard to older civil servants, who were in the employment of the Government when the superannuation system was in force, there is provision for superannuation, but that does not survive the recipient of it. The penitentiaries, therefore, are not in a different position with regard to the granting of compensation to the surviving relatives of servants who have died in their employ from the other departments of Government. The committee will realize that it would be a large proposition, which would call for careful consideration by this Government, to undertake to make provision for surviving relatives of its employees. Much might be said in favour of that plan, but I do not see that anything special might be said in favour of it so far as the employees of penitentiaries are concerned. The gratuity is intended as an allowance for a man who serves either for a lengthy period until he is broken down, or whose employment in the penitentiary is terminated otherwise than by fault of his own. There are cases in which men resign because they become incapacitated, and it is usual in such cases to grant a gratuity. There are also cases in which it is considered that it tends to promote the efficiency of the institution that a man should be retired or allowed to resign, and in such cases the gratuity is paid to him. But so far as there is any connection between the granting of the compassionate allowance, granted to Mrs. Mackenzie in the supplementary estimates, and the question of gratuities, I have only to point out that to make any grant to the surviving dependents, we have to depart from the rule that prevails throughout the Civil Service. The special circumstances to which I referred when I said that I thought there was reason to believe that there would not be many absolutely similar cases was not an expression of opinion as to the liability of other men dying from heart disease. Mr. Mackenzie had a record of service that was absolutely exceptional in its length, as I am informed by the officers of the penitentiary, and there was in the second place this fact that played a large part in leading to the conclusion that the case should be treated as exceptional, that is to say, that his widow, with a large family of very small children, was left in absolutely destitute circumstances. I am also told that the case stood out rather as an exception, in that combination of conditions, with regard to what ordinarily happens in the case of a penitentiary vote. With regard to this particular allowance which is the matter properly before the committee, I have only to say that, in fixing the amount of it and the limit with regard to salaries to those who should be recipients of it, we have followed what has been done in the great number of departments of this Government, in view of the high cost of living. Some observations have been made with regard to the remuneration which those men already receive. That remuneration was fixed by Statute some years ago, Parliament at that time thinking it a proper remuneration for the services. If Parliament was right in that regard, then there must exist for those employees the same reason resting upon the increased cost of living that applies in the case of the employees of the Government generally. As to the limitation of $1,000, that, as I say, is following the rule. It has been pointed out that, in the supplementary estimates with regard to the post office, provision has been made for this allowance with regard to men of a certain class of employment who receive a salary up to $1,600. When we come to deal with that item, I think I shall be in a position to explain the reason of that particular disposition with regard to that particular department.

Something has been said with regard to the utilization of prison labour. I quite sympathise with the idea that we should utilize our prison labour to turn out a product that might be used by the Government and that might afford for the men in the penitentiaries more suitable occupation than sometimes we are able to put them to. It should, however, be remembered that it does not depend upon the Department of Justice to furnish things to people who do not want to take them from it. Before we can find our way to furnish those things, we shall have to find our market with the other departments of Government. It does not belong to me to criticise nor do I intend to do so, but we cannot supply that for which there is no demand. I have at different times, since I have had charge of the administration of the penitentiaries, sought to find an outlet for penitentiary labour in furnishing the requirements of other departments. I regret to say I have not been successful. I do not want to criticise the reasons that were given. They were, in the judgment of those administering those departments, sufficient reasons, and I think at that particular time they were not open to criticism.

In that connection, referring to what the hon. member for North Oxford has said with regard to pay, if we were put in a position where the product of the labour of the convict could be disposed of to other departments of the Government, or in other directions that would not bring us into unfair competition with free labour, I myself would believe that it would be a perfectly proper thing that these things should be paid for by whomsoever they were acquired, and that out of those moneys there should be paid something to the convict to represent wages. In talking of wages or pay it has to be remembered that a convict is supported and clothed, but I think it would be most desirable, provided the moneys so paid to him for his labour were not necessary for the maintenance of those depending upon him while he was in the penitentiary—which is the first purpose to which it should be devoted—that when he went out he should have some savings to his credit. I certainly would welcome the day when it would be possible to bring about that condition of affairs. But it does not depend upon those responsible for the penitentiaries whether this is to be done or not. We cannot sell our product and get money for it until there are people ready to buy our product and pay for it. There have been certain periods, at the outbreak of this war for instance, when there was a serious lack of employment in the ordinary industries of the country, and apprehension of a greater lack of employment. At that time, at all events, it would hardly have seemed desirable to press for the initiation of a system of utilization of penitentiary labour. But we have done something towards the utilization of that labour in connection with the farming industry, and although I am not in a position to give details at the present moment, I may say that we have also utilized prison labour to a certain extent in the direction of providing things necessary in connection with the interned alien prisoners. I shall be glad, if it should become possible for us to find an outlet for the product of our labour, not only to give consideration to, but if the matter be in my hands, to endeavour to bring into practical operation, a system whereby more useful work may be done and whereby we may obtain the very desirable thing suggested by the hon. member for North Oxford. With regard to the separation of prisoners, I quite agree that it would be highly desirable to have a separation of the prisoners according to classes. I am not absolutely clear that it would have to be according to age, though I dare say you would find a larger proportion amongst the younger criminals who ought to be classified as among the less hardened criminals, than you would perhaps find among older men. I would rather classify with regard to the character of the criminal you are dealing with than absolutely on the line of age. I may say that before the outbreak of this war, in the year of 1914, I had given very considerable thought to this matter, and the plan that I had conceived, though not absolutely the plan suggested by the hon. member for Frontenac, was somewhat along the same line. My impression was, and still is, that the hardened criminal is in the minority, and my conception of what would be desirable to do, and what I should be glad to do if it should become possible and I have the opportunity, would be to provide say, two institutions in which the more hardened class of criminals should be confined, leaving the present institutions for what I believe to be the majority of the criminals we handle, that is, those who would not be described as hardened criminals. I think there would be advantage in preserving those less hardened from the injurious influence of association with those who are more hardened. In the second place, there would be to my mind this great advantage, that if you divide the institutions in that way it would make it possible to adopt what might be described as a milder rule for the institutions generally, reserving the more severe features of the rules as they are deemed necessary, for those institutions where the hardened criminals would be confined. Plans of that kind, of course, involve the starting out in new enterprise in the way of public works, and the expenditure of public money, and it was not considered desirable that we should embark upon new enterprises of that kind at that time to which I have referred. I do hope, however, that under better and more favourable circumstances we shall be able to obtain the result of a separation on the lines I have indicated, and I do hope that when we come to more normal times and conditions it may be possible to persuade those who might properly be the customers of the penitentiary of the advisability of giving their custom to the penitentiary. When that time comes I shall certainly be glad to do what depends upon me, if I should be responsible for the administration of the institutions, to avail ourselves of that opportunity of giving a more varied employment.

Something has been said about road-making as a desirable form of employment. I think the hon. member will admit that we have done some little road-making during the past summer. As to the advantage or disadvantage, I may say that those who are experienced in the administration of penitentaries—I am not now expressing my own opinion—do not look upon it as desirable that the men should be called away to work at distances from the institution. While they sympathize with the desire for giving more suitable work, these experienced people do not seem to be of the opinion that road-making, outside of the immediate surroundings of the penitentiary would be a desirable thing.

Both hon. gentlemen have said something about tobacco, and I must admit that they touch what ought to be a very responsive chord in my own heart. The matter has been discussed from time to time with those responsible for the administration of the penitentiaries. What is said with regard to it —and I must say it has not quite convinced me that we ought not to allow tobacco— is that if you permit the use of tobacco for smoking purposes, that, of course involves the possession of matches and the possible danger of fire, which is an institution of that kind, no matter what you do to make it fireproof, is not to be overlooked. Such a thing in such an institution would be a disaster. Then, of course, it leaves open the practices of allowing tobacco to be chewed. Now it has been urged upon me that if we allow the use of tobacco it will be availed of, of course, by those who had contracted the habit before they went into the penitentiary, and in all probability by those who had not acquired the habit when they entered the penitentiary. It has been pressed upon me—I do not say it is a conclusive argument— that it would be a very undesirable thing if, among other habits, a young convict might acquire in a stay of two or three years in a penitentiary, would be the habit of chewing tobacco.

I do not want to say that personally I am specially scandalized by the suggestion, but there are people whose opinions are certainly entitled to very great respect, who would look upon that as a most objectionable thing. However, with regard to the question of tobacco, as I say, I am not convinced that it would not be desirable to permit its use, and I am not saying my last word upon the subject, if we can find a means which will satisfy those responsible for the administration that we are not creating inconveniences which would more than counterbalance the privation to which the men are now subject, and the more serious evil which is occasioned by the prohibition of tobacco, that is the trafficking between guards and prisoners.

Mr. OLIVER: How is the tobacco which is thus trafficked in used? Is it smoked or chewed?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have cases where men have been punished for smoking. We also have cases where men are found using tobacco for chewing purposes. Without pretending to speak with absolute certainty, my impression would be that it is used more for chewing than for smoking. One obvious reason is that the violation of the rule is less perfectly manifest if the tobacco is used for chewing. The convict has a better opportunity to avoid detection in the use of tobacco for chewing purposes.

Mr. OLIVER: If I understood the hon. member for Frontenac correctly, he is under the impression that this gratuity is an optional gratuity, that is, it is paid provided the authorities see fit, and withheld if the authorities do not see fit to pay it. Is that correct?

Mr. DOHERTY: It may be withheld if the man's course of conduct is considered to be such as would not entitle him to it. I may say, however, that, generally speaking, unless a man's connection with the penitentiary terminates either of his own perfect volition, when he is able to remain on, and when there is no reason to part with him, unless he has been guilty of conduct which is really reprehensible, it is usual to grant the gratuity. The man, however, may forfeit it by bad conduct.

Mr. OLIVER: I am speaking of the $100.

Mr. DOHERTY: This is an allowance to all the employees who have salaries of $1,000 and less. It is not optional.

Mr OLIVER: It is simply a temporary increase of salary without any option.

Mr DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand the argument of my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to be that being optional it placed the officer more dependent upon the favour of his superior than upon good service, whereas if he gets it as a straight increase in salary, of course he is still independent.

Mr. EDWARDS: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I was not referring to this $100 at all. I was referring to the gratuity which is given to a man when he retires after serving, say, ten, or fifteen, or twenty years.

Mr. OLIVER: I misunderstood the application of my hon. friend's remarks. If this $100 we are voting now was optional, it would be objectionable. To my mind it should be a specific increase to every man's salary. There is a penitentiary in the constituency I represent, and I would like to say a word following the lines already taken up. In the case of the retiring gratuity to an officer of the penitentiary, I am strongly of the opinion that his family should get the benefit of that gratuity in the event of his death. The gratuity he earns by reason of long service is for the welfare and benefit of his family as well as for his personal advantage. That being so, when death overtakes him, say suddenly, his family is even more in distress and need than it otherwise would be, and I would certainly think it would be only fair and right, whatever may be the practice in the other departments of the Government, that in the penitentiary service, where the remuneration is not by any means too large, and where above everything reliability of service is required, the Government would be well advised to make a change and to give the family of the deceased officer the benefit of the gratuity to which he would be entitled upon retirement because of physical disability. I think the Minister may depend upon it that he would be supported by both sides of the House in such a proposal. In any event, I would be very glad to support him.

I was very favourably impressed by the suggestion of the Minister as to the employment of prisoners. Formerly a prison was simply a place of punishment, and the more undesirable the condition surrounding the inmates the more severe the punishment, and therefore the more fully the institution was fulfilling the purpose for which it was intended. Apparently, these views have given place to others, which have regard to the welfare of the prisoners, and a still further advance has been made in the public mind looking to the reformation of the inmates of the prisons. It seems to me there can be no reformation unless there is employment. Now, employment cannot produce reformation unless there is some reward for the employment. Employment without reward is slavery, and slavery is debasing, and whether it is inside walls or outside walls the result is bound to be the same. If we desire to use our penal institutions as a means of reformation, I cannoe see any objection to adopting the minister's idea that the inmates should be employed at a wage, which wage should either be made payable to the dependents of the inmates, or should be held to be given to the prisoners themselves when they are released. If the inmates of the penal institutions are producing for wages, there should not to be the same objection as has hitherto been urged that they are competing with free labour. True, they are competing with free labour, but the competition is on the same basis as that on which free labour is operating, that is to say, wages are paid for work done. That being so I do not see that there can be any reasonable objection to the product of that labour for which wages are paid being sold on the open market; certainly, not the same objection as prevails now—that the product of prison labour is in a different position from the product of free labour. Another feature of the case is that hitherto the dependent of the criminal suffers by reason of his punishment. That of course may be an increase of punishment to the criminal, who may suffer agony of mind because of the sufferings of his dependents.

To provide for payment to members of the Senate for days lost through absence in addition to the days for which no deduction is made under chap. 10, R.S.C., 1906, who during such absence were ill in hospitals, notwithstanding their being over ten miles from Ottawa, and to provide for the payment to members of the House of Commons for days lost through absence caused by illness, public business or on account of death, during the present session, including an amount of $2,500 to the Hon. H. S. Béland, a prisoner of war in Germany, and for days lost through absence not exceeding fifteen days, being in addition to the days for which no deduction is made under chap. 10, section 35, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, $55,000; to provide an amount for the Speaker of the House of Commons in lieu of residence and attendants, for the year ending 31st March, 1918, at the rate of $15 per diem—further amount required, $1,800; to provide an amount for the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons in lieu of apartments, for the year ending 31st March, 1918, at the rate of $5 per diem—further amount required, $600; annuity to Dr. Thomas Barnard Flint, upon his retirement from the Clerkship of the House of Commons through physical disability, $2,500—$59,900.

Mr. REID: This item of $55,000 is put in to cover the extra fifteen day's allowance to members. It also provides an amount of $2,500 to Dr. Beland and makes provision for loss on account of death. This is to take the place of the item we had in the previous estimates.

Mr. NESBITT: The other items will not be used?

Mr. REID: It will not be used. The amounts of $1,800 and $600 are necessary to cover the allowance to the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker on account of the session being so much longer than was expected. Then we have an item of $2,500 for an annuity to Dr. Flint upon his retirement from the clerkship of the House of Commons. I may say in reference to this item that we all know that Dr. Flint's health has not been very good and that he wishes to retire. I have been in the House all the time that Dr. Flint has occupied the position he now has; in fact I was here while Dr. Flint was a member of the House. We all feel sorry that his health is such that it is necessary for him to retire. He has been a splendid official, liked by every member of the House and it is a matter of regret to us that we are about to lose him. Still, these things must come and it is at his own request that he retires. The amount of $2,500 allowed as an annuity, Dr. Flint himself feels is fair and reasonable and he is quite satisfied with it. Therefore, I hope the House will allow this item to go through.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have not been in the House nearly so long as my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) but I have been here for ten years and I have had occasion to form a critical judgment of the devotion which Dr. Flint has shown to his duties. He has given entire satisfaction, I think, to all the members of the House. One thing which I think it is proper to refer to is the fact that he has displayed very great industry in editing the work of Dr. Bourinot. He has added many most valuable notes and citations which are of very great assistance to members. His book will certainly remain as a monument to his very great industry and ability. I feel sure that my hon. friend expresses the feelings of all the members of this House when he says that it is with the deepest regret that we learn of the infirmity which makes it necessary for Dr. Flint to retire. I am also convinced that the recognition which the Government has asked the House to give him in the way of a retiring allowance will be very cheerfully approved of by the House.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to add to the observations made by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) and my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) by expressing my regret that Dr Flint finds it necessary, owing to the unsatisfactory condition of his health, to retire from the very honourable and respected position of Clerk of this House. He has served many years in a public capacity and he has attained to the highest official position that could be occupied by any man in this House. It so happened when Dr Flint retired from the office of Clerk Assistant of the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia in 1891 I succeeded him. Since that time the relations existing between Dr Flint and myself have been of the most cordial and agreeable character. I could not say anything that would add to the esteem that Dr Flint has won for himself among the members of this House in both political parties. I speak of him both as a member of the House of Commons and an official of the House for several years. Before he assumed the position of clerk, he was representative of the county of Yarmouth in Nova Scotia for several years, and as the representative of that county he won the respect and good feeling of all his associates in the House of Commons. I can only express the wish that Dr Flint may be long spared and that the condition of his health will permit him to continue to render useful service if not to the Dominion of Canada, to the province of Nova Scotia, for many years to come.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it would be hardly fitting that this item should go through without my saying a word along the line of the observations of those who have preceded me. It has been my privilege and pleasure to be more or less intimately associated with Dr Flint more particularly during the past two years. I can bear tribute to his unfailing courtesy and consideration to me, sometimes under somewhat trying circumstances. I know that only one desire animated Dr Flint in his public service, whether as a member or as Clerk of this House, and that was to serve to the very best of his ability. No one regrets more than the clerk himself the infirmity which makes it absolutely necessary that this vote should appear in the estimates. I only hope that the House may be fortunate enough to have a successor in the office who will carry out the traditions as creditably as Dr Flint has.

Mr. MURPHY: In this item, No. 512, there are four amounts the first of which is $55,000. I understood the minister to say that it was in substitution for the item of $22,010 which appeared in the first supplementary estimates, page 5. If that be the case, it strikes me the phraseology of the preceding grant of $55,000 is not apt.

11 p.m.

Mr. REID: This item is changed. Item 416 reads:

To provide payment of the full sesional indemnity of members of the House of Commons —days lost through absence caused by illness, public business, being engaged in necessary farming operations, or on account of death, during the present session, including an amount of $2,500 to Hon. H. S. Béland, a prisoner of war in Germany, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes, an Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons or any amendments thereto—payment to be made as the Treasury Board may direct, $22,010.

This item is changed for this reason. The session has been about twice as long as the ordinary session, and it was arranged that fifteen days over and above the fifteen days that are allowed under the statute should be allowed to the members for absence, and the item had to be remodelled to cover that arrangement. I thought the item covered the senators' absence also, but I do not know whether it can be interpreted in that way. However, as we have it now I think it is quite satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it in substitution for the other item, or in addition?

Mr. REID: It is in substitution. The other item would not allow the extra fifteen days, so that we just substitute this item for the other.

Mr. BOIVIN: I understand that item 416, just referred to by the hon. minister and the hon. member for Russell, is not to be concurred in, or not to be used in any event.

Mr. REID: It is all in item 416. We will concur in that, but it will not be used. This item now takes the place of 416. There are a great many items in 416, and we are just putting in this item to take the place of item 416.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Should not the other be stricken out?

Mr. REID: We can strike it out, but it is not necessary. I thought it would not make much difference.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not good practice to vote two amounts for the one purpose. When the Speaker is in the Chair, by unanimous consent it can be stricken out.

Mr. REID: I have not gone into it, but there is nothing in that item, as far as I can see, that is different from the other, but if the House will let it go through as it is, the money will not be used.

Mr. BOIVIN: There is an additional amount provided by this item, because this amount is larger than the other item.

Mr. REID: As I understood the Finance Minister, it took the place of the other, and they have added a sufficient amount to cover the absences. Possibly there may be some difference.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the other item is included in this, then it would be very easy, by unanimous consent of the House, to strike it out.

Mr. REID: I am going to propose concurrence after we put these items through, and if there is any objection, I will strike it out.

Mr. BOIVIN: Another point in connection with this vote is that it appears to me that the Government, by the phraseology of the vote, is placing a premium upon absence in this House, encouraging the members who stay away, and punishing those who remain. According to this vote as it stands at the present time, the member who has been away thirty days or more will receive a bonus, or a re-vote of $225.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman states that the Government is paying a premium on absence. This matter was arranged by the whips on both sides of the House. If there is any misunderstanding, I am not assuming any responsibility in the matter. I understand both whips agreed that, on account of the length of the session, the extra fifteen days should be allowed. If I am wrong, I should like the whips to say so.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am perfectly willing to withdraw the remark that the Government was placing a premium on absence because I do not think it was done intentionally. I do not dispute the fact that the whips may have come to such an agreement, but I think every member of this House has the right to give his own opinion concerning the votes brought before the House, and I am sure the few words which I am going to utter will meet with the approval, I will not say of the majority of members but of a large number. The item, as it stands at present, amounts to this: that a member who has been absent for thirty days or more during this session is receiving $225 more than he would receive if this vote had not been put through. A member who has been absent say 18 days is receiving $45 more than he would receive if this vote were not put through, but the member who has attended to his parliamentary duties from the beginning of the session is receiving absolutely not one cent more than he would receive if the vote had not been put through. In this way those who were absent 30 days or more are receiving a reward for their absence. Those who have been absent less than 30 days, but more than 15 days, are receiving a reward, but a less reward than the man who has been away longer. Those who have remained here during the entire session, or who have lost less than 15 days, receive no reward at all. I spoke about it to the Speaker a few moments ago, and he explained to me that it would, of course, be impossible to change this vote at the present time without a new authorization from the Governor General and a new estimate, but I thought it only right to bring this point to the attention of the House. The member who has been away from this House attending to his private business, who has not been obliged to pay his living expenses in Ottawa for the time he was away, and who was undoubtedly making money in his own private affairs while absent from the House, is receiving a reward of $225. It appears to me to be illogical, and I think it would be a great deal fairer if the Government would consider the matter before the close of the session and introduce an item to add to the sessional indemnity of the other members the sum of $225, which you are giving to the members who were absent 30 days. In that way those who have been absent more than 30 days would be getting absolutely what they are getting under this vote, and the member who has been present during the entire session or absent less than 15 days, would be rewarded accordingly for his attendance here. Every one knows the session has been a lengthy one. That a large number of members have been unavoidably absent, I am willing to admit. On the other hand, there are others who certainly would have absented themselves to attend to their private business if they had known this vote was to be put through at the last moment.

I do not think that an hon. member should be punished for remaining in this House. Western members, for instance, who have been here the whole session, should not be punished for having remained in attendance. I admit that I have missed more than the fifteen days; therefore, the vote does not affect me as much as it affects members who have remained in the House. But as a matter of justice to every one, the Government should give this matter serious consideration. It should be possible tomorrow to bring in an estimate or to change the phraseology of this item with a view to providing that all members shall be treated alike. It has been pointed out that if this were done the amount of the vote would necessarily be increased. Well, there are 180 members in this House, and to give the allowance of $225 to each member would mean a vote of only $40,500. The amount of the vote as it appears in the estimates now is $55,000; moreover, those who have been absent more than 15 days would not receive as much as $225, and a certain amount would not be used. I think that that is a fair proposal, and would do justice to all members. If I used the expression that the Government was placing a premium upon absence, I did not mean to say that they were doing so intentionally. That was, perhaps, an impolite expression of what I had in my mind—that the absent member was being rewarded while the man who remained here was being punished for his attendance.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I hope that nobody will go away with the impression that under the proposed resolution any member of the House is going to get more than his sessional indemnity, $2,500. As this session has been practically double the length of an ordinary session, it was thought that the exemption should be for double the usual period. Under the law as it stands at present some men are absent only two days, five days, during the session, while others take their full fifteen days and get their full indemnity. In this case we have applied exactly the same principle, so far as I can see, as that which has hitherto prevailed. On the basis that there should be fifteen days' exemption for a four months' session, we are providing for an exemption of thirty days for an eight months' session. This is the only method we could adopt without passing a special Act increasing the indemnity, and I am sure that none of the members are in favour of doing that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would it not be advisable to add to the end of this item the words "payment to be made as the Treasury Board may direct"? These words are usually placed at the end of such items as this.

Mr. REID: I think that that can be done. I move that after "1906" at the end of item 512 the words "payment to be made as the Treasury Board may direct" be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to say a word in connection with this allowance for days of absence. I do not propose to make any motion on the subject, but it is only fair that there should be an understanding as to the different positions of members of the House coming from different sections of the country. Those of us who come from a considerable distance—from west of Lake Superior, from the Maritime Provinces, and from some constituencies in the more remote portions of Ontario and Quebec—are unable to carry on our private business while attending to the public business of the session. It appears that the members who are situated within a night's or an afternoon's railroad run of the city of Ottawa are in a position to carry on their private business while ostensibly attending to their duties in Parliament. Those of us who are not so fortunately situated have no right to find fault with those who are, provided the exercise of their liberties does not reflect upon us and do us substantial injury. As a matter of fact, the business of this House is and has been delayed session after session by the fact that such a large proportion of members live within a comparatively short distance of the capital and make it a matter of business to be absent from the House the latter end of the week and the beginning of the week thereafter. So that during the greater part of the session, instead of doing business five days in the week, we are doing business three days in the week, and sometimes hardly that. That has the effect of lengthening the session unduly; it compels the men who reside at a distance to remain here weeks and months longer than they would be required to remain if everybody stayed here and attended to business during the five or six days of the week. The penalty of a fine of $15 for each day's absence was imposed for the purpose of holding members to their work. We relieved them of that fine to the extent of fifteen days—and it is this fifteen days that has done the damage so far. Now we propose to make that fifteen days thirty days. On the one hand we declare that the interests of the country and the treasury shall be protected by a fine of $15 against each member who is absent from a day's sitting, and then we provide that the fine shall not be paid in respect of fifteen days. Now we provide that the fine shall not be paid in respect of thirty days. The position is entirely illogical. While it would, perhaps, be ineffective to make any determined opposition to this vote, I take the responsibility, following the remarks of the member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), of placing before the House the serious disadvantage to which a large proportion of the members are subjected by reason of the undue exercise on the part of other members of the privilege and advantage of attending to their private business while the session is in progress.

Mr. VERVILLE: My hon. friend stated a moment ago that according to the law it was impossible to increase the sessional indemnity. What would prevent the Government from calling it a certain amount for expenses on account of the session being so much longer than usual? The word "expenses" is used in this item, and the same amount could be given to every hon. member to allow for expenses which have increased on account of the length of the session. It is well known that the cost of living in Canada has increased tremendously, and Ottawa is no exception. I think my suggestion would cover the objection of my hon. friend who stated a moment ago that, according to the law of the land, we could not increase the indemnity. It would not be increasing the indemnity if we called it an appropriation for extraordinary expenses on account of the length of the session. Many of us are obliged to remain here during the whole sesssion, and I do not want to be penalized —I do not use the word offensively—because we are just as much entitled to that amount of money as are others who have been away.

Mr. REID: The hon. member, from his parliamentary experience, of course, knows that it is impossible to change this item as it is now in the estimates. As this is a money Bill, the assent of His Excellency the Governor General must be obtained, and the appropriation is inserted this session in almost exactly the same way as it has been inserted in other years, with the exception that fifteen days extra have been allowed. I understood from the Chief Whips of both sides that hon. members thought that this was a fair and reasonable thing to do. There are many members who have been here practically the whole session who have lost thirty days. I know one member in this House who, in order to attend his business, leaves on Friday afternoon for his home—and he has to go a long distance—and gets back here on Tuesday. Yet he is here Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday until probably 4 p.m. On a session like this he would lose fifteen days, and yet he has done as much work as many others who have been here, because probably he may have taken an active part. There are, therefore, cases in which it would be hardly fair not to make a little extra allowance on account of the session lasting eight months. There is no way in which I can change this vote, and as it was understood to be agreeable to members on both sides, the Government asked His Excellency for permission to insert this item just as has been done in other years on account of days lost through absence caused by illness, public business, or on account of death, with the exception that fifteen extra days have been added.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not understand that the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have objected to the additional allowance of fifteen days.

Mr. REID: They wanted a change.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The suggestion is that, in order to do complete justice, some further provision should be made. There is a strange anomaly in this vote, in that it provides that a member of the House of Commons should be allowed only an extra fifteen days on account of absence through illness and so on, but in respect to our good friends in the Senate, they may be allowed a full sessional indemnity if they happen to be ill in a hospital more than ten miles from Ottawa. The result of that is that a senator who happens to be ill at his home and goes to a hospital for attendance receives his full sessional indemnity provided that his illness lasts during the whole session, while a member of the House of Commons, being equally ill and requiring medical treatment in a hospital, is allowed only an extra fifteen days' indemnity. I think the vote should be changed to make it applicable equally to members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons. It occurs to me that a fair additional vote to bring down, in order to do even a small measure of justice to members from the West who come here from a long distance, would be to make a special provision which would be particularly applicable to this session. As the minister knows, there is an allowance for expenses in coming to the opening of Parliament and in returning home after prorogation. During the present session Parliament adjourned in February and re-assembled in April, but the expenses of going home and returning, which were equally as great as those in coming to the opening of Parliament and in returning after prorogation, are not allowed for, and the members are obliged to pay their own expenses both in coming and going. It would be a small measure of justice to members who come from a long distance to give them those expenses. It would not affect me very much because my expenses in coming here are comparatively small, and I am, therefore, free to speak about the matter. I am also thankful to say that I am not affected by the fifteen days' provision, because I have not lost fifteen days during this session. While the item as to the fifteen days is right, it ought to be made uniform with regard to the Senate and the House of Commons. The minister may have put it in in this way in order to please the Senate. He is clever at framing legislation to pass both Houses.

Mr. REID: I cannot change the item as it appears in the estimates, and I think we shall have to let it go through.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is plenty of time. Parliament does not prorogue to-night. If the minister wants to do a thing in a hurry, he can do it.

Mr. REID: There is not any opportunity for any further estimate being brought down. I would like to have these put through and concurred in. I understand the only matter that is left and that might delay prorogation is the War-time Elections Act, which has to come back from the Senate.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That cannot get through for two days yet.

Mr. REID: It has passed the Senate and will be here to-morrow.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has to be put on the Order Paper, and it could not be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. REID: It could be taken up to-morrow with the consent of the House.

There is not anything else left, and I am sure every hon. member is anxious to get away. If we can take that Bill up to-morrow and discuss it, we shall be glad to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sure the minister will find that there will be a desire on the part of hon. members to discuss fully any amendments that may have been made to that Bill. If, therefore, the minister approves my suggestion, there will be ample time to bring down a supplementary estimate.

Mr. REID: I am willing to bring my hon. friend's suggestion to the attention of the Government, but we would like to have that Bill proceeded with to-morrow, and then we could take the necessary time to discuss it. We do not want it to be pressed through the House faster than is necessary. I think every one of us is anxious to get away, and we should all be ready to facilitate matters as much as possible. I should like to get this item through.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This would be a very little matter to dispose of to-morrow, if the suggestion meets with my hon. friend's approval. If we are only waiting for the Franchise Bill, in the ordinary course if it does not come down until to-morrow it will not get on the Order Paper until Saturday, and we shall be kicking our heels around here all day to-morrow. Perhaps we could not be better employed than in doing justice to our western friends.

Lighthouse and coast service — Further amount required to pay pensions to retired pilots, viz.: O. Noel, F. X. Desmeules, and Adjutor Baillargeon, $800.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This relates to the lighthouse and coast service. I want to call the attention of the minister to the fact that early in the session a question was put to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as to whether it was proposed to give the lighthouse keepers an increase in salary. There have been a great many increases given by Parliament upon the invitation of the Government during this session, most of which were pretty strenuously opposed on this side of the House. In answer to that question, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that he could not hold out any hope of an increase. It is within my knowledge that there are a great many lighthouse keepers who are getting a salary, some of them, of only $300 a year. The average salary is from $300 to $400, I am informed. These men are leading a lonely life in a lighthouse upon a rock, and in the winter especially their life is surrounded with great hardships; and to expect men to continue to perform those arduous duties and undergo the hardships they are compelled to undergo for the small salary of $300 is to my mind not at all creditable to a country like Canada. I regret very much that the minister was not able to give some assurance that the representations which have been made to him would be favourably entertained, and I would ask the minister now whether he could see his way clear to bringing down before the close of this session an item providing for an increase of even $100 a year for these men. They are affected by the high cost of living just as other people are, and the salaries which they receive may truly be called starvation salaries. They cannot live upon them. In some cases lighthouse keepers can make some money out of fishing, but those cases are the exceptions. The great majority have nothing but their salaries, which are entirely inadequate for them to live upon and to bring up their families.

Mr. REID: I will bring the matter before the members of Council to-morrow and see whether anything can be done.

To complete special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, $2,500.

Mr. EDWARDS: I should like a little explanation of this item. I am informed that the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada is $10,000 a year. Is that correct?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am also informed that he receives an allowance of $2,500 for travelling expenses when he goes overseas to attend the meetings of the Privy Council. Is that right?

Mr. REID: Yes, he is a member of the Privy Council.

Mr. EDWARDS: I presume he has not attended many sittings during the last three years. As I understand it, he now receives $2,500 for signing his name for the Governor-General. We propose here to add another $2,500, making $5,000 which the Chief Justice will receive to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor-General. I am informed that the Chief Justice lives in Ottawa. Is that right?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: If he is within the city limits, his travelling expenses ought not to be very heavy. I do not believe this increase of $2,500 is warranted. I do not believe there is a man in this House who believes it is warranted, and I am going to test the feeling of the committee by moving that the item be struck out.

Mr. REID: The hon. member is correct in stating that the salary of the Chief Justice is $10,000. The Chief Justice has also been receiving $5,000 per annum to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General. It is true the Chief Justice lives in Ottawa, but there are times when he may be a considerable distance away and has to return to the city. We had $5,000 in the estimates last year for this purpose, but through some error, the amount was put in at $2,500 this year, and we are simply asking that the item be restored to the usual amount. It is not an increase at all. The other item of $2,500 in the main estimates is to cover the expenses of the Chief Justice when attending the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I hardly think it would be fair to reduce the item by $2,500. I am sorry this mistake was made in preparing the estimates, and I would ask the House to agree to the $2,500 being restored.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not want to be unreasonable, but $5,000 for signing one's name a few times does seem to me to be piling it on pretty thick. Ten thousand dollars as Chief Justice, and five thousand dollars as Deputy to the Governor General makes fifteen thousand a year. I do not think the time and work of the Chief Justice can begin to be compared with the time and work of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition.

It seems to me to be entirely unreasonable that a gentleman living right here in Ottawa should receive $5,000 for occasionally signing his name. If we want to increase the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada, let us put it in as increase in salary. Personally, I think this item might very well be cut out altogether. I think the Chief Justice of Canada or some other justice living here in Ottawa could, without receiving any pay for it, sign his name a few times, if the Governor General happens to be away on his holidays. In regard to those trips overseas, I do not know whether I am right or not, but I have heard it stated that the Chief Justice has drawn the $2,500 for travelling and other expenses in connection with attending the Privy Council in England, when, as a matter of fact, he never left Canada, but still drew the amount, taking it as part of his salary. Hon. gentlemen spoke here a while ago to the effect that the minister might bring in a little item which would hand a couple of hundred dollars to various members of this House who had been regular in their attendance, in order to even things up, that is, that a small amount might be granted the western members and those from the extreme East, in consideration of the extra expense they were put to on account of the break in the session. This is something which would have to receive very earnest, and careful, and prayerful consideration, before it could be put through, but a matter of $5,000 to the Chief Justice of Canada for simply scribbling his name a few times is dead easy.

Mr. REID: The salary of the Chief Justice is $10,000. Merely expressing my own personal opinion, and not referring to the present Chief Justice or any one else in particular, I would say the man who is fit to occupy the position of Chief Justice of Canada is a man who could earn perhaps twice as much as $10,000. So far as the salary of the Prime Minister is concerned, there is no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister could earn three times as much as he does were he to relinquish the position he occupies, and go back to the practice of his profession. I say the same of the leader of the Opposition were he a young man. I do not think the Prime Minister or the leader of the Opposition is paid the amount to which they are severally entitled.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are you too modest to discuss the question as to whether the members of the Government get enough?

Mr. REID: I will not discuss that. It has always been the custom to pay this amount to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and the Government feel that as he has been receiving $5,000 for the position, it is hardly fair to reduce it. While I have no objection to the hon. member from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) expressing his opinion, I would like the House to concur in this item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The item is put in to cover "travelling and other expenses." I quite agree with my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that $5,000 seems a large item for "travelling and other expenses." I think it would be better to make an allowance to the Chief Justice as deputy Governor General, by reason of the very high and honourable position he holds and by reason of the fact that he does discharge the duties of deputy Governor General. I think it would be better to put it on that distinct ground. To my mind it would not be proper to strike out the item, because the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada has always acted as deputy Governor General, and has always received an allowance. I do not know whether it was $5,000 per year. It certainly would seem rather ungracious to discriminate against the present occupant of that high position and refuse to treat him in the same way as his predecessors have been treated. I agree with the minister, that the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada is not by any means a large one. I think we pay the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners $15,000 a year, $5,000 a year more than the salary of the Chief Justice of Canada. The other day a vote was passed to pay the Chairman of the Bureau of Research $10,000 per annum. As has been stated, a lawyer in good practice in Canada can earn twice or three times as much as the salary of the Chief Justice, and a gentleman of the eminence of the Chief Justice could easily earn at the Bar from $25,000 to $50,000 per annum in the larger cities. I do not object to voting the amount. What I object to is the language of the vote and the way it is put, as "travelling and other expenses."

Post Office—Outside Service.

To increase the minimum salary of railway mail clerks from $500 to $600, and to raise the annual statutory increases of railway mail clerks from $50 to $100 in cases where the salary is over $800, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or the Post Office Act; also to provide for the payment of provisional allowance of $100 each to Civil Service employees of the Outside Service of the Post Office Department whose salaries are $1,600 and under, and also to provide for the establishment of inspectorate at North Battleford, Sask., $608,000.

Mr. PARDEE: I would like to direct the attention of the Government to the question of staff and non-staff post offices. For some reason best known to the Post Office Department, the man who is in a staff post office is a member of the Civil Service, is entitled to a pension, and his salary is increased from year to year under the Civil Service Act, whereas a man in another place, which may be just as large as some of the staff post offices but which is a non-staff post office, is not entitled to be a member of the Civil Service, is not entitled to any pension, and his salary is not automatically increased under the Civil Service Act. Formerly, in those non-staff post offices, the postmaster got a percentage of the revenue, and he paid the clerks out of that percentage.

Later, that percentage was taken away from the postmaster, he was put on a fixed salary, and the clerks were also put upon fixed salaries. If the Acting Postmaster General will look into the matter he will find that clerks have been sixteen or eighteen years in the service and that they have never had one dollar of an increase during that period whilst the revenue of these offices has gone up tremendously. That is simply unjust. Why the hard and fast rule should be made by the department that one should be a staff office and that the other should not be a staff office, and that because there is this difference the employees in one office should have the right to belong to the Civil Service, to be entitled to pensions and to increases of salary, whereas the others are deprived of every one of these benefits, is something that I cannot understand. This is the most unjustifiable treatment that could be accorded to any class of men who are working for the State. In my own town there is a man who has been in the post office for eleven years. He has not received a dollar of increase in that time, and his hours are from seven in the morning until half-past eight at night. Other clerks are in the same position. There are men who have been employed for varying terms, some for as long as twenty years, and not a dollar of increase has been given. While I absolutely approve of the increase in the salaries of mail clerks, a recognition which they are very much entitled to, I do not see why the Government cannot take into consideration those men who belong to those non-staff post offices and who are receiving the same salaries as they have received for years while it costs fifty per cent more to live. Taking into consideration their terms of service, an increase in their salaries would be a simple act of justice on the part of the department, and that increase ought to be proportionately the same increase as is granted to the mail clerks by this vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have a very considerable sympathy with what the hon. member has just said. I am transiently and quite newly in charge of this department. I had my attention called to the system of semi-staff post offices, and I have been somewhat puzzled as to what was the advantage in maintaining that separate and distinct system. I understand the distinction is that in the first place you have a post office where the postmaster has a percentage of the revenue and he provides his own help. These offices are in certain cases converted into what are called semi staff offices, the Government taking the entire revenue and paying the salaries of the postmaster and clerks out of the revenue. I have had it in my mind to look into the whole reason for the existence of the system. But apart from that, this class of clerks is not dealt with in the present vote, because, if an addition were to be paid to them it would be paid out of the revenue of the post office. I cannot say more than that I purpose to look into it to ascertain the reason for the differentiation, and if there be an apparent injustice I will endeavour to remedy it.

12 m.

Mr. MURPHY: The provision of the item is to raise the annual statutory increase from $50 to $100 in cases where the salary is over $800. It would seem to me that the increase is more needed where the salary is below $800. There may be a reason for this, and if so, I would like my hon. friend to inform the committee regarding it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the item the minimum salary is being raised from $500 to $600. In the past the lower salaries have been increased at the rate of $50 per annum and not at the rate of $100. A line was drawn between those who increased by $50 and those who increased by $100, and that, I understand, has been at $1,000. It is proposed to extend the increase of $100 to those having a salary of $800. There is a very limited class below that which is not dealt with.

Mr. MURPHY: Why not give it to the lower class?

Mr. DOHERTY: The prayer of the petition that was put before me was to extend it so that clerks receiving salaries of over $800 should get the benefit. I am not clear why there should be a distinction between those above and those below, but the grievance that was complained of was that while those getting over $1,000 got this annual increase of $100 those below $1,000 did not. Therefore, those below $1,000 and above $800 had a grievance. That is why the distinction was made. Frankly, I am not in a position to state why it was not extended to those receiving less than $800.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. MURPHY: I see, also, that the vote is:

To provide for the payment of provisional allowance of $100 each to Civil Service employees of the Outside Service of the Post Office Department, whose salaries are $1,600 and under.

What is the effect of the words "provisional allowance?" Does that differentiate it from an annual increase? Is that a flat amount, given generally?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a flat amount of $100. In the supplementary estimates there was an item to provide an allowance of $100 to employees of the Civil Service receiving under $1,000. That increase has been given, I think, in practically all the departments this year, to put the lower salaried men in a better position to meet the increased demands upon them by reason of the high cost of living. It has been done by way of an allowance without an increase of salary. This also is an allowance, but the difference here is that in regard to post office clerks and certain classes of railway mail clerks it has been extended to those getting up to $1,600. While we are doing this under the guise of a temporary allowance the classes of clerks that are covered have in reality a very substantial ground of complaint of inequality between their position, from the point of view of salary, and that of Civil Service employees of a similar grade generally. I will give one instance. In 1914 legislation was passed by this House providing that the increase to the railway mail clerks should be at the rate of $100 per annum instead of $50 per annum, as it previously had been.

Both this House and the Senate concurred in the view that that was a proper provision, but, unfortunately for the railway mail clerks, they were not dealt with by the Bill applicable to the employees of the post offices generally, which was enacted at the same time, or shortly before. A provision for making their increase $100 a year, instead of $50, was contained in the Bill, which also contained certain provisions with regard to the charges made to the newspapers for carrying the mail. The Senate, while it approved of what was done for the class of mail clerks, refused to assent to the provision with regard to the carriage of the newspapers. The Bill came back to this House, and the Postmaster General at the time refused to accept the amendment of the Senate in regard to the newspapers, and it was not found possible to bring the two Houses to an agreement upon that subject, and by reason of that disagreement, for the last three years this class of clerks have been getting an increase of $50 a year, whereas the other employees drawing similar salaries were receiving an increase of $100 a year. These clerks pressed —unfortunately at a late period of the session—for a re-enactment of the legislation of 1914, and further pressed that it should be made, as seems to me only fair, to count from the time it was originally passed, so that they might be on a footing of equality with their fellow employees. When this matter was brought to my attention, and the attention of the Government generally, it was too late to deal with it by legislation during the present session, and after an interview with the gentlemen, in which they put their case strongly, they acquiesced in the view that it was too late to do anything, and expressed their readiness to accept, as compensation, at all events for the past, this allowance of $100 for this year. We look forward in the future to rectify the injustice done to them. For the time being we are giving something less than they would have received if that legislation had been passed at the time, by way of compensation, for what I really think they have been unfairly deprived of by the accident which happened in regard to the Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: This refers to Civil Service employees of the Outside Service. What does that mean?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand it would cover every class of employee in the Post Office Department of the Outside Service. We are not making a distinction between the different classes. We have letter carriers and clerks and they are subdivided into different classes. There are railway mail clerks, clerks in the Service, in the post office, letter carriers, and a large number of different denominations of employees, and we use the word "employees" to make it cover everybody.

Mr. McKENZIE: I desire to bring to the notice of the House a question which I think deserves consideration. We have a certain body of officials around this building called messengers. I do not know that their employment comes under any department. Perhaps the Speaker's jurisdiction covers this class more than any other jurisdiction. I was asked by some of those very useful gentlemen who are employed around the building to bring their case to the notice of the Government, and I would just as soon bring it to the notice of the Minister of Justice as of any other person. They say their pay is very small. I understand they are getting $3.25 a day and the minister will readily understand that is very small remuneration under present conditions. They have to live in the city of Ottawa. They come from distances. They must live in respectable places and $3.25 a day has not much purchasing power at the present time. No doubt these messengers have people dependent upon them, families to support. They have been coming here for years, and they have been invited to come. I think the country should provide decently for their services, and see that they are not losing their time, and that they have something to the good when they go home for the support of those dependent upon them. I, therefore, appeal to all the ministers here that they take the messengers' case into consideration, and out of some vote give them such an increase in their pay as may be considered proper. Perhaps the Speaker has more to do with this class of employees than the head of any other department. The Speaker might look over the list, see what they have been receiving, and make a fair allowance to them. I happened to be addressed by some of those men, and I shall be very proud if I can be of any service to them in bringing this matter to the notice of the House.

Mr. PARDEE: I desire to draw the attention of the acting Postmaster General and the Minister of Customs to an article which appeared in to-day's papers regarding the appointment of the postmaster at New Hamburg.

Mr. GRAHAM: What riding is that in?

Mr. PARDEE: Waterloo, I think. We have heard a great deal from the opposite side of the House regarding the treatment of returned soldiers, and I well recollect, as do other members of this committee, the vehement declaration of the Minister of Customs that returned soldiers should always be taken care of, and that they should have the first call on positions which they could fill. This appears to me to be a very striking case. A young man named Laschinger, who lived in New Hamburg, is about to return from the front wounded. One of his legs had to be amputated, and the index finger of his right hand is gone. His father, the postmaster at New Hamburg, died very recently and the young man, through his friends, applied for the position. It is said that 90 per cent of the inhabitants of New Hamburg signed a petition asking that this young chap be appointed. I believe he has a mother and some other members of the family who will be practically dependent upon him. The position has not been given back to him. Instead a young man named Rau has been appointed.

An hon. MEMBER: A raw deal.

Mr. PARDEE: A raw deal and a raw man, a wealthy man living in New Hamburg. He is very well off, and runs a local brewery, a very prosperous citizen who does not need the appointment for the purpose of a livelihood one bit. We on this side of the House have heard, without end, and without any possible end until after this election, declarations of what the Conservative party would do for the soldiers—protestations of their loyalty and so on. It has been stated that these men would be taken care of, and that the Government party was the only people who could take care of them. Almost the first instance that happens is the case of a boy whose father had the office before him, whose family were dependent upon the revenue of that office for a livelihood, and where 90 per cent of the people of the town, including Liberals and Conservatives, signed a petition in order to have him appointed in his father's place, and we find the Government, instead of appointing that soldier boy, took the recommendation of the Conservative committee in New Hamburg and appointed a man who has always been a stalwart Conservative, who does not need the office for a livelihood and who was given that office purely on account of his party allegiance.

It would be well, therefore, if we should hear fewer protestations of loyalty to our soldiers on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, who seem to think that they are the only persons justified in uttering them. "By their fruits ye shall know them,"—The instance that I have quoted is a very striking one.

Mr. REID: The hon. member has insinuated that that is the policy which is being carried out in my department.

Mr. PARDEE: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. REID: That is the inference that I draw from his remarks. I defy the hon. gentleman to name one instance in which I have filled a position in the Customs Department by the appointment of a person other than a returned soldier.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend admits that the policy adopted by the Post Office Department is wrong.

Mr. REID: The hon. member should not put words in my mouth. I am stating the policy that I have followed in the Customs Department. So far as I know, that policy has been followed in other departments in all cases where returned soldiers have been available. The member for West Lambton has referred to the case at New Hamburg. I know nothing about it; I do not know whether or not the acting Postmaster General (Mr. Doherty) knows anything about it. My only reason for rising is to take issue with any hon. gentleman in this House who says that in the Department of Customs returned soldiers have not been appointed to fill vacancies. I have tried to follow out the principle of giving these positions to returned soldiers, wherever that was possible.

Mr. PARDEE: Then when my hon. friend made the declaration that returned soldiers would be appointed, he was making it not for the Government, but simply for himself.

Mr. REID: I stated to the hon. member that the Order in Council had been passed and that we were acting upon it.

Mr. MACDONALD: You never observed it.

Mr. REID: I have observed it all along; that policy has been followed out in almost every case, in accordance with the Order in Council.

Mr. MACDONALD: When it came to the appointment of a postmaster in the town of Stellarton, the man who held the patronage was consulted, returned soldier or no returned soldier. The postmaster was dismissed, and, far from taking a returned soldier, they appointed to the position the president of the Conservative Association of that town. Further than that, they rented his store at $600 a year—a store for which no one else would pay more than $200 a year—and all this while a dozen returned soldiers were walking around the streets. The Minister of Customs is a good bluffer; he gets up and tells us what he does, and defies hon. gentlemen on the other side to do this or to do that. He is a very good fellow, but he cannot get away with that kind of thing. As to the Post Office Department, they do not pretend to observe the principle of appointing returned soldiers.

Mr. GRAHAM: The trouble is that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Post Office Department is not in the House —he may be busy; I am not saying anything about that. Every week the Post Office Department violates the policy of appointing returned soldiers. The member for West Lambton mentioned a case that occurred in New Hamburg; I have in mind another case in an adjoining county. I brought it to the attention of the House some weeks ago, and a discussion thereupon arose in reference to positions in Montreal, in the course of which the Minister of Customs made certain statements. In the case to which I refer the same thing happened; the people of both political parties asked for the appointment of a returned soldier who was fit for the position, but the recommendation of the member for the district was acted upon and the position was given to a politician, just as if no policy had been adopted of appointing returned soldiers. Moreover, that action was contrary to the wishes of the people.

Mr. DOHERTY: When and where did that happen?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will look it up in Hansard. It was in a western Ontario constituency; the member for the district was in the House when I made the statement, and he offered no contradiction.

Mr. DOHERTY: When was it?

Mr. GRAHAM: About two weeks ago; I cannot tell the exact date. We had a general discussion then about the appointment of returned soldiers, which, I think, led up to the announcement that was made by the Minister of Customs.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend will admit that that information is somewhat vague. If positive statements are made and I am held responsible, I should be informed when and where the instances have occurred.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will look up the details and let my hon. friend know. It is in Hansard; I thought that after the discussion that took place every one would be familiar with the circumstances of the case. If the hon. gentleman was not in the House, I should have thought that he would be informed by other ministers.

Mr. DOHERTY: Unfortunately, things go on Hansard that are the result of misinformation on the part of gentlemen who may make statements in good faith. As a matter of fairness, when we are told that these things are being done every week, we should be informed also when and where they have occurred.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the Stellarton case?

Mr. DOHERTY: When did the Stellarton case occur?

Mr. MACDONALD: About four months ago. I brought the matter up twice; my hon. friend ought to have looked into it before now.

Mr. GRAHAM: Pleading ignorance is a poor excuse.

Mr. DOHERTY: A question was put about a building that had been rented for the Stellarton post office. I certainly have no recollection of the hon. gentleman's making any statement, when I was present, concerning the matter to which he refers.

Mr. MACDONALD: I put another question on the Order Paper in regard to the dismissal of the postmaster and the appointment of another person to the position. Possibly my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) was not acting minister at that time. Anyway, the answer was put on Hansard. I can cite another instance, the case of the vacancy in the postmastership at Charlottetown. The people in the city were pressing for the appointment of a very prominent returned soldier, but their representations were disregarded; the recommendation of the members for the county was accepted and another man appointed.

Mr. KYTE: Another case came to my attention some time ago. A young man who had been employed as a messenger in this House returned from the front with one of his arms disabled as a result of injuries received in the firing line. He told me that he had been recommended for a position in the Department of Naval Affairs at a salary of $90 a month. After working there for some two weeks, he was dismissed and a young lady was given his position. He was then given employment as a messenger in this building—he is not here at present, so anything that I may say will not prejudice him in any employment that he would receive from a department of the Government. I think it is well that we should do what we can to remove the masks which hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches are wearing so smugly in this matter. Only a few months ago it was stated in the Toronto papers that a returned soldier who applied for a position was told to go to the chairman of the Conservative Patronage Committee. There has been no denial of that. Hon. gentlemen who are interested may profess great indignation, but everybody knows throughout the country that the only use the Government has for returned soldiers is the use that they make of them at election time. In my constituency there are a number of returned soldiers. Two positions have been vacant during the last four years—preventive officer of Customs and collector of Customs. These vacancies are not filled because the dispenser of political patronage in my constituency has promised the position to so many that he dare not fill it until the election is over—and then it will be too late. Why are returned soldiers in my constituency not appointed to those positions? Because, as I say, the political patronage managers insist that these appointments shall go not to men who have won glory and performed service on the battlefield, but to men who are performing service for the Conservative party in the constituency in which they reside.

Mr. ROBB: I understood the Minister of Customs to say that by Order in Council the Government had determined upon a policy of giving preference to returned soldiers. As forewarned is forearmed, I want to draw the attention of the acting Postmaster General to the fact that tenders are being asked for a mail route running out of Hemmingford. One of the tenderers is a returned soldier who was wounded. I met him yesterday at a local fair. He told me he had put in his tender, and had attached to his tender the certificate from the doctor certifying to his injury. Will the minister now say, that, all conditions being equal, he will give the preference to this returned soldier?

Mr. DOHERTY: If all conditions are equal I certainly would carry out the provision of the Order in Council. Hon. gentlemen have spoken very loudly and violently and have told us about what "everybody" knew. They have been very vague—in particular the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte). They have covered a very wide field. I do not quite see that that is a fair method to prove a charge. If the policy has been departed from in the Post Office Department it is most assuredly not within my knowledge. It is not quite conclusive to say: There is a position; there is a returned soldier; the returned soldier, and the position do not come in contact; therefore, you are departing from your system. Hon. gentlemen, I suppose, will admit there are certain classes of men with certain qualifications suited to fill certain positions, and I do not suppose that the suggestion is that the mere fact of a man being a returned soldier, and the mere fact of there existing a vacant position without regard to the qualifications of the returned soldier on the one side and the requirements of the position on the other, should cause the position at once to be filled by the returned soldier. The hon. gentleman puts to me the question in a perfectly fair way. Other things being equal, the provision of the Order in Council would call for preference being given to the returned soldier. I do not think hon. gentlemen will show that, in my personal action, that being the condition, the Order in Council has not been acted upon.

Mr. KYTE: I will recall to the Acting Postmaster General a case in which, perhaps, he will admit that the returned soldier was qualified. Take the case of the post office in the city of Charlottetown, P.E.I. A vacancy occurred there some time ago. A returned soldier, who was a university graduate, was an applicant for the position. He was recommended by most of the responsible people in the city of Charlottetown, but he did not receive the appointment. Political considerations again intervened, and the position went to the man who had the recommendation of the patronage committee. There is clearly a case in which the applicant, a returned soldier, came in contact with the position, and had all the qualifications necessary, but he did not receive the appointment.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is the hon. gentleman's position that every university graduate is the best man to be appointed to fill a position in a post office in any particular place?

Mr. KYTE: I should think, if a university graduate is available for the position of postmaster in Charlottetown, the acting Postmaster General would have to furnish pretty good evidence to the contrary before he could convince anybody that that man was not competent to take charge of it. I do not wish to hold the acting Postmaster General responsible for this. I am speaking generally in regard to the Government. The policy the Government has laid down in Orders in Council, which have been flaunted frequently before the faces of hon. members on this side of the House, is being violated every day, and the acting Postmaster General, as a member of the Government, must take his full share of responsibility in the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the statements made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) are true, what does the minister purpose doing about the Charlottetown case? Will he give the position to the university graduate who is a wounded soldier and who has returned?

Mr. DOHERTY: I will make inquiry as to the qualifications of the respective candidates. I have the honour to be a university graduate myself, and I am prepared to concede that there are hundreds of men who are not university graduates who are more competent to fill the position of postmaster almost anywhere than I should be. I cannot accept the test of being a university graduate as a proof of competence to fill the position.

Mr. KYTE: There is only one test—the political test.

Mr. GRAHAM: You ought to call in the Civil Service Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Government ought to admit that all these appointments are made on the recommendation of the patronage committee. Those patronage committees are just as active in all the constituencies throughout the country as they were before the war broke out. Patronage is everywhere. The other day a gentleman in Montreal to whom a young lady, a nurse, applied for a recommendation, saying she wanted to serve her country, said to her: "I shall be very glad to come to Ottawa and see what I can do for you." This is the statement of a man of the very highest character. When he came to Ottawa he was asked what this young lady's father was in politics.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By whom?

Mr. PUGSLEY: By somebody in Ottawa to whom he went.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Somebody!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A gentleman to whom he thought he ought to go in order to get the position for this lady. I know of another case in which a medical man in charge of an ambulance corps was urged by a prominent member of the patronage committee to take on some nurses. He declined because he did not want them. He was called up again and asked if he was not going to play the game fairly. He declined again. It was not long before, I am told, a peremptory order came from Ottawa to take on one of those nurses at once, although there was absolutely no reason in the world why she should be taken on, because her services were not required. In the city of St. John, from which I come, it is known by everybody that since the war began the patronage committee is the Government so far as that constituency is concerned. I believe that is the case also throughout the country. You may speak about the affairs of Canada being administered from Ottawa, they are not; they are administered by the patronage committees in the different constituencies. The patronage committees form a part of the machinery of this Government. Not long ago, there was a proposition to form a Union Government, and it was suggested that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) should be the Prime Minister of this country. At a caucus of my hon. friends opposite, they stated they would not have the Minister of Trade and Commerce as Prime Minister. They knew that he had declared in this House that he was opposed to patronage, and they considered that if he became Prime Minister patronage would be done away with. Tnerefore they refused to entertain the suggestion that he should become Prime Minister. The party machine must still continue, as under Union Government the Conservative party machine would continue to administer the affairs of this Dominion from coast to coast.

With regard to my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), who spoke of the very great hardship to this boy and his family by reason of his not being allowed to have the position for which he was recommended and which his father had previously filled, I suppose he has been informed that his female relatives are to be allowed to vote in the next election. Why, then, should they complain? Surely that ought to be a compensation for any financial distress which they may suffer. Has my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Weichel) written to them that they are to be allowed to vote in the coming election, and therefore they must not complain that their brother is ill-treated in respect to the position?

In Military District No. 6, in the Maritime Provinces, to-day there are 257 gentlemen holding positions in the Militia Department, only ten of whom have been overseas, while there are in the Great War Veterans' Association of St. John, I think about 350 members, who could easily be placed in those positions, running from small salaries up to the enormous sum of $6,200 per year. Let me read the resolution which the Great War Veterans' Association have sent me, and I do it because it shows that it is all a hollow pretense to say that this Government is prepared to do everything it can for the returned soldier. The resolution, which was passed at a general meeting at St. John on September 12, 1917, is as follows:

Resolved, that the attention of the Premier and Minister of Militia and Defence be drawn to the state of affairs existing in the Militia Department, District No. 6. In a recent list of officers employed in Military District No. 6, there was shown to be 257 holding positions, of whom only 10 had seen service at the front, and these were all holding minor positions, while the better positions were held by officers who had never seen service overseas or had made no attempt to do so.

Therefore, resolved that these officers should be made to go overseas or revert to civil life and take their chance with conscripts when called, and their places taken by returned officers who have done their duty for the Empire.

Also that all men employed in safety-first jobs who have not been overseas be sent immediately to the front and their places taken with returned men wounded for their country.

Further resolved that a copy of this resolution be sent to Hon. J. D. Hazen and Hon. Dr. Pugsley as minister and members of St. John, and they be asked to take a definite stand in this matter and report same and advise the intention of the Government in this matter.

Yours respectfully,

(Sgd.) E. J. Puddy, Secretary,

The Great War Veterans' Association, St. John.

I bring this before the House and, through Hansard, before the people of this country. I say that these returned soldiers are realizing to-day that they are not receiving fair treatment at the hands of this Government, and it is necessary the Government should be aroused to a sense of its duty in respect of positions which returned soldiers could fill. They are now walking the streets, waiting for recognition, feeling that their services demand recognition, but as I have said, all the recognition which they are to get from this Government practically is that their female relatives are to be allowed to vote. Why should they not complain at this treatment? Is the mere privilege of voting to be regarded by this Government as being a fair and reasonable recognition of the services which these men have performed for their country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite consider it a fitting opportunity to make vague charges of insincerity against the Government with respect to returned soldiers now, just as the session is to close, and when in all probability no individual case, if the hon. member has courage enough to mention any case, can be investigated closely and replied to fully. We are charged with extreme partisanship, running the country by patronage committees—charged by hon. gentlemen opposite who, throughout this session, have displayed a partisanship that should make them historic and immortal. This session has witnessed an effort on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, concurred in by the whole party, to bury partisanship so far as the war is concerned, and to share the Government of Canada with all who are in favour of this war—an offer declined by hon. gentlemen opposite who raised the flag of party, fought under the flag of party, and persisted in fighting under the flag of party to the end.

A case was mentioned by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) as taking place in the town of New Hamburg, I know the town of New Hamburg, but I never heard of this case. The member for the county is absent to-day, but I know that he intends to contest that constituency at the next election, and I know he would not make any mistake in the town of New Hamburg in regard to returned soldiers. I think he may be able to speak to the case to-morrow, and I hope he will be able to do so. The facts are not all brought out with regard to that case yet. To say that 90 per cent of the town of New Hamburg supported this returned soldier for postmaster and that he was refused the appointment is not a full statement of the case, even if it is correct so far as it goes, and I question very much if the information of the hon. member for West Lambton is correct. To lay down the proposition that because a man is a university graduate, all other considerations as to qualifications must be laid aside, and that that fact alone establishes that he should have the appointment, is a very strange proposition for a member of this Parliament to lay down. Do hon. gentlemen not know university graduates who are about the least well qualified people they could think of for the position of postmaster? I know nothing of the case in the city of Charlottetown, but the city of Charlottetown will pass on that case when it comes to the contest at the polls. I venture to say that when charges are made in the city of Charlottetown about returned soldiers being treated unjustly the charges will have reference to the western coast. It will be a case of the hon. member for St. John over again: somebody told somebody else in some far-off city that somebody could not get a position unless her father voted so and so, or some one told some one else in the city of Toronto that he had to go to the Patronage Committee to get the position. These will be the charges levelled in Charlottetown, instead of bringing up an individual case in that city where the facts would be well known. I think it is altogether unlikely that an injustice would be done in that city any more than anywhere else.

I am engaged at the present time in correspondence with a returned soldier from the western provinces. He is a man with a family, but he left his family and went overseas. He left a Government job, not under a Conservative Government, but under a Liberal Government, and he is still pleading to get the job back which he left.

Mr. MACDONALD: Under what Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government of Manitoba.

Mr. McKENZIE: They are for union Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not being able to get his job back, he appeals to the Government of Canada to provide something for him.

Mr. MACDONALD: What was his name and position?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will not give his name.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is you who are now making vague charges.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it Doctor Simpson?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When I have a charge to make against hon. gentlemen opposite, I will name the man. I do not want to do an injustice to him, or to prejudice his chances of getting that position. It would be unjust to him to mention his name; the hon. gentleman knows that. But those are the facts just the same. I do not say that there is no reason why he should not get his position back. There may be a reason I know nothing of, but if there is such, I know not what it is. It just shows that one needs to know all the facts of a case before making charges against any one. There are returned soldiers in every province. There are perhaps returned soldiers who have not Government positions, but for the most part, they have all some sort of position out in the province from which I come. Not only in cases where the merits are about even, but where they are anything like even, the position in all cases I ever heard of, goes to the returned soldier. Many and many a position in the province of Manitoba has gone to a returned soldier, and nobody has ever complained about a Patronage Committee that I ever heard of. For that matter, I have no Patronage Committee.

I know not in the province of Manitoba of a single complaint that any returned soldier has been done an injustice. There are positions that all returned soldiers cannot fill. There are very few positions that all returned soliders can fill. And it does not do a returned soldier any good to put him in a position he is not qualified to fill. A returned soldier cannot fill many a staff position and you give him no advantage by placing him in a position he is unfitted for. Instead of doing him a benefit, you do him an injury. I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to point to an individual case, and if they can establish it against us then they have gone a lot further than they have gone to-night. Wherever that case is it will be under review in the constituency when we come to the polls, and I have no doubt whatever how the returned soldiers of this country are going to vote, and the result.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would you like to bet on it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is always the answer of the man who has no other answer "would you like to bet?"

Mr. PUGSLEY: Don't be too confident.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let hon. gentlemen bring up the treatment of returned soldiers, not in constituencies a thousand miles away on the word of somebody, or nobody, or everybody, but let them bring it up in the very constituency itself, and thresh it out on its merits, and the people will give their verdict, and we have no fear of it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is not altogether fair for the Secretary of State to charge hon. members on this side of the House with being indefinite in their criticism. I think they have been very definite. My hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) has given him a specific case, which he has not been able to answer. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) has given him another specific case, well known in eastern Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. He has made no reply. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has mentioned another case in the town of Stellarton. The Secretary of State has not been able to answer any of these. If he wants another case, I will give him a fourth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The case in Stellarton was four months ago, when the acting minister was not in charge of the office. Why did not the hon. member put a question on the Order Paper and bring the matter up then?

Mr. GRAHAM: The question was on the Order Paper long ago.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The case I have in mind is that of a returned nurse. Recently the Government established a hospital in the city of Sydney, called the Moxham Hospital for convalescent soldiers. It was necessary to engage a matron to take charge of the hospital. A very competent young lady, who had seen service at the front, made application for the position. Every one said she was well qualified and should have been appointed. Her name is Miss Black, and the Secretary of State can make investigation about this and see if the facts as I present them are correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that the military hospital?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes. This young lady was not acceptable to the patronage committee of South Cape Breton.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it under the Military Hospitals Commission?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I suppose so. In any event, she was not acceptable to the patronage committee of South Cape Breton, and her application was rejected, the position being given to a young lady who had no experience at all, but who had simply completed her training as a nurse, but her father was a friend of the party in power. This case is well known in the county of Cape Breton. I think we should have no trouble in giving my hon. friend a great many other cases of a similar nature. My experience in regard to the cases of any of the nurses I have been acquainted with is that they got on the force only through the recommendation of some Conservative politician, and I can give the minister specific instances of nurses making application to be put on the service whose applications lay for months in the military head office here, and there was nothing doing until they secured the recommendation of some prominent Tory supporter . That has been the system of the appointment of nurses all through the service. I do not want to bother the Secretary of State by giving him too many specific cases, but it is not fair for him to say that members on this side of the House are making general charges only, when, as a matter of fact, we have been giving him specific cases which he has not been able to explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have had the explanation of one of the cases already. Perhaps it is as well to give it to the committee. I have not had time to communicate it to the acting Postmaster General. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. McLean) tells me that what the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) says as to Charlottetown is quite wrong, that there has been no appointment made at all to the position of postmaster at Charlottetown, that the inspector who was inspector before is doing the work along with his own work, and saving the country $2,000 a year.

Mr. GRAHAM: He will be in the estimates for extra work done. This condition of affairs will only last until after the election.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

The House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think it necessary to read all these items, but I would like to speak of one matter. There is an item for improvement work in St. John harbour, and I wish to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Public Works to what I think is a very serious state of affairs in connection with this work. There was a contract given for a large amount of work there, including the building of a dry dock. When I was minister, I exacted a security of half a million dollars. I am told that the Government has reduced the security to $250,000, and that drawbacks accumulated, and that the contractors were at work and had a large plant on the spot, worth $300,000 or $400,000, in respect of which the department would have a lien for the purpose of the work. There was also about $700,000 of cash on hand including the deposit. I understand the Government has returned to the contractors the whole $700,000, and that the contractors are now trying to get the plant released. If that is done, it will be handing over to defaulting contractors, who were under obligation to perform this work, nearly $1,000,000 which this country had a right to insist should be applied towards the completion of the work. I do not think my hon. friend is responsible, but the Government is responsible, and I would ask him to exercise the right of lien which the Government has on that plant to keep it there until matters can be arranged for the completion of the work.

I am not going to criticise to-night anything in connection with the half million dollars; perhaps that can be satisfactorily explained. But I would ask the minister to retain control of the plant until satisfactory arrangements are made for the continuance of the work and the unravelling of all matters connected with the dry dock.

Mr. REID: The amount that was handed to the Government went to pay the creditors. With reference to the plant, I promise my hon. friend that I will take it up in the morning with the officials of the department, see what the situation is and if it is as the hon. member states we will hold it back.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If my hon. friend will look at the contract he will see that the Government has a lien on all plant brought to the work.

Resolution concurred in.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that the Government will see that all these items are right. When we dispense with reading them the Government will have to take the responsibility of seeing that the details are correct.

Resolution concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE SUPPLY BILL.

On motion of Mr. Reid, the House went into committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Rainville in the chair.

Mr. Reid moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenditures of the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1918, the sum of $4,721,500 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Reid moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenditures of the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1918, the sum of $46,375,267.75 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

THE SUPPLY BILL—$51,096,767.05.

Mr. Reid moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 135, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, and reported.

On the motion for the third reading of the Bill:

Mr. GRAHAM: Unless there is some special reason that the Government can give us why this Bill should be read a third time to-night, it should not be read a third time. I do not want to take any objection, but to go through the first, second and third reading without taking a breath is rushing matters somewhat unless there is some special reason for it.

Mr. REID: We would like to pass it to-night to get it over to the Senate. I understand the Senate is practically through. They have passed the War-time Elections Bill and it will be here to-night.

We would like to send over to the Senate what we have on the Order Paper, so that they may have some business to-morrow. When we get through with the Bill which is coming over, we will have nothing more to do. We would like to take it up, discuss it, and be ready for prorogation to-morrow. If, by any chance, we cannot get through with the discussion, prorogation will take place the next day, but we would like to get our Bills over there in order to finish up the business.

Mr. GRAHAM: Of course, there will be some discussion on the other Bill I imagine, but before I consent to the third reading I would ask if the War-time Elections Act is back from the Senate and is to be dealt with to-night. It cannot be discussed to-morrow, unless steps are taken to-night so that it will appear on the Order Paper. Otherwise, the discussion will take place the day after to-morrow.

Mr. REID: The Bill I refer to has passed the Senate, and, as I understand, was sent over here, and will be ready for to-morrow. At all events, we would like to finish up the other business and be prepared to discuss the War-time Elections Act to-morrow. I understand that the Senate came to some arrangement by which the Bill passed there without further discussion. I admit there will be some discussion here. I have no doubt the Bill will be ready for discussion to-morrow.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I might be permitted, under the rules the Bill cannot be here for discussion at the next sitting, unless it goes through the proper stages, and is sent over to us to-night. If it is presented to the House to-night, it will be on the Order Paper to be discussed to-morrow.

Mr. REID: I have information that the Bill will be here inside of ten minutes, so it will be on the Order Paper to-morrow; that will be arranged.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Might I suggest that the amendments should be printed, as they refer to my province. They are very intricate, and I would like to see them.

Mr. REID: Yes, they will be printed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT.

The House proceeded to the consideration of an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 66 to amend the Judges' Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suggest that this debate be under closure.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understood that this stood over, in order that the formal motion might properly be submitted to the House. I move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this House disagrees to their amendment to Bill No. 66, an Act to amend the Judges' Act, for the following reasons:

Because the amendment is not relevant to the Bill, which is only to provide the salaries for two additional judges, to restrict in certain cases the travelling expenses of judges, and to extend certain provisions of the Act now applying to County Court judges to the Circuit Court of the district of Montreal;

Because, though it may be advisable to modify the pensions at present provided with respect to future appointments, it is not in the public interests that the remuneration or pensions of judges now on the Bench should be changed to their prejudice;

Because, the amendment forbids the judges to perform any duties outside their judicial duties, and that, while it may be an advantage to make more precise and definite the prohibitions at present existing, there are duties that every one is bound to perform, that so wide a prohibition is impossible for the judges to observe, and that, in any case, it is not in the public interest to enforce so unlimited a restriction.

Because there are in connection with said amendment questions of grave importance touching the independence of the judiciary, which call for the careful consideration of the House of Commons, consideration which cannot adequately be given at the present session, and because these questions can be more advantageously dealt with upon a Bill submitted for that purpose, and at a time when they can be deliberately considered.

Mr. GRAHAM: What will be the result if this motion is adopted? Where does the Bill go then?

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. DOHERTY: It will be returned to the Senate. While I have no official information on the subject, I believe there is very good reason to believe that they will acquiesce in the soundness of these reasons, which only look to defer consideration of the important questions which arise on their amendment, which is entirely foreign to anything in the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Bill will get through?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

WAR CHARITIES ACT.

House again in committee on Bill No. 130, relating to war charities, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is that the Act to provide for the supervision of the collection of war charges?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: That Bill was held over by the Minister of Finance, who has charge of it, for further information which he was to get before he would take it up again. We have never had an explanation. If it proceeds, it will go on in the absence of any information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Minister of Finance is confined to his room. Consequently, I made as good a study of the measure this afternoon as I could, and I read the whole debate that took place on the measure when it was in committee before. I think my hon. friend is wrong when he says there was information to come. I cannot recollect that.

Mr. McKENZIE: He held it over for some reason.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the reason; it was not for information. There were certain suggested amendments. It was suggested that it should be amended in three ways. First objection was taken to the title. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) thought the title should be "The War Contributions Act." Secondly, the hon. member for Pictou thought it should be widened to include such contributions as machine gun contributions and the like of that, that it should be extended beyond the mere domain of benevolence. Thirdly, it was contended by the hon. member for Middlesex, and several hon. gentlemen opposite, that churches should be exempted from the operation of the Act. I do not know of any other amendment that was suggested. That was why it was held over, and consideration was promised to those suggestions. I would prefer to see the title stay as it is. The title "War Contributions" would not definitely indicate the nature of the Bill. It is a Bill to prevent people appealing to the public for money for an unauthorized fund, or a fund which it is not in the public interest that appeals should be made for. It does not cover the whole scope of war contribution. It covers only benevolent or alleged benovelent contributions, or charitable contributions, because there is really nothing distasteful in the word "charity."

The title to be given to this Act is the same as that which has been given to the British Act; their War Charities Act is in line with this legislation. They have had their legislation since the war began; in my judgment, we should have had this sooner. The member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) suggested long ago that some such legislation as this should be provided. We are following in line with Britain in that regard; besides, the title "War Charities" is appropriate. As to the other idea that the Bill should cover a wider sphere, it may be that we ought to do that in separate legislation, but anything done in that regard should not be done in connection with this measure. The things we want to aim at now are appeals to the charity of the public and to the benevolence of the public for the relieving of suffering and distress. The other various schemes that were worked—some of them very laudable indeed in themselves—are now pretty much in the past; I do not think that we need look for them much more. The suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite that churches should be excepted, is a good one. I move that section 2 be amended by adding after the word "association" in the second line the words "other than a church or the Salvation Army."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GLASS: There was a discussion as to the desirability of exempting an organization of a national character, such as the Daughters of the Empire. Possibly, however, if you started on one you would have to introduce quite a number of exemptions of this kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see any need of exemptions. I do not take quite the same view of the operation of the Act as that taken by the Minister of Finance. He seemed to proceed on the assumption that any institutions that were obviously and by general acceptance right and proper and already recognized by law should be exempted. My idea is that they should be immediately registered. The Secretary of State has power to register them at once, and my first step would be to register the Daughters of the Empire, the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross, the Belgian Relief Fund, and the like. These organizations will lead in the matter of registration.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that this Bill enables the minister to grant licenses for the holding of entertainments at which moneys will be collected for patriotic purposes, and that if such licenses are not issued, those responsible for the entertainment will be acting in violation of the law. I do not think that we have any jurisdiction to grant licenses for entertainments held in any of the provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that my hon. friend has in his mind quite the right idea of the nature of the Bill. In the first place, we do not grant licenses. We register the fund, which is the institution that embodies the purpose of the appeal. For example, we register the Patriotic Fund; that does not mean that we license a church or a society in the country to hold a concert on behalf of the Patriotic Fund. Contributions to that fund by way of concert or entertainment are all right provided the Patriotic Fund themselves say that they are prepared to accept the contribution and that the concert or entertainment has their sanction. But we want to stop the carrying out of schemes, even in respect of the Patriotic Fund, the purpose of which is ostensibly to obtain money for the Patriotic Fund, but really to get money which goes largely to the promoters of the schemes or their friends, the Patriotic Fund getting only a negligible residue.

Mr. McKENZIE: No form of criminal ingenuity could be practised in connection with getting funds that is not a violation of the provisions of the Criminal Code. If it is stated that money received or collected will be given to one purpose and it is deliberately given to another, money is received on false pretenses. If funds are misappropriated, the persons responsible are guilty of conversion and of theft. I do not see that anything a man or woman could do in exploiting schemes of this kind in a criminal way is not covered by the provisions of the criminal law. I think that this proposed Act is an absolutely unnecessary provision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The criminal law does not cover the cases dealt with here, so far as they have been presented to me. For example, it was advertised that at a race meeting the proceeds of the first day should go to the Patriotic Fund. As a consequence patriotically inclined people went on the first day in preference to the other days, and many who went, instead of asking for change, left their five dollars with the gatekeeper. They thought that it was all going to the Patriotic Fund; that was all they cared about it. As a consequence some $6,000 or $7,000 were taken in that day. Some difficulty ensued in getting the money; much time was taken up, and finally about $350 reached the Patriotic Fund. The rest was applied towards the expenses of the meeting, salaries and allowances to those who gave their time to it, and so on. That would not come under the Criminal Code, but no such scheme of making money for the Patriotic Fund—it was really not for the fund at all—should be allowed. It is such things as that that we want to regulate by this Bill. The secretary of the Patriotic Fund can give my hon. friend some very illuminating instances.

Mr. McKENZIE: Suppose it was advertised that the funds were to be applied to the Patriotic Fund and that the people in the light of that advertisement, went and contributed their money. That money would have been received illegally, under false pretenses, if it was not afterwards handed over to the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The proceeds were applied to the Patriotic Fund all right, but the promoters took care that the proceeds did not amount to very much.

Mr. GLASS: I remember the argument of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) on that point when this matter was before the House on a previous occasion. I believe that even if the Criminal Code does provide punishment for fraudulent collection of funds of this kind, yet in these times it is a great deterrent and discouragement to funds supported by voluntary contribution if those frauds are allowed to go to a point at which action has to be taken which may ultimately result in a prosecution. The old adage that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure very fitly applies to a matter of this kind, and it ought to be checked by prevention rather than by punishment after frauds have been perpetrated. For that reason I can conceive that an Act along the lines of the one before the House will more effectively meet the case than by resorting to punishment after the wrong has been done.

Sir HERBERT AMES: An Act of this kind was found to be absolutely necessary in England even after a few months of war. The general public were willing to give generously, but they were very susceptible, the result being that they were easily exploited. We had the same experience in Canada. One of the things that must be conserved in this war, quite as much as provisions or money, is the generous impulse of our people. We must not allow them to be exploited, because there is only a certain amount of voluntary generous impulse in the country. If that is drawn off and misused, there is so much less for legitimate enterprise. I can give to this House any number of instances that have come within the experience of the Canadian Patriotic Fund, in which we have seen the well-intentioned generosity of the Canadian people deliberately diverted and wasted on war funds. This Bill has a double purpose. First of all, it purposes protecting the public against fraudulent, unwise, injudicious collection of money for so-called war charities, and, secondly, we want it very much in order to protect the legitimate funds, to make it possible for the legitimate funds to defend themselves.

The National Canadian Patriotic Fund will be one of the first to ask to be registered. It will be the easiest thing in the world for that fund to conform with all the regulations that are required. They have to prove that they are administered by a responsible committee; that they keep regular minutes of their meetings; that they have proper books, and that their income and outgo are properly checked. They have to show that they bank their money, and that they use the authorized forms of the department. The National Canadian Patriotic Fund, the Belgian Fund, and the Red Cross Fund, through their organizations, will come and be certificated. Their certificates will apply not only to the national fund, but to all the branches. Each of the branches in its respective locality has, to some extent, the same powers that the parent organization has, and what will happen will be just this: If a city organization undertakes to raise money for the Patriotic Fund they will have to obtain permission from the local branch in order to do so. The local branch can say to those people: That is not the proper way in which to go to work for the Patriotic Fund; a large percentage of the amount collected will be wasted. We had in Vancouver a case in which they got up a large contribution contrary to the desire of the local branch of the Patriotic Fund. They raised $1,500 and paid out $1,400 in expenses. That was a pure waste of benevolent effort. The various funds of this country are entitled to protect themselves against misdirected effort.

Bill as amended reported, amendments read the first and second time and concurred in, and Bill read the third time and passed.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 1.40 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, September 20, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AS TO SUGGESTED HOLIDAY.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Russell (Hon. Charles Murphy) made an inquiry in the House a few days ago with respect to a press report that Australia had made arrangements to send 50,000 members of the original Australian Expeditionary Force to their homes for rest. I addressed a telegram on the same day to Sir George Perley in the following terms:

> Press telegram reports Australia has made arrangements to send fifty thousand of original Australian Expeditionary Force home for a rest irrespective whether corresponding reinforecments are sent from Australia. Question as to this has been asked in House of Commons. Please report soon as possible whether press statement has any and what foundation.

To which I received a reply yesterday as follows:

> Australian High Commissioner's office states question of returning original Australian Expeditionary Force was raised in Australian House but no instructions have come to Australian headquarters, London, regarding such return and High Commissioner's office not aware of any action taken to effectuate it.

Mr. MURPHY: The other part of my question was whether such steps as those suggested were to be taken with reference to the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No such steps have been taken.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

MATTRESSES AND COVERS.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. To whom was the contract awarded for the supply of 1,700 mattresses and 2,900 covers under tenders asked for in February last, and maturing on Thursday, February 22, 1917?
2. What was the price?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Stand.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This question has been on the Order Paper now for several days. The facts to be ascertained must have been known for some weeks, even months. Why has the question not been answered?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: If the hon. member had asked how many mattresses and covers had been purchased by the Department of Militia and Defence, the question would have been answered in due course. But, as the question is put, it has been necessary to go to every department of the Government for information. The Militia Department have already answered the question in the regular way and sent the reply to the proper officer of the Government.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The question refers to a specific tender for the supplying of specific goods; there was no need of any rushing from one department to the other. Reference to the advertisement issued by the department would have indicated the officer possessing the information.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is mistaken about that. When a question is asked in this form it must go to every department of the Government, because it does not appear on its face to what department it relates. It is possible that the Militia Department had or had not such a tender, but that does not dispose of the question by any means.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My attention might have been directed to that on a previous occasion, or I might have been asked privately to supply the necessary information. The question has reference to the Militia Department.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Similar cases occur very frequently when questions are called.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will complain no further if I have the assurance that the answer will be sent to my address.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend the information so far as the Militia Department is concerned.

LIEUT. M. J. HOWE.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Is Lieutenant M. J. Howe, formerly of the 188th Battalion, still in the service of the Militia Department?
2. If so, what are his duties, pay and allowances?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

CAPTAIN DOUGLAS, M.P.

Mr. DAVIDSON:

1. Did Captain J. M. Douglas, M.P., enlist or receive a commission in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces?
2. If so, when and where and in what branch of the service?
3. What rank did he hold?
4. Is he still a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces? If not, when did the term of his services cease?
5. For what period and where was he in training, was his training completed and what time, if any, did he serve at the front in France or elsewhere?
6. At what rate per diem has he been paid, and have any of his dependents drawn separation allowance?
7. What amount has been paid to date on both accounts?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

CENTRE SPAN PLACED IN POSITION.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The following memorandum has just been placed in my hands:

A Quebec despatch says the centre span of the Quebec bridge is in position, and is being attached to the cantilever arms.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

RECRUITS AND CASUALTIES.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What was the total number of recruits enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces since August 1, 1916?

2. What was the total number of casualties in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces since August 1, 1916, classified as killed in action, died of wounds, died of sickness, presumed dead, missing, wounded, and prisoners of war?

3. What is the estimated average percentage of wounded who subsequently return to active service?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Stand.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is a very important question. Have I the assurance of the minister that the information will be given later?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: The information will be forthcoming shortly.

CORRECTION—Mr. PUGSLEY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): I wish to correct a statement which I am reported to have made yesterday, and which appears on page 6384 of Hansard. I assume that the error occurred because my language was not clear. I read a resolution adopted by the Great War Veterans' Association of St. John, and during the course of my remarks I referred to the fact that a certain number of gentlemen held positions—the report says "in St. John," but what I intended to say—and what I think I did say—was in "Military District No. 6."

Mr. REID: I remember that the hon. gentleman said "St. John."

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did I? Then I made a mistake. I should have said Military District No. 6, in the Maritime Provinces. I wish to correct that error.

PRINTING OF ELECTORAL LISTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Nova Scotia voters' lists as last revised by the province will be printed and furnished to candidates, including defeated candidates, as required by the provision of Part 1 of the Dominion Elections Act? It would be a very great advantage to all parties to have this information. It is true that the lists will be somewhat revised; still, a great deal of work would be saved if the provisions of the law were carried out.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend asked a similar question the other day. I communicated with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and expected to have a reply from him. I believe that such a reply has been prepared, but it has not yet reached me. Part 1 of the Dominion Elections Act is suspended for the purposes of this election; therefore the provisions which requires the printing of voting lists are suspended because they are in that part of the Act, and are not elsewhere to be found. My hon. friend, however, has put it on the ground not of legal obligation, but of convenience. I should not care to give a definite reply at the moment, but I shall discuss the subject with the Secretary of State and give the best consideration that may be possible to what my hon. friend suggests.

NOVA SCOTIA ELECTORAL LISTS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would suggest to the Prime Minister that when the Military Voters' Act and the War-Time Elections Act are printed, a considerable number of copies be sent to the members so that they shall not be obliged to write to Ottawa for them.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that is an entirely reasonable request.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I, in this connection, suggest to my right hon. friend that the lists which are now in force in the four eastern provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, should be distributed, because the number of those whose names will be taken off those lists is very limited. Apart from the number in one or perhaps two cities, the number of those who will be disfranchised can be counted upon the fingers of one hand. If we had copies of the lists of those provinces, it would be a great advantage to us.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall give my best attention to the suggestion of my right hon. friend.

EXEMPTIONS UNDER MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Has the Prime Minister had time to read carefully the letter written by the Deputy Speaker to his constituents in regard to the exemptions under the Military Service Act? If so, does his letter exactly represent the opinion of the Government?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I regret to say that, in the hurry of many affairs at the end of the session, I have not been able to give very close attention to the letter which has been spoken of, and I can only repeat what I said on a previous occasion when the subject was referred to me, that the regulations have not yet been formulated or presented to the Government. They are under consideration now by the Military Service Council, over which the Deputy Minister of Justice presides, and which is composed of Mr. O. M. Biggar, of Edmonton; Mr. J. H. Moss, of Toronto; Mr. Louis Loranger, of Montreal, and Lieutenant Colonel H. A. C. Machin, of Kenora. They have been for some time engaged in the preparation of the regulations. I believe it is their intention, if possible, to include in the regulations which are to have the approval of the Central Appeal Judge all regulations that may be made under the statute. That is their present intention, if it is practicable. There are certain regulations which must be approved by the Central Appeal Judge; there are certain other regulations which do not require that approval, but I understand that, if possible, all the regulations to be made are to have the approval of the Central Appeal Judge. Until those regulations have been presented to the Government and confirmed by Order in Council, there is nothing authoritative about the matter at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As this is a matter of the gravest importance, because the people in my constituency, at all events, are led to believe that no sons of farmers will be called out, am I to conclude, from what my right hon. friend has said, that nothing has been yet decided?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The regulations, as I have already stated, have not been presented to the Government by the Military Service Council. I do not know whether they have been placed before the Central Appeal Judge. Until they have been placed before and approved by the Governor in Council there is nothing authoritative about the matter at all.

MEDICAL EXAMINERS UNDER MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. EDMUND PROULX (Prescott): Is it the intention of the Minister of Militia to appoint medical examiners in each constituency to examine men between the ages of twenty and thirty-four who wish to present themselves for medical examination?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: Medical examiners under the Military Service Act will be appointed at certain mobilization centres which are to be determined upon and which will cover the whole country.

STAFF OF OVERSEAS DEPARTMENT OF MILITIA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Might I ask the Minister of Militia if he has not with him to-day the information I requested as to the number of officers, non-commissioned officers and men employed in the Department of Militia Overseas, if he would be good enough to send the information to me?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: There are 141 officers employed or attached to the Department of Militia overseas in the various departments and offices. There are 492 non-commissioned officers and men, not including civilian employees, so employed. The total amount paid per month for salaries to such officers and men is not available at the moment.

DEATH OF THE SERJEANT-AT-ARMS.

REFERENCES BY RT. HON. SIR ROBERT BORDEN AND RT. HON. SIR WILFRID LAURIER TO THE LATE COLONEL HENRY R. SMITH.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have to announce to the House, with very deep regret, that Col. Henry Robert Smith, Serjeant-at-Arms, died this morning. The son of a distinguished Speaker of the old Parliament of Canada, he was appointed Deputy Serjeant-at-Arms in 1872 and promoted to be Serjeant-at-Arms in 1892. He has, therefore, served as deputy and as Serjeant-at-Arms for nearly half a century. Col. Smith had also a very considerable military service, in 1866 and 1872 on the frontier, and in 1885 in the North-west Rebellion. Those of us who have known him in the course of his important official duties have, I am sure, been impressed with the dignity and courtesy with which he discharged them. He was, in a word, a fine type of a gentleman of the old school and his passing away is a distinct loss to the public life of this country. He was a man of much culture, having a very wide acquaintance with English literature, and altogether he was a most interesting personality. I am sure all the members of the House will join with me in an expression of profound sympathy to all the members of his family.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is with as much regret as that of my right hon. friend that I learned of the sudden death of Colonel Smith. To me, personally, who am now one of the oldest members of this House, the death of Colonel Smith causes me very keen sorrow. Too much praise cannot be given to our late friend. As every hon. member knows, he was one of the best servants we ever had. He was a man of the strictest integrity, of the highest sense of honour, and of unfailing courtesy. It is not too much to say that he had endeared himself to every member of the House who had anything to do with the management of public business.

THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

RETIREMENT OF DR. FLINT, WHO BY RESOLUTION OF THE HOUSE IS ACCORDED THE PRIVILEGE OF A SEAT AT THE TABLE ON OCCASIONS OF CEREMONY.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: An intimation has been already conveyed to the House that the Clerk of the House purposes retiring from the duties of his office, which he has discharged for some fifteen years. Previous to his acceptance of the office which he now holds, Dr. Flint had a distinguished career in Parliament and in the public life of the country, and since he undertook the responsibilities of the important office of Clerk of the House, all of the members who have come in contact with him have appreciated the ability, zeal, and industry which he has uniformly displayed in the discharge of his duties.

I desire to express my own personal recognition of his uniform courtesy and his unfailing attention to all matters which I have had to bring to his notice in the ten years which I served as leader of the Opposition, and in the six years which I have had imposed upon me the responsibilities of First Minister.

I feel perfectly confident that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will join with me in proposing a resolution which I am sure will meet with universal acceptance by all the members of this House. It is my privilege to move, seconded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

That in view of the long and faithful services of Doctor Thomas B. Flint, Clerk of the House of Commons, he be continued after his retirement an honorary officer of this House, and that he be allowed the entree of the House of Commons and a seat at the Table on occasions of ceremony.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we are to lose the services of Doctor Flint, I second this motion with very great pleasure. I join cordially in everything that has been said by my right hon. friend in appreciation of the services of Doctor Flint, and I am sure that in his remarks he only expressed what is felt by everybody. Doctor Flint has been not only attentive but indefatigable in the discharge of his duties towards both parties in this House. As an old personal friend, I regret more than I can say that the condition of his health forces him to the relinquishment of the duties he has so well performed. I am sure that I reflect the feelings of all when I express the hope that his health may be restored, and that he may long be spared to move amongst us.

THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

CANDIDATES FOR THE HOUSE OF COMMONS SERVING ON TRIBUNALS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): May I be permitted to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to something which may not have been intended in the last revision of the Franchise Act. Paragraph (g) of section 70 of the Dominion Elections Act provides that:

Every person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada at the nomination of the Crown or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada, —shall be debarred from offering himself as a candidate for the Federal House. By the Act of 1915 to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act it is provided that serving in the naval and military forces of Canada and receiving emolument therefor shall not render a man ineligible as a member of the House of Commons. Now the question arises whether under the last revision of the Franchise Act any member or candidate to the House of Commons would be disqualified if he accepted a position on any of the tribunals and received his expenses therefor. I think that point ought to be taken into consideration, and the Act amended so as not to disqualify any person undertaking that work.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My impression is that there is nothing in the Dominion Elections Acts which affects the matter one way or the other. The statute to which my hon. friend alludes is the one relating to the Senate and the House of Commons. Therefore, I would not consider that any legislation passed at this session has any bearing upon the question which my hon. friend has raised. However, his observations will appear in Hansard, and I shall direct the attention of the law officers of the Crown to the point which has been raised, and if there has been any omission or oversight it could probably be corrected under the War Measures Act, after consultation with my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

POLLING DIVISIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): My attention has been called to the fact that under section 27, Part 1 of the Dominion Elections Act, the federal authorities had power to divide the constituencies of British Columbia into polling divisions. Part 1 of the Dominion Elections Act is now suspended, and it has been suggested to me that there is no power vested in any authority to divide British Columbia into polling divisions. I mention this to the Secretary of State now because it may be important, and it will give him an opportunity of looking into the matter.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Secretary of State): As I understand it, by the War-Time Elections Act, it is made the duty of every returning officer to divide his constituency into geographical polling divisions. That applies everywhere throughout Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: Would it apply to a province like New Brunswick or Nova Scotia where, by statute, the country is already divided into polling divisions?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act covers the point clearly, I think. My recollection is that the discretion of the returning officer is exercisable only in the western provinces. I do not know whether it is exercisable in New Brunswick or not, but I do know that the returning officer is directed in every case to utilize the polling divisions already established, unless for some reason they cannot be utilized.

Mr. CARVELL: That was my view of it, but I wanted to have the opinion of the Secretary of State on Hansard. I did not imagine the returning officer would have the right to interfere with polling divisions in provinces like New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

FEMALE ENUMERATORS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HERBERT AMES (St. Antoine): Is there anything in the War-Time Elections Act to prevent women from being appointed as enumerators?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It raises the old question whether she is a person.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that the section relating to enumerators used any particular word, but whether it does or not, I do not hesitate to give the opinion—I know that it is generally unwise to give legal opinions on cross-examination in the House of Commons, but I feel sure of my ground in this case—that it would be quite within the law to appoint a woman as enumerator.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE SENATE CONCURRED IN AFTER FURTHER AMENDMENT.

The House proceeded to the consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 133, The War-time Elections Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, a number of amendments of a more or less important character have been made by the Senate to this Bill. I understand that so far as those amendments are concerned they are not likely to be of a controversial nature, provided the motion which I am now about to make should commend itself to the judgment of the House. There has been a conference with respect to those amendments between gentlemen on both sides of the House, and as the result of those conferences I now beg to move, seconded by Hon. Mr. Meighen:

That the Senate amendments to Bill No. 133 be concurred in, subject to amendment of such amendments as follow:

(a) By striking out of paragraph 2 of subsection 5 of the new section 65A, provided by said Bill, the word "made" and inserting instead in each case the word "completed" as said word appears in lines 19 and 21 of page 1162 of Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons.

(b) By striking out of said paragraph 2 of said subsection 5 of section 65A provided by said Bill the words "except the issuance in any necessary case of a certificate in form W3 under paragraph (g) of section 67," which words appear in the 33rd, 34th and 35th lines of said Votes and Proceedings.

I shall ask the Secreary of State to make any explanation that may be desired of the other amendments. So far as these were concerned, they were brought to my attention this morning by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and by my colleague from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I think there is very good reason for the amendment because, as was pointed out to me the use of the word "completed" gives a definite date, whereas the use of the word "made" does not give a precisely definite date under the law of Nova Scotia in respect of which this amendment is made. In regard to the other amendment, it was represented to me by the hon. gentlemen I have mentioned that, under the special provisions which are made for the province of Nova Scotia, it is neither desirable nor necessary that there should be any further action by the enumerators. I concur in that view. The result of that would be that those lists having been revised under judicial sanction will stand and the enumerator will have no further duty to perform with regard to them. It seemed to me that amendment was a reasonable one, and, therefore, after the conference to which I have alluded, I thought we might accept the amendments made by the Senate, with the further amendments that are embodied in the resolution I have just proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not rise to a point of order, but I would like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House, to the fact that whenever an amendment is brought from the Senate to be concurred in by this House, the practice has been not to take it into consideration the day it is brought down. I will not raise the point to-day, as apparently there has been an understanding between the two sides of the House.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: While the Senate amendments to the War Franchise Act were the subject of conference between hon. gentlemen on each side of the House, yet it was expressly understood that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House attending the conference were not to be understood as concurring in the amendments in principle. I desire to address the House just briefly in respect of those amendments. I shall not take up much time, because I understand the House is to prorogue very shortly. It is unseemly, as well as unjust, that when we are momentarily expecting the serjeant-at-arms of the Senate to knock at the doors of this chamber, commanding hon. gentlemen to attend as a body in the Senate to hear Parliament prorogue, and practically dissolve, that we should be asked to consider an amendment to this Bill which vitally affects the franchise system of one province. I do not think such a thing has ever been done before. The franchise has always been regarded very solemnly, and when additions or amendments were made thereto ample time would be given to their consideration. It is a very delicate matter, indeed, to attempt changes in the franchise law of any country at any time, but it is most objectionable to attempt amendments to that important part of our laws in the closing days of a session, and particularly when these amendments have been proposed in the Senate, and not in this chamber under the auspices of the Government. I want to protest against this legislation. I say it is in principle abominable, as were the motives which prompted its introduction. The whole thing is outrageous and unnecessary, and, besides, it is a cruel exercise of the powers of the majority of this Parliament. I understand quite well, as do all hon. members upon this side of the House, that the Government can well pass this legislation in a very few hours by resorting to the closure rule. The main part of the Bill passed this chamber under closure, and consequently all hon. gentlemen on this side of the House can now do is to register their solemn protest against the Senate amendment.

I do not assent to the proposition that this Bill is being amended for the purpose of correcting defects in the franchise law of Nova Scotia. The motive behind the introduction of the amendment must have been absolutely and purely a political one. The majority of this Parliament can only seek and desire some political advantage, else this amendment would not have been introduced in the way it was.

Had the Government been desirous of amending the Nova Scotia Franchise Act, as is virtually now proposed it would have introduced these provisions into the Bill upon its second reading. If they had that in mind then, probably they decided that it would be tactically preferable to attempt to amend the Bill in the Senate and not in the House of Commons. If that is the position, it is an objectionable one. If it was, in the judgment of the Government, desirable, for the purposes of the next general election, to establish a new Federal Franchise law for Nova Scotia, they should have introduced the amendment in this House. If that was not their desire, then the only other inference is that they succumbed to the solicitations of members from Nova Scotia supporting the Government and unwillingly capitulated to them. I consider this amendment is Government legislation, notwithstanding the fact that it reaches us at this moment in the shape of an amendment proposed by the Senate.

If they were proposing this amendment for the purpose of establishing a new Federal Franchise Act applicable to all provinces, there might be something to say in favour of it. But it is unfair and unjust at this stage of the session to attempt to establish just for one province a Federal Franchise Act—for that is what this amendment means. It is true that the War-time Elections Act deals very considerably with the franchise systems of the several provinces, but a reason was given in each case for any interference with any of the provincial franchise systems. When the War-time Elections Act was being introduced by the Secretary of State he said—Hansard, page 5726:

> By this Act the machinery which heretofore has been applicable only to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan is made applicable to all those provinces where the present lists are such that new lists are necessary; namely to the four western provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and as well to Prince Edward Island. It was impossible to use any lists to be found in those provinces and consequently the machinery which has been in force for twelve years as to the provision of lists in Alberta and Saskatchewan is made applicable to the other three provinces.

Therefore, in so far as the franchise laws of the four western provinces and Prince Edward Island are concerned, the interference is justified upon the ground that in those provinces there were no lists available which could be used in the forthcoming election. That may or may not have been a good reason, but at least it was a pretence of some justification for the legislation in so far as these other provinces are affected. On that point the Secretary of State spoke as follows:

The lists so made up of male voters all judicially revised in Ontario and Quebec and revised by the provincial methods in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are by this Bill adopted, so far as they go. The only requirement as to them is to add such of the women as by this Bill are to be entitled to vote and to substract such of the men, if any, as, by reason of alienage, should not be entitled to vote. This is done by means of a system of enumeration similar to that adopted in the other provinces. The names of women are enumerated along the lines of the present Ontario Act. I am not speaking now of the cities of Ontario; I shall ask hon. members to keep the cities of Ontario until I get through with the counties of Ontario and with the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. As regards these latter the lists are adopted and the enumeration only goes to the adding of the names of the additional women now entitled to vote and to the striking off of those who by reason of alienage, and nothing else, are disentitled to vote. That is the province and duty of the registrars or enumerators, whatever you call them, and that alone.

When the Secretary of State introduced the War-time Elections Act he expressly stated that it was not the intention of the Government, by the Bill, to interfere in the slightest degree with the lists for Nova Scotia as provincially made except in so far as they had to be amended for the purpose of adding women qualified under that Bill and striking off the names of aliens who were disqualified under the Bill. When the Bill was presented to the House we had the assurance of the Government that there was no intention of departing from the lists of Nova Scotia prepared under provincial legislation save in the ways I have stated. That being the policy of the Government on that occasion, the Secretary of State should ask this House to decline to accept the amendment offered by the Senate. The Government, the other day very unwillingly expressed their assent to the amendment made to the Income Tax Bill by the Senate. They took great care to have it recorded in the proceedings of this House that, while they were accepting the amendment of the Senate in that respect, it should not be construed as an acknowledgment of the power and jurisdiction of the Senate to amend such a Bill. The War-time Elections Act is just as important as the Income Tax Bill. If the Government propose accepting this amendment of the Senate, they should take care to state in the proceedings of the House that they do not acknowledge this as within the competence or jurisdiction of the Senate. Further, I am surprised that the Secretary of State intends, without a protest to submit to the amendment proposed by the Senate in direct opposition to the Bill as proposed by him on its second reading.

There is, in my judgment, only one explanation of it, and that is that the Government were a party to the play that this amendment would not be offered in this Chamber when the Bill was in progress on its second reading or in committee. It was reserved for amendment in this regard in the other Chamber where it was supposed that such an amendment might be more safely attempted. I protest, as I believe the electors of my province will protest, against singling out one province of the Confederation and establishing there a Federal Franchise Act, which is not done in any other province. The electoral list in New Brunswick which will be used at the forthcoming election was prepared under a provincial law, and revised by officers appointed by the municipal authorities or by the provincial Government of that province, and still no effort is made to amend the Bill in so far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned. I ask the members of the Government, why was that done? Can there be any answer? The ground is advanced that the appeal work in connection with the revision of the lists in Nova Scotia is done by the sheriff and not by a judge. But the lists in New Brunswick are not finally revised by any judicial body; there is no appeal of any kind there; the appeal board is constituted by municipal authority acting jointly with the Government;—as, I understand it, the municipal authorities appoint two of a board of three and the Government appoint the remaining member. If this amendment was based upon any principle it would have been been made applicable to every province of this Dominion: the Government would have attempted the establishment of a Federal Franchise Act applicable to every province of Canada. At least it would surely have been applied to the province of New Brunswick and to other provinces where there is not, in whole or in part, something approaching a judicial revision of the list. Only one inference can be drawn; that is that this amendment was designed for the purpose of gaining a political advantage in the province of Nova Scotia, and why that one province should be singled out for this purpose is something I cannot understand. I register my protest against it. I say we have a system of revision of lists in Nova Scotia that is as good as that in any other province, if not better. That revision was last completed in March last. As hon. gentlemen know, it requires a great deal of labour on the part of members of Parliament and of political organizations to obtain a revision of voters' lists annually. That list in Nova Scotia was completed but a few months ago. Nobody in my province was complaining about the revision. I venture to say that no protest or complaint was lodged with the Government by any responsible person living in my province against that revision. I say that this amendment does not originate from anybody except the members from my province supporting the Government, and their only motive in suggesting and supporting such an amendment in the Senate and its passage through this House is a political one. In December next we shall be obliged to commence a revision of our lists again, and concurrently with the forthcoming election members of Parliament in my province will be obliged to undergo the expense, anxiety and labour of carrying on a revision of the lists, something which has never occurred before. Where the system of electoral revision by enumerators is in vogue and where that has been the practice and the established system, it may not be so objectionable; but it is objectionable to my province, and I believe that will be the judgment of everybody in it, both Liberal and Conservative. Therefore I say it entails an unnecessary amount of labour and expense upon everybody, after having undergone, just two or three months ago, a revision of our lists, to be obliged to undergo the same thing in the course of another month or two. And what for? Just to gratify the unwholesome, the unjust, desires of some hon. gentlemen opposite. Because they think they can gain some personal and political advantage in the forthcoming election we must go through a vast amount of work and incur a considerable expense. In the end very few names will be added to the electoral lists outside of women, and very few will be struck off outside of those struck off for reason of alienage. I venture the prediction that when this Bill becomes law and the revision takes place under this amendment, hon. gentlemen opposite who are responsible for this amendment will regret that they ever promoted such legislation. Further than that, I say that it adds to the burdens placed upon candidates in this election. There is that immense soldiers' vote to be taken care of, which requires a vast amount of organization and expense on the part of all candidates. Then we have the enfranchisement of women voters in all the provinces, and that entails vast labour and expense. One would think that that would be sufficient additional burden to throw upon candidates and party organizations in this election, without introducing this further complication at this particular moment.

I understand that this legislation is justified upon the ground that in Nova Scotia the appeal from the work of the revisers is to the sheriffs, who are political officers appointed by the Government of Nova Scotia. Complaint is made that the appeal should be heard by a judicial officer and not by such an officer as a sheriff. At least I have heard that presented as a justification for this amendment. I say it is not a sound reason and will not be received as such in the province of Nova Scotia by any considerable number on either side of politics. Our lists are prepared by municipal officers who are called revisers. These revisers are appointed by the municipal councils or county councils, because the municipality practically corresponds geographically with our county lines. In some of the counties the majorities are Conservative; in other counties, it is true, the majority in the municipal council may be Liberal. Three or four years ago the majority of the county councils of my province were Conservative. In the constituency which I represent, the majority of the municipal council are Conservative. In the counties of Guysborough and Antigonisih the majorities are Conservative and the lists are made up by officers appointed by these people. I have had more or less to do necessarily during the last twenty years in connection with the revision of lists, and I do give it to the House as my opinion and my judgment that our franchise system is satisfactory to everybody in our province. I do not say you will not find complaints. No franchise system is capable of construction which would be satisfactory to every person. Naturally, some person of doubtful qualification or without qualification seeks enfranchisement and is refused. He complains and is dissatisfied, as probably would be the candidate seeking the enrolment of that particular name. That, however, does not prove that the franchise system is wrong, or that it is in any respect open to objection.

With respect to appeals to the sheriff, the number of appeals in Nova Scotia in any one year is altogether a negligible quantity. I do not pretend to speak accurately, but I venture to say that in many years, particularly in years when an election is not likely to take place, there are practically no appeals. In my constituency, where there is an electoral list of over 20,000, only 25 appeals were asserted by my political friends at the revision last March, fifteen of which were allowed and ten refused. I think that 25 is as large a number of appeals as is usually asserted in any year in my constituency. In the county of Annapolis this year 28 appeals were made on both sides; probably 6,000 or 7,000 voters are enrolled in that constituency. Eleven men were struck off, seven were added, and ten were left on; that was the disposal of the 28 appeals. In the counties of Guysborough, Antigonish and Cape Breton—in the latter county the electoral list contains about 20,000 names—not an appeal was asserted last year.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Would my hon. friend like to know why appeals were not made?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know; I suppose it was because there were none to make. I should trust my hon. friend to make every appeal that he thought was possible.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The reason is that it has been found by experience that to appeal is absolutely useless.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Has my hon. friend any objection to the sheriff of Annapolis county as an appellate tribunal in this matter?

Mr. DAVIDSON: The objection I have to the sheriff in Annapolis county is that he feels constrained to take the advice of the Attorney General, who represents the county in the provincial House. That advice is very bad, and, at times, very vicious.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When was the present sheriff of Annapolis county appointed?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Two years ago.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The last revision was the first under which he acted as an appeal officer?

Mr. DAVIDSON: No.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it was the first.

Mr. DAVIDSON: It was not the first.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the present sheriff of Annapolis county, sitting as an appeal officer under our franchise Act, would deal unjustly with the appeals?

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend is aware that in 1911, when he was Attorney General of Nova Scotia, after the lists had left the revisers, the sheriff and the clerk, absolutely contrary to law, altered the list so as to make a great change in the county of Annapolis. Appeal was made to my hon. friend as Attorney General, and he instructed the sheriff by wire to remedy, in some particular instances, the grievances which he had caused. After receiving the wire the sheriff went to the Liberal member for the county, who is now Attorney General of the province. The Liberal member told him to disregard the Attorney General's wire ,and the lists stood as they were cooked.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Evidently as Attorney General I carried out the request made to me by the member for Annapolis. If he had come back to me and had shown that the sheriff of Annapolis county had disregarded my instructions, I should have punished the sheriff. However, that sheriff is dead.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend is not quite right. While my hon. friend was Attorney General I made complaint that a certain justice of the peace, a gentleman by the name of I. B. Whitman, who was an officer of the provincial Government, had forged applications for the adding of names to the list. My hon. friend merely appointed a commissioner who went down and whitewashed him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I forget the circumstances respecting this particular justice of the peace, and I shall not take up the time of the House in discussing the matter. I venture the opinion that I did what I should have done. But my hon.

friend is talking about a sheriff who is dead; I am talking about the present sheriff. I have asked my hon. friend if he has any objection to that sheriff, and he has not answered my question.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend appeals for information; I am bound to give it if it is in my power to do so. The sheriff of the county of Annapolis tries to do his duty, but he has informed me that he is obliged to take the advice of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who is the member for Annapolis in the provincial legislature. The advice that the Attorney General gives is always in favour of the Liberals and against the Conservatives. I may add that the present sheriff was appointed by the Attorney General of the province; he naturally feels under obligation to take the advice of the gentleman who appointed him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I direct the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that we have my hon. friend's recommendation of the sheriff of Annapolis county as revising officer. As I pointed out, last March only 28 appeals were asserted in the county, to an officer who, as the member for Annapolis says, endeavours to do justice. A few moments ago he said that the reason why more appeals were not asserted was because he had not faith in the sheriff as revising officer. Now he admits that this officer is a just man, and anxious to deal fairly in these matters. I assume, therefore, that the reason why not more than 28 appeals were asserted in the county was that no more could have been made; that there was no necessity of making any more.

I register my protest against this amendment. It will entail an enormous amount of work upon the candidates at the next election. It is an unnecessary provision, because only a few months ago, a revision of the lists in Nova Scotia was completed. No one, either Conservative or Liberal, complained about that revision. The list was made up by municipal officers, as has been customary; and not many complaints have been made concerning the work done by these municipal officers as revisers. Consequently, few appeals are ever made to the sheriffs. I know that it is useless to protest this afternoon against this legislation. I am surprised at some members of the Government who sit here and consent to the passage of the amendment. I am surprised to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who strives for high ideals in public affairs—or pretends to—sitting idly by and assenting to an amendment to this legislation which seeks to establish a Dominion Franchise Act for one province alone. I object to the motives which prompt the introduction of this amendment.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will my hon. friend pardon me for a moment?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of speaking in a moment. As I have said, I realize how useless it is for one to protest this afternoon against this legislation. But I do want to register my protest against it. There will come a time when we shall have an opportunity of appealing to the sovereign power in the country, the people. We shall appeal to the people of my province against this iniquitous legislation. I feel sure that they will not approve the miserable, partisan course pursued by some members of the House in seeking at this stage to introduce an amendment into what is already a very cumbersome piece of legislation, the War-Time Elections Act—an action taken purely for base political and partisan purposes. We will take our appeal, Mr. Speaker, from this House to Philippi, and we will meet hon. gentlemen there on this issue.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Secretary of State): The House will note that, while the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) used the worst language and adjectives in his vocabulary in describing this amendment of the Senate, he did not, in the course of an address lasting three-quarters of an hour, give to the House the least indication of what the amendment was. No word of his will afford the least illumination to any hon. member of the House as to the nature of the amendment or what change it made. He gave the impression that, in some way, Nova Scotia was singled out and some peculiar method of list preparation applied to that province at the dictation of the Government in the Senate, which peculiar method was embodied in the amendment now before this House. which the hon. member discussed this afternoon, is an amendment prepared by his own side of the House and adopted by ourselves. I know, while that is the truth, it is not the whole truth, and I purpose giving the whole truth. The Bill introduced by the Government into this House provided, speaking broadly, two methods of list preparation. The one method applied to the four western provinces and Prince Edward Island and that method was, in the main, the method heretofore obtaining in Alberta and Saskatchewan for twelve years gone by. The other method applied to the other four provinces of Canada, of which Nova Scotia was one. Why was the division made?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why did you change your mind?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will get to that very soon. My mind is just where it always has been. I would like, in the first place, to get some of the facts before Parliament because the hon. gentleman was very short on facts and strong on adjectives. The four provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had lists that were in force and that could be utilized. There is no question about that. Ontario, with the exception of the cities, had a list that could be utilized, although it was not altogether a desirable list, because, in some parts, that list is not as new as it should be. Consequently, in those four provinces it was proposed, in the original Bill, that those lists, so far as they went, should be used, and that the power of the enumerators should extend only to adding the names of women voters to the list and striking out the names of alien enemy voters and conscientious objectors. In the other five provinces the lists could not be used, for the reason that all the women were included in the lists. As four of those provinces were of the same nature and geographical character as Saskatchewan and Alberta, there was no reason at all to apprehend that the method which had heretofore been adopted and carried out in Saskatchewan and Alberta would not work out in the other three provinces as well. We set out to adopt, so far as they could be adopted, the lists in the four provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In that form the Bill went through this House. After the Government brought down its measure and after the measure was explained to Parliament, hon. members from Nova Scotia took the ground that Nova Scotia should not be included in the same category as Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, for this reason: whereas in Ontario they had a judicial revision of the lists under which all parties got fair treatment, which is always presumed to flow from the judges of this country, and whereas the same thing exactly obtained in Quebec, on the contrary, in the provinces of New Brunswick and Saskatchewan that did not obtain, and there was no judicial revision whatever. In the discussion of the measure as it proceeded then, because my hon. friends on this side did not have an opportunity of advancing their amendment or proposal in this House before the Bill passed——

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because hon. gentlemen opposite took up all the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And because furthermore, we were driven close to the end of this session and dangerously close to the seventh day of October in order to enable us to get this legislation through the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) not remember that, on the third reading, my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) waited for an hour and a half for the conclusion of the debate in order to have an opportunity of moving another amendment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite true.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The members on the other side of the House were blocking the debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: An hour and a half was taken up by hon. gentlemen on this side before the conclusion of the debate on the third reading. But if my hon. friend's amendment had been agreed to, what would that have meant? We should have had to move to go back into committee on the Bill, and when we got back into committee, several days would have elapsed before the Bill could be sent to the Senate. To come to the point, while New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had no judicial revision New Brunswick, as the matter came out in the discussion, was in a different position from Nova Scotia, because in New Brunswick the lists were made up by municipal officers and there was no revision of those lists and no final say on those lists on the part of any single officer of any party. Those lists were made up by officials who were not the officials of any single party in this House.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the Solicitor General permit me to correct him? Because he is in error, and I know he would not want to be in error. In New Brunswick the final say as to the lists on which we shall have to vote, rests in the hands of a prominent Conservative in every case appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, and no list was effective unless it was signed by that man as the chairman of the board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The lists were made up by one official appointed by the provincial government and two officials who are members of the county council. There has to be a majority of those three men.

Mr. CARVELL: That is where the minister is wrong. No list is of any value unless it is signed by the political chairman appointed by the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend knows that any list signed by the chairman is of no value unless it has the approval of at least one of the other two men.

Mr. CARVELL: Unless it is signed by the chairman it is of no value. There is another provision, that the list might be made up by the secretary-treasurer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the list is approved by the other two, the chairman must sign it.

Mr. CARVELL: That is just what he does not do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could he not be made to do so by mandamus?

Mr. CARVELL: There is a special provision in the law that a list is of no effect unless it is signed by the chairman of the board, and that is the end of the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the majority of the board says: That is the list, cannot the chairman be compelled to sign it?

Mr. CARVELL: No. There is another provision made—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know what my hon. friend is driving at. It is not the list until it is signed.

Mr. CARVELL: There is another official altogether. The secretary-treasurer of the county makes up a list after that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The acts of those men are official acts, and they must sign them, if the majority of the board say so.

Mr. CARVELL: That is not so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the whole law of New Brunswick must be farcical.

Mr. CARVELL: It is farcical.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend the other day said the lists were all right.

Mr. CARVELL: I would rather take those partisan lists than the lists your enumerators will make over for us.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is cornered now. It would be a farcical procedure to appoint two members of a board and say to them: Your work does not count, the list is only the list when it is signed by the chairman.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the fact anyway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I undertake to say it is not the fact, because that would be a spurious law for any province to make.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On what date did the Government decide to accede to the request made by the members for Nova Scotia on this side of the House, and secure this amendment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no formal decision of the Government at all until today, when we are faced with this amendment from the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member told the House a moment ago that the reason this amendment was not introduced on the second reading or in the committee was that the Government did not get a chance because we on this side of the House occupied all the time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the reason the hon. gentleman who intended to propose it did not get it in. They might have done so at the very last moment, but there was no time at all in which to give it fair discussion. Now we are coming to the serious point of this debate, the point to which my hon. friend from Halifax does not want us to come. In the province of Nova Scotia, distinguished from every province of Canada, they have a system of making up the lists which, considered in itself—that is so far as the making up only of the lists is concerned—is fair enough, I presume. In that province the lists are made up by county council officials, at all events not appointees of the provincial government or of this Government. But the lists are revised on appeal before an appointee of the provincial government, a partisan official.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is wrong. The sheriff does not revise the lists; he is not called a reviser. The revisers under our statute are the municipal officers appointed to do that work. The sheriff simply hears the appeals; that and nothing more.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not care what you call it; he has the right to strike any name off the list.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Only on appeal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has the final say as to whose name shall be struck off and whose name shall remain on. What would hon. gentlemen say if we proposed to this House a Bill that gave an official of this Government the final say as to whether any man should go on the list, or any man be struck off? That does not obtain under this Bill in any province, nor anything like it. But that was the condition of affairs in Nova Scotia. The official who had the final say was an official appointed by the provincial government, and at the mercy from day to day of the provincial government. That was the complaint urged against this measure on behalf of members who knew conditions in Nova Scotia, and that was the complaint urged in the Senate by members representing the province of Nova Scotia in that House. As a consequence, an amendment was introduced in the Senate, but it was not at all to the effect of the amendment that is now brought down into this House. The amendment proposed in the Senate did not single out Nova Scotia in any way whatever. It simply put the province of Nova Scotia in the same category as the four western provinces of Canada and the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The amendment, as introduced in the Senate, included New Brunswick as well, but at the request of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and other Liberal members from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick was dropped from the amendment.

Mr. CARVELL: I never asked the Senate or anybody else to drop New Brunswick from the amendment. I knew nothing about it, except that I was prepared to fight it to the bitter end, if it came here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was originally introduced in that form, and finally, at the request of members on the other side of the House in the Senate, New Brunswick was dropped. I do not know whether the hon. member for Carleton had anything to do with it or not. The amendment, however, as introduced in the Senate, did not single out Nova Scotia. It simply put the province of Nova Scotia in exactly the same position as the four western provinces of Canada and Prince Edward Island; it did that, and nothing more, and nothing less. In a word, it put the province of Nova Scotia in exactly the same position that the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have been in ever since they were provinces, ever since hon. gentlemen opposite created those provinces and created the machinery in those provinces under which elections are held. That was the great crime we were committing, and it was against that sin that hon. gentlemen opposite rose in protest, and proposed their method of making the lists. They would not tolerate that in the province of Nova Scotia the same principles of making the lists should obtain which they had themselves imposed twelve years before in regard to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. That is all that we propose, and not even that. We proposed safeguards in Alberta and Saskatchewan which never obtained before, and which, though hon. gentlemen complain of them, they did not want to have removed at all. We had to do without those safeguards twelve years ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite were not satisfied to have Nova Scotia put in the same category as the four western provinces and Prince Edward Island, and they rose in protest. At the conference threats were made. They would not stand for Nova Scotia being put in the same class with the four western provinces, even under the safeguards then existing, and unless Nova Scotia was put back where it was, and the final say rested with the sheriff as of yore instead of there being the judicial revision that obtained in the four western provinces, they threatened to do so and so. However, a proposal was made by way of amendment to the amendment in the Senate, along the lines of the amendment which is now embodied in the Votes and Proceedings, and comes down to this House, which in principle was the same as the amendment to the amendment, but worked out so as to make it fit in with the rest of the Act as to time. It did not differ in principle, however, in any way whatever. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in association with their friends in the Senate, would rather have had the Bill just as it went to the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We would have had none at all if we could have helped it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They would have had no women voters and would have struck off no conscientious objectors, and no aliens. It is the alien vote they have been so solicitious about for many months now in this House. I know that. But rather than be put in the same class with the four western provinces they proposed the machinery that is now embodied in the amendment which comes from the Senate to the Commons. That is the origin of this amendment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I deny that statement. The amendment now before the House originated with hon. gentlemen opposite. It is true there was a compromise by which we were represented at the conference endeavouring to make the Bill as unobjectionable as possible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the point. Does not the hon. gentleman admit that the amendment to the amendment in the Senate was moved by an hon. gentleman on the Opposition side of the Senate? That is what is now embodied here.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There were many conferences at which both sides were represented, so that it cannot be truthfully said that the amendment was the work of any one person, or of any one party. I am surprised that my hon. friend refers to this at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman referred to it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I referred to it, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what took place prior to the proposal of the amendment to the amendment. If there were conferences prior to that, I know nothing about them. But after the proposal of the amendment to the amendment there were many conferences, and that amendment to the amendment finally resulted in what is now before the House of Commons of Canada brought down from the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not object to the statement put in that way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the origin of the legislation, be it good or be it bad. What is this legislation? What is it that all this disputing is about, and to which objection is taken? This legislation, described shortly, has this effect. It places the province of Nova Scotia in a position very similar, though not altogether the same, as the cities in the province of Ontario—very similar, let me repeat, to the cities in the province of Ontario. It provides that the list that are now in force there, shall be the basis of the lists that shall be made by the enumerators as the lists of that province. But those lists, so made up by the enumerators, go before the courts of that province—and I shall define the courts in a moment—for revision prior to the election.

Judicial revision in that province prior to the election is the principle of the amendment to which hon. gentlemen object. Does it sound very strong logic in the mouth of the hon. member for Halifax to say: "I protest against the system embodied in this amendment, which means judicial revision of the lists—or, as he calls it, a judicial appeal of the lists—prior to the elections, and instead of that I want appeal of the lists to stand as they are now, resting in the sheriffs alone"? What this amendment provides is in reality the substituting of the county court judiciary of the province of Nova Scotia for the sheriffs of Nova Scotia. That is what my hon. friend protests against. The women are added, and the aliens and others are struck off who are shown to have had no right to go on at the time the lists were made, any others are added who have the right to go on. The lists then come before the judges of Nova Scotia and are revised by them prior to election day. This was not made more general in this Act, because it was felt that in some rural parts of the country in particular, and in very many parts of the country not altogether rural, judicial revision was in its purest form an absolute impossibility if we were to have the election in any reasonable time. Therefore the method was confined to the province of Nova Scotia. It was suggested that to get over the difficulty the judges should do the work so far as they could, but that they should have the privilege of naming barristers of a certain number of years' standing to conduct the revisions in other parts where they could not act, so that while the judges do not do it all themselves it is done by others named by the judges and in no way named by or appertaining to the party in power. That is the system of judicial revision which will obtain under this amendment in the province of Nova Scotia, and that is the system which we submit to the House as preferable to the system of sheriff revision which has obtained in days gone by. It is true, it was proposed to adopt lists that could be adopted at all, in so far as those lists were completed, and on that principle I submitted the Bill to the House including the Nova Scotia lists as adopted. When those matters were represented to us as they were, that Nova Scotia was not in the same position even as New Brunswick and in a much different position from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec where there was full and complete judicial revision, it was not deemed unfair that that province should be given the advantage of judicial revision in place of sheriff revision. That is the purpose of this amendment and it has no other purpose. While hon. gentlemen opposite have a perfect right to object to the amendment, still I think the public of this country will come to the conclusion that an improvement has been made in the Act, and that there is no very great sincerity on the part of hon. members in arguing against a judicial revision in place of a sheriff revision in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Before this measure is finally dealt with I wish to be allowed to enter my protest. I regard this move as a piece of partisan injustice, and I think it will be so regarded by every fair-minded man in the province of Nova Scotia. It is resorted to absolutely without any excuse. The Secretary of State has drawn attention to the fact that under this proposal he has substituted a judicial revision by the county court judges for the revision formerly carried on by the sheriffs, but he does not deal with the question that he is substituting partisan officers to make the lists in the first place, instead of the revisers appointed by the county council. We have in the province of Nova Scotia, as you know, Mr. Speaker, a system which has existed for the last thirty-eight years, and has given complete satisfaction to the people of the province.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It has been the boast of the Conservative party of the province of Nova Scotia that they originated the Municipal Council Act.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Who introduced politics into the municipal councils?

Mr. SINCLAIR: This principle is found in the original Act, which was passed by the Holmes-Thompson Government in 1879, and which gave to the province of Nova Scotia municipal government for the first time.

Mr. McCURDY: If the system about which the hon. gentleman speaks has been so satisfactory in the province of Nova Scotia for all these years, will he tell the House why it was that the Attorney General of that province, who is the present junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) introduced an amending Act in the Nova Scotia Legislature in 1909, providing that there should be judicial review in that province, and why, after introducing that Act, and giving it the first reading, he did not go any further with it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is very easy for my hon. friend (Mr. McCurdy) to ask the hon. member from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) that question, because he knows my hon. friend from Guysborough cannot answer it. I do not recall all the provisions of the Bill I introduced in the legislature of Nova Scotia, but the main idea was to introduce manhood suffrage. Our qualification is exceedingly low now, and I endeavoured to establish the principle of manhood suffrage and registration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I quite understand there are people in Nova Scotia who advocate a judicial revision, and I am not putting myself against the proposal, but I will make the statement that there has not been any injustice done in the province of Nova Scotia so far as the sheriffs are concerned. The responsible party is not the sheriff, but the municipal council. Each county is divided up into polling districts, a group of polling districts is called a revisal district, and the municipal councillor practically appoints the reviser for his polling division. He stands up in the presence of his colleagues in the council and proposes his man as reviser for that district. If he proposes a man who is not regarded as straight and honest, his proposal will not be accepted. The practice has been so satisfactory in Nova Scotia that it is a rare thing to have an appeal. Since this proposed change was suggested, I telegraphed to my county. I received an answer yesterday from the municipal district of St. Mary's to the effect that there had not been an appeal for many years against the lists made by the revising officers. I telegraphed to the other municipality, Guysborough, and I am informed that the year before last there were no appeals; last year there were twelve. In the county of Antigonish, which is not part of the constituency yet, but which I hope to represent, there were no appeals last year or the year before. No one will say the reason why there were no appeals was that they did not expect to get justice from the sheriffs. The reason was because every one was perfectly satisfied with the lists made by the revisers. The Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, Hon. George H. Murray, is well known throughout Canada as a candid and truthful man. It appears he has heard of this measure going through the House. I have a message sent by him to an hon. member of this House, in which he says:

> I have a general knowledge of the revision of the provincial lists in the province of Nova Scotia for a period of twenty-five years, and I have no knowledge of any objection from either of the political parties to the fairness of the decisions of the sheriffs as court of appeal. I have consulted other officials of the Government, and they are all of opinion that our sheriffs have always acted independently and without political prejudice. Our sheriffs hold office during good behaviour. I would regard a return to the preparation of lists by partisan temporary officials on the eve of a pending election as likely to develop a great amount of bitter feeling. You must understand that our provincial system provides for every measure of publicity by the posting of lists in public places, and ample opportunity is given both parties for every reasonable objection.

That, Sir, is the statement of the Premier of Nova Scotia who is known by every hon. member on both sides of this House to be an honourable and fair man and one who knows what he is talking about. The municipal councils are the responsible bodies and we propose to pass an Act which will cast a reflection not only upon the sheriffs but upon every municipal council in Nova Scotia. The conduct of the sheriffs has been been criticised by hon. gentlemen who have spoken but the Prime Minister himself has given a certificate of character to the late sheriff of Halifax, Mr. Donald Archibald. He said that he regarded him as a fair man. He was for many years sheriff of that county. He also stated the other day that the present sheriff of Halifax was regarded as a fair man so there has been no complaint in Halifax. I can say the same thing for the sheriff of Pictou There is no man who knows him who would venture to say that he would be guilty of any unfairness in regard to the revision of the lists. The same can be said of the sheriffs of Antigonish, Guysborough and Colchester. These are the sheriffs whom I know best. The statement that this amendment becomes necessary in order to avoid injustice on the part of the sheriffs of Nova Scotia is not well founded and cannot be supported by evidence.

Why does the Secretary of State depart from the policy that he laid down when this Bill was introduced? We all understood that the policy of the Government with regard to the four provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec was that the existing lists were to hold and that no changes were to be made except those that were necessary to add the names of female relatives of soldiers and to strike off the names of aliens. That was the policy laid down by the Secretary of State for those four provinces. What justification can there be for singling out the province of Nova Scotia and adopting a different system. The only possible explanation is that it was done for the sake of obtaining a partisan advantage for the Conservative side. This is what the Secretary of State said when introducing the Bill:

[Mr. Sinclair.]

The lists so made up of male voters all judicially revised in Ontario and Quebec and revised by the provincial methods in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are by this Bill adopted, so far as they go. The only requirement as to them is to add such of the women as by this Bill are to be entitled to vote and to substract such of the men, if any, as, by reason of alienage, should not be entitled to vote.

Then he goes on to say:

As regards these latter the lists are adopted and the enumeration only goes to the adding of the names of the additional women now entitled to vote and to the striking off of those who by reason of alienage, and nothing else, are disentitled to vote. That is the province and duty of the registrars or enumerators, whatever you call them, and that alone.

Why was not that principle followed out in Nova Scotia? It was simply for the reason that the Nova Scotia members of the Conservative side asked that this change be made in order to load the dice and gain a partisan advantage. That is the only reason that can be given. Under the provincial law of Nova Scotia practically every man who is entitled to a vote becomes an elector. The requirements are very low. The ownership of $150 worth of real estate entitles a man to vote. If he earns $250 he is entitled to be placed on the register as an income voter. If he owns a farm worth $600 he can qualify himself and four sons. Practically every man in Nova Scotia who desires a vote has it under the existing system. The county councils are primarily responsible and they discharge the duty well.

The Government propose by this amendment to adopt a system which is altogether different. The enumerators are appointed by themselves and are practically certain to be partisans. They will all be of one stripe. You cannot have that in the county councils. County councils and revisers appointed by them are bound to be composed of men of both political parties, sometimes Conservative and sometimes Liberal. In the county which I have the honour to represent the county council happens for the last term to be Conservatives, but I have no reason to complain in regard to their action in apointing revisers for making lists. Under this proposal the partisan enumerator does not even require to be a resident of the district. A stranger who never saw the district, and who is not known to a single inhabitant in the district may be sent in to act as enumerator.

If permitted I would like to make an appeal to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is going to ask the people of Canada for re-election in a few weeks. He will issue a manifesto. In that manifesto there will be a paragraph stating that he has made every effort to obtain a Union Government. He will ask the Canadian people to cast aside all partisanship and to unite with him in helping to push forward the great enterprise that we all have so much at heart. That will no doubt be a part of his appeal to the people. But the people will ask him a question and that question will be: "Did you forget partisanship yourself?" Let me say this, Mr. Speaker: the very last act of his Administration will be regarded by every liberal and fair-minded man in Nova Scotia as a piece of extreme partisanship and it will not read very well side by side with the manifesto which my right hon. friend will issue. If I had a right to make a proposal to him it would be this: Refuse to agree to this amendment of the Senate and leave the lists in Nova Scotia alone, except to add the names of the female relatives of soldiers and to strike out the names of aliens. Say to the Senate that it is no part of their duty to interfere with the lists for election of members of the House of Commons. Let the Prime Minister say to the hon. members for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) the hon. member for Queens aud Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy) the hon. gentleman in the other chamber from Pictou Mr. John C. Douglas of Cape Breton, and all the other gentlemen who are pressing the Government in this matter that they must go back to their counties and win their elections in fair fight on the lists that are in existence now and as they have been fairly made by the municipal councils in Nova Scotia. I suppose my right hon. friend will not take my advice but it is my duty to offer it to him and it is my duty to protest with all the energy I have against this attempt to bedevil the electoral lists of my province and thereby gain a partisan advantage for the Conservative party in Nova Scotia.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Electoral Franchise Act of Nova Scotia was based upon the Municipal Incorporations Act passed in 1879 under the auspices of the only Conservative Government that ever existed in Nova Scotia since Confederation. The Holmes-Thompson Government, in the first session after its accession to office, passed the Municipal Incorporation Act which established the county councils and made provision for the appointment of revisers to prepare the voters' lists at each annual meeting of these municipal councils. These revisers are appointed according to the political complexion of the councillor representing each polling district. Every municipal council is made up of councillors of both political parties and it is a fact that no matter what may be the political complexion of the majority of the councillors a Conservative councillor always has the right to nominate his own reviser.

Mr. DAVIDSON: That is absolutely incorrect. In the county council in Annapolis, where the Liberals have a majority the Liberals appoint all the revisers and the Conservatives appoint none.

Mr. KYTE: I suppose there is no man in public life who has more information that is not true than the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson). I repeat that the revisers are appointed upon the nomination of Conservative councillors irrespective of whether the majority of the councillors is Liberal or Conservative.

That being the case, there is always a large number of Conservative revisers appointed in Nova Scotia. In the municipality of the county which I represent, there is a majority of Conservative councillors, and the majority of revisers in that county is also Conservative. In the town in which I live, the three revisers are Conservatives. They held a revision of the electoral list on the fifth of March last, and after they had heard applications involving the adding to or striking off from the list of 25 or 30 names, only one appeal was taken to the sheriff of the county. In the municipality of the county of Cape Breton, where there are some 20,000 votes, the revisers held their court on the 5th of March last, and although they considered hundreds and perhaps thousands of applications to be added to or rejected from the voters' lists, not a single appeal was taken to the sheriff of the county of Cape Breton. I do not think that even the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) will undertake to say that the people of Cape Breton, whether Liberal or Conservative, have not confidence in Mr. George B. Ingraham, sheriff of the county. It is no answer to the statement I make that no appeals were taken to the sheriff last year to say that the people had not confidence in Sheriff Ingraham.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Who would be better able to say that than Judge—

Mr. KYTE: If any person were rash enough to make that statement it would be indignantly denied by every one in Nova Scotia who knows Sheriff Ingraham. But so fair was the revision, so eminently satisfactory was the work performed by the revisers in the various municipal districts, as well as by the registrar of voters in Sydney and Glace Bay, that every person was perfectly satisfied with the revision of the lists. The same thing is true of every county in eastern Nova Scotia. I cannot undertake to say what are the conditions in western Nova Scotia, but the only criticism that has been directed against the appeals carried to sheriffs in Nova Scotia was the one case referred to by the hon. member for Annapolis. I do not know what conditions exist in Annapolis, but, judging from the choice of the electors of that county as witnessed by the present representative, I should say the electorate of that county does strange things on occasions. The point made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Meighen) that this amendment had to be added in the Senate because there was no opportunity of doing so here, cannot prevail with members of this House, who know the circumstances so well. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) read from the speech made by the Secretary of State when introducing this Bill in which he said it was proposed to adhere to the lists in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec. If, when this Bill was going through the House of Commons, it was intended by the Secretary of State or by the Prime Minister to make the changes that were afterwards made by the other body of this Parliament, surely the Secretary of State would not have committed himself to the principle that the lists in the province of Nova Scotia would prevail. The fact that the Secretary of State made that statement to the House of Commons is proof positive that no such change in the basis of the electoral lists in the province of Nova Scotia was in contemplation. The fact of the matter is that when this Bill got over to the Senate there was unusual activity on the part of certain hon. gentlemen representing constituencies in Nova Scotia who support this Government. Not only were they exercised as to the form and shape in which this franchise Bill should go back to the electors of Nova Scotia, and not only were they exercised themselves, but the assistance of certain other gentlemen who do not at the present time hold seats in this House was called upon. There was present in their conferences a gentleman prominent in public affairs in Cape Breton for some years, who has exercised a most baleful influence upon the public life of eastern Nova Scotia. That gentleman was in consultation with members supporting the Government in this House from day to day, and as a result of their combined wisdom, they came to the conclusion that the only chance they had of carrying the province of Nova Scotia was by loading the dice and imposing a franchise on the people of Nova Scotia that would give them an undue advantage. There is no gainsaying that. There is no other argument that can be urged which will meet the case. The result of the amendment that is being proposed by the other body of this Parliament is to deprive the workingmen of the large centres in the county of Cape Breton of their franchise. We have, as is well known, a large population engaged in industrial occupations in that constituency. In addition to the 6,000 men employed in the steel works at Sydney and Sydney Mines, there are 7,000 or 8,000 employees in the collieries of the Dominion Coal Company and the Nova Scotia Coal Company. These men exercise a large influence in public affairs in eastern Nova Scotia at the present time. The result of the voting upon the issues which will be submitted to these people in the present election is viewed with a good deal of apprehension by hon. gentlemen opposite and is greatly feared by the gentlemen who will be the candidates of the Government in the ensuing election. It is pretty well known that the labouring men throughout the country are opposed to this Government. They are opposed to this Government, not only on the subject of conscription but because the Government has failed, when conscripting men, to conscript the wealth of this country as well. The workingmen of Cape Breton are opposed to this Government because the Government has failed to grapple with the great question of the cost of living. The working people of Canada realize that, while sacrifices are being demanded of men who are asked to recruit for overseas service and to give up their lives in the cause of the Allies and in defence of the principles of liberty, the sacrifice has been limited almost entirely to the men who enlist for overseas service, and that instead of sacrifices being made by men engaged in industrial enterprise in Canada, many of these men have taken the opportunity which the war gave them of amassing large fortunes. These are some of the reasons why the working people in Canada, and more particularly in the island of Cape Breton, are opposed to this Government .

5 p.m.

Hon. gentlemen who desire the Government to win constituencies in Nova Scotia and who realize that the sentiment of the working people is against them in this contest determined when this Franchise Bill went over to the other House of this Parliament, that they would introduce an amendment to the franchise which would result in disfranchising a large element of the population in the industrial centres of Nova Scotia and placing upon the electoral list a large number who are not qualified and would not otherwise be placed upon it. No person will realize that better than the workingmen themselves, and none will be readier to respond to the appeals for justice and fair play which will be made to them when the election comes in the course of the next few weeks. We in Nova Scotia have been singled out for special treatment by this Government. The electoral lists of New Brunswick are to stand as the basis of the franchise to be used in the coming election. The electoral lists in Ontario and Quebec are to stand as the basis of the franchise for the coming election. But the province of Nova Scotia—and I regret to have to say it, the province represented by the right hon. the Prime Minister—has been singled out for unfair treatment in order that this Government may get an unfair advantage when it comes to the elections in that province, the result of which they fear so greatly.

I should feel that I was not discharging my full duty to the people whom I represent in the island of Cape Breton if I did not make as strenuous a protest as I am capable of making against this iniquitous legislation, which was designed solely and exclusively to steal the election for the Government in Nova Scotia.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has no right to speak at this stage.

Mr. F. B. McCURDY (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, my observation of discussions in this Parliament has not led me to the conclusion that condemnation by hon. members opposite of any proposed measure carries with it any assurance that that measure is without merit. The strenuous opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite to the Senate amendment of itself suggests to one's mind that there may be something wrong with the present lists.

I have talked with many members of the House from western Canada, where the system ensuring fresh lists prevails. I listened to the discussions in this House of the Wartime Elections Bill and I failed to hear any objection or any criticism of the manner in which the enumerator system operates in the western provinces. Personally I should have preferred the extension of that system to Nova Scotia. It already applies to Prince Edward Island. I should have liked to see it in operation in Nova Scotia, but as a result of conferences which took place between hon. gentlemen opposite and Liberal members of the Senate, instead of having a uniform system for Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as was proposed originally in the Senate we are now to have a system which applies to Nova Scotia only.

I cannot follow the argument of the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) when he says that men will be unfairly disqualified by this amendment. He has failed to point out any unfairness in this provision or shown how it will work to the disadvantage of any portion of the electorate. Surely no hardship can result through enlarging the opportunity to correct previous errors and wrongs. Under the system which has prevailed in Nova Scotia, good Canadians have frequently been left off the list. Under normal conditions the average citizen is not much concerned about having his name added to the voters' list, and a great deal of care and attention is necessary to see that he is registered. Under the old system a person fully qualified to be registered would find his name omitted from the lists.

At this crisis, when the people are to pass upon an issue of utmost national importance every patriotic citizen should have the opportunity of voting. Every opportunity should be given for bringing the lists up to date. This is not a case where voters are endeavouring to get their names on the lists; rather it is an occasion where the greatness of the issue demands the expression of every loyal man's opinion.

Had no amendment been made to the Bill, if the name of a man was not on the provincial list last revised, he would be denied the right to vote. Every member from Nova Scotia knows of cases where people properly entitled to the vote have had their names left off the list. In some counties of Nova Scotia the lists contain thousands of names with no addresses at all; these names may or may not be fictitious.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In what county?

Mr. McCURDY: In many counties.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Name one

Mr. McCURDY: If my hon. friend will take the trouble to refer to the voters' lists as printed last year, he will find that in many counties this condition exists.

Only a few years ago a leading King's Counsel residing in the city of Halifax, the president of one of the largest banking institutions in Canada, had his name left off the voters' list and the first intimation he had of that was when he went to the poll to vote. He went to the poll as usual. His name was not registered under the provincial system and he was denied the right to cast his ballot on that occasion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: May I tell my hon. friend that I know—

Mr. McCURDY: In any business concern that is honestly managed and where fair dealing is desired, there is never any objection to audit or revision. In Nova Scotia there has been no change in the administration of local affairs for thirty-five years. The same set of people have administered the provincial affairs of Nova Scotia during that period, and the revision of the lists as well as the conduct of other public business has been more or less running along the same groove. In a business concern, as I have said, no objection is taken by any person to a revision or a review of the work done. The very fact that my hon. friends object so vigorously to revision or audit under judicial review in the present case arouses a suspicion that there is something to hide.

One or two hon. gentlemen opposite have said that no complaint has been made in Nova Scotia in respect of the existing voters' lists. Well, that is not my experience. A few days ago I received a letter from a personal correspondent in Nova Scotia with regard to the enfranchisement of the relatives of soldiers. It was written before the particulars of the Military Voters Bill were published. I did not receive the letter until after that Bill had been introduced, and while the letter has particular reference to need of that legislation, it throws some light on the results of the existing Nova Scotia system of preparing voters' lists, and, incidentally, may also account in a measure for the strenuous opposition of the hon. members from Cape Breton. My correspondent says:

> In re proposed plan of giving votes to mothers, wives and sisters of soldiers, do not overlook the fathers. This may sound odd to you, but if you lived in a county like Victoria, you would know what voters' lists mean. I have been a county councillor for the past seven years, and I have never been allowed to appoint a reviser of voters' lists. In this district alone I know of a number of cases of men, with sons on the firing line, who have no vote.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman give the name of his authority?

Mr. McCURDY: It is my intention to support the proposed amendment, for the reason—

Mr. McKENZIE: Does my hon. friend refuse to give the name?

Mr. McCURDY: —that it is equitable, and that it will give to every person the right to vote who should have that right. It will invite a fuller and fairer expression of opinion on the part of the people of the province. It is desirable that every person who is entitled to the right of franchise should have the opportunity of giving voice to his opinion at this crisis in the country's history, and this amendment gives every person that opportunity.

Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

NATIONAL SERVICE BOARD.

STATEMENT BY THE DIRECTOR GENERAL, MR. R. B. BENNETT.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Perhaps, before the House arises, I might avail myself of this opportunity to state that now that the Military Service Act has come into force and various Orders in Council have been passed, dealing with matters which have received the attention of the National Service Board, this organization has ceased to exist. The various directors have tendered their resignations which have been placed in the hands of the Government. I tendered my resignation on the introduction of the Military Service Act. I came into the position under very peculiar circumstances, and it might not be amiss if I stated them shortly. In September of last year I received a telegram asking me if I would act as Director of National Service for the province in which I resided. I agreed to do so if I could be of any service to my country. I came to Ottawa in October in response to a call issued by Sir Thomas Tait, Director General of National Service, for a meeting of the district directors. I attended the meetings on the second day of the conference. On the next day, Sir Thomas Tait resigned, and it was necessary to appoint a successor. I was asked to accept the position. I did so with very great reluctance, believing, as I did, that I should not accept that responsibility, having regard to the conditions that prevailed. But if I may be permitted to use the language of Mr. Neville Chamberlain, who accepted a somewhat similar post under somewhat similar circumstances, I was impressed by the fact, perhaps improperly, by those who urged me, that it was a patriotic duty on my part to undertake this work, and I accordingly did so. I have no regret to offer except to indicate that, at that time, the policy of the bo rd had been settled and the question as to what the general duties were had been fixed by Orders in Council. Those orders contemplated largely that the work should be carried on by district directors and not from Ottawa, but owing to difficulties that arose at the very inception of the work, it became necessary that the largest part of the work should be carried on in Ottawa. We undertook the work and endeavoured to discharge the responsibility as best we could.

At the initial meeting which was held here and to which I have referred a resolution was passed that a man-power inventory should be taken and that the signing of cards which were sent out should be compulsory, and that a penalty should be provided for their not being signed. The resolution, which was passed before Sir Thomas Tait resigned was very explicit upon that point. Those in authority, however, thought that could not be done, and, we were compelled to endeavour as best we could to create an atmosphere sufficient to induce the people voluntarily to sign the cards. In order to create that atmosphere, letters were sent to members of Parliament, senators, members of the local legislatures, labour unions, clergymen, boards of trade, fraternal organizations and practically 150,000 representative men throughout the country. Public meetings were held, advertisements were inserted in the newspapers and the first week of the year was proclaimed National Service Week. It is only fair to say that the response was much better than might reasonably have been expected, and one would hesitate to describe, except in the warmest terms, the spirit of co-operation and sympathy displayed by all those who were appealed to at this time. The result was that, by this voluntary effort, a very large number of cards were signed and returned. I ventured to point out at that time in public addresses, that this was the last great voluntary effort on the part of the Government, and the response as I have said. was everything that could be expected. The time for filling in cards was extended, but no penalty was provided and the Government did not think it advisable to make it obligatory to complete the cards. It is highly important, nay, absolutely necessary that there should be at all times created and maintained in this country a proper atmosphere in relation to this great conflict. That atmosphere can only be obtained by appealing, through concrete means to the sentiment and reason of the people. It was believed that the carrying on of a campaign of thrift, a campaign in relation to the saving of money and food and other matters of that kind would have the desired result. I urged when the enthusiasm of the people was apparent that a general campaign of this character should be organized and vigorously prosecuted. For reasons best known to those in authority the matter was not taken up at that time, but it was taken up later on. The results have to some extent justified the effort, late though it was. The enthusiasm of the people by that time had in some measure waned. When the cards came in arrangements were made to classify them, and the classification was carried on in a most comprehensive manner. I fancy perhaps very few people have an adequate appreciation of the work that was done. That part of the work was in charge of a young lady who is a graduate of Toronto University, and also of one of the largest universities in Chicago. I refer to Miss Grange, who undertook and carried on that work successfully. The cards were divided into military prospects and industrial prospects. We found 475,363 military prospects out of 1,549,360 cards, and those military prospects were subdivided into Military Classes 1-A, 1-B, 2-A, 2-B, 3-A and 3-B, having regard to the men's married or unmarried condition, the number of their dependents, age, etc. I shall hand this memorandum to Hansard without taking time to read it all. Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, as it contains a summary of the information thus obtained.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not according to the usual practice; but in view of the undoubted importance of the document, that might be done with the unanimous consent of the House, but only with that unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I shall avail myself of the kind permission of the House.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Then it was thought it would be advisable to make an occupational survey of the country. If I had been charged with the responsibility I should have done that in the first place, and then used the information obtained by the National Service cards in conjunction with it. The occupational survey was a survey to obtain from all the employers in Canada the conditions in respect to employment now and what the conditions may be immediately after the war. That occupational survey seeks information by the aid of a very large number of questions with respect to (a) male employees, and (b) female employees. I shall avail myself of the privilege, if I may, of stating exactly what are the questions without reading them, by putting them on Hansard, and then indicate further, because I must be very hurried, that, in response to certain instructions given to us, we endeavoured to ascertain from our soldiers overseas something of what their views might be when they came back to this country with respect to agriculture.

I give, first, the form of questions for male employees; next, the form of questions for female employees.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: We circulated and have received back, up to date about 250,000 cards from those who went overseas, such cards containing 18 questions. I will file the card with Hansard if I may. That will indicate the questions asked.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: If the information thus obtained and still being obtained is properly collated and classified, it will assist those, who are charged with responsibility with respect to demobilization, to determine what should be done to meet a situation that, in my judgment, will be the most acute with which the country has ever been confronted. The occupational survey will indicate the probable opportunities for work throughout Canada; the overseas cards will indicate what the peculiar fitness of each returning soldier may be for the work that will offer:

With the cessation of industrial activity, the result of the shutting down of munitions factories, and with the returning to these shores of three or four hundred thousand men, it is obvious that there will be a great displacement of woman labour, and a very great demand for employment which will not be forthcoming. One might say without being tedious, that the great problem that must confront this country is the problem that will arise when this conflict is over. The absorption into our civil life of those out of employment, as well as of those who come back, is a matter of extreme importance. The taking care of the adverse balance of trade in this country, the making provision for meeting the enormous charges upon our resources, with respect to interest both on our national debt and pensions, are matters of pressing importance. There is only one way by which that can be done, and that is by the creation of new wealth, and new wealth can only be created by increased production and the development of our vast natural resources. So it is of paramount importance that the great natural resources should be developed, and we must learn what is the desire and intention of those who are left and of those who are coming back with respect to agriculture and other pursuits.

The great problem this State will have to deal with is the problem of how adequately to encourage production and development. With the burden of taxation the people will have to bear, it is only necessary to say that new capital will not come here as willingly as some people seem to think. The great problem is how to induce capital to find here an opportunity for profitable employment while at the same time arranging that adequate provision is made for the state receiving its share of the profits that may result from any enterprise that utilizes our natural resources which the state holds as trustee for all the people. I shall not dwell longer on that point. I have not time this afternoon to do more than indicate the activities that have been undertaken by the board with respect to farm labour and increased grain production during the present year, the providing of men for specific undertakings, the Royal Flying Corps, railway, shipbuilding and many other pursuits, the advertising campaign for thrift and war savings. All these things we have endeavoured to do as best we could, with what degree of success it is not for me at the present moment to discuss. In my judgment, however, the language used by Mr. Chamberlin, the Director General of National Service in England, in dealing with similar conditions might aptly apply here. He said:

> It is apparent that the rock upon which the department split was the fact that a local habitation and a loud sounding name were given to it, and that it was then launched with a roving commission to discover its functions and duties, but left without any statutory powers and no boundaries delimiting its sphere from that of other departments. My reluctance to accept such a vaguely defined post was natural, but I accepted from patriotic motives and have done my best.

I think the language of Mr. Chamberlin's valedictory might well be the language I should employ as mine, and in so doing I desire to thank the press for the very great effort they have made at all times, under difficult circumstances to insure so far as possible the success of the movement. The thanks of this country are due to the district directors who earnestly and sincerely laboured to make their work a success and particularly to Mr. C. W. Peterson the unpaid secretary of the board to whose zeal, patience, persistence and energy in no small degree the success of the work that was undertaken is due. Nothing, however, could have left with me a more lasting or a more pleasant memory than the recollection of the sympathy which all who are in this House have extended to me in the work I was unfortunate enough to have been induced to undertake. I shall never forget the kindliness of their criticism, and their willingness to appreciate and understand the difficulties under which the work was carried on.

THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. D. C. ROSS (West Middlesex): There is some difference, on this side of the House at any rate, as to whether an elector who is on the voters' list of the province of Ontario, who has left the electoral district, is entitled to vote. Section 32 of the War-time Elections Act, provides that:

> The qualifications necessary to enable any male person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as by this Act otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such male person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Under the law of the province of Ontario a male person, in order to vote, has to be a resident on the day of polling domiciled in the district in which he is voting. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) whether that rule will still prevail under this Act.

Mr. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I can only give my opinion of the interpretation of the provisions of the Act, but I am very clear in that opinion. Under the first paragraph of section 32, it is made quite clear that the qualifications to vote, prescribed by the law of any province are to be the qualifications of male voters under this Act, save in so far as they may be modified by the provisions of this Act. There are but two provisions which I have heard it suggested might be said to modify what I understand to be the requirements of the Ontario law, that in order to be entitled to vote a person must be a resident in the constituency at the time he voted. The two provisions that have been suggested as possibly modifying that are subsection 2 of section 32 and section 143.

[Mr. R. B. Bennett.]

As regards subsection 2, a perusal of it will make it perfectly clear, I think, that it deals with the subject of residence only from the point of view of the operation of preparing or adding to the lists. Its purpose is merely to fix a date in relation to which the period of time required in any province for residence within the province and for residence within the constituency, shall be fixed, and it fixes the period of residence essential to entitle a man to be placed upon the list as one year within the provinces, as I understand the amendment of the Senate, and thirty days within the constituency, such periods to be fixed by reference ot the date of the writ of election. That deals only with the question of residence so far as it is to be considered in preparing or adding to lists, and its purpose and effect are merely to determine the period, and the date in relation to which that period shall be fixed.

Section 143, as I read it, is intended to, and does, simply determine, not what is the qualification to vote, but the place at which a person having all the qualifications to vote shall be entitled to vote, and the only place at which he shall be entitled to vote. The section provides:

> Except as otherwise provided in this Act, each elector shall be entitled to vote at the polling station of the polling division, or of one of the polling divisions, upon the list of voters for which his name is—

There is a misprint in the Bill, but at all events the man's name figures on the list. I would point out that the section does not create the right to vote, and I say that, because it deals only with a person who is an elector, and the definition section of the Elections Act defines an elector as a person who is entitled to vote. So that it means simply that any person entitled to vote shall be so entitled at a particular time.

Mr. CARVELL: In connection with the subject under discussion, I would like to put a concrete case before the minister in order to have his judicial opinion on it. I take it for granted from what he has stated that under the provisions of section 143 a man can only vote at the place from which his name is upon the voters' list. According to the laws of the province of New Brunswick a man can only vote at that place in which he is a resident, but we have a very simple provision by which, if a man's name is properly added to the list, say in the city of St. John, and he moved before the election to, say, the city of Moncton, his name could be easily transferred from the list for the city of St. John to that for the city of Moncton, and he would vote in the city of Moncton. Would the minister think that section 143 would override the provisions of our Act as to residence and the right of a man to have his name transferred from his former residence to his present residence?

Mr. DOHERTY: That question has just been brought to my attention. I have not had an opportunity of giving any thought to it, and I would not like to pronounce an offhand opinion on the point. I think my hon. friend will recognize that this is a different question from the one put by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross).

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, it is.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had spoken to me about the question during the course of the afternoon, and thus I had an opportunity of looking into it.

Mr. CARVELL: In view of the great difficulties that may arise in our province, may I suggest that the minister give a decision on this point, which decision should be made public. I am satisfied if this were done it would be in the interests of everybody.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be glad to do so.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at 5.30, for the purpose of proroguing the present session of Parliament.

At that hour, a message was delivered by Lieutenant-Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency, the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went to the Senate Chamber.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In His Majesty's name, his Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.

Then the hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Excellency:

The Commons of Canada have voted the Supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bills:—

"An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918."

to which Bills I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To these Bills the Clerk of the Senate by command of His Excellency the Governor General did thereupon say:

In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks His Loyal Subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to these Bills.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the Seventh Session of the Twelfth Parliament of the Dominion with the following Speech:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Important measures for the effective prosecution of the war have engaged your close attention during a long session, and I am now happy to release you from further attendance.

Since your labours began, the high and worthy character of our cause has been confirmed by two significant events. Our allies, the Russian people, are engaged under trying circumstances, in establishing institutions which shall fully conform to their ideals of liberty and order. In the midst of inevitable difficulties, which command our sympathy, they have affirmed their determination to remain faithful to the Alliance.

The United States of America, refusing to tolerate the arrogance and menace of Prussian Militarism have made common cause with the Allies and are vigorously co-operating in the struggle for freedom and humanity. Already the Canadian people have given many expressions of the warm welcome with which they greet their great kindred neighbour as a comrade in arms.

The meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet and Imperial War Conference in the early part of the year have very materially facilitated the thorough co-operation of the Dominion, both in the prosecution of the war and in preparation for the future. They constitute also an important step in the development of constitutional relationships between the nations of the British Commonwealth.

Notwithstanding the increasing military strength of the allied nations, the stubborn resistance of the enemy in all important theatres of the war demonstrates the need of throwing our utmost effort into the struggle and thus hastening the day of abiding peace. In the western theatre the Canadian Army Corps, by its capture of the coveted Vimy Ridge and by its recent operations at Lens, has sustained its distinguished record and contributed in important measure to the ascendancy which the Allies have gained in that theatre.

In order to secure the reinforcements essential for the support of our forces further steps have become necessary, and the authority you have granted for compulsory military enlistment on a selective basis will meet the urgent need for reinforcements. At the same time it will provide the means for conserving more effectively the essential agricultural and industrial activities of the Dominion.

You have recognized your duty in providing the best possible safeguards for enabling those engaged in the defence of their country to have their voice in the decision of national questions which vitally affect them. For this purpose, as well as to give due recognition to service and sacrifice in the affairs of the State, the necessary adjustments which you have made in the legislation relevant to these matters will doubtless prove effective.

The legislation you have passed for the purpose of assisting returned soldiers to settle upon the land will not only aid materially in restoring these gallant men to their rightful status in the community but should greatly increase the agricultural production of the country.

The appointment of a Food Controller and of a Fuel Controller invested with important powers and duties is founded upon the impressive need of the utmost economy and saving in order that our national strength may continue unimpaired.

In order that our industries may be equipped to cope with the intricate problems of the future, provision has been wisely made for promoting scientific and industrial research.

Important progress has been made in solving our difficult problems of railway transportation, and the means have been provided whereby a great railway system shall become the property of the people of Canada and be added to their national undertakings;

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In the name of His Majesty I thank you for the liberal provision you have made for the needs of the public service and for the prosecution of the war.

Hounourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Although the stress of the war becomes increasingly severe, the people of Canada, resolute in the supreme purpose of achieving through victory an abiding peace, have not faltered; and I am confident that whatever further efforts are necessary will be unhesitatingly put forth in the stern determination that the vast sacrifices already made shall not be in vain.

The Speaker of the Senate then said:

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued until Thursday, the 1st day of November next, to be here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until Thursday, the 1st day of November next.
