In paragraph 2.15 of the 1976 report of the Auditor General, he clearly outlines what the responsibilities of the Comptroller General should be. On one hand, the government indicates it is following the recommendations of the Auditor General by creating the position of Comptroller General to somehow bring uncontrolled spending under control. Yet, his recommendations are accepted without putting teeth into the act as recommended by the Auditor General. One cannot have it both ways. Either what he says is accepted, or it is not. It is incredible that the government comes before parliament asking for support of a bill which is inconsistent with the recommendations of the Auditor General.

If hon. members opposite want to continue to defend this toothless bill, I ask them to look at paragraph 2.15 of the report, wherein the duties of the Comptroller General are spelled out clearly. The position of Comptroller General should be accountable to parliament, and his appointment should be referred to an appropriate standing committee. As was recommended by the Auditor General, he ought to be more than simply a deputy minister. His responsibilities must be clearly laid out.

I confess I do not know Mr. Harry Rogers; I understand he will be taking this position. I understand he is a man of some notable ability and credibility. I am looking forward to the expertise he will bring into this position. He comes to this position with the required enthusiasm and dedication. With the legacy of spending and the track record of this government, it is unfair for parliament to ask any man to take a position without legislation clearly spelling out his authority. I cannot emphasize enough the fact the Auditor General made specific recommendations as to what the responsibilities of that position should be. But this bill contains no specific responsibilities.

Quite frankly, I do not understand how government members can accept the Auditor General's suggestion to create this position and at the same time not support our amendments which were based on what the Auditor General suggested. I have the report in my hand, but I will not read it. It is well known to the government. I plead with the government to accept the amendments which stand in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). As I have indicated before, the Auditor General suggested the establishment of the position of Comptroller General.

Mr. Francis: But he did not indicate that it should be spelled out in the statute.

Mr. Whiteway: Perhaps the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) missed my earlier remarks wherein I referred to paragraph 2.15 of the 1976 Auditor General's report. I stand on that. If we vote on this piece of legislation tonight, I appeal to government members to support our amendments. The legacy of spending of this government absolutely cries out for a responsible Comptroller General who will get government spending under control.

I am happy to say that when Mr. Harry Rogers takes that position it will only be a matter of months before the Progressive Conservative party under the leadership of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) takes the reins of government, and we will help him do his job of getting government spending under control. We will make his job obsolete. Ministers in our government will make his job unnecessary. In the meantime, with the position this legislation will create, I would ask the government to support our amendments in order that we can follow the recommendation of the Attorney General by giving this legislation teeth and the position the responsibility it deserves.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, one of the first things this government did when it took office ten years ago was to bring in major changes to the rules of the House. Those of us who were here at that time recall that debate very well. We remember that ironically those rule changes were put through by the invocation of closure.

It was the former auditor general in an article a few years ago who made the point that the take-off in government expenditures commenced at the time this government changed the rules of the House. What this government did to the House of Commons at that time was remove from this place parliament's ancient and traditional right to withhold or control supply and government expenditure.

There is not a member of this House who will not admit that the present system is just not working; it is not working in terms of an examination of the estimates and in terms of parliament having any control whatsoever of the government's purse strings. All we have to do is go to the standing committees of the House where the estimates are being examined. We will find in most cases, if not all, those standing committees which are now involved in what should be parliament's most important task, the scrutiny of government expenditures and holding the government accountable, cannot find a quorum. As a matter of fact, some of the committees cannot sit because there are not enough members there to go through the motion of hearing evidence.

My colleague says the fisheries committee this afternoon could not sit because there were not enough members. That committee was scheduled to sit today under the block system we now have by which a number of standing committees sit at the same time to examine the estimates. Members have lost interest. Interestingly enough, the press too have lost interest because this is a charade and a meaningless exercise.

Under the rules, which are no longer new, having been adopted in 1968, we took away from this place the right to control supply. We put in rules which state that as of midnight at the end of May the estimates are deemed to have been reported to the House.

What does a minister have to do when he goes before a standing committee of the House with his estimates? All he has to do is turn up his collar and hang tough because he knows it is just a question of stonewalling long enough and his estimates will be passed anyway. What a stupid exercise. Is it any wonder we are faced with the situation today of having a bill before the House to set up the office of comptroller general, which arises from a report by the present Auditor General in 1976, and referred to in his 1977 report from which I quote as follows:

In my 1976 Annual Report, I wrote of my concern that Parliament—and indeed the Government—had lost, or was close to losing, effective control of the public purse. I said also that the full results of my Office's two-year study of financial management and control across Government had led me inescapably to the opinion that:

Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control in the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore, it is likely to remain so until the Government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

It is all well and good that we have this bill before us. Indeed, the government had no choice but to respond positively to the recommendations of the Auditor General and bring in this bill. I want to make this point, and we as a parliament should not lose sight of it, that the office of the Comptroller General of Canada will not be effective until we put our own house in order; until we change our own rules and until we get rid of this totally ineffective system we have now in which we as representatives of the people no longer have any control over government expenditures and cannot in fact hold the government accountable for its spending.

One suggestion that has been made time and time again, and I think it is a good one which will ultimately have to be accepted, is that the House, represented by the opposition, which has the principal role in this regard, should have the right to call at least one, preferably three, departments, and for the purposes of the rules this rule would be suspended in respect of those departments. Those departments would have to come before the House in Committee of the Whole and be accountable for their expenditures, without the imposition of the guillotine, as presently expressed in the rules, whereby all estimates are deemed to have been passed by the end of May. That would impose a discipline on government departments which does not now exist.

How can we possibly carry out this principal function of parliament when we have ministers who stonewall the committee and will not allow their officials to answer questions, hiding behind the excuse that the questions are ones of policy? Then when we are given the opportunity to probe and direct questions to officials of departments we really do not have the kind of back-up support necessary to take on these huge departments of government with the tremendous back-up and expertise they possess. We are just not a match for them, and it is that simple. I believe very strongly that the rules have to be changed.

Just a few days ago in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs we were examining the estimates of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. Included in the estimates of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs was a vote for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a Crown corporation. We have always had the right to examine Crown corporations separately from the government ministers who answer for those Crown corporations in the House, for the very simple and logical reason that Crown corporations are not represented here, hence they cannot be accounted for. We have always had the right in committee to examine the executive officers of those Crown corporations. We examine the estimates of CN, even though they come under the Ministry of Transport. They are examined separately from the Department of Transport without the minister being present, although there are cases when he might be there; but usually he is not and we are able to direct our questions directly to the management of CN. The same applies with Air Canada, whenever we can get them, and that is not very often. It also applies to the CBC which comes under the estimates of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts).

However, on this particular occasion I as a member of the committee had some very important questions relating to the way that the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs had been using CMHC in a partisan way as a political instrument of the government by having government members hand out cheques on behalf of this independent Crown corporation to municipalities, an improper procedure which was using the corporation in a political way. It was making announcements on behalf of the corporation. I wanted to pose these questions to the chairman of CMHC, who was present as he should have been because vote 10, the administrative vote of the corporation, was called, but I was denied that right. I was told by the chairman of the committee that I could not direct questions to the minister's officials, and that included, of course, the chairman of CMHC as one of the minister's officials. He said I would have to direct my questions to the minister. That is a dangerous precedent because that considerably weakens what is already an inadequate system. It considerably undermines a system that is at best barely functioning, and it is already the subject of a point of order which I have raised in the House.

If we do not have the right to examine Crown corporations, then how can we pursue the day to day operations of these independent agencies of the government set up under their own statutes, autonomous of the government? If they are not accountable to us, who are they accountable to? It is interesting to note that the Auditor General had this to say about Crown corporations in his 1975 report:

In the majority of the Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control is weak and ineffective. Moreover, co-ordination and guidance by government agencies of financial management and control practices in the Crown corporations are virtually non-existent.

If they do not answer to parliament, the representatives of the people who own those Crown corporations, who are they accountable to? That, sir, is a question that I intend to pursue because, indeed, the House has a right to examine these Crown corporations independently when they come before committees with their estimates.

Getting back to the rules, I have already said that there is not a member of this House from the Prime Minister down who would not admit in his own heart that this system is not working, that we have to change it. That is why we, by order of reference in the last session, referred the whole matter to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. We put in a lot of time and effort in that committee in the last session. Indeed, I can recall sitting when the House was in recess. We established sub-committees, and we went about our work seriously. We examined other legislatures around the world, and we really took our task seriously because we knew that the House took this matter seriously.

What happened to the report of that committee? It never saw the light of day. It just did not happen to suit the particular strategy of the government House leader at that particular time. He felt that the government was going to have to give too much and the opposition give too little. That was the way he proceeded, if I am not doing him an injustice. The result is that the whole matter was allowed to die and all of the work we did, the recommendations that we had put together after exhaustive study, travel and surveys, came to naught.

One of the things we looked at and reached consensus on was the establishment of a public expenditures committee that would have an ongoing function like the Public Accounts Committee. It would have an ongoing function in relation to the expenditures of all government departments and would be able to call any government department at any time throughout the year, as opposed to the present system whereby estimates are referred to committee for approximately three months. I forget when the estimates are brought in, somewhere around March, but they are reported back to the House at the end of May.

Indeed, sir, there is not a year that goes by that there is not at least one department, if not two and sometimes even more, on an agency of government that does not even get before committee. Their estimates are never examined by a committee or anybody else. The House then goes through the humiliation of having to pass an appropriations bill, knowing that we are going to be voting for $46 billion of expenditures without having properly examined these various departments as to how these moneys are being spent, or holding them accountable for how they spent their money last year. It is the day for humiliation in this House when we have to sit down at night and pass that appropriations bill year after year, knowing full well that we have not done our job, knowing full well that there have been estimates of government departments and agencies that have not even had cursory examination by committee. What an absolute farce! Is it any wonder that parliament is becoming irrelevant? Television in this House, in my view, instead of making parliament more relevant, will show it up for the irrelevancy that it has become.

Let the television cameras pan around this House tonight and see how many of us are here. And I am one of the guilty ones, for I am not here all that often at night. This is an important bill. Let the television cameras go into the standing committees of this House where we are charged with examining $50 billion of taxpayers' money and see how many members are in these committees—not a corporal's guard. We cannot even get the usual representatives from each party in order to proceed with the examination of witnesses.

There is an improper practice that has crept into our procedures which never should have been allowed in the first place, and that is where committees now function without quorums. Committees will now function if there are five members present as long as each of the two major parties are represented. I only wish that the television cameras could relay this live and in colour to the people of Canada so they would see how totally irrelevant this institution is. When it comes to accountability, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government, which has brought this parliament to this sorry situation, will have to—when it gets up its nerve to go to the people of Canada—be accountable to Canadians for what it has done to this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: There is no possible way that they can justify what has happened to this place. The main issue in the election is going to be the economy, and rightly so. It is going to be the inflationary situation, the consequence of runaway government expenditures. It is going to be the growth in government, a government that has been on a spending spree for the past ten years, a government that has total disregard for this place or anybody else because they know they are no longer accountable. The daily oral question period is the only area of the accountability that we have left, and even that has been emaciated and truncated to the point where it is becoming less and less effective. It is a serious situation in which we find ourselves today.

• (2142)

In placing before the House the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), we have tried to improve the situation and this bill. We do so firm in the belief that unless we put our own house in order, and unless we change these grossly inadequate rules, then we will have the Comptroller General coming back with the same sense of utter frustration that the Auditor General has come back here with year after year, saying that he cannot control the situation, that it is out of control. That is something we cannot allow to happen.

If we do allow that to happen again, then we will see the printing presses at the Bank of Canada churning out more money to pay for a spending spree by a government that is out of control. There is only one way we can control it and there is only one way we can change it. That change is just as inevitable as day follows night. The solution is to change this tired government, which has nothing but contempt for the institution of parliament.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, it is a sad time to rise in this House with the government on its deathbed and with a slip of paper coming across with a bill which more than anything else is supposed to pass as an earnest plea that there has been a deathbed repentance over there and that from now on things are going to be different. This, Mr. Speaker, after ten years of prodigality and the most profligate government this country has ever seen; ten years of ever increasing debt; ten years of endeavouring to train an entire generation of Canadians, young and old, to believe that public funds are available for everything and anything; ten years of misspending which has been documented by a variety of reports official and unofficial.

The government now has the nerve to bring forward a bill in these last days of the thirtieth parliament. This bill is to appoint an officer called the Comptroller General of Canada. I always think it is the "mp" in the word "comptroller" that is designed to add a measure of sophistication to the title and to suggest there is something unusually powerful about the office. In ordinary English it would be "cont" and it would just be "controller". But, of course, this person keeps count, one gathers, and "comptrols", and does it with force and power.

Yet there is no indication in the bill as to how this is to be done, what is to be covered, how long the individual will occupy the office, only that he will be there at pleasure and that the duties may be assigned—not necessarily will be, but may be assigned—to him. There would be no requirement on the government over there should they receive some hope for transfusion. I am sure the Canadian public is not going to give them some miracle cure at the last minute to change the situation. Should that happen we are led to believe that this might work; but we know that it is window dressing and there is nothing precise here.

Even the prodigal son after his fling was at least repentant. When he reached the bottom and there was nothing left he at least came home and made a genuine offer to go to work. I cannot for one moment believe that in Bill C-10 is a genuine offer from this government that from now on things will be different.

An hon. Member: How many times have we heard that?

Mr. Johnston: We have heard it far too often. We can look almost anywhere, whether at the report of the Auditor General of Canada, who looks "after the fact" and we see his concern for such items as the spending on bilingualism in education. This accounts for most of the expenditure under the depart-ment's bilingualism development program. It consists of payments to the provinces, includes support for a variety of suggestions as to what they are supposed to be doing there, yet there is a weakening of control in the financial management of contributions.

The Auditor General and the deputy minister of the Department of the Secretary of State admitted that there was no way of auditing how these moneys are used. As members of parliament we receive complaints from within the province of Quebec that the money does not get to where it is supposed to for the teaching of English. We know the stories from our own provinces that the money does not get to the point of being used for teaching the French language. It disappears and there is no way of checking on it.

The Auditor General refers to the Canada Council. That organization has been thoroughly taken apart in the last few weeks and months in this parliament and elsewhere. There again there is a great need for some control. I would suggest one of the easiest ways to obtain some control would be to make up the selection committees from a group of the general public instead of setting up selection committees that in themselves are teams of artists working with their fellows. There is the kind of set up which the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) describes as incestuous and which certainly produced on the west coast an interesting game. Readers of one of the Vancouver papers were challenged to match up the awards with the judges who were making them. That is the sort of thing that should not happen.

We can look at the Auditor General's report at page 199 concerning inactive loans. Accounts in this category comprise: Loans to China—Export Credits Insurance Act—$49 million; loans to Greece—$7 million with a total of $56 million. Then there is a note which states: that these loans are described in the public accounts as being neither currently revenue-producing nor realizable. In fact, there has been no change in the outstanding balances for over 20 years.

Another different example of lack of control occurred when nothing was done. How many Canadians realize what happened to the urban demonstration program? This was a con game played with the municipalities across this country. The then minister of state for urban affairs has now moved over to the national defence portfolio where the potentiality for expenditure is much greater. In urban affairs he launched an urban demonstration program supposedly funded by $100 million. Municipalities across this country were challenged to present projects to draw on that fund. It did not exist at all. There were man-hours by the thousands spent, and delegations came to Ottawa. But there was no money there.

One would hope that a comptroller general might also be able to finger that abuse of the federal estimation of expenses as well, so that one would not only have a firmer control of money that was going out, but in future we would not have situations where lower levels of government would be hoaxed into thinking money was available thereby wasting their limited funds applying for something which could never come to fruition.

We cannot have any faith in this bill. I believe the office is needed. However, we need the amendment because the bill as it is, is too narrow, too limited, too large a device for platform waving during the election campaign that is certain to come within the year. I am sure that candidate after candidate on the government side will hold this bill up and say "We have repented. We have become truly conservative. We are away to the right in the political spectrum from the official opposition because we have brought forward this bill. We have set up a Comptroller General who will see that the kind of spending the government has been associated with will be kept under rigid control from now on."

I do not believe that control will happen. As long as this government is in power, this situation will be parallel to that presented by the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability. I quote a paragraph from their report:

> Members of parliament with whom we have met have expressed additional concerns that centre primarily on the issue of accountability of the public service. Most agreed that the traditional doctrine of ministerial responsibility must somehow be adapted to the present size and complexity of the departments and agencies for which ministers—individually and collectively—are held to account. Equally, there is a consensus that information provided to parliament for its surveillance role is insufficient, often not pertinent, or unduly complicated. We have heard numerous suggestions for improving the procedures and mechanisms by which parliament could sift and digest the information it now receives. We have found particularly striking the testimony from those with the longest parliamentary experience that parliament's control of the purse is sound in theory, but seldom practised.

I suspect that will be equally true of the role of the Comptroller General of Canada. In theory it will seem as if this official will be able to keep an eye on the expenditures of the government. However, particularly in the past few weeks, the government has found with its usual ability surprisingly large sums to spend in various downtown cores across this country where a seat might be in danger. We find announcements of expenditures running into the millions of dollars being made at nominating conventions and by new candidates who hope they will be able to stave off the day.

This will not be enough to fool the Canadian people. To bring this measure in at this time, worthwhile as the idea may be, will not be enough. The Canadian people have come to realize that in order to get a public expenditure under control, there is only one solution, and that is to defeat this government and elect the official opposition to parliament in the election that cannot come too soon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On division.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost on division.

Motion (Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West)) (for Mr. Andre) negatived.

Mr. Cullen (for Mr. Andras) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): At the next sitting of the House. If there is unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I am sure it would be appropriate to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—WITHHOLDING OF FUNDS FROM NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on one of those rare occasions when the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) was in the House, I addressed a question to him and received the rather insulting reply that he was going to speak to me privately about the nature of my question. I am still waiting for some kind of overture from the minister to speak to me privately.

I asked the minister why it was that the joint cabinet-National Indian Brotherhood committee only had one area of agreement in response to a comprehensive set of proposals advanced by the National Indian Brotherhood. That one area of agreement is on the subject of land surrenders and that they shall in fact cease.

There are two basic reasons why the National Indian Brotherhood have in fact absented themselves from the cabinet-NIB committee. The first is the government's failure to recognize aboriginal treaty rights as a basic framework of serious negotiation. The second reason for the breakdown is the withdrawal of services that can only be considered by most Canadians as basic, essential and expected.

Services such as hot lunches for Indian schoolchildren have been withdrawn or cut back. Services such as fire protection on the reserve have been withdrawn or cut back. In that framework I would like to add a remark. In one example in the province of Saskatchewan, out of 42 native houses constructed last year, 21 have burned to the ground. Indian schoolteachers on reserves have been cut back or withdrawn. All of this is in the name of restraint, yet we see the same department, Indian affairs, increasing its internal administration by 17 per cent. We think that is the figure.

We on this side have been trying to persuade the minister, the parliamentary secretary and the chairman of the standing committee to call the minister's estimates before the standing committee. As remarked by one member on this side this evening, as of midnight on the last day of May, those estimates are to be presumed to have been passed without the careful scrutiny and examination they so richly deserve. It is little wonder, on the basis of the facts that are known and those yet to be disclosed, that the National Indian Brotherhood decided the time had come, after exhaustive discussion for months and months, that they should withdraw.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) laid it on the line for the National Indian Brotherhood in his response to questions advanced by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). I quote Hansard of April 18. As reported at page 4601, the Prime Minister, responding to concern which had been expressed by the hon. member for Egmont about the provision of basic and essential services which many of us have come to expect but which are denied to the Indians on the reserves, stated:

In times when the federal government is attempting to restrain the rate of growth of its bureaucracy and when federal budgetary expenditures are being restrained it is obvious that in some areas of Canada the public will not find services growing at the rate they would like.

We do not ask that these services should grow. We ask, however, that they be maintained. We are not interested in growth, now, if there is to be restraint. But we are interested in the continuance of the basic services which have been provided to the Indian people. The Prime Minister has said this is a period of restraint. He did not tell us that he did not care how much internal administration was costing. Then the right hon. gentleman in a typical display of arrogance went on to say:

Obviously, government restraint means restraining government expenditure toward some people.

Which people? The Indian people?

As far as details of each departmental expenditures are concerned, the blue book is before the House. It can be discussed in the standing committees.

That's a joke, Mr. Speaker. When is this standing committee going to be called? Then the Prime Minister, once more with his customary disdain and demonstrating his absolute ignorance of the functions of the House of Commons as well as a short memory of what he and his government have inflicted upon us, went on to say that the government House leader would be happy to discuss with House leaders on this side when they wanted those estimates to go to standing committee. What nonsense! The Prime Minister should know better than that. He should know there is no need for consultation among the House leaders on this matter.

In conclusion, let me say I have every reason to understand why the National Indian Brotherhood walked out of that cabinet consultative committee.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), both on April 19 and this evening, has expressed concern about the state of affairs in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am advised that as a result of the budgetary and other control systems which have been initiated in the department there is a much firmer grip on resource management than may have been the case a few years back.

The hon. member has suggested that somehow the department is withholding funding from the National Indian Brotherhood. This is not so. Nothing is being withheld from the brotherhood. The brotherhood put forward its proposed budget three weeks ago, as is customary. This submission is being actively reviewed and it is expected that it will have been dealt with within the next two weeks.

Reference was also made to a sum of $28 million being held back. This appears to be a misunderstanding of the requirement by Treasury Board that the Indian and Inuit program submit a capital management plan to the board before the board authorizes expenditures of $28 million in capital funding. It is a reasonable precaution on the part of the board to require this five-year capital plan before authorizing use of those funds. The program is now in the process of complying with that requirement.

The hon. member also said administrative costs have increased by 17 per cent. Since the 1972-73 fiscal year administrative costs have, in fact, remained practically constant at 6.1 per cent of the budget. There is good reason to believe that the institution of financial management and controls on resource allocation and expenditure will result in an improvement even in that picture in the months ahead, while services to native people are maintained.

The hon. member also referred on April 19 to a large deficit in Saskatchewan. I am advised that over-expenditures which have occurred there have arisen from enrichment of services beyond the funds allocated. Steps have been taken to ensure that regional allocations are respected in future delivery of services through a system of budgetary controls instituted as a result of reviews conducted by the program's senior management and the Auditor General.

Hon. members are aware that the department's spending estimates were referred to the committee almost two months ago. When the committee meets, the minister will be pleased to discuss any further concerns of hon. members about the administration of the department.

Adjournment Debate

AGRICULTURE—PRICE OF HERBICIDES—STEPS TO ASSIST FARMERS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, on April 26, yesterday, as recorded at page 4884 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) whether he would reconsider opening the border for the importation of herbicides in those cases where it could be definitively proved that costs of those herbicides in the United States were substantially lower than in Canada.

I think we have to remember that farmers receive the international price for their products. We must also remember that the input costs farmers face have increased dramatically, thus reducing the net incomes of farmers. Just the other day the Minister of Agriculture got up in this House and said—and how he could have said it I do not know—that farm income had increased by 187 per cent. What he conveniently forgot were input costs. How could the Minister of Agriculture tell us about that increase without talking about input costs? The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has said that in the last three years net income to farmers, after costs, has dropped 54 per cent.

I remind the minister that in my home province of Manitoba in 1976 net farm income, after costs, was $327 million. In 1977 it dropped to $281 million. In 1978 it is estimated that it will drop still further, to $248 million. In 1977, operating costs in the United States increased by approximately 5 per cent over 1976. In Canada those operating costs increased by approximately 10 per cent.

That brings us directly to the problem we are facing this evening. Last year the minister closed the border to Canadian farmers who were importing herbicides. Those importations were taking place because those herbicides were priced at a lower rate in the United States than in Canada. The minister tells us that there is no appreciable price difference. I have been checking with farmers in my riding. They have been calling me as well, and there are substantial price differences. If we take into account the discount on the dollar which is now 12 cents or 13 cents, imports, brokerage fees and transportation costs are still lower in the United States.

Hon. members do not have to depend on my figures or the figures of farmers in the riding of Provencher. Let us look at the minister's figures. In a letter dated April 13, 1978 addressed to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) the minister pointed out that in North Dakota and Manitoba Treflan, Cobex and Avadex were more or less the same price. He gave the highs and lows for the state of North Dakota and the province of Manitoba.

However, let us look at two other herbicides and the minister's figures with regard to them. The low price for Eptan 8 in North Dakota is $2.49, and the high price is $2.67. Those are base prices related to pounds of active ingredient. In Manitoba the low price is $3.50, and the high is $3.95 per pound of active ingredient. That is a 70 per cent differential. How can the minister say that the price is more or less the same?

[Miss Nicholson.]

What about Eradicane? In North Dakota—I am using again the minister's own figures—$2.67 is the low and $2.92 is the high. In Manitoba, $4 is the low and $4.31 is the high, an increase of 65 per cent.

All that Canadian farmers are saying is this, and it is a very simple request: we must compete on the international markets. We receive the price for our products that the market will bear. Why must we be penalized by the Minister of Agriculture, who claims he is a friend of the farmer, and why can we not buy herbicides at prices that are most beneficial to Canadian farmers? They are proving time after time that their input costs are rising. The herbicides which they buy in Canada come from the United States in the first place. Who is taking the mark up? Here is the Minister of Agriculture, the self-proclaimed friend of the farmer, willing to jeopardize and to penalize Canadian farmers to the extent of 65 per cent to 70 per cent, which is his own figure. Where is the justice?

In his own letter the minister says that on March 9 when this survey was done they had minimal figures on hand. He said that the consultative committee made up of members of the industry and farm groups was to meet on April 27, which is today. If I can take the minister's letter at face value, that meeting has taken place. I say to the minister clearly that he better come up with much better evidence other than what the farmers are giving him, what the farm groups are giving him and what the brokers are giving him, as well as what members of parliament who have done their own research are saying.

I say to him that if he can justify a penalty of 65 per cent to 70 per cent to Canadian farmers, then the service that he is giving to farmers is of no benefit. I challenge him and his parliamentary secretary to give Canadian farmers an equal break and allow them to compete in the international market at prices that other farmers, such as farmers in the U.S., have to pay. We must allow them to compete. If we do not, this basic agricultural community which is so essential to Canada's economy will continue to flounder, input costs will continue to rise, and farmers' income will continue to drop. How are we to maintain family farms? It is the responsibility of this Minister of Agriculture to start defending agriculture in the practical ways which I have mentioned tonight.

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to reply to the question raised by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) in the "packed" House this evening.

The closing of the Canada-United States border to imported pesticides does not seem to have adversely affected the prices of pesticides in Canada over that period. The pesticide price and supply committee mentioned by the hon. member which was set up to monitor prices and supplies when the border was closed on March 4, 1977 has now met six times and is in its second year of operation. It has not found any price spreads inconsistent with the usual cost factors in the pricing of herbicides. As a matter of fact, as the hon. member mentioned, that committee did meet today.

A comparison of the 1977-78 closed border period with the preceding three years does not indicate any increased price trends due to the border closing. In fact, pesticide price increases still lag behind the cost of living index increases. The general picture this year seems to be similar to that of last year.

As was the case in 1977, some pesticides are being offered at some United States locations more cheaply than directly across the border in Canada. Some products are lower priced in Canada than in the United States and others are offered at comparable prices in both countries.

While there is no common price for any given pesticide because of the nature of the pesticide market, the committee finds that prices reflect in the usual way the quantities sold, different profit margins and local costs that depend on location, cost of credit, package size and other factors. Casual comparisons of United States and Canadian prices can be misleading if all factors, including currency exchange rates and the difference in units of measure between the two countries, are not taken into account.

The pesticide price and supply committee have come up with some very interesting findings. For example, based on equivalent measure and Canadian dollars, we have compared the highest Canadian price versus the highest United States price. Let us look at some of these. A corn herbicide, atrazine 80W, was found to be 11 per cent less in Canada; semcor 50W, a bean herbicide, 17 per cent less; zolone 30W, a fruit and vegetable herbicide, 27 per cent less.

What about the phenoxy herbicides and wild oat killers. Such as 2,4-D amine 80; MCPA amine 80; MCPA ester 80; treflan; carbyne; avadex BW and avadex 10G? Using the highest price comparisons, Canadian prices range from 1 per cent to 18 per cent less than United States prices. One must remember this is on a corrected measurement and Canadian dollar basis.

For these last items I have just mentioned, I also have a comparison of the lowest Canadian price found and the lowest U.S. price. Looking at 2,4-D amine 80 on this comparison, Canadian prices were 41 per cent less than the lowest U.S. prices. Of course, some products for the same uses are more expensive to varying degrees in Canada than in the United States, depending on the retailers and geographic areas compared. For instance, eptam, which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) mentioned this afternoon, is sometimes more expensive in Canada than in the United States. But we must remember atrazine and 2,4-D, two of the most important weed killers in Canada, are cheaper than in the U.S.A.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

FINANCE

STUDY OF FINANCIAL SITUATION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to raise a matter of urgency. In view of the announcement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that the government is borrowing 1.5 billion marks through the Deutschbank—the third large borrowing or credit arrangement in two months, for a total of $5 billion—along with rumours that further borrowing will be required to maintain the Canadian dollar at its current rate, and in view of the fact that this extraordinary borrowing is mortgaging the next generation of Canadians to such an extent that they may not be able to carry the financial load, bearing in mind that government debt already costs $6.5 billion annually, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Finance request the governor of the Bank of Canada to appear before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs immediately to inform hon. members what the financial situation is and how many more loans will be needed this fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT REIMBURSE QUEBEC FOR SALES TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Quebec National Assembly, including the Liberal party, have agreed that the federal government should reimburse Quebec for its selective sales tax cuts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House direct the government to accept the advice of the National Assembly and reimburse the province of Quebec for its selective sales tax cuts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF MCDONALD COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the body of evidence which has now been placed before the McDonald commission with respect to criminal activity by the RCMP, in view of the limited mandate given to the commission, one which contains no specific reference to recommendations for the laying of charges, and in view of the delay which may take place before the report of the commission is received, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That the Solicitor General amend the terms of reference of the royal commission to provide that a specific mandate be provided to the commission as follows:

"The commission shall make recommendations to the appropriate law enforcement officials of charges to be laid forthwith when prima facie evidence of violations of the Criminal Code comes before them."

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POLLUTION OF OTTAWA RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that certain psychic disturbances characterized by irritability, shyness, tremors, coarse, jerky movements of the lips, tongue and extremities and, finally, gross inco-ordination, can sometimes be caused by mercury poisoning, considering also that a federal-provincial study on pollution levels in the Ottawa River, not yet released but known to exist, is reported to reveal high levels of phosphorous and mercury, both seriously hazardous to health, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis):

That this House implores the minister for the environment, who admitted last April 19 in the House that he was aware of this particular report, to table the report forthwith so that residents on both sides of the river can understand the risks to their health and, in so doing, gather strong public support for all levels of government to intensify their efforts toward remedial action with better control to de-pollute the Ottawa River.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of the Standing Order, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CRTC RULING ON USE OF TV CHANNELS IN SASKATCHEWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of a conflict between licensed cable operators in the province of Saskatchewan and the owner of the cable hardware, namely, Saskatchewan Telecommunications, with respect to a ruling of the CRTC concerning the use of channels by a co-operative network in the province of Saskatchewan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That this House direct the Minister of Communications to make a statement on motions at the earliest moment with respect to the position taken by the government, and particularly by the minister, with respect to this very important matter to the people of Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that two vacancies have occurred in the representation, namely, F. Hugh Poulin, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Ottawa Centre, and John Gilbert, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Broadview, by resignation.

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of new writs of election for the said electoral districts.

TRIBUTES TO LT. COL. DAVID V. CURRIE, V.C., ON RETIREMENT AS SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will have noticed that today, as has been the case on almost every day that the House has been in session since January of 1960, the mace was carried into the chamber by a very distinguished Canadian, Lieutenant-Colonel David V. Currie, holder of the Victoria Cross, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presence of a good many members of the security staff, over which the Colonel presides, in the corridors as he carried the mace today perhaps was an indication that this is a very special moment, because it is the last day on which the Colonel will fulfil that function. I have to take some responsibility for the fact that it may even have been an irregularity, due to the fact that the order in council appointing his successor has already been signed, and therefore he may be in here against the rules which he has been around to enforce for these 18 years. However, that is a responsibility which I will be glad to accept.

The responsibilities of the Speaker, at least those which are visible to the public, are well known. What is not well known is the range of responsibilities which touch the administration of the facilities which exist for members of the House of Commons, and that includes five buildings, two of which are under extensive renovation and all of which have to be provided with maintenance staff, security, all kinds of catering, restaurant facilities, and a whole range of services for which the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons bears full and total responsibility. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that any member of this House of Commons who has had the opportunity to travel to other legislative buildings around the world is able to return here and say that we rightfully take a very special pride in the first-class appearance and condition of these facilities which serve us in our work here in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: During the four years I have had the honour to serve as the Speaker, I can faithfully relate to hon. members that the dedication of the Colonel has been one which has gone far beyond the normal hours of work of anyone occupying any kind of post around these premises. He is here early in the morning and stays late at night. He is here on weekends, and he is always here when special events are on. He has served this House with such great devotion and dedication that I know all hon. members will want to join with me at this moment in saying to him, and to his good wife, that the rest and retirement to which he now proceeds are richly deserved, and all of the work he has done will make him one who will be fondly recalled and remembered by all hon. members of this House.

He is a distinguished Canadian, a distinguished soldier and a holder of the Victoria Cross before coming to this House. In this House he has served with the same kind of distinction with which he served his country prior to becoming the Sergeant-at-Arms, and I know all of us wish him a happy retirement and rest. Bon voyage; a job well done; and congratulations, Colonel, on behalf of all of us.

• (1117)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, your words have so well expressed our feelings this morning that it might seem unnecessary to add a single additional comment. However, this is one of the rare occasions in the House of Commons when the House can be in total agreement, even in the absence of all-party consultation. That total agreement, of course, is one brought about by our desire to express gratitude and good wishes to Lt. Colonel Currie.

I believe that words on this occasion can hardly do justice to the contribution that Colonel Currie has made to our country and to the House of Commons. Your Honour has already referred to his gallantry in time of war when he was awarded the Victoria Cross, held by very few persons. Indeed, in that select company Lt. Colonel Currie would be regarded as one of the most distinguished. He has carried into the House of Commons during his years of service that same dedication to duty and patience which was his hallmark during his service career.

I am sure that in all the years he has served us we have tried his patience and his endurance, but despite all these provocations he has maintained his fairness, his authority and his good humour. Accordingly, it is easy for me to express to him our admiration and respect on behalf of all those on this side of the House, and to add our good wishes to Mrs. Currie and to himself for many future years of happiness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be associated with my colleague, the government House leader, in this tribute to Lt. Colonel Currie today, not only as House leader for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition but in a very personal way. I hope that Lt. Colonel Currie has not forgotten that when he first came to Ottawa in 1960, he came to a very young lawyer, who has the floor of the House of Commons today, for advice on the purchase of his first house. It was on that occasion that I first met Lt. Colonel Currie. I have always admired his choice and judgment ever since.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He helped me, sir, when I moved into this House in 1972. I appreciated his kindness then, and his kindness to me and to all of my colleagues ever since.

In the citation recommending Lt. Colonel Currie's Victoria Cross, these words appear about him; that he showed "gallant conduct and contempt for danger." I can think of no greater attributes for a Sergeant-at-Arms in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): More than that, sir, it says that he "set a magnificent example to all ranks under his command". He has set an example to those who serve under him, to those of us who have had the privilege and honour of serving with him, of devotion to duty and adherence to principles. All of us in this House of Commons are sad to see him go.

• (1122)

I should like to join with my friend, the hon. government House leader, in paying a special tribute to Mrs. Currie. It was a happy occasion for members of parliament, during the course of their duties and their sojourn in this building, to meet Mrs. Currie, who is a kind, affable, warm and generous woman, second to none. I pay a very special tribute to her.

On behalf of my leader and my colleagues in the House of Commons, I hope the years of retirement for Lt. Colonel Currie are long and fruitful, that he enjoys the good health and the time to do the things which a very busy and distinguished career heretofore made impossible. He goes to the fruits of his retirement with our blessings and our thanks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join with Your Honour, and with the two House leaders who have spoken already, in this moment of tribute to our friend, Lt. Colonel David Currie. I do so on behalf of my leader and all members of the New Democratic Party.

I do so, as well, in a very personal way because of the privilege I have had these many years of being associated with him. In that connection, may I underline what has been said already about the fairness and the impartiality of his administration, which indeed carried with it a great many responsibilities. Certainly, Lt. Colonel Currie has performed the visible aspects of his office with distinction. He has been a part of this institution in a way that we shall long remember. But we are also conscious of the fairness and the impartiality with which he has dealt with the many requests we have made of him over the years.

Also, I join with the others in paying tribute to the gracious presence of Mrs. Currie. We have enjoyed very much having both of them with us in this building.

We are happy that Your Honour asked the House to take this time today to express our thanks to a distinguished servant of the House of Commons. Your Honour presented a problem when you suggested, because the relevant order in council has already been signed, that he is not properly here; but since the Sergeant-at-Arms is the only person who can eject someone from this place, I guess we have no option but to say we are glad he is still with us.

There is one other custom which is frequently followed in this place, namely, when comments are made by way of tribute to one in this place, that person can respond. It is unfortunate today that our rules do not permit a response from our Sergeant-at-Arms who is retiring. Perhaps that is just as well for the rest of us. He might have some things to say out of his 18 years of experience that are better put in his memoirs than on the record of Hansard.

On behalf of my party, I am happy to pay this tribute to Lt. Colonel David Currie. We are honouring him, but I should like to take the liberty of asking him to do something for me before he leaves the chamber today. One of my valued possessions is a book entitled, "Valiant Men—Canada's Victoria Cross and George Cross Winners", edited by John Swettenham. Before he leaves the chamber today, I should be very happy if Lt. Colonel Currie would autograph the page on which appears his picture and the citation related to his being awarded the Victoria Cross on August 18, 1944.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we, of the Social Credit Part of Canada, are quite pleased to join with other parties in extending our congratulations and thanks to Lt. Colonel Currie who has reached the age of retirement, and we are assured that he will know how to fill his retirement years as he did so well when he acted here, in the House of Commons, as Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. Speaker, I think that our party is doubly indebted to Lt. Colonel Currie, because members of our party have always sat closest to him, either to the left or to the right. I do not know whether it was because of our affection for him or if he was the one who attracted us to this side of the House, but we were pleased with it because we felt truly protected in the House. I feel duty bound to mention his sincere devotion towards us. When we first came here in 1962, since everything was new for us, we needed much guidance and it took a great deal of patience on the part of the Lt. Colonel. But we were fortunate enough to deal with such a diplomat—indeed I term him a diplomat—a conscientious and honest diplomat and, Mr. Speaker, a fair and honest man is hard to find nowadays. He knew how to deal with problems quietly and promptly. We can say of Lt. Colonel Currie that he did well what he had to do. I think it is the finest tribute one can pay to him. I wish him and his wife a long and happy retirement.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the years roll by. My memory goes back to the occasion when Colonel Currie first took his position as Sergeant-at-Arms. Of all the recommendations I made during my period of office, none gave me greater pleasure than the recommendation that he should be the Sergeant-at-Arms. Great in peace, great in war, and great in the hearts of the members of this institution through the years!

There is nothing one can add to what has already been said, except a personal word to Mrs. Currie and the Colonel. May happiness and sweet content be yours for years to come. Colonel, you have earned a rest after having presided over this institution, in so far as the administration of the law is concerned, for so many years. God bless you both and keep you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The question period will conclude at 12.15.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—REPORTED IMBALANCE IN EMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. It deals with the overview of the North American auto industry just completed and released by the treasury department in Ontario.

As the government has had these figures for several days, my question to the Minister of Finance centres on the revelation in the report that if Canadians had their fair share of employment in relation to retail sales in this country respecting the auto industry, we would have 25,000 more Canadians employed in that industry than we have at the present time: we would have 120,000 employed in the industry instead of 95,000 at the present time. Would the minister indicate if he agrees with that observation set out in the Ontario report and, if so, what is the government going to do to correct this imbalance?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the occasion to read the report presented by the Ontario administration. On some scores it is a subject of disagreement. But I would like to inform the House of Commons that since we signed the auto pact some years ago, the situation in the auto industry has improved fantastically in Canada. We have more than doubled the number of jobs and activities in that industry compared to the situation before the auto pact. Of course, the auto pact is not a perfect instrument and the government is always working to improve it. This is what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is attempting to do at this time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Finance. It is revealed in the report that if Canada had its fair share of North American investment as far as the auto industry is concerned, we would have an additional $866 million invested in Canada. Would the minister indicate if any discussions have taken place with the large automotive manufacturers in this country with a view to, first, determining whether they are giving us a fair share of the investment and consequently jobs and, second, if not, why are they not giving Canada a fair share of jobs and investment?

Mr. Chrétien: As I said, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report. The report has been made public. Nor do I know whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has had occasion to read it. I would like to say that the auto pact has been extremely good for Canada, although it is not a perfect instrument. The hon. member should know the type of criticism that the auto pact is receiving day in and day out in the United States: the people there are saying that it has been too good for Canada.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT IN AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. The Minister of Finance has indicated that the auto pact is extremely good to Canadians. The report from Ontario indicates that if we had our fair share of research and development in the auto industry, we would have 2,500 people employed in research and development in that industry alone, compared to virtually nobody at the present time.

Bearing in mind that $203 million, on average, in the last three years has flowed into the United States for research and development because we do not have people employed in that field, would the minister indicate whether he is aware of this fact? If so, what is his department doing to correct this imbalance?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, we are very much aware of this imbalance and one of our major concerns is the fact that the auto pact did not make provision for significant research and development in Canada in this industry. I know my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is negotiating with at least one of the major companies to establish a significant research and development facility in Canada.

To follow through on an additional point, it is my understanding that we enjoy in the automobile manufacturing industry, over-all, roughly 11.3 per cent of the employment and Canada represents approximately 8.8 per cent of the North American automobile market.

Mr. Stevens: That is not accurate.

Mr. Buchanan: Hon. members opposite keep saying it is not accurate, but I am told that the figures are, in fact, accurate.

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—CANADA'S DEFICIT IN AUTO PARTS MANUFACTURE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the conclusions of the Ontario treasury and economic affairs department which state that Canada is not getting its fair share of the benefits of the auto pact. In my riding of Parry Sound, for example, many people are out of work, which reflects the human problems behind the mounting deficit in auto parts.

In view of the fact that investment in Canadian auto parts capacity is stagnant in this country, while it continues to increase in the United States, will the minister tell the House why this government allowed the $3.2 billion deficit in auto parts to develop and why it has done nothing to correct the situation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add much to the point made by the hon. member. I have just informed the House that we are working constantly on this problem. I remember that some ten years ago, when we decided to set up an auto pact, the number of jobs in relation to the market in Canada was approximately 5 per cent or 6 per cent. We have doubled that percentage in the last ten years and increased substantially the number of jobs in proportion to the Canadian share of the North American market.

Mr. Stevens: That is not true.

Mr. Chrétien: You can always divide statistics here and there. I have said the auto pact is not perfect; however, it is a big improvement over the situation in that industry ten years ago. We are always working very hard to improve it.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, will the government assure the House that at the tariff negotiations at Geneva the auto pact will be treated as a package with other tariff measures, and there will be no signing of the GATT agreement without negotiation aimed at reaching a fair auto pact? Will he also assure the House that the standard tariff of 15 per cent which the automotive sector report said was vital to the health of the industry will remain in place?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the auto pact is an agreement negotiated between Canada and the United States; it is not a subject for bilateral discussion at Geneva because the GATT negotiations are of a multilateral nature.

COST OF MAINTAINING FLOATING DOLLAR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance concerning the recent announcement by his government that it intends to continue the insane policy of borrowing to prop up the Canadian dollar. Considering that the government has either borrowed or has on standby credit some $4 billion and is negotiating for another $1 billion, would the Minister of Finance confirm that the daily charges for the Canadian taxpayer, in terms of interest rates, for this monumental loan amount to approximately $750,000?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is false. I have replied to this question before. We are borrowing that money from abroad, which means that we do not have to borrow internally in Canada. Borrowing in either the United States or Canada involves interest rates. When we have American dollars in our reserves, if we lose those reserves the Canadian dollar balance-sheet increases and we do not have to borrow an equivalent amount in the Canadian market.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister would answer the question. Will he tell us how much in interest charges it is costing the Canadian taxpayer by borrowing? I say it is approximately $750,000 a day down the drain. I would like the minister to correct that figure if it is wrong.

Dealing in terms of job creation, considering that President Carter of the United States has maintained a floating dollar which has been a major instrument during the past 12 months leading to a situation in which the number of unemployed there has been reduced by one million, while the number of unemployed in Canada increased by 100,000, would the Minister of Finance tell the House why he has not opted for the policy pursued in the United States, that is, not to prop up the dollar but to increase export sales to benefit from the result of a lower dollar?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not on very solid ground. We used to be stronger than the American dollar, but in the past 18 months we have been approximately 12 points lower than their dollar. We floated our dollar and at the present time we are lower by 12 points. We are floating the Canadian dollar, but we are intervening in the market to ensure that it floats in a rational way. We have used this instrument to supplement the flow of capital into Canada that was lacking in the last three months.

● (1142)

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance is the only one who could maintain a sinking dollar and a floating dollar simultaneously: that is some achievement. Notwithstanding the $750,000 per day he is pouring down the drain in interest charges, has he read, or have his officials passed on to him a report prepared by the government of Ontario which points out that for each increase in the interest rate of 1 per cent, there is a negative impact on the economy—and we need stimulus in order to create jobs—of about $1 billion? If so, will he take action to stop any further increase in interest rates which the banks have indicated they are going to pursue?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we raised the interest rate of the Bank of Canada by 1 per cent last month and in fact most interest rates have not followed suit. For instance, Mr. Speaker, the interest rate on mortgages has gone up by one quarter of a point only whereas the interest rate of the Bank of Canada has increased by one point. Why? Because there is so much disposable savings in Canada at the present time that the various institutions compete against each other and therefore have not dared to boost their interest rates by as much as the Bank of Canada did, which is very good for the economy. As I see it, the hon. member's suggestion is not valid because the higher Bank of Canada rates have not been followed by a proportional rise in the interest rates of other institutions in Canada.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT OF GERMAN BORROWING

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance for clarification. Did I understand the minister to say that the borrowing was made in Germany, that if it had not been it would have been made in Canada, and that the borrowing in Germany has absolutely nothing to do with the value of the Canadian dollar on the exchange market?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I said that we are borrowing in foreign markets in order to increase the amount of United States dollars in Canadian reserves. When, through speculation or otherwise, we lose some reserves, the United States money is transformed into Canadian money. We are not losing, we are just transforming United States dollars, through the exchange market, into Canadian dollars. Our cash balance increases by that much, and as our cash balance is higher we are not forced to borrow as much in the Canadian market.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have that explanation, but it is exactly opposite to what the minister said in answer to the first question. I ask the minister why the government does not borrow from the International Monetary Fund, where the borrowing rate is 30 points cheaper than it is in the commercial market?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we borrow from the International Monetary Fund only when we have exhausted our credit and it is now obvious that Canada's credit is very good not only in the United States but also on the European markets.

NEW OFFER OF QUEBEC CONCERNING SALES TAX

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Following the last letter which the federal Minister of Finance addressed to his Quebec counterpart, a copy of which I have before me and for which I am deeply grateful, could the minister advise the House whether there have been any new developments in this conflict? Has the proposal he has made been received with either enthusiasm or reserve by the province of Quebec, and are there other possible solutions to this conflict which I consider very serious, considering the current state of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): It is like this, Mr. Speaker. In order to meet the particular situation which had resulted from Mr. Parizeau's unilateral proposals, I have modified my own proposal after consultations with my counterparts from the other provinces who had made commitments based on my proposal. I have changed mine and offered Mr. Parizeau to reduce the sales tax by 2 per cent on other items sold in Quebec and to assume the full costs. I am quite surprised that Mr. Parizeau should want to deprive Quebec taxpayers and consumers of this opportunity. I dare hope that when the election campaign is over sometime this year, Mr. Parizeau will realize that causing Quebec to lose this money will serve no purpose and that we will be able to compromise.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

As things do not seem to be improving, would the Minister of Finance be willing to remedy the situation by some other means, since the sales tax cut is intended to make more money available to consumers? Is the Minister of Finance willing to intervene in that field under federal jurisdiction, and let the provinces exercise their own jurisdiction, by reducing taxes at the manufacturing level which comes under federal jurisdiction? Thus the same objective would be attained, the same advantages would be given to all Canadian consumers and no one would quarrel. Is the minister willing to consider that proposal?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when my budget was being prepared, I did consider the possibility of reducing the federal sales tax, and had I not thought I could reach an agreement with most of the provinces, I should have opted for that possibility. The reason why I did not is that the federal sales tax is levied at the manufacturing level and I could not be sure that the tax cut at that level would have been passed on to the consumer while the provincial sales tax is paid after prices are set, and all Canadian economists, chambers of commerce and several other bodies advocated a provincial sales tax cut. That is why I offered to help them. Of course, if during the next five or six months, Mr. Parizeau maintains his stand, we may look into the alternative proposed by the hon. member, but then, if I resort to that, benefits will accrue not only to Quebec but to all the rest of Canada. In the circumstances, one must bear in mind that if Mr. Parizeau wants to deprive Quebec of $185 million, a solution must be found that is acceptable to the federal government and the finance ministers of the other provinces.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL CONSIDER QUEBEC'S SALES TAX PROPOSALS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister yesterday, I shall ask the following question as a good federalist, not as a separatist. The hon. member who has already asked a question saw yesterday that the unanimous vote includes the good Liberals in the Quebec National Assembly. Considering the unanimous vote to support Mr. Parizeau's proposal and given that in the manufacturing industries in Canada 30,000 out of the 36,000 jobs lost were in the province of Quebec, in a traditional sector such as the textile industry, is the minister seriously considering Mr. Parizeau's proposal without calling us separatists?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have already made some observations on this subject. If Mr. Parizeau wants to help the footwear and textile industries through his budget, which is what we have been doing for several months when we imposed quotas on imports, I think he is free to do so. If Mr. Parizeau now wants to cut the sales tax on children's clothing, a tax which he imposed last year, when everyone was saying it was a foolish step, if he wants to correct his errors, we should not have to foot the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I think that no other province had ever put a sales tax on children's clothing. So, if Mr. Parizeau wants to remove it in his budget, it is his own responsibility. As far as I am concerned, I made a proposal which was accepted by all the other ministers of finance. As the federal government, we made a number of proposals to the nine other provinces, and now Mr. Parizeau comes after the fact, just like a hockey player who jumps on the ice after the others have gone to the dressing room, and tries to score. I think it is rather ridiculous.

OBJECTION TO USE OF "SEPARATIST" IN CONNECTION WITH QUEBEC SALES TAX PROPOSALS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I have a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that in a recent memorandum the Minister of Finance informed his colleagues that he considers Quebec's proposal a separatist measure; in view of the unanimous vote given last night at the National Assembly and in view of the unanimous support given to the Quebec proposal by the minister's cousins, that is the Liberal members of Quebec, would the Minister of Finance have the honesty to withdraw the word "separatist", to answer all Quebecers—since all parties unanimously reject that word of the Minister of Finance—and to be fair, if only out of respect for his own province?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during three weeks we have had discussions with the other ministers of finance of Canada—

Mr. La Salle: Yes or no?

Mr. Chrétien: —and we have made proposals—

Mr. La Salle: It is a betrayal of the interests of Quebec. If I were you, I would feel embarrassed. It is a conspiracy.

Mr. Chrétien: And during three weeks we have in good faith put forward proposals to the nine other ministers of finance. We have made commitments. Mr. Parizeau has decided he wanted something completely different. He can put what he wants in his budget. As for me, I say the Canadian government is prepared to pay the $185 million if the Quebec government agrees to reduce by 2 per cent, without any cost to the Quebec treasury, the sales tax on other items in Quebec. Thus Quebec consumers would benefit from our measures as do all other consumers in the rest of Canada.

Mr. La Salle: I would be ashamed.

Mr. Ouellet: Tell us what Mr. Lévesque promised you, Mr. LaSalle!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ATTENDANCE OF IDI AMIN AT COMMONWEALTH GAMES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. There being widespread objection across Canada to Idi Amin being present at the Commonwealth Games, will the Deputy Prime Minister advise whether, in view of his diabolical, murderous conduct, he has been informed he would not be a welcome visitor to Canada during those games?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether there has been any direct communication with Idi Amin on this particular point. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already expressed the view that he would not be particularly welcome in Canada. However, as the right hon. member knows, Idi Amin has made it a point to escalate his interest in these events, saying he will attend in order to gather international publicity, so probably the most constructive thing we can all do is to forget about him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There has been too much forgotten about him already. I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he brought to the attention of Idi Amin, either officially or diplomatically, the fact that he will not be welcome in Canada, with his record which shocks the conscience of all people who believe in democracy?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that question was physically directed at me. I do not have responsibility for matters concerning the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will take notice of the question.

An hon. Member: Turn it over to the McDonald commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was quite surprised at the answer of the Deputy Prime Minister when he said the Secretary of State for External Affairs had answered this problem. I now ask him this question: Will he convince the Government of Canada to let Idi Amin know he is not wanted here, as he was told in respect of the prime ministers' conference in London last year.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already commented on this particular point along the lines of the answer I gave. I believe the right hon. member suggested that we ought to make it clear that we do not welcome him to these games. I think I have already made that clear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I don't think so; there is too much pussyfooting here.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DESTRUCTION OF RCMP SURVEILLANCE REPORTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. He informed us yesterday that presumably the 24 monthly reports covering the two-year period during which the present Minister of Supply and Services was solicitor general were destroyed. Can he explain today how a document of this nature, a report prepared exclusively for the Solicitor General, covering very important activities by a unit for which he is responsible, could be destroyed as a matter of routine procedure?

Second, how can such destruction take place without either a certificate of destruction or some record of destruction that would be immediately available to the Solicitor General?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows I replied to a question on the order paper relating to the destruction of records within the RCMP. I advised the House at that time there is no statutory requirement to keep any records of the destruction. I explained quite extensively the process that was followed in the destruction of these documents.

Mr. Jarvis: To say the least, it is alarming that, regardless of the statutory requirement, any solicitor general would not want to know when records of such a vital nature are destroyed. Yesterday the Solicitor General said the directives were fairly explicit that this type of report be destroyed after three years, but the reports for 1973, 1974 and part of 1975 were not destroyed because of the establishment of the McDonald commission.

I point out as a matter of arithmetic that the McDonald commission was established in mid-1977. Therefore, we have at least 18 of these monthly reports which miraculously are available subsequent to the tenure of the present Minister of Supply and Services which must have been retained in contradiction of these fairly explicit directives. Why can we get the documents for 1973 and half of 1974 but we cannot get the documents which predate those?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the documents themselves are the subject of destruction, as the hon. member has said. The McDonald inquiry was not formed until 1977. Indeed, there was an explicit order issued by my predecessor that no further documents should be destroyed which could be material to the McDonald inquiry. That order was followed. If the hon. member has any knowledge of large administrations, he will know that sometimes explicit directives are not followed explicitly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: Is the Solicitor General telling us that his immediate predecessor found out about this destruction and ordered it to stop with the 1973 reports? If I understood him correctly, he said that a counter order to the explicit directive was issued by his predecessor. Will he tell the House now whether his predecessor found out about the 1971 and 1972 destruction? If so, when did he find it out, and as a result of finding it out did he order such destruction to stop?

Mr. Blais: No, Mr. Speaker, I believe the order was a more general one, not directed to any specific event but just to ensure that all evidence was made available. Questions were asked of my predecessor in this House relating to destruction policies by, I believe, the hon. member for New Westminster. At that time, the then solicitor general indicated that he had issued an order that no further document be destroyed notwithstanding the directives contained within the administration itself.

Oral Questions

EXTRAPARLIAMENTARY OPPOSITION LISTS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Since it was the practice in the crucial 24-month extraparliamentary period for which these surveillance reports are missing to compile lists called extraparliamentary opposition lists, can the minister tell us the connection between the extraparliamentary opposition lists and the surveillance reports? Also, are these lists still with the security analysis group, in his office at this time, or have they been destroyed? Further, were the people who were innocent and named in those lists notified and offered redress?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has directed a very involved and complex question to me: there was an indication that somehow the extraparliamentary opposition lists were connected with these documents. I want to assure the hon. member that there is no connection.

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—SUGGESTED CANADIAN AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister: it is a return to questions on the Canada-U.S. auto agreement and why the government has failed to ensure that we get a proper proportion of jobs from it. The minister, in replying, said the Americans probably think it is too good for Canada. That is very likely true, given the fact that we have not been doing very much bargaining, and bearing in mind the government's defeatist attitude.

In order to ascertain government policy, I should like to put this question to the Deputy Prime Minister: Is there an alternative plan within the government to develop a national automobile industry if we do not get our fair share of jobs from the Canada-U.S. auto agreement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): The hon. gentleman's question is hypothetical, but I understand its implications. I gather he is recommending that we do away with the idea of a North American market for Canadian production and employment. That seems to me to be a somewhat unusual proposal.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I hope I will be excused if I do not make recommendations to the government, since ministers do not seem to pick them up. The Deputy Prime Minister paid attention to only part of what I was saying. The fact that at present the government has no alternative to the auto agreement simply means that the Americans can thumb their noses at this country because we have no bargaining position. I am asking the Deputy Prime Minister whether we are prepared to go on our own with a national auto industry should we fail to get our fair share of jobs out of the auto agreement.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe the Minister of Finance and others have stated in the House on more than one occasion that Canada has benefited greatly from this auto pact. Obviously there are problems which must be overcome, but to suggest that the pact be junked in favour of a Canadian domestic automobile market is, to my mind, somewhat preposterous.

Mr. Saltsman: I think the most preposterous suggestion is the one we have just heard, because Americans listening to it will simply refuse to pay any attention to improving our position. I asked the minister, and I hope he will reply, this question: Does the government have an alternative program so that we will not be at the mercy of the U.S. under this agreement and so they cannot do as they please with us?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already attempted to answer that question twice, and I do not think I would do any better if I were to make a third effort.

AGRICULTURE

STABILIZATION PAYMENTS TO POTATO GROWERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that it has now been twelve days since the minister announced in the House the decision to provide potato growers with stabilization payments, and in view of the fact also that the terms and the amounts of such interim payments have not yet been determined, can the minister advise the House this morning when a final decision will be made, since potato growers, especially in the maritimes, are protesting the fact that this decision is being delayed?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would hope very soon.

REVENUE CANADA

CIRCULAR RESPECTING POLITICAL ACTIVITIES OF CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister answering for the Minister of National Revenue who now rests in the other place.

An hon. Member: May he rest in peace.

Miss MacDonald: It concerns the circular sent out by Revenue Canada to all charitable organizations warning them that if they involve themselves in so-called political activities such as writing letters to MPs or to editors, their status as charitable organizations, and hence their tax exemptions, may be cancelled.

Since in the minds of many Canadians this is in direct violation of the right of individuals and groups to take an active interest in issues of important political significance, will the government immediately withdraw these ridiculous guidelines and bring in an amendment to the Income Tax Act which would do away with these outdated regulations? I am sure the minister will recall that this matter was first raised by the hon. member for St. John's East—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not the Acting Minister of National Revenue.

An hon. Member: Who is?

Mr. MacEachen: I can tell the hon. member, however, that the circular or guideline to which she has referred is presently under consideration. I cannot give her any assurance that it will be withdrawn, but I can tell her that it is being looked at.

Miss MacDonald: Will the minister give the House the assurance that an amendment to the Income Tax Act will be brought in to do away with these outdated regulations? Further, will he explain why at this time it was felt necessary, in light of the work done by the churches and charitable organizations in this country in addressing themselves to matters of social significance, to remind them that the making of written or oral representations "to all or mostly all members of parliament or ministers of the Crown as part of a campaign to influence intended or specific legislation is a political activity and as such cannot be properly carried on by a charity that wishes to maintain registered status"? What kind of interference with freedom of speech is that, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I cannot give the hon. member an assurance that we will introduce amendments to the Income Tax Act with respect to this matter within a short period. If the House is in session for an extended period, it may be possible to do so. I will look at the portion of the guidelines to which the hon. member has referred and try to provide an explanation of why it was thought necessary to communicate this advice to the churches.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN FISHING VESSELS VIOLATING QUOTAS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I will direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. According to recent reports, there is at present uncontrolled harvesting of fish stocks on the southeastern and southern edges of the Grand Bank just beyond the 200-mile limit, reports confirmed on Thursday of this week by officials of the Department of External Affairs.

Is the minister aware of this situation? Which countries are exceeding their quotas in this area where the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries still establishes quotas, and what steps does he intend to take to ensure that foreigners do not continue their uncontrolled harvesting while Canadians are required to adhere to strict quota regulations?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): There are reports that violations are taking place in the ICNAF area outside 200 miles. This question will, of course, be raised at the meeting of ICNAF which is to take place, if my memory is correct, in June. It is obvious that the regime outside 200 miles is in a state of flux until a new organization replaces ICNAF. This constitutes a difficulty. In fact, it argues rather strongly against those who believe that Canada's interests can be protected by closing the fence around waters within the 200-mile limit. In fact, we have vital interests outside that area. We are negotiating internationally. Indeed, a session of NAFO, which will be the successor to ICNAF, will be held in Ottawa for two days next week.

The situation to which the hon. member has referred may be just a pressure tactic on the part of some nations, designed to secure more liberal concessions, but we have made it clear that continued protection of Canadian interests outside will mean co-operation by Canada with respect to access inside. If there is a regime of disorder outside, we cannot then condone entrance into the Canadian zone to those who hurt our interests.

Mr. Crouse: The fishermen from Digby who appeared before the fisheries committee last week complained bitterly about quota regulations, and the provincial fisheries minister in Nova Scotia stated publicly on April 26 that the federal minister had failed to honour his pledge to consult and co-operate with his department and local fishermen.

In the light of the arbitrary, restrictive and discriminating regulations which have recently been applied against Nova Scotia fishermen, regulations which do not conserve fish stocks, I ask the minister whether he intends to implement the promise made at the recent first ministers' conference and consult all provincial ministers and fishermen before implementing regulations. If he does this, hopefully he will gain some information which will help him resolve the offshore problem which presently troubles all Canadians.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises another very important issue, which is the access to Georges Bank by the scallop fleet which traditionally has not fished there. The allegation that there were no consultations really does not hold water. In fact, I met with the group in Nova Scotia many months ago. My officials met repeatedly in an effort to find a solution to a very simple conflict, which is the conflict of the interest of one group which is totally dependent on the Georges Bank scallop fishery and the interest of another group which has access to other types of licences. It is obvious that these are management problems.

As for the complaint of the minister from Nova Scotia, I really must say that we cannot have negotiations with fishermen's groups, with processing groups and with provincial governments and then try to synchronize all of these every time we have to make a management decision. It is obvious that in the case of the management of the stocks the federal government, which is responsible—and, by the way, which has to carry the can when there is a disaster—will continue to assume that responsibility, even if it means that at times provincial ministers are not satisfied.

CANADA MANPOWER

BELL NORTHERN RESEARCH—ADVERTISING JOB VACANCIES IN ENGLAND

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration: it relates to advertisements appearing in the Daily Telegraph in London, England, placed by Bell Northern Research. Bell Northern Research is advertising for people to come to work in Canada where the main laboratories are situated in the green belt of Ottawa.

In view of the fact that this company is advertising outside Canada for employees, were these positions made available to Canadians? Were they cleared by Canada Manpower, especially in view of the fact that the electronics industry has been very hard hit: there is high unemployment in that industry. I wonder how the minister justifies the clearance of advertising jobs abroad when this industry has a very high unemployment rate.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pointed out that the advertisement was placed by the company. It was not placed by the government. We have made it quite clear to all industries and, as a matter of fact, to all governments that we have a "Canada first" policy and that if there are Canadians capable of doing a particular job, no one will be given either a work visa or a permit to come into the country to take that job.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, is the minister saying that job openings in advertisements such as the one in the Daily Telegraph have not been cleared by Canada Manpower, and that if people in the United Kingdom apply for these jobs they will not necessarily be cleared by Canada Manpower? Has that not taken place previously?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the specific instance to which the hon. member refers, but in the ordinary course of events companies in this country are well aware of the fact that we have high unemployment, that we have a "Canada first" policy and that if they intend to bring people into the country they must be people with skills which are needed and which cannot be found in Canadians. If jobs can be filled by Canadians, foreign workers will not be given work visas or permits to come into the country.

ENFORCEMENT OF 200-MILE LIMIT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and is supplementary to the question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for South Shore. Given the fact that by international treaty we already have mineral rights to the continental shelf, and that the continental shelf—and hence the Grand Banks—exceeds the 200-mile limit by certainly over 300 miles in places, is the minister prepared to use the substantial clout he has by virtue of his licensing authority within the 200-mile limit and the port facilities which we are now prepared to make available to foreign fleets to enforce quotas on our continental shelf? Failing this, is the government prepared to consider imposing the same jurisdiction on our continental shelf that we now have on the 200-mile limit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not an international lawyer but I think that the two issues, the question of mineral rights and the question of living resources, are quite separate. It is obvious—I think this is recognized by serious fishing countries—that there should be a regime of international co-operation in which stocks which move in and out of the 200-mile zone are managed as a unit and not fought over as they move in or out of the zone.

That would be a preferable system, and there is broad acceptance of the principle that Canada has a special interest outside the 200-mile zone. This is reflected in some bilateral agreements we have with at least five nations which have traditionally fished off Canadian shores. There is one difficulty: the European Economic Community finds it difficult to agree with that clause, but that will be the subject of further negotiation. I will certainly tie permits to access to the Canadian zone to behaviour outside the Canadian zone, because I think that is one of the strongest cards we have to play.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are two outstanding questions of privilege. One was raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) yesterday, and I indicated I would hear argument today. However, before doing that, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) has given me notice of a question of privilege and also indicated that he may want to reserve argument to another day.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HUNTINGTON—LEGAL PROCEEDINGS LAUNCHED BY VANCOUVER BRANCH OF CUPW

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I just returned from my riding last evening, so this is the first opportunity I have had to raise in this House what I believe to be a serious matter. In my opinion this matter involves an attempt to intimidate a member and to inflict pecuniary loss on a member through the use of the judicial process.

It involves a dispute which Mr. Whitaker, the president of the Vancouver local of CUPW, believes he has with me as a result of statements I made on May 5, 1977, before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. There was an interview subsequent to those statements on May 6. On April 17 of this year I received a statement of claim from the solicitors for CUPW. I have been in my riding for almost a week. The writ was issued back in July of 1977, on the original statement made in May of 1977.

I have discussed this with research personnel here, and I am told that the matter is serious enough to deserve serious research on the part of the research branch of the Library of Parliament. Therefore, I seek Your Honour's permission to guard my question of privilege by raising the matter after it has been properly researched, on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has given notice, and requests time to research the matter before delivering argument. I see no problem.

MR. STANFIELD—SURVEILLANCE OF CANDIDATES SEEKING PUBLIC OFFICE

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the motion introduced yesterday in this House by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) on a question of privilege.

I have given serious attention to the hon. member's concerns because, in my view, they express the feelings of hon. members on all sides of the House not only as they relate to privileges of members but also as they relate to the cherished democratic process which brings them here. In a democratic society such as ours, where freedom prevails and where freedom is dependent upon the electoral process, we should not suffer from any interference which would either enhance or hamper the efforts of candidates seeking office.

Following the publication of the article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on Wednesday, April 26, some hon. members of this House may have been led to believe that there could be surveillance of candidates, which might be construed as interference, or that the RCMP may have been involved in surveillance activities in the past and again more recently, contrary to guidelines issued by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1975, and contrary to assurances given by the Prime Minister to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to the effect that no member of this House has been the subject of surveillance by the security service of the RCMP since 1968.

I wish today to deal with those concerns and dispel any doubts that privileges of hon. members of this House may have been infringed.

Immediately upon reading the article on Wednesday I convened a meeting attended by senior members of the security service. The allegations referred to in the article were raised, and the existence of the documents confirmed. I then read very carefully their contents and had the opportunity to get acquainted with and discuss at some length the process outlined in those documents.

During Wednesday's question period, and again during the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Halifax, I referred to those documents as being related to national security and indicated that they referred to procedures which were the subject of review by the McDonald commission.

I would now like to deal with the first issue raised in the hon. member's motion. Contrary to what the motion states, I did not refuse to provide information with respect to surveillance of candidates by security forces. I merely pointed out repeatedly the sensitive nature of the documents and their review undertaken by the McDonald commission.

I am pleased to review the procedure followed by security forces as it relates to candidates during an election.

When the names of candidates seeking office become available to the security service, a name check is conducted against a list of persons known to belong to subversive groups or involved in subversive activities. If and when a candidate is positively identified as falling into that category, the fact of his candidacy is duly noted, and the security service continues to be legitimately interested in his or her activities. The security service has no interest in the other candidates, and the fact that their candidacy is brought to the attention of the security forces does not result in the initiation of any inquiry and surveillance of those candidates.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I can reiterate to this House that no person who has been a member of this House since 1968 has been the subject of surveillance by the security service. As I indicated earlier to the House, and to the hon. member for Halifax on Wednesday, and in this instance refer the House to page 4888 of Hansard, this assurance had been given previously by the Prime Minister and by my predecessor.

As to the second issue raised in the motion, I never contended that the "McDonald commission was the only vehicle to investigate a question affecting the privileges of all members of the House of Commons." I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that no member of this House would advance that proposition.

I repeatedly stressed in previous statements to the House that the procedures contained in the operational manuals were the subject of review by the McDonald commission, and that, being relevant to security service operations, were not discussed openly in the House. Throughout my answers, and in reply to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Halifax, I always referred to the procedures as being reviewed or under study by the McDonald commission, and again I never gave an indication that none of them could be discussed in this House.

I think that all members of this House realize the necessity of the existence of a security force. I am sure that the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) was stating the position of all members of this House when, in a letter to my predecessor on August 12, 1977, he raised that particular issue, and I quote:

> In a free society, it is foolish to argue that no security forces are required. Both our own history and that of the modern world in general have revealed the existence of small groups committed to the use of violence in pursuing their objectives. No serious democrat can ignore this reality. Security forces have then a democratic mandate to monitor such groups as a means of ensuring civil order.

The mandate of the security service is one which is in accordance with the objectives seeking to protect our democratic institutions in this country. No candidate is the subject of surveillance because he adheres to a legitimate political party. But members must realize that if anyone in this country is acting contrary to the interests of our nation by advocating undemocratic means or violent means to attain their goals, those people then become legitimate targets of our security forces.

And this is where, Mr. Speaker, every member of this House, and every citizen of this country sharing our belief in our democratic system, must understand and realize the importance of countering activities which, under the cover of legitimate organizations, seek to undermine the basis of that very system.

I believe that the Prime Minister in his answer to the Leader of the Opposition last October stated very clearly the position of this government and the role of the RCMP when he said:

> No person in Canada is immune from observation, surveillance or detection, if it is determined that such person has been or is engaged in activities that are defined in the Official Secrets Act as being subversive.

I am certain that members of this House share the concern of the government in ensuring that the political process not be interfered with by known subversive elements intent on weakening or even destroying our national democratic institutions. The political parties represented in this House will not stand for such an infiltration.

I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, first of all I believe that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has cleared up one aspect which formed the subject matter of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). If I understand the Solicitor General correctly, he has now confirmed that questions in this general area may quite properly be put in this House from time to time. That was one aspect of the concern of the hon. member for Halifax.

Secondly, the Solicitor General has confirmed the existence of documentary material generally called, I believe, an operations manual, or whatever title it might have, that would contain the procedures under which our security service would operate in terms of political candidates and their supporters. I would maintain that the existence of the manual may raise a question of privilege, sir. I believe the Solicitor General said quite clearly that there is no question of privilege because of the way the procedures have been implemented. I am not quite sure I am prepared to accept that, nor would I believe that many members would be quite prepared to accept that.

We have a situation where a person nominated for political office is checked against a subversive list. I do not know what lists are subversive. In this House we have heard for many months now about the EPO list. Is that a subversive list, sir? I do not know. My name may be on it, and other names may appear on it. It could be that the name of a candidate to be nominated tonight in any one of our ridings may be on that so-called extraparliamentary opposition list. In my opinion that would give rise to a question of privilege.

While the Solicitor General did not confirm the accuracy of the entire Globe and Mail story, neither did he deny it. For example, I notice in that story that a contributor who gives more than $10 to a particular candidate may be the subject matter of a report in the implementation of the procedures in this manual. I think that would affect my privileges. If a number of my potential supporters, who are prepared to contribute to my campaign a sum in excess of $10, might be subject to surveillance simply because their contribution was over that specific amount, I believe my rights and privileges would be affected. These contributors might choose to support me in ways other than monetary donations and similarly become the subject matter of surveillance under these manuals.

I am happy to hear from the Solicitor General the manner in which he believes a manual is being implemented. However, I would suggest that the mere existence of a manual, which is quite properly before the McDonald commission but in no way abrogates the rights of the highest court in the land, has to give rise, in my opinion, to the dangers that can flow from two things; the existence of the manual and the fact that its procedures are being implemented by cross-checking against certain lists of which I know absolutely nothing.

As a potential member of parliament from any one of the more than 280 ridings in the next election, I would feel very strongly that in this particular case this should form the subject matter of a serious question of privilege and be referred to that group of our creation which is charged with the responsibility for investigating such matters.

The fact that no member of parliament has been the subject of surveillance since 1968 is of precious little comfort. I am happy that is so, but it provides me with no comfort for the future. If a candidate for the 1978 or 1979 election potentially is subject to surveillance because of this manual, that provides me with little comfort. If he is the subject of surveillance because he is a candidate and not because he has been involved in subversive activities—

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Mr. Jarvis: The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) can indicate no; but if a nominated person in my riding happens to be on the EPO list, for example, according to what was said by the Solicitor General, he can be subject to surveillance. That affects the rights and privileges of members, as well as of potential members. I am not sure there should be a distinction, because the ballot boxes determine that, and not the House of Commons.

While I welcome much of what was said by the Solicitor General, and his apparent willingness to acknowledge the right of hon. members to ask questions in this area, I disagree with him when he denies that this is the proper subject matter of a question of privilege.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we heard a good many words from the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) this morning. Of course some of them are reassuring, but we are not reassured as to the basic issue.

The question raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) deals with the fact that privileges of parliament may have been breached, because certain members of parliament are to be subjected to surveillance by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We realize that being a candidate or a member of the House does not grant absolute exemption from normal security inquiries. What we are talking about here is someone who, by reason of his candidacy, is considered to be subject to surveillance. We are told the only persons concerned in this matter are those who are on a list of subversives.

The word "subversive" is so broad that it might include a wide variety of individuals. We do not know which of us is regarded by the police as being subversive for some reason or other. We do not know which of the candidates in the forthcoming election will be regarded as subversive. So, we are left with the proposition that a list can be used for the purpose of selecting members of parliament to be put under special surveillance. This is not because they were suspected of some wrongdoing long before they became candidates or members, and thus are subjected to surveillance, but simply because of the fact they were nominated, and thus are subject to potential surveillance by the police. That is an infringement of the rights of hon. members.

I forgot to bring with me the report of a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday. The report appeared in the newspaper this morning. He defined the list of those who could be subjected to surveillance, which definition was far more broad than that of the Solicitor General. The definition of the Solicitor General is very loose. I do not know of anything which could be considered looser than the use of the word "subversive". For example, in the State of New York, under the American constitution the word "subversive" has been found to be unconstitutional because of its vagueness and the impossibility of giving any particular meaning to it. What we are told envisages an investigation which may well breach the privileges of members of the House.

I hope I correctly understood that the minister withdrew his suggestion which indicated that because some of the matters involved in this were being considered by the McDonald commission, the privileges of this House may well be curtailed. I understood him to withdraw that suggestion. Thus, obviously it is not worth my time, nor the time of the House, to enlarge upon it. However, I want to repeat what I said the other day. This House is supreme. Perhaps it is some sort of perversion that a person cannot be tried twice on the same matter; but because subject matter is being looked into by a commission there is no reason for the rights or privileges of members to be curtailed in any way.

I am not clear as to how far the minister withdrew his suggestion. I think he indicated that it was not a consideration. He referred to this subject being a security matter once again. I warn the minister and the House against taking a blanket like the word "security" and casting it over entire subject matters. In the name of security, crimes have been committed and many rights have been denied to people. The use of the word "security" as an alibi for wrongful deprivation of rights is all too common.

If a member of this House is accused of some subversive activity, he is not subject to immunity; but because his name happens to be on a list he should not be subject to surveillance. We know how accurate these lists are and the lack of gifts certain police officers have in their selection of people who are regarded as being subversive. In fact we have been told that everyone in the province of Quebec who is a separatist is also a subversive. I do not have to agree with separatists, but the idea that the entire province of Quebec and a large number of the people in that province are subversive is absurd. Therefore, I maintain the question of privilege put forward by the hon. member for Halifax is proper.

I hope Your Honour will consider the matter and that it will be referred to committee. There is nothing which infringes the privilege of members more gravely than this. Simply because a person ventures to run for office does not mean he should be subjected to surveillance, which otherwise he would be free of, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a certain amount of misunderstanding as to the procedure which is alleged to be the basis of this question of privilege. I hope I can assist in clearing up some of that misunderstanding. Before doing so I should like to refer to the motion before us submitted by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield).

● (1242)

If the allegations in the motion were found to be accurate, and I submit they are not, I do not see how the motion itself could become the basis for a question of privilege. What the motion does is make allegations against the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) that he has refused to provide certain information and has taken a certain view in respect of the McDonald commission and what is its role. Even if the allegations were correct, I do not believe the motion itself is a basis for privilege. It could be a grievance against the minister registered by the hon. member for Halifax.

However, even within the motion there are a number of factual errors. For example, it is assumed there is surveillance by the security forces of political candidates. Of course that is not the case. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), in the course of his remarks, returned again and again to the notion that merely because a person was a candidate for political office he was then a fit subject for surveillance by the RCMP or by the security force. Of course that is not correct.

It ought to be put clearly on the record that we are not dealing with a procedure that has been commenced recently. I am advised that this particular procedure, which is the subject of these discussions, goes back to the mid 1940's, and that it may extend earlier than that. Certainly it was not commenced in 1971, which is the alleged date of the manual. It extends back to the mid 1940's and includes the regime of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his predecessor, of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and of several prime ministers earlier than that. It is very difficult to suggest, on the basis of history, that the privileges of the members of parliament have been infringed upon in any way as a result of this particular procedure.

There is a feeling constantly being put forward in the House of Commons that because we are members of parliament we have special privileges, and that special privileges are sought for members of parliament on such a broad front. I was elected to this House of Commons not to extend privilege but to do as much as I could to narrow the scope of privilege, and I take a rather dim view of the suggestions that have been made, not only in this case, that members of parliament have certain privileges which are not available to other citizens of the land.

I want to make the point very clear that privilege is a very narrow concept when it is applied to members of parliament, and we ought to be rather prudent and economical in attempting to draw to ourselves certain privileges which are not accorded to other citizens and are not necessary to us in order to discharge our duties as members of the House of Commons.

If this particular procedure has been in operation, as is my information, since the mid 1940's, it is difficult for any hon. member to suggest that his performance as a member of parliament has in any way been infringed.

What the Solicitor General has said is that the names of political candidates are cross-checked against existing information within the security service. There is not an investigation of candidates, there is not surveillance of candidates, and there is not a reporting upon of candidates as has been suggested in the press and in the House.

Names of candidates are checked against security information within the files of the security service. It is another matter to debate what is security, but we are not debating that today. The names are checked against existing information within the files, and if a particular name is correlated to existing information then that particular candidate could be of further security interest to the security service, and that is all.

Surely it is the mandate of the security service to direct its efforts against subversion and subversive activity in Canada conducted by any person against Canada. That mandate reflects the provisions of the law of the land contained in the Official Secrets Act and other federal statutes such as the Criminal Code.

Any argument that the security service ought to be fettered simply because an individual is a candidate for public office or, indeed, if he becomes elected to the House of Commons, would certainly be contrary to the spirit of the letter of the law and, I believe, to the wishes of the Canadian people.

It is assumed in all the arguments that any particular individual who might become a subject of interest to the security service because of information already existing in the files of the security service has provoked a reaction or provoked a response that might require further interest on the part of the security service. To suggest that candidates or members of parliament are the object of surveillance, investigation, or reporting upon during a campaign is wrong. It is only when a particular name has a correlative body of information within the security files that any further interest is exhibited. That is as I understand it.

The fact that the interpretation has been quite strict and narrow is, it seems to me, clearly demonstrated by the assurance that has been given by the Prime Minister that no member of parliament has been the subject of surveillance by the security service during his period as prime minister. It seems to me in this particular case it is impossible to draw exaggerated conclusions from a practice that has existed for a long time and which, in its application, has not resulted in surveillance by the security service of any member of parliament during the last ten years.

I am not going beyond that because what I have said is not to suggest that surveillance has taken place earlier, but the assurance has been given that it has not taken place during the leadership of the present Prime Minister. We are talking about a varied procedure, as I have described, which comes into play only when a name provokes a response based on existing security information, or if there is an association with subversive activity. I do not believe that this can be concluded as being a breach of the privileges of any member of parliament, or the breach of the privileges of any citizen of the land who would be subjected to precisely the same kind of interest.

Mr. Jarvis: That is not right, that is the point.

Mr. MacEachen: Hon. members may say that candidates for elective office should not be treated in this way at all, and I can agree with that. That can be argued both ways, and I think that on the grounds of privilege it is very difficult to argue that this particular procedure, which has been in effect since 1945 and which has not resulted in the surveillance of any member of parliament, on the assurance of the Prime Minister, in the last ten years, could be construed as a breach of the privileges of the members of parliament. I am not implying, by using the ten year period, that it has not occurred earlier. I am using the ten year period because it is based on the statement that has already been made by the Prime Minister of Canada. I hope that we are not drawing unwarranted, exaggerated conclusions from this particular procedure that has operated in the way that I have described. I have attempted to describe the situation faithfully based on conversations I have had with the Prime Minister and others who are involved in this particular problem.

Mr. Speaker: I see that four other hon. members have indicated their desire to contribute to this discussion. Obviously, it will have to be continued after the lunch hour adjournment.

There is a matter to which I would like those who are intending to participate in the debate to direct their attention. What the hon. members are concerned about, and what they ought to be concerned about, is whether in fact some regime or procedure exists which may call into surveillance a candidate for office to the House of Commons, or in fact a member of the House of Commons. That is the concern that is at the core of the question and, certainly, the members who have spoken already have expressed their concern about that.

The difficulty that I want to bring to the attention of members at this time is that we are now arguing this point under a motion which has got two procedural difficulties and which, in fact, prevents us really from arguing the basic question. I have permitted hon. members to argue up to this point, and I indicate that I will let other hon. members participate—the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal). There may be others as the discussion carries on.

Before one o'clock, perhaps we may be able to solve the problem that the present motion raises. There are two matters: first, the refusal of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) to provide information, and secondly, the contention advanced by the Solicitor General that the McDonald commission is the proper vehicle for this. Regardless of the arguments one way or another as to the merits of both matters, the Solicitor General has in fact denied those statements. He has said that he has provided information and, furthermore, that he has never contended that the McDonald commission is the only vehicle for this. He has said that today, and whether that can be totally accepted or not is not the point. It merely brings it into dispute.

Therefore, in a very fundamental, procedural way, what we are talking about is a matter that is in dispute and that has never formed the subject matter of a question of privilege. We have never taken a dispute or a disagreement between members of this House and transferred it to a committee to determine who is right and who is wrong. Thus, we are labouring at least under that procedural difficulty, and possibly others. The hon. Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) may be right when he says that, even if these allegations were true, they might be a grievance and not a question of privilege.

For the moment, let us agree that we are labouring under difficulties which seem to be insurmountable in the procedural sense, and, even if it did constitute privilege, it has now been denied by the Solicitor General which, therefore, makes it a matter of dispute and not of privilege.

The difficulty for the Chair is that that procedural problem does not set aside the basic problem that rests at the core of this matter, which may now come to light, or it may not, I do not know. However, the contributions that have been made now indicate that there may be some regime in existence which may be offensive to members and which they may want to put in the form of some motion. I refer, not to the actions of the Solicitor General, but to the existence of some regime, if it is in fact an offensive one, that has been disclosed today in argument.

I am considering that those members who may want to participate would be better served in their position if the contributions to the debate today could be reflected upon. Of course I would set aside the outstanding motion on procedural grounds, because I have to do that on the basis of what I have just put forward. Then hon. members who are concerned with this problem will have the opportunity to examine the contributions that have been made and to determine if, in their opinion, there is at the core of this the existence of some regime. This in turn might form the substance of another motion which could be renewed and introduced on Monday.

However, I am perfectly prepared, in fairness, to hear all the hon. members before trying to decide on this particular question of privilege which, in any case, would be without prejudice to the introduction of another motion on the basis of these arguments. In any event, we ought to deal with this basic procedural problem, and I am in the hands of the members who I have already indicated are prepared to participate. Perhaps I could have some indication as to how we should proceed.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, that we basically deal with these things from a procedural ground. That is not a criticism, but merely a comment. I could give you argument as to why, when the motion was put by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), it was relevant on the day it was put from the point of view of the question period of that day. However, that is something I feel I should not engage either you, sir, or the House in at this point.

It is important that we examine the statements made today in light of what has been said by you, sir, on procedural grounds so that the matter will not be lost and we can deal with the merits of it. The merits certainly are not those put forward by my friend, the government House leader, that any member of parliament, least of all the member for Halifax, was trying to garner unto himself as a member a matter of special privilege that ought not to be vested in anyone else in the community. The fact of the matter is, and my friend overlooked it or skated around it, that with respect to political candidates there is a special manual.

The question that arises in my mind, and I am sure in the minds of a lot of people, is whether there is a special manual for lawyers, bankers, priests and others. The question is just what is the procedure, and not that a security procedure exists. Having said that, sir—and if you could take your eyes from the clock for a moment—would it be appropriate, since the hon. member for Halifax is not here, if we did stand this matter over until Monday so that he could consider what was said? He could also consider your observations with respect to the motion, and then we could deal with the matter on Monday in a way that would be procedurally correct. With respect, that would be my suggestion to you.

Mr. Speaker: The only other step that I had in mind would be to set aside this particular motion on procedural grounds, without prejudice to the right of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), or for that matter to any other member, to reintroduce a motion on the same subject. I do not have to take that step now, however, but I wanted to indicate my thinking on it.

There is a procedural difficulty with this particular motion, but there still is at the core of the matter the possibility of a regime which may be odious to members of the House of Commons and which might form the subject of another question of privilege entirely. Therefore I shall suspend further discussion on this particular motion until Monday afternoon at three o'clock, at which time there may be an indication, after study, that some other motion might be introduced or some other indication that might be helpful to the House in these deliberations. This matter is therefore suspended.

Before leaving the chamber I wonder if we might not attempt to tidy up the routine proceedings in order that we may go to orders of the day at two o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 1,417.

[Text]

PRIVATE PENSION PLANS

Question No. 1,417—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many persons are receiving pensions from private pension plans, such pensions being based on employment in Canada, and what is the average pension per month received by such persons?

2. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 1, how many (a) are having their pensions escalated annually at a rate equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) are having their pensions escalated annually at a lesser rate (c) receive no annual escalation of their pensions?

3. How many persons are contributing to or are enrolled in private pension plans based on their employment in Canada?

4. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 3, how many are in plans which provide (a) after retirement, for an annual escalation of their pensions at a rate equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) after retirement, for an annual escalation at a lesser rate (c) for no escalation, after retirement, of their pensions?

5. How many persons in Canada are receiving retirement benefits from annuities, insurance plans, retirement savings plans, or other schemes apart from employment-related pension plans, and what is the average amount per month received by such persons from such plans?

6. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 5, how many (a) are having such benefits escalated annually at a rate equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) are having their benefits escalated annually at a lesser rate (c) receive no annual escalation of their benefits?

7. How many persons in Canada are enrolled in retirement plans of all types other than employment-related pension plans?

[Mr. Speaker.]

8. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 7, how many are enrolled in plans which will provide, after the payment of benefits commences, for (a) an annual escalation equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) an annual escalation at a lesser rate (c) no escalation?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as Statistics Canada is concerned: 1. In the taxation year 1975 benefits from private pension plans in Canada were received by 690,500 beneficiaries. The average benefit for the year was $2,607.

3. Participation in private pension plans in Canada stood at 3.9 million workers at the beginning of 1976.

4. (a) 754,517 members were in plans that provided for the annual escalation of pensions after retirement at a rate equal to the Consumer Price Index. (b) 281,343 members were in plans that provided for the annual escalation of pensions after retirement at a lesser rate. (c) 2,866,638 members were in plans that provided no escalation of pensions after retirement.

In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned: 2, 5, 6, 7 and 8: There are no departmental programs to capture this information either by analysis of documentation filed for registration purposes or through filing of special information returns.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen (for Mr. Andras) that Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to be back in Ottawa, having arrived back last night to find Bill C-10 before the House. I am sorry I missed the opportunity to debate it on second reading but I am grateful to be here to make a few comments on third reading.

In my capacity as chairman of the Standing Committee on Pulbic Accounts I would take this opportunity to pay tribute to the members who have served so well and worked so hard this session on that committee. We have been deeply involved in the subject of the establishment of a comptroller general as well as in finding ways to improve the financial control and management systems throughout the departments, agencies, and Crown corporations of the government.

I would particularly like to pay tribute to the members on the Public Accounts Committee from the government side. I hesitate to single out any particular member, but in the work we have been doing these last few months, involving an average of four meetings a week, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre), the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), and I have all worked long and hard on the second report of the committee on Crown corporations, which we tabled two weeks ago. For members on the government side, particularly, this is a low profile committee which works hard at fundamental subject matter, trying to build a new and stronger foundation, under the operation, control, and management of our federal resource. I am grateful to these members as well as to my colleagues on this side of the House for the hard work they have put into the carrying ont of their responsibilities.

I would also like to pay tribute to the Auditor General, Mr. J. J. Macdonell, who has presented the House with three fundamental reports which have led to improving the structure, the financial management control system and the degree of accountability. He has acted in a manner which will relieve the Public Accounts Committee from having to deal with matters which repeat year after year in the Auditor General's report. As a result of Mr. Macdonell's approach to his responsibilities, and he is an officer of parliament reporting to parliament through the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, a sound foundation is being laid for the departments, agencies, and Crown corporations of the federal government, and I believe the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is functioning in a manner whereby proper review and accountability are now being noticed throughout these various aspects of the federal government.

In considering Bill C-10 to amend the Financial Administration Act, an act primarily to appoint a comptroller general, it is important to note that the growth of government has probably been too fast and has been ahead of any infrastructure offering the type of control and accountability that we, as members, should demand on behalf of our constituents.

The tireless efforts of the Auditor General through the Standing Committee on Public Accounts have brought a realization that a chief financial officer is indeed needed at the Treasury Board level. Having worked on this subject matter for some time now, I can see the sense of the chief financial officer, the comptroller general, reporting through the Treasury Board to the House, though some of my colleagues may disagree with me. He is the one responsible for putting in place within our agencies, departments, and Crown corporations, mechanisms which will demand a better performance in the management of our tax resource.

The Auditor General is always dealing in a post-audit capacity, and the Public Accounts Committee is always dealing after the fact. Now we have a man who can start to structure and put in place very capable people. Although I have not met Mr. Rogers I look forward to doing so. Comments I have already heard about the gentleman are very well worded indeed and it would appear that this thirtieth parliament will at least have taken an effective approach to financial management controls and utilization of the tax resource. It will be up to the members of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts in the future, along with the Auditor General, to make sure that this new office functions properly. I am sure it will come under review on at least an annual basis.

The duties, responsibilities, and relationships of the comptroller general are well known. They are on public record in several places, and for the purposes of this speech I can refer to the statement of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), made in this House on April 25, 1977. Again, in the 1977 Auditor General's report, on page eight, the Auditor General highlighted the duties of this new officer, and I would like to put them on the record again at this time. I am quoting from paragraph 2.7 of the 1977 Report of the Auditor General as follows:

> In general terms, the comptroller general will be responsible to the Treasury Board for the quality and integrity of the financial control systems and administrative policies and practices in use throughout the federal public service. The greater part of the responsibilities of this new office will comprise those which were assigned to the Financial Administration Branch of the Treasury Board Secretariat, on its creation in March 1976. There will be a special "functional" relationship between the comptroller general and the chief financial administrators of departments, agencies and corporations, thus enabling the Comptroller to provide necessary guidance, while maintaining the principle of decentralized management adopted as a result of the Glassco Commission's recommendations . . .
> By this action, this appointment, which will entail a major restructuring of the Treasury Board Secretariat, we reiterate our determination to maintain the highest possible standards of control through the creation of an office that could best be described as the "chief financial administrator of the Federal Public Service".

These duties and responsibilities are also outlined in the report of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates of March 16, 1978, issue No. 7 at pages 14 and 15. I will not burden the listening ability of my hon. colleagues, but I suggest that the responsibilities of the comptroller general as outlined there are very important. There are about 20 of them in all, and it would probably take too much time to put them all on the record here in this House.

I think it is important that we do not lose sight of the fundamental recommendations of the Auditor General. One of those recommendations is that we should establish the office of comptroller general, which we are doing with Bill C-10. It would be advisable to select carefully a truly outstanding individual as the first comptroller general. I understand that Mr. Rogers has come to us and is prepared to take this position. He comes to us from a very high and successful position in the private world. I would like to pay tribute to that man for placing the public interest and his own sense of responsibility ahead of material gain which he could perhaps have continued to enjoy in the private sector.

I pay personal tribute to him for coming into the federal system and accepting this high and important office. He will be pioneering the role of delivering to the people of Canada a new standard of accountability and a new and more effective utilization of resources. I think it is very important that he not only audit and put into place control mechanisms for financial accountability but also, as part and parcel of that internal audit system, that he go back and view the original objectives which brought about the original appropriations. In too many cases we have found that departments, agencies, and some Crown corporations have gone far beyond the parameters which were originally intended. Mr. Rogers, the new comptroller general, certainly has a challenge ahead of him and, judging by what I hear, he is certainly the man who can lead us out of the wilderness and into a more disciplined way of life and standard of performance.

I would not like to lose sight of the major task which will confront this office, and that is to regain control of the public purse. I believe a few people have quoted from reports of the Auditor General which pointed out that public expenditures are out of control, so with this appointment we have a chance to regain control of public expenditures before the fact rather than after the fact. We will have a chance to control the growth of government expenditures to the extent that the Canadian taxpayer will get value for his tax dollar in terms of economy, improved efficiency, and effectiveness of government programs.

That leads us to another very fundamental concept which the Auditor General would like to see, particularly through the office of the comptroller general, and that is the value for money concept which has been so lacking in the past performance of this government, its departments, agencies, and Crown corporations.

Another objective is to improve greatly the present state of financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of government which, according to the Auditor General in his 1975 report, is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness. Another objective is to improve greatly the present weak state of financial management and control in Crown corporations by providing the necessary co-ordination and guidance which, according to the Auditor General in his 1976 report, are virtually non-existent.

I am basically not in favour of putting the comptroller general into a straitjacket at this time. I can understand the anxiety of my hon. colleagues on this side of the House who say they do not trust the government on the basis of past performance. They have tried to tie this new office down within some parameters which are recognizeable and which can be defined, but I submit that in the references I have given, and particularly in the record of proceedings of the Standing Commmittee on Public Accounts regarding responsibilities of the comptroller general, the government and the Treasury Board have made it clear as to what these responsibilities will be. The Auditor General has urged that this new office be created to watch the situation, and there are some very knowledgeable people on the Standing Committee on Public Accounts who will be watching with astute interest and who will be very anxious to see what is happening. If this new office fails, it will be our fault for not following through with a continuous watch on procedures and on improvements. I question whether we should tie the new comptroller general into a strait-jacket. He comes to us well recommended and with a reputation for great ability at organization.

I suggest that the new comptroller general be given a period of time to review procedures and the concerns which are on record, and to meet with the Auditor General, the President of the Treasury Board, and the various officers of the Treasury Board. I can see coming out of that a pattern of gradual organization which will last well into the future. If that does not happen, then we in this House must again make demands through the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Let us not forget the important distinction between the responsibilities of the comptroller general and those of the Auditor General. I remind hon. members that the comptroller general, as the most senior financial officer of the government, must be responsible for the introduction and implementation of sound financial systems and the correction of defective systems, and can be accountable to parliament for the financial policies of the Treasury Board and for their successful implementation. The Auditor General, on the other hand, as an officer of parliament, must be responsible to the House of Commons for the annual statutory review of the accounts of Canada and for the identification of financial mismanagement, inefficiency, waste and so forth in government departments, agencies and Crown corporations owned or controlled by the government, including the office of the comptroller general.

The duties of the Auditor General are well established. The function of the Public Accounts Committee of reviewing the progress of departments, agencies, and Crown corporations and their financial management and control systems is also established. That review process is well in place and working. The committee calls before it only those departments, agencies, and Crown corporations which are not making a truly genuine effort to put sound accounting and financial management and control systems into place. The challenge ahead for the committee and for the comptroller general is to implement value for money concepts for which I think every taxpayer in Canada would be very grateful.

Let us not forget the importance of the role of the Public Accounts Committee. It has been an underestimated, low profile committee. However, I believe its day has come. I urge more hon. members to get involved with that committee because that committee is an avenue by which we can start to understand the fundamental structure under the Government of Canada, its performance, and its weak points. Those things are exposed to the committee. The interesting thing about the Public Accounts Committee is that it has moved into areas of fundamental structure. The last two reports of that committee, if read in detail and with attention by members, would show the substance of the work that has taken place. It is interesting to note that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is becoming well staffed with research capabilities. The research officer who has been assigned to the committee has done yeoman's service. I believe he is entitled to our thanks.

In addition to that we have a person with a Master of Business Administration degree, as well as lawyers and chartered accountants from outside the government who are available to us for consulting purposes. I believe the quality of the report and the work which is being tabled in this House are directly due to the ability of parliament to start structuring a committee which has such a fundamental importance to this House.

The committee's desire to see the system of financial accountability to parliament by Treasury Board, departments, agencies, and Crown corporations has been strengthened, as I have just outlined. That is fundamental to the work of the comptroller general and the ongoing work of the Auditor General. The government House leader has now allowed permanent reference of the report of the Auditor General and the Accounts of Canada, which means that committee is one of the first to get off the mark in any session of parliament. The committee will be responsible for the review of the performance of the office of comptroller general and his progress in strengthening the financial management and control practices within this government.

I explained to the House that the committee is starting to take on a structure of importance which perhaps has not been generally recognized by members at large before. I believe the new office of comptroller general is the dawning of a new era in financial management in government. It behooves all of us to give it full encouragement and to make it work.

The tabling of the second report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts dealt at length with the problems that exist within Crown corporations. The growth of Crown corporations is an example of the degree to which the operations of the government went out of control. Actually in terms of legislation, there are only 41 legitimate Crown corporations. And yet, in the proceedings leading up to our second report, we asked Treasury Board what was the total number of Crown corporations, and it could not tell us. It took several weeks before a total inventory was available, and it finally netted 384 or 386.

We must look again at the condition of legislation, the lack of accountability and lack of control which exist in the present legislation pertaining to Crown corporations. I would also urge members who are seriously concerned in this whole matter of control and accountability to read that report, and perhaps read also the first report on Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. There is much substance in there which will be of ongoing value as we move toward a more stable and more structured condition of management, accountability, and use of resources in the federal government, its agencies, departments and Crown corporations.

I will not take time to remark on areas of abuse, Mr. Speaker. However, I see there is enough time to put into the record what the responsibilities of the comptroller general will be. I would like to point out that the comptroller general would be responsible for the Treasury Board's interest in the following items: first of all, respecting financial officers. One of the weaknesses which we found in our work in public accounts was the lack in many departments of persons with the capability of basic bookkeeping or financial control.

As I understand it under the comptroller general's responsibility he will put in place people who are capable of conducting financial audits and people capable of conducting audits toward objectives throughout departments and agencies. He will also ensure that internal audit procedures support the Treasury Board Secretariat's audit for compliance. He will ensure that financial systems are compatible and support procedures recommended by the Treasury Board are designed to provide for the measurement of program effectiveness. He will design and implement guidance with respect to systems of financial reporting, financial management, and financial control to provide assurance that public moneys and assets are expended with probity, economy and efficiency, and that public moneys and assets are under effective custody and control. There will be an assessment of the adequacy of such systems in departments and agencies.

The comptroller general will report to the President of the Treasury Board on the adequacy of departmental and agency systems and procedures for effectiveness evaluation. These are all pioneering efforts which are long overdue.

The comptroller general will report to the President of the Treasury Board on the adequacy of departmental and agency systems and procedures for measuring efficiency. He will be preparing and signing the public accounts and certain other financial statements of Canada. Accounting principles and practices for the accounts of Canada will come under his jurisdiction. I would hope that he will make an extra effort respecting the form of estimates so that they will be a better instrument for the use of parliamentarians, whereby parliament can control the expenditure and use of funds from the Blue Book all the way through to the accounts of Canada. This will take the place of the very complicated system which exists today, with its shortfalls as far as members of parliament are concerned who are not highly skilled professionals and trained in the cash flow accounting structure of the federal civil service.

I hope that he will make recommendations on the form of the estimates so that they will comply and tie right into the accounts of Canada. The comptroller general will be responsible for a review and approval of all accounting systems and procedures supporting the financial information and statements included in the public accounts. The comptroller general will appear before parliamentary committees on matters of expenditure control and financial reporting. He will recommend how capital budgets might be changed to improve expenditure control and financial reporting. He will be responsible for the preparation of briefing material and recommendations for the minister on all memoranda to cabinet having to do with the responsibilities of the office of the comptroller general.

The comptroller general will have a functional relationship with chief financial officers of the departments, agencies, and corporations, providing them with functional guidance in this area of responsibility. There will be provision for assistance to departments, agencies, and corporations in the design and development or improvement of financial management, control, and reporting systems. The comptroller general will provide liaison between the President of the Treasury Board and Auditor General, including the coordination of the response to the Auditor General's annual report. He will be ensuring that effective and prompt remedial action is taken by departments and agencies on matters raised in audit observations, and on recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee.

The comptroller general will be responsible for the development, maintenance, and evaluation of detailed policies and guidelines on the internal financial and operational audit function of the government; the evaluation of the scope and quality of this internal financial and operational audit in departments and agencies, as well as the provision of advice and leadership to the internal financial and operational audit community of the government.

Lastly, he will oversee the provision of a central advisory service to departments and agencies concerning financial administration policies, principles, and standards of the government, and the provision of authoritative interpretations of legislation, regulations, and policies related to financial administration. The provision of advice to the Treasury Board secretariat on financial administration aspects of issues submitted to the Treasury Board for consideration will come within his responsibilities.

Bill C-10 is another milestone in the progress of the Parliament of Canada. The appointment and selection of a comptroller general is something I endorse personally, and I am grateful to see it in place. Many of the shortcomings of the rapid expansion of the federal service will commence to come under control, and a standard of performance which all of us can be proud of will come about in the future.

The combination of the office of comptroller general as an officer of the Treasury Board, the office of the Auditor General as an officer of parliament, along with a strengthened and more fundamentally structured Standing Committee on Public Accounts, augurs well for the future performance of the Public Service. On the basis of what I have seen, a new standard in the use of and respect for our tax resources is upon us. I compliment those who have worked on bringing this bill about. I feel privileged to have had an opportunity to offer a few comments on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments to participate in third reading stage of Bill C-10. The hon. member who preceded me is filling an honoured tradition in this House which was inaugurated first by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), that is, the election of an opposition member to chair the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. That tradition has served the House and the people of Canada well.

The first chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts was the hon. member for Mount Royal, Mr. A. G. L. McNaughton, who subsequently became the Speaker of the House. He distinguished himself as the first chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. I think of the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) who now serves in that honoured position well and with distinction. I think of his immediate predecessor, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), who equally filled the role in the best traditions established by the House. Also I think of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), and of a former distinguished member of the House, Mr. Alf Hales, both of whom served the House well as chairmen of that Standing Committee.

I am pleased to see the right hon. member for Prince Albert has just entered the chamber. As I indicated, it was under his administration that the practice of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts being chaired by a member of the opposition was first started. I am pleased to indicate that practice continues today, and continues to serve the Parliament of Canada and Canadians well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The purpose of Bill C-10 is to establish the office of comptroller general. In making reference to the Standing Committee Public Accounts on third reading, I do so to emphasize the importance of this committee. The hon. member for Capilano referred to the participation of hon. members on all sides of the House in that committee. This committee works hard, and usually has a low profile. Its work receives publicity only when it reports to the House in connection with the report of the Auditor General. It is the only Standing Committee of the House which normally operates on a year-round basis.

If that committee is to continue to function and serve the House and Canada, especially when the office of comptroller general has been established, it is important for the government to give consideration to providing it with adequate support staff in order for the committee to be truly independent of the government. Although I have not served on the committee, I have been present for some of its hearings. At the present time the only support it receives, apart from the committees branch which serves all standing committees of the House, is from the Department of the Auditor General. That is a rather awkward situation in that it could pose a conflict of interest.

Mr. Cullen: That is not true.

Mr. McGrath: I am attempting to make the argument that it is essential for that committee to be provided with support staff by the government, if its role is to be carried out effectively and well. The hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) was the chairman of a special standing committee on food prices. Because he is nodding, I am sure he agrees with that fact. I hope the government gets around to doing that.

Regretfully during third reading of this bill, and during part of the report stage yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board, who is the responsible minister, was not present in the House. Perhaps that minister had important official duties elsewhere, but he should have participated because it is one of his important functions as a minister carrying out his duties. Notwithstanding what may be considered as the role of a minister in the House, it shows a certain arrogance and contempt on the part of the President of the Treasury Board that he would not be present to pilot this bill through the House, as well as listen to the excellent suggestions made by all hon. members during the course of this debate. It says a lot for the attitude of this government to parliament; in fact it says it all, in my opinion.

I see the Minister of Employment and Immigration sitting opposite. He represents the government, but he cannot possibly represent the special interests of the President of the Treasury Board in connection with this bill. Only the President of the Treasury Board can do that. It is his responsibility to be present in the House today for third reading of this bill. For him to be elsewhere displays nothing but contempt for the House and its members. The absence of the President of the Treasury Board today exemplifies the attitude of this government toward parliament.

We have in fact only one effective functioning standing committee of this House today, in my view, and that is the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. It is the only committee, or one of a few, the exceptions being the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and, to a lesser degree, the committee on finance, that has retained any degree of collegiality in terms of tenure of service of members of the committee. The rest of the standing committees of this House are nothing short of a farce. It is a sort of passing parade; members come and members go, and government members come in merely to vote and move out again, not even knowing for what they have voted. That spectacle goes on day after day, especially in connection with the examination of the estimates.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I have listened to the hon. member and I agree—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would suggest that perhaps the hon. member should indicate whether he will accept a question.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to entertain a question from the hon. member when I finish my speech. I know he will want to make a contribution to this debate, as he always does.

I was referring to the role of standing committees, the lack of collegiality and the attitude of the government toward these standing committees. Nowhere is this more apparent than in respect of our examination of estimates. What an absolute farce that is, Mr. Speaker.

We refer the estimates of the Government of Canada, some $45 billion of public expenditure, to the standing committees where they are supposed to receive examination by members of this House, yet there is not one of those standing committees which functions with a quorum. Indeed, my friend, the hon. member for South Shore informs me that the Standing Committee on Fisheries yesterday could not even meet because it could not get enough members there to hear evidence.

When I say it could not get enough members to hear evidence I have in mind another illegal practice that has crept into this House whereby standing committees function without a quorum. We have adopted the practice whereby standing committees of the House can hear evidence if five members are present, including members of the two major parties. Committees sit with five members present and hear evidence, but they cannot do anything such as passing motions, moving amendments, or raising points of order.

Yesterday when the Standing Committee on Fisheries was to meet to examine the estimates of the fisheries service of the Department of the Environment it could not continue because it could not get even five members present. Under the rules adopted by this government in 1968, through the invocation of closure these standing committees are deemed to have reported the estimates back to the House by midnight as of the end of May. There is not a year that goes by when there is not at least one, sometimes two, and often three, departments of government which never even have this cursory examination of their estimates under this inadequate committee system. Even those departments that do go through the motions of appearing before standing committees with their estimates know that all they have to do is hang in there, because their estimates will be passed in any event and there is nothing the committee members can do about it.

This is why I believe, as I have already indicated, that for the new office of comptroller general to be effective there must be a fundamental change in the rules of this House, and a fundamental change in the committee structure and the procedure for examining estimates, as well as a change in the form of the estimates, as our amendment that was voted down would indicate. Unless there is this basic and fundamental change in the committee structure and in the form of the estimates, and in how the estimates are examined and reported back to the House, the comptroller general will find himself with the same degree of frustration the Auditor General has year after year when he reports to the Public Accounts Committee that spending is out of control and he can do nothing about it.

It has to be repeated again and again and again that this House has lost control of public spending and the government is no longer accountable to parliament for this spending. There is no accountability and there is no control. We in this House have lost the ancient and traditional parliamentary privilege of withholding supply.

These changes to the rules were invoked by closure. The former auditor general, and this has to be said again and again until the message gets through, identified the change in the rules of this House in 1968 with the take-off in government spending. Let us just look at what has happened. When we lost the committee of supply in this House in respect of estimates and the right to control them, government expenditure took off to the point that today, ten years later, the projected deficit of government equals almost the total budget of the government ten years ago. That is what has happened to us here. We have to restore parliamentary control and government accountability.

My friend, for whom I have the greatest esteem, looks at me and laughs, and he is one of the guilty ones. If there were this degree of control and accountability, I submit that the Minister of Employment and Immigration would not have taken $1 million of public funds and given it to one of the government's friends in the advertising business to launch a nation-wide advertising campaign pointing out abuses of the unemployment insurance program. This is $1 million that has been wasted via the government pork barrel. He could have achieved the same result with practically no cost to the government by merely inserting in each envelope to each unemployment insurance recipient a little card pointing out the regulations of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the consequences of circumventing those regulations, and the penalities for fraud. That would have been much simpler. With this government's penchant for spending public funds we had to have a $1 million advertising account, which was not only a waste of money but was also an insult to the vast majority of unemployment insurance recipients who do not cheat.

That attitude prevails throughout the government structure, and that is why it is a matter of some considerable regret that the President of the Treasury Board did not even think it worth his while to be present in the House today for third reading of this bill for which he is responsible.

We have to change the rules of this House. If we do not, the people of Canada will lose what little regard they have left for this institution. It has been said that the advent of television in the House would make this institution more relevant. I was one who felt that way, but I am now coming to the view that television in this House is showing this place up for the irrelevancy it has become under this government, and that is a matter of some regret.

The government has nothing to fear from a strong opposition. Good opposition makes good government. You cannot have good opposition if you are going to tie the hands of the opposition and refuse them the right to hold the government accountable for the expenditures of public funds.

I admit that it was not possible to continue with the committee of supply where estimates would be brought into this House and each member would have the right to address his grievance and hold up the estimates. That system had to change because our country was becoming more complex, and that was the argument that favoured having estimates referred to committees. However, there has to be some means of reinforcing the committee structure so that departments of government, ministers and their public servants will know that when they go before those committees with their estimates they will not only have to explain those estimates but they will have to be accountable for the expenditures of the previous year. If they do not adequately explain their estimates and if they cannot account for the expenditures of the previous year they should be aware they could be penalized by the House.

Unless you have that discipline then the structure falls down and will not work. I hope that with the passage of this bill and with the establishment of the post of comptroller general in the next parliament we will get around to addressing this problem. As a matter of fact, I know we will because the next Parliament of Canada will be led by a Progressive Conservative government, and our leader has committed himself to making parliament more relevant and to restructuring the committees of the House, giving them a support staff and an ongoing investigative role.

That is the problem that we as a House addressed ourselves to in the last session when we referred this matter to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. We in that committee came up with a consensus in a number of areas, including a restructuring of the committee system. For example, we proposed the expenditures committee which would function parallel to the Public Accounts Committee on an ongoing basis and would be able to call any department at any given time to examine any aspect of that department's expenditures throughout the year. That is a reform that is long overdue and whose time has come. I am very proud to be able to say to this House that these reforms will in fact be put into effect in the next parliament of Canada because there will be a change of government in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) accept a question?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Would the hon. member for St. John's East accept a question from the parliamentary secretary to the House leader?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the hon. member and I should like to know whether the three reports prepared by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization were supposed to be submitted to the respective caucus of each party. Moreover, could he confirm to the House whether his party caucus did in fact ratify these three reports, because his party has never indicated its concurrence in these reports. We on this side would have liked to ratify them, too, a lot sooner, because we have long been in favour of a complete reform of the House procedures. I can assure the hon. member that this type of reform is quite acceptable to the government side.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: I am very pleased to respond to the question of my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, an hon. gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect. However, he poses the question out of ignorance. I say that in sorrow because he was not the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader during the last session of parliament, although I do believe he was a member of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Mr. Pinard: I was.

Mr. McGrath: He served well. The report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, containing the three packages that the hon. member refers to, did not get back into this House because of the stubbornness, the intransigence and the bullishness of his colleague, the government House leader. He refused to go along with the concessions that we made as an opposition because he felt the government would have to give too much. For our part, we were prepared to make compromises. As my colleague the House leader for the opposition indicates, we were prepared to make concessions and go a long way. The government was not prepared to do so because it did not at that particular time fit in with the House strategy of the government House leader, and regretfully the committee's work was allowed to die with the session.

Mr. Pinard: Will you answer my question, please?

Mr. McGrath: I have already answered the question, Mr. Speaker. I told the hon. member that there was a consensus in my party that we were prepared to make concessions, and that government was not prepared to accept because they felt they were giving too much.

Mr. Pinard: You did not let us know.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Ottawa West on a point of order.

Mr. Francis: I would like to ask a question of the hon. member. I endeavoured to ask one in the course of his speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Would the hon. member for St. John's East permit a question from the hon. member for Ottawa West?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I must say I am flattered at the interest in my speech by the members opposite.

Mr. Francis: The members on this side are always interested in following the events of the House. I listened to the hon. member's complaints about the committee system, and he seems to have a most unfortunate record in those committees in which he participated. He singled out the Public Accounts Committee, and I want to pay my tribute to the way in which the chairman of that committee, who is present here, has conducted that committee.

I would like to ask the hon. member for St. John's East: Is not a very significant factor in the way a committee functions the degree of partisanship shown by the members who participate in it?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is unfortunately the case. Of course, you cannot have committees functioning in an objective, non-partisan way when they are presided over by partisan chairmen. We had evidence of that when the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) behaved in a most partisan way last week when we were examining the estimates of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, including a vote for CMHC, and he refused to allow members of the opposition the right to direct questions to the president of CMHC. It is that kind of partisan conduct that has killed any degree of objectivity.

The other point that has hurt committees badly is the rule whereby the whips can change the membership on committees without so much as a by-your-leave. There was a time when, in order to change membership in committees, you had to come to this House with a resolution. Today, if the whip finds any member of the committee getting out of hand—and it happens on both sides of the House—all he has to do is notify the Clerk that so-and-so is no longer a member of the committee. In fact, there are even times when the member involved is not given the courtesy of being notified. All these things combined are helping to destroy the committee system in this House.

Mr. Francis: The members have a responsibility as well as the chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Would the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) allow a question?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think we should get back to the business at hand. This is not a question period nor are we in committee of the whole.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. The hon. member referred to the whips replacing members. I would like to remind him that during my term as whip this has not occurred, although a member of the opposite side once referred to me as the whip when I was deputy whip.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would just remind the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain that that is not a point of order and therefore he is not recognized on a point of order.

• (1512)

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make—

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: I would simply like to understand the situation. Was there not unanimous consent of the House to allow the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) to ask his question of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who showed willingness to reply, since he will probably never have the opportunity to reply to questions in the House in future years. Could the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont ask him a very relevant question about his speech if there is unanimous consent, as seems to be the case, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to because the hon. member is going to need all the practice he can get.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary has a point. If there is time and the time of the hon. member for St. John's East has not expired, the question can be put, if there is consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank hon. members, and especially the hon. member for New Westminster, for their patience.

[Translation]

Since I will probably not see him on this side of the House in the future, I would like to ask the hon. member whether, in view of his comments about the reform of this House, which we both agree is extremely important, he can promise on behalf of his party to accept the recommendations contained in the three reports of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and whether he will co-operate with the government when it introduces amendments to the Standing Orders of the House?

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for my House leader but he is able to speak for himself. I can certainly say, however, that we can make such a commitment—if the hon. member can make the same commitment on behalf of the government House leader.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much of the time of the House this afternoon. As I understand this particular bill, the comptroller does not have responsibility to parliament or the House of Commons but has responsibility to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). If there is one significant change we must make in this place it is to ensure that parliament regains control over the spending of government.

Most of us who come here have had experience on school boards or municipal councils. I do not think that any municipal comptroller or school board trustee need feel inferior to a member of parliament. We all know the job they do at the local level in controlling or examining spending on behalf of the ratepayers or taxpayers of their community. A good deal of the time of locally elected officials is spent on the examination of spending. We have all had the experience, I am sure, of deciding whether to put shingles or some other kind of roof on the bicycle shed!

It is a scandal that members of parliament have so little clout when it comes to examining the massive amounts of public spending. Some of that spending cannot be objected to but there are no facilities or techniques to control it.

I listened with interest to previous speakers who had some suggestions about what could be done. I rise to make one principal suggestion only, Mr. Speaker.

One of the difficulties about our responsibilities as members of parliament, I suppose, is that a lot of us want the press to know what we are doing. Working on committees to control expenditures is not as attractive as attending question period in the House and taking one shot at an interesting subject with a full press gallery listening in. This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, you will notice there is not a great attendance in the press gallery; there are two members present and that is 100 per cent more than is usual on a Friday afternoon. I suppose we cannot kick the press around too much here.

Question period in the House is where all the attention is focussed and that is fine, but the work in committees to control expenditures is where the press should be. It is time they started to take responsibility and do that kind of work. Members of parliament have to do it.

I suggest there should not be a question period Mr. Speaker. For a period of three or four weeks we should spend our time exclusively examining expenditures. Every member of the House should be dedicated to examining the estimates in his particular area and putting questions that deal with the cost of running government. Three weeks would probably be enough to accomplish this.

I should like to give credit to the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), Mr. Speaker. We had some discussions and this is a compromise position. We have talked about changing the rules in this place so that a member of parliament will have some influence.

Another point that bothers me is that in committee sometimes witnesses seem to have been coached to read their statements slowly and we run out of time. Our experience has been that witnesses are actually coming forward determined to take the full time of the committee so that questions cannot be asked. A member who does not happen to get in on the first round of questions can be totally frustrated.

Once in a while perhaps we should deal with a question that is not of great national import, not something that every press reporter will scribble about—perhaps the fact that there are 25 more people working on a project than is necessary, or an instance of waste somewhere in the public service. We must change the way our committees operate in any case.

We should also think about changing the rule that allows estimates to be approved automatically after a certain date. The time between when estimates are submitted and they are deemed to be approved should be extended. We should perhaps even suspend sittings of the House for a period and devote all our attention to examining government expenditures. In that way responsibility for that vital and important question would be returned to members of parliament.

Along with many other members, Mr. Speaker, I am increasingly concerned that parliament is becoming irrelevant. Government spending is not examined by the opposition in an appropriate fashion. That is not the fault of the opposition but rather of the rules we have fallen victim to over the years. We need to have a clear examination of the prime functions of a member of parliament and certainly one of them is to exercise some control over the spending of government.

This bill falls short of providing anything which would be of assistance to members in the political role constituents have assigned to us and which we are unable to carry out as a result of our failure to amend our own rules.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take too long. I believe it important, however, that it be put clearly on the record what is happening in regard to the examination of supply.

I appreciated the comments of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). He related to the House the frustration that I think every member has faced in committee. The public expects us to examine the estimates and see what happens to their tax dollars which are "in trust" dollars. The government has responsibility for its expenditures but we are here to ensure they use that money scrupulously and as carefully as possible.

The situation is such with the committee system at the present time that it does not even give lip service to the scrutiny of estimates. How many of us have been at the committee well prepared and ready to proceed and then been only allowed ten minutes? By the time you ask a question and get the answer, you have only introduced the subject. The chairman then goes on to the next member of parliament.

On the other side of the coin, other members of the committee sit there hour after hour waiting to get in their ten minutes' worth. How many of us have been prepared at the committee and were not even able to ask a question in that session? When there is a specific branch of the department before us, we might not have an opportunity to again ask a question of that branch during the course of that year. All we can hope for is that supplementary estimates, more spending, come before us so that we will have a chance at that point. It has become a farce. That is why I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for New Westminster. At least he got up to bat and got the estimates before his committee.

What are we to do in the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration when they have not even called the ball game? Those estimates came down in February and March. We have $4 billion in unemployment insurance and one million people unemployed, yet we have not examined the estimates, not even in the perfunctory manner described by other members.

We have not looked at the Department of Employment and Immigration. I see the minister smiling. If I were the minister, I would smile too for not having to be held accountable in public. However, if you ask the minister, I am sure he would agree that better government comes from scrupulous study of estimates. I am sure he would have a better department and feel more confident if those estimates were reviewed by the committee.

We have not looked at the Department of Labour estimates. Even if we get them now, at the end of May, if we sit that long, they will be deemed to be passed, even though we have not yet started on them.

Just to show how partisan those committees can become, in the time we had the estimates referred to the committee and never studied them, we studied Bill C-8 in detail. When we were through with Bill C-8, committees were not called. We then got Bill C-45 which took away the right to strike during the time of an election campaign. It was top priority legislation. We sat again to examine Bill C-45. I say quite openly the issue got somewhat heated as to when we were going to get the estimates. That is the only chance I have had as a member of this House to say to the chairman of that committee, "Look, sir, when will you give us a chance to examine the estimates?" Bill C-45 has gone through the committee, this House and the other place.

Where are the estimates now? We have a block system. The Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration is locked into the block system. There are times when we should be sitting, but the chairman chooses not to call the committee. This week I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 asking this House to direct the chairman of the standing committee that we examine the estimates. Should it be necessary for a member of this House to rise in his place two months after the estimates have come down and one month before passage of time will pass them and plead with the Speaker for an opportunity to look at the estimates? That in essence was what I was doing.

Later on a point of order I asked the Speaker to intervene and look at the situation in order that we might deal with the estimates. I was very gratified by his comments. He seemed to be as astounded as the rest of us. He stated that one of the primary functions of a member of parliament is to look at estimates. I have looked at the schedule of committee meetings up to next Tuesday, May 2, but they are still not scheduled. To my knowledge, a steering committee has not been called. Maybe because of my tirade today we will get some committee hearings next week, I do not know. The point is that even if we do, we will only have three weeks to look at millions of dollars of estimates. I am sure no member of the government can say to us that is good government. I suggest, with respect, to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) that he had better get out of his seat fast, get to the chairman of that standing committee and tell him he wants his estimates before that committee.

It does not end there. I called the chairman two weeks ago to ask when the estimates will come before the committee. I was told that he was out of his office and in his constituency. I do not criticize that; we all go to our constituencies or on trips. I was informed that the deputy chairman was in charge. I knew the deputy chairman was out of the country for a legitimate reason.

I get up to speak today in absolute frustration. Although I support the concept of a comptroller general, there are much more fundamental issues that have to come before this House. Do the government actually want their estimates examined? I have come to the conclusion they do not. They at least gave the hon. member for New Westminster three strikes. They did not even call me into the batter's box. I say to the minister with all the sincerity I can muster that it is this kind of activity which raises in the minds of the Canadian taxpayers deep cynicism, which they feel not only for the government but for every elected official.

Mr. Young: Get on with the bill.

Mr. Epp: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Young) says I should get on with the bill. It is through this very bill that we are trying to bring into this public forum some methodology from the ground up to examine estimates properly, to have public money spent in as valid a way as possible. If the hon. member thinks I am not debating the bill, I say to him the very heart of the bill is how we get spending under control. And he has the audacity to tell me to get to the bill.

Mr. Young: I said if you were sincere you would get on with it.

Mr. Epp: All I can interpret from the hon. member is that the complaint I have now made a number of times in a number of forums is not valid. We are told "Pass the bill. Don't ask about estimates; don't raise that." The hon. member will not muzzle me about overspending. He can say what he wants but I will continue to show to the Canadian people the sums that this government is spending.

While these fundamental issues have to be looked at, there must also be some mechanism whereby the estimates are referred to committee. The chairmen of these committees cannot stall day after day, week after week, month after month, and not call the committee. That is the best defence. We have seen the other defences. I suppose it is good politics but the minister just turns up his collar and lets the arrows fly and hopes that May 31 will come and his estimates will be passed automatically. Under this procedure we do not have the right to criticize.

I hope the government takes our representations very seriously. It is absolutely necessary that we get a branch such as this which can exercise much more careful supervision over the daily expenditures of the government. The government is overspending this year by an amount which is more than was spent in the first budget under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). That first budget totalled $10.9 billion. Today, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) says the over-expenditure will be in the neighbourhood of $11.5 billion. To put it in another way, the government intends to overspend on an average at the rate of about $1 billion a month more than its revenues produce.

I should like to read a comment by one expert. This statement was made on October 20, 1975: "You can never spend more than you have, otherwise there is needless inflation." Do you know who that expert was, Mr. Speaker? It was the present Prime Minister. Yet he will be overspending this year by more than $11 billion.

In the first hundred years of this country's existence our forefathers put it together, built railroads, opened the West, went through a depression and two world wars. The deficit in 1968 was in the area of $32 billion. Ten years later this government had created a deficit larger than had been accumulated by our forefathers in the first hundred years. It was larger than it was at the end of the first hundred years of our history.

When is this going to stop? I pray that the comptroller general and the Auditor General will have sufficient clout to bring government spending to heel. I know one thing: members of parliament and the committee system are not able to do so. I should like to quote another expert. This is the statement he made on May 6, 1974:

> This budget represents my determination to deal with inflation. It recognizes the need for all governments responsible to parliament, including this one, to restrict spending.

Do you know who that expert was, Mr. Speaker? He went to his reward as a corporate lawyer in Toronto. I am referring to the Hon. John Turner. There have been other experts in this House and I should like to quote from one of them:

> Our goals are clear. Our first objective must be to maintain the underlying trend to lower inflation.

That was said on March 31, 1977, by another person who went to his just reward in Toronto as a corporate lawyer.

An hon. Member: Not old Thumper?

Mr. Epp: Old Thumper himself, the former minister of finance. Government spokesmen have paid a great deal of lip service to the idea of restraining spending, cutting deficits, having scrupulous regard for the public purse. I am taking their words at face value. Then what happens? They do not want the estimates examined in committee. I think a medal should be struck for the minister who comes up each year with the best idea for the expenditure of public funds. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is here—I am sure he will get a chuckle out of this one. Does he know that under the Young Canada Works program the Canadian taxpayer spent $15,407 on a project "to survey graveyards old and new"?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is a new one over there.

Mr. Epp: How can we expect people to have any confidence in the democratic process when they see these wild expenditures day after day in areas where no return can be expected? It has been estimated that it takes two dollars or three dollars of income to produce one dollar of tax revenue. Consider the volume of production in which the Canadian economy must engage to enable this kind of money to be siphoned out.

I might go on to refer to a celebrated case involving the Canada Council. Everyone familiar with the subject has heard about the Bill Bassett affair. He, along with the publishers, received funds in excess of $100,000 to publish poetry which I am sure the average Canadian would call pornographic. I wrote to the minister, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), and received the nicest letter from him in return. It said, in effect: We cannot get involved in censoring this kind of thing; we do not want to become involved in censorship. Mr. Speaker, is the Canadian taxpayer obliged to continue funding this kind of stuff, stuff I would not want to read into the record, stuff that no decent newspaper would publish? Yet when I raised this matter with the Secretary of State, pointing out that the Canadian taxpayer was insulted, not only by the material but by the fact that he was financing it, I was given the bland answer that the department could not become involved in censorship.

It is high time this government controlled its expenditures. Because if it does not, the democratic process will suffer very dramatically. This legacy of spending has now become a legacy of debt. I have already mentioned the amount of the increase in the national debt. By the government's own figures, 14 cents out of every dollar of tax revenue is spent to service the national debt. That is not to pay off the debt, just to service it.

I think it is important for this House to realize what can happen. Manitoba Hydro has given excellent service to the province of Manitoba. Manitobans have paid some of the lowest hydro-electric rates in the country for hydro generated from the Winnipeg River. In the last years of the former administration, however, Lake Winnipeg was regulated. Russian turbines were put in at the northern end of Lake Winnipeg, but those turbines are not producing electricity. There have been the Nelson River diversion and the Churchill River diversion. All those programs in themselves might have been valid, but today of every dollar Manitoba Hydro takes from Manitoba taxpayers 50 cents is spent on debt. The comparative advantage we had is gone.

I say to this government that the way it is spending and overspending, the legacy of debt we have in Manitoba Hydro will be the legacy of debt which will accrue to every Canadian. We will never repay that debt, but the generations who will follow us will.

With regard to the estimates, I suggest that the federal government seriously examine a method used in Manitoba, not because Manitoba is my home province or because this method was developed by the former NDP administration and the Conservative House leader of the day, but because the system is quite simple. Under the system X number of hours are provided for the examination of supply in the legislature. The opposition has the right to call whatever department it wants to call. The opposition has the right to hold ministers in their seats answering questions for as long as it wishes. When the total number of hours are used, that is it. So it is up to the opposition to bring public attention to spending in the legislature, because that is where the public attention is directed. It is not directed to committees, as is the case here in Ottawa.

In response to public pressure the opposition in Manitoba has the ability to hold ministers accountable. If they choose to start with agriculture, for example, and spend all the hours on agriculture, obviously the estimates of the other ministers do not come before the legislature. However, by that time the opposition should have analyzed clearly which departments it would like to scrutinize publicly, and that is the method used.

At times the legislature agrees not to see the clock at the end of the day and to go beyond the appointed hour. That might be of some advantage here. Under the system I am describing the government has an opportunity to know how much time will be spent. I think governments have to know that. We cannot go on here forever, but I think the government should be able to respond in a positive way. Under this system the opposition is able to apply public pressure and to hold a minister and his government responsible. I say to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), as I said earlier, that I think we would have better government and I think ministers would be more confident in their roles if they knew that their estimates had been scrutinized and passed after a meaningful debate.

I welcome the appointment of the comptroller general. I just hope that we will not stop there but that we will go much further in the examination of estimates and that parliament once again will be able to do the job it is called upon to do. The democratic process can demand nothing less.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned me in the course of his remarks. It is true that I did throw a quip across the aisle while he was speaking, and I want to clarify for his benefit that I said that if he was sincere about wanting to get on with control procedures in order to control government spending, and if he was sincere in wanting to see an improvement in the watchdog role of parliament, he and his colleagues would get on with the bill, pass it and install the comptroller general in office.

It is true that time and money is wasted in this institution, as in any institution. Time is wasted by repetitious speeches when some hon. members are ready to go on with other measures, particularly when they have been given an indication that certain other matters might be proceeded with, as was the case a day ago. It was indicated to us that we would be through with this measure and go on with some other measures. I want to point out that I have been waiting here with notes to deal with Bill S-8 and Bill C-42 since yesterday. As a result of some indications I cancelled three very serious appointments in my riding today, one of which had to do with a model parliament. When some 400 or 500 interested students at a local high school look next week in Hansard for the remarks I told them I undoubtedly would be making today on those two other measures, they will not find them. I want to point out that my remarks will not be there because we have been delayed by a series of repetitious speeches today on this bill, which I thought we would get on with.

Improvements could be made, and that is why we have this bill. We want the comptroller general not one day, one hour or one minute later than necessary, and if opposition members want to continue delaying this measure by making speeches, that will be upon their shoulders.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Apparently the hon. member does not realize that the comptroller general has been appointed and has been in his office for three weeks. He is doing his job, and that has nothing whatsoever to do with this point.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that, whether the man has been appointed or not, he needs legal authority through this bill to do his job, and I repeat, not one day, one hour or one moment later than necessary.

If there is a delay and if the cause of it is repetitious speeches, that will not be on the shoulders of hon. members on this side of the House. The public will be quite aware through television where that responsibility lies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great respect and great interest to my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Young), who advanced a complaint which is, I suppose, the complaint of all hon. members. From time to time their duties in this House of Commons do take them away from other functions which are also their duties in their constituencies and in other parts of the country. That is one of the difficulties of this life. I am happy to see the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) in the House today. Both he and I have a particularly acute problem in that regard sometimes, and sometimes greater difficulty explaining than perhaps does a member who comes from southwestern Ontario or from some other part of Canada. It is a difficulty hon. members face from time to time, particularly when the government brings forward important legislation.

I do not think there is any topic which ought to engage the attention of the House in any more direct way than a procedure which involves the control of the expenditure of money, because that is the whole reason, I suppose, that we are here. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said on many occasions that he regards the prime function of members of parliament as that of watchdogs on parliamentary expenditures. After all, it is in the hands of the cabinet that the initiating authority lies, and parliament disposes of or deals with the initiatives that are dealt with and which are brought forward by the government. That is the essence of our system.

Therefore, when the government brings forward a bill which is as significant as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice has said it is, then I think that no member of parliament, whether he or she be a member of the government or a member of the opposition, ought to quarrel with the debate on that bill on the basis that he or she must be somewhere else. Basically members of parliament are elected to serve in this place. They are elected to serve on committees and they are elected to consider the expenditures of government regardless on which side of the House they sit. This is the essence of our procedures.

It is interesting that on third reading this debate has focussed a great deal of attention on a subject matter which the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) has directed his attention to over the years. I see he is in the House. He and I have discussed this matter in this Chamber and we have dealt with it in committees. We have accomplished through committees the two objectives that seem to be always running in conflict, namely, the necessity in the hands of the government to advance legislation at a reasonably rapid rate, on the one hand, and the necessity for members of parliament to be able to examine expenditures, programs, et cetera, of government on the other. This is in an effort to see whether we receive benefit for the money spent or allocated by parliament or whether the objectives of the program are sound or ought to be changed. I say to my friend from Scarborough East that I have admired the way he has pursued this objective. Notwithstanding the fact that he sits on the government side, I think he recognizes the necessities of this matter.

The hon. member for Ottawa West was extremely generous to the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) today and last night regarding his chairmanship of the Public Accounts Committee. Indeed, the hon. member for Capilano has followed in the best traditions of the chairmanship of that committee. This chairmanship was given to a member of the opposition so that the public will know that we approach government spending and its appropriateness in a serious and non-partisan manner. For that same reason the vice-chairman of that committee is a member of the government side, namely the hon. member for Ottawa West. He too has conducted himself in the best traditions of that committee.

I mention also the Procedure and Organization Committee whose chairman is from the government side, at least up until his resignation yesterday. I am referring, of course, to the Hon. Mitchell Sharp, formerly the member for Eglinton, who always approached his work on that committee in a non-partisan way. The vice-chairman, who is equally interested in the functions of this House, is the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), a former Speaker of this House of Commons.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) serves on that committee. It is interesting to know when that committee met, it operated in a relatively non-partisan way. On the one hand it advanced the government's views in getting legislation through. Whereas the opposition's job is to preserve the rights of parliament and to examine what the government does. That is our job and one of the reasons why we are here.

That is why it is important that we consider this structure most carefully. The structure of the comptroller general is not a method by which the government is interfered with in any way or by which parliament's rights or duties are interfered with. This duty to examine is actually a method by which parliament will be helped. It is the hope that there will be less spillage and less wastage in the promotion of government programs with this kind of person in office.

I listened last night with great care to the hon. member for Ottawa West when he spoke on the amendment which stood in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). He and I have a basic disagreement. This disagreement is not with respect to the function of the comptroller general but basically with respect to the question whether he ought to have a certain kind of legislative assistance by setting out in the law his terms of reference. The member for Ottawa West said it would be better if he were free of those kinds of legislative tools, free to operate in his own way as he saw the job developing. He said that the Auditor General who occupied a particular place ought to have his powers spelled out because his function is different.

I differ with him. I do not believe there is any reason why the comptroller general would be in conflict or at odds with the Auditor General if the Auditor General is given certain terms of reference by statute. But that is a difference of opinion about operation. There is basically no difference of opinion with respect to the importance of the Auditor General and the comptroller general.

Evidence of interest on all sides of the House with respect to the job of parliament in the twentieth century has been shown in this debate by the fact that the tools of parliament are inadequate as part of the function of Treasury Board, the comptroller general, the Auditor General, and ultimately parliament in the supervision of government expenditures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I call it four o'clock?

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There may be some agreement now that everything to be said has been said on Bill C-10 and the office of the comptroller general. If you followed the debate, Mr. Speaker, everyone has emphasized how important this office is. Maybe there is now unanimous agreement and we can pass third reading. Perhaps we can make it official.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite pleased to do that if I could say to my good friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre), that I have completed what I wanted to say with respect to the matter. However, I understand there may be other members who might wish to say something on the matter. I must say to him in order to allay any fears he may have that I do not anticipate that the bill will be long before this House.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, in other words there is no agreement to having third reading today.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked that very much and I would have had no objection to the matter going to third reading today except that I just began what I wanted to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I gather we do not have unanimous consent. It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

MEASURE TO DEFINE STANDING OF BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane) moved that Bill C-202, to amend the Official Languages Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which I have the honour to introduce jointly today with my colleague the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) deals with the unity of the country or, in other words, with the inequality between both founding groups of this country. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, while most people agree to raise their voices in favour of a united country, when time comes to try to find the means to ensure that unity those same voices weaken, not to say that they express conflicting opinions. Let us recall the incident which occurred a year or two ago in Vancouver when one of the 12 TV channels was to become French-speaking and the strong protests which were raised by the Anglophone majority in the British Columbia metropolis.

I wondered then what group felt less inclined to defend the country. How sincere are we if on one hand we speak in favour of Canadian unity when on the other hand we are not ready to make the necessary sacrifices? How sincere are the people of Essex in Ontario where the members of the school board are no more separatists than the present Quebec government when they refuse to accede to the request of an important Francophone group? In my opinion, it is quite easy to speak in favour of Canadian unity, justice, virtue and motherhood, but the important point is to translate those words into convincing action.

To my mind, it is not just by talking about national unity that we are going to solve the problem but only when the English majority will accept measures which will give equal opportunities to both groups. I remember the famous statement made by the leader of the official opposition in 1930 when the then Liberal government introduced legislation to have bank notes and Canadian currency printed in both official languages. At the time the leader of the official opposition made the following comment which appeared in the report of the B and B Commission: I am against that legislation because it would jeopardize the harmony which has always existed between the two founding people. Where is harmony, Mr. Speaker, when one is afraid of recognizing the rights of Francophones? Surely we remember the famous speech which the deputy minister of federal-provincial relations, Mr. Gordon Robertson, delivered not long ago when he made a review of all injustices against Francophones in each one of the Canadian provinces. He concluded by saying that, in essence, the history of Canada has been one of meanness of mind and heart.

And that is why I suggest that we could progress enormously in the pursuit of this objective on which we have all set our hearts, namely the preservation of the Canadian unity, if as a first step we adopted a number of measures which come under the jurisdiction of our parliament and which would improve the position of our French Canadian compatriots within our area of jurisdiction in a way that would assure a fair balance between our two groups.

The purpose of the bill which I have the honour to introduce today, together with the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal), is precisely to determine a series of measures which would translate into reality the abstract principle set forth in section 2 of the Official Languages Act to the effect that French and English should have equal status in all institutions of the Government of Canada. This principle having been unanimously adopted by all parties represented in the House eight years ago, I feel the time has finally come for us to take concrete steps to give life to this principle, failing which it will exist only in principle and as a theoretical abstraction. Bill C-202, to amend the Official Languages Act, contains therefore about ten concrete proposals which we should like the House to adopt. The purpose of the first one is this: the federal government should recognize its responsibility to maintain the demographic equilibrium of this country, or as we say in clause 1.1(1)(c), and I quote:

to support the attainment of such demographic goals in respect of the size, rate of growth, structure and geographic distribution of the Canadian population, as tend to support and promote the principle of equality between the two official languages and linguistic groups,

For too long, Mr. Speaker, our immigration policy has disregarded this aspect.

We all know that when Canada was founded there was a blissful balance between the two linguistic communities and that, particularly because of a declining birth rate since the early fifties, the proportion of the French-speaking population in Canada has been going down. It is obvious that this trend has a considerable impact, not only on the political scene of all provinces and particularly of the province of Quebec, but also on the issue of national unity.

Our second proposal is that there should be an equitable balance between both language groups as regards their participation in the institutions, programs and initiatives of the Parliament and Government of Canada.

I could obviously give a lot of examples of this. My only comment will be that the Department of the Environment is spending only 4 per cent of its expenditures in the province of Quebec. As for the National Research Council, out of an approximate number of 560 scientists in Canada, barely 27, if my figures are correct, have French as their first language. I think that, nine years after the Official Languages Act was passed, it is time to recognize the principle that there be a French approach, aspect and dimension in our various programs.

Third, we would like the French language to become an autonomous drafting language. What happens, Mr. Speaker, is that statutes are drafted in English then, of course, translated into French. All those in this House who are lawyers know that the French versions reflect neither the spirit of the language nor French law, and in future, under the principle that the law reflects the ways and customs of a people, legislation should always be drafted and passed in both official languages at the same time.

Fourth, as we say in clause 8(2), we would like both French and English to be the languages of work of the institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada, and that the departments have the duty to ensure the observance of an equitable balance in the number of positions reserved by them for Anglophones and for Francophones.

You probably remember that in 1969 we tried to limit the scope of the legislation to the relations between the public and the institutions of the federal government. But it is time that this other dimension, the dimension of the working language within federal institutions, reflected the principle of equality that we have entrenched in the Official Languages Act.

Fifth, we would like that the collective agreements entered into by the government with various public service employees' unions and various agencies not run counter to the law. At present, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to speed up the recruitment of Francophones at the intermediate management level, precisely because of the collective agreements. And I also remind you that a few years ago, parliament was asked to ratify by a resolution an agreement already reached with this private group. I do not think that parliament should follow the lead of any private group, but on the contrary, it should serve the best interests of our country.

In clause 11(1), we suggest that this act, unless otherwise specified, be paramount to any other act.

I must confess that as a French speaker and a member of parliament I felt deeply insulted as I attended the hearings of the highest court in Quebec, the Court of Appeals, and heard the counsel for Air Canada argue that the Official Languages Act was only a pretence of an act, which could be dismissed as unenforceable wishful thinking, which had been adopted with the full knowledge it was unenforceable legislation. In my opinion, that was an insult not only to French-speaking Canadians but especially to the authority of this parliament.

On the other hand, it is a sad comment that the annual reports by the Commissioner of Official Languages have been pigeonholed in the various departments where they are gathering dust. In his last report Mr. Keith Spicer who was then about to resign his post, drew up a list of the various departments where disregard of this law had been worsening year after year since he wrote his first report. So we propose an extension to section 33 to the effect that government departments which, without legitimate excuse fail to comply with a ruling by the Commissioner be deemed to have committed an offence punishable not only with a fine but also imprisonment, just as would be the case for non-compliance with other federal laws.

I think it is time we put an end to this tired joke whereby year after year the departments do not even bother to read the recommendations of this officer of parliament.

There are two measures which I adamantly defend, namely that people who can complain of non-compliance with the act will always be able to refer these cases to the courts but they must first of all lodge their complaint with the Commissioner of Official Languages. There is also a measure inspired by the equal opportunity act of the U.S. whereby the federal government, not only in its own institutions but also through the various fiscal and budgetary measures it adopts as regards its suppliers and so on would require that they also do their share and take on themselves part of the national unity burden.

Mr. Speaker, it is always a problem, a test of sincerity. Personally, I have heard enough talk on national unity, I would like to hear of concrete measures from all concerned, of how much they are willing to pay to play their part in this great project to preserve the unity of our country. It has been my experience that everyone is in favour of virtue, but becomes hesitant and even evasive when the time comes to test the public's sincerity.

There is the Public Service Alliance which refuses a project as essential as that of sharing the wealth of the country between both sides of the river, between Ottawa and Hull; in their press release they gave about twenty reasons for refusing to travel three extra miles to work in a French atmosphere such as that which exists in Hull. I tell myself that if people in the national capital are not more generous, there is great cause to be pessimistic. So, Mr. Speaker, what this bill is getting at is that what is important, above all, is concrete action.

[English]

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start by congratulating the sponsor of this bill for his very diligent and conscientious work. Those of us on this side of the House who know him can attest to the passion and devotion he gives French-speaking Canadians, and I hope they will repay him in full for his integrity and his great work on their behalf. I might also say that as a female Canadian I can share to a large extent his frustrations over what he terms discrimination, being the lack of proper representation in government departments. We females know what it means to be in the so-called minority, and we hope that situation will change too.

I remember when I was studying British history in England and one of my history books said that in retrospect the great fire of London was a very good thing; it was really an act of God. Despite the fact that it destroyed an entire city, it also destroyed the black plague and got rid of all sorts of other pestilence. Taking that analogy, we could say in retrospect that the election of the Parti Québécois was perhaps a good thing because it made Canadians from coast to coast conscious of the troubles that are facing French Canadians—their frustrations, their anger and their aspirations. I hope this consciousness on the part of English-speaking Canadians will continue and even heighten.

Having said that, I would like to deal with the bill at hand, Bill C-202. Despite the fact that I agree and sympathize with the sponsor in what he is trying to achieve, there is one particular part to which I take very serious exception, and I hope the sponsor with his own sense of fair play will see fit to amend it. At the very beginning of the bill, in referring to its purpose, it reads "linguistic and cultural objectives". My whole objection is to the fact that he has mixed in the same bill linguistic and cultural needs. He even speaks of a cultural policy for Canada. John A. Macdonald in 1890 said that there is no paramount race in this country. I would hope those words are as true today as they were in 1890.

I believe that we must take the initiative and make adjustments in order to enable French-speaking Canadians to participate fully in the country they played a leading role in helping to explore, to settle and to found. I agree with the sponsor when he says we must pay a price for Canadian unity, but I would like to know exactly what the price is. We English-speaking Canadians are willing to pay a big price, but what exactly is it? Do we have to relinquish our own cultural identity?

I hope that is not the price, because if so 26 per cent of the population of Canada will not relinquish their identity, nor have they been asked to do so by the federal government. Although culture and language are profoundly related, there is a clear distinction between them. We must be very careful to observe that distinction whenever we speak of the two. Language is a vehicle of communication.

I believe both English and French should have equal value in this country of Canada. However, culture is a totally different thing. It is very complex, dealing with attitudes, feelings, values, emotions and traditions. When we go back into the history of Canada we must remember that from the beginning of this century, for some 77 years, people have come to this country who spoke neither English nor French, nor had the cultures of England or France. They came here and adopted one of the official languages. Unfortunately, most chose to adopt English; but the point is they kept their own culture.

I recommend that we do not adopt that particular part of this bill. Language to me is learned through the brain, but culture is learned from the heart and by the heart. There is no way you can impose it on other people. Culture should not even belong to just one group. It should be multi-faceted if it is to be strong and rich. One of Canada's riches is the diversity of her culture and we should be very proud of that fact.

In the government publication entitled "A National Understanding" we are warned:

> Attempts to mould people who speak the same language or belong to the same political entity into a homogeneous cultural pattern or conception endangers their very freedom. Such attempts must be studiously avoided by the state, and fiercely resisted by citizens. For this reason, countries and peoples who value freedom and know how fragile it is, usually exercise great care in intervening in matters of culture even when they cannot avoid intervening in matters of language.

I believe that parliament should intervene in the language situation. Despite the lip service we have paid to it, French is not on an equal level with English. I abhor the fact that some people are refused jobs only because of their lack of English and the fact that they are French-speaking Canadians. They had a part in founding this country. By the same token, however—and here again I refer to the employment of women in the public service as an example—they do not want tokenism. They do not want somebody accepted just because he speaks French, but rather because he speaks French and he is worth his hire.

That is all that should really be said on the subject, but unfortunately it does not apply in every case. The government realizes that more has to be done along the lines of official languages. However, more than languages, what is needed is a very clear guideline for the people of Canada, particularly those whose mother tongue is neither English nor French, to assure them that we are not asking everybody to be bilingual but merely to respect both official languages. We could even drop the word "bilingual" and refer to "linguistic requirements", perhaps.

More harm has been done on this subject of discrimination, and to unity through misconception—for example, the fear of people in western Canada that they are going to have to speak French. This is not true; nobody is imposing French on them. I agree wholeheartedly with the portion of the bill that refers to the fact that provincial governments could and should do a tremendous amount more than what they are presently doing on this question of linguistic rights. In my own city of Toronto I recently saw a notice in seven different languages, one of which was English, but none of which was French. That is appalling and, worse still, that notice appeared in a school. Why can we not instil in our children the need to learn French, not the necessity, and the enrichment of knowing another language?

Keith Spicer not too long ago pointed out that English and French are the two most widely used languages in the world. You can go any place knowing both of them and somehow make your way. It is not as if it were a language like Swedish, for instance, which is concentrated in one small part of the globe. These are two international languages, yet we as Canadians are hesitant about learning both of them. I do not know why we have this shortsightedness, especially when it concerns children. However, the answer is not to stuff it down their throats as we have been accused of doing. I do believe the provinces should give guidance by influencing the thinking of the school boards and the thinking of its citizens.

Why can French not become an official language in Ontario? We are told that perhaps there is a political reason and people may rebel. I cannot think why. In Ottawa we see "Stop" and "Arrêt" on the same road sign, but in Toronto we just see "Stop". Why is that Mr. Speaker?

● (1632)

I think what is missing in this country is tolerance, understanding and compassion. Very often a feeling of fair play is also missing. When we can be big enough to understand what other people want, meaning our brothers and sisters in this country, and when we lean toward them and give them their fair share, perhaps then we will overcome the terrible difficulties we face now.

There is a price to pay, Mr. Speaker, and most of us are willing to pay it, but we want to know exactly what that price is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks with respect to Bill C-202, I wonder if I could ask other members of the House and yourself, sir, to join me in making welcome that gentleman whose presence in the gallery is extremely appropriate to a discussion of linguistic rights in Canada. I refer to Mr. Max Yalden, who is seated in the visitors' gallery. Whether his view of the complexity of the linguistic problems of our country will be improved by following this debate I do not know, but it is my intention—I almost say with the permission of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané)—to stray a little into the field of constitutional reform.

Perhaps for different reasons but with rather similar principles, I have grown exhausted over the years with the lack of movement on the matter of linguistic rights and educational linguistic rights in Canada.

As I said, I want to take some issue with the hon. member for Matane with respect to his Bill C-202—not with his purpose, which I think is admirable, and not with the effects of the bill, but rather with the mechanism that he has chosen. That is because I would prefer a mechanism that has more impact and would have longer lasting effects on Canadians. I refer to the patriation and amendment of the British North America Act as the constitution of Canada.

I think that is a long overdue event. I suggest that a long last the time has come to patriate the British North America Act, to revise it, to amend it and to provide therein a bill of rights which will guarantee the citizens of Canada, of any nationality or origin, the right to be unilingual in either of the two official languages, and the right to educate their children to be bilingual so that those children will be able to learn both official languages of Canada.

The Official Languages Act provides, in essence, that citizens of Canada should be able to address themselves to the federal institutions of Canada in the official language of their choice, whether that be English or French. In my view, Mr. Speaker, it simply provides to Canadians the right to be unilingual.

If we go back to the reports of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which began its hearings about ten years ago, we find it was the hope of that commission, which is reflected in the wording of the Official Languages

Act, that provincial governments would follow the example of the federal government in ensuring that services would be available in French in situations where the numbers of citizens requiring such services warrant it. Provision was made in section 15 of the Official Languages Act for consultation to take place with the governments of the provinces as part of the process of determining where bilingual districts might best be established.

The philosophy of the royal commission in regard to the role of the provinces and their treatment of the minorities was indicated in the first formal report the commission issued, that is in Book I. The commission had this to say:

> The principle of equality implies respect for the idea of minority status, both in the country as a whole and in each of the regions. In the provinces or smaller administrative entities both Anglophones and Francophones live in some cases as a majority and in some cases as a minority. Since the English-speaking population is larger across the country its members are less often in the minority; but they are the minority in some areas, especially in Quebec. Francophones are usually in the minority outside Quebec. In either case, however, the principle of equality requires that the minority receive generous treatment.

I think that last sentence, Mr. Speaker, is the key to what the attitude of the provinces should be. They should establish the principle of equality whereby the minority is given fair treatment.

In essence, the Official Languages Act insists that it is the right of any Canadian to be and to remain unilingual. The act, in fact, reflects the situation in our country: about 60 per cent of the French Canadians resident in Quebec are unilingual French and the vast majority of citizens resident in other provinces are unilingual English.

Despite this treatment of unilingualism as an individual civil right of Canadians, and despite the fact that members of the Conservative party voted for the Official Languages Act, the fact remains that many Canadians in western Canada have been led to believe that the act "forces French down their throats". Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I hold the members of the Progressive Conservative party responsible for this misunderstanding of the Official Languages Act.

Since it appears highly likely that there will be a general election in the near future, I would go further and challenge members of that party to finally face their political responsibilities to all the people of this country and to cease once and for all the blockage or misrepresentation of the legitimate aspirations of both French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians with respect to their opportunity to use, to work in and to learn the language of their preference.

Hon. members will be familiar with the rather infamous Bill 101 passed by the Parti Québécois government in the province of Quebec, a bill whose basis is, in the words of Dr. Camille Laurin, its author and the Quebec minister of cultural development, "ethnocentric". The effect of the bill or law is to deny French Canadians the right to choose the language of education of their choice for their children. I want to come back to that later, Mr. Speaker.

This is a matter upon which much debate has taken place, namely whether or not, in effect, there is such danger to the French language that in order to protect that language it is now necessary, as has been done in Bill 101, to reduce the civil rights of French-speaking Quebeckers by limiting their choice of language in education.

I take the view, Mr. Speaker, that every citizen of Canada and every landed immigrant should be able to choose the language in which his children should be educated, no matter where in Canada he may be resident, and based only upon the existence of a reasonable number of other people of similar intention so that there is an adequate number of children in that area to warrant an education in that language of choice.

To put the same proposition in a different manner, Mr. Speaker, it is my view that this parliament ought to ensure these rights as civil rights of Canadians by enshrining them in the BNA Act and including them in a bill of rights incorporated in that act so that they are a part of the constitution of Canada.

I take the view that one of the fundamental functions of the federal government is the just protection and encouragement of minorities of every type throughout the whole of Canada. That has been clearly stated again and again by the Liberal Party of Canada and was repeated recently by delegates to the national Liberal party convention in Ottawa. It has also been said by the leader of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

There is, then, a very clear philosophical distinction between the position taken on these matters by the Parti Québécois government in Quebec and the Liberal Party of Canada. It is we at the federal level who seek freedom of choice. It is we who seek a nationwide opportunity for parents of any language to educate their children in their language of choice. And it is we who seek to expand the options of every Canadian and to encourage Canadians to take this choice as a personal civil right. By contrast, the official opposition, the Conservative party, seems to have a perpetual schizophrenia on this matter. They say and vote one thing in this House and they say and do the utterly contradictory thing in their home ridings and elsewhere in the country.

In my area of Quebec one of the strongest demands of citizens is that those who are English-speaking at home wish their children to acquire the other official language, French, at school. Like people all over Europe, we believe that the acquisition of a second, and indeed third or fourth, language is a matter of pride and delight, not a distasteful obligation but a wonderful opportunity.

Francophones and non-Francophones alike in Quebec grow weary of the theories of ethnocentricity, of the deliberate distortion of facts and reality in the name of the protection of some linguistic rights. It is perfectly clear that in the area of Montreal there has been a loss of capital investment, lost job opportunities, jobs and businesses of all sorts, not because of friction between English and French, but because of the irrational and arbitrary discrimination practised by the government of that province.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is perfectly consistent and reasonable, if a society concludes that its language and culture are endangered, to take through democratic means such legal steps as may be necessary in order to protect that language and culture, and to do all of that without—I repeat, Mr. Speaker, without—creating an attitude of distrust and distress.

It may well be the decision that Francophone Quebeckers want to make, to deny themselves by some expression of opinion—an election, a referendum or whatever—of this freedom of choice. I see no reason whatever why such an option cannot be guaranteed in our constitution so that, in changing times and views, French-speaking Quebeckers voluntarily and deliberately reduce or curtail these linguistic rights. However, I contend that every Canadian and, as I said earlier, every landed immigrant ought to have enshrined in our constitution the right to be unilingual and the right to be bilingual.

The hon. member for Matane will find no cause for difference of opinion with me over his Bill C-202 where it attempts to put aside injustices as he and I perceive them. We agree. He proposes, however, significant changes in federal institutions in order to achieve these changes, whereas I point out that after a hundred years the provinces still cannot seem to provide assurances of certain civil rights in the field of education. I call them civil rights because I believe that a changing, growing and maturing Canada needs to see such matters as the linguistic education of our children as civil rights to be enjoyed from sea to sea, not restricted to local and regional jurisdictions.

For that reason, I urge members on this side to give consideration to the desirability of such constitutional patriation and amendments. In so doing, I am simply saying what many other members of the Liberal party have said.

As to hon. members of the Conservative party, I suggest that once and for all—perhaps this election will be an excellent opportunity to start—Progressive Conservative members finally tell Canadians with one voice, in one statement for the whole country, not ten statements by candidates in ten different provinces, just where the party stands on an amended constitution for Canada.

As for those on this side, we stand for the principle of the protection of minority rights throughout Canada, for the provision of opportunity for equal status and equal opportunity for both official languages, not only at the federal level but at the level of all government and everywhere in Canada.

I listened to the Progressive Conservative candidate in my constituency a couple of nights ago when he supported the Parti Québécois stand on the federal budget and the sales tax. He stood arm in arm with Mr. Parizeau, the Quebec minister of Finance. Today we are discussing minority rights in the House of Commons. I see two members of the Conservative party here, neither of whom have said a word about minority rights in so far as Canada is concerned.

I complete my reference to Bill C-202 by congratulating the hon. member for Matane on an excellent piece of legislation. I do not know whether or not it will go to the committee. The only difference between the view he has proposed and the view I propose is that, in his case, he would see minority rights placed into legislation. In mine, I would see minority rights enshrined in our constitution. I thank the House for listening.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I shall be quite brief. First, I should like to say to my colleagues of the Progressive Conservative party who are present—

[English]

I should like to say to the hon. member for the Conservative party who is present in the chamber that I do not share the view of my colleague from Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) that members of the Conservative party do not share the views and objectives of the Official Languages Act. It might be that some individual members differ in their opinion, but the vast majority of them expressed through their vote their support for the objectives of the Official Languages Act. I believe the same is true of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to remind the House, and particularly my colleague the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) as well as my colleague the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker), that the great majority, if not all the clauses of Bill C-202, express concerns that have already been voiced by the Official Languages Commissioner in his 6th annual report and also in the 7th which was tabled last March. As concerns the comments of the hon. member for York South, may I simply point out to her that the introductory clause of Bill C-202 that seems to worry her is exactly the same as title IV, section 38 of the constitutional provisions tabled in this House by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) on April 1976. Those constitutional provisions had been sent to all provincial premiers and were to serve as the basis for discussions about the revision on which every province and the federal government had agreed. So, those are not exceptional provisions in relation to the commitment made by the federal government to establish a cultural policy for each and every Canadian.

As for the other clauses of the bill, they only echo the comments made by Mr. Keith Spicer in 1977 on pages 15 and 18 of his 6th report and the recommendations included in the 7th report of the Official Languages Commissioner published in March 1978, particularly on pages 21 to 24. They are aimed at clarifying three things: on the one hand, the fact that the introductory clause of section 2 of the Official Languages Act that says that English and French both have equal status, rights and privileges, is not just a pious statement, but a legal and binding obligation in relation to every agency, department and Crown corporation concerned. They also aim at clarifying the role of the courts as far as the implementation of the Official Languages Act is concerned. This commitment only reaffirms the government's intentions, as expressed in the Speech from the Throne in October last year, to define the linguistic rights of public servants and the duties of the departments, agencies and Crown corporations, and to determine the role of the courts in the administration of the Act. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this bill should receive the support of all parties in this House and be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts for a closer examination of those objectives.

[English]

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the opportunity the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) has given us to expose the various views and difficulties that we have has been most helpful and fruitful. I judge from the fact there have been no speakers from the other side that there is substantially complete approval by the opposition parties with at least the subject matter, if not the actual fact, of this particular bill.

Because there are no other voices, I judge there is totality of agreement on the other side and that this bill should be adopted and sent to committee. However, in order that the opportunity might remain for all members to have the opportunity to express any further concerns they might have either with the specifics or with the subject matter—

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has pointed out that members of the opposition have not participated in this debate. The reason I have not participated is because I do not want this bill talked out. If it is talked out it will be the Liberal members who talk it out and not the members on this side. I support the principle of this bill 100 per cent. I do not intend to participate further. I want to see the bill proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I suggest that is not a point of order.

Mr. Daudlin: I thank the hon. member for adding that, Mr. Speaker. If he would have waited another second or two, he would not have had such great concern. I was about to suggest that if the appropriate administrative acts can be taken, the subject matter of this bill could be referred to the committee. I suggest we take that step before five o'clock so that the subject matter, not the bill, will be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would need a motion to that effect.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move:

That Bill C-202 be withdrawn and that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the standing committee of the House which is considering the radio and television estimates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The House has heard the terms of the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). Does the House agree with the proposed amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): By unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lachance: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Since we have concluded the order of business for today, I suggest that we call it five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the House agree to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hour provided for consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.54 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

STOPFORTH CASE—TAXPAYERS PAYING DAMAGES AWARDED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Having regard to the fact that the government has decided that the Canadian taxpayer shall pay the $10,000 damages assessed by the court against the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) for having cruelly maligned, defamed and libelled Lawrence Stopforth, I move:

That this House condemns such action which means that the damages caused by the minister's gross wrongdoing is being imposed on taxpayers who are not responsible instead of being payable by the minister who was the wrongdoer.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO PUBLIC SERVICE POSITIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the number of members of parliament is rapidly diminishing due to a frenzy of government appointments of unwanted Liberal MPs to positions in the judiciary, the civil service, Crown corporations and agencies, to the other place and possibly to the staff of the House of Commons itself, as well as to the consular and diplomatic corps, in view of the fact that there is increasing nervousness among Liberal backbenchers and cabinet ministers as to their prospects in the coming election, and the very real danger that the House of Commons quorum of 20 may be threatened if the election is long postponed, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) further importuned by worried Liberals looking for a safe berth on the ship of state, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That either the Prime Minister call the election immediately, before this House becomes vacant by attrition, or that he cease and desist from further patronage appointments of members of parliament who are now in danger of becoming an endangered species.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for New Westminster.

TESTING OF HERBICIDE 2,4-D—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the U.S. environmental protection agency has found positive evidence that the herbicide 2,4-D is carcinogenic, in view of the fact that 2,4-D is a component of the herbicide Aqua 20 which requires an exemption from the federal government of label restrictions for use in waters normally under restriction, and in view of the fact that the British Columbia minister of the environment, Jim Nielsen, has stated that the provincial government still intends to use this potentially dangerous herbicide in the Okanagan Lake system this summer in spite of the reports from the U.S. environmental protection agency, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House directs the minister of the environment to refuse the waiver of the label restrictions to the government of British Columbia until such time as full-scale testing is conducted to determine if the use of 2,4-D is safe.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE BUDGET

REQUEST GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER QUEBEC SALES TAX PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

S.O. 43

Considering the impassioned debate taking place in Quebec as a result of recent federal intrusions in exclusive provincial jurisdictions; considering the protests of the four western provinces blaming the federal government and supporting Quebec's claims; considering that over the past ten years this government has got into the habit of scoffing at Quebec authorities, treating them as second-class citizens; considering that there can be no peace without absolute recognition of provincial rights within their jurisdiction as spelled out in the constitution, with a view to ensuring that harmony and safeguarding provincial autonomy, thus ending the current crisis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), in a responsible manner, recognize for once his mistake and reconsider his last decision. If the minister is not convinced that the three opposition parties are expecting such an honest effort from him, he should demand a debate to explain that jurisdictional matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion for discussion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED LAY-OFFS AT RCA PLANT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of extreme urgency in my constituency, namely, the loss of 300 to 400 jobs which will occur as a result of the announced closing of the RCA plant in Smiths Falls which, on a per capita basis, is even more disastrous to that community than the recent deplorable, sizeable lay-offs by Inco in Sudbury. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That in view of the fact that officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have now met with the mayor and the industrial commissioner of Smiths Falls, the minister of that department make an immediate statement as to the government's views on this situation, outline what plans the government has to be of assistance, and specifically take active steps to deal with this crucial situation affecting a sizeable part of the eastern Ontario economy when he meets with the Smiths Falls municipal officials and the members of parliament from the area on Thursday morning.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TREATMENT OF HEROIN ADDICTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas a great deal of crime in the province of British Columbia is committed by those supporting a drug habit, and whereas the heroin traffic in British Columbia results in untold damage, both economically and socially, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt):

That this House supports the innovative measures being proposed by the government of British Columbia for the treatment of heroin addicts.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HEALTH PROBLEMS CAUSED BY ASBESTOS DUST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning the strike which has been taking place for many weeks at Baie Verte, Newfoundland. In view of the health and safety conditions at Advocate Mines where the asbestos dust level is causing serious health problems, particularly for small children, and in view of the asbestos operations which if allowed to continue will, according to health authorities, cause respiratory problems and perhaps asbestosis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the minister of the environment, under the provisions of the federal Clean Air Act, to consult immediately with the provincial authorities in Newfoundland and take other immediate steps to curtail serious asbestos dust problems produced by the Advocate Mines' operation at Baie Verte.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

REGULATIONS PERTAINING TO CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It relates to the circular sent out by the Minister of National Revenue to churches and charitable organizations limiting the expression of their views on political issues and, indeed, setting out the consequences if these organizations do not conform to the government guidelines.

Would the minister say whether the issuance of these guidelines at this particular time was a cabinet decision, or was it just the Minister of National Revenue acting independently of the cabinet, trying to exercise questionable authority by sending out these regressive regulations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer the question asked by the hon. member. I understand that the circular which has been put out was under preparation last summer and was the distillation of existing information which was asked to be put together by the former minister because of an interest in clarifying what exactly is a charity under the Income Tax Act.

The purpose of the circular was to put together information relating to existing jurisprudence on the subject as to what is a charity under the Income Tax Act and what is political activity. There is absolutely no relationship between any possible future event and the putting out of this document. It was undertaken last summer at the request of the minister's predecessor and in response to requests from the field.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. I should like to refer to a letter which was sent to my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East, dated April 18, 1978. It was written by the Minister of National Revenue. He stated that indeed, the charitable status of organizations would not be prejudiced by "limited attempts to promote the interests of these organizations at the political level".

In light of that, what type of criteria did the minister have in mind when he said that he may approve limited attempts to promote the interests of these organizations? In what way is the minister able to sit in judgment on the activities of the churches as to whether their attempts or interests should be limited in any way?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am sure no one would attempt to limit the interests of the churches or their activities. As I understand the income tax law, in order to qualify for charitable exemptions, it provides that all resources, including physical and financial, must be devoted to charitable purposes. Some people in the community, cynically, do not regard politics as essentially charitable.

MINISTER'S INTERPRETATION OF REGULATIONS PERTAINING TO CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the question I put to the minister concerned who would interpret the minister's expression of "limited attempts" by charitable organizations and churches to promote the interests of their organizations. How can the Minister of National Revenue have the power or authority to interpret what is meant by "limited attempts"? If I may, I should like to direct my final question to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I was under the impression the hon. member had already put a question.

Miss MacDonald: My final question is directed to the Prime Minister, because in this instance we have not received answers from any minister in the House who would be speaking for the Minister of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Miss MacDonald: In light of this unaccountability, when will we have the benefit of a minister holding the portfolio of Minister of National Revenue in the House of Commons who will answer and be accountable to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is an acting minister and a second acting minister. They will gladly deal with policy matters raised by the hon. member.

Miss MacDonald: Who is the acting minister?

Mr. Trudeau: The acting minister is the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Beatty: Where is she?

Mr. Trudeau: The second acting minister is the Solicitor General.

Mr. Gillies: Neither of them is here.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Egmont.

Miss MacDonald: Neither the acting minister nor the second acting minister is here.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont.

REASON FOR CIRCULATION OF DOCUMENT ON REGULATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just shown the utter fraudulency of the present situation wherein neither acting minister nor the minister himself is in the House. The Deputy Prime Minister clearly is unaware of some of the developments which have gone on respecting this highly intimidating document put forward by the Department of National Revenue.

Two years ago, on May 17 when a similar issue arose, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who was then minister of national revenue, indicated to me that political activity had no definition in the act. Also, he admitted that 36,000 organizations had charitable tax status at that time and not one prosecution or action had taken place on the basis of any improper political activities.

Can someone on the other side, the Prime Minister or anyone else who would like to provide an answer, indicate what actions were taken which led to this government department producing a document laying down in specific terms the conditions under which charitable groups in this country could operate?

● (1422)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that fact is the explanation of the guidelines which are being given out by the minister. The department is attempting to explain an area of the law which is general, which has to do with charitable donations and with the Income Tax Act. Because these activities are not defined, as the Deputy Prime Minister has said, the department is putting together cases on jurisprudence to indicate to the public how they should be guided.

It seems to me that rather than calling this an intimidating document, the hon. member opposite should welcome the department's trying to explain the law and the regulations.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what area of reality the Prime Minister is following, but obviously if the government had been serious and responsible in this matter, there would have been some kind of advance consultations with a good cross-section of charitable organizations in respect of this issue. The fact that there has been none is an indication of the kind of respect the government has for voluntary organizations in this country.

In view of the fact that one church body, the Mennonite Central Committee, has already responded by having interviews with officers of National Revenue, trying to define what the government is getting at in this regard, and that the government, according to officers of National Revenue, have agreed that the Mennonite Central Committee can raise questions in respect of capital punishment, the purchase of fighter aircraft or a change in milk policy but cannot get involved in one of the church coalitions having to do with the upcoming disarmament assembly at the United Nations, will the Prime Minister indicate whether this action of intimidation in the circulation of last February is a direct attempt to remove the legitimate political rights of thousands of voluntary organizations in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I take objection to the word "intimidation". The department is attempting to explain an area of the law which, as with many areas of the law, has need for explanation. The hon. member knows there is such a thing as administrative law and he knows that the general law has to be applied by departments and by ministers in specific cases.

It would seem to me that this circular—which I have not read—is an attempt, by the description given to us by the hon. lady, to help the taxpayer know what is deductible and what is not. If there is some desire on the part of the taxpayer to obtain further clarification, of course he is always welcome to meet with officials of the department of revenue in order to obtain that clarification. Surely the hon. member should not describe as intimidation an action by the department to explain an area of administrative law.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have one final supplementary question. The use of the word "intimidation" is mild, compared to the reaction of some of the voluntary organizations which have looked at this document. The Prime Minister, if he has not read it, should read it at the first opportunity, because it is putting the government on record as being an arbitrator in respect of the activitie of non-governmental organizations, in respect of publications, in respect of representation and activity, suggesting that their activities must be impartial and objective—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question, will he put it, please.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Will the Prime Minister indicate whether he or any other official of the government has instructed the Department of National Revenue to enter into serious conversations with charitable organizations to clear up what is, at the very least, a very bad misunderstanding between the government and these organizations or, better yet, withdraw this particular piece of intimidation and put the whole operation of non-governmental organizations in this country on the respectable footing they have always occupied?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I take it that in this society nobody likes to pay taxes. The fact is that when you are a charitable organization, you do not have to pay taxes; you are exempt from certain provisions of the Income Tax Act. That is what the law says. Surely, what exactly is a charitable organization, how each particular organization qualifies under the act, and how others do not qualify, are matters for administrative law. Tribunals, in the end result, make a judgment in a particular case as to whether an organization is charitable under the law.

The department, surely, is discharging its duty in attempting to explain, for the benefit of the organizations themselves, what the courts in the past have viewed as charitable and otherwise.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Big Brother is calling the shots again.

Mr. Trudeau: Big Brother? Obviously, the government is the one who is collecting taxes, and obviously the taxpayer can call the government what he wants. But the taxpayer is asking for guidance, and surely the government should not merely say that anyone who says he is charitable will not have to pay taxes. Surely that has to be defined, and that is the attempt of the policy paper.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You had better read it.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

MONITORING OF ASBESTOS DUST LEVELS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Environment). It concerns the very serious strike that has been going on for some weeks in Newfoundland, and it particularly concerns the health and safety not only of the workers involved in the operation but of the women and children living in the community.

My question is this: A year ago this month the then minister responsible for the environment issued a press release stating that the federal government would begin immediately to monitor emission levels of asbestos dust from asbestos mining and milling operations throughout Canada. Would the minister inform the House if this has been done at Baie Verte and, if so, what was discovered?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, my officials have advised me that the company has already taken steps to reduce air pollution at the mine site, as required by the regulations under the Clean Air Act. There is not enough time to list all the things that have been done, but I will try and put some of them on the record. A so-called bag-house is already under construction to limit the emission from the drying-up operation. The expected completion date prior to the work interruption was June, 1978. A bag-house is also in the engineering stage to control minor emissions from the dry-rock storage building. It is scheduled for completion in late 1978.

I am advised that the company is doing all it can to meet the regulations under the Clean Air Act.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister would, when providing the information, take care to answer the question. I asked him for specific information, since the government undertook to monitor such operations more than a year ago. If he does not have it at his fingertips now, would he make available to the House the reports of such monitoring in that community, in light of the fact that one medical authority is quoted as saying that there is a pollution count 4,000 times higher than the level of safety.

More specifically, I ask the minister in my second question, considering that many people in the community—apart from the direct effect of the mine itself, without working in the mine—are concerned with what has been described as a mountain-high hill of tailings nearby, and depending on which way the wind is blowing it can blow the dust loaded with dangerous fibres, as I understand it, as far as 30 or 40 miles—this is what many people would like to see removed—if he could inform the House whether the federal government, under the existing law, has taken steps to ensure that this safety precaution is carried out?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I also heard the radio report this morning on CBC and I have asked my officials to provide me with an up to date report on all the points that were raised. Certainly, all the points that the hon. member has raised will be looked into and I will be very happy to give him a full report. However, I am informed that a considerable amount of action has been taken and the company has been moving very well to comply with the regulations. I will make sure that the action is stepped-up if it needs to be.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that the miners themselves, and the wife of virtually every miner, as I understand it, took part in a demonstration at the weekend on the precise ground that what the company has committed itself to do is not sufficient to meet the health requirements, would the minister now make a commitment to the House, with specific reference to the mountain-high hill of tailings, that he will ensure that it will be dealt with properly from a health point of view in the immediate future?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to provide the hon. member with information on that particular question.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

POSSIBILITY OF PROVINCES LAYING FOUNDATION OF NEW CONSTITUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. Because at the hearings held throughout Canada by the Pepin-Robarts commission many Canadians expressed the wish for Canada to have a new constitution, can the minister tell the House whether he has had discussions with the provincial leaders on the subject in the last few weeks?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, the government has already echoed the wish expressed by Canadians to give ourselves a new constitution that is truly Canadian; the right hon. Prime Minister, through his efforts in the last ten years, has proved that he is willing to do everything possible to achieve that end. I have had conversations with some of my colleagues in the last few months, but must say that I have not held meetings on the subject with my provincial colleagues in the last few weeks.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in view of the urgency of starting serious discussions on the possibility of having a new constitution, can the minister tell the House whether he would look kindly on the provinces holding a conference to work out the basic principles of a new constitution, following which they could report to the central government to show their good will with regard to the new constitution that would guarantee the rights of the provinces and lead to greater stability in Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister has already written twice in the last few months, in the last year, to the provincial premiers and, at the first ministers' conference in February, he and his provincial counterparts agreed on holding a conference on the constitution probably sometime in the fall.

I hope that conference will be held in the spirit of co-operation indicated by the hon. member. He can rest assured that we envisage the conference in that spirit and hope that, on the other side, no one will amuse himself by untimely banging the door.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

STEPS TO IMPROVE GRAIN MOVEMENT TO AND THROUGH WEST COAST

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, the Minister of Transport. It has been confirmed that China has expressed dissatisfaction with Canada's ability to meet its grain transportation commitments. It also appears that China is ready to enter the grain market in a substantial way, with the distinct possibility of much higher world grain prices—prices from which Canadian farmers may not benefit because China has indicated it may look to the United States for its requirements. What is the government doing to increase our grain movement to and through the west coast so that we may participate in future sales?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have done a great number of things, including the very important purchase of 8,000 hopper cars and tax incentives which allow the railways to double-track and increase the capacity to the west coast. Millions of bushels of additional storage has been constructed in Vancouver, and there are proposals for important facilities in Prince Rupert.

The fact is, we have been unloading more cars on the west coast each day than at almost any time in the past, constantly setting new records. This year we are exporting perhaps as much as 150 million bushels of wheat more than we actually had available from the 1977 crop. We are setting a new record and doing very well.

Obviously, if we had more wheat and more capacity, we could export more because of current demands. But we are doing very well indeed. Our plan is to encourage farmers to produce more and to continue expanding facilities so that we will be able to export far more grain than at present. I do not think, however, that hon. members should overlook the fact that a record is being set.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister would tell that to the Chinese. We have heard that statement in the House before. I ask the minister if officials from the Canadian Wheat Board are planning to go to China in the next few days, in an effort to calm any fears the Chinese might have about our inability to deliver grain and, if so, could he indicate what instructions they have been given? This is truly a serious situation. Prices appear to be rising, yet we are not able to fulfil all our export commitments.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we are exporting more and fulfilling our commitments at a rate more rapid than we anticipated when those commitments were made. There is a backlog from the December-January period which will take some time to clear up. I dismiss the hon. member's suggestion that there is any deep-seated concern on the part of the Chinese in this regard. They know our record and they know our generally very good performance. I was in China less than a year ago and found no problem with their attitude.

I say again to the hon. member that it should be obvious that when we are exporting a record volume, twice as much as in any year when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was prime minister, obviously we have come close to our maximum capacity, but we will build more capacity because we will export more than hon. members opposite ever dreamed of.

GOVERNMENT MEMBERS APPOINTED TO PUBLIC SERVICE POSITIONS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I should like to draw his attention to the fact that there is no economic or finance minister here today—Finance, Treasury Board, Revenue and ITC are all missing. Are the vacancies to be filled on the Canadian Transport Commission and on the Canadian Pension Commission, and is the government now considering the appointment, as mooted in the paper, of the hon. member of parliament for Cochrane as a member of the Canadian Transport Commission in lieu of appointment as ambassador to the Vatican, or the appointment of the hon. member for Kitchener to the Canadian Pension Commission in lieu of running for the Liberal nomination in Kitchener? Are these under consideration, Mr. Speaker?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the absence of the Minister of Finance, he is attending a meeting of the International Monetary Fund in Mexico City. I think hon. members opposite will realize the importance of that. As far as the rest of the question is concerned, I take it more as a representation than a question. Hon. members were complaining a few weeks ago that we were naming too many Tories to public positions and that we were depleting their ranks. Now I see the hon. member is trying to get even, and I will give that consideration.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I have no fears in that direction. My question was, where will Flynn fly or Stewart cavort?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT APPOINTED TO THE BENCH

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of an answer from the Prime Minister I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. In connection with the two judicial appointments made last week of members of parliament to district courts in Ontario, did the minister refer the names of these appointees and other potential appointees to either the benchers of the Law Society of Ontario or to the appropriate committee of the Canadian Bar Association for their recommendation? If he did not, why not; and if he did, would he expand on that?

The other part of my question to the minister is to ask how he was able to persuade the hon. member for Ottawa Centre to accept an appointment when the day before he had said that he wanted to run?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to answer all the question, but with regard to the first part about whether the names were referred to the appropriate committee of the Canadian Bar Association, the answer is yes. Any other answer would be exceptional.

With regard to the rest of the question, I can only say that, contrary to newspaper reports, knowing both members appointed to the county and district court I have full confidence in them as members of the judiciary, and they were appointed on my recommendation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNMENT MEMBERS TO ADMINISTRATIVE POSITIONS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question in the same vein. Is it correct that Her Majesty's Consular Corps is to be strengthened by the appointment of the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine to the position of consul in New Orleans? If this is the case, when will the appointment be made?

In addition, to save asking a supplementary, will the Prime Minister advise the House whether a Liberal member of this House will be ushered from the ranks of those who must have their mandates renewed or otherwise by the electorate to be appointed Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, who that member might be, and when the appointment be made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will tell you what happened, Mr. Speaker. Over the past—

Mr. Alexander: Take it easy.

Mr. Trudeau: You take it easy. Over the past few months a great number of Tories have been coming to us asking to be appointed: I think as many as 10 or 12, but I have not made a count. When they came, the government did the usual thing: we asked ourselves whether they were qualified. Even though they were Tories, we appointed them because we judged they were qualified. We do not think a person is disqualified from serving the public in another capacity merely because he has served the public for 5, 10 or 15 years in the House of Commons. This is the position of this government.

● (1442)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Nobody believes you.

Mr. Trudeau: Having appointed some ten or so Tories to the public service by order in council, it is true that a few Liberals said, "Can we be appointed?"

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I said, Mr. Speaker, "If you are not running away as the others were, if you are honestly wanting to change your career, then we will consider it. But not otherwise."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: I guess he has not met Joe Flynn.

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF HON. MEMBER FOR KITCHENER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and, hopefully, a short supplementary which I would like to direct to the Prime Minister. Some time ago the hon. member for Kitchener told his constituency association that there was a federal appointment waiting for him. Since then we have had senators Haidasz and Guay appointed, judge Poulin appointed and commissioner Sharp appointed, and others; and, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, even some Conservatives. Therefore, I would like to know what will happen to the hon. member for Kitchener, and will the Prime Minister tell the House why this member, who seemed to be off to such a good start, has not gone to his final reward?

An hon. Member: You do not seem to be concerned about many individuals.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it the hon. member is making a representation on behalf of the hon. member for Kitchener. I think that is very noble of him. It is something we do not usually expect in this House from the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

TAX STATUS OF ENVIRONMENTAL GROUPS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Environment). This morning I was in touch with a number of environmental groups from all parts of Canada, some of whom refuse to have their names revealed because of fear that being in touch with me would deprive them of the status which they have under the Income Tax Act. I wonder if the minister has been in touch with the Minister of National Revenue to determine whether representations made by them to members of parliament, all or several or just a few, on matters of policy or legislation, unsolicited, will deprive environmental organizations and others of the status they enjoy under the Income Tax Act?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, this question has not been raised with me. I will be very happy to look into it.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the minister will make inquiries, and that he will provide assurances to the House in this area and in many others, otherwise the groups are bound to conclude that the regulations designed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

REPORT ON POLLUTION OF OTTAWA RIVER

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the minister of the environment: It seems to be his day. Following his answer to a question in this House last week, can the minister tell us when we can expect the release of the report of the special joint study concerning pollution of the Ottawa River?

An hon. Member: Change the government.

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, this report will be released on May 8; that is the target date that I have now. We have had consultations with the government of Quebec and, of course, the government of Ontario. We believe we now have cleared up all the questions that were raised, especially those raised by the government of the province of Quebec, and thus we can release the report. It is a matter of getting the report printed in the proper form.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SEXUAL OFFENCES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. It arises from a statement the minister put out today which is headed, "Basford introduces justice omnibus bill". Those are, of course, amendments to the Criminal Code. First of all, my question deals with the subject of rape. The bill provides that an act of rape will be treated as a form of indecent assault. As the Minister of Justice knows, the fact is that consent is no defence to assault.

Do I take it now that the provision in this new bill will be that consent will not be an element of the crime in proving rape? Secondly, the statement goes on to say that rather than restricting the offence to an act of penetration of a female, it will reduce the crime of rape to indecent assault. Does he mean that under the new statute the question of rape or indecent assault, however he wants to describe it, penetration is immaterial and the element of consent is no longer an element of the crime?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to embarrass the hon. member, but I feel bound to say—I take this to be the case—that he did not see my note on the envelope which I sent to him. This information was being sent to him as a courtesy, and not for comment or publication until the bills therein had been read for the first time later today. I am sure the hon. member's question was put now quite inadvertently.

I am not sure I followed the question of the hon. member in its entirety. The proposed amendment is to improve the law relating to sexual offences and the commission of sexual offences to take cognizance of the position taken by many—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps, in the circumstances, both the question and answer would be better left till the introduction of the bill. The hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is absent today, so I would like to reserve my question.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

BAIE VERTE, NEWFOUNDLAND—ASBESTOS DUST POLLUTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is by way of a supplementary to the question posed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby to the Minister of State (Environment): it concerns the situation in Baie Verte and the asbestos mines in Newfoundland. I ask the minister why his department has not seen fit to provide an on-site inspection and, as a consequence of that inspection, enforce the federal law which he has responsibility to enforce. Why were the levels of asbestos dust at this site allowed to pass the acceptable standards without the minister's department moving in?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I will check the specifics of that particular question. There was considerable work being done by the government of Newfoundland, because we do not have complete jurisdiction over this particular facility, and I would expect that to be the answer. I will certainly check it out. I am advised by my officials that the levels of dust at this particular plant at Baie Verte are monitored, and I take that to mean we are watching the situation day by day as things happen.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the minister tells the House that the situation in Baie Verte is being monitored. Surely he must know—it has become a matter of national news—that there is a strike at this mine because the levels of dust are unacceptably high and therefore pose a serious health threat not only to the mine employees but to the residents of the town. If the strike continues, will the minister look upon this as an emergency situation and send his officials there immediately?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will take that into consideration. When the news report came out I asked for a report immediately. As soon as I get that report, if immediate action needs to be taken on my part I will be happy to so advise my staff.

An hon. Member: Six months!

NATIONAL SECURITY

MISSING RCMP SURVEILLANCE REPORTS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, in the absence of the Solicitor General. It concerns the 24 reports which are mysteriously missing for the years 1971 and 1972. We now know that those reports were summaries of original documents presented to the Solicitor General for his perusal.

Given the fact that the APLQ surveillance and break-in took place in the year 1972—the actual break-in was October 6, 1972—can the Minister of Justice now give us his unequivocal assurance that none of the documents perused by the then solicitor general referred in any way to activities with respect to surveillance of subversives, or alleged subversives, or surveillance of that agency during that year?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a complete answer to that question because, as Acting Solicitor General, I am not briefed on the precise detail of the question. As I recall the answers given by the Solicitor General, he made it clear that the documents upon which the summaries were prepared were not destroyed and were available if, indeed, they had not been given already to the McDonald commission. Whether any of those summaries contain information relating to the APLQ break-in, I do not know.

Mr. Leggatt: The minister is well aware that in any testimony given before the McDonald inquiry, the solicitor general at the time could not be cross-examined on his knowledge, with the assistance of the missing reports. Those reports would be very significant to the inquiry. Also, out of the McDonald inquiry we now have evidence of 419 illicit entries, if I could put it that way. Breaking and entering without warrant would be another way of describing what occurred. Now, 402 of those incidents occurred in British Columbia. Since writs of assistance are available in drug cases—so these are clearly not drug cases—would the minister advise us why it was necessary for 402 illegal entries to be made in the province of British Columbia in that short period? What were they for?

Mr. Basford: I will obtain an answer and give it to the hon. member.

TRADE

INQUIRY WHEN SECOND REPORT ON ECONOMIC BOYCOTTS WILL BE TABLED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister tell the House when the second report on economic boycotts will be tabled? This report was to cover the period August 1, 1977, to July 31, 1978, and was promised early in March.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe it is the intention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to table it soon.

Mr. Kempling: Could the Prime Minister tell us when the Bryce commission report on corporate concentration will be tabled? I understand that this report was submitted to the government last November. I suppose we may see it at some time in the future. I understand it is being edited.

Mr. Trudeau: The report of its being ready last November is, as far as I know, completely false. I believe it is being made ready now. My recollection is that it will be ready in the first half of May, but I would have to check that. I am certain the November date is not correct.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX STATUS OF CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and is supplementary to those asked by hon. friends who are concerned about the tax status of charitable organizations. The right hon. gentleman indicated that he has not yet read this circular which has been a subject of debate in the House for at least two weeks. My question concerns policy. Is it the policy of the government to deprive charitable organizations of their tax status if they make recommendations to support or change government policy or the law?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is really asking me for a legal opinion. I can answer him by saying that this is the precise question to which an answer is attempted in the circular put out by the department. The law, I repeat, is general. It states that charitable organizations will not pay taxes. The circular tries to indicate what is and what is not a charitable organization.

If the hon. member wants an answer to a particular question about a specific charitable organization, I would undertake to ask the department to give its advice on the matter. But, of course, that advice would only be based on the department's interpretation of the law and on the jurisprudence: in the final analysis the issue would be decided by the courts.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister is mistaken. I was not asking for an interpretation of the law; I was asking for the policy of the government. We know what the effect of this circular has been. We know it has caused real concern among charitable organizations which feel their tax status has been changed. Is it now the policy of the government to deprive charitable organizations of their tax status if they make representations which seek to support or change the law or policy of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: That cannot be said to be a policy of the government. The policy of the government is embodied in the law. The law itself needs interpretation. I cannot, in all sincerity, tell the hon. member that I know how the law would be applied in a particular case. If he is asking me whether it is our intention to deprive charitable organizations of their tax advantage, the answer is, of course, that we are not. But that begs the question: What is a charitable organization? When would it cease to be a charitable organization and become one which was interested in politics, or sport, or making money?

It is the job of those in the Department of National Revenue to interpret the law, and they do the best they can. If this circular is not satisfactory, I am convinced the department would be prepared to meet with representatives desirous of arguing the case further. The law is that charitable organizations do not pay taxes. But the definition of a charitable organization has to be interpreted. This is done by the department and by the courts. It is not the purpose of the government to try to interpret the law in such a way as to try to penalize anybody.

Mr. Clark: The document states, in part, that written or oral representations to all or mostly all members of parliament or ministers as part of a campaign to influence intended or specific legislation cannot properly be made by a charity wishing to maintain registered status. That is the clear language of this document, plainly showing a policy on the part of the government to attempt to stop actions by charitable organizations which, in the words of the document, might embarrass the government.

Since the Prime Minister appears not to be clear about the document and about the policy, I should like to ask him this: Will he suspend this document and its effect until it has been reviewed in consultation with the charitable organizations which are adversely affected by it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If it were within my power to suspend it, I would tell the House right now that I suspend it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. lady laughs. This is not what her leader asked. I hereby suspend it, then.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I must explain, at least to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a distillation of the law. It is an attempt to help the taxpayer by distilling the jurisprudence in those areas where the law is applied. If the taxpayer does not wish to be guided by this, he need not. If this document can be improved, it will be improved. But it will remain, in the last analysis, for the courts applying the law to decide whether an organization is charitable or not. And this is hereby suspended, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clark: Now that the Prime Minister has backed down and suspended this document—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —I applaud him for doing it. Hon. members opposite can bleat as much as they like. Will the right hon. gentleman give us a commitment, having suspended this document, that any further interpretation of a similar nature will be worked out in consultation with the charitable organizations concerned?

Mr. Trudeau: I am assured that this document was prepared in consultation with many charitable organizations. One hon. member opposite shakes his head: I hear him shaking his head.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It is possible, of course, that they have not all been consulted. I must say I do not think the Leader of the Opposition understands the law and its application in administrative fields.

Mr. Clark: Will you give us an undertaking to consult with the charitable organizations concerned?

Mr. Trudeau: The departments are at all times called upon to administer the law under their jurisdiction. The government has nothing to do with this. It is the function of the departments to put these documents together, and they are as helpful as they can be to the citizens concerned.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WOOLLIAMS—APOLOGY FOR BREACH OF CONFIDENCE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. When I received this package from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) I opened it. It was not sent to me in confidence. The envelope was upside down. I did see a note from the Minister of Justice that the bill would be read later today. I want to apologise. It was an accident on my part because I did not read the outside of the envelope. The Minister of Justice has confirmed that. I just want to say, after having been here a number of years, that I have never broken confidence with any minister or any member of this House.

● (1502)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my answer, I fully accept the statement of the hon. member. He and I have been either minister or official critic for quite some time, and I know that our relationship is such that confidences are not broken.

MR. COSSITT—HOUSE OF COMMONS—VACANCIES IN MEMBERSHIP

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very brief question of privilege. Under the rules of the House I know that I do not have the right to object—and I certainly would not—to the fact that the Chair saw fit in its judgment not to allow me a supplementary question. In retrospect I realize that this judgment was probably quite correct and that the supplementary question which I had for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is really a question of privilege rather than a question.

In about 50 words or less I would like to outline that question of privilege. As of today there are approximately 14 House of Commons vacancies, and over one million Canadians are deprived of representation in this House. This obviously interferes with House business with regard to having full Commons committees operating, having quorums at all times and so forth. These vacancies increase the workload of hard-working members who are already here and who must fill in by assisting in representing those constituencies which are not represented. I ask the Prime Minister on this question of privilege why he does not, despite the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn), call an election immediately?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that he does have a question and not a question of privilege.

RAILWAY ACT

USE OF BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES AND ADOPTION OF INTERNATIONAL TRAFFIC SYMBOLS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-450, to amend the Railway Act (signs, notices and forms).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to remove from this act the restrictive provisions concerning public notices and announcements and to permit use of both official languages in all provinces in Canada. At present, this requirement is limited to Quebec. This bill also proposes the adoption of international symbols for railway crossings.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS

DURATION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-451, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1978 (duration of House of Commons).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, this bill in effect would set a four-year term for parliament without curtailing the right of members to force an election earlier or later, if either is the desire of 100 members. I introduce this bill at this time because representation in this House is now being depleted very rapidly, and I think most hon. members would agree that it would be easy to find 100 members who would be in favour of having an election called if this bill were implemented.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

GRANT TO POSITIVE ACTION COMMITTEE OF MONTREAL

Question No. 1,362—Mr. Epp:

1. Were any grants made to the Positive Action Committee of Montreal by the Department of the Secretary of State and, if so, for what specific purpose?

2. How many persons does the Committee employ and what amount of the grant will be paid to them for their employment?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. Yes, a grant of $50,000 has been approved of which $20,000 has been paid in fiscal year 1977/78 and $30,000 is earmarked for fiscal year 1978/79 subject to satisfactory completion of specific phases of the study. The organization is undertaking a study to assess the impact of current trends in Quebec upon the social, cultural and economic fabric of Montreal. This study is intended to provide a better understanding of the present situation and enable governments and citizens to act to maintain the vitality and bilingual nature of the city.

2. Assuming acceptance by the department of all phases of the study: Honoraria to about ten individuals who will direct committees and write reports: Amount, $20,000; Student assistants (about ten): Amount $10,000; Translation: Amount $5,000; Preparation, typing, printing of surveys and draft reports and other miscellaneous expenses: Amount $15,000; Total $50,000.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

Question No. 1,376—Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska):

1. Since the passing of the Canada Student Loans Act, did the government give any fiscal compensation to the Province of Quebec and, if so, what was the (a) nature of the compensation (b) total amount?

2. How many students per province benefitted from a loan under the Act?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. Yes. The government of Quebec opted out of the Canada Student Loans Act in 1964 and, under the provision of that act qualified for an "alternative payment". (a) The alternative payment is an amount obtained by multiplying the total net amount paid by the federal government to lenders in respect of interest charges and loss or death claims on loans issued by provinces participating in the program by the quotient obtained by dividing the 18/24 year old population of the opting out province by the 18/24 year old population in participating provinces for the year concerned. (b) To June 30, 1977, a total of $76.2 million had been paid to the province of Quebec under the alternative payment provision.

2. A cumulative total of the number of students assisted by province is not available because many students receive aid from more than one province during their education. In the loan year 1976/77 assistance was authorized under the program to the following numbers of students by the provinces shown: British Columbia: 16,887; Alberta: 14,015; Saskatchewan: 5,069; Manitoba: 7,759; Ontario: 88,732; New Brunswick: 6,567; Nova Scotia: 9,471; Prince Edward Island: 1,458; Newfoundland: 4,888; Yukon: 80; Northwest Territories: 55; Total 154,981.

CIDA—SALARIES

Question No. 1,379—Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska):

What is the salary of the (a) President (b) Vice-Presidents (c) various categories of employees working for the Canadian International Development Agency?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): (a) $49,500-$65,300; (b) $33,300-$52,300; (c) AG, $27,510-$31,738; AR, $27,941-$35,358; BI, $27,029-$31,170; ES, $24,481-$39,324; ED-EDS, $23,258-$37,800; ENG, $15,892-$40,800; FO, $24,828-$29,-124; LS, $13,127-$26,187; AS, $14,122-$32,500; CS, $9,842-$29,400; FI, $14,676-$32,600; IS, $10,620-$32,600; OM, $12,340-$32,900; PE, $13,500-$36,100; PM, $15,746-$34,900; PG, $10,047-$29,471; FS, $23,299-$33,684; DD, $10,983-$16,374; EG-EDSS, $16,738-$18,772; GT, $12,372-$22,064; SI, $13,423-$21,486; DA, $11,935—$14,543; CR, $8,483-$15,177; OE-MSE, $7,319-$9,085; ST-TYP, $7,855-$8,568; ST-OCE, $9,803-$10,712; ST-STN, $7,368-$10,228; ST-SCY, $7,443-$15,447; GS-MES, $8,268-$8,268; GS-STS, $8,794-$8,794.

CANADA COUNCIL GRANTS—PETITIONS

Question No. 1,454—Mr. Malone:

Has the Secretary of State received any letters or petitions since January 1, 1978 protesting the present methods of awarding Canada Council grants and, if so (a) how many (b) how many signatures were attached to the petitions?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Between January 1 and March 31, 1978, the Secretary of State Department received approximately 450 letters concerning the methods of awarding Canada Council grants. It is estimated that some 1,000 signatures were attached to the letters.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS, SPECIFICALLY NOS. 45 AND 54

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have risen a number of times regarding questions which have been on the order paper for as long as two years. Without going through all the numbers and taking the time of the House to do so, I refer to questions beginning with questions beginning in the 30's and on up. Each time I have raised this point of order all I have received from the parliamentary secretary have been guarantees that they will do their best, that many questions have been answered, a very high percentage, and so forth.

I would like to refer specifically to two questions which are long standing but which are easy to answer, and there is really no valid excuse for the government's not having answered them. The first is question No. 54 regarding the brother-in-law of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), Tony Merchant, and the amount of legal business he has received from the Government of Canada, including what he was paid to represent the Crown in a case against radio station CKRM. That question is simple enough to have been answered months ago, but the answer has not been forthcoming, and I hope it is not due to the fact that Tony Merchant is a Liberal candidate for the coming election.

The second question to which I would like to refer is No. 45. The matter dealt with in this question should concern hon. members on both sides because it is very serious. It has to do with the fingerprinting of public servants. This has been going on for months and months and, in fact, several years under this government, yet no one on the government side has seen fit to do anything but admit that it is going on. My question asks how many have been fingerprinted and why they are being fingerprinted. It asks about people who are outside security sensitive positions such as positions in the Department of National Defence and so forth. Why is this going on among people who are not in security positions? What are the numbers involved, and why is this House not being told of this situation?

There is an invasion of privacy involving thousands of public servants. The government is well aware that many refused to be fingerprinted, yet nothing is forthcoming.

I am surprised that members of the free press of this country have not gone after the government for not doing something about this situation and for not making the reasons public.

I conclude by asking the parliamentary secretary not to give a general answer but to refer specifically to questions Nos. 45 and 54 and to tell me when the answers will be forthcoming.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall find out whether questions Nos. 45 and 54 are those which the hon. member mentioned today.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

The House resumed, from Friday, April 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen (for Mr. Andras) that Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when the debate ended on Friday I had been responding to my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre), with respect to the difficulties that we in this House have with respect to inspecting, controlling, and superintending, in the way that the House of Commons has always intended that it be done, the expenditures of government. I will not repeat the arguments which I advanced at that time because I know the parliamentary secretary is very anxious to have the debate conclude within a reasonable time, an anxiety which, I want to assure him, is shared on all sides of the House. Hon. members are free to read the remarks I made at that time.

A number of things have occurred in the House since the introduction of Bill C-10 and the comments made in the second reading debate on the bill which bring to mind just how important is the position of the comptroller general. For instance, let me refer to the case of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) and of a public servant, Mr. Larry Stopforth, a case which Mr. Stopforth won in the courts of law wherein he was awarded not an unreasonable amount in damages for libel, through repetition of a statement about that gentleman's professional performance, made in the House of Commons, for which the minister was found liable to pay both damages and costs. The case is now subject to appeal and, therefore, I make no comments on the merits of the matter, but what is important with respect to that case, so far as the use of the public money is concerned, particularly because of the nature of the case, is that there seems no way in which it could be reasonably found that a minister of the Crown, in the course of libelling one of his public servants, could be held to have been acting within his authority, and therefore, by tradition, custom or otherwise, have his damages paid out of the public purse. It is one thing to defend him; it is quite another to go that far and to indicate that one is prepared to go that far.

This is important because it calls into play the whole question of ministerial responsibility. Surely there has to be some action somewhere with respect to a minister of the Crown regarding what he does in relation to the operations of his department or in relation to the position he takes in so far as his public servants are concerned.

What happened to Mr. Stopforth as a result of what has now been judiciably found to be a wrong in terms of the description of what he did? He was found not to have been grossly negligent by a court of law. What happened was that this highly placed public servant, who asked only for the privilege of serving his country with the skills and the expertise that were his, has now found himself doing work that does not occupy or challenge either his intellect, training, or ability. Notwithstanding the fact that questions have been raised in the House about the matter, the position of that public servant and how he has been treated by the Government of Canada—that is where it lies because it was a minister of the Crown who maligned him—are a travesty that no right-thinking member of the House of Commons should tolerate for one moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): But this government is prepared to tolerate it and, while tolerating it, is prepared to say that, in the unequal balance between its resources in the legal sense and the resources of a public servant in his private capacity, the government is prepared to add yet another weight to that inequality, that is to cover the indemnity and save from penalty a minister who has maligned a public servant.

There have been a number of things that have happened in the last little while that enrage one, that make one wonder about the direction in which this government is going and about its sense of responsibility, but there is nothing that has occurred in the last little while that has shaken people as much as the knowledge that this government would stoop, without any statutory authority whatsoever—and that is admitted—to paying those damages. If there was even a case for a requirement of a comptroller general, if there was ever a case for a subsequent inquiry by the Auditor General, if there was ever a case of the misuse of public funds, then we have that in the case of Larry Stopforth versus Jean-Pierre Goyer. I suspect that that is the kind of thing a comptroller general would never allow to see the light of day, not that it would be hidden but that it would never occur.

If I sound angry and incensed about it, I am. I am angered that this should be tolerated. The government can seek redemption, if it wants, by backing off publicly from such an untenable position. What sanction is there? You and I, Mr. Speaker, if we go to court, have to pay our own fees. That is quite one thing. If damages are found against us when we have not been acting correctly in the course of our duties—and there is no way that a member of the government, in slandering or libelling a public servant, can be held to be acting in the course of his duties—then, like everybody else, we have to go to the bank and borrow the money if we do not have it. I suggest that if this kind of thing is allowed to stand, then the whole doctrine of ministerial responsibility will be split asunder and the balance of fairness that should be found in a judicial proceeding will not be found in this case. I for one, so long as I am here, will say to those who are here representing the minister today that it is absolutely unfair and a gross miscarriage of justice, and we might as well say so.

The other thing that concerns me is the mind of a minister who would allow the kind of information circular to be put out with respect to registered charities, political objects and activities, that was the subject of the discussion today in the question period. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can say that he withdraws it. He is right, but he does not have the power to withdraw it. That is not the question. The question is how has it occurred. How did he ever decide that we can send out a circular which has been deemed unjust in the reasonable representations of good organizations in the community, churches, and charitable organizations? It involves an expenditure of public funds and, if you can accept what the Prime Minister said, it has been going on for some period of time.

Perhaps the comptroller general will be helpful in ending this practice. Is it any wonder charitable organizations are concerned about it? Is it any wonder people who observe this government and are outside those organizations are concerned about its attitude and mentality? The Prime Minister said that it is a distillation of the law and an attempt to expand the law. The former minister of national revenue gave the lie to that when he told the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) that there was no definition of political activity. In this case, justice varies with the length of the minister's foot. Is it any wonder people are concerned about what kind of government we have? What are the moral standards of the government? What can we believe?

The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) pointed out today the effect of this. For instance, if those who favour a continuation of the law in respect of abortion decide to write members of parliament, then they are in danger of losing their charitable status. If organizations in favour of expanding the grounds or removing it from the Criminal Code, decide to write their members of parliament, then this so-called law is infringed and they can lose their charitable status. One must think of the charitable organizations in Canada and the wording of that doctrine, as set forth in the gospel according to the Department of National Revenue dated February 27, 1978. In part the document reads as follows:

> An activity is considered political if it is designed to embarrass or otherwise induce a government to take a stand, change a policy, or enact legislation for a purpose particular to the organization carrying on the activity.

Presentation of briefs is considered to be a political activity. Would this include the presentation of briefs to members of parliament, ministers of the Crown, and departmental officials? Surely this practice cannot be allowed to continue. The Prime Minister must do more than displaying little theatrics as he did today. They are likened to his flouncing out of the House a few days ago, saying, "I withdraw it". He does not have the power to withdraw it, and he realizes that.

Certainly Senator Guay ought to be roasted for permitting this document to emanate out of the bowels of the Department of National Revenue. One cannot blame the Public Service for this. Public servants are under direction, control of and are responsible to ministers. In turn, the ministers are responsible to the House of Commons and ultimately to Canadians. We hope people will have an opportunity to make a choice very soon, but in the words of Geoffrey Stevens, perhaps this government suffers from congenital cold feet.

I commend the document entitled "A Legacy of Spending" which is now available in bookstores. It brings together information from the order paper, debates, and the government, on a host of areas. It indicates an attitude of wastefulness, improvidence, and congenital lack of judgment on the part of the government. I will not point to many areas, as other hon. members have done so.

Can one imagine a Young Canada Works program giving $25,121 to an organization known as Creation II to deal with human information overload? The metro Social Planning Council received two grants of $18,000 and $43,000. The funds were used mainly to draw up applications for other groups wishing to receive funds from the federal government. Is that not a waste of public money? Approximately $40,000 was used to produce two pro-communist plays for presentation in metro Toronto high schools. The recipient of this grant stated that he had strong communist leanings. Also he received a $26,000 grant to produce children's plays for public parks. Can one imagine that type of program?

There is a place for a granting program. I am not arguing that. But I am concerned about the looseness of the department which is administering this program. Should these things be allowed to happen? A minister of the Crown took great pains to tell parliament and the public that he makes the ultimate choice, for the Young Canada Works program. According to that minister, it is not done on the recommendation of hon. members of parliament, nor on the recommendations from ministerial advisory groups. The minister indicated that he makes the final decision.

A grant of $15,880 was given to a project known as "The Shadow of Dracula" to produce a full-length film with this intriguing title, using the residents of a housing corporation development in Toronto. Is that how public funds should be spent? Is it any wonder hon. members of the official opposition support the concept of a comptroller general, and have done so for some time? At the outset we were dismayed by the government deciding to stand against the concept of a comptroller general. It was indicated that, for some reason or other, there was a mystery surrounding that concept, and that it might interfere with ministerial responsibility, which is a doctrine the government is prepared to ignore when it is convenient.

The sum of $23,500 was granted for a study on how to demystify the dance, another project which was approved by a minister of the Crown and not a public servant. It was not approved by a member of parliament for the area, nor by a member of the public who was involved in a ministerial advisory group which supposedly advises ministers of the Crown. This is one of the projects which was "ultimately approved by the minister". That justifies the office of comptroller general.

Various other examples are contained in the document to which I referred. For example, a drafting clerk at Dairyland, Coquitlam, Mr. Maurice Muirhead, received $306,784. That grant was under a Local Initiatives program and not Young Canada Works. Is it local initiative for a man to be able to con the government out of $306,784? According to the reports, the man had no qualifications whatsoever. He had a full-time job, and yet received four grants totalling more than $250,000. Surely that was not done on the advice of the hon. member of parliament for that area, nor on the advice of constituency advisory groups which are supposed to represent the taxpayers of Canada. Again this was a project approved by the minister.

I could refer to many such projects, but in particular I should like to refer to those famous buttons which were produced by the former minister of national health and welfare and charged to the Status of Women. Has Your Honour ever heard any of the women's groups talking positively about the Status of Women program instituted by this government, except to say it is the greatest study on cosmetics since Revlon? Have you ever heard them speak in a laudatory way about that? No, you have not, Mr. Speaker.

We had a question on the order paper of the House of Commons asking how much it cost to produce those buttons, which read "Why not?" or "Pourquoi pas?", on behalf of that program as a promotion. The answer by the then minister of national health and welfare, now the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde), was that they cost $62,224. I suggest you could go to any self-respecting women's group in this country, and its membership would find a positive use for that $62,000 odd.

Why do I raise these questions and why do I put these examples on the record of this House of Commons? A young person came to see me last Thursday. He is a graduate of a university, with a degree in psychology. He wants to put his skills to use. He has studied for four years, plus one, and cannot now get a job. He cannot find employment. He has had difficulty in finding employment even in an area outside his skills.

We have one million people unemployed in this country, including young people who cannot fulfil their ambitions or even use their training. They are discouraged and upset. I think of what the Prime Minister has said about these people wanting to move somewhere else, and I say to myself that if ever there was a government which needed a comptroller general, in the face of these examples I have given surely this is the government. If ever a country needed a change of government, in the face of the matters I have raised surely it is this country.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), when he was leader of the opposition, suggested that the government spills more sometimes in respect of some projects than it spends. I think of the senior citizens who petition members of parliament about the inadequacy of pension programs and the whole performance of the spouse's allowance. The moment an individual over 65 dies and leaves a widow between ages 60 and 65, even before that spouse is buried the survivor has that allowance taken away. When this occurs, and when I think about the wastage by this government which says it cannot afford to do better, then I say no wonder the Canadian people cannot believe in this government, and no wonder they cannot credit it with being able to speak the truth on anything. No wonder we need a comptroller general in Canada.

I happen to be a member of the committee on statutory instruments that twice has said the use of regulations to increase the postal rates is wrong in law, yet we have heard the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) say he does not care whether it is wrong in law. It apparently does not matter to him whether this practice flouts parliament. He says he will run things by order in council. When I hear that kind of thing, and the refusal of a minister of the Crown to deal in any way with the question of the legality of this in the face of that unanimous report, then I say there is no stronger case anywhere for a comptroller general. That report was not just supported by members of the Conservative and NDP parties, but was unanimously passed by members of the Liberal party as well as members of the Conservative and NDP. It said that the last postal rate was illegal, and that suggestion was supported by members of both Houses of Parliament. In spite of that, a minister of the government has said he does not care whether it is legal or illegal, he intends to go ahead with it anyway.

I also consider what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and Senator Jack Marshall, who was the veterans affairs critic in this House before being summoned to the other place, have attempted. Those two gentlemen have asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to do certain things for widows of veterans and for veterans themselves by simply living up to the promises this government has made to a dwindling group of Canadians. They have asked this government simply to comply with doctrines that are existent. They have combined, time after time, to move motions under Standing Order 43, but members on the government side have turned them down. I suppose they have done that because they are worried about restraints on spending. But when this government wastes money as though it were going out of style, then I say we need a comptroller general in this country.

At the report stage of this bill we moved amendments that would give the comptroller general some power and some status in law. We moved amendments to give him some way to muscle into that club of deputy ministers in order to do his job, by requiring them to perform according to guidelines rather than by order in council or guidelines that have come from the bowels of government behind the green covered doors. We tried in that way to give the comptroller general the power to require performance according to the guidelines adopted in the open here in this place, yet we heard government members say they would not give us that kind of regulation.

In view of all this, I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and to Senator Jack Marshall that they ought not wonder why their reasonable requests, made on behalf of widows, veterans, widows of veterans, unmarried people, and spouses left alone as a result of death, have fallen on barren ground, because this is the kind of government we have, and this is the kind of government that had to be kicked into acceptance of the concept of a comptroller general in the first place. However, when we try to arm the comptroller general with some teeth, the government turns us back.

There are many things to be done in this country. I think of many people I have met who are handicapped and are trying to enter the public service, and trying to find a place in other areas of employment, asking only to be given a chance to compete as equals, all to no avail. They are not asking for special treatment, they just want an equal opportunity.

When I read that report prepared jointly by Treasury Board and the staff of the Public Service Commission and hear the minister say that his heart is in the right place—and I think it is—but he can support only these baby steps of implementation because to do otherwise would be very costly, and I stack this against the wastage which is set forth in this book, then I despair and wonder about the meaning of words such as honesty, integrity, trustworthiness, things that we ought to expect of this government.

Surely all of us have seen that brief relating to funding of research and development prepared by the Canadian Advanced Technology Association for consideration by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I am not going to read it now, but it asks for a reasonable and certain approach to a funding program for research and development in order to assist in the development of Canadian industry, and employment opportunities for Canadians. When I think of the waste of some of the government programs, waste so great that we do not have any money for these programs of merit, then I say this makes the Minister of Finance looks pretty sick when he suggests the opposition is always advocating the spending of money.

There are great things to be done in this country. There are things that can be done for the disadvantaged. We have come to be accustomed to accepting second best, the lowest common denominator, because that is the kind of government we have. There are the disadvantaged, but there are advantages to be had, there are opportunities that we can build. There is an economic sector crying out for action and industrial strategy that should be put forward by this government. There are employment opportunities that should be made in the private sector and condoned by a government that really cares. It is no answer to say "you are going to spend money," when so much money is being wasted.

If there are some hon. members who have not seen a copy of that book, I would suggest they read it. It is important that we understand that there has to be a program with respect to spending and, indeed, there must be with respect to approaches to programs. That has not happened here.

As a result of this waste, senior citizens right now are saying, "I have inadequate housing; I don't know how I can make ends meet; I have to give up my home." Veterans come to me and say—and this is not unique to myself—"I am having trouble. Would you see what you can do about having the Pension Commission look at my pension?" Young people come to me and say that they want to work and they want opportunities to use the skills we asked them to get so the world would be their oyster, so that we would benefit from their learning. In the face of all this the government—leaderless, directionless, listing and drifting—allows these opportunities to pass by, and these people who are disadvantaged remain disadvantaged.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thank hon. members, Mr. Speaker. I will not indulge the good intentions of the House any further except to say, sir, that there is a challenge in this country to be met and there is a government inadequate to the challenge. It is important that these programs, and the funds that are available for the programs, be utilized in a fair, honest, and unwasteful manner. The government has demonstrated that it is absolutely incapable on all of those counts.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with Bill C-10 the first thing I would like to say—and it has been said on a number of occasions—is that the government really does not want a comptroller general. There is no question that ministers were dragged, kicking and screaming, and that it was forced upon them as a result of the effectiveness of a very alert opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I hear hon. members laughing. The fact is well known. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who talked somewhat at length about a book entitled "A Legacy of Spending." It is an indictment of the way this government has misused and misappropriated the public purse.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton was right when he indicated that we need a comptroller general that will get involved with the Canada Council. It seems to me that what they are doing, with the acceptance of this government, is condoning undue exploitation of sex, vulgarity, indecency, filth and depravity. At the same time—and it has been mentioned by many members, particularly of late by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton—we turn a deaf ear to our veterans, and our widows.

What has happened to those who were able to become involved with the spouse's allowance? The government says, "Here is money because you are now 60"—and up to 64—"and married to someone who has the old age pension." But the moment that person, who is entitled to the old age pension, passes away, this government in its callousness and cold disregard for those who can least afford to be hit so hard, says it is going to take this money back. Yet, it condones dirt, filth, and thinks that this will be accepted by the Canadian people. Canadians want to know the priorities of this government. How can the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) stand up and say, "Well, I can't do anything about it; the Canada Council is an autonomous organization set up by parliament"? Surely, every now and again this government must take some leadership and must give some leadership.

I do not buy this bit about autonomous groups frivolously wasting and spending the taxpayers' dollars without a minister being responsible. The sooner we bring on the election, whenever his lordship wants to call it, the sooner you are going to see a dramatic change in the way this country is run. It seems to me that their flimflam, their cover-up, is not being accepted any more.

An hon. Member: What is that word?

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Alexander: Flimflam.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Spell it for him.

An hon. Member: It is the first time I have heard it.

Mr. Alexander: What the Canadian people are looking for is some honesty.

An hon. Member: What about some facts?

Mr. Alexander: I hear the hon. member requesting some facts. He ought to know that as a result of the last Goldfarb poll the Liberal party is in trouble. That is why we have not gone to the people.

An hon. Member: Tell us what you can do.

Mr. Alexander: I certainly appreciate my weekends in Ontario, because when I go out west to Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, or Alberta they all say, "Do not waste your time out here because we are going to vote Tory, we are sick of the Liberals." They have always been sick of the Liberals.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Alexander: I heard my hon. friend say order. The people in the west say, "Go back to Ontario."

An hon. Member: Could we talk about the bill?

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member who represents Oakville should know that his time is extremely limited. I do not want to bring him into it, Mr. Speaker, but he asked to be involved in this debate.

An hon. Member: All our time is limited here.

Mr. Alexander: I thought I would put something on the record as far as his future is concerned.

We are dealing with Bill C-10, Mr. Speaker, and it is a frightening bill. It has only one clause, and bills of one clause must be questioned for their motives when the explanatory note merely brings into being the comptroller general. There is merely one clause, and the explanatory note says:

> The purpose of this amendment is to establish the office of the Comptroller General of Canada and to provide for the assignment of duties and functions to the incumbent of that office.

It is misleading because it does not provide for the assignment of duties and functions to the incumbent of that office. In no way can anyone read into it any particular assignment or anything that is close to an assignment.

When members of parliament see bills of one paragraph come before the House, it is necessary that they probe them and that they probe deeply, as we have probed. Once we give the government this bill, the comptroller general is gone as far as members of parliament are concerned. He will not be reporting to parliament; he will not even be reporting to an appropriate standing committee; but he will be reporting through the Auditor General. That is not acceptable to us and that is why we have attempted to give some idea as to what the responsibilities of the comptroller general should be and must be. We are not going to give this government a blank cheque.

This country has been very disturbed to discover that Treasury Board has lost control of the public purse. In the Auditor General's last report, and many other reports he has commented regarding the financial management and control by this government. I am not trying to say we are not not for the comptroller general, because we believe that this office is required in order to control public spending. The Auditor General said that the financial management of government departments, agencies, and Crown corporations is "grossly inadequate" and a "serious situation."

Although I support the legislation because it is surely a step in the right direction, I am concerned about the bill as drafted. The Auditor General had some ideas on what this bill should do. He spelled out quite specifically the functions and responsibilities of the comptroller general in paragraph 2.15 of his report for the fiscal year ending March, 1976, as follows:

His basic responsibilities would include the design, development, implementation, and monitoring of adequate systems and procedures to ensure that the form of estimates provides a sound basis for the government's budgetary system.

That is the plank that the Auditor General considered necessary—it is part of the criteria he wanted, and we in the opposition approved and tried to move an amendment to that effect.

In paragraph 3.10 of his report he stated:

The role of the Comptroller General of Canada should be to see that departmental systems function in this fashion, and to examine the estimates of departments, not from a resource allocation point of view, since this should remain the responsibility of the Treasury Board Secretariat, but to make sure that the underlying systems reliably reveal planned efficiency and economy and that detail is adequate enough for subsequent analysis of variations between actual and planned results.

That is what the Auditor General said, and it is he who gives us leadership. We do not have the expertise, so we have to call upon him. The government will not tell us anything because it is secretive and does not like the opposition or the people of Canada to know anything. That is why we have to call on the Auditor General to tell us. He gave us direction and we, if we are to be responsible, must follow it.

Reaction to what the Auditor General stated has been negative and vague, in my view. This legislation does not spell out the specific duties of the comptroller general at all. If the position is not given a clear, statutory mandate, it is my submission that it will be nothing more than window-dressing. It will be just a name. We will have no more assurance that he will be able to control the public purse than we had with Treasury Board, and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton indicated how much control we have had there when he read excerpts from "A Legacy of Spending".

In his 1975 and 1976 reports the Auditor General recommended responsibilities for the form of both the estimates and the public accounts. It is noted that the responsibilities of the comptroller general as described by the government do not presently include the form of the estimates, except to provide advice. They just want the comptroller general to be some weakling, without power and without clout. All they want him for is to give advice, and we know what this government does with advice—it just throws it in the wastepaper basket. I cannot understand the arrogance of this government. After ten years of arrogance you would think ministers would learn a lesson but they are insensitive.

The Financial Management Institute agrees with the Auditor General that the comptroller general should have direct responsibility for both the estimates and the public accounts. One challenge for the position will be to foster public confidence in the integrity of the financial information presented by the government. This challenge will obviously be more difficult if the comptroller general is responsible for the form of the public accounts and for consistency between estimates and public accounts but can only advise on the form of the estimates. Surely these facts point to the need to spell out the mandate of the comptroller general.

I want to emphasize that, as the legislation stands, it does not establish the position in the manner that the Auditor General proposed. One almost wonders why the whole project or problem is being dumped into the lap of the new Comptroller General. The government does not want to give him any assistance—it does not want to tell him what he should be doing—it does not want him to have any legislative clout. We must go along with this bill, however, because we feel it is a step in the right direction.

This party examined the Auditor General's report thoroughly and offered a meaningful amendment to this bill which could not be called offensive. It was couched in general terms and was not offensive to the Financial Administration Act, and would have given not only the comptroller general but the public an idea of what was intended with this new office. Without the terms of reference or the mandate spelled out, it is only window-dressing. We offered an amendment which read in part as follows:

(2.2) The Comptroller General of Canada shall design, develop, implement and monitor such systems that will ensure that

(a) the form of Estimates provides a sound basis for budgetary control;

What is offensive about a simple statement like that? It gives a direction in terms of budgetary control and provides a sound basis for it.

The next thing we said about the duties of the comptroller general was this:

(b) public moneys and assets are under effective custody and control at all times;

Is that offensive to Canadians, to the government, to the comptroller general, to the Auditor General, Mr. Speaker? The only sector to find that offensive is this government, this arrogant government.

(c) accounting procedures and financial reports conform to accepted accounting principles and standards;

What is so wrong about that? It is clear, meaningful and desirable, but the government decided it did not want it. It wants the comptroller general to be under its control. That is what will happen when this bill is passed.

We gave them another idea in this amendment in these words:

(e) satisfactory procedures measure the effectiveness of government programs;

Is that offensive, Mr. Speaker? Of course not, but the government wants to throttle the comptroller general and, if this bill is passed, that is what will happen because he will have to take orders from the Treasury Board. He will not be responsible to parliament. Mr. Speaker, I am getting sick and tired of agencies, Crown corporations, and even this government not being responsible to parliament, and the Canadian people are getting sick and tired of it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): They are going to get rid of them.

Mr. Alexander: I accept what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton just said—the Canadian people will get rid of this government.

We even went further in the amendment and indicated that if we had somehow or other stepped on the toes of Treasury Board, the secretariat or this government, they could put in the "Catch 22" phrase in the following terms:

and without restricting the generality of the foregoing shall perform such additional duties and functions as may be assigned to him by the Treasury Board.

What is wrong with that, Mr. Speaker? The government does not want it—it wants to flimflam the Canadian people, to govern in secrecy.

I was concerned about this, so I thought the best thing would be to ask the Auditor General what he thought of the amendment. The poor man has been listening to Treasury Board and the law officers of the Crown who wanted to talk about precedents—they claimed that this thing had never happened before and therefore they could not spell out the duties of a deputy minister. I say that is a lot of nonsense. This parliament can do anything it wants as long as we have an alert, an awake and responsible government.

● (1602)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: And the Auditor General is good, let me say that. All hon. members would commend him highly for the very significant role he has accepted and for the way in which he is discharging his duties. Thank goodness we have him. He is not afraid of these guys. The government whip has said he is an old friend of his. The whip in due time will have to determine whether he has any friends in Hamilton Mountain.

An hon. Member: Do you?

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Alexander: I do not represent Hamilton Mountain. The hon. member who is the Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs, I think—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to mention to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) when he referred to Hamilton Mountain that it seems to me in committee that Mr. Macdonell said:

I know that Mr. MacFarlane has a tremendous reputation in the sports field.

An hon. Member: Is that a point of order?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, do you know what the hon. member has just done? He has misled the House. I want him to tell me that he is reading that from some report or some committee hearings whereby the Auditor General makes a specific reference. I do not want to pursue it. But if he does not have it I want him to stand up and say that he is just joking and just trying to bring some levity to this debate. We do not need any levity because it is a very serious matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacFarlane: Mr. Speaker, this item is from the Committee Report on Miscellaneous Estimates. It appears at page 2:46. It is a very serious point and I was not joking at all. He said:

I know that Mr. MacFarlane has a tremendous reputation in the sports field, and he has used the analogy of two referees, referees of authority, and so on. This gives me an opportunity to clarify what it is I am trying to say because it is quite clear that there has been a misunderstanding . . .

Mr. Macdonell was clearing up a point where he had used the words umpire and referee, and the analogy which I had used in sports aided him in clarifying that he had not meant this at all, which is what this bill is all about.

Mr. Alexander: I wish the government whip would go back to sleep because he is being offensive at this particular time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest that all members of this House have tremendous reputations and I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) to get on with Bill C-10 and go back to work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I was trying to do until some of the smart-alecks on the other side intervened without any reason. This is not acceptable, and it is no cheap political trick. There is another dummy-dummy in the backbench; they are trying to get in. I did not mention anyone's name, so he is safe.

I will return to what I was trying to put before this House in terms of the edification not only of the other ministers but of the one sitting on the front bench. No one else cares about the bill. I am sorry, I see the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) as well, and the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand). Are there any more? We will not count the government whip. I will carry on with what I was trying to say concerning the Auditor General.

I went through each and every one of those particular subamendments that we found were required in order to make this bill more effective and acceptable. I do not want to take up the time of the House but I think it is necessary that hon. members should know. I refer to each and every one. I have just read (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). Because it is important I will read them into the record. I quote from the committee report on miscellaneous estimates, issue No. 8, Friday, March 17, 1978, at page 8:12: and page 8:13:

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Mr. Alexander.

MR. ALEXANDER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Auditor General. When you asked yourself those two questions, the why not and the why, it seems to me, and check me if I am wrong, you did not really throw out the window the suggestion that there could be some spelling out of duties and functions. You, and I say this with a great deal of respect, are interested in it, but I think what concerns you is the possibility that the Comptroller General's hands would be tied somewhat. Given the fact this is a new function or a new job, there are not new responsibilities, but there is the separation of them, what bothers me is that you indicated this type of function has never existed before. In the light of that I have a feeling that we around this table should at least give some direction and some indication of general duties and functions. I just want to read this to you because it does not seem to offend, if it is worded this way. It is purely a guideline which gives some indication as to what the committee thinks the duties and functions of the Comptroller General should be.

The Comptroller General of Canada shall design, develop, implement and monitor such systems that will ensure that

(a) the form of estimates provides a sound basis for budgetary control;

Without getting into whether you are for such an amendment, would you agree that should be a function? I will stop there.

MR. MACDONELL: Mr. Chairman, those words have quite a familiar ring to me.

MR. ALEXANDER: Right.

MR. MACDONELL: I have a suspicion that they are in my 1976 report.

MR. ALEXANDER: All right. So then, in other words, it is yes.

MR. LEFEBVRE: Is that what you call poetic licence?

MR. ALEXANDER: In other words, the answer is yes, sir.

MR. MACDONELL: Yes.

MR. ALEXANDER: Now, we will go to the second one.

(b) public monies and assets are under effective custody and control at all times;

MR. MACDONELL: Another effective ring.

MR. ALEXANDER: Is that another effective ring?

MR. MACDONELL: Indeed, it is.

MR. ALEXANDER: Right. That is number two.

(c) accounting procedures and financial reports conform to accepted accounting principles and standards;

MR. FRANCIS: This is House of Commons, dispense, Mr. Chairman.

MR. ALEXANDER: Dispense. May I have a yes to that one too, sir?

MR. MACDONELL: I like everything you are saying sir, very much.

MR. ALEXANDER: I am glad you like it, sir, because we are getting down to the crunch soon, you see. Now, the next one.

(d) expenditures of public monies are made with due regard for economy and efficiency;

No question about that.

MR. MACDONELL: I do not think I could write that better myself.

MR. ALEXANDER: So, I take it that the answer is, yes.

MR. MACDONELL: Yes.

MR. ALEXANDER: Okay. Now, the next one.

(e) satisfactory procedures measure the effectiveness of government programs.

MR. FRANCIS: You would make a very good speaker.

I do not want your job, sir. But we will see to it that if there is a choice it will be filled by someone who is equally as competent as you are.

MR. ALEXANDER: Excellent. Now, my last one is even more in keeping with what we are trying to do, particularly as we look at the clause in the bill. The last one and I think this is going to assist you greatly, sir.

MR. MACDONELL: I am all ears.

MR. ALEXANDER:

And without restricting the generality of the such other duties and functions which may be assigned to him by the Treasury Board.

That is taken right from the bill. I will ask you again, what is so offensive about that in the act?

Here is where we come to the meat of the issue. I want to be fair to the Auditor General. Even though he accepted what I was attempting to do, he had reservations because of what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) had to say, and I am not blaming the Auditor General, he is not a politician, he has a job to do. They told him, "Well, I don't know whether we can accept the motion put forward by the opposition because it is without precedent." Mr. Macdonell goes on to say at the bottom of page 8:13:

MR. MACDONELL: Mr. Chairman, I will put it this way. There is not a thing offensive to me in everything you have said. I think the offensiveness is apparently caused—I have asked these questions as long as two years ago—because as an amateur in this business of constitutional law, I have bumped my head into the whole principle of ministerial responsibility.

MR. ANDRE: The minister would still be responsible.

Mr. Andre is the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Macdonell goes on to say:

All I am telling the committee, sir, with respect to the answer that was given to me, is that it is not done that way. Again, I would declare my own bias. Anything that can strengthen control of the public purse, I am automatically for. I recognize and I did try to say that I find nothing offensive at all in this but I have to concede the point that it is certainly exceptional and people that admittedly know a lot more about parliamentary procedure and about how you do things legislatively in parliament say that you just do not spell out the detailed duties and responsibilities of an administrative official because the minister—in this case it would be presumably the committee of ministers known as the Treasury Board—are the people that are responsible to parliament for the administration of the duties aside from the act.

So the only reason we are not being shown any leadership is because the government is afraid. It is afraid to take that first step. I think that when we are treading new ground we should try to bring about some understanding of the need for financial management and control, and in creating this new office we can surely have the gumption to move ahead and not only establish the post of comptroller general but ensure that his views are to be respected.

Another thing that bothers me is this: after persistent prodding from this side of the House the minister did table something in March for the edification of hon. members. A request was made to him on Thursday, March 16, and in response he sent over a three-page document which gives us some idea what are the responsibilities of the comptroller general. But those duties are not set out in legislation. They will not be found within the Financial Administration Act. The government at its pleasure will determine those responsibilities. The part I do not like is this: parliament means nothing. We have no say in the matter. The government can lay down what the duties of the comptroller general are to be, and parliament has no role to play.

A dozen or more responsibilities have been laid out. We read, for example:

The Comptroller General would be responsible for the Treasury Board's interest in the following items:

1. Financial Officers—development and maintenance in conjunction with PPB and PSC of training programs for financial officers. Liaison with Personnel Policy Branch concerning the general level of financial staff within the government and with PSC, departments and agencies concerning transfer and promotion of senior financial officers. Representation on selection boards for senior financial positions.

2. Ensuring that internal audit procedures support the Treasury Board Secretariat's audit for compliance.

It goes on and on. Yet who will be in a position to know just what his responsibilities actually are? Mr. Speaker, we shall never know, because those functions can be changed and amended at the whim of Treasury Board. Is this what parliament really wants? I do not think so. The government determines the role of the comptroller general but does not want anything specific to be expressed in legislation. We are hoping that before this debate is over the government will have second thoughts and admit that what the opposition is proposing is capable of working, that it will not be offensive to the principle of the Financial Administration Act or to the responsibilities of ministers. After all, we are breaking new ground, and in these circumstances we ought to do all we can to ensure that the post which is to be brought into being will be effective and that it will carry some clout.

I placed a number of questions on the order paper in an attempt to ascertain just what the Financial Administration Act was all about. In all fairness I must say that the President of the Treasury Board answered my questions, but when I read the answers to two or three of them I became concerned. I found there was a certain amount of confidentiality attached to provisions of the Financial Administration Act which will be passed over to the comptroller general. What disturbs me is that the comptroller general, in terms of analysis, views and reporting, will be involved with matters which are confidential and, as a result, people will never know what is going on. Let me put on record what I had to say in the committee about this aspect, one which I particularly dislike. The relevant part of the record reads as follows—I am quoting from issue No. 10 of Monday, April 3, 1978, Minutes of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates at page 10:15:

MR. ALEXANDER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Minister, I placed some questions on the order paper back in January dealing with the Treasury Board's planning branch—some 19 questions. In two instances I have become a little concerned. You have done an excellent job in terms of answering most of the questions.

[Mr. Alexander.]

The minister was in attendance at that time so I did give him credit for what he had attempted to do. The record continues:

You have indicated that the planning branch terms of reference were to initiate and undertake studies of the effectiveness of selected government programs. When I get to questions such as, "What projects have been undertaken by the planning branch since 1970-71 in fulfilling its mandate?" your answer is: "The information requested refers to internal departmental projects of a confidential nature and cannot be released."

Question 7 is: "Which of these projects have been concerned with ensuring that programs are effective and that the desired results and benefits of the programs are being achieved?" The answer to that is: "The information requested refers to internal departmental projects of a confidential nature and cannot be released."

What is going on, sir, when we are talking about effectiveness?

MR. ANDRAS (PORT ARTHUR): Mr. Reid is Deputy Secretary of the Evaluation Branch which has now taken over this function. This branch will be working with the Comptroller General.

MR. ALEXANDER: Is that the same as the Efficiency Evaluation Branch?

MR. ANDRAS (PORT ARTHUR): Yes.

MR. ALEXANDER: Is that confidential too, sir?

MR. ANDRAS (PORT ARTHUR): I think you have just announced it, Mr. Alexander.

Mr. Reid.

MR. T. REID (DEPUTY SECRETARY, EFFICIENCY EVALUATION BRANCH, TREASURY BOARD): Mr. Chairman, the question is clearly put, and the answer was also quite clear, that in the cases in which the planning branch has done in-depth evaluations inside the Treasury Board Secretariat, those evaluations are done to prepare advice to ministers and that advice is confidential to the department.

That is my point. This is now being taken over by the comptroller general and the whole area will be confidential. Looking at this apparently innocuous bill it seems there are likely to be no problems. But it is dangerous. I continue to read:

MR. ALEXANDER: I see. Now we say that the efficiency evaluation branch, if I understand it, is going to be transferred to the "almost" office of the Comptroller General. Am I to understand then that the efficiency evaluation which will be done by him is as well confidential?

● (1622)

MR. ANDRAS (PORT ARTHUR): In some cases it will be, I think, Mr. Alexander.

MR. ALEXANDER: Well, how are we ever going to know how effective the Comptroller General is, Mr. Minister, when you refuse to spell out his duties by way of legislation and he is taking over a group that is going to be involved with confidential information? All I want to know is, where does a member of parliament happen to come in?

This is the sorry plot that this government is attempting to foist upon the Canadian people. We cannot have it.

There are two reasons why I find this bill offensive, but still I have to go along with it. Hopefully, the comptroller general himself will in due time stand up, be counted, and raise hell. I do not like the fact that the duties of the comptroller general are not spelled out. They are hidden, and he will be working in secret. Because of the devious approach of this government he will be covering up, even if he does not want to do that.

There is a problem regarding confidential information with which the efficiency evaluation branch deals but which will be taken over by the comptroller general. Is this fair, when we are talking about restraint? Is this fair, when we are talking trying to bring about some meaningful discussion by members of parliament in the creation of this new office? I say no.

I have tried my best to point out the problems associated with this one paragraph bill. They are enormous and frightening, and the government should not proceed in this way. It is hiding, covering up, and dealing in secrecy, and it is not fair that the new Comptroller General should have to face such a lot, knowing that if this government had the necessary intestinal fortitude, it could have accepted the amendment which we introduced earlier. That would have given some indication of what the job is all about and what we can expect of the comptroller general.

Perhaps I am just whistling in the dark, because this is a callous government which does not really care. As long as there are enough hon. members opposite to vote us down, they are not interested in meaningful and responsible amendments or submissions. However, I never give up hope. I have been here ten years, and every now and again a chord can be struck. Some hon. members opposite are laughing at me, and that is very unfortunate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are just getting started.

Mr. Alexander: It is necessary that we give leadership. In view of the way the government is spending, perhaps it does not want the comptroller general to have any clout or any teeth. As the bill stands, he will be toothless.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much time. I just want to plead with the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre). He knows the position of the opposition. As a member of parliament he knows what we are attempting to do. He knows that there is some merit in our position. He knows we should be moving in the direction the opposition wants this government to move. I know he has a speech to make. I will not say it has been prepared by departmental officials, because that would not be fair.

Mr. Lefebvre: I have it my hand.

Mr. Alexander: Just because it is written in long hand does not mean that it has not been prepared by departmental officials. However, I do not want to get involved in that because I see that the parliamentary secretary is getting sensitive and touchy. I do not want him to get touchy because I want him to understand and to agree that I have an exceptionally good point. I and other hon. members have attempted to put this point before the House for the edification of the Canadian people. I hope that on second thought, after listening to our cogent and important arguments, the government will accept our amendment. It would not have to accept it in its present form if there are technical difficulties with respect to drafting, but when the parliamentary secretary stands up, I hope he will move in that direction. If he does not do so, I will be extremely disappointed.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, if I say as much as the bill does, I will not talk for a long time: it will not take me more than two minutes to cover it all. Nevertheless I want to express my opinion about the principle of this bill under which the government would appoint a comptroller general.

The first time I read the title of the bill, even before I received a copy of it, I figured it would be quite a voluminous bill because I thought, and I still do, that the duties of the comptroller general would be of the upmost importance; I even consider they are more important than those of the auditor general because, in my mind, the auditor general's duty is to examine the administration of departments, to discover errors that have been made and to make parliament aware of these gaps, whereas I consider the comptroller general is more of a consultant, of a counsellor to the various departments and to the government. That is why the appointment of a comptroller general, as stated here, and I quote:

The purpose of this amendment is to establish the office of the Comptroller General of Canada and to provide for the assignment of duties and functions to the incumbent of that office.

Naturally, at first sight, nobody can be against the appointment of a comptroller general, but first we should know how the comptroller will be selected, what kind of man he will be. Will he be free in his actions or will he be bound to the policy of a party or that of a government? Mr. Speaker, this question always comes up in our parliamentary system. The bill says, and I quote:

● (1632)

The Governor in Council may appoint an officer called the Comptroller General . . .

Mr. Speaker, of course we would want an independent person, a person qualified to judge without prejudice the action and policies of the government, a person to be appointed by the minister or by the cabinet—in fact, this person will be appointed by the governor in council, that is by the cabinet. But are we to believe that they will select that person in the ranks of Progressive Conservative, NDP or Social Credit candidates? We all know the Liberals well enough not to expect them to do that, unless they pick someone from the Senate, but it is quite obvious that the people they send to the other place are no longer very useful.

Mr. Speaker, we know that election time is coming, some candidates will be defeated and every time I defeated lawyers in an election, they were appointed judges the next day. This is so true that at the last election I was invited to the swearing-in of the lawyer I had defeated. I congratulated him and told him publicly as he is a friend of mine: I should not be the one to congratulate you; it should be the other way around because if I had not defeated you, you would not have been appointed judge. He understood and replied: That is true, if I had been elected to parliament, I would not be a judge now.

Mr. Speaker, this is another case of such an appointment and I suspect that this is what will happen under this bill when a public servant is appointed by the party. We read in the bill that a person appointed by a party will play the role of advisor and counsellor to the government and the various departments. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this sounds false; this distorts the vocation of the public servant because he will be held in a strangle hold as many are now and as the government itself is held captive by financial interests.

If this person is to be appointed as a result of party pressures, we will have only what we can expect. I believe that it would be more logical to have an elected comptroller general. He could be elected in parliament by a majority of two thirds. This way I believe we could have a public servant who would be completely outside of political influences. I cannot believe that the 264 members of parliament could not find in Canada someone objective enough to forget party politics. I suggest this would be the best way to choose such a person, a person whom I consider somewhat like the defender of the people, like the ombudsmen who now exist in Canada and the provinces.

Of course, I believe that the responsibilities of the comptroller general are as great and even greater than those of a minister in charge of a department. However, I do not believe that it would be logical for the comptroller general to report to the auditor general. Under the bill, he would report to the auditor general rather than to parliament.

It is the auditor general who will evaluate his work and he will be asked to submit his report to him. But he should submit his report to parliament so that this institution may review it as it does for the auditor's report. Those two men will certainly not share the same bed. They will have separate responsibilities and they should not depend on each other because, if they are two friends and particularly two friends from the same party, they will forgive many things to each other.

As concerns the rights and duties of that comptroller general, as I said earlier I think that his duties are even more important than those of the auditor general himself. The comptroller will certainly have control over taxation. This comptroller should have executive powers and not only act in an advisory capacity. He will have the right to control taxation rates as well as the Canadian debt so that a government may not decide to multiply taxes and deficits as today. In the last ten years, we have only heard about taxes and deficits.

I think that if the comptroller could demonstrate to the government the adverse effects of this uncontrolled debt, it would be good for the health of the Canadian economy and beneficial to everyone. We should also control pensions, particularly old age pensions that are totally ludicrous. They are ludicrous because we say that our pensioners will get $254, but it is not true. They get old age pensions of $150 and $155 and the rest comes from welfare or the Saint-Vincent-de-Paul Society, as long as Canadians will not be recognized the right to a full pension because workers have to contribute to a full pension, but when it is time to collect the pension, they are given only 50 per cent of it.

A comptroller could show that to the public and tell the government to stop fooling the people. The pensioner is asked during all his working life to pay 100 per cent unemployment insurance premiums, social security premiums or pension contributions, but he is not told that, at the time of retirement, he will be entitled to only 50 per cent of a given insurance, the old age security and a few dollars from the Quebec Pension Plan. And if he gets more, the Quebec Pension Plan will take his old age security from him. He is not told that and to top it off he is offered a ludicrous basic exemption that makes him pay taxes even on his old age pension. I think that if the comptroller were here he could prevent the government from causing all those difficulties to our pensioners and it is absolutely necessary in a democratic system to have a man able to advise the government.

There is certainly no shortage of civil servants but I feel there is no expert to tell the government how to spend some of the subsidies. Sure, subsidies are granted by the Department of Employment and others, but how are they spent? I do not have enough time to go into that but I believe there is much to be said about the subsidies of the Department of Employment. Besides, people complain a lot about the way they are spent, and especially those of DREE.

For my part, I call that department the department for the distribution of subsidies to privileged people. It is a typically political department, 100 per cent political, where the money spent is the least profitable. We find small millionaires who became millionaires thanks to those subsidies; no control was exercised over those funds and we end up finding out that of the $400 million to $500 million allotted in subsidies by the department, only about some $200 million were wisely spent, that the other millions disappeared into thin air as dust would in the wind. If we had a comptroller such circumstances would occur less frequently and we would have a better idea of how the money is spent, that money, our money, our tax dollars are spent in Canada. We often get leaflets in which the government explains how our tax dollars are spent but there is a world of difference between what they say in those folders and what we see happening. If the leaflets were written by a comptroller and checked by the auditor general, I think that literature would inform the Canadians generally far better. Once again, it is not that I am against the appointment of a comptroller; it is just that I should first like to see the terms well defined, so that we will know where we are going with such a short bill which states only that we are going to have a comptroller.

● (1642)

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-10 is being considered, sometimes we lose sight of the bottom line of government spending. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) touched upon the fact that when we are considering the powers of the comptroller general, which hopefully will result in greater restraint on the part of the Government of Canada in the future, we must remember we are fighting for a minimum of expenditure at the federal government level in relation to the services and programs which are put into place. There must be a minimum of expenditure to ensure a minimum of taxation as far as Canadians are concerned.

In the six years I have been here the government has given great lip service to restraint from time to time, but in fact government expenditures have skyrocketed during the decade of our present emperor, which skyrocketing has resulted in an unbelievable tax load for Canadians. The impact of that tax load should be emphasized because governmental expenditures in Canada today are one of the most significant contributing factors to our relatively high wage structure and lack of competitiveness in world markets. Canada has become so loaded with governmental expenditures that approximately 8 per cent more of our gross national product is carried in the form of government expenditure than is the case in respect of our neighbours to the south. That 8 per cent translates to possibly $16 billion of additional government expenditure, compared to what it would be if our load were the same as that of our counterparts in the United States. I should like to bring that into perspective.

Often we forget that Canada shares a continent, and that we must stay competitive with our neighbours to the south. If we do not, the result will be huge trade deficits, such as we are experiencing at the present time. That shows up when the tax loads of American and Canadian families are compared.

The 1966 report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, commonly known as the Carter report, contained startling observations concerning the tax paid by American families compared to Canadians. In that year the Carter report pointed out that Canadian tax was approximately 20 per cent higher than the United States tax, which contributed to the exodus or brain drain into the United States, and that the inequality between the American and Canadian tax levels must be adjusted to ensure that it no longer existed.

Certain significant recommendations were made in respect of the tax load in Canada. Those recommendations were designed to ensure Canadian families ceased being overtaxed in comparison to their American counterparts. In 1978, rather than this difference being lessened, most regrettably we find, under the aegis of the emperor who has ruled this country for the past ten years, the tax load as a percentage in relation to the American tax load has widened.

I have had occasion to visit three chartered international accountancy firms in order to receive the benefit of what they are advising multinational corporations in respect of the tax impact when those corporations transfer employees to Canada. The information was startling. One chartered accountant informed me of the advice he gave one international firm. That corporation intended to send a Canadian back to Canada who had been working in the mid-United States. Prior to implementing that transfer, the firm asked what amount it would have to pay to that employee to ensure him the same take-home pay in Canada as he was receiving in the United States. The chartered accountancy firm advised that multinational corporation that its employee, who was being paid $27,000 a year in the American mid-west, would have to be paid $44,000 Canadian, if he were transferred to Ontario, in order for him to receive an equivalent after tax take-home pay.

I should like to refer to two other examples which will illustrate what I am attempting to indicate. There examples are based on the relative after tax positions of individuals residing in the State of New York and Ontario, Canada. In both of these cases it is assumed that the individuals have been transferred to Canada by their employers for a period of more than one year, and that their families will reside in Canada with them. Because the cost of housing in Ontario is higher than in New York, the employers agreed to pay housing allowances to compensate the employees. The agreed upon amounts are received by the employees in addition to their base salaries.

● (1652)

In short, and I hope this is understood by hon. members, these are not cooked figures, they simply are figures a chartered accounting firm gave a multinational corporation in answer to a request to show what it would have to pay an employee in Canada after transferring him up here to ensure that he would be as well off in Canadian currency terms as he was in the United States. Before giving the example I should mention that the chartered accounting firm made the observation that the employer would incur substantially higher compensatory costs in Canada than in the United States for the same services from the employee.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I see that the Leader of the Opposition has just come in the House and I wonder whether he realizes that by filibustering this bill, the opposition is preventing passage of a legislation dealing with the language spoken by all Canadians before the courts and which would allow them to be tried in the official language of their choice.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I do not think this constitutes a point of order.

Mr. Stevens: Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should never be surprised in this House, but it is one thing for a backbench Liberal member to be unconcerned, if you like, with the explosion in expenditures in this country from about $10 billion to $50 billion under the reign of the emperor who now rules the nation, but it is quite another thing for that same backbencher, ten minutes after my standing up to speak in respect of the tax implications of that explosion, to suggest I am engaged in some type of filibuster. Surely that is ludicrous.

What I am trying to point out is that one of the inherent problems we are living with in Canada is the result of the cost of government in Canada imposing a non-productive burden on Canadians much greater than is imposed on our American counterparts. This in turn is translated into higher gross wages in Canada, making us non-competitive.

This is a serious issue and, regardless of the wishes of the hon. member not to hear this, I intend to put some of these figures on the record. When a chartered accounting firm comes to me and suggests that I should be aware of the tax implications in Canada as compared to those of the United States when considering how we are to get back some of our competitiveness, then I think it is important to let hon. members and the people in the country know what are the figures about which we are talking.

The first example I want to give is of an employee by the name of Johnson who receives a basic salary of $19,700 in New York State. The company wanted to transfer Johnson to Canada and has been informed by its chartered accountants that he should first of all receive a housing allowance per year of $5,328 to compensate him for the higher cost of homes in Ontario and, secondly, that his OHIP payments should be included. It also suggested that the company must pay him what is referred to as a "tax equalization", which in short amounts to what the chartered accountants estimate the man needs in tax equalization to end up with take-home pay, after paying Canadian tax, equal to what he is getting in the United States. The amount of that payment is $3,968.

In total, to pay that employee doing virtually the same job in Canada for the company it will cost that international employer $29,380 compared to, and I emphasize this, $19,700 being paid in the United States. In short, by shifting one man to Canada at a wage rate of $19,700 the international employer must pay a difference of $9,680, or a gross salary of $29,380.

Let me point out how this works from the employee's stand point. His gross income in Canada will be $28,996. In Canada he pays taxes at all levels of $7,781, and receives an allowance of $5,328, giving him a net disposable income of $15,887. In the United States that same person with a gross income of $19,700 pays out $3,813 in taxes, giving a net disposable income of $15,887.

Just to summarize what I am saying, to give this man with a gross salary of $19,700 in the United States the same take-home pay in Canada of $15,887, he must be paid $28,996 here.

An hon. Member: Rubbish!

Mr. Stevens: I notice that certain hon. members on the other side have not joined in this debate, presumably because they have no concern about the expenditures with which we are concerned on this side of the House. Those hon. members have the audacity to talk about what the man in this example gets in Canada. Let me tell them that he gets in Canada—a lot less than he is getting in the United States at the present time.

Let me give another example. This chap is earning $35,460 in the United States. Before calling it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I just—

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. When I hear a small "f" front bencher wasting all that time to quote statistics to make a comparison with the United States and deliberately omitting to speak of the numerous social benefits we enjoy in Canada, I say that he does not put into practice what his party is advocating.—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follow: the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Regional Economic Expansion—Government action to assist areas of disparity; the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)—Finance—Measures to prevent dumping of steel beams—Definition of "fair world price"; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie)—Regional Economic Expansion—Cost-sharing of trans-Canada highway.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): First I should draw to the attention of the House, if you will bear with me for a moment, that the first five items on the order paper under private members' notices of motions were called and allowed to stand at the request of the government on April 17, 1978. In accordance with my ruling on December 5, 1977, and Standing Orders 19(1) and 49(1), these items can be stood a second time only by unanimous consent. If that unanimous consent is not forthcoming, the items will be dropped from the order paper. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to proceed with notice of motion No. 15 and that all preceding notices of motions stand, not at the government's request, but by unanimous consent of the House, in the hope that we might very soon proceed with Bill C-42.

● (1702)

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Yes, so agreed, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

ADVISABILITY OF PROVIDING INCENTIVES TO BUILDERS FOR USE OF SOLAR ENERGY DESIGNS

The House resumed, from Friday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Caccia:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of directing the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make appropriate changes in its lending policy regulations to provide incentives to builders and developers who incorporate in their building plans the use of passive solar energy designs and/or solar energy systems for space and water heating.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is very appropriate to deal with this motion today because on Wednesday of this week—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) on a point of order.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I had the floor when this was last before the House. However, I will relinquish the floor to my friend across the way, and when he is finished I will follow. I had not realized the bill would be on the list today, so I am not really prepared. I could be ready in five minutes if my friend from Guelph wishes to continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In order to recognize the hon. member for Hastings at a later date we need unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, presumably the hon. member knows his subject very well and we are quite prepared to let him go on with his speech. If he needs a few minutes to refresh his memory, we on this side of the House do not object to his speaking again a little later today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is unanimous consent.

Use of Solar Energy

Mr. Maine: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, it is very appropriate to deal with this motion today because Wednesday of this week has been designated as "Sun day", the day of the sun, a day on which we will be focusing attention on solar energy. I would like to say a very few words in support of the motion by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). I think it is a very important motion, that it should receive the attention of this House, and hopefully get consent to go to committee. We must encourage people in a very tangible, financial way to utilize solar energy in the design and construction of their houses and in innovations with respect to solar energy technology.

A recent example of solar energy technology being harnessed in a land base use—which should be a symbol to Canadians of what can be done and urge them to greater heights—is this solar energy, battery-powered electronic calculator that was made in Japan. It is a tremendous feat in technology. As you can see, it is very small, completely rechargeable, and powered by a solar battery located here. It is this kind of technology that is ahead of us and that will create jobs and make solar energy more applicable to life on planet earth and not just in space technology, as it has been used in past applications to date.

I do not see the encouragement for this industry in Canada. I do not see new ideas being utilized such as this electronic calculator. I have a few more examples, but I will be brief so as not to use much time in this private members' hour.

At the University of Toronto I recently observed an aluminum covered plastic in the form of a solar blind which would go up and down between two panes of window glass to act as a solar reflector thereby controlling the temperature inside a house. It was operated by a motor which was both triggered and repowered by solar energy. An area where solar energy is in use in this country, and which has been used historically a great deal in Europe, is in the use of shutters to keep heat in as well as control the amount of light coming into a building. Generally, normal shutters have to be opened and closed daily, but these could be both activated as well as powered by solar energy. There is sufficient technology in this country to develop and utilize such inventions through solar energy.

Another area for the use of solar energy is the controlling of lights. Solar energy could activate the lights in a building as well as power the mechanism that would turn them off and on at a suitable time interval. This would replace the usual timers currently being used which operate on a 24-hour-a-day basis using a great deal of electricity. Those three examples are just a few of the new applications that I can see for solar energy technology in the housing industry.

Solar energy would help to create new jobs, new industries in Canada. It is very appropriate and worth-while to support the motion of the hon. member for Davenport, and I do so.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): I apologize once again, Mr. Speaker, for not being aware that this was going to be coming up. The very few moments that I will spend in continuing with what I was saying on February 3 last have to do first with the question of support for this motion. I made it very clear that day that I intended, because of the manner in which these motions have been handled in the past, to talk it out, which I did. In so doing, however, I did not have enough time to put forward my support for the basic principle of the motion moved by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

One of the questions I wanted to ask that day was whether or not either the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), who is responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing, or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) would in fact give us some guarantee that the subject of this motion would be acted upon. One of the criticisms I had then, and continue to have, is the lack of support for renewable energy sources within this House. The information that I have is that the budget for the last full fiscal year was something in the order of $6 million. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) has said on previous occasions, "the government could spill more money than that in any given afternoon."

The need for energy from renewable resources has been well proven. Whether or not this motion in going to committee would give more support to that very necessary subject, is something about which I have a great deal of question. This motion—and I made the point earlier—merely asks that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation consider changing its lending policy to provide for extra loans. Unlike the United States, it does not provide for relief from the extra costs, or support for those who put in renewable energy sources.

On February 3 I had just arrived at the point of telling the House about a Mr. Ball in the village of Wellington, who has gone to the extent of spending approximately $20,000 to install wind generators powered by solar energy in his home, and other innovations for using renewable energy to heat and light his home. He has done an exceptionally fine job and, being a machinist, he has done all of the work himself, including the designing. This has brought his regular electric bill down to approximately $25 a month, but even reducing it by that much will not enable him to regain his $20,000 investment. There is just no way he could do it taking into account the interest he would have to pay on the money, yet no provision is made by the government to reimburse him for the savings in non-renewable energy resources that he is putting into effect.

It seems to me that we could follow the lead given by the Congress of the United States. There are a number of programs in effect there to reimburse individuals by way of better interest rates, better mortgages, and outright grants, if they are prepared to use renewable energy resources for heating or lighting their homes. I think even a heater for a swimming pool should qualify.

There has also been a great deal of study in the United States into various ways of using renewable energy resources. Several symposiums have been held to study the technology, and the information is readily available. Here in Canada, where the need for renewable energy resources is far greater, I have not come across any good information which would help people who want to use the resource. We have a problem with high unemployment, yet there is not a single program to encourage industries in this field, particularly small businesses, to become involved in the development and construction of parts and equipment necessary to the use of renewable energy in homes. At a number of home shows I attended recently, all of the technology came from the United States.

I have no quarrel with the motion of the hon. member for Davenport, Mr. Speaker, as I think it is time the government put legislation before the House to support the use of our renewable energy resources.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House but I should like to take a few minutes to express my personal support and that of my colleagues for this motion. It is not necessary for me to remind hon. members that we are still in the midst of an energy crisis. We have tended to become so used to the energy crisis that we may feel it has passed away. The fact is that in terms of non-renewable energy resources, particularly oil, gas, and coal, in that order, we are rapidly running out of resources. We also have fewer sources of hydroelectric power, and therefore anything which can be done to help this country face the energy shortages which will confront us in a few years ought to be done immediately.

The best estimates show that by the middle of the 1990's Canada will be spending about $5 billion per year on imported oil. This will create problems with our balance of payments and costs of production, and it could deliver a serious blow to our economic future. I think we have not been tackling this problem as seriously as we should. No one would suggest for a moment that there is any simple solution to the energy shortage or that a good fairy will wave a magic wand and the problem will disappear.

There will have to be a three-pronged attack, Mr. Speaker. First, we must develop other non-renewable resources—oil from shale or tar sands or heavy oil. We have to make better use of coal than we have done in the past.

The second thing we have to do is embark upon a much more ambitious conservation program to reduce consumption of energy. A good deal of the consumption of energy in this country is wasteful. We consume huge quantities of energy simply because it was cheap in the past and we took it for granted that there would be no limit on the amount of energy available in the future.

The third approach is the one which this motion touches upon, that we must begin immediately to develop the renewable resources. That may be energy from wind, from harnessing the tides, from thermal power, from putting shafts down into the earth and capturing steam, or it may be from capturing the greatest source of energy of all: the sun.

Development of solar energy is something like motherhood and patriotism—everybody supports it. But we really have not done very much about it, Mr. Speaker. Some experiments are going on in my constituency where a number of people are heating their homes using solar panels, others are using wind energy and some are using a combination of both. The government of Saskatchewan is financing construction of a house in which all the heating, lighting, and electrical appliances are powered by solar energy. This experiment will be very useful.

I have seen solar energy programs in Malaysia, Hong Kong, Singapore, and particularly in Australia, which has made great strides in developing solar panels. So far, however, we have only touched on the fringe of this subject.

We could do several things, one of which is mentioned in this motion. The government, through CMHC or any other mechanism it wants to use, could provide financial incentives for people building houses, and particularly for developers, to instal solar energy units in one form or another. That would give us an opportunity to see how they work, to compare costs, and to get people accustomed to them.

The main problem, however, is that we have not yet embarked upon a massive research and development program to produce an economic unit that would provide solar energy at a relatively low cost. The units which I saw are in Australia and which were being sold at agricultural fairs were relatively cheap by comparison to any solar panels that we buy here, but they were still fairly expensive.

I am convinced that if the government were prepared through the National Research Council and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to call in the whole of the electrical industry in this country and say to them, "Let us put on a massive program to produce a solar energy unit that will be the cheapest in the world", it could be done. Of course, it will cost money. But it will cost a great deal less than it will cost if we wait until the time comes when we do not have sufficient energy from other sources or if we wait until some major power, such as the United States, Japan or West Germany develops cheap solar energy and we have to pay a very high price for it.

I am sure that by 1990 there will be a $1 billion solar energy industry available to any country that has the foresight to establish the production of an economic solar unit. Canada can be the country, because there are many nations in the world which have warm climates and lots of sunlight, but they have no oil, no coal, and no gas. These countries do not have the technical know-how or research facilities to produce solar units themselves, but they would be prepared to purchase them if they could obtain them at reasonable prices from a country such as Canada.

I notice that the United States is already moving rapidly into this field. I am afraid that we will miss the boat. I hope that those of us who are supporting this motion, and I think we all are, will press the government to go one step further and not only provide financial incentives for the consumer to put in solar units but also spend the necessary money for research and development so that there are cheap solar units which we can purchase, manufacture, and export to other countries.

Sometimes we tend to spend money protecting and subsidizing industries which are on their way out. We ought to be spending money to develop industries which are in their infancy and which have a tremendous potential for the future. In my opinion, the solar energy industry is one where an investment by Canada at the present time would bring great benefits in the future, not only for our own people but for the export trade which we could develop.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of interest in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) in which he invites the House to tell the government that it should, and I quote:

> Consider the advisability of directing the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make appropriate changes in its lending policy regulations to provide incentives to builders and developers who incorporate in their building plans the use of passive solar energy designs and/or solar energy systems for space and water heating.

Mr. Speaker, the motion is worthwhile. It urges the management of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to devise plans enabling those who are involved in housing construction to provide for the possible uses of solar energy to heat buildings, houses and the water used by the people who live there. It seems to me that worth-while though it may be that motion places parliament in an inferior position towards the Crown corporation. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is a Crown corporation which receives the funds the Canadian parliament agrees to allocate to it no matter how many millions are involved and that corporation administers those funds. The corporation sets up regulations concerning borrowers, those who want to benefit from the National Housing Act and build homes in which Canadian families can live decently.

Mr. Speaker, we should not expect the impossible from management. They should not be put in a position where the population would see the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as being the Canadian parliament. Yet the fact is that this is pretty much the intent of the motion. Mr. Speaker, if we really want our Crown corporations to perform well, they should not be put into some kind of a yoke. I for one am quite in favour of using solar energy. For several years I have been a supporter of the possibility of using solar energy for heating houses and domestic water.

Mr. Speaker, I even attended once in an African country a conference of the Association of French-speaking parliamentarians. I remember how glad and pleased my colleague the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) and I were on that occasion to consider seriously for hours on end the possible ways and means to tap, collect and make better use of these sources of energy. The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine has just suggested something to me. Collect the energy and use it to meet the needs of the people. These nations have solar energy to spare, but they lack the technology to use this energy to pump the water they need. And the conference considered very seriously this problem and this possibility to use these energies which are made available to us by God.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to blame anyone in Canada, absolutely not. I do not intend to blame anybody but we have a housing policy which puts under a yoke those who need to go to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Of course, the corporation is responsible for the management of the funds which are made available to it and gives yearly accounts to the Parliament of Canada. The corporation lends at rates which force borrowers to refund three or four times the amount of the loan.

To have the right to own a house under the present policy, the borrowers have to sign a contract under which they agree to refund three or four times the value of the house. It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that there are now many more tenants than owners in our country because ownership is becoming increasingly impossible for a working couple with an average income under the onerous conditions for the refund of the loans or of the loan they can obtain to be able to own a house.

So, Mr. Speaker, under the present circumstances, it is obvious that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation feels obliged to impose obligations which are well beyond the repayment capacity of borrowers. And from year to year we see ever fewer couples prevailing themselves of this legislation and of the advantages which have been enumerated because they do not foresee the possibility one day of really becoming owners of the house they will have to maintain, in addition of municipal and school taxes and so on.

And this is why I say that in a normal society when one witnesses a phenomenon such as this when there are more tenants than owners, it becomes a source of concern. When a man owns a property it is like his little homeland. He is prepared to make all the necessary sacrifices to ensure the protection of his rights. It is his little homeland and he is prepared to accept any sacrifice to make sure it is truly his. When the majority of people in a country are not made owners but simply tenants, unfortunately—and history has shown this, the past bears this out—people are not interested in defending their homeland against attacks that may come from all sides. They let themselves be carried by ideologies and are prepared to accept anything, because they do not believe they could be worse off.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I find that the hon. member's motion is timely because we also have in Canada that opportunity of working to discover more fully the resources of the sun—solar energy. I understand that in recent years the government of Canada—and I say this with pride—has made efforts to carry out research to discover the possible uses of solar energy so as to reduce the cost of maintaining a house, and more particularly when it comes to heating water and keeping our houses warm, something which our climate has made necessary in this country.

Mr. Speaker, even if unlike the countries of Africa we do not have the advantage of enjoying a scorching sun all year round it is still possible to allocate more money to trying to find the necessary means for storing solar energy. It could be used advantageously by future home owners to reduce their costs, with the resulting advantage of being eager to have access to ownership and saying with pride, I own part of my homeland.

Mr. Speaker, that is the pride we have to transmit to our children if we want them to be really responsible citizens. Or, in short if we want them to be able to fight to protect their rights and the freedom that will enable them to enjoy the rights which come with the ownership of a piece of property. Mr. Speaker, that is why I think that the motion of the hon. member for Davenport is so timely. I know the House gives its unanimous consent to directing our research work in a serious way towards the use of solar energy. Mr. Speaker, I would not like us to find ourselves in the kind of mess we have been in for 50 years.

The energy of our rivers and of all those natural resources fell under the control of corporations which developed those resources to make profits and not to provide services. I consider that it is the responsibility of parliament to vote the necessary funds to carry out further research which could be valuable for Canadians instead of leaving them in the hands of those who can eventually centralize and cash in on those energies to make more profits and take unfair advantage of the people. Let us be careful.

Past experience should compel us to take steps and make parliament truly responsible, which would enable our researchers to work efficiently and submit practical proposals. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) would thus be able to make solar energy available to all Canadians at prices in line with the ability to pay of each individual who wishes to gain ownership. This is why I seriously support the motion of the hon. member for Davenport, while suggesting that if one day the objective aimed at in the motion is attained, it should be beneficial to all Canadians.

I am concluding my comments so that this motion may be passed, because I do not want it to be said that I killed it as it has unfortunately happened too often in the past. I am in favour of life, Mr. Speaker, I am not a murderer. I am anxious that steps be taken so that all the assets given us by our Maker are made available to all mankind.

● (1742)

Mr. Ross Milne (Paliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as a person who has engineering training and who had some responsibility for the design of buildings a few years back, I want to support this motion and to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), for putting it forward. I was interested in the building trade at the time when new or adequate insulation standards were introduced, and perhaps by virtue of that I have some understanding of the enormity of the task of getting common acceptance for the use of solar energy in every-day housing and in other applications.

I want to comment on the positive role that the National Research Council has been playing in co-ordinating research effort and in advancing the state of the art. I hope that with the passing of this motion and in subsequent action on it by the government not only will the financial aspect of this motion be supported but also that recognition will be given to the fact that this is another problem which has to be addressed before there will be any wide scale acceptance of solar heating in mass produced housing.

Builders are reluctant to use new methods unless it is demonstrated to them that they are reliable, that they perform well and that down the road they will not be plagued with operational problems which will interfere with their business. The only point I want to make is that there is a large role for some government agency—I am not just sure which one it ought to be—in doing the innovative work for the early adapters, and in making sure that design work is done and that this new method is promoted. I do not mean to be negative toward people in the building business, but very few of them are prone to spend very much money or time to design new and innovative designs or to try out new ideas, and it seems to me that this is one of the roles that the government will have to play. It will have to do the engineering, the verification and the product testing so that people buying can be sure that the product is reliable and that its performance will be good. In addition to making appropriate changes in lending policies toward the application of solar energy, I hope that there is recognition that there is a large design, selling and demonstration job to be done.

I would like to put on the record the good work the community college in my riding is doing at the present time. It is putting together an alternative energy source house to demonstrate not only solar but also many other types of renewable energy approaches which can be used. I think this type of thing, along with the intent of this motion, will further the art.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I suppose there is unanimous consent to let you say that it is six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Does the House agree?

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 5.47 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cullen (for Mr. Andras) that Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At five o'clock the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) had the floor.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as you have said, at five o'clock I had the floor and, you will recall, I was pointing out that as the result of the expenditure explosion which the federal government has permitted to occur in Canada, a very unhappy level of taxation has been reached. It means that the average Canadian family are paying substantially more in income tax than their counterparts in the United States.

I pointed out that this has resulted in Canadians being enticed to some degree to emigrate to the United States where they feel they bear a lighter tax load or, conversely, it means that Canadians who stay in Canada demand exceedingly high gross wages so as to have the same take home pay as they would if they were living and working in the United States. This is of particular concern to Canada today when we have lost a certain competitiveness in relation to our main trading partner, the United States.

If I could summarize, I am saying that as a result of our tax system and, more important, as a result of present expenditures paid either through direct taxation or by debt, we now have a much greater imbalance than was the case even 10 or 15 years ago between the tax load in Canada and that in the United States. I pointed out that a person in the United States earning a basic salary of $19,700, according to one of the largest accounting firms in the world, would need to earn $28,996 in Canada to give him the same take-home pay after tax. To carry the example further, a person in the United States earning $35,460, according to the same international accounting firm, would need $53,714 simply to get the same take-home pay after tax in Canada.

I think that that type of dramatic evidence should be enough to arrest the propensity that the government has shown for spending. Surely every day that we question the government on the flight of capital from Canada to the United States we are touching a nerve; we are touching something that is very undesirable. But when you add the fact that it is not only capital that is leaving but some of our best, most highly trained professional people, people who are moving because they feel that the tax load which they now have to bear in Canada is unbearable, the situation is all the worse.

Another international chartered accounting firm has given me the benefit of a schedule that they sent to one of their international clients in which they gave a tax equalization comparison for 1967, comparing a person who lives in Ontario with a person who lives in New Jersey, U.S., assuming these persons have a $20,000 salary, a $40,000 salary and a $60,000 salary in each country. This breakdown indicates that the person earning at the $20,000 level pays $1,000 more tax in Canada, compared to his counterpart in the United States. In short, that person would be required to pay $3,708 in Canada, compared to his counterpart in the United States who would be required to pay $2,734. The person earning $40,000 would pay $3,900 more taxation in Canada than in the United States. The person earning $40,000 in Canada would pay $12,369, compared to his counterpart in the United States who would pay $8,472. The person earning $60,000 would pay $6,400 more taxation in Canada than in the United States. In short, he would pay $22,737, compared to his American counterpart who would pay $16,330.

Now that the emperor has had ten years to place this burden upon Canadians, surely that heavy burden is evident. A significant thing which leads to this imbalance regarding tax load is the fact that the American counterpart has many more deductible items to subtract from his income before he pays taxes. More importantly, the tax load in the United States does not have to be as high. In fact, it is roughly 80 per cent of our tax load, because their expenditures are not as high. With regard to the gross national product, all governments in the United States take 35 per cent, whereas the governments in Canada take 43 per cent. The 8 per cent difference is borne by Canadian taxpayers. The bulk of that difference is an unnecessary charge.

Once again I should like to refer to the 1966 report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, usually referred to as the Carter report. Page 158 of Volume III reads as follows:

> For many Canadian workers, the market for their services is continental, not Canadian. This is especially true for highly skilled and professional employees who are increasingly sought by United States and other foreign employers as well as by employers in Canada. The so-called "brain drain" from Canada has been widely noted and deplored by many observers. We are anxious that the Canadian tax system should not contribute to that drain.

It continues:

> We are, however, concerned with reducing Canadian taxes on skilled workers and professionals to the point where there are no major tax incentives for emigration to the United States.

Then it refers to various examples, such as I have given, in respect of comparative tax loads. It concludes as follows:

> . . . taxes are substantially above the average for the respective countries. As can be seen from the data given in the table, income taxes are higher in Canada in all examples.

The Carter report found evidence of a tax imbalance, and it made recommendations as to how a new equality could be arrived at between the Canadian tax level and that of our neighbour to the south. Unfortunately the government only listened partially to the recommendations contained in that report, the net result of which is that the imbalance has widened rather than narrowed.

This brings me to the following crucial question: Why has there been such an explosion in government expenditures? I hope the Comptroller General, when he takes office, will do something about this explosion. This explosion is evident when one considers the government as an employer in our economy. In an earlier speech, I referred to some figures which I should like to give again. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) was almost hysterical because he was embarrassed by the growth in the public service since the government took power. I should like to refer the President of the Treasury Board to the 1977-78 publication of the National Finances. At page 82 it is spelled out clearly why we are living with the expenditures of today. This publication was put out by the Canadian Tax Foundation, and reads in part as follows:

> The increase in the number of employees is a striking indication of the growth that has taken place in the size of the government during recent decades. In March 1925, when figures were first published, federal government employees numbered 39,000, compared to 121,000 at March 1946 at the beginning of the postwar period, and 580,022 at June 30, 1977.

I am glad Your Honour was seated when I read those figures. Is that charisma in action? Perhaps the Economic Review tabled on Friday fills in the other gaps, which explains why expenditures have risen so dramatically. In this connection, I refer hon. members to the Economic Review dated April 1978. At page 88 they will see how the deficit has been allowed to grow in Canada during the ten years the emperor has ruled us. The federal government deficit is shown as being $7,343 million. During the 1960 to 1970 period, the average surplus was $80 million. Thus, we came out of the 1960 to 1970 decade with an average surplus at the federal level of $80 million, arriving at a deficit of approximately $7.3 billion last year.

Perhaps Liberal backbenchers have been told in caucus not to worry about that deficit because it is a hangover from the unemployment problems, and that if the economy increases at its potential growth rate, that it will disappear. The figures I have referred to put the lie to that claim on the part of the government. Even if full employment accounting is used, this government is in a deficit position. For example, in 1977, even if the cyclical adjustment is taken into account, the deficit will be to the tune of $4.4 billion. Mr. Speaker, that is very, very serious. In its own Economic Review, the government admits that if this country were back to full employment the deficit would still be $4.4 billion. Surely the need for an effective comptroller general is evident. It is not only the impact of these deficits that is important for consideration, but the fact that the deficits must be paid in order to avoid incurring additional debt, either foreign or domestic.

● (2022)

Again in this regard we have some startling figures. We find at page 89 of the same Economic Review to which I have referred that the total net debt of the federal treasury in 1976 was $15.5 billion, while in 1978 the report shows the debt to be $40 billion. In fact, the report shows a jump of almost $11 billion between 1977 and 1978, and those figures are taken from the Economic Review of the Department of Finance.

Let me refer to the gross figures. The gross debt this year will be $77.8 billion, compared to $28.4 billion when the emperor first took power in Canada. These are some of the reasons I earnestly hope those on the government side will bring pressure to bear to ensure that the comptroller general is given a mandate which will be in truth meaningful as far as expenditure control at the federal government level is concerned.

Another interesting table in this Economic Review, which I am sure you have noted, Mr. Speaker, is Table 42 appearing at page 168 of the April issue. You will note here a sharp contrast between government price increases and the consumer price increase. I emphasize this because the government likes to represent that somehow or other inflation has been caused by labour, big business, the provinces or foreign disturbances and things of this kind. What the government rarely points out, although it knows this is true, is that the government has been in the vanguard in respect to increasing prices in the last ten years.

Table 42 points out the implicit price indices, which are the broader indices, rather than the consumer price indices. For 1968 this shows that personal expenditures on consumer goods and services, taking 1971 as 100, in 1968 stood at 90.8. That is on the personal expenditure side. On the government current expenditure on goods and services side the figure stood at 82.8. However, in the last ten years there has been a dramatic increase, not so much on the personal expenditure side as on the side in respect of government expenditures on goods and services. We find that this jumped from 82.2 in 1968 to 191.30, and again I emphasize that this is the implicit price index put out by the Department of Finance covering government expenditures as far as price escalation is concerned. In other words, based on the 1971 implicit price index for government expenditures the jump was well over 91 per cent. During the same period personal expenditures jumped from 90.8 to 158.

To express that based on the 1971 year equalling 100, we find that personal expenditures as far as price increases are concerned went up by only 58 compared to government expenditures which went up at the rate of nearly 100. When we consider the role of a comptroller general in this country we must bear these facts in mind. The truth is that it has been government expenditure, not only in volume but in actual prices, that has put this load on the taxpayer. Not only has there been an increase on the unit side; actual prices have skyrocketed as compared to price increases on the personal expenditure side.

I touch upon these points because I feel it is often overlooked, when we are thinking in terms of the weight of expenditure, who eventually pays the bill. There is no way the government can spend money and not pay, any more, Mr. Speaker, than you or I can. The fact is that when the government spends it must either pay for that expenditure through taxation or by borrowing money, which means the government is asking generations down the road to pay for those expenditures. Or it can take a third course, which this government is wont to do, and that is counterfeiting or printing more money in order to create a balance. That, of course, leads as much as anything to the inflation which this government likes to decry so much.

If that is so, that surely points out why it is absolutely necessary and essential that we get a better hold on government expenditure, and that is why I believe the move toward the establishment of the position of comptroller general is a welcome move; but only if he can be given the mandate he needs to do something effective in controlling these expenditures.

I recommend that hon. members read another Canadian Tax Foundation publication put out in January of this year entitled "The Expenditure Budget Process in the Government of Canada". It is authored by Douglas G. Hartle, professor of economics at the Institute for Policy Analysis, University of Toronto. He served as deputy secretary to Treasury Board from 1969 to 1973. Various comments are made in this little booklet concerning the budgetary process as well as the expenditure process in Canada. This was before the comptroller general idea came into being. Mr. Hartle points out that he hopes the Auditor General might be able to do certain things in order to get a better handle on the type of expenditure we have been discussing during this debate. At page 118 Mr. Hartle states:

> To this end we propose that the Auditor General report to parliament annually on each program or project for which he carries out a financial audit. The report should answer the following questions.
> 1) Has the department or agency specified the criteria by which it wishes the efficiency and effectiveness of this program or project to be assessed?
> 2) If so, have these criteria been made public?

3) If they have been made public, what is the reference?

4) If they have not been made public, what reason or reasons does the department or agency give?

5) If the department has specified the evaluative criteria—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I would gladly yield the floor to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) if—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I definitely heard a "no" and I recognized the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen).

Mr. Friesen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As much as I would like to defer to my colleague the hon. member for York-Simcoe, I can see that government members recognize quality when they see it and are waiting for what I am going to say.

An hon. Member: We knew you would be next.

Mr. Friesen: I am glad to have an opportunity to contribute to the debate on this bill that will introduce a new member to the government bureaucracy, namely, the Comptroller General. All hon. members have heard the story that a drowning man sees his life pass before him as he is going down for the third time. The government is going through that experience right now. They are about ready to meet their Maker, and seeing their whole life passing before them, they are engaging in a little bit of deathbed repentance. That is better than no repentance at all, but I wonder just how genuine the repentance is if it comes at the last minute. It is like the boy who when he was falling over a cliff said "Lord save me"; and just then his clothes caught on a branch, whereupon he said "Never mind, Lord, the tree has got me". That is the way the government feels about repentance.

● (2032)

The provision for a comptroller general is a kind of commentary on the government itself. While we on this side called for the creation of this office in the government, I do find two very serious shortcomings in the way the government has brought this bill forward. First of all, it has nothing to do with the establishing of the levels of the budget, and the government can tax all it wants in spite of the creation of this new office. It can continue to tax the Canadian people, and the comptroller general has no control over that. If the government has any kind of self-control or sense of feeling for the Canadian people and the weight of the burden they are already carrying in taxation, there would be no need for the office of comptroller general.

What we need is a little historical sketch as to where we have come in the institution of parliament. Many centuries ago it was the king who had the ultimate, total and absolute control over the powers of taxation and spending. He could act according to his whims, and it was not until the barons got hold of him at a place called Runnymede, England that they began to limit the exercise of his powers. Some time after that the House of Commons began to limit the powers of the king and say, "Look, you are going to have to come to us before you can exercise those so-called unlimited powers." Parliament then began to limit the taxation powers of the king.

Today, we have the emperor opposite, as he has been described tonight by the member for York-Simcoe, who feels that it is his prerogative to tax the Canadian people as much as he wants, and it is the prerogative of the Canadian people to pay without murmuring. That is noblesse oblige to do that. Over the centuries parliament began to control the taxation and spending powers of the king, but in one fell swoop over the past ten years the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been able to undo all the progress that the House of Commons was able to establish over the centuries.

We now face a government headed by a Prime Minister who feels that the only limits that ought to be exercised are the limits of endurance of the Canadian taxpayers and that they ought not to squeal. The government's principle is to tax as much as possible rather than as little as possible. Having taxed as much as possible, it is then the responsibility of the government to spend as much as possible rather than as little as possible.

I noted with interest that Pat Carney, one of our economists in British Columbia and now one of our candidates in Vancouver Centre—and who is going to turf out that Liberal who wants to make it—has said that the country is facing a potential taxpayers' revolt. I can understand that. The one who wants to be the Liberal candidate, the former mayor of Vancouver, illustrated Liberal economics very well in the way he is going for the nomination. As Pat Carney pointed out in her speech, he bought ads for $1,900 in major Vancouver newspapers which go all over the province—and obviously most of the readers are not eligible to vote for the man in Vancouver Centre—to get himself nominated in Vancouver Centre. That is the way the Liberals look at things.

I read an article in the Globe and Mail this morning about what one of the government backbenchers is experiencing in the city of Toronto, and that article said:

> But, according to one senior Metro-area Liberal MP who has spent the past three week ends knocking on doors in his suburban riding, he doesn't need a public opinion poll to tell him that "it's turned to jelly in the past two months."

That is, the decline in support for the Liberal government.

> The decline in Liberal support in his riding is palpable, he told a reporter over lunch, and he wasn't the least surprised that Mr. Trudeau and his advisers are attempting to get another reading of the lie of the land.
> His constituents are expressing a general feeling of irritation and concern, a lack of confidence in the way things are going in the country and in their economic prospects, he said. This is, coupled with an increased antagonism toward Mr. Trudeau.
> To his surprise, this feeling includes an element of distrust, and when he probed for the reasons, Mr. Trudeau's flip-flop on the issue of wage and price controls was often cited.

The problem that we are facing in this country is that the government feels it can do anything it wants; it can make any promises it wants, and it does not have to deliver those promises if it does not want to. The taxpayers of Canada, as I have said, are going to revolt and change all of that as soon as the Prime Minister screws up his nerve. There has to be a limit to taxation and spending in our country.

As constituted in this legislation, the office of comptroller general really does not deal with the issue of the level of increase in the budget. In the past few days the papers have been reporting the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is raising another $700 million in West Germany by a bond issue. Canadians are concerned about the interest that it is going to cost us in addition to the 12 per cent or 15 per cent that we are going to have to pay in exchange rates on that loan. The bill does not provide any kind of priorities in the way the budget is established.

A few months ago I went to visit a constituent of mine in Crescent Beach. I went to his office, and I spoke to his wife who was running the office because the gentleman cannot work any more. He is a veteran of World War II who was captured by the Japanese and held in a prisoner of war camp in the South Pacific. Many of the prisoners of war in those South Pacific camps suffered from malnutrition. When he came home he was emaciated, but after a little fattening up he looked all right, so veterans affairs discharged him.

Now, 30 years later, he is suffering from ancillary diseases resulting from his malnutrition during the war years, and he would like to get a disability pension. However, the government have an austerity program in operation and they just cannot afford the extra dollars that it would cost to give this man the kind of disability pension that he deserves. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) says that these men will understand very well because they are good Canadians; they will understand that we are on an austerity program and the government just does not have the money.

All the understanding in the world, regardless of how good these men are as Canadians, does not fill their stomachs. They still need that money to live on. Think of that, Mr. Speaker, and then think of the fact, as has been outlined in newspaper reports brought to the attention of the House last week, that the government has every intention of paying the $10,000 fine that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) incurred as a result of slandering one of his civil servants. The government is not only going to pay the fine but also the legal fees to appeal the decision. There seems to be all kinds of money for that but somehow there is not enough to pay those veterans who suffered in a prisoner of war camp and who would like to have another $150 or $200 per month—and deserve it.

Somehow our priorities are all mixed up, Mr. Speaker. Those who are able bodied—I will keep it at able bodied when I speak of the Minister of Supply and Services because I do not know if there is any ability in any other direction—but able bodied people like the minister get all the attention while a man who is totally disadvantaged, whose wife now has to run the business because he cannot, does not get the attention he deserves.

This bill, which brings into being another officer who supposedly controls spending, does nothing about the priorities the government is establishing. What happened to the austerity the Minister of Veterans Affairs spoke of? Where did this $10,000 come from all of a sudden? Maybe the government could print it. As I have said before, the United States has Fort Knox and Canada has the Reid Paper Company. That is just about the way we get our extra money. I think the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) was quite right when he said last week that the government pays the expenses which accrue to a minister in the line of his duty. Now it has obviously decided that slandering one of his public servants is in a minister's line of duty and so the government is going to pay the expenses.

This bill holds out the possibility—and only the possibility—that the comptroller general will have some influence in controlling spending within the already established priorities. The second major shortcoming I see in the bill is that the comptroller general will have no effective control over spending. It is a short bill, Mr. Speaker, only one paragraph, and that is one of the delightful things about it. I wish there was more legislation like that.

For an understanding of Bill C-10 we must refer to the speech made by the minister in this House on March 8 on second reading. Obviously if the minister made a speech in the House it is recorded in Hansard. Nevertheless, he took the trouble to have it copied and sent to each member of the House. I do not know why he had to go to that expense when we could have read it in Hansard. Referring to the position of the comptroller general, the second paragraph of his speech notes:

> . . . will be responsible to the Treasury Board for the quality and integrity of financial administrative systems and related practices and procedures . . .

You will note that he is responsible to the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker. Surely if the government is serious about controlling spending it would not mind if the comptroller general were responsible to the House of Commons or the public accounts committee. If they were serious about wanting an examination of how well they have lived within their means, they would not mind that; but perhaps the minister is a little bit nervous about letting the House of Commons look at the comptroller general's report before it has been dealt with by Treasury Board.

The next paragraph states:

> Since the comptroller general will report to the President of the Treasury Board and will represent a new and somewhat specialized organization serving the Treasury Board, . . .

Mr. Speaker, we do not need someone else serving the Treasury Board. What we need is a tyrant—someone who will ride herd on the Treasury Board, someone who will sensitize their conscience. We do not need a servant of the Treasury Board. The next paragraph reads as follows:

In my previous statement, Mr. Speaker, I outlined the main duties and responsibilities of this new position. As well as responsibility to the Treasury Board for the quality and integrity of the financial administrative policies, practices, and control systems, the comptroller general will also develop and maintain policies, procedures and practices necessary to evaluate and report upon the efficiency and effectiveness of government programs.

That sounds good, Mr. Speaker, but if you look at the premise upon which it is based it is that he is responsible to the Treasury Board for all his actions and reporting.

On page 2 of his speech we come across this statement:

. . . as the legislation before the House clearly indicates, the comptroller general would report to the government through the President of the Treasury Board.

Why not report to parliament? Why not to the House of Commons—to the public accounts committee? There it would get detailed examination and scrutiny. The sentence that really disturbs me, however, is this one:

The systems that will fall within the comptroller general's purview are intended to ensure that the government has timely, accurate and comprehensive information.

Is it to be his job to collect information and give it to Treasury Board? It seems to me that in business practice the job of a comptroller general is to stop spending, not simply to provide information—to say "You have gone as far as you can, go no further."

From the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board it looks as though it is his intention that the Comptroller General will simply provide information to the government, not stop it spending as it should be stopped.

One page 3 of his speech the minister says:

I want to reiterate that the introduction of this new office will not in any way change the responsibility of the secretary of the Treasury Board in the field of resource allocation.

There is nothing about priorities in this bill, Mr. Speaker. The comptroller general is not going to be able to tell a minister that he will get 3 per cent, 5 per cent or 7 per cent but no more. It is still up to the President of the Treasury Board and the other ministers to decide how much they are going to spend.

As the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) pointed out several times in this House, a pattern is developing in departments such as DREE, external affairs, secretary of state; we see a ballooning of their administrative expenses. This, of course, leaves less money to be used for the purposes for which the funds were intended originally.

The minister went on to say:

As I explained in detail to the Public Accounts Committee last April 26, the secretary will retain responsibility for the direction of the resource allocation and the control processes of funds; and ensure that they will not be reallocated without due authority.

So there will not be a recycling of funds. I welcome the limitation to be put on government in this respect so that unused funds cannot be put back into consolidated revenue or some other department. There will possibly be closer scrutiny of those one dollar items in the blue book.

Those are the two main concerns I have about the legislation, Mr. Speaker. There is no assurance that it is going to stop or curtail government expenditure in any serious way. It has nothing to do with the establishment of the levels of the budget and the amount of spending. It simply says that when the Cabinet establishes spending limits the Comptroller General will make sure that they stay within those limits. That is some kind of help. But as long as it is the cabinet which sets those limits, the needs of the Canadian people will not be met.

It appears to me from what the minister has said that there will be no real power in the office of the Comptroller General such as to seriously limit government spending. Therefore, while this is the best that we can get out of the legislation, to that extent I suppose we must support it. It is far short of what we in the opposition had in mind when we suggested that the government create this office so that there would be genuine control of government spending.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to speak on third reading of this debate. This matter has taken up a great deal of my time and concern since its first introduction into the House. While this debate is coming to a close, I think it is worth-while to remind the House and the country of the reasons for this piece of legislation and how it came about.

The House will recollect—and I hope the country will recollect and not forget—the Auditor General's report of 1975 in which he stated, and I quote:

The present state of the financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

This is the kind of audit which, if contained in the annual statement of a privately held corporation or a corporation trading on the public stock exchange, would result in the delisting of that stock by the provincial securities commission. It would certainly result in a fall in the value of that stock and it would result in any decent, self-respecting investment broker or banker ceasing to have anything to do with a business that received an audit like that.

There was a recommendation attached to that statement of the quality of the comptroller. It stated that a comptroller general, a chief financial officer, be established to monitor the control systems of government so that these types of criticisms would not be applicable in the future. The government's response to that was exemplified by testimony before the public accounts committee. I quote from page 18:3 where the then secretary of the Treasury Board was asked this question by a Liberal member of that public accounts committee, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson):

Do you not feel there should be a chief financial officer?

To which the then secretary of Treasury Board, Mr. Osbaldeston, replied:

No, sir, I believe a government governs and the government is responsible for doing so and is accountable to the country and it must discharge that responsibility. I say that very directly.

That was the initial response of the government. It said no, that its job was to govern. It is responsible to the people, and regardless of what the Auditor General says or recommends the government intends to ignore it.

In the 1976 report of the Auditor General, a year later, after further examination the Auditor General was moved to say:

Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and Crown Corporations audited by the Auditor General financial management and control in the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

I cannot comprehend any publicly held company remaining in business if it received an audit such as that. It would surely be driven out of business. Finally, after being told in such harsh terms as an auditor could possibly use, the government started to concede a little bit and said that they might consider the recommendation of the Auditor General and establish the office of a comptroller general. On April 25, 1977 the new President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras)—the former president of the Treasury Board who refused to accept this recommendation in the first place is the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien)—said that the government had decided to go along with the recommendation and establish the position of a comptroller general.

The government said that this comptroller general would have a special functional relationship with the chief financial officers, departments and agencies, but he went on to make it clear that the ongoing responsibilities of the secretary of Treasury Board would remain the same. In other words, he made it clear there would not be much change. He ended his statement with a bit of flimflammery of the type the President of the Treasury Board likes to use, namely, "we are endeavouring to give further evidence of our determination to maintain the highest standards of control." What an absurd statement, Mr. Speaker. The Auditor General said that the control standards were grossly inadequate. The President of the Treasury Board said that they will continue to maintain the highest standards of control. That is more flimflammery.

What is the responsibility of Treasury Board in regard to financial management control? The Financial Administration Act states that the Treasury Board has the responsibility for financial management, including estimates, expenditures, financial commitments, accounts, fees, or charges for the provision of services or the use of facilities, rentals, licences, leases, revenues from the disposition of property, and procedures by which departments manage, record and account for revenues received or receivable from any source whatever.

In other words, according to the Financial Administration Act, Treasury Board already has responsibility for the financial management and control of its departments and agencies, a responsibility which it has totally failed to uphold. For the President of the Treasury Board to say "we will maintain those standards" I say is absurd.

After the denial and dismissal of the Auditor General's recommendation of a comptroller general and the subsequent admission that maybe the Auditor General's recommendation had some merit, what do we get? We get a one-line bill which says there shall be created another deputy minister. That is all that the bill says. It is true that the deputy minister shall have a fancy name, that his name shall be "Comptroller General." But what is in a name, after all? If a rose by any other name is a rose, then a deputy minister by any other name is a deputy minister. All this bill does is give us another deputy minister and nothing more.

The Auditor General's recommendations set out in great detail a restructuring of Treasury Board and the types of functions, responsibilities and activities that the comptroller general will engage in. These are set out in paragraph 2.15 of the Auditor General's report of 1976. I will not repeat them because they are here for everyone to see. What the Auditor General recommended was a substantial restructuring of the Treasury Board with the specific responsibilities of the comptroller general spelled out.

Why is there nothing in this act to reflect that particular recommendation of the Auditor General? When one asked the minister about this, as he was asked repeatedly in the House and in committee, he said that they operate under a system of ministerial responsibility. He said ministers are responsible to the House for what their deputies do. In no way whatsoever. The government holds constantly to this principle of ministerial responsibility when it would deny the House of Commons access to information or deny it the right to take any initiative with regard to certain legislation. But when it comes to admitting that it has failed to exercise proper supervision over the expenditure of taxpayers' money, it is quite another story. Do we ever hear of ministers resigning in such circumstances? Not on your life.

What are the chances of success for the comptroller general? We on this side hope he is outstandingly successful, but if I were a betting man I would bet that his chances of success are next to nil. What are we giving him by way of authority to move into government and cure the ills which the Auditor General describes as horrendous? He will walk into an operation which has carried the responsibility all along; he will walk into a Treasury Board structure which has proved to be a total failure, without any legislative authority; in short, it is without any tools with which to accomplish the job.

He will, it is true, be given a set of guidelines laying out a general job description. I should like to mention just one item:

Design and implementation guidance with respect to systems of financial reporting, financial management and financial control to provide assurance that public monies and assets are expended with probity, economy and efficiency and that public monies and assets are under effective custody and control. Assessment of the adequacy of such systems in departments and agencies.

The key word here is "guidance". In other words, the comptroller general will not have the authority to instal systems of financial management and control which will work. He will simply provide guidance. He will, in effect, be some kind of co-ordinator or teacher. That is no authority at all, Mr. Speaker; he will be eaten alive. Those 500,000 civil servants who have been operating out of control, according to the Auditor General, will continue in the future as they have in the past. We are told that the minister will give the comptroller general the necessary authority, because the minister is responsible. But will the minister live up to that responsibility? I have not seen any president of Treasury Board resigning although the president of any company who receives an auditor's report similar to the one the government received would be gone within 24 hours. The fact is that the comptroller general is going into the den of lions with no weapons whatever.

What our party tried to do in committee and on report stage was to strengthen this position. I regret that at the report stage I was not able to be here to present my motion personally; I thank my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for doing so on my behalf. That amendment, had it been accepted, would, it is true, not have answered all the questions I have raised but it would have given the Comptroller General a certain legislative authority; he could have approached his task in the knowledge that the House of Commons had vested him with responsibility by statute to look after such things as the form of the estimates, the effective control of public moneys and assets, making sure that financial procedures and reports conform to accepted accounting principles and that expenditures of public money are made with due regard for economy and efficiency. He could have acted to see that specific steps were taken to measure the effectiveness of government programs.

A provision of this kind in the statute would have given him some leverage so that when he met the resistance which will surely be forthcoming he would have the necessary power to overcome it. It was a simple amendment and a reasonable one. Indeed, it contained an additional sentence—"that without restricting the generality of the foregoing he should be allotted such functions as may be assigned to him by Treasury Board." Had this amendment been accepted it would have made the task of the comptroller general easy. But it was something which the government was not willing to accept. Why? Because the government has no intention of changing things in any way.

The bill before us, the appointment of this individual, is simply window dressing for the benefit of the public. The government is trying to say: "Look, we are doing something about the fact that your tax dollars are being spent in foolish, inefficient and wasteful fashion; we have appointed the comptroller general." Nonsense, Mr. Speaker. They have appointed another deputy minister, that is all, and the same old gang will carry on just as they carried on before.

That was the only amendment we put forward in committee. Another had to do with the making of an annual report to parliament, through Treasury Board, which would stand permanently referred to the appropriate committee. In that way members of parliament would at least have an opportunity to examine the report on an annual basis, to question the comptroller general and to establish where he was meeting resistance with a view to backing him up should he need support. Again, we ran into opposition. The minister claimed that in accordance with our parliamentary traditions a committee of the House could not be involved in the manner suggested. To put it another way, it amounts to some sort of rude interference when members of parliament seek effective ways of expressing concern about the manner in which taxpayers' money is being spent. Such things, we are told, are the prerogative of members of Treasury Board. But when things are getting out of hand, don't expect the minister to resign. No way.

We also introduced in committee, unfortunately without success, a sunset clause. We agreed with the recommendation of the Auditor General that something had to be done about the fact that financial controls within government were nonexistent, but we also recognized that the course proposed might not be the answer to the problem. There is a possibility that it will not succeed. There is a possibility that costs may be too high. After all, imposing another central agency on such a huge operation like this may restrict the flexibility of the government. It may introduce inefficiencies in itself, and so we think it only wise that when we take a step like this and create a new office, a new structure and a new way of doing things, we put in a sunset clause so that five years, eight years, ten years or whatever, at some point in the future the House of Commons asks itself what it did five years ago, what it put in place at that time, whether it is working, whether it should carry on as before and whether it should be dropped, amended or changed. At some time we should look into it. To me that is the only responsible action.

However, again we ran into resistance from the government and from the minister. The minister said the government could not tolerate that kind of interference by parliament in the operations of government because, after all, parliament has no right to interfere in the operations of government; parliament should mind its own business. I have always felt that the business of parliament is government, but apparently hon. members opposite do not think so.

So it is with some degree of sadness that I see this stage of this bill nearing its completion. It is a nothing bill, really. It appoints another deputy minister, that is all, full stop. We obviously cannot be opposed to nothing, and therefore we are not opposed to this bill. But I hope the public of Canada is not deluded into believing that this piece of legislation is a response to the observations of the Auditor General with regard to the quality of financial management and control of Canada's taxpayers' money because it is not. This is a nothing bill which does nothing in terms of solving the problems articulated by the Auditor General some three years ago and which remain outstanding. Given the level of taxation in this country and the amount of money which is just wasted through inefficient practices, it is indeed a tragedy that we carry on as before and an even worse tragedy that we have such an irresponsible government.

In closing, let me repeat that we on this side wish the new Comptroller General well. According to my knowledge of his background, he is a person of exceptional qualifications, and perhaps he will be able to overcome the obstacles which will be put in front of him. I am not optimistic in that regard. If I were a betting man, I would bet that he will fail. I am saddened that we on this side of the House were not able to give him the legislative back-up necessary so that he could get to the root of the problems and improve the quality of financial management and control within the federal government. However, until the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) screws up his courage and gives the people of Canada an opportunity to do something about it, we have to live with the recommendations of that group opposite. Hence, it is our intention to let the bill pass at third reading with the realization that the job we face when we assume office will be that much harder.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in his concluding remarks the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) said that this is a nothing bill, and I do not know whether the Canadian public realizes just how much nothing there is in it. The bill purports to appoint an officer called the Comptroller General of Canada to hold office during pleasure. The bill goes on to say the following, "and to perform such duties and functions as may be assigned to him by the Treasury Board". That is the extent of the bill.

The explanatory note, which generally elaborates on the intent of a bill, says much the same thing, and then it says, "and to provide for the assignment of duties and functions to the incumbent of that office". As I see it, the explanatory note is very misleading. You would be bound to agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that to provide for the assignment of duties when there is no assignment of duties here—because the wording of the bill is "and to perform such duties and functions as may be assigned to him by the Treasury Board"—is a contradiction. There is a contradiction between the text of the bill and the explanatory note which I find more than a little disturbing.

I have forgotten just how many years ago it was—perhaps two or three—but I recall the circumstances under which the concept of a comptroller general came to the fore. It stemmed basically from a remark in one of the reports of the Auditor General to the effect that the accounts of the Government of Canada were in such a deplorable state—I am paraphrasing, but this was certainly the intent of his comment—that the day might come, and come soon, when the Auditor General would be unable to certify them as being accurate. That is a very serious indictment of the accounts of any organization, but for one which has a budget of some $42 billion, all of which is raised through taxation of the Canadian population or by other means, it is a damning indictment. It is an indictment of the accounting record of this government.

In addition to that background I remember one report in which the Auditor General recommended the establishment of the position of comptroller general. I think that was in the 1976 report. At that point that government stood up and said it did not need a comptroller general at all, that it had everything in hand and that instead of appointing a comptroller general it would appoint a royal commission of inquiry on financial management and accountability in the Government of Canada.

The government said that a royal commission would soon satisfy all the needs and allay all the worries of the Auditor General. That was the first reaction of the government. A commission was duly appointed. It was chaired by Mr. Lambert of the board of the Toronto Dominion Bank. There vere other members including a former public servant who was at the time the deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce. Time went on. I have forgotten just how much time passed. Then all of a sudden we understand that a selection process took place and a comptroller general was named. There was some questioning and prodding: Why this change from the royal commission approach, which was supposed to solve all problems, to what appears to be an acquiescence in or an agreement with what the Auditor General said? I do not think we really know the background on that story, unless it was that the government became particularly worried. However, what concerns me is that this turnaround is a mark of indecision and evidence of a lack of good financial control over accounts, and looking at the ten-year record of this government in financial terms and in parliamentary terms, I think the Canadian people have cause for serious misgivings about the promises and undertakings which are set forth in this bill. I would like to see it otherwise.

It was suggested by my friend who spoke just before me, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, that it was just the appointment of another deputy minister, nothing more. Certainly the powers that will be given to him are not now being exercised by the Treasury Board. They may or may not be those which were outlined by the Auditor General, and I shall come to them in a few minutes because I want to talk about some of them in particular terms. As I said, with the record of this government in the matter of ministerial responsibility, we have seen time and time again when the government has developed a new theory or a new principle, and I call the principle one of ministerial abdication. The government is prepared to slough off on to the public servant responsibility for acts which are properly the government's acts. So if the comptroller general does something wrong, it is his fault and out he goes.

This has been done in the case of the public servant, Mr. Stopforth, whose name, we find, has been cleared, although the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) defamed him in public. It is not one of the ministerial responsibilities to defame a public servant, and therefore it is not the responsibility of parliament or of the Canadian people to make good the judicial judgment at a trial covering that matter. It is the individual responsibility of the minister who has defamed the public servant to do so.

So in the matter of ministerial responsibility this government has shown itself to be utterly deficient. Let me recall that this government has managed to create just this year a deficit equal to the whole budgetary spending program the year it took office—that is, $10 billion. Is that a record of monetary or fiscal responsibility? Yet we are expected to accept that sort of bill as an undertaking to provide what is required according to the Auditor General. And I certainly subscribe to the words of the Auditor General when he says that this sort of operation is needed. We have been asked to sign a blank cheque to allow a government with such a record to define in all secrecy—because this government is known, in addition to all its other defects, to operate in complete secrecy—the responsibilities of a comptroller general once he has been placed in office.

I ask myself: When it abdicates its responsibilities in one area, why should the government expect us to accept the notion that it will perform any more satisfactorily in another area? Its fiscal record is so abominable and so abysmal, I suggest, that we have every reason to think that in this area it will be unable to meet expectations. Therefore, we really do need a clearer definition in the legislation of the functions and responsibilities of the person whose post is being created by this legislation. We are not safe with a government with such a record of secrecy and we need an assurance in law that control will be carried out, in accordance with the efforts made by my colleagues in committee and at report stage to have the appropriate amendments brought in, efforts which were defeated by this government by sheer weight of number.

Perhaps we should ask ourselves what is a comptroller general. My first action, when I run into an expression like that, is to seek the dictionary definition as guidance. So I went to the 12 volume edition of the Oxford dictionary where I found the following definition of the word "comptroller":

An erroneous spelling of controller, introduced c1500, and formerly frequent in all senses; still retained in certain official designations, while in others it has been changed to the ordinary spelling.

So the word "comptroller" is really the erroneous spelling of the word "controller", which is more commonly used in English. I suspect it was done by a scribe who found it easier to write the word comptroller, which comes from the French word "compter", one who holds accounts. Then I went to the definition of "controller" and I found four or five definitions here. One reads:

One who keeps a counter-roll so as to check a treasurer or person in charge of accounts.

Another reads:

A household officer whose duty was primarily to check expenditure . . .

Another reads:

An officer having similar duties in various public offices.

Another one is:

One who takes to task, calls in question, reproves, or censures: a censorious critic.

This is the definition which really meets the case. Another definition is:

One who controls or keeps under control; one who restrains, directs or manages.

That is what we need; we need a restrainer around here.

Another definition reads:

Controller-general: an officer entrusted with the supreme direction or control.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Those are not the sorts of definitions that would be all that meaningful in an act, but surely when this act was being drafted there were some competent legal people who could define in two languages what a comptroller general was supposed to do and could put it into the bill.

I took a hint from my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, and I looked up the distinction that was made by the Auditor General when he was discussing the role of the future comptroller general. I think it is worth putting on the record again and again—it cannot be repeated too often—just what he saw the comptroller general as being required to do. These are the terms that should have gone into the bill. The Auditor General examined the structure of the Treasury Board and he said:

All functions relating to financial management and control would be assigned to the comptroller general of Canada,— —leaving aside those of the secretary of the Treasury Board relating to resource allocation, personnel policy, administrative policy, and management of the official languages program, which would remain with the secretary of the Treasury Board or would otherwise be assigned as the government may see fit. He went on to say that the responsibilities of the comptroller general "relative to other deputy heads and his relationships with departmental financial officers are described in Part 3 of this report," to which I may have an opportunity to come.

Although this part is important, I consider it secondary this evening because my time is limited. There were five principal functions set down and I think they should be listed so that they are known. I know that in common law it is not the discussion surrounding a bill or an act which determines definitions in courts of law. For a better understanding of the meaning of this bill, the five functions of the Comptroller General should be laid down as they were seen by the Auditor General. As reported on page 3589 of Hansard, his responsibilities would be as follows:

His basic responsibilities would include the design, development, implementation and monitoring of adequate systems and procedures to ensure that the form of the estimates provides a sound basis for the government's budgetary control system, . . .

All of us have complained about the estimates, the difficulties which are faced when reading the estimates and extracting something from them which is meaningful. We can criticize, examine and approve, but the estimates are deemed to be approved at the end of this month if they are not passed by deliberate act.

His second responsibility would be as follows:

. . . that accounting procedures and financial reports throughout government . . . conform to acceptable accounting principles and standards . . .

In itself that is an indictment of what is now the practice, or it would not have to be said. It is a shameful thing for a public servant to feel it is necessary to advise parliament in this regard.

His third responsibility would be:

> ... that expenditures of public moneys are made with due regard for economy and efficiency ...

This is a most important responsibility.

The fourth one would be:

> ... that satisfactory procedures measure the effectiveness of programs where they could reasonably be expected to apply.

His fifth responsibility would be:

> The responsibility for maintaining the central accounts of Canada would be transferred to the office of the Comptroller General from the Department of Supply and Services where it is now located.

To that I say, "Amen". Nothing should be left in the hands of the Department of Supply and Services and its minister.

I have in my possession a publication entitled, "Guide on Financial Administration for Departments and Agencies of the Government of Canada". It is signed by a previous president of the Treasury Board and is dated September, 1973. Apparently it is full of meaninglessness, and was discarded by the Auditor General. How many thousands of copies of this were produced and distributed for guidance?

Certainly we need accountability and efficiency in the economy in order for us to know if the programs undertaken by the government are meaningful. This could lead us to zero-based budgeting, whereby programs start from zero and the individuals working on those programs are required to justify what they are doing. This will not be an easy process, but it ought to be introduced early.

That zero-based budgeting, which is an effective tool of management, could be started within the departments first, and then expanded on a department by department basis. The export development program regarding the line of credit to Algeria amounted to $1.2 billion. Can that program be examined? Would it stand up under the criteria of efficiency and economy? What about the Eneraction program? I call it the enervation program. In that program, people are taken off the dole and asked to assist in the provision of insulation for the elderly. These people know nothing about insulation or construction. They have applied for a grant to operate the government program. They undertake to train people in the field of insulating houses. People are taken from the unemployment insurance rolls to be trained. These people know nothing about construction or construction standards. The result of that program is that qualified insulators are going on the unemployment rolls. They are unable to get work because of this program.

There is a great need for an examination of the economy and the efficiency of government programs. The comptroller general should be encouraging department heads to examine programs such as these. This is the area in which his relationship with other government departments would come into play. Department heads could come to him indicating that they do not know if the Eneraction program is working or not. A system of examination, assessment and evaluation could be worked out to determine whether returns were being paid in the form of economy and efficiency. If not, then the program must be dropped. I use this program merely as an example. The public will never hear about these programs unless the comptroller general is given the real power he requires to assure economy and efficiency in government operations.

Surely it is not too much to ask for these clarifications to be added to the bill. As the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) suggested, there should be an annual report to parliament from the comptroller general so that parliament would know the comptroller general was exercising his functions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-10. The successful passage of this very important and long-awaited piece of legislation will enable the establishment of the office of the comptroller general of Canada. The setting up of a watch dog over the spending spree of the government is long overdue.

After grim warnings from the Auditor General that the federal government has pretty well lost control of the public purse, and as a result of persistent prodding from members of my party, finally we are close to starting along the long road to introducing some economic sanity into the government and its spending. The prodigal son spending approach of the government has led this country to the brink of bankruptcy. Elected officials must register their concern and fully support this bill. It is hoped that the appointment of the comptroller general will improve financial management and introduce some degree of accountability. Similar sentiment has been expressed by the Auditor General in his annual report.

One of the basic functions of parliament is responsibility for the public purse. We in the opposition consistently have been vigilant in requiring accountability for government spending. I must confess it has been a most frustrating experience. As a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, I am well aware of the lack of accountability exhibited by the government. The committees have failed miserably in their efforts to apply brakes on excessive government spending. Through their long and extended testimony, ministers have tried to undermine the parliamentary tradition of scrutinizing government spending.

In its progress report of November 1977, the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability said the following:

> We are persuaded that if accountability is to have full meaning and real effect, parliament must be a vital part of it.

● (2142)

I am one of those of the opinion that surveillance of government spending by parliamentary committees ought to be made more effective. A regular review of government departments should be conducted. We sorely lack effective mechanisms for obtaining government accountability. Accountability to parliament and to the people of Canada is the most essential element of our democratic process. If for some reason this privilege is abused, it plunges us into the kind of economic chaos we have been led into.

Consider for the moment the following. Between 1969 and 1977 public expenditure amounted to $235 billion. The startling fact is that during all that time parliament made only two cuts; $19,000 in supplementary funds for Information Canada in March of 1973, and $1,000 from money intended for the CBC in June of 1973. This illustrates well the manner in which the government has bull-dozed its spending estimates through parliament.

The government has indulged in questionable advertising campaigns on behalf of government departments reflecting party bias. The taxpayers are paying for the whims of the philosopher king who is engaged in playing games with the election date, thus requiring the CBC to station its technicians and vans on Parliament Hill awaiting the election announcement. This was mentioned last week by one of the previous speakers from our party. The cost estimate given in this regard was a startling figure.

I could go on and list the massive dose of inefficiency this government has given. I have only to mention the fact that the government's deficit today is more than the total budget of the last Conservative government in power by a good many millions of dollars.

For too long the king has thrived under the automatic passage of estimates by May 31. This built-in acceptance mechanism should be removed. Members should be allowed the opportunity to thoroughly examine the estimates before voting on them. That is the only way we can put an end to the spending legacy of this government.

Big Daddy, the biggest spender ever—and that is the federal government—certainly has a great deal to account for in the years to come, and possibly in the forthcoming federal election campaign. The Government of Canada is the greatest spender of all in advertising its own wares, telling the story of how good it is and what it has to offer. This is rather unusual when you consider that the government has no competition. I think of some of the great private concerns which spend millions of dollars to sell their products, such as Procter and Gamble, whose budget for advertising is phenomenal, General Motors, tobacco and alcohol companies. Yet their advertising budgets do not hold a candle to this government's. Certainly if there is a priority for the Comptroller General when he takes office it will be to investigate the advertising campaign in which the present government is involved. There is one particular aspect of one department which requires investigation, and that is the $1 million advertising campaign pointing out abuses to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Post Office is an important department. I am vitally interested in it as a member of the committee. Some ten years ago this department had a deficit of $67 million. This year the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) says there will be a deficit of approximately $600 million. In 1968, some ten years ago, the employees of the Post Office numbered 36,000. This number has now increased to 66,000, but the service has not improved greatly. It is difficult to know when you can count on a letter being delivered. Let me give an example. Some telegrams were sent to me from my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka last Tuesday, some of which were delivered today. Those were telegrams so the House can imagine how much good those telegrams did!

In 1968 there were 236,000 employees of the civil service. Various members of this party have pointed out tonight that the number of employees presently in the civil service is about 500,000. These huges increases should be investigated, and let us hope the Comptroller General will be able to do so.

The proposed budget for this coming year is $45 billion. We are well aware that, with the supplementary estimates which will come in from time to time, by the time March 31 of next year arrives the budget will probably be $50 billion in round figures.

It has already been mentioned that various government departments as well as the government have talked about zero budgeting. However, that is as far as it has gone. Let us hope the Comptroller General will be able to do something to bring these departments to heel, cutting back on overspending.

A suggestion that the Auditor General and the Comptroller General should take into consideration is one involving an incentive system for various departments, having the deputy ministers made responsible. The deputy ministers would have to keep within their budgets or face penalties. If they stayed within the budgets they would receive bonuses. I am aware that deputy ministers are not among the underpaid in this country today, but if they could save taxpayers' money it would be worthwhile giving them an incentive to do so.

I have heard on good authority, and I believe government members will agree, that in certain departments just before March 31 there is an effort to spend that remaining portion of the budget in order that they will receive the same or a greater budget the following year. These people dust around and do their darndest to spend what money is left so that as much or more will be available in the following year. If they could save $300,000 or $400,000 they could be given bonuses of $10,000. I am sure they would think twice then before squandering taxpayers' money. This is an idea the new Comptroller General should consider and perhaps put into practice.

As a member on this side of the House I am in support of this bill. I trust it will accomplish something. Some hon. members are pessimistic about it, but I have the highest praise for the government for bringing it forward even at this late stage. I offer my best wishes to the new Comptroller General. Let him get on with his job as quickly as possible in order that we may stretch taxpayers' dollars a lot further than at the present time.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have followed the debate since first reading of this bill with a great deal of interest and attention, especially the views put forward by members of the official opposition. One of the most interesting speeches was made by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), who I am happy to see in the House tonight. That gentleman is the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. He is the only member of the opposition to hold the position of chairman. Let me say that he carries out his task in this regard in a very excellent fashion. I appreciated the kind words he had for various members of this party, especially for the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) and myself who, along with himself and members from all parties, have had an opportunity of working together in the Public Accounts Committee.

In his speech on this third reading of Bill C-10, he made a very interesting observation, to be found on page 4980 of Hansard dated April 28:

> The tireless efforts of the Auditor General through the Standing Committee on Public Accounts have brought a realization that a chief financial officer is indeed needed at the Treasury Board level. Having worked on this subject matter for some time now, I can see the sense of the chief financial officer, the comptroller general, reporting through the Treasury Board to the House, though some of my colleagues may disagree with me. He is the one responsible for putting in place within our agencies, departments and Crown corporations, mechanisms which will demand a better performance in the management of our tax resource.

Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, the great work that was done by the members of the miscellaneous estimates committee to which this bill had been referred. This committee was responsible for calling forth the witnesses to be questioned on this bill regarding the functions and duties of the Comptroller General. On behalf of the minister, I wish to thank all those who have taken part in the debate and the committee hearings in relation to this bill. It was referred to the miscellaneous estimates committee at which time the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), the secretary of the Treasury Board, the Auditor General and the new Comptroller General himself, Mr. Rogers, appeared. We had been told before meeting him that he had been chosen after careful study and was a person who had had a very extensive career in the private sector in a variety of positions of responsibility with a major international corporation. He indeed impressed all those present with his answers and coolness in spite of the fact it was his first time before a committee of parliament, and there was no doubt that he was an excellent choice.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), who is also in the House tonight, was the only member from the opposition parties who was able to be present throughout the hearings on the day Mr. Rogers appeared as the new Comptroller General replied to questions. Yet everyone who has spoken in this debate keeps saying over and over how important this position of comptroller general is. Further, I hope that in the future more and more members of this House will become more active participants in the Public Accounts Committee. As I know from long experience, this is one of the most important committees in this House.

This is an historic occasion, and as one who has been an active member of the Public Accounts Committee for approximately nine of my 12 years in the House, I join all members in welcoming the official establishment of this new office. I am sure all members will join me in wishing Mr. Rogers well in his new, important duties.

I remind hon. members of the words of the Auditor General in committee when he stated that with this new office and the other changes that have been made since he assumed office, the Canadian government now has the most advanced system of accountability and control of any government in the western world. Even though members may have other priorities and may not become active members of either the Public Accounts Committee or the miscellaneous estimates committee, I would commend to them the reading of the minutes of these committees. Opposition members have especially taken objection to this one-paragraph bill setting up the office of the Comptroller General, but if they study the committee hearings and statements made by the ministers and others they will find the answers to all their questions.

Hon. members will find that in an unresolved conflict existing between the Auditor General and the Comptroller General, if this conflict still exists at the time the Auditor General makes his annual report to parliament, it will be included in that report. This will mean the necessity of a further report to parliament is disproven. In other words, if for some reason Mr. Rogers and Mr. Macdonell cannot come to an agreement on a certain item of government expenditure, then the Auditor General will include it in his report to be tabled in parliament, which is automatically referred to the Public Accounts Committee.

As I previously stated, this committee has been ably chaired by the hon. member for Capilano and other opposition members. Therefore, the committee will be quite free to carry on any investigation it feels necessary. Indeed, neither Mr. Rogers, the Comptroller General, nor the Auditor General, Mr. Macdonell, has any problem with Bill C-10. They are both confident that they can carry out their duties, and have testified to such in committee. I now hope that we can get through third reading of this important bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, there have been the usual consultations, and I understand that if you were not to see the clock for a short period of time we could now proceed to Bill S-8 rather expeditiously.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I hope I have not misled anybody but I cannot agree to that. Why I cannot agree can be found if hon. members will look at page 11 of the bill, section 18. I have a 20-minute speech ready, but I am prepared to listen to the parliamentary secretary until ten o'clock.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, if you call second reading of Bill S-8, I will be glad to begin. We have twice had misunderstandings which I cannot understand.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, the idea was to introduce the bill today and we would discuss it further tomorrow.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING SURRENDER OF PERSONS APPREHENDED IN CANADA

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill S-8, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask the acting House leader if he could confirm the order of business for tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as announced by the Deputy Prime Minister for Canada, we will proceed with second reading of Bill S-8 and then with consideration of Bill C-42. If we deal quickly enough with the latter, which concerns language before the courts, and I trust that the opposition parties, particularly the Progressive Conservative party, will not object to quick passage of the bill, we could go on to Bill S-9 and Bill C-4. So, Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member's question, the order would be as follows: S-8, C-42, which should go rapidly, and then S-9 and C-4.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST AREAS OF DISPARITY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, recently I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) what new initiatives he had in mind to focus more specifically his department's resources in the critical areas of regional disparity, particularly since the department's budget is down in real terms. Not only is it down in actual cash but new areas have been added and inflation has undermined this department's resources as it has so many other cases.

As it now stands, this department is failing in its task. In 1970, one year after DREE was created, unemployment in Canada stood at 5.7 per cent while in the Atlantic region, a classic area of economic disparity it was 6.2 per cent. Seven years later unemployment in Canada stood at 8.1 per cent while in Atlantic Canada it was 12.7 per cent. Clearly the situation is getting worse instead of better. Economic differences have become more exaggerated and critical.

As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), our former leader, pointed out a few weeks ago, the result of the combined policies with respect to Canada's various regions is such that to a substantial degree various regions have turned into government dependencies. Energy costs and transportation costs continue to plague the efforts of the Atlantic region to limit its failure to expand as it should.

I want to suggest to the minister tonight that he take steps to educate and work with other departments in order to do something about this lamentable state of affairs. Since the federal government is the largest employer, the largest buyer of goods and services in the country, it is time that the Atlantic region was given more equity.

In 1976, for example, total federal spending on goods and services was about $9.7 billion. Experts and analysts consider that approximately 85 per cent of all procurement is done in central Canada, leaving less than 15 per cent for the other eight provinces and two territories. I remember that shortly after coming to this place the then minister of supply and services stated clearly that his department was going to institute a more enlightened purchasing policy. This has not had any appreciable effect to date.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce also contributes to the under-development of Atlantic Canada. In a recent year, Atlantic Canada received only 1.7 per cent of the funds allotted for industrial assistance. On a per capita basis it should have received over five times as much.

Since my time is very limited tonight, I just want to make a suggestion to the minister. Although both his predecessors had experience in the Department of Transport as well as DREE, by taking the initiative he could accomplish something that they could not, except by paying lip service to the idea, and that is to make transportation a partner with regional economic expansion in attacking disparities in this country.

I should like to suggest this evening that the minister or his parliamentary secretary take a very close look at building something that has been talked about for many years in the Atlantic region, and that is a corridor road extending from the New Brunswick border through northern Maine to the vicinity of Sherbrooke in la belle province, Quebec. A corridor road would be a direct link through the state of Maine from New Brunswick to Quebec. It could be an extension of the Vanceboro-Lincoln Road at the New Brunswick border which would emerge in the vicinity of Sherbrooke, Quebec after crossing New Brunswick, saving approximately 200 miles on the existing route from Fredericton to Montreal and almost as far by driving through the United States on the existing highway route.

The construction of such a road could perhaps be of more benefit than the St. Lawrence Seaway as far as Atlantic Canada is concerned. It could be and should have been one of the areas of joint co-operation and negotiation between the United States and Canada whenever mutual concessions, aims and objectives were in issue, as for example in the recent pipeline negotiations or when Alaska highway matters are on the table between our two nations.

Such a road would reduce the driving time by approximately four hours and thus allow many additional trips in the course of a year with great savings in energy and maintenance costs. It would bring the Atlantic provinces much closer in real terms to markets in the rest of Canada. Many bulk commodities now tied to rail or water transport could look at potential new markets via road transport. Tourism would be facilitated. There is something to be said for building a road thereby bringing Gagetown, New Brunswick into close linkage with the military installations in the United States. Such a road would be welcome in both countries. It would be expensive. But it would be money well spent compared to some of the cosmetic capital costs involved in building unnecessary and grandiose skyscrapers and monster airports. It would do a great deal in real terms to overcome some of the natural disadvantages geographically that we have in the maritimes.

Let DREE help facilitate the arteries of commerce. We need improvements and opportunities in the maritimes, not handouts. DREE can help but it cannot do much in its present posture. It needs to take steps to either build sound infrastructures and to work with other departments in projects of this magnitude, or make its definition section more flexible. It could allow other industries, except manufacturing and processing industries, to be eligible for DREE aid, as is done in Germany, for example. If we continue to drift along with DREE in its present form, as statistics have shown we are not only perpetuating policies which are not helping the disparate regions of the country, but we are seeing as time goes by a steady erosion of the situation that existed even a few years ago.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) has raised several questions concerning the role of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in Atlantic Canada and in his own province of Nova Scotia with respect to creating employment. While the minister feels that this department's efforts in this regard ought to be well known by now to most Nova Scotians, on the minister's behalf, as his former parliamentary secretary, I am pleased at this time to acquaint the hon. member with what is happening not only in his home province but in his own riding.

He asks what new initiatives the department has in mind. DREE operates in concert with provincial governments in the identification and exploitation of development opportunities. Therefore, I do not unilaterally have new initiatives in mind.

What the department intends to do must also be put in the context of what it is already doing. The department is constantly working, in conjunction with the province, to find new initiatives leading to development agreements. In Nova Scotia the department has signed ten such agreements in less than three years, with a total value approaching one quarter of a billion dollars. We hope in the near future to be announcing further agreements which will contribute in a meaningful and permanent way to the betterment of that province's economy.

The agreements already in force deal with the natural resource sectors, such as forestry, agriculture and minerals. Others deal with industrial development, the Sydney steel mill, the Strait of Canso, tourism and redevelopment of the Halifax-Dartmouth waterfront area.

It is frequently suggested by members of the opposition, that all the department has to do to straighten out our economic problems is to develop our natural resources. We are presently fully committed to the natural resources in Nova Scotia. Another resource, the fisheries, has the full attention of an entire department of the government.

These agreements were not worked out on an ad hoc basis, nor were they proposed as purely political, counter-cyclical measures to create jobs out of thin air. In short, they do not represent the kind of stop-gap measures the hon. member thinks we ought to engage in.

If permanent jobs could be created simply by making interest-free money available to the private sector, we would have recommended this action a long time ago; but this approach is too simplistic. It makes no attempt to recognize the facts of economic life nor, I might add, does it take into account what the availability of too much "free money" would do to our conventional lending institutions.

What we can do, however, and what the department is doing, is to put federal dollars into the economy in such a way that, hopefully, more opportunities for investment will be created. Our development agreements represent the best thinking available as to how to stimulate economic growth by first creating an environment which is attractive to private investment.

This is not easily achieved. Nor can it be done overnight. Broad-based programs for forestry, agriculture, minerals and tourism must by definition be diffuse in their application. They carry with them, however, a number of opportunities for the private sector.

The hon. member might be interested to hear that residents of his own riding and of the surrounding areas have been benefitting from these programs for some time. Grants to farmers in Pictou county during the past two years have amounted to more than $491,000. This money was provided under the agreement for development of the agriculture sector.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his time has expired.

FINANCE—MEASURES TO PREVENT DUMPING OF STEEL BEAMS—DEFINITION OF "FAIR WORLD PRICE"

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, on February 20 of this year, as reported in Hansard at page 3006, I addressed the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The preamble reads:

> The heart of much of the regional antagonism caused by federal rulings on matters like the dumping duty on wide-flange steel beams seems to be in our failure to recognize that often more than one market can exist in a country as vast as Canada.
> Can the minister, or the Prime Minister, advise whether the government is negotiating an amendment under article 4(A)(ii) of the GATT agreement to reflect the fact that transportation costs and other regional marketing factors may create in Canada two or more markets, where in at least one Canadian producers sell none or almost none of their goods?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) replied as follows:

> We have recognized that there is a short-term problem in British Columbia. Of course, when we have one Canadian market we have to maintain a tariff and have an adjudication by the tribunal when it looks into a dumping case—whether it be steel or any other product—because we cannot accept dumping of products on the Canadian market. I am sure the hon. member would not be pleased if we did not protect, in the eastern market, the price of plywood that very often comes from B.C.

In answer to a supplementary question by my hon. friend from Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), the same minister ended his explanation by saying:

> Of course, British Columbia producers will always have access to international steel as long as it is not dumped on the Canadian market.

It is not my intention, nor that of the B.C. government, to speak against the principle of protection against dumping. However, for the federal government to continue to treat this vast land with ports on the Atlantic close to European markets and with ports on the Pacific close to Asian and Pacific Rim markets as a single market is to keep in place a policy that is obsolete, a policy that maintains regional stresses, a policy that works against unity and a policy that enhances anti-centralist feeling to the disadvantage of federalism.

My argument against the position taken by the government is that injury should be isolated to the region or market where the injury can be identified. The main factor which determines markets within Canada is railroad freight rates, as anyone who has been in the business of distributing or manufacturing goods knows.

The issue facing us is that tariffs erected to safeguard against injury to domestic producers caused by dumping be considered in two parts; first, within the market regions of Canada where such dumping is causing injury and, second, within market regions of Canada where such dumping is not causing injury. We should limit the safeguard to the region in which the safeguard is prompted as a result of the threat or reality of injury.

[Mr. Lumley.]

As a member of GATT, Canada has accepted the principle of liberalizing trade between member nations. Indeed, this is the thrust of the Tokyo round. The suggested isolation of the safeguard resort would mean protection for the region of Canada needing it, leaving the benefits of freer trade to those not served by domestic production and historically dependent on offshore materials. Surely the federal government can see that this suggestion fits the spirit and objectives of GATT.

To continue as we are today will deliver the West Coast steel fabricating markets to the fabricators of Ontario. The loss to British Columbia will be in neighbourhood of 1,500 to 2,000 jobs, plus all the spin-off benefits attendant to this employment. If the concern of the government for unity and regional equity extends beyond rhetoric, I trust my plea tonight will be given careful consideration by the ministers concerned.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) has raised a question concerning the recent move by the government to remit anti-dumping duties on wide flanged steel shapes imported from certain countries for installation in projects in British Columbia, Alberta, Newfoundland and the Yukon Territory. The remission order, as hon. members are aware, will apply for the nine-month period from the application of the provisional anti-dumping duties; that is, for the period from September 29, 1977 to June 29, 1978. As noted in the press announcement, this action was approved to cushion the transition to higher input costs for fabricators in the areas mentioned. As such, it is both limited in coverage and temporary in duration.

The hon. member suggests in his comments that the temporary nature of the remission order will add to the uncertainty facing the steel fabricating industry in British Columbia. Moreover, he is urging that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) act quickly to announce the level of the final dumping duties involved.

Let me first say that it is not the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to determine the level of the anti-dumping duties applicable. The law requires that this decision be taken by the deputy minister of the Department of National Revenue for customs and excise. In this connection I would like to stress, however, that any delay involved in arriving at a final determination should not be attributed to the Department of National Revenue. As I understand the situation, that department has encountered extreme difficulty in obtaining the necessary factual information from the exporters concerned in order to make its findings in such cases. Clearly, much of the uncertainty involved could be eliminated very quickly if the exporters would co-operate with the Department of National Revenue to this end.

With regard to the temporary nature of the remission order, I can assure the hon. member that the matter was given very careful consideration by the government prior to taking a decision. In this instance the government was faced with a request from the provinces of British Columbia and Newfoundland to assist their fabricating industries to adjust to a new situation. This new situation resulted directly from a decision by the anti-dumping tribunal that dumped imports of the steel product in question were causing injury to domestic production. This decision, by a court of record, was in full conformity with the terms of the Anti-Dumping Act passed by this parliament. The government, in light of the representations it received, felt that a limited remission was warranted in this instance to enable time for the regional fabricating industry to adjust.

It must, however, be clearly recognized that the real issue at stake here is whether Canada is prepared to allow its domestic industry to suffer injury by unfair trading practices of other countries. The government has in the past and will in the future use all the means at its disposal to provide the environment in which our domestic producers can be assured of fair trading practices. At this particular time the steel industry worldwide is facing difficulty. This is expected to continue until such time as the world economy picks up. Other governments have taken special measures to guard against predatory dumping of steel into their markets. The Department of National Revenue has also stepped up its activity to ensure that steel is not injuriously dumped into the Canadian market in massive quantities.

It should be borne in mind—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—COST-SHARING OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on April 3 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question about cost-sharing and the reconstruction and improvement of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland. I asked him would his government agree to a cost-sharing arrangement of 75 per cent federal and 25 per cent provincial, as the province had asked. The province originally asked for a 90-10 deal. The Prime Minister said that I should ask the DREE minister. He thought it was a matter for DREE. Mr. Speaker, this shows you how little the Prime Minister knows about what is going on in his government.

Negotiations were going on with the department of transportation, the minister of transportation of the Newfoundland government, since May of 1973 at least, over this cost-sharing arrangement. The Prime Minister is governing in the dark. The left hand does not know what the right hand is doing. He is pirouetting in the deep purple. Either that or he is so dithered about the election and whether to call it or not, or he is so puzzled about patronage, that he does not know what is happening in his own government.

In 1965 the trans-Canada highway, Mr. Speaker, was completed under the great slogan "We'll finish the drive in '65 thanks to Mr. Pearson". That is when the federal government agreed to pay 90 per cent of the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland. But the highway was build to substandard; it was not built to the trans-Canada standards on the mainland. It was substandard then, and since then, Mr. Speaker, federal neglect of their obligations with respect to the Newfoundland railway and CNR neglect of the needs of the Newfoundland railway and mismanagement of the Newfoundland railway has resulted in most freight now being taken by truck rather than by rail cars across Newfoundland.

The figures are staggering. In the year 1971, 2,500 tractor trailers landed at Port aux Basques to go across the Island. In 1976, 28,000, a huge increase in traffic. In 1970 the railway moved 385,000 tons of freight. In 1976, six years later, just 397,000 tons, only a 3 per cent increase. But whereas in 1970 there were 3,292 truck and trailer units operating in Newfoundland, it went to 17,247 in 1976, a 424 per cent increase. In 1976, trucks carried about 90 per cent of all the freight carried across Newfoundland.

In addition, the federal government and CNR conspired with Mr. Smallwood, when he was premier of Newfoundland, to do away with the railway passenger service in that province, and since 1968 we have had a bus service only for passengers travelling across Newfoundland. The result is there is this tremendous increase in traffic on the substandard trans-Canada highway.

The highway is deteriorating completely. Anyone who trucks on that highway will tell you, as did the St. John's Board of Trade a few months ago, that repairs to transport equipment skyrocketed; the transport trucks are damaged by the condition of the highway. They said also:

> And claims by business to the truckers have doubled because the freight being hauled across this province "has literally been smashed to pieces".

Of course, those costs are being met by the consumer. This is happening in a province like Newfoundland with its weak financial condition, with the federal government letting CN concur in the dumping of all the freight on the small and narrow Trans-Canada Highway, and with our recognition that we are a special case, as was found by the MacPherson Royal Commission which stated in 1962:

> The situation in Newfoundland is a special case distinct from the rest of Canada.

You cannot put it any plainer than that. They are finding that a highway network is beyond our resources and the government should see that the provincial government has money for roads other than the trans-Canada. At least a 90-10 deal is needed for the next ten years in the reconstruction of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland and its strengthening and upgrading. The province simply cannot find 50 per cent of the $250 million required.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), with his Teutonic, terrorist transport tactics, sent wires to the four Atlantic premiers in June of this year telling them that they would cost share 50-50 only, and that if they did not accept this 50-50 offer, the money would be used for some other purpose by the federal government. Because of this ultimatum, they all collapsed, with Newfoundland falling in line on March 29 of this year. Newfoundland surrendered and accepted this pitiful and incomplete offer. So instead of "We'll finish the drive in 65, thanks to Mr. Pearson", what we have now is: "On the Newfoundland highway, you drive with a bang, until you get rid of Otto Lang". We must get some minister of transport in there that is not hip on the user-pay principle of the present minister and who will treat Newfoundland fairly in this direction.

The present transport policy is to discontinue ferry subsidies in Newfoundland; it is to put an inadequate search and rescue service there; it is not to give us any kind of ice breaking service at all; it is to continue withdrawals by CN Marine and the CNR and an inferior ferry service from the mainland to Argentia.

This Minister of Transport will languish in history as the least sympathetic, the least useful, the most loutish and the most lumpish of all federal ministers of transport ever seen. His actions in Newfoundland, to put the best face on it, are barbaric. I am asking the government now to change this unilateral decision of theirs that they will finance only 50 per cent of the cost. We are talking of $250 million over ten years, not $250 million that must be spent this year, next year or the year after. It will cost $250 million over ten years, of which the federal government is now offering $125 million if they go for the whole ten years. This is a three-year agreement only. It should be a 75 per cent deal at least.

If you look at the brief submitted by the Canadian Railway Labour Association to the Government of Canada on March 20 of this year you will see what happened in Newfoundland. It reads:

> In sum, what we now have on the island of Newfoundland is an inefficient passenger service; an inefficient freight service; a fast deteriorating trans-Canada highway and a rail system, operated by the frustrated Crown corporation, the Canadian National Railways; a federal transport policy based upon "commercial viability" and "user-pay concept".

That is what we have now in Newfoundland. What is to be done? If this government will not do it, then the next government, which will be of a different political persuasion—we hope, in any event—will have to do it, and that is to give the province of Newfoundland better financial terms to put across the island a decent trans-Canada highway and ensure that the Newfoundland railway continues to operate more efficiently and at a more reasonable freight rate, so that much of this freight traffic will go off the highway and back on to the Newfoundland railway where it belongs.

So I call upon the Minister of Transport, in his last month of office, to stop this loutish behaviour and to give Newfoundland a fair deal.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I really do not see where the hon. member is getting at with all the wordiness and verbal inflation that he uses when speaking of the Minister of Transport and even of the right hon. Prime Minister, who have spent all their energy in harmonizing the policies of the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion, Transport, and others in consultation with the provinces, in order to give the Maritimes the best possible road system for the best possible service to the population of those provinces.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to confirm that on Tuesday, April 18, the Minister of Transport of Canada and the minister of transportation and communication of Newfoundland signed an official agreement regarding a three year road improvement program for Newfoundland. This program will involve expenditures of almost $60 million. The agreement concludes fruitful negotiations with the four Atlantic provinces, and the road improvement program can thus be implemented without delay.

As the hon. member of the opposition is aware, the federal government agreed, in May 1977, to spend up to $125 million over the next three years to upgrade the transport system in the Maritimes, and a large proportion of that amount, namely $100 million, is earmarked for the highway improvement program, which is a program whose costs are shared equally by the provinces and the Government of Canada.

[English]

Work to be undertaken over the next three years in Newfoundland includes construction of additional lanes at selected locations between St. John's and Highway 70; strengthening and upgrading between highways 201 and 210; also between Port Blandford and Terra Nova Park, and between the park and Highway 320; between Georges Lake and Crabbes River; and between Bishop's Falls and Grand Falls. In addition, the agreement provides for the standardization of allowable axle weights and gross vehicle weights for truck using the primary highway systems.

In closing, I should emphasize that the government is anxiously awaiting recommendations from the Sullivan commission, which is reviewing transportation on Newfoundland. Of course, this recently signed agreement will not affect any of the recommendations which may arise from the commission's findings.

Mr. Crosbie: I am talking about the Trans-Canada, not the DREE agreement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

ELECTIONS

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, to move:

That, without further delay, in view of the Gallup poll of today's date which indicates that the Trudeau government is on the way out, this House calls upon the right hon. Prime Minister, having lost the confidence and support of the Canadian people, to put an end at once to the uncertainty and secure the consent of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada to immediate dissolution of this House so that the people of Canada can elect a government without delay which will meet the tremendous economic problems that exist and face this country.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: The Prime Minister said no.

POST OFFICE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH CUPW TO AVOID STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the long drawn-out contract negotiations between the government and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are reaching a critical stage, and the Postmaster General is not involved in the discussions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Postmaster General participate in the current critical contract negotiations with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers through the established procedures of the conciliation board rather than by statements to the press.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING RESEARCH WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the many criticisms which have been levelled against the National Research Council of Canada, which is said to discriminate against Quebec research workers, with the result that the province of Quebec is not likely to receive its fair share of the research grants, and in view of the series of irregularities which today's edition of Le Devoir has published concerning the appointment of the selection committee, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the minister responsible for the National Research Council of Canada to investigate these alleged irregularities and report to the House so that the Canadian public at large may know the whole truth about this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

SUGGESTION FUTURE AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT BE PUBLICIZED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and vital necessity for both Quebec and the rest of Canada.

Considering that according to what the Prime Minister himself said in the House of Commons on April 19 last, caisses populaires and credit unions will fall under the future bank legislation; considering that in Quebec particularly, but elsewhere as well, both institutions are based on the savings of people and are the centre of local economies; considering that in all logic and justice no amendment to the present status of these institutions should be made without previously seeking consent from the provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

That the House unanimously urge the Minister of Finance to make public before the next election campaign the essence of the provisions of the future legislation and to consult his provincial counterparts on any proposed change of jurisdiction in this area.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—RATES TO MOVE CARS AND TRUCKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. VIA Rail has announced that excursion rates to Churchill will be the same as last year. At the same time, rates to move cars and half-ton trucks out of communities that are isolated and have no highway access have been increased. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk):

That VIA Rail be instructed to also leave the rates for moving passenger cars and trucks at the same rate as last year.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO ACT RESPECTING CAPITAL GAINS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the statement the Minister of Finance made in this House on December 6, 1977, as reported at page 1603 of Hansard, that corporations would not be included in the roll-over provision for capital gains tax on farms, and in view of the statement of the hon. member for Trinity, as reported on April 28, that the Income Tax Act would be amended to enable a small businessman to sell his shoe store and buy a clothing store without paying capital gains tax, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

● (1412)

That the Minister of Finance immediately introduce amendments to the Income Tax Act to allow small businessmen the same capital gains tax provision as suggested by the hon. Leader of the Opposition in Hamilton on April 26.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH PENSION EQUALITY FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because the urgency of this matter will continue until it is resolved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House calls on the government to expedite the introduction of legislation to establish pension equality for women, including full rights for women under the Canada Pension Plan, equal pension rights for all women between the ages of 60 and 65 regardless of marital status, increasing the pensions paid to widows under various government plans to at least 75 per cent, and the continuing payment of pensions granted to widows regardless of any subsequent change in marital status.

REQUEST AGED PERSONS HAVE ACCESS BY MOTOR VEHICLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a very important motion.

In view of the fact that the Plains of Abraham at the top of Cape Diamond in Quebec City are under federal jurisdiction; in view of the fact that the National Battlefields Commission is in charge of the administration of this large historic site; in view of the fact that there is a great deal of talk about prohibiting motor vehicle traffic in this area, which will be quite detrimental to aged persons because it is their only means of transport to go there, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House urge the minister in charge of the Plains of Abraham not to allow the National Battlefields Commission to prevent aged persons and young children from gaining access to this historic site by motor vehicle.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DECLINE IN FARM INCOME AND INCREASE IN PRICE OF FOOD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance. Yesterday, Statistics Canada released disturbing figures indicating, based on 1976 incomes, that farm incomes in Canada have declined by 6.9 per cent. I hope the Minister of Agriculture takes note of that. At the same time, the Anti-Inflation Board introduced startling figures which indicated that food prices in Canada over one month have increased by 2.6 per cent, representing an 11.9 per cent increase in the price of food, as measured by the AIB, in one year.

It is obvious the people of Canada are very unhappy about the situation, and Dr. Gallup confirmed that. What does the government propose to do about this very serious problem which is imposing such an unjust burden on middle and low income earners in this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since April 15 we have relied on the marketplace to decide. Hon. members opposite have been saying for the last three years that controls in Canada were not the proper instrument to control our economy. We then decided to discontinue the controls program and leave the decisions to the marketplace. If the hon. member is proposing that we reinstate controls, we can look into that.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the minister must still be suffering from Montezuma's revenge, because that could be the only way to explain the fact that he does not know food prices are not covered by the AIB, and never have been.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: It is obvious that food prices in Canada, according to the AIB, will continue to rise. That fact is confirmed by Statistics Canada in the consumer price index. This can be related, among other things, to the minister's floating-sinking dollar. Now that parliament will be around for a while at least, will the minister bring in measures to offset the failure of his budget and address this serious problem that is hurting the poor and the low income earners of this country?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is ignoring some very basic facts; firstly, that farm prices are not controlled at the farm gate. However, everything else, the ingredients of transportation, marketing, and so on, is controlled; and this represents more than 50 per cent of the price of the food product. Also, many of the foods consumed in Canada during the winter are imported from the United States and Mexico. Of course, because of the decline of the Canadian dollar we have gained at lot in the export business, but we have to pay higher prices for imported foods.

STEPS TO IMPROVE FARM INCOME

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that tremendous concession, whereby he now admits that his monetary policies are disastrous and are driving up food prices.

I have a question for the gloomy-faced Minister of Agriculture who has a lot to be gloomy about. Can he tell us what he proposes to do about the farm income situation which, if not corrected, will lower production in this country? While he is at it, will he tell us what has become of the so-called conference on food strategy which was heralded with such fanfare last winter?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if anything makes me gloomy, it is some of the false statements made by the hon. member and the fact that some people may believe him. The hon. member has stressed food prices, while knowing full well that such things as coffee showed on the index an increase of 280 per cent last year. Total imports in foods show a 58 per cent increase in one year. These are foods that cannot be produced in Canada and come from tropical and semi-tropical areas.

When the hon. member talks about income to farmers, one of the groups that he condemns is an anti-inflation fighter's dream: the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency lowered egg prices 3.4 per cent last year, yet the producer had a decent profit all the time.

Mr. McGrath: Man does not live by eggs alone.

FORECAST RESPECTING FOOD PRICES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance, who has already referred to the weaker dollar. As we know, the weaker dollar is contributing to the high prices in Canada that the minister has already referred to. At page 4 of the Bank of Canada Review for April, we find the admission that increases of nearly 12 per cent, on average, in import prices were experienced in 1977.

Would the minister indicate, bearing in mind the already objectionably high food prices that we have in the country, whether they have taken a survey to determine what is likely to happen to food prices in May, June and July? May we anticipate still higher food prices, as many merchandising organizations are indicating?

[Mr. McGrath.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a precise indication of what will happen, but in our forecast we anticipate there will be an average inflation level of 7 per cent in 1978. As usual, with summer coming it means that more food will be produced in Canada of the kind that will bring down the price of food in the CPI. In the winter, when we rely on imported food, we have to pay higher prices because of the weaker dollar, which has been extremely good for our balance of trade. We have a record balance of trade for the month of March to an extent Canada has never experienced before.

• (1422)

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If we are to attain that 7 per cent price increase level by the end of the year, it will mean we will have to be down to 6.4 per cent in the last quarter of this year, which is very unlikely. In view of the revelation made today with respect to our foreign exchange reserves, namely, that the government has borrowed a total of $2.1 billion to protect the weaker dollar that the minister has referred to, what does the minister anticipate the interest load on that increased borrowing from foreigners will be, bearing in mind that the interest load set out by the Bank of Canada in the Annual Review this month was $2.4 billion paid to foreigners? That means $100 for every Canadian was paid to foreigners in interest alone in 1977. What will be the impact of the new foreign borrowing revealed in today's figures?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the impact will not be major. If the hon. member understands the system, the money we are borrowing abroad to supplement the inflow of capital into Canada is money that we do not have to borrow internally. When we borrow in Canada, we pay interest, just as we pay interest on foreign borrowing. The net cost is just the margin of the rate of interest we have to pay between the two. If I compare the rate for borrowing on the German market, borrowing there at this time will in fact save us some interest.

Mr. Stevens: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This is the only Minister of Finance in Canadian history to claim it is better to borrow from foreigners than from the Canadian people. In view of the outflow revealed in the minister's release today of $700 million as far as our reserves are concerned, which is made up, of course, by this foreign borrowing, would the minister indicate if he anticipates this outflow will continue supporting the weaker dollar and, specifically, would he indicate where the $200 million went that we lost in International Monetary Fund reserves?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make any speculation as to what might be the level of fluctuations in our reserves during May. We will wait until the end of the month to reveal the amount, whether positive or negative, of the reserve loss and, of course, the hon. member will find out about it on the first Tuesday of June.

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—DISTRIBUTION OF JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Yet another automotive parts company has today announced the shutdown of most of its operations in Sarnia and that it will move back to the United States.

Considering that the Ontario government's study of the auto industry confirmed what we and the Canadian autoworkers have been saying for many months, namely, that Canada is not getting its share of jobs in this industry, would the minister admit that he and his colleague, the minister of public works, have been misinforming the House when they have contended that Canada has received more than its share of jobs, because they failed to take into account the more than 225,000 U.S. auto workers employed in such key sectors as stampings, carburettors and windshields?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I never at any time said that everything at all times is perfect with the automotive pact. I have said repeatedly in this House that we are trying to encourage the building of more automobile plants in Canada because we recognize that there is an imbalance of trade between the two countries. The fact is, however, that the Ontario government's study does not take into consideration third countries shipping to Canada, such as Japan, Germany and other European countries, when trying to balance the automotive trade between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Broadbent: What the minister has said is perfectly true, Mr. Speaker, but they do not consider the price of apples in Tanzania, either. What the minister has indicated is irrelevant to the question. The minister of public works said in this House on Friday that Canada received in excess of 11 per cent of the jobs and that we are consuming some 9 per cent of the output of this industry. That is a falsehood, Mr. Speaker.

I am asking the minister to confirm that that falsehood which he, as the minister, stated on an earlier occasion, not in this House but in committee, leaves out some 225,000 Americans working in such sectors as windshields, stampings, carburettors, and so on. The Government of Canada is using misleading figures: I want the minister to admit that.

• (1427)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we in Canada have 11.2 per cent of the labour involved in the automobile industry between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Broadbent: That is false.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member says it is false.

Mr. Broadbent: Read the Ontario report.

Mr. Horner: He can produce his figures. Obviously, the Ontario government has produced theirs, and theirs are in error because they have failed to take into consideration, as I said, third countries shipping into Canada. They have failed to take into consideration that fact; that is why their figures are in error.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, this can be pursued at another time, but it is basically the minister who is in error because the federal government has left out 225,000 Americans who are employed in this industry. More specifically, I want to know what the minister is doing about getting more jobs. He has admitted that we have a shortfall in jobs. I want to know what he is doing.

Specifically, would he agree that the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement which states that both countries are committed to a share on a fair and equitable basis in the future growth of the industry means that the companies should be investing proportionately in both countries. If he admits that, would he tell us why he has not obtained from the companies precise commitments to invest in Canada in the next two years in proportion to what they plan to invest in the United States?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly said that there is a shortfall in the automotive trade of about 5,000 jobs. I do not mind saying that again. I have repeatedly told the House that we are carrying on negotiations with the three major auto manufacturers in the North American markets hoping that we will get some additional plants built in Canada.

Nothing world give me more pleasure than to tell the House today that more plants will be built in A, B and C locations, but I cannot say that. Negotiations are still going on. I hope one day to be able to tell the hon. member in this House where the plants will be built and how many more jobs will be created by them.

REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING ALLEGED INJUSTICE TOWARD RESEARCH WORKERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of science and technology.

Today's Le Devoir reports statements made by Mr. Brian Gregory who spoke on behalf of the National Institute for Scientific Research in the University of Quebec. The newspaper article denounces discrimination against Quebec research workers who do not receive their fair share of research funding. For example if one considers priority fields such as energy, Quebec research workers have received only 12 per cent of the grants, yet they represent 48 per cent of all Canadian research workers in that field. So I would like to ask the minister whether he has received representations about this injustice which is reported in today's Le Devoir.

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have not received such representation. However, I will be happy to look into the figures drawn to my attention by the hon. member and report back to him.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Mr. Gregory stated that Ontario was generously rewarded with research grants but several other provinces that had applied for grants had not been successful. Will the minister inquire about this matter so that the provinces which have research staff in their universities may get their fair share?

[English]

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, these grants, basically, are made through universities. There is an evaluation process which they go through. We do not, in fact, do it within the department; it is done by a group primarily made up of academics who assess the various projects which are proposed. As I said earlier, I will be happy to look into the representations.

SMALL BUSINESSES

MEASURES TO PREVENT FAILURES

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Small Business). In view of the fact that figures which were compiled by Dun and Bradstreet of Canada show that business failures in 1977 increased by over 38 per cent compared with the figure for the year before—an increase of 1,155—can the minister confirm to the House that the vast preponderance of business failures taking place in Canada today are taking place in the small business section? Also, can he tell the House whether he and his colleagues are prepared to put before parliament a comprehensive program which would give small businessmen the break they need if they are to survive in Canada today?

● (1432)

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, in partial answer to the hon. member's question, since the vast preponderance of businesses in Canada are small, necessarily the highest proportion of failures will occur in that sector. We have a number of programs that are very helpful to small business, and more are in the planning stage. There is our tax system and the various other programs.

I would point out that the same organization, Dun and Bradstreet, indicates that the principal cause of 90 per cent of the business failures is management problems. Therefore, we have very strong belief in the CASE program which is offered by the FDBD, employing some 2,000 consultants to help small businessmen, at low cost.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, that is typical of this government. Just as they would blame the unemployed for unemployment, they blame Canada's small businessmen for the failures of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: I want to know from this complacent minister whether he and his officials have attempted to compile figures for the first quarter of this year. Can he confirm reports published in the press which indicate that the failure among businesses in Canada has actually accelerated in the first quarter of this year over last year?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I am not blaming small business. Since there are one million small businesses, some 400,000 incorporated small businesses, if there is a substantial number of business failures they obviously have to be drawn largely from that sector. The point I am making is that we recognize 1977 and 1978 have been difficult years. We are distressed by the number of business failures. We do have figures compiled. I would not differ with the figures the hon. member has cited, but I would like to examine them.

Mr. Beatty: The minister is attempting to pass the buck. When will this government be placing before parliament new proposals which will give a break to the small business sector? The minister acknowledges that the trend accelerated in the first quarter of 1978. When will the minister be prepared to take action and place a program before parliament?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, we have a number of programs and I am hopeful we will be producing more.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF HALL COMMISSION

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Yesterday the minister said he was setting new records. However, he has established a few records which he did not mention. In view of record demurrage charges, 16 ships waiting in Vancouver today, record export backlog, 35 million bushels behind, record farm debt, up again today, record discrepancy between selling price and farmers' price at $2 a bushel, record outpouring of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): When does the minister intend to implement those sections of the Hall commission report which are designed to straighten out the transportation mess in our western grain industry?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I find it extraordinary that a member of the Conservative party can say that, when a colleague of his, a Conservative from New Brunswick, in the debate the other day said that we in this government are doing everything in transportation for the west. I do not know how the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek can ride right over the fact that this government just in the last month approved $600 million toward a rail rehabilitation program. We have approved the expansion of Prince Rupert. In fact, we are moving toward a record volume of wheat exports and grain exports. We are likely to move 850 million bushels of grain this year. In the Diefenbaker years, we scarcely passed 400 million bushels.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, it is generally conceded in western Canada that our grain industry is in the hands of an economic virgin. Yesterday the Alberta Wheat Pool was unable to unload a single bushel of grain; they did not have any. Last weekend only two terminals in Vancouver worked. Will the minister look at the transportation section of the Wheat Board with a view to somehow streamlining it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, once again, I am glad the hon. member referred to the fact that these are operational matters which are in the hands of the Canadian Wheat Board. Unlike the hon. member, the Canadian Wheat Board has the full and almost complete support of farmers right across the prairies. I know it does not have the support of the Conservative party, as evidenced just now by this speaker and when the Leader of the Opposition indicated some time ago that he was going to break down the export monopoly of the Canadian Wheat Board. That is a losing policy all across the west.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL NEGOTIATE SALES TAX WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

According to a report issued by the office of the Minister of Commerce here in Ottawa, if the federal government were to adopt the proposals of the Quebec minister of finance even the other provinces might benefit from it; according to the same report, of the 36,000 jobs lost in Canada in the manufacturing industry in the last 18 months, 30,000 were lost in the province of Quebec in the traditional sectors such as clothing, footwear, furniture and others. As those factors—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question to put, would he kindly put it immediately?

Mr. Grafftey: In view of those factors, is the right hon. Prime Minister now willing to negotiate with the province of Quebec in a spirit of flexibility as the government did with Saskatchewan and British Columbia with a view to accepting Mr. Parizeau's proposals?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the one hand the hon. member speaks of negotiating and on the other of accepting. Clearly, we are favourable to having negotiations. To wit, the federal Minister of Finance negotiated for three weeks with his provincial counterparts, including Mr. Parizeau. It so happens that Mr. Parizeau was unable to give an answer.

So, we did negotiate, and they could not give us a reply. As pointed out by Mr. Chrétien, our finance minister, now that the game is over Mr. Parizeau comes out on the ice and wants to score points. We find that a strange way of negotiating. Still, despite that we have continued to try and find a solution, for the objective of the government is very clear: we want to make sure the Quebec government is not penalized through the fault of that particular government; we have always stated clearly that the money involved would go to Quebeckers one way or another. The problems lies with whether Mr. Parizeau can negotiate as we did with him, that is, in good faith, and as we did with all the other provinces.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Considering that the sales tax remains a matter of provincial jurisdiction and that last week the entire opposition in the National Assembly, which includes the Liberal party, supported Mr. Parizeau's proposal, are you accusing those people at the provincial level of encouraging the separatist option, much as you accused us in the opposition here in Ottawa last week?

Mr. Trudeau: Well no, Mr. Speaker. The provincial parties, whether in Quebec, in Alberta or in British Columbia, naturally offer a provincial point of view, and that is not only their right, but also in their interest. On the other hand, the federal government—and I would have thought that the opposition would agree—offers a national point of view. That is what we attempted to do by saying: Of course this tax comes under provincial jurisdiction. We want to cut federal taxes, which we can very well do in our sphere of responsibility, but for once let us try to do so jointly. We acted jointly with nine out of ten provinces, the tenth having failed to reply. So the federal government cannot be accused of refusing to negotiate. It was Mr. Parizeau who let the nine other provinces and the federal government arrive at an agreement which was acceptable to all and who then said: Now that everyone has had his turn, I have something else to say. We will continue to negotiate with him. I repeat, the federal government will take the necessary action so that Quebec taxpayers do not lose a cent because of Mr. Parizeau's desire to make federalism impossible.

CANADIAN POSITION AT GATT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I got off my sick bed to come here, so I cannot shout.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: Speak up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: In the minister's recent budget he continued certain tariff reductions that were made in 1972 by Mr. Turner, who made these reductions on grounds that he wanted to wrestle the cost of inflation to the ground. The minister continued in his recent budget of 1978. Could the minister tell us, did he get any quid pro quo, or did his colleagues attempt to get any quid pro quo from the nations negotiating at Geneva in this GATT round for his continuation of these cuts, which he was not required to do? Did we get any quid pro quo in return?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we take into account all factors in the negotiations. Those cuts are on a temporary basis for Canada, they are not permanent, so they are still part of the package which we can offer at the Geneva negotiations. I think the hon. member can now go back to his bed.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I will not tell the minister and the government where they should go; that is obvious.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Crosbie: In connection with these tariff reductions, one industry, the coffin and casket industry—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —had its tariff reduced from 22.5 per cent to 15 per cent. Has the minister received any representations because, as a result, 300 jobs have been lost and there has been a large increase in the number of coffins and caskets imported—for the government, probably, after the next election—and will he consider some additional protection for industries such as this which manufacture here in Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if we look at the people in this House who have tended to encourage that type of operation, caskets, in the last 15 years in the House I think they have bought many more than we have bought. I have not received any specific recommendation from the hon. member or otherwise.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Just try to get into a Japanese casket and see how you like it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPROVE GRAIN HANDLING

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a couple of questions to the Minister of Transport, who is also in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, regarding our future prospects for grain movement and sales. The United States Department of Agriculture foreign magazine of yesterday says that Canada, which is China's largest traditional supplier, is experiencing transportation tie-ups in moving grain for export, and that in any event Canada may not be in a position to supply the import needs of the People's Republic of China through November of 1978.

Is there any accuracy in that statement by the United States Department of Agriculture? If so, what measures is the minister taking to increase grain movement and grain supply of the grades and kinds which are wanted by the Canadian Wheat Board and by the Chinese, and will he be recommending to prairie grain producers that they maximize their seeding acreages this spring?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the nature of our very large sales did lead us on March 1 to indicate to farmers the great opportunities there were for them to produce wheat, Durum and other grains. It is true that the selling program of the Canadian Wheat Board has advanced so far that it has not very much more space for sales, having regard to supplies as well as transportation and port facilities.

In setting a likely record of, for example, 850 million bushels for export this year we may be getting close to what we actually can move out of the country during the course of a year. That, of course, happens to be the total of the 1977 crop available for export, plus 150 million bushels out of that which was available from 1976. Our objective, however, is to continue to encourage production and farming techniques which result in it. The increased storage in Vancouver which is now under construction will be a major help, as will the very important facilities which we expect to see under construction in Prince Rupert within a few months.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the likelihood—or it may be a fact—that China will require additional grain and may look to the United States for that rather than to Canada, has the minister received requests or urgings from the Canadian Wheat Board and others reminding him that 2,000 boxcars went out of service this year and that they are requesting 4,000 more hopper cars and funds for the refurbishing of 5,000 boxcars in order to keep up with the grain movement we would like to have for grain sales to China?

The second part of my question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that there were three parts to his first question. He is now on the second part of his second question, which really calls for some leniency.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to avoid asking for a second supplementary. Will the minister shorten the timeframe for the enlargement of storage facilities at Prince Rupert and allow for the use of the present capacity? We could double grain movement, with the present capacity at Prince Rupert, in order to enlarge shipments to places like China.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that we are looking at all alternatives including, of course, improvements to the existing terminal at Prince Rupert which we announced and which will be under way. We are looking at the question of the need for additional hopper cars. We have been very alert to that problem, and we furnished the first 8,000 hopper cars to move our grain.

We also have been prepared to look at every available facility, including bulk handling facilities on the west coast, and I am fairly satisfied that we can move our export capability up by another 50 million bushels, even with existing facilities but, clearly, we are looking to the future and will want to go even 100 million bushels over that figure.

EFFECT OF DEVALUED DOLLAR ON GRAIN SALES

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the same minister. In view of the fact that forward sales of Canadian wheat were based on the $1.03 dollar and our dollar is now down to 88 cents, which means a direct loss of 15 per cent to the wheat producers, I wonder when the minister will be able to say that future sales will be based on the 88-cent dollar.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is exactly wrong in his conclusions. Most of the sales of wheat are, indeed, priced in U.S. dollar terms, so that the 15 per cent change in the value of our dollar has produced an increase of 15 per cent, measured in Canadian dollar terms, to Canadian farmers. So they are far better off in the current circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

REOPENING OF SWORDFISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Judge Winston Arrow, of the United States district court in Pensacola, Florida, recently ruled in favour of a group of American swordfishermen who were charged with distributing swordfish which were supposed to contain excessive amounts of mercury, since under test the fish proved to contain less than one part per million of mercury.

Since the American food and drug directorate set the level of acceptable mercury in swordfish at five parts per million in 1969, has the minister made representations recently to Washington concerning the possibility of reopening the Canadian swordfishing industry, now it is evident that mercury levels in these fish are not harmful; and, if so, what was the result?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I know that conversations were held several weeks ago and I understand that they are going to continue. I will report to the hon. member.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

SCHEDULE FOR IMPROVING GRAIN HANDLING FACILITIES AT PRINCE RUPERT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Minister of Transport, who is also responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. He made reference a few moments ago to improvement of the port facilities at Prince Rupert. He said it would be a matter of months before that port would be capable of meeting its grain handling potential.

Can the minister tell the House what firm commitments have been made and what the construction schedule is? Is he not confusing the improvement of elevators there with the coal port which is being planned for the future?

• (1452)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not confusing wheat and coal; but the hon. member is mistaking what I said. I indicated that I would expect construction to begin in the near future in relation to the expansion at Prince Rupert. Indeed, we will be improving the existing elevator and that work will be coming forward very quickly. We will also be moving ahead with the site preparation on Ridley Island on the assumption that a new terminal building will be built there. There are active discussions taking place now involving the Alberta government and some of the grain companies in connection with that terminal, and I am hoping that will put together the necessary equity and investment for a major terminal on Ridley Island. Obviously, the construction phase of the major terminal will take two or three years, but the work will be under way very soon.

Mr. Oberle: Is it reasonable to assume that the minister has not yet made any firm commitments to contractors or shippers of grain in respect of the improvement of the elevator facilities and grain handling facilities at Prince Rupert?

Mr. Lang: The contracts in relation to the existing elevator are, of course, the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture. The contract preparations are under way. In the case of Wrigley Island, our first project is the engineering studies which are required in order to ensure that we are building the causeway and the rail facilities in the correct location. That work is about to get under way. The construction phase will obviously follow that engineering phase.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE FOR URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEMS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that this weekend the Ontario government began its urban transport improvement program with much needed renovations to Toronto's Union station, and because most necessary projected improvements cannot be completed, let alone started, as the result of this government's reneging on its 1974 election promise of $290 million for urban transit, a promise which was assumed to have been made in good faith—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Jelinek: —I would like to ask the minister whether or not, before he starts drafting new election promises, he would consider fulfilling at least part of his 1974 promise in order that urban transit projects in and around metropolitan Toronto and elsewhere can be completed?

[Mr. Oberle.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well aware of the fact that we have made available $230 million for the urban transportation assistance program, which included $100 million of new money on the commuter side. That was not all we had intended to do in our program in 1974, but in face of the severe fiscal restraint being required it was the conscious and careful decision of this government to cut back, particularly in this area where the prime responsibility is that of the province and municipalities. However, we are making $100 million of new money available, and a very flexible $230 million for the urban transportation assistance program.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answer, I would like to put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Last year the same government made grants available in the millions of dollars, one of which was for such an earth-shattering project as "to study the role of the harmonica in a social culture of each region of Canada".

In view of the serious need to improve urban transit systems in Toronto as well as in other parts of Canada, could the Prime Minister reconsider the priorities pertaining to the government's expenditures and assure the House that his 1974 election campaign promises, at least in the sense of urban transit, will be fulfilled?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the particular case quoted by the hon. member. I will look it up. I believe it must be a project under the Canada Works program and I suppose it is something that has been decided by a local council. I will look into this matter to see if the hon. member has a point.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REGULATIONS RESPECTING CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister gave a commitment to the House that National Revenue circular No. 78-3 restricting the activities of charitable organizations would be suspended. Since we have taken the Prime Minister at his word in this regard, will he now inform the House of the nature of the communication that has been sent to the 36,000 registered charitable organizations in this country indicating that this circular is no longer in effect, that it has been suspended?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the members of the public who are interested in this debate have heard my words of yesterday. They have heard, also, the explanations I gave—which I repeat now—that this circular was meant to help charitable organizations by indicating to them what the courts had decided on the basis of the law. I repeat what I said yesterday, that if the charitable organizations do not want to be guided by this circular, they do not have to be.

It is put out as a service to them, not as a statement of the law or even as guidance under the law. It is put out as a service to those charitable organizations which asked the previous minister of national revenue if he would issue such guidance for their information. If they do not want to be guided by it, they do not have to be. I repeat my statement of yesterday, that in the last resort it is the courts which will decide what the law says.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister what action he has taken to put his suspension order into effect, because the Prime Minister knows that it is not enough just to say it is suspended and something will vanish. If that were the case, he could have said the same thing long ago, no doubt, about unemployment and inflation. Because of the concern and the confusion that his comments of yesterday have created, what actual steps have been taken to put this order into effect? Has he at least been in touch with the Minister of National Revenue, who is out of reach of this chamber, to instruct him to put his order suspending this circular into effect?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Following yesterday's debate, I did ensure that the Department of National Revenue would be informed of the debate in the House and they would take whatever action is necessary. I said in the House yesterday that if it were in my power to suspend the document, I would suspend it. I went on to say that suspending such a document only has meaning for those who do not want to ask for help from the department in guiding them on whether or not they are charitable organizations.

The House must understand that many charitable organizations do things through inadvertence which are interpreted as political activity and which might disqualify them from exemptions. I understand that these organizations go to the department and ask for guidance. When they are told that certain actions have been judged under the law as disqualifying them as charitable organizations, they cease those activities and then are able to qualify; they are not penalized. Once again, the Department of National Revenue's duty is to help citizens to understand the law, and this is exactly what the circular is meant for. If some citizens do not consider it helpful, they can consider it suspended.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR DEBATE ON BANK ACT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): What the Prime Minister is saying, sir, is that the new document which was suspended yesterday is in effect today. In other words, he is being as consistent in this matter as he was in the question of controls when he betrayed the Canadian people in the 1974 election campaign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question, sir, is for the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: First, the Leader of the Opposition forces his lady member to sit down; then he addresses a question to me; then he addresses one to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Go and see the Governor General.

Mr. Speaker: I recognized the Leader of the Opposition and I will let him pursue his question; but it stretches the point to put a preamble to one minister and a question to another.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I will wait until there is quiet in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My question to the Minister of Finance, if I can get some order on that side of the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are not in church, Joe.

Mr. Clark: —relates to economic policy and to the opportunity of the House of Commons to consider some economic measures. I wonder if the Minister of Finance can tell the House when he intends to introduce to the House for debate the Bank Act which this government has been deliberately delaying in the hope of avoiding revealing its intentions before an election campaign, and when might we expect to have before the House the necessary amendments to the Income Tax Act arising from the budget?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, last week I gave the answer that we were waiting for the French translation of the bill. The bill is now in front of the cabinet. I hope that within a matter of weeks—

Some hon. Members: Weeks?

Mr. Chrétien: —a maximum of couple of a weeks, to be able to table the bill. So far as the other bill is concerned, I will be discussing it with the House leader and will bring it in as quickly as possible.

Mr. Clark: It raises some intriguing questions as to why a bill, on which the policy has already been decided, which has been drafted and translated, will take a matter of weeks to get through the cabinet, although with this cabinet I can understand that it takes the simplest thing a long time to get through.

• (1502)

Mr. Clark: So that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs might not be denied an opportunity, even if the entire House is denied an opportunity to deal with economic policy, would the minister be prerared to make an immediate reference of the annual economic review of his department to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will follow the usual procedure about those things. I will be appearing before the committee of the House on Thursday afternoon, at which time hon. members of the opposition can ask me questions. Also, I have agreed to be present at another meeting next week or the week after; I do not know. I am accepting the invitation of the committee. If they want more work in front of them, certainly I am able to send some more over to them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. STANFIELD—SURVEILLANCE OF CANDIDATES SEEKING PUBLIC OFFICE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On Friday I indicated some preliminary reasons for disposing of the motion originally put by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). Also I made some remarks about the basic nature of the subject raised in the motion. I believe the hon. member for Halifax is ready to make further representations.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to follow the discussion in the House on Friday, particularly relating to the question of privilege which I raised originally last Wednesday. At that time I indicated I would be prepared to bring a motion on Thursday, which I did. On Friday there was a discussion concerning that motion, at which time Your Honour expressed some views.

On Friday Your Honour indicated that the motion I presented could not be regarded as being in order. At least that was your disposition at that time. It could not be considered in order, because on Friday the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) denied that he took the position the McDonald commission was the only appropriate place for this question to be dealt with, rather than the House. Your Honour indicated that this had become a question of fact, and still remained a question on that point, and could not be regarded as a question of privilege. Certainly I do not quarrel with Your Honour's ruling in that regard.

When I raised the question of privilege on Wednesday, it seemed to me that the Solicitor General was taking the exact position of which I had accused him. On that point, I am content he backed away from that position. On Friday in the House he indicated quite explicitly that he was not standing by that position. He was not contending that the House was not entitled to information. Indeed, he put some information before the House. He was not contending that the McDonald commission was the only appropriate place for this question to be considered. I am happy the Solicitor General departed from the very hard line which he took on last Wednesday, when I raised my question of privilege.

As the matter now stands, in the minister's judgment and the judgment of everyone else it is very clear the House is not precluded from inquiring into this type of question on the grounds it is a security matter, when in fact it touches upon some very fundamental rights and concerns of members of parliament. I take it that is now settled.

As reported at page 4977 of Hansard dated April 28, 1978, Your Honour indicated the following:

> The difficulty for the Chair is that that procedural problem does not set aside the basic problem that rests at the core of this matter, which may now come to light, or it may not, I do not know. However, the contributions that have been made now indicate that there may be some regime in existence which may be offensive to members and which they may want to put in the form of some motion.

Your Honour indicated that my motion would have to be set aside on procedural grounds.

Following an intervention by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), Your Honour is reported as saying the following:

> The only other step that I had in mind would be to set aside this particular motion on procedural grounds, without prejudice to the right of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), or for that matter to any other member, to reintroduce a motion on the same subject. I do not have to take that step now, however, but I wanted to indicate my thinking on it.

The discussion was suspended until today by Your Honour. If it is believed that there is in fact a prima facie case, I would be prepared to move:

> That the matter of the surveillance by the security forces of candidates at general elections be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in order that the committee can determine and report upon the extent of and criteria for such surveillance.

In other words, while the Solicitor General and others have eased our concerns in some respects, still those concerns are very fundamental. I am not referring to the refusal of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to tell the House clearly what the instructions of the government were to the security forces following the invocation of the War Measures Act, at which time the government asked the security forces to give more attention to internal subversion. We sought those instructions, but we have not been able to get them. However, that is not the point I am making this afternoon.

Instructions within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to certain designated personnel, relating to the surveillance of candidates in elections, came to light last week. On Friday the minister indicated that in fact the RCMP does not exercise any surveillance. If they check the list of candidates and find a name which is already in their files, then they become interested and place it in their files. Some of us are quite concerned about the security forces' definition of the words "subversive", "security risk" or "security interest" in this connection. From this document, it seems to be very broadly conceived as genuine. It relates to candidates; in some to their agents; and in other cases to their contributors. It includes any candidate who is considered to be a separatist, whether he is a subversive, separatist, or otherwise. Our concern is that we just do not know how sweeping is the definition of "subversive".

Also, the document refers to government requirements. It points out the request for names of nominated candidates is not so much directly for security purposes as it is to meet certain statistical requirements and government requirements. I do not know what the term "government requirements" means in that connection.

I do not know what the RCM Police do with this information when they find somebody who is in one of their files and who has been nominated as a candidate. What do they do with that? Why do they have this particular interest in that file? If somebody is nominated and they feel he is a security risk, what happens after that? Do they merely make up a file and that is as far as it goes, or is some initiative taken in the course of the campaign? I do not know, but I do not like the way matters stand.

As I say, there is a question in this document of the broad definition of security risk; there is a question of what is meant by government requirements, which are referred to as the reason for these instructions, and there is to me the very disturbing question as to what happens in connection with a candidate when his name is found to be on one of their files. With respect, sir, these have to be matters of concern to this House, and I think the existence of the document and these instructions do impinge upon the privileges of this House. This issue should be clarified by being referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. If you believe I have a prima facie ground for doing this, sir, I would so move.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I intend to add very little to what was said in this debate on Friday by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) has referred to the War Measures Act and the events of 1970 in a way which would, once again, reinforce the impression that was earlier erroneously given that somehow these instructions were given to the police as a result of those events.

I would like to repeat what was made abundantly clear, it seems to me, on Friday in the House, but in the absence of the hon. member for Halifax. It was made abundantly clear that this practice has been going on for at least 30 years, that it has been the practice of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to be performing such duties before elections at various levels of government administration. Therefore, the practice existed not only under my predecessor but under the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, under Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Mackenzie King.

While the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has criticized our attitude, that the government of the day should not be involved in the day-to-day operations of the police, I do remember him saying that when he was Prime Minister he knew everything which was going on in the police. He is not here to speak today, but I merely make that suggestion, and he may want to deal with this point at some other time. However, if he is correct in saying that he knew everything that was going on, presumably he knew about these instructions.

I can say unequivocally that I did not know, because I do not make it a practice, as the House well knows, to involve myself in the day-to-day operations of the RCMP. Either the right hon. gentleman knew about it or he did not, but the point is it has been a practice for at least 30 years, in spite of successive administrations. However, I have been able to give the assurance and to repeat it unequivocally, that no member in this House, since I have been Prime Minister, has been the object of security surveillance without his consent, and in so far as it concerns the members of this House there is obviously no question of privilege. In so far as the practice in general is concerned, it would seem to me that, since it has been going on for at least 30 years, the proper course would be not to make it the subject of partisan debate but to refer these concerns to the royal commission.

Mr. Blais: They already have.

Mr. Trudeau: I am told, Mr. Speaker, by the Solicitor General that they already have been referred, and as a matter of fact I believe that the existence of this practice was made known to the McDonald commission.

I realize the urgency in the minds of the members to get to the bottom of this. I repeat, if it has been going on for 30 years without prejudice to the members of this House, one would think that it would be to the advantage—

Mr. Fraser: How can you say "without prejudice"?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member from Vancouver asks how I can say "without prejudice." I repeat, no member of this House, since I have been Prime Minister, has been the object of electronic surveillance by the RCMP in security matters.

Mr. Fraser: To your knowledge.

Mr. Trudeau: The words are to my knowledge. I have that knowledge from the commissioner of the RCMP. If the hon. gentleman from Vancouver wishes to question that gentleman's word, then of course that is his right. It seems to me—

Mr. Fraser: You also told us that that break-in was an isolated event.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of matter which should be referred to the McDonald commission, and that is what we propose to do.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I join in this important discussion, Mr. Speaker, following what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) just had to say. It seems to me that the Prime Minister has made two points. The first one concerns the duration of time that this kind of practice may have been in existence. With all due respect to the source, the duration of time, sir, is beside the point. If something has been going on for 30 years which has been pernicious in any way in its influence, whether or not it has become public knowledge, that is no reason to legitimize or perpetuate such a circumstance.

We all know, taking something out of the history of our country and going back into that time-frame, that the Government of Canada took a certain course of action toward Canadians of Japanese ancestry during World War II that was anything but reputable to those who concerned with civil liberties. At that time certain candidates for political office, and indeed certain members of parliament, came to the defence of those Canadians of Japanese ancestry. What the Prime Minister has had to say does not offer any persuasive evidence at all for us to abandon the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). Indeed, there may well have been some kind of action taken toward the candidates for office at that time, whether they were elected or not. It is something that is worth while for members of the House as it is presently constituted to consider within the framework of its present practices. The argument that the Prime Minister has made with reference to past practice is not one of substance or germane to the issue as raised by the hon. member for Halifax.

The central question is the loose definition and broad concept given to subversive or wrong activity to legitimize this kind of activity by the police forces in Canada. Without repeating the fine argument that has already been made by the hon. member for Halifax, on behalf of my colleagues I would like to lend the strongest possible, unequivocal support to the view that he expressed. If you do find there is a prima facie case that has been made out by the member for Halifax, quite independent of what the McDonald inquiry should decide to do with this matter—and it should look into it as well—it seems to me that the members of the present House have a real obligation to exercise their responsibility representing all parties to look into this matter.

I listened to the words of the Prime Minister with care when he talked this afternoon about surveillance, because in his earlier comments he said that he had given assurances that since he has been Prime Minister there had been no surveillance of members of the House. I listened, because I know that that is not the record. The record of the Prime Minister has been that there is no electronic surveillance that has been undertaken, and that is quite a different notion. Later in his comments this afternoon he corrected himself when he made reference to surveillance of present members and he said there was no electronic surveillance. I submit, sir, that even the government's position vis-à-vis the issue of surveillance of present members is at the very least ambiguous. Mr. Speaker, I conclude by repeating what I said a few minutes ago, that we support the case made by the hon. member for Halifax 100 per cent.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I shall try not to impose upon you or repeat the argument I made last Friday when the subject was a different motion. The arguments made then were rather forceful and I hope were of assistance to you.

I want to deal briefly with two or three points. The first of these was discussed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), and that is the assurance that no member of the House has been the subject of electronic surveillance since 1968. I am not quite sure if that is the issue and whether it should be conclusive in preventing you from finding a prima facie question of privilege. There has been a question about that assurance as it relates to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) and to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) who were alleged to have been the subject of such electronic surveillance. We had a question of privilege on that matter as it related to the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and it was voted upon.

If I understand the submission of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) correctly it is that, having confirmed the existence of a document, one defence to a prima facie question of privilege was the sensitive nature of that document or documents. I do not believe that is a defence to finding that there is a prima facie question of privilege. There is a certain sensitivity, but I think all of us would acknowledge that it has nothing to do with the question of whether our rights and privileges have been affected. Indeed, there are ways of handling that sensitivity which are well known to Your Honour.

We have, apparently, a cross check between the names of political candidates and certain lists of persons believed to be members of subversive groups or who are alleged to have participated in subversive activities.

On Friday the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) made a special point of saying that no one is immune, and I quite agree. I would argue, however, that this is not the issue. There may be other documents and other manuals relating to union leaders, businessmen, municipal leaders, and all kinds of people, but each of those groups has its own remedies. Those remedies may be political or they may be legal. Our remedy, sir, is to appeal to you, because there is this one manual apparently directed solely to a certain group who happen to be political candidates. Your Honour is not asked to deal with union leaders or business leaders and, if I were to intervene on their behalf, I would have no question of privilege. As their spokesman, other remedies would be available to me. Our only remedy, however, is to appeal to you as protector of our rights and privileges.

What I pose as an ancillary to the question put to you by my hon. friend from Halifax is the criteria used in putting these names on a certain list—not what names are there but on what basis they were selected, against which list political candidates are checked. It seems to me that not knowing the criteria might assist you in finding a prima facie case. In other words, doubt about what that criteria might be, might assist Your Honour.

In my submission, the fact that this has been a practice for 30 years is irrelevant. No one knows what criteria have been used over that 30 years or whether they have changed from prime minister to prime minister or from commissioner to commissioner. The fact that the practice has developed over 30 years has nothing to do with the question of whether our rights and privileges may be affected.

We have no idea what criteria are used to put a certain name on a list against which the name of a candidate for political office may be checked to find if he belongs to a subversive group or has engaged in subversive activities, to use the words of the Solicitor General. Therefore, the assurance given by the Solicitor General on Friday about how the manual was used does not, in my view, affect the question of whether there is a question of privilege in this case.

Is Your Honour prepared to find that the threat of an impingement upon our rights is equal to an actual impingement? If there is a cloud over political candidates which may affect them, even though we cannot point to one candidate as the subject of electronic surveillance, is that threat sufficient for Your Honour to find there is a prima facie question of privilege? That is the ancillary argument I would put to the main argument advanced by the hon. member for Halifax.

In summary, sir, I reject the argument advanced by the Deputy Prime Minister on Friday to the effect that we seek special privileges. It is not special privileges we seek but a special forum in which we can look for redress or assistance when we think we have been affected. It is only in this House, and only through you, sir, that we can come to seek that special right.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, following the presentation of this new motion by the hon. member, it is clear that he refers to general surveillance. I think it is important, in the present debate, to point out that several speakers have suggested or, at least, seemed to have suggested that systematic surveillance has been exercised on candidates in federal elections.

Now, if we refer to the facts or to the evidence given by the Solicitor General or the Deputy Prime Minister in the House last Friday, we realize that this allegation is not true. At the outset of my argument, Mr. Speaker, I stated that this has been categorically denied by the Solicitor General and the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada.

Never have we said, on this side of the House, that all candidates have been subjected to systematic surveillance. What has indeed been mentioned is that it is verified whether or not a candidate has a record. Verification is not surveillance, Mr. Speaker. And being a candidate in a federal election does not automatically rule out verification as to whether he or she has a record and whether he or she represents a threat to the security of the state.

So I think that anyone anxious to enter into federal politics is not automatically exempt from simple and normal scrutiny applied to any Canadian citizen. Does the candidate for public office have a record containing facts suggesting that person may represent a threat to the security of the state? I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this does not constitute systematic surveillance of candidates, but rather a verification to know whether or not there is a record against that person.

My second point, Mr. Speaker, is in line with the first point I referred to. The Solicitor General of Canada has formally denied that any member of this House is the subject of any surveillance. If we take these two facts into account, first that there is no systematic surveillance of candidates, and second that no member of the House is the subject of any surveillance, I wonder how the privileges of hon. members can possibly be threatened or violated. If we are to hold a theoretical discussion on the way the RCMP arrives at its security standards about Canadian citizens, I submit we should not do so by way of a question of privilege before Parliament. Things would be different if one or more members of the House had been the subjects of surveillance. But that has been denied. So we have to take for granted what the Solicitor General says: no member of the House is the subject of surveillance. Therefore we cannot argue that the privileges of members are threatened or violated. As for electoral candidates, they do not come under any systematic surveillance but, as the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) said, it is a verification to know whether a candidate, who is an ordinary citizen, has a record.

Since this matter of checking on individuals in Canada, whether or not they are running for federal office, is now before an inquiry set up under an act of this Parliament—the McDonald commission was set up under the Public Inquiries Act, an act of this federal parliament, passed by us—since that inquiry is a valid, democratic institution whose purpose and mission is precisely to inquire into those situations, I say it would be a duplication to ask a committee of this House to check whether or not the RCMP has valid criteria on which to determine whether or not an individual who is a Canadian constitutes a risk to the security of the state.

The question the hon. member raises in his motion and his question of privilege is that of the criteria on which the police has to determine whether a candidate constitutes or not a danger for the state. Well, a candidate is not a member of parliament, Mr. Speaker. In this House we deal with questions of privilege affecting members of this House and not people who might become members of parliament. I say it would be a dangerous precedent and a dangerous departure to extend the notion of privilege of members to those who might one day become members of this House. I say that is not our role, that Canadian citizens are not above the law simply because they show an interest in running for federal office, and that on the very face of it the motion is not a prima facie case of encroachment upon the privileges of members. On the contrary, it does not refer to members of parliament but to candidates and to Canadians citizens under surveillance, something which was denied.

There is nothing in this House to indicate that systematic surveillance is being carried out, but rather an absolutely normal check on any Canadian citizen. For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, and those are basic issues of fact, I believe that no member here in this House considers that his privileges are being interfered with by an absolutely normal check made by the police on people who want to enter federal politics. For those reasons I say the motion should not be presented, is out of order and there is no breach of the privileges of members of parliament here.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate being able to make a short contribution to this question of privilege. Your Honour will have had time to evaluate the motion put by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), his submission to this debate as well as statements which were made on Friday in support of and against the hon. member's motion. It defies any rule of logic to listen to the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who said on Friday that members of parliament should have no special privilege in this regard, whereas his parliamentary secretary told us just now that members of parliament should have different privileges than has a candidate.

It would help us all if we were to look at the basis for the argument which is presented here, the definition of the words subversion or subversive. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has told us repeatedly that the definition of the term as it is applied here is derived from the definition given in the Official Secrets Act. The Official Secrets Act deals with the matter of subversion in four different categories: (a) espionage or sabotage; (b) foreign intelligence activities; (d) activities by a foreign power directed toward actual or potential attack, and (e) activities of a foreign terrorist group. I have omitted (c), which I suppose is the definition the Prime Minister relates to, that is to say, activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means.

Surely a candidate seeking election to the House of Commons is seeking to take part in a time-honoured democratic process. Is it the suggestion that members of parliament or candidates will resort to violence after they are elected, or during an election? Mr. Speaker, persons issuing directives to the RCMP to keep an eye on persons who offer themselves to this time-honoured democratic process must be attempting to subvert the political process if they are suggesting that a person who seeks office or seeks the confidence of his supporters could indeed resort to violence. It is an expression of non-confidence in the political process.

I do not know what process is carried out by the government party, but in my party there is a serious recruiting process carried on to attract people to run for office. Once these people have made the offer to run for office, the party executives in the various ridings learn more about this person before they offer their support. Following this there is a nomination meeting held where the general membership of the party again follows a process of evaluating the person they will support in the general election. Then there is the general election itself where all Canadians have the right and the responsibility to look at that person who will be representing them in this, the highest court in the land.

I will quote a statement made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) on Friday. He said:

> When the names of candidates seeking office become available to the security service . . .

We do not know how they become available to the security service but we assume that someone is responsible. Are we to believe the person in charge of elections in Canada provides the police with the names of all the candidates who have offered themselves for election? In any event, a list is made available to the RCMP.

The Solicitor General went on to say:

> . . . a name check is conducted against a list of persons known to belong to subversive groups . . .

And here again, Mr. Speaker, it is not a name check conducted against files held by the RCMP. The Solicitor General continued by saying:

> . . . or involved in subversive activities. If and when a candidate is positively identified as falling into that category, the fact of his candidacy is duly noted, and the security service continues to be legitimately interested in his or her activities.

I presume those activities might eventually be the duties of a member of parliament.

When the Solicitor General speaks about lists, I cannot, of course, overlook the fact that this House has been preoccupied with the existence of lists. As well, I cannot overlook the fact that in the last week we have been preoccupied with a certain practice within the Solicitor General's office during the tenure of one certain solicitor general who happens to be in the House at the moment. This practice was to compile lists, and a concept called extra parliamentary opposition was very much in evidence.

That brings me to the statement the Prime Minister made a few moments ago, as well on previous occasions, when he said the practice of surveillance has been going on for 30 years. But never before, under no other administration, was there a capacity within the Solicitor General's office of the type that we have now, the security and analysis group, which has access to these lists. As we all know, they have not only kept these lists for the purpose which was identified by the Solicitor General last Friday, but they have circulated these lists to other departments of government. These lists have become public knowledge.

When the President of Privy Council tells us that members of parliament should have no special privilege, he is very much confused. He says that members of parliament should not be on these lists but other people may. There are other lists which are made up of union leaders, when unions have been under surveillance, and native leaders who have been under surveillance. I could name these lists, but I do not intend to do so here. However, I will do so on another occasion. There has been surveillance of student leaders on campuses, and surveillance of public servants.

If one relates this situation to actual personalities there is the example of a person by the name of Walter Rudnicki, whose name happened to be on one of these lists. He is very much interested in the political process. He may want to offer his name to compete in an election. The question arises, what will happen when the police find his name on the list? Also, what will happen when they find his name on the list in which he was identified as a subversive, a person who by illegal and violent means wishes to overthrow this government? That is the difference to which we have to address ourselves.

We have here a unique opportunity to raise these matters which are very sensitive and crucial. In my case it has become a very emotional issue. I still today have information about some of these matters which I have not yet brought to the attention of the McDonald Royal Commission. I find it distasteful to bring this to the attention of the public, either in the House of Commons or outside.

I desperately want to be provided with a forum and an opportunity to tell all I know. What better time and way to do that than by an internal inquiry? If this matter is referred to the committee and the motion of the hon. member for Halifax is accepted, I suggest that some of the hearings and meetings might well be held in camera. People like myself and some of my colleagues could then bring these matters to the attention of our friends and colleagues in the House of Commons. We could once and for all take the necessary remedial actions and measures to clean up what I consider to be a very critical, distasteful, and ugly mess, a sort of monster which has the potential of becoming unmanageable. This should be done at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct your attention to the principal issue before you, the question of whether the rights of members of parliament have been violated as a result of the release of this particular document. Surely the overwhelming fact is that a candidate and member of parliament are one and the same thing during the time that an election takes place.

If I could direct Your Honour's attention to that fact, that is prima facie evidence that the surveillance techniques were putting members of parliament under surveillance. Perhaps you might wish to argue about people who are not members of parliament, those who are merely candidates, and I do not say they should be put under surveillance, because they should not. The key issue is whether there is a prima facie case against members of parliament.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that you direct your attention to the law, which is that a member of parliament continues to be a member of parliament after an election is called. Therefore, the documents that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) has referred to clearly refer to the surveillance of members of parliament.

We have ample precedent before us. That is the question which arose from the surveillance of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). The facts in that case were that a sworn affidavit by one Warren Hart said (a) "I was directed by the RCMP" and (b) "I placed the hon. member for Nickel Belt under surveillance." Therefore, that was found to be a prima facie case of an interference with the normal rights and privileges of a member of parliament.

In that case, as Your Honour so well put it, it was of such importance, with the new kinds of electronic techniques that have been developed, that Your Honour felt it was a matter that should be dealt with by the House. In that instance Your Honour saw fit to put the motion before the House. This House, to its eternal shame, turned down that motion. The Liberal whips got on the job and decided that the motion Your Honour decided to put before this House should not be referred to a committee.

I am willing to accept the assurances of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). That is my job as a member of parliament. However, I find it deeply suspicious, with a motion put in the circumstances which the hon. member for Nickel Belt was faced with, when this Liberal government, with some notable exceptions I see who are here, would not allow an inquiry, even an inquiry to determine whether his rights had been violated.

We heard some rhetoric from the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) on Friday, rhetoric about members of parliament seeking to expand their rights as a result of this. The rights of a member of parliament are traditional, to protect his constituents from oppression. The rights of a member of parliament are a direct result of an attempt by a democracy to protect itself from the agents of the Crown. That is what the rights of a member of parliament are all about.

No one is standing in this House trying to expand the rights of a member of parliament on some kind of personal basis. We are trying to protect our constituents from oppression by the state. That is what we are doing. If, in doing that job, Your Honour finds a prima facie case, and I submit there is an overwhelming prima facie case here to put the motion, because the documents speak for themselves that in fact there is direction to the RCMP to place members of parliament under surveillance, then there is no other way those documents can be interpreted or read. Some members of parliament must have been placed under surveillance.

How then can this House be denied at least the opportunity to inquire as to whether those rights have been interfered with? Is this government going to deny that? We should at least have the opportunity to see if its members have the courage to stand up again and say they will not allow us even to look at this particular subject as members of parliament.

I submit there is an overwhelming prima facie case that an instruction was given to the RCMP to put members of parliament under surveillance; admittedly, the evidence is, if they have information on a particular member. However, that is an interference with the right of a member of parliament to do the traditional thing that he must, which is to have the freedom to represent his constituents.

As I say, the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt was prima facie. It was direct. In fact it was substantiated by an affidavit wherein Mr. Warren Hart said he was willing to spend 14 years in jail as a—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made some reference to that argument which is one that has served its purpose in the past. It has a rather limited application to this particular case. We really ought to stick to the facts of this case.

Mr. Leggatt: Getting back to the question at hand, Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate that you might have some difficulty with persons who are not members of parliament who could allegedly come under surveillance under the guidelines that the hon. member for Halifax mentioned. However, the argument that somehow there is another forum looking into that is a false argument. If Your Honour would simply examine its terms of reference, you see it has no jurisdiction to inquire into the rights of members of parliament in this place.

There is no other forum that can examine the rights of a member of parliament other than this forum, the highest court in the land. If Your Honour were tempted to accept the argument of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister that there is a forum that is examining this subject, therefore let them do it, I say that is a specious and false argument. Your Honour has pointed that out many times in the past. In fact the rights of members of parliament must be determined in this place, not by the McDonald inquiry. Therefore, I would urge you to reject that kind of argument in terms of the material which has been placed before you.

I submit again there is a very strong prima facie case based upon the fact that by law a member of parliament continues to be a member of parliament during a campaign. There is a directive to the police forces of this country to place certain members under surveillance. It is therefore the duty of this House to determine the extent of that surveillance to protect the rights, not of members of parliament, but of the people of Canada.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest, as I am sure you did as well as other members of the House, to the arguments put forward, both pro and con, on the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). I want to be brief, but I do not want my brevity to indicate any lack of sincere concern about the gravity of this motion.

I want to join with those of my colleagues who have rejected the proposition put by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) when he suggested that the purpose behind a motion of this kind is that we, as members of parliament, are trying to expand our rights individually. Nothing could be farther from the truth, and the Deputy Prime Minister knows full well that what is of interest and importance here is the requirement that we must always try to expand, not upon the rights of individual members of parliament, but the rights of the individual citizens of our country who is indeed deeply affected by the possibility of surveillance of the democratic process.

I want to distile as much as I can the facts which I think Your Honour must consider. There has been in a document an unequivocal admission of surveillance with respect to candidates for office, and I say that Your Honour's role will be to determine whether parliament and its rights as an institution and the rights of members of parliament are affected by the existence of this kind of practice within the security service.

The affirmations made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Deputy Prime Minister, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) that within their knowledge no present member of parliament has been the subject of surveillance simply begs the issue. It is clearly admitted that candidates have been under surveillance. It is clearly admitted by the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister, and the Solicitor General that the information they have has been given to them by other parties. What I am saying is that the way these hon. gentlemen have framed their statements with respect to members of parliament indicates a qualification, and the point I think important is that if there is a question of degree or any qualification to the statements made by the Prime Minister today, for example, it is incumbent upon Your Honour to allow this motion to go before the House so that the committee can determine by cross-examination of those involved, by examination of documents, and by the introduction of witnesses—the proper forum would be a committee of this House and not the McDonald commission—whether or not there has been a direct or indirect operation affecting the rights and privileges of members of parliament.

I think Your Honour has to judge whether the statements made by the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister, and the Solicitor General somehow render this whole proposition invalid because they have given their word that no member of parliament has been under surveillance. However, I think Your Honour should also consider a very recent exception which I think the Prime Minister himself would have to agree was considered sufficiently strong to allow Your Honour to put a motion with respect to the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). Allegations were made about the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) regarding accidental or incidental surveillance. It was surveillance, nonetheless.

The point I want to make is that the House of Commons has a responsibility, in the interest of democracy within Canada, to ensure that people presenting themselves as candidates, particularly at this time when we are looking forward within the next year to an election—I gather—are protected. The fact of the matter is that we should be more cognizant now and make ourselves more aware of any limitation upon candidates, because a limitation upon candidacy for parliament is a limitation upon parliament.

In conclusion—and I am attempting to be brief—I am very unhappy to hear rhetoric about how members of parliament are trying to protect themselves against prosecution and about how we are above the law. There are many examples of sitting members of parliament in the Mother of Parliaments, and in this parliament, who, when found to have contravened official secrets acts, have been prosecuted and imprisoned or suffered whatever penalties there were in the existing law. I say that that is not at all relevant. The relevant thing for your Honour to consider is whether we in parliament are being limited in any way in the performance of our duties by this operation. A full examination is required, and I strongly support the position put forward by the hon. member for Halifax in his motion.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, in saying a few words about this important matter I would like to identify myself with what was said by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). As many hon. members have stated, this is the highest court in the land, and there have been many words of legal art or jurisprudence spoken here today, but one of the things hon. members to my knowledge have not mentioned this afternoon is the doctrine with which you, sir, being a distinguished counsel, are very familiar, and that is the doctrine of benefit of doubt.

It seems to me that the perception is growing among members of the public, and perhaps among members of the House of Commons, that this House is abandoning much of its jurisdiction, to stick with legal terminology, and leaving it to the McDonald commission. Surely we cannot permit ourselves as members of parliament to allow things as sensitive as the rights and privileges of ourselves to be considered exclusively by the McDonald commission. I see no reason why the McDonald commission might not have concurrent jurisdiction, but I see no merit at all in the contention that somehow it has exclusive jurisdiction.

I was interested in the remarks of the parliamentary secretary, who stated that we should take the assurances of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) that everything was all right. Without meaning any disrespect to the Solicitor General—and this has already been pointed out this afternoon—the Solicitor General may not know. He may in good faith say that certain things are true, but he may not know because he may be misinformed. It was suggested by the predecessor of the Solicitor General at the time of the Hart affair that perhaps things were kept from him. I think this was attributed at one point to the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand). I wish he were here to confirm that. When the present Solicitor General was postmaster general as Your Honour well recalls, he stood in his place in the House and said that mail was never opened, and your Honour will also recall the look of amazement on his face when the then solicitor general said that indeed it had been opened. That is fresh in the recollections of all of us.

So I say to you, sir, that there is no comfort in the fact that the Solicitor General may say that everything is all right. He may be perfectly entitled to do so on the basis of the information he has but, as in the past, it may very well be that he does not have enough information.

The parliamentary secretary also said something to the effect that perhaps the surveillance was not systematic. It may have been only general and occasional. Again, with respect, the best judge of that will be the evidence brought, hopefully, before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Surely as members of parliament we have the right to extract evidence which affects all of us. Surely it must be relevant to consider the performance of the McDonald commission on a matter which has been referred to it, and I will not belabour this because Your Honour has indicated that you do not want much said about it because it has already been argued.

However, to the best of my knowledge the McDonald commission has not taken any meaningful steps, apart from one trip to Washington to make arrangements to take Mr. Hart's testimony, in getting to the bottom of this very important matter. We have a situation where the government is voting down a very important question of privilege. One of the arguments is that the McDonald commission will be looking into it, but based on its track record and performance so far I have yet to see very much indication that the commission is seriously interested in pursuing this particular matter.

In conclusion, I strongly support the motion of the hon. member for Halifax. Without repeating them, I would like to identify myself with the arguments which have been made. I suggest to you, sir, coming back to the proposition that this is the highest court in the land, that surely there is a place for the benefit of the doubt, surely there is an argument to be made for the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to develop jurisprudence in sensitive matters, particularly now when we have the added dimension of television in the House, particularly when this committee is made up of members of parliament who have a particular and unique appreciation of what it means to be candidates and to be members of parliament because, again coming back, with all respect, to something that the parliamentary secretary said, no member ever came to this place who did not at one time offer himself as a candidate. It is pretty artificial to try to make a valid distinction, particularly at election time, between members of parliament and candidates. We all come in the same way, some of us leave by different routes, but at the same time I think this is not a valid distinction.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, as this debate is going on, it is easy to understand the significance of the statement published in the Toronto Globe and Mail a few days ago and the question of privilege and the motion raised in this House by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). We realize this is a very important issue which I think concerns not only hon. members but also all those who seek or will soon be seeking office.

I disagree completely with the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to the effect that no member is or has been under surveillance since his or her election, but he made a difference between elected members and candidates. Mr. Speaker, I believe that all official political parties must select their candidates according to their own criteria. It has been said, rightly so I believe, that we should do our utmost to attract good candidates who could use their qualifications to improve the administration of public affairs in the Parliament of Canada. Mr. Speaker, if those candidates who are not or have never been elected feel they might be under surveillance by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for any reason, those people will avoid running for a political party knowing that they would be exposed to that kind of trouble.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said on April 28, and I agree with him, that it was very difficult to give an accurate interpretation of the word "subversive", but who among the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and those responsible for that police force is going to define "subversion"? Who is going to define the word "subversive"? They say in certain circles that someone subversive might attempt to destroy the basis of the society and the economy of a country. If this is the definition of the word "subversive", the Prime Minister, his cabinet colleagues and all Liberal members could be accused of being subversive if we consider the situation presently facing Canada. Canada being on the verge of bankruptcy, they could be accused of being subversive because they attempted to undermine the economic basis of Canada and destroy the Canadian economy.

So who is going to establish the definition of the word "subversion"; it is a serious risk. Some policemen can believe that the actions of certain persons might represent a danger for the government. For others, it might not be the case, but we have been told that there has been a manual since 1970. We have been told also that this surveillance system has existed since the mid forties. I suppose it was established following the events that occurred in 1946.

Mr. Speaker, we should be very careful with that decision and I do not think it is wise to use the McDonald Inquiry Commission as an excuse and say that it will study all that situation, and I think that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or another committee of the House should be in charge of reviewing the matter and throw light on that subject and inform the House of Commons and all members and all political parties of the situation. So I agree completely with the motion moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and I think it should be adopted.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this motion derives its importance from the fact that it relates to the basic freedoms we must protect as representatives of the public here in the House. Mr. Speaker, when we stand up for ourselves as members of parliament and of course as candidates initially, we are standing up for public rights as such. Of course we recognize that order and social peace are necessary and therefore there must be laws and police corps to maintain them.

Mr. Speaker, we know particularly from the experience in some countries that we must be wary of any regime which would let its police establish an embryo of dictature, and without wanting to make things look worse than they already are, we must nevertheless admit that we have here in Canada an embryo of police state and, in this respect, I would have the same reservations as the right hon. Prime Minister had himself when he stated—I will if I may quote from an article published in the magazine Cité Libre of March 1961. That article is several years old, but I do not think the Prime Minister changes his opinions as he changes shirts. The Prime Minister then expressed his abhorrence for any type of police state. Referring to that article I wish to quote Pierre Elliott Trudeau, back in 1961:

> We do not have to ask ourselves what kind of fruit Jean Drapeau's party would give us: the strong supporter of today's nationalism has just made it known to the private bills committee that he prefers a police state to a state dominated by the criminal element. Not me, for against the criminal element I have the law on my side to put an end to its domination; but against the police and the kind of dictatorship it would support I could only rely on my freedom which would soon be lost.

Mr. Speaker, I will not go as far as the Prime Minister back then in saying that I prefer the criminal element to the police, I would simply say, Mr. Speaker, that I prefer the rule of justice, the rule of true freedom, that which gives the individual the possibility of evolving the way he wants towards the common good. There is presently no justification for interfering into the private life of an individual for whatever reason. This is what leads me to strongly support this motion.

Mr. Speaker, it is not because the Prime Minister denies it or because the Solicitor General said there has not been any surveillance or that other ministers say likewise that we must conclude that it never happened. This is not the first time this government has denied certain facts, Mr. Speaker. One must recall how lightheartedly, as recently as earlier this year, the former solicitor general, the member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) was saying certain things — and how he was eventually forced to say just the opposite. One must recall how strongly the then solicitor general denied the involvement of the RCMP in L'Agence de Presse Libre break-in in Montreal and that later it was proved it had actually happened. One must recall how strongly the ex-solicitor general denied that for several years the police had been carrying out infiltration activities till the time when he was compelled to confess it because the facts and circumstances had been ascertained.

So now when the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister claim that such things have not taken place, Mr. Speaker, it almost amounts to giving us the assurance that they actually happened. In defence of our constituents' freedoms, we have a duty to do everything in our power to prevent this country from becoming a police state, where our traditional freedoms would be hindered by all sorts of fears of interference from above into the individual's private affairs. This is so serious, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot allow these facts and circumstances to go unchallenged, without a committee of this House inquiring into the matter. We must know the motives, the reasons, the causes behind such a system of surveillance.

As evidenced by the Prime Minister's statement made earlier, and the confirmation from hon. members opposite, clearly the attempt is to sidestep the basic question with the suggestion there has been no electronic surveillance.

Mr. Speaker, the type of surveillance does not matter. We must know the real motives, the real reasons, the real causes for initiating as I said the makings of a police state, in this land we are so proud to call a free country. This government is responsible for that. We also have to know how to explain to the people the actions of this government. The suggestion that this has been done for 30 years is no answer. Those who have been in power for ten years, those who are perceived as the people in authority have no right to wash their hands of things so unacceptable. It is either one or the other, Mr. Speaker: either the Prime Minister and the government are responsible, and consequently they know what goes on in this country and are aware of what the police do, or they are not responsible, in which case it is high time we call upon the people to solve the problem democratically.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, we must know what the facts are and see clearly where we stand about this whole thing, so that the people can be guaranteed the most fundamental rights of freedom. Let us note once again, I want to stress the point, that there is a huge difference between the acts that interfere with freedom and the regular activity of a police force that is noble, worthy, that is simply keeping peace and order in a given society. It is all too difficult, as the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) pointed out, to try to determine where there is subversion, to leave it to the discretion of a government that has proved beyond any doubt that is the champion of disunity and discord in this country. The situation has come to that. It is none of our doing, but we know that the government failed in its responsibility and that at some point it felt it had to make up for its lack of real moral authority over the country, and so let the police perform acts that are clearly "antifreedom". There is nothing surprising about that, but it must disappear. It is becoming a sickness we must get rid of immediately to restore a wholesome and free climate in this country.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in this most fundamental question of privilege until the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) intervened this afternoon. I should like to make only a few comments because those who participated today—and I was not present in the House on Friday—certainly covered many of the points which give me concern.

In part answer to the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) indicated that, regardless of what the practice has been for the last 30 years, the creation of a security and analysis branch within the Department of the Solicitor General assumes a different character. That branch is to analyse and/or give direction from time to time respecting what was considered to be normal police practices up until the creation of the branch.

I have followed the debate, as well as reading Hansard dated April 28, 1978. Today the Prime Minister mentioned a practice which has been in existence for 30 years. As other hon. members have indicated this afternoon, that begs the question as to when these instructions were codified, and/or defined, and when they came into practice.

As we are all aware, there is no great fundamental final code which makes parliament tick. There is the British North America Act, as well as customs, traditions, and practices. Obviously there are practices respecting police work. I do not know what the situation was for the last 30 years. I was not a member of parliament 30 years ago. In those days there were prime ministers who paid their price by taking chances on many issues at the polls from time to time. Perhaps this was not an issue because it did not come to the public fore.

I was not bemused, in fact I was disappointed by the Prime Minister's intervention today into something so fundamental as the question of privilege advanced by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). He attempted to use very specious arguments in something which is fundamental. I am present in the chamber today as a member of the thirtieth parliament. There has been the long parliament, the short parliament, and some time in the 1300's there was what was known as the mad parliament. Once this has come to the attention of parliamentarians, and if this institution does not analyse the import and/or the implications of how these instructions were implemented, through the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, then perhaps this parliament will be known as the mock parliament, in terms of history, as sociologists and political scientists look at what we have done here.

Your Honour has been required to make difficult rulings over the past few months. Whether this is a mock parliament or not, certainly it has been preoccupied during the last six to eight months with security matters of all sorts, shapes, and sizes, with all the convolutions, contradictions, confessions of mistakes, and confessions of ignorance which have come up as different chapters unfold. Certainly I will not go through all of that today.

If it were not so serious, I would be almost bemused by what the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) indicated on Friday, which in effect was implied also by the Prime Minister today. Normally the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) makes constructive and cogent arguments, but I cannot agree with what he said. The Prime Minister indicated that there is no electronic surveillance of present members of parliament. What happened to the candidates who ran for the thirtieth parliament? What will happen to the candidates who run for the thirty-first parliament? As members, we represent the people and their rights. That has been indicated by other hon. members. I ran as a candidate and was elected to the thirtieth parliament. I do not know whether I was on a list or not.

There has been nothing said here today which might be amplified and defined in committee that there was the surveillance of X number of Canadians. We have 264 members here, and a possible 1,200 candidates running for these 264 positions at the polls. However, hearing the speech made by the Prime Minister, with respect, I feel compelled to contribute my few cents worth here today. It is in a bemused way that I do so, with the Deputy Prime Minister and the Prime Minister suggesting that this matter be referred to the McDonald commission. Yet, the Prime Minister, quite rightly perhaps, in the time of crisis in 1970, apprehended or otherwise, was most upset at an extra-parliamentary group that was supposed to be concocted and/or suggested to take over certain things.

Today, however, the argument of the government is that this fundamental question of surveillance by the RCMP or the security forces of candidates and members of parliament should be delegated to some other body, a body which is the creature of this institution. Royal commissions are the creatures of parliament, and surely we are the highest court in the land.

The thing that has interested me throughout this whole debate on privilege, and which to me is almost the proof of the pudding, is that usually on points of privilege we can rattle on and wax eloquently, quoting precedent after precedent from the Mother of Parliaments. We go back to Beauchesne, to May, to the Mother of Parliaments; we go to the River Thames and paddle our canoes up and down, and reach into the dusty tomes of parliamentary precedents from the Mother of Parliaments. However, so far in this debate I have not heard one speaker, especially from the government side, even mention any parliamentary precedents.

The question which Your Honour has to face is so extraordinarily unique that it has never come up before. Can any of us visualize the Mother of Parliaments debating whether Scotland Yard or M-15, or whatever they call themselves, has a list of instructions to be followed on surveillance of candidates in a general election? Just propose the question, Mr. Speaker, in a rhetorical way, and think in a most subdued fashion, and it makes it seem so ridiculous. Yet, it having come up and it being there, regardless of what the precedent was, as the hon. member for New Westminster said, you obviously do not condone pernicious practice just because of knowledge. Once it comes out in the open something must be done about it, and it is with that that Your Honour is faced. That is what the members who have participated in this debate have tried to argue.

The point confronting Your Honour is so unique and extraordinary that no one has even touched on it, because the Mother of Parliaments never would have such an invidious situation as debating instructions to the RCMP on surveillance. The Prime Minister says it has been going on for over 30 years. I do not know when that code of instructions was defined, how it was defined, and as the member for Halifax says, "what are the implications of some of the words." Those are questions, Mr. Speaker, that only we can answer in committee. There may have been many names go through this parliament. We just cannot abdicate our responsibility to look into this. I do not know what this parliament is finally going to be called, but I would hate to see it called a mock parliament.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) for having raised this point of privilege. We do not know how much longer we are going to be here, but if it should turn out that this is the last intervention by the hon. member, then it is certainly one to his credit.

I do not feel the necessity to repeat the arguments that have been made in support of the point of privilege, that has been raised, because the case has been made very effectively. As someone has said, if there is a benefit of the doubt it ought to be accorded to the rights and privileges of this institution. I would argue that if there is any question of steps being taken by the executive or by the police that have any bearing on the operation of this institution, whether we are thinking of members who are successful in getting here or those candidates who also ran, this ought to be examined by a committee of this House of Commons.

However, sir, I rose to make a particular plea, and it relates to something to which reference has been made a few times already. I should like to make the point very strongly, especially in light of the Prime Minister's urging that this matter not be dealt with on a partisan basis. That is a plea on his part that can be met.

I well recall the day when Mr. Speaker's rulings were appealable, and we appealed them by the dozen. I recall one year in particular. It did not do very much for the authority of the Chair or the dignity of parliament, and I have to say, as one who asked for many of those appeals, that they were highly partisan and highly political. Things have been greatly improved because Mr. Speaker's rulings can no longer be appealed. The Speakers we have had since the rule was changed have been much more concerned and much more responsible about the rulings they have given.

In this situation we have a hangover fom the former regime. Your Honour must rule whether or not, in your view, there is a point of privilege, and then you must put it to the House of Commons as to whether or not the matter will be referred to a committee. We have had an instance in this very session where Your Honour ruled that there was a prima facie case of privilege. It related to a matter raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). It became the subject of a partisan vote and, in effect, a ruling made by the Chair after deep consideration and several days of reflection was set aside. We should carry over the practice we have adopted with regard to rulings by the Chair on points of order. We should apply this practice to this situation. We cannot change the rules this afternoon, but at least we can get back to the tradition that has been established that when Mr. Speaker finds there is a prima facie case of privilege the House accepts that decision and allows the matter to go to committee.

I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will rule that the member for Halifax has a prima facie case of privilege, and if you do so, I earnestly hope that this House of Commons will have respect for that decision and not put it to a vote.

Mr. Speaker: I hope hon. members will understand that I would like to take some time to consider this matter. Reference has been made in the discussion this afternoon to previous dispositions on similar matters, which perhaps may be important if for no other reason than that they indicate my attitude toward this entire question of surveillance which, as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) pointed out, is a new area entirely.

As to the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), the House knows that I looked upon that as a matter which had never been dealt with under the umbrella of privilege before, because it involved electronic surveillance, which is a new problem to us. Therefore, I was very much inclined to give the benefit of the doubt in those circumstances to the argument put forward that any suggestion of interference by electronic means with members of the House of Commons ought to be examined in such a way as to give the doubt to the favourable interpretation of that and in such a way that the House would be put to the decision of whether or not the particular case ought to be sent to committee.

In the similar situation here, this motion raises a new problem and therefore the initial disposition that I made is, again, an indication of the importance that I attach to any suggestion that any members of this House—and whether that extends to candidates may be something for some considerable thought when I do make the final decision—are the object of surveillance because I could have brushed aside the motion on procedural grounds. However, that would not have done justice to the very important matter that lies at the core of this subject, and hence we have arrived at this point.

I wish I could say that these were all the difficulties I was going to have, but obviously there are some very fundamental questions such as whether, when parliament is dissolved, there are members of parliament to be interfered with, and whether candidates for membership of this House and members of this House stand on the same footing in respect of the classic definition of privilege. To put the argument another way, it would be technical in the extreme to consider that those who are candidates are not logical extensions of the people who succeed as candidates and become members. I do not know how to resolve that argument at the present time.

Whether having some procedure in the office of the RCMP for calling the attention of the security forces to anyone who puts himself forward amounts to surveillance in the terms of the motion, is another question that I must resolve. Then, if I have resolved all those matters, I have not only to find whether there is a fundamental question of privilege in such a way as to determine whether a decision should be made for or against the motion, obviously, but to decide whether the motion ought to be put as a normal motion, with the usual notice, under normal conditions, or whether it ought to enjoy priority and be put by the Chair forthwith over any other business because it has attached to it that essence of privilege which gives it priority. These are the decisions I have to make and I will want some time to sort the very valuable arguments that have been advanced.

I want to reiterate that the arguments have been very helpful. If I had not thought at the start that there was an extremely important and fundamental matter at the core of this motion presented by the hon. member for Halifax, I could have simply dismissed it out of hand, on procedural grounds last Thursday or Friday, but I preferred to see the matter argued today, and I shall try to come to a conclusion as quickly as I can.

MR. HUNTINGTON—LEGAL PROCEEDINGS LAUNCHED BY VANCOUVER BRANCH OF CUPW

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, to explain the background of my question of privilege, I must go back to a meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which took place on Thursday, May 5, 1977, at which the Post Office estimates were being considered. For some years I had been deeply concerned, and I still am, about the activities of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, particularly as they affect the city of Vancouver. I have long been convinced that the leadership of the union in Vancouver is controlled by revolutionaries and agitators whose principal aim is to create havoc in the postal system and disrupt the economy in general.

At the committee meeting on May 5, 1977, I expressed certain views, and passed on certain information which had come into my possession, to the then postmaster general, currently the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), who was appearing before the committee. I said, inter alia:

> We in Vancouver know that there are a small number of radicals running the union affairs, to the consternation of many of the people within that union. So I would say we need some democracy in union affairs, and perhaps you might give consideration to initiating something like that.

I had, and still have, a thick file of evidence to support the contentions I expressed at that meeting. Much of the information I have has come to me from postal workers themselves, the honest rank and file who seek only to do a day's work for a day's pay without harassment and intimidation, and who are as troubled as I am by the activities of their own union leadership. I have documented evidence of the theft of registered mail, destruction and opening of mail, deliberate encouragement of on-the-job slacking, distribution of inflammatory pamphlets, and other abuses. One conclusion I arrived at, and which I have expressed publicly several times, is that 45 per cent of the union membership has been denied any voice in union affairs. It goes without saying that nothing would induce me to identify my informants and thus expose them to victimization.

On the day following the committee meeting, Friday, May 6, 1977, and later, on or about May 16, I participated in radio talk shows hosted by Ed Murphy, at which I repeated the substance of my remarks at the committee meeting and answered questions phoned in by callers. At the first of them I said there were about 30 radicals in and around the union leadership of the Vancouver postal workers, and I named some of them. At the second talk show, a press release by Mr. Peter Whitaker, president of the Vancouver local of the union, was read out. He denied my allegations and accused me of conducting "a despicable witch hunt, reminiscent of the McCarthy era." He demanded a retraction from me. Needless to say, I refused to withdraw anything I had said, pointing out that I had collected a mass of material which supported my contentions.

I might add that I raised this matter of national concern some years ago when the Hon. Bryce Mackasey held office as postmaster general. I privately met with and turned over to Mr. Mackasey the information and material I had concerning the behavioural problems that existed within the Vancouver post office. I took a very low key attitude at that time. I was not seeking confrontation but a resolution of the problems besetting the Post Office, and that remains my position.

During the postal strike of 1975—at about the time the government offer was to be voted on—the union leadership in Vancouver denied those members who had crossed the picket line the right to vote on the government offer. As a local member of parliament I was approached by a group of inside postal workers and was asked for advice. The advice given was that they should get an injunction against the union, and I assisted these union members with that procedure. It was at this time that I became concerned with the threat to the democratic process of their union affairs.

At the committee meeting to which I referred, the present Solicitor General said:

> I am very pleased with the way this meeting has gone because you have identified problems that we are very much aware of.

This suggests that, as far as he was concerned at least, nobody at the meeting was attempting to launch a witch hunt.

Following the first of the talk shows, a meeting with the vice-president of the union local, to which I had agreed, failed to materialize because, I was informed, the union had decided to take alternative action. This action was the issuing of Mr. Whitaker's press statement, prepared I believe by the union's lawyer, Mr. Stewart Rush, and the demand for a retraction which I refused to make. The union then proceeded to issue a writ against me which was finally served on July 26, 1977.

The writ was broadly worded and sought damages for slander, defamation and innuendo, and an injunction to restrain me from further speaking, circulating, broadcasting or causing to be broadcast or circulating or publishing the said or any similar slander, defamatory statement or malicious falsehood or innuendo.

What was particularly odd was the length of time it took them to serve the writ. During the intervening weeks I was readily available, either in Vancouver or Ottawa, and I made no attempt to conceal my movements. Nevertheless, various attempts were made to serve the writ at places where I did not happen to be, and it was suggested by the union's lawyer that I was attempting to evade having it served on me. This was patent nonsense, and I gave them the name of my solicitors. As described, it was couched in very broad terms and I instructed my lawyers to prepare a defence and file an appearance.

Nothing further happened until April 4, 1978, when a statement of claim was filed, the plaintiffs being Mr. Peter Whitaker, whom I at no time identified as being a radical, and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

My lawyers had advised me as follows:

> Their delay in filing a statement of claim indicated to us that they weren't intending to proceed. However, after a delay of 252 days they have done so and we must face it by filing a defence.

It is interesting that the filing of the statement of claim was made on the eve of an anticipated election call.

The terms of the statement of claim are much narrower than those of the writ in that it is alleged that Peter Whitaker has been greatly injured in his general character, credit and reputation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to restrict the hon. member unduly, but I do not think the House is as much interested in the merits of his case as in the point at which he feels his privileges or the privileges of other members are being affected. I would ask the hon. member to concentrate upon that.

● (1642)

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I am very close to that. However, I would like to point out that this is not a civil law suit—I can deal with those—this has political overtones and that is the reason I have raised the matter today. However, the complaint of the union is much less specific, alleging that:

> The defendant intended to deprecate the operation of the union and to prevent it from carrying out its lawful activities as a bargaining agent on behalf of its members.

So far I have stated the facts of the case. I come now to my complaint of privilege. I believe that I am the victim of harassment and attempted intimidation by the union in that, by their tactics and the inexplicable length of time which it has taken them to pursue their case, they are obstructing me in my parliamentary duties.

I have been forced to spend a great deal of time and to incur considerable expenses in respect of a law suit which, I believe, is being deliberately drawn out as long as possible, and which may never even come to trial. My lawyers agree that this is strange behaviour on their part. I have no apprehensions about defending myself in court, and indeed I should like to resolve the issue once and for all, but I am deeply concerned at the extent to which this matter is consuming valuable time which, as a busy member of parliament, I cannot spare. I believe also that I am being subjected to a form of pressure the purpose of which is to silence me and to prevent me from publicizing the information I have concerning the activities of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

The condition of the Post Office is a matter of grave national importance. Some of the things which are happening cry out to be exposed, and members of parliament have both the right and the duty to speak out on any matter affecting national interest. Should trade unionists, corporate officers, or anyone else, ever succeed in muzzling the elected representatives of the people, it would be the end of parliamentary democracy in this country. I can think of no greater threat to the well-being of this nation than to allow this kind of obstruction and intimidation to succeed.

I recognize that it is the right of any citizen to seek redress if he believes he has been slandered or libelled. But he has to have solid grounds to support his case. I believe that in the present situation there are unusual circumstances because, as a member of parliament, I am being harassed in relation to a stand I have taken on a matter of undeniable public concern.

My complaint of privilege calls upon two principles; first of all a member's right to protection from obstruction in the pursuit of his duty and, secondly, the concept of what constitutes a proceeding in parliament.

Freedom from molestation is an ancient parliamentary privilege which, although it has never been defined, has been very widely interpreted. A former Clerk of the British House of Commons, Sir Gilbert Campion, interpreted molestation as:

> . . . including not only assaulting or insulting members, or challenging them to fight on account of their conduct in parliament, but even attempting to influence them in their parliamentary conduct by improper means.

I have taken this quotation from a memorandum by Mr. L. A. Abraham which was submitted to the British Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege whose report was published on December 1, 1967. The words I have quoted appear on page 93 of that report. The committee devoted four paragraphs of its report to the concept of "freedom from molestation", and described it as "doubtful and unclear". They recommended that the use of the expression be discontinued in order to avoid confusion, pointing out that a member's right to protection against conduct amounting to improper obstruction, which was undeniable, amounted to much the same thing. The relevant paragraphs are numbered 109-112 in the committee's report.

This committee also dealt with the citizen's right to make fair comment on a matter of public interest. It added the following reservation, however:

> But if the rights of a citizen, though enforceable in the courts of law, are so exercised as to be likely improperly to obstruct the member in the performance of his parliamentary duty, it must be within the power of the House to restrain him.

This observation appears in paragraph 46 of the report. I submit that the actions of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are calculated to obstruct me in the performance of my parliamentary duties.

I would like to turn now to the question of what constitutes a proceeding in parliament. This is a term which has apparently never been defined, although it seems clear that there are circumstances in which a matter arising outside parliament may be treated as a proceeding in parliament. There is one important Canadian precedent involving the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and a former minister of energy, mines and resources, the present Senator John Greene.

The case, which occurred in 1970, concerned the sale to the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited of certain shares owned or controlled by Mr. Stephen B. Roman and the Roman Corporation in Denison Mines Limited. The Prime Minister and his colleague advised the House of Commons that legislation might be presented to prevent the sale because it would result in a substantial interest in Denison Mines Limited passing into non-Canadian hands. Subsequent to the declarations made in the House, the minister of energy, mines and resources issued a press release repeating substantially what he had said in the House. The Prime Minister sent a telegram to Mr. Roman referring at length to his colleague's statement in the House.

Mr. Roman and the Roman Corporation sued the Prime Minister and the minister of energy, mines and resources for damages arising out of changes in government policy which resulted in the cancellation of the agreement with the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company. The case was dismissed on the grounds that the press release and the telegram were extensions of statements made in the House of Commons and were therefore equally privileged. The decision was upheld by the Ontario Court of Appeal in 1971, and by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1973. In support of his judgment in the Ontario High Court, Mr. Justice Houlden quoted from a 1963 decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which reads as follows:

> The most, perhaps, that can be said is that, despite reluctance to treat a member's privilege as going beyond anything that is essential, it is generally recognized that it is impossible to regard his only proper functions as a member as being confined to what he does on the floor of the House itself.

I realize that against this judgment there are others where the decision has been that words spoken in the House when repeated outside the Chamber were not protected by privilege. I submit, nevertheless, that the judgment in the Denison Mines case is an important one and established beyond doubt that in certain situations a matter arising outside parliament can constitute a proceeding in parliament.

In relation to this aspect of the matter, I should also like to cite a British case of 1957 in which a member of the House of Commons wrote a letter to a minister criticizing certain alleged practices of the London Electricity Board. The minister referred the letter to the Board for their comments, whereupon the Board threatened to take libel action against the member if he did not withdraw the allegations made in the letter. The member concerned, Mr. George Strauss, raised a complaint of privilege and the matter was referred to the committee of privileges. The finding of the committee was that Mr. Strauss's letter to the minister constituted a proceeding in parliament and that the Board's threat of libel action against Mr. Strauss constituted a breach of privilege. However, when the House came to debate the report it took the unusual step of rejecting its committee's recommendation by the narrow vote of 219 to 196.

The Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege of 1967, to which I have already referred, made some highly significant observations with regard to this case. It referred to it as:

> A classic case in which the House acted upon principles contrary to those which, if your committee's recommendations are accepted, will in future be followed.

It continued:

> If the House had acted upon the principles which, in your committee's view, ought in future to be followed, it would have asked itself the question "Is this threat, maintained as it has been, a contempt of parliament, that is, an improper obstruction which is likely substantially to interfere with the parliamentary duty of the member affected?"

In fact, however, the committee of privileges to which the matter was referred did not ask this question at all. Instead it asked itself three questions. The decisive one was:

> Was Mr. Strauss's letter to the minister a "proceeding in parliament" within the meaning of the Bill of Rights? The committee concluded that it was a "proceeding in parliament" and "therefore" recommended to the House that the action of the Board in threatening proceeding for libel constituted a "breach of privilege". . . . The sole basis of controversy before the House was whether or not the letter was a "proceeding in parliament".
> Accordingly, as it appears to your committee, the House in that case failed to ask itself a question which was material to its powers and which might possibly have been answered in a manner favourable to the member's complaint. It would have been open to the House to hold that the threat by the Board to institute proceedings for libel against Mr. Strauss if he did not withdraw the allegations contained in his letter to the minister was so improper an attempt to obstruct the member in his parliamentary duty as to amount to a contempt of the House.

[Mr. Huntington.]

The paragraphs of the committee's report relevant to this case are numbered 80 to 83. It is also of interest to note that on February 6, 1978, the British House of Commons resolved to bring into immediate effect all the recommendations of this committee which did not require legislation. This resolution followed upon third report from the Standing Committee of Privileges which reviewed the recommendations of the select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege and was published on June 14, 1977.

The remarks I made at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on May 5, 1977, were obviously a proceeding in parliament. My remarks in the talk shows which followed arose directly out of what I had said in committee. They were made in good faith, and in the national interest, as I saw it. The subsequent actions against me of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers amount, in my opinion, to harassment. They have certainly obstructed me in the performance of my parliamentary duties by causing me the difficulties I have already described.

People in sensitive areas often seek the aid of their member of parliament. The member must be trusted and must protect the confidence given if effective use is to be made of his position. This is the condition that exists between myself and postal workers who found need to use my office.

What I am seeking is the opportunity to have my peers on the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections assess the general situation as it may be distinguished from some of the existing precedents. There could well be an opportunity for the Committee on Privileges to go into this matter in more detail and to develop jurisprudence, particularly since TV is now in the House and an instant electronic Hansard is now on the airwaves. We have already heard today about new problems.

Such matters of concern, in my opinion, should be referred to the committee almost as a matter of right. If the committee is not to atrophy, it should be given some substantive work, particularly in this era of change in the extension of the proceedings of the House.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is no part of your duty to judge whether a breach of privilege has been committed. I realize that your responsibility is limited to deciding whether or not a complaint should be given precedence over other parliamentary business. What I seek is to have my submission considered by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am content to let that committee and the House decide whether or not I have a valid case. It is therefore my hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow me to move that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like this opportunity to speak briefly to this point. I was present at the meeting of the committee where the incident occurred. The events that have been described were exactly as they took place there. That is not the first time the suggestion has been made that there were activists in the postal union who were making it difficult to bring about a reconciliation of viewpoint between post office management and post office union. The former postmaster general, the Hon. Bryce Mackasey, made this suggestion from time to time.

I think it would be very useful if the hon. member's motion were accepted and this matter could be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. For example, it would be useful in resolving some of the tension that exists in the Post Office Department at the moment. I say this because there is a movement afoot where responsible members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are anxious that the confrontation which has persisted far too long should come to an end and that the process of reconciliation should commence. For example, in the Vancouver local, they have elected a new president. The position there is a more moderate one. What took place in Toronto just before Christmas is indicative that the vast majority of postal workers are anxious to get to the root cause of the confrontation that has been expressed so eloquently here by the hon. member who presented this resolution.

I would just bring this matter into focus. I strongly support the recommendation that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I believe a discussion there would have a very beneficial effect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has raised a question that is always interesting, that is, the position of a member in speaking for the record of the House for the proceeding in parliament and the definition of a proceeding in parliament as it applies to the immunity from prosecution, particularly in the civil sense, in a lawsuit for libel or slander that may result from any remarks that a member makes in the course of his duties, and whether the precedent as it applies to a proceeding in parliament extends through committees and beyond that, as the hon. member stated today, to matters which flow directly from that particular proceeding in parliament.

There are, however, a number of other difficulties that will require some considerable research, not the least of which is whether this House at this stage should take any steps which would interfere with the prosecution of a lawsuit that is duly constituted in the courts. Whether the lawsuit is with or without merit, as the hon. member has argued, and whether it is proceeded with diligently or intermittently is a matter for the courts once the matter is before the courts.

The hon. member has raised several matters which may be more germane to the defence of the action than they are to an argument on privilege. Again that is a difficulty. I do not make a final decision on that. In the final analysis, I am not sure if any relief could be offered to the member by this House in any case, even if the House were to decide that the matter may have privilege surrounding it in such a way that it should be considered on a priority basis by the House and, if the decision were made to move it to the committee, whether that in any way could interfere with the progress of the lawsuit.

Those are all questions that would have to be answered. They certainly will require some considerable research which I would be glad to undertake on the hon. member's behalf just as soon as I can get out of the chair this afternoon.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENT GUARANTEEING RIGHT TO WORK

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-452, to amend the Canada Labour Code (right to work).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Maine: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to protect an individual's right to work, thereby ensuring an individual's right to join and maintain membership in a union, and also an equal right not to join or maintain membership in a union. This right to work legislation will protect the basic right of individuals to choose either membership or non-membership in a labour organization. It does not, however, interfere in any way with legitimate union activity, nor does it restrict the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively with their employers.

This bill would provide the basic right of citizens to earn their livelihood as voluntary union members or as non-union members, and it would guarantee that no individual could be denied the opportunity to obtain or retain employment because of membership or non-membership in any labour organization.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MIRABEL AIRPORT—COSTS

Question No. 940—Mr. Jones:

1. What was the total cost for the construction of the Mirabel Airport and what is a breakdown of such costs?

2. Since the Airport has been in operation what was the monthly (a) cost (b) revenue (c) profit or loss?

3. Are the costs to amortize the debt for costs of construction taken into consideration in such a figure and, if so, what are the particulars and details of each item?

Order Paper Questions

4. What were the estimated or planned revenues and expenses and net annual and monthly profits or loss when the decision to build the Airport was made?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Total construction and land acquisition expenditures at Mirabel to March 31, 1977 are as follows:

Land	23,177
Terminals and facilities	107,172
Runways and other paved surfaces	110,712
Machinery and Equipment	11,591
Development including capitalized interest	82,236
*Unallocated construction costs	30,748
	365,636

* Cost of construction not allocated to classifications of assets as at March 31, 1977.

2. Formal profit and loss statements are prepared for the periods ending September 30, December 31 and March 31. Revenues, costs and profits (losses) for the aforementioned periods, since the airport has been in operation, are as follows:

	1975/76 Fiscal Year		1976/77 Fiscal Year			1977/78 Fiscal Year
	Dec. 1/75 to Dec. 31/75	Dec. 1/75 to Mar. 31/76	Apr. 1/76 to Sept. 30/76	Apr. 1/76 to Dec. 31/76	Apr. 1/76 to Mar. 31/77	Apr. 1/77 to Sept. 30/77
Revenue	1,663	5,581	13,287	19,778	24,972	13,583
Less: Interest expense	2,412	8,084	14,472	21,514	29,066	16,029
Depreciation	1,495	6,044	7,172	13,582	16,125	8,142
Other expenses	1,297	9,835	10,805	17,804	29,602	10,088
Profit (loss)	(3,541)	(18,382)	(19,162)	(33,122)	(49,821)	(20,676)

3. Costs of construction are being amortized through annual depreciation charges to operations, as specified in the above schedule. Costs of financing the debt are shown in the same schedule as interest expense.

4. Revenues, expenses, profits and losses projected for the planning of Mirabel are as follows:

$ Millions

	1974/75	1975/76	1976/77	1977/78	1978/79	1979/80	1980/81
Revenue	20.0	23.3	27.0	31.3	42.3	46.9	52.2
Less: Interest expense	15.3	15.2	15.0	15.4	16.7	18.5	17.2
Depreciation	13.8	14.1	14.3	15.2	16.7	13.5	13.6
Other expenses	11.5	11.7	11.9	12.6	14.0	15.5	16.0
Profit (loss)	(20.6)	(17.7)	(14.2)	(11.9)	(5.1)	(.6)	5.4

Costs are on a 1970 basis with no provision for escalation.

[Mr. Jones.]

COST OF LANGUAGE TRAINING

Question No. 1,199—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the government aware of the recent statement by Mr. Keith Spicer, former Commissioner of Official Languages, to the University of Victoria, that the government "blew a billion dollars" in second language training and is the figure accurate and (a) if so, what is its breakdown under such headings as cost of language schools, compensation to departments for replacing employees absent on language training, second language training in the Armed Forces, costs in all departments for bilingual services branches (b) if not, what is the accurate figure and what is the breakdown under the previous mentioned headings?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): (a) Yes, the government is aware of Mr. Spicer's recent statement but his figure is not accurate. (b) Until 1976-77, some direct and indirect costs of the official languages training program were neither specifically identified in departmental budgets nor independently collected. This includes part-time in-house courses and other administrative costs of the program. Recognizing the unavailability of some of these costs for part of the period covered, the total language training costs from 1970-71 to 1976-77 inclusive are listed below. The period for which these figures apply is given in parentheses.

1.	Costs of Language Schools
	Public Service Commission Language Bureau courses	145,276	(70-71 to 76-77)
	Courses organized in departments/agencies	6,389	(1976-77)
	Armed Forces	86,670	(72-73 to 76-77)
1.(1)	Capital and Leasing Costs
	Public Service Commission Schools	20,057	(72-73 to 76-77)
	Departments/Agencies	331	(76-77)
	Armed Forces	14,529	(72-73 to 76-77)
2.	Compensation to departments for replacing employees absent on language training
	Public service departments/agencies	93,589	(72-73 to 76-77)
	Armed forces	6,419	(72-73 to 76-77)
3.	Costs in all departments for bilingual services branches
	Departments/Agencies	11,828	(1976-77)
	Armed Forces	3,963	(1976-77)
	Total	389,051

ASSISTANCE TO FEED MILLS IN PROVENCHER

Question No. 1,269—Mr. Epp:

To date, were any grants made to feed mills in the Constituency of Provencher and, if so (a) in what amount (b) who were the owners or sponsors of such mills?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned: on March 12, 1974, an incentive offer, under the terms of the Regional Development Incentives Act, in the amount of $41,443, was accepted by Mr. J. Koslowsky, president of the Niverville Feed and Farm Supply Ltd., Niverville, Manitoba.

In so far as the Departments of Agriculture and Industry, Trade and Commerce are concerned: nil.

FUNDS FOR WORK ON PIERS IN KAMOURASKA

Question No. 1,380—Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska):

Since 1970, did the Department of Public Works allocate funds for the development, repair or for any other work on the piers in the Constituency of Kamouraska and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): As of February 28, 1978 Public Works Canada had the following expenditures on marine projects in the constituency of Kamouraska: 1971/72, $8,893; 1972/73, $5,431; 1975/76, $868.

Information prior to April 1, 1971, is not available as per the Government of Canada's records disposal schedule.

SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS ACCOUNT

Question No. 1,408—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. What was the total amount contributed (a) by employees (b) by the government, to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account during the year from April 1, 1976 to March 31, 1977?

2. What was the total amount paid of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account, during the year from April 1, 1976 to March 31, 1977, in the form of pension supplements, and to how many individuals were such pension supplements paid at any time during that period?

3. What was the balance at credit in the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account as at March 31 (a) 1976 (b) 1977?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. (a) $35,595,962; (b) $35,595,962.

2. Pension supplements totalling $131,086,109 were paid to 116,240 individuals during fiscal year 1976-77. Of this amount $5,502,323 was charged to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account and $125,583,786 was charged to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

3. (a) $130,258,518; (b) $205,928,464.

PERSONS HOLDING TWO JOBS

Question No. 1,420—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government maintain records or are estimates prepared of the number of persons that are holding two jobs and, if so, are these kept by sex and age groups and has there been any recent change in relation to the size of the work force?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: the labour force survey carried out by Statistics Canada provides monthly estimates of the number of persons holding two or more jobs. The estimates, by sex and age group, are published each month in The Labour Force, Statistics Canada, catalogue No. 71-001. Estimates for February for the years 1975-1978 are as follows:

Multiple Jobholders by Age, by Sex, for Canada
February 1975, 76, 77, and 78
(in thousands)

		Feb. 1975	Feb. 1976	Feb. 1977	Feb. 1978
	All ages	142	150	160	163
Men	15-24 years	20	24	28	26
	25 years plus	121	126	132	137
	All ages	46	49	52	61
Women	15-24 years	12	16	14	20
	25 years plus	34	33	38	41
Total multiple jobholders		187	199	212	224

MEASURE AMENDING DEFINITIONS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West) moved that Bill C-213, to amend the Railway Act (definitions), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in beginning debate on my private member's bill I think a brief history relating to the reason for introducing this bill is essential to the understanding of its purpose and intent.

Before the turn of the century, in the 1880's, a number of small railway companies were formed in Kootenay West to serve mining communities and mines near Kootenay Lake and Slocan Lake. These lines were leased to the CPR over a period of years.

In 1898 the CPR leased, in perpetuity, a line from Proctor to Nelson built by the British Columbia Southern Railway Company. In 1903 the CPR leased, for 999 years, the line built by the Kootenay and Arrowhead Railway Company, and in 1921 the CPR leased the line from Kaslo to Sandon built by the Kaslo and Slocan Railway.

This network of railway lines led to and from Kootenay Lake to connect with the CPR's rail barge link which operated until July 31, 1975, at which time the CPR abandoned the service.

Why a rail barge? Why not a railway? The decision to employ a rail barge made good economic sense. It was a relatively short haul by water of some 20 to 25 miles. The alternative would have been a rail line down the west side of the lake of some 50 miles to Nelson, or up to the head of the lake to the eastern shore and thence to Creston, about 150 miles. In both cases the rail line would have traversed forbidding terrain, with enormous engineering problems.

After the CPR abandonment I appealed to the Rail Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission to hold a hearing regarding the abandonment. The committee denied the hearing on the ground that it did not have jurisdiction. In the fall of 1975 the Rail Transport Committee agreed to accept arguments as to whether or not it had jurisdiction. The CPR submitted its case, I submitted mine based on considerable research and study, and the province of British Columbia submitted its brief in support of my position.

A year later, in October of 1976, the Rail Transport Committee decided that on the basis of arguments presented and the committee's own careful study, it indeed has jurisdiction over rail barges and that they were indeed an integral part of a railway line. The committee then ordered the CP rail barge back into service. The CPR appealed this decision to the Federal Court of Canada in Vancouver in September of 1977, and won its appeal. The Rail Transport Committee presented argument, as did the ministry of the attorney general of British Columbia and the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Basford). Again, the rail barge service was abandoned. In December of 1977 the Attorney General of Canada asked the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal the case to the highest court of the land—save parliament—the Supreme Court of Canada. The appeal was granted, and the case will be heard this year in the Supreme Court of Canada.

In the particular case of the rail barge service on Kootenay Lake there is no doubt that Canadian Pacific Limited of today succeeded to the right and obligation to operate and maintain such barges from a railway which was given this right and obligation under the umbrella of a federal act.

Confirmation that the barge service on Kootenay Lake is part of a railway is also found in a letter of the general solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway addressed to the Board of Transport Commissioners dated March 19, 1942, promising to continue the barge and boat service "as heretofore". There can be no other reason why the Canadian Pacific Railway should make such a commitment to the Board of Transport Commissioners other than that the Canadian Pacific Railway considered the barge and boat service to be under the authority of the Board of Transport Commissioners. It does not now lie in the mouth of Canadian Pacific Limited to argue that the rail barge service is an entity which is separate and severable from the rail service. The judicial principle of estoppel applies to any such argument. The authority of the Board of Transport Commissioners was passed to the Railway Transport Committee of today when the Board of Railway Commissioners turned into the Railway Transport Committee in 1966-67.

We can list an additional modern case where a rail barge service or a water-going vessel is considered to be a part of a railway. The Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada Act, 13 George VI, Chapter 1, to approve the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada, assented to on February 18, 1949, considers, under term 33(a), the barge and boat service between Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, to be a part of a railway.

Taking note of section 21 of the National Transportation Act, we find that it is the duty of the Canadian Transport Commission to perform functions vested in that act as well as the Railway Act and Transport Act, with the aim of coordinating and harmonizing the operations of all carriers. Section 23(4) of the same act states, furthermore, that the Canadian Transport Commission can rule on the prejudicial effects of any actions taken by the transport industry.

Finally, it would be a violation of common sense to consider each part of a railway as a work differing radically in kind from each other part, to the point where we introduce the possibility that many different jurisdictions have control over each segment. It seems clear that these features of any given work which form an essential link, without which that given work could not reach its ultimate aims, must be considered to be an integral part of that work. Therefore, it follows that any claim that we can arbitrarily divide that work for the purposes of legal jurisdiction must be rejected.

A railway line has as its ultimate purpose and effect to provide a continuous stream of motion of goods. Because it is the duty of the Railway Transport Committee to work for the regulation and efficiency of such a stream of goods, it is absurd to consider any one given integral part of any given line as not being within its jurisdiction. Certainly, there is no question as to a rail barge differing radically from the rest of the line since it actually has rails affixed to it, uses railway cars on its surface, has rails which connect to corresponding ones on dry land, and has locomotives used on it. A rail barge is essentially a rail bed which floats between two designated points without deviation.

There is one vital issue which lies in the shadow of this bill.

In 1975, I, the MLA for Revelstoke-Slocan, Bill King, and concerned citizens and businessmen appeared before the Rail Transport Committee in Nakusp, B.C., on an application by the CPR to abandon a rail line between Denver Canyon and Nakusp used for hauling freight. We were successful in persuading the RTC to rule in our favour, and accordingly the CPR was ordered to upgrade and maintain the rail line and apply for a subsidy. That rail line lies in the next north-south valley to the west of Kootenay Lake. This line is serviced by a rail barge link between Slocan and Denver Canyon, a distance of approximately 20 miles, on Slocan Lake. Again, as on the Kootenay Lake, it was done for sound reasons of economy. A rail line would have to be constructed along the edge of Slocan Lake which, on much of its east side terrain is virtually perpendicular.

The point is that if the rail barge on Kootenay Lake can be abandoned with impunity, then also the CPR can abandon the rail barge link on Slocan Lake with impunity. Once that has been done, the CPR can, by default, defeat the purpose and intent of the ruling by the Rail Transport Committee that the CPR must maintain the Denver Canyon-Nakusp rail line. The CPR will point to the line and say, "Look, it starts nowhere and it goes nowhere." It follows that the abandonment of the Slocan Lake rail barge service will be followed immediately by an application to abandon the Denver Canyon-Nakusp rail link.

Surely that is not the intent or wish of the Rail Transport Committee, or indeed of parliament. I therefore urge that members on the government side allow this bill to go before the parliamentary Standing Committee on Transport and Communications in order to plug this loophole in the Railway Act.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, there might be general agreement today that economic issues are the most pressing ones facing the country at this time. Certainly my priority is jobs and I will support any economic program aimed at stimulating the economy. Indeed, I will press for economic initiatives from the government, especially with respect to the automotive industry. Nevertheless, there are other problems confronting the country, one of which is transportation problems of all kinds.

I have presented one of these to the House in Bill C-439, which I trust will come up for debate later in the session, in which I try to ensure that the jurisdiction of the CTC with respect to rehearing of cases is limited in the same way as that of courts.

Bill C-213 has its roots in a specific case involving CP Rail's intent to discontinue a rail car barge operation on Kootenay Lake, British Columbia. CP Rail has operated a steamer service from Lardeau to various points along Kootenay Lake, including Kaslo and Procter, B.C., moving loaded or empty railway cars between points on the lake, thus avoiding the expense of joining these points by a continuous railway line around the lake.

In 1942 the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada granted CP Rail permission to abandon parts of its railway line system between Lardeau and Gerrard, B.C., that extended north from Kootenay Lake. Prior to the abandonment approval, the CP general solicitor had advised the Board that CP would continue to operate the boat and barge service to Lardeau as before, and the company did so for 33 years until July 31, 1975, when CP Rail decided to discontinue its barge service between Procter, Kaslo, and Lardeau on Kootenay Lake.

The Canadian Transport Commission was requested to order CP Rail to reinstate the barge service. After a preliminary examiniation, the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC indicated that it did not have jurisdiction over the barge service and that it could not, therefore, require CP Rail not to discontinue the service.

Due to the expressed concern of interested parties, including the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), the Railway Transport Committee issued a notice on November 18, 1975, stating it would reconsider the matter and inviting all interested parties to make written representation:

on the general subject of the extent of the committee's jurisdiction in so far as it relates to rail barges and . . . whether or not a rail barge is a "branch line or segment thereof" pursuant to section 252 of the Railway Act.

I understand that several submissions, notably those from the hon. member and the government of British Columbia, supported the position of the CTC and jurisdiction.

Mr. Brisco: And the Government of Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. MacGuigan: On the other hand, CP Rail, CN, and the Minister of Transport for the province of Quebec argued the contrary, that the Commission did not have jurisdiction.

On October 18, 1976, the Railway Transport Committee issued its decision stating reasons why it had full jurisdiction to deal with the discontinuance of the CP Rail barge service on Kootenay Lake and, as a result, ordered CP Rail to resume the operation.

CP Rail appealed this decision of the Railway Transport Committee to the Federal Court of Appeal. The court heard arguments in Vancouver and, on September 30, 1977, held that the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC was without jurisdiction to order CP Rail to reinstate and resume rail barge service on Kootenay Lake.

The Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Basford) then sought leave of the Supreme Court of Canada to appeal the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal, and leave to appeal was granted last December 14 by the Supreme Court of Canada.

The jurisdictional question is a difficult one, and I certainly share the concern of the hon. member for Kootenay West about the problem which this jurisdictional question has created on Kootenay Lake. The bill as written, however, creates certain difficulties in a number of areas which make it inadvisable to proceed with it, especially in light of the fact that we are now awaiting a decision from the Supreme Court of Canada in the matter.

The principle underlying the purpose of Bill C-213 has merit in attempting to clarify a Railway Transport Committee jurisdictional question. The specific case of the CP Rail barge service on Kootenay Lake would be a desirable area for the jurisdiction of the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC.

There is a need for this jurisdiction, despite the fact that CP Rail operated a barge service connecting its railway lines in the Kootenay area for about 40 years, and, after abandoning some of its railway lines in 1942, continued to provide the barge service for another 35 years.

In the absence of regulatory provisions, it is conceivable that CP Rail could have decided, for valid reasons of its own, to discontinue the service many years before it actually chose to do so in July, 1975.

In offering the barge service to connect its railway lines, CP Rail likely created an expectation of transportation service on the part of shippers and receivers in the area and elsewhere. This in turn may have directly stimulated investments in local industrial opportunities. Without appropriate regulatory mechanisms in place to guard against a unilateral decision to discontinue a service without adequate substitute services in place, the local and other interested party investments could have been seriously jeopardized.

Without adequate regulation, only a moral obligation would rest on CP Rail, and therefore it is indeed important to ascertain whether obligation is imposed on CP Rail under the jurisdiction of the Board of Commissioners.

At first glance, the wording of Bill C-213 appears to satisfy the intention to provide the CTC with appropriate jurisdiction over ferries and barges used to transport railway cars. The bill, however, intends to amend a definition of "railway", a term used extensively throughout the Railway Act in which major sections deal with the provisions for construction and commencement of operations.

The wording of any amendment does not clearly ensure that only certain specific rail car ferry services come under the abandonment jurisdiction of the CTC, so as to avoid any implication that the CTC will regulate the abandonment of automobile ferry services or intraprovincial barge and ferry services which are not related to federally regulated railways.

There is good reason to believe that the present definition of "railway" may already be broad enough to include the rail barge, but we have to await the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on this point.

One other possible problem with the proposed amendment is how it would apply to certain east coast ferry services. We particularly wish to consider carefully what regulatory authority the Canadian Transport Commission should be given in this area in view of the constitutional obligations of the federal government to provide ferry services to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. These services effectively link those provinces to the mainland railway system. These obligations are now being fulfilled by Canadian National on behalf of the government, using ferry vessels owned by the federal government. Consideration is being given to the creation of a separate Crown corporation to operate and fulfil the federal government's east coast transportation service obligations and objectives.

In addition, unlike the Kootenay Lake barge operation for railway cars only, the Gulf Ferry Services carry automobiles, trucks, buses, and individual passengers. In other words, there may be some cases where a general CTC jurisdiction over the operation and abandonment of rail car ferry or barge operations, as part of a railway operation, may create problems in policy, jurisdiction and regulatory areas.

However, it is fair to say the government agrees with the general principle that the railway transport committee should have jurisdiction over the abandonment of rail car ferry and barge operations, when these services are directly related to federally regulated railway operations.

Because the Attorney General of Canada has obtained leave of the Supreme Court of Canada to appeal the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal, which indicated the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC did not have jurisdiction in the Kootenay Lake case, I believe further deliberations on this bill may not be productive until after the Kootenay Lake test case is finally resolved by the Supreme Court. Only then would a clear statement of the adequacies of the present Railway Act provisions be available to form the basis for the drafting of any appropriate amendments to the act.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). He is a very knowledgeable member, and has a great background in transport and legal matters. Particularly I was interested in hearing him raise the considerations implicit in ferry services in the eastern part of this country which link the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland to the mainland. In the past it has been a matter of great concern, particularly to people of the island provinces, that every time there is a national rail disruption the existing situation governing rail and ferry services automatically exacerbates the situation in those provinces.

In the context of some future debate on a bill like this, I hope the House considers ways and means to make certain, every time there is a national rail tie-up, it does not necessarily tie up rail freight services to Newfoundland or prince Edward Island. I am sure that is beyond the scope of this bill, but I wanted to use this opportunity to put those thoughts forward.

It is a pleasure to speak on this particular piece of legislation because it has a very constructive purpose. Actually it purports to prevent indirectly the abandonment of transport services by CP, in a manner which could not be done directly by virtue of section 253 of the Railway Act. As the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville pointed out, one of the catalysts was the action of CPR when it abandoned its railway line and barge service on Kootenay Lake. That service transported railway cars. The abandonment of it caused such a furor that our national television network did a feature film on it. Obviously the transportation disruption occasioned by the action of CP is a matter of great concern to that area. It is in the process of being appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. Last fall the Attorney General of Canada intervened to assist in this regard.

The judgment of Mr. Justice Le Dain was a very interesting one. As has already been stated, the case was heard in Vancouver. A judgment was given from the bench, and the decision was that the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC was without jurisdiction to order Canadian Pacific to reinstate its rail barge service on Kootenay Lake, thus reversing a previous ruling made by the committee.

Ever since its creation, historically there has been buckpassing between the Department of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission over matters of jurisdiction and definition involving the Railway Act, as well as other federal statutes. In this case, ferry or rail barge services is a key area which needs to be clarified. This very timely bill provides the House of Commons with an opportunity to do just that.

The purpose of this bill is to remove any anomalies which presently exist in the Railway Act. I think that deserves serious consideration by the House. As the learned justices of the Federal Court of Appeal pointed out, certainly these are matters of grave concern in studying the contradictions which are implicit in some of the legislation involving marine and rail transport. To require the railways to justify the abandonment of an obviously outmoded and non-productive branch line, pursuant to section 253 of the Railway Act, and yet to allow them to discontinue service as vital as the one at Kootenay Lake, which is part and parcel of a railway service, is not practical or realistic. We in the House have an opportunity to correct some of those anomalies by virtue of this bill.

In his very comprehensive decision Mr. Justice Le Dain recognized that there was a fundamental difference of legislative policy in respect of the abandonment of rail and water transport services. Therefore it is up to the House of Commons to assist in clarifying this legislative policy. This bill can be of assistance in this regard. The question of jurisdiction on the appeal resolved itself, as was noted by Mr. Justice Le Dain in the question of whether the rail barge service is the operation of a minor railway. He quoted from the findings of fact by the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC, which read as follows:

> The barges were first operated to connect various towns situated on Kootenay Lake and the line of railway which ran out of these towns. These barges were an integral part of CPR's undertaking in this area, and as such formed an integral part of CPR's railway system. The barges were built uniquely to accommodate rail traffic. There are rails on each barge which link up with rails on the wharves of each point of origin and of destination, thereby enabling railway cars to be transported from one point on Kootenay Lake to another without themselves being loaded and unloaded.
> The barges were never a separate operation from the operation of the railway lines which serve the Kootenay Lake area. They were built with actual rails on them so as to be able to connect directly with the lines of railway at Procter, Kaslo and Lardeau. Without the barges, there would have been no connected and continuous railway system to serve these areas. They were operated, as mentioned above, in place of a railway line along the shore because it was considered to be a more efficient method of transporting rail traffic from one town on the lake to another town on the lake.

Mr. Justice Le Dain made reference to CP's emphasis on the distinction between rail and water transport, as reflected in certain provisions of the Railway Act and the Transport Act. However, the issue which still remains is the operation of the rail barge service and, although it involves a form of water transport, the operation of a line of railway. Mr. Justice Le Dain came down with a decision which indicated that the Railway Transport Committee was without jurisdiction to take the action it did. Therefore it is quite proper for the House of Commons to clarify the legislative anomaly which caused the court to come to this conclusion, and prevent an obvious contradiction if an integrated transportation system were allowed to find a loophole to discontinue a link in the transportation service to a region, thus preventing the railway from doing what it could not do under the clear intent of the Railway Act.

I commend the Attorney General of Canada for this action. Since the government has seen fit, on November 18 of last year, to intervene and to seek leave to appeal the Federal Court decision to the Supreme Court—which leave was granted—I fail to see why, even though the Supreme Court is going to rule on this matter, the House of Commons would not be within its right to move forward and assist the court in changing the definition of "railroad". After all, we are the highest court in the land.

I commend the definition contained in this bill to the House of Commons because it seems to be most straightforward with no semantics and thus an acceptable definition as opposed to the one that exists now. It would not be construed by the Supreme Court of Canada, or anyone else I am sure, as interference or, indeed, as counter productive to what the court is about to do. It would give the court in some respects some assistance. More important than that, it would allow the House of Commons to improve a definition which, by its nature, is one of the most important and critical definitions in any statute, that being just what does constitute the proper definition of a railway.

I would like to congratulate the hon. member for presenting this bill and I commend it to the favourable attention of this House.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): On behalf of my party, Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate that we support the bill proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco). In a few moments I would like to attempt to persuade our colleagues on the government side to allow this bill to pass second reading and at least go to committee. I may not get further than that, but if it got through committee and came back here for third reading, then if the government or government members feel that they do not want it to pass, they can always put up three speakers at 20 minutes per speaker once every four years and the bill will never pass.

The issue of these rail and passenger ferries as between the continental mainland and appendages to Canada which happen to be islands is not new. Since the 1880's Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk in the early 1900's, and the Grand Trunk Pacific have made great arguments on how these were essential links in their rail systems. The CPR said decades ago that connecting the mainland to Vancouver Island was an essential part of their rail transportation system. In fact, it was part of their terms of reference, and the reason for their existence was to hook up Canada from coast to coast.

Suddenly, a rail ferry system that connects two parts of their rail lines on the ground across a piece of water is no longer relevant. I am no lawyer, Mr. Speaker, and I get a little tired of all the legal nitpicking that goes on, but if it was an essential part of a rail transportation system in the 1880's, 1910's or 1920's, I do not know how it is less essential now. The rail ferries across the Kootenay Lakes is a small part of the whole problem.

I hope my colleague from Kootenay West and his friends can persuade the Conservative government of British Columbia and the Liberal government of Canada that the British Columbia coastal ferries are an essential part of the trans-Canada highway. There should be no argument about that, but the B.C. government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) have opted for a user-pay principle on an essential part of the trans-Canada highway system. How they reconcile that I will never know. I hope the hon. member for Kootenay West can persuade people in Victoria and Ottawa on that matter.

Those passenger and rail ferries are an essential part of our road or rail system, since there are, in fact, large bodies of water inland and islands off our coasts on three sides that require water connections to whatever ground connections there are close by. We are attempting here to make some new law, or at least clarify old law or entrench in old law what has been an obvious fact and practice since the 1880's.

On top of that, the Canadian Transport Commission, which I would hardly call a great friend of the Canadian transport user—it has always been a great friend of the transport companies—ruled in favour of the transportation users. The communities and citizens around the Kootenay Lakes, the present member of parliament for Kootenay West, his predecessor, a provincial member of the legislature and the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission all agree that the demand and need has been very well expressed.

A lower court, after some legal nitpicking on behalf of some CPR counsel, overruled the Canadian Transport Commission, and now the matter is before the Supreme Court because the Department of Justice is appealing it. The Government of Canada is adding its weight to the representations made by the hon. member for Kootenay West, by other people and communities regarding a decision made by the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission.

If in appealing it is not obvious that this particular amendment to the Railway Act should go through, I do not know what else can be done. Perhaps we should hit the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) over the head with a cedar post to get his attention. I hope that is not necessary. I see no reason why this bill cannot go through right now on second reading to the standing committee. Whatever treatment it will receive there, it will still have to come back here for the report stage and third reading. If in the wisdom of the government or the parliamentary secretary it should not proceed any further, then the bill can still be stopped in private members' hour because this bill, along with 200 others, will be selected out of a hat in each session of parliament, and if the hon. member is lucky, and if he is still here, and if his bill comes out in the top 30 or 40, it will get called for debate for one hour once every four years.

Let us move on it at least to this extent. If the parliamentary secretary and his minister are worried about usurping or prejudging any decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, I do not think it is a valid concern. The Supreme Court, if and when it hears this case, will make its decision based on the old law, the old practice and the old decisions of the lower courts. However, if this parliament were to pass this amendment to the Railway Act, which is retroactive I believe to 1975—an excellent move on the part of the hon. member for Kootenay West—the Supreme Court will be relieved of a duty which it probably feels it should not have had in the first place. The CPR, CN or any other organization, who for decades have justified these essential water connections, should not be allowed now to turn around 180 degrees and tell us that it is not an essential part of the transportation system. That will not hold water, Mr. Speaker. I urge the parliamentary secretary and his colleagues to let this bill go to the committee. I am particularly anxious to hear the arguments of the CPR, so for that reason if for no other I hope the bill will go through second reading. It has our full support, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the speeches with a great deal of interest and I must say, as one who has a great amount of transportation going through his constituency, I always find transportation debates to be of great interest. I can readily understand the view of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) and the difficulties his communities have been faced with as a result of service which they have had available to them for a long period of time being withdrawn by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Unfortunately, it seems to me that those of us who live in the rural areas are constantly facing this problem of services which we have enjoyed and which have formed the centres around which our communities have grown being suddenly and almost unilaterally withdrawn by the transportation industry.

I submit there are probably good and significant reasons for those decisions to be taken, however hurtful they may be to the local communities. For example, one of the most important withdrawals of transportation services affecting the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River was passenger service on the northern part of the CNR line. That was a decision taken by the Canadian Transport Commission through its railway committee and it is in the process of implementation.

I find that particularly difficult to accept, as do most members who come from northern Ontario, because what has been agreed to under this plan is to put two passenger trains on the CPR line and none on the CNR line. While I am the first to admit that the reasons for using the CPR line are compelling at first glance—that is where the bulk of the population in north western and north eastern Ontario is located—at the same time it leads to a substantial denial of service to a large number of people and communities who have become dependent upon it. The replacement which has been suggested—that is, a three-days-a-week service between Capreol and Winnipeg—is inadequate.

It is this kind of attitude which leads me to support the position of the hon. member for Kootenay West. I can readily understand the frustration which his communities must face and the difficulties which they are confronted with through having an appropriate form of transportation removed. But while I agree with the hon. member in principle, I do not necessarily agree with the way in which he has chosen to proceed. I disagree because I think he ought to have held his bill until the Supreme Court has made its decision.

It seems to me that the Supreme Court—and I speak as a layman, not a lawyer—will make a decision in one of two ways. It will agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West in that it will say that, indeed, the particular instance of which he complains is within the jurisdiction of the Railway Transport Committee. In this event his bill will be superfluous. He will have won his case without it.

If, on the other hand, the Supreme Court agrees with the Federal Court, then it strikes me there will be a legislative remedy since the Attorney General of Canada is leading the charge in the Supreme Court against the CPR in support of the Railway Transport Committee. So the hon. member is in the beautiful position, it seems to me, of having won his case no matter what happens to this bill, and perhaps no matter what happens in the case before the Supreme Court.

There are some considerations which I think it would be useful to have on the record, however, in terms of what would happen if we did proceed with this bill and even, perhaps, were to pass it, assuming we would not have to pay any attention to the due processes of law. Speaking of that factor, Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that when we have created a system to adjudicate these disputes the least we can do before seeking a legislative remedy, or any other remedy, is to allow that due process to take place.

It appears to me there are a number of advantages which accrue to everybody concerned. First of all, of course, and most important, is the clarification of issues in such a way as to make them more readily understandable in terms of law. For as much as the hon. gentleman will protest, to some extent the case about which he is concerned is a local case. But any judgment involved—and, indeed, any judgment by this House—goes far beyond simply the local case; it goes right into the general application of the law across Canada and it may have consequences which are unforeseen. Therefore I would not like to see the House act precipitously or until we have moved through the system.

There are, however, implications which I would like to deal with briefly, Mr. Speaker, so that hon. members may realize what is at stake here. The first point is that if this bill were approved, the proposed act would imply that all automobile, rail and ferry services would come under the jurisdiction of the CTC. To put it mildly, Mr. Speaker, that would be a very substantial increase in the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission and particularly that of the Railway Transport Committee. That jurisdiction does not presently lie there and to some extent would amount to a transfer by the courts and by this proposed legislation of jurisdiction from one agency to another agency. I really think that would require far more determination than we could give it in private members' hour.

Second, if ferry services were deemed to be an extension of railway branch lines, when put up for abandonment they would become eligible for subsidies if their continuance were considered to be in the public interest. That also is a question of public policy and public tax moneys.

One of the things which strikes me as being at the heart of many of these rail line abandonments and the abandoning of services on which communities have become reliant is the fact that the people who have been paying for these services in the past have become reluctant to do so in the present and in the future. Indeed, this can be an important factor, because if the business is not there to justify the internal subsidies which are generated to keep these services going, then it seems to me that another form of subsidy has to be discovered. Usually that subsidy takes the form of taxpayers' money which is collected by the federal government and distributed to the agency involved.

A perfect example of this principle, Mr. Speaker, is the situation with respect to railway passenger service which has traditionally been paid for by the freight shippers in this country. At one time, perhaps, when railways were the main means of transportation for people as well as goods between communities, that was no problem. Passenger service may even have provided a substantial income and profit for the carriers. But it is interesting to note that back in the mid-sixties the legislation was changed so that 80 per cent of the losses incurred by the railways in providing passenger service would be paid by the general taxpayer to the federal government. It is interesting, again, to note that the concept of VIA Rail, which is now in the process of being implemented, provides for 100 per cent of the losses to be paid for by the general taxpayers.

It seems to me that the great difficulty we have when we experience local disruption of service by the cancellation of a particular type of service can only be solved by finding someone who can pay the bill. The costs of providing these services do not go away, and whether those who pay that bill, or the greater part of it, should be the general taxpayers or the persons requesting the service is a matter which this House has often debated and on which we have reached no real conclusion.

The more equitable way, it seems to me, would be to have a sharing of the costs between the general taxpayers and the users of the service. Whether the users of the service should pay a premium which is greater than that which somebody else acquiring the service in another geographical location requires is an open question. It appears to me that it would be very useful to have at least a substantial amount of the costs of providing any kind of service paid for by the users as well as a share being borne by the taxpayers.

The question in Canada, I suspect, as to what is the appropriate level of subsidization to be applied to various levels of transportation services is one which is going to bedevil us as long as this House exists. There will never be agreement. As long as people have to use these services there will always be argument raised, as a general principle and point of honour, that they are paying too much for transportation services, just as those taxpayers who do not necessarily use those services will complain that they, too, are paying too much through the general tax levy.

It is a known fact, for example, that the automobile accounts for the bulk of the intercity passenger miles, to the tune of about 85 per cent. Yet when we examine the amount of money which the federal government puts out in terms of railway passenger service, even before the new formula comes into effect, we can see that a person who uses his automobile is paying a substantial premium in order that people can use trains. I have no objection to this principle but we should acknowledge it and try to devise the proper relationship between the user who must pay for part of the service and the taxpayer who must pay for the rest of the service.

Another implication of this bill concerns interprovincial barge and ferry services which come under provincial jurisdiction at the present time. Consequently, there is potential for jurisdictional disputes between the federal and provincial governments. If this bill were to pass it is not clear just exactly where the jurisdictional argument would lead. We know that provinces have steadily acquired authority and power during the last ten to fifteen years at the expense of the federal government as well as opening up new areas for themselves. We also know how sensitive these interprovincial and intragovernmental disputes can be.

I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to extend the powers of the CTC with respect to this particular point of including waterborne railway traffic in the jurisdiction of the federal government, such legislation be drawn carefully so as to permit the provinces to carry on in those areas where they have traditionally carried on. I am not so certain that the federal taxpayer would want to pick up the subsidies which are now being carried by some provincial governments to provide services which they regard as essential, but which may not be essential from the point of view of maintaining a federal national transportation system.

The new proposal made by the hon. member for Kootenay West would be in conflict with the Canada Shipping Act respecting regulation of vessels in Canadian waters and Canadian registered vessels—

Mr. Benjamin: No. How did they operate previously?

Mr. Reid: While that is a matter which the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) may dismiss lightly, it does mean that if that is done the implications of amending the act are far greater than he chooses to admit. It is not only a question of changing the Transportation Act, it is also a question of changing the Canada Shipping Act and probably a few other acts as well. I do not hold that out as an impossible problem to overcome, but I point this out as an indication of what must be done in order to make the ideas of the hon. member more explicit.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member will accept a short question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentions some ramifications respecting navigation on water. Would he be good enough to explain to the House how the CPR and other organizations operated water craft for the past 90 years? There were requirements regarding navigation in the course of those water operations connecting their rail-lines. How was this accomplished over the past 80 or 90 years, if the hon. member is suggesting now that this is in conflict with maritime legislation?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I suggested there was a navigational problem. I did suggest that it could bring it into conflict with the Canada Shipping Act and there would be two jurisdictional authorities under the federal government intertwined which are now separate.

When one examines the situation on the inland waterways there is probably no difficulty at all about jurisdiction. However, what we are talking about is the application of this amendment. As I pointed out earlier, it may have ramifications regarding larger areas of jurisdiction than are contemplated by the hon. member. I did suggest that it could cause the jurisdictional authority of the Railway Transport Committee to extend into other areas which are now regulated by other acts. I used the Canada Shipping Act as an example of this kind of extension. It means that it totally confuses the regulatory authority.

It seems to me that if the hon. member for Kootenay West is correct in his assumption and also in his remedy, the amending bill will have to be a far more complex one than the one he has provided here. I do not criticize him for that because I think he has done his constituents and the House a service by bringing forward this knotty question in the way he has. The purpose of debate is to examine the ramifications and to see what the implications are of moving in this way. I am trying to indicate to him that the problem he has unearthed and for which he seeks remedy is a legitimate one. However, the solution he has developed may not be the only one. It may not be the most appropriate one and it may indeed cause more difficulties in other areas.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, members of the Railway Transport Committee and learned judges of the Federal Court of Appeal in Vancouver did not address themselves to the concerns expressed by the hon. member. They did not even visualize or conceive that this would be a problem in the arguments which were presented. How does the hon. member square his perception with reference to his arguments now in light of the fact that Mr. Justice Le Dain as well as other learned judges, including the members of the Rail Transport Committee, did not consider that type of argument to be germane to the case?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I would be surprised to know that in the judgments of the Federal Court and in the decisions of the Railway Transport Committee those arguments would have been considered at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until 8 o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING SURRENDER OF PERSONS APPREHENDED IN CANADA

The House resumed, from Monday, May 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill S-8, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Fugitive Offenders

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very long in the debate this evening. I think we might move through at least this stage expeditiously.

This bill contains amendments to the Fugitive Offenders Act and the Extradition Act. It is a further aspect of this government's effort to deal effectively with the world-wide scope of law-breaking, especially organized crime. We must recognize that modern day criminals are very mobile and sophisticated.

The purpose of this bill is to permit us under certain conditions to return foreign offenders to the countries where they committed their crimes, both inside the Commonwealth under the Fugitive Offenders Act, and in other countries by way of the Extradition Act. At the same time, the proposed legislation would enable us more effectively to seek the return for trial of Canadian offenders who have fled our borders.

Of equal importance, the bill contains provisions which would allow Canada to protect the civil liberties of refugees from political, racial or religious oppression. The bill is designed to allow Canada to play its proper role in suppressing true crime while protecting those who are victims of prejudice or oppression.

I think there are several parts of this bill which merit special attention. One is the new schedule of returnable offences which will be provided under the Fugitive Offenders Act. The present act provides that an offence is deemed returnable when it is punishable under the laws of the offender's country by at least 12 months' imprisonment combined with hard labour.

The new bill contains a schedule of returnable offences which has been modernized and updated and includes such serious modern day criminal phenomena as air piracy, income tax evasion, stock frauds, counterfeiting and bankruptcy offences.

One aspect of the new bill which merits attention is the provision which would allow the Minister of Justice a discretion to withhold permission to return an offender to his country if he is likely to be subjected to capital punishment. The prisoner can be surrendered if an assurance is given that the death penalty will not be imposed or, if imposed, that it will not be carried out. This means that there is no absolute prohibition of surrender to states which retain capital punishment.

This is not a provision unique to Canada. Such provisions are found in all modern extradition treaties to which Canada is a party. Indeed, Great Britain has included it in every extradition treaty it has negotiated since the second world war. I might go further to point out that the scheme relating to the rendition of fugitive offenders contains a supplementary article to this effect in Annex 2, Article 1. It should be noted that only eight associated states of the total 69 independent countries and dependencies in the Commonwealth have not yet abolished the death penalty for murder. These include Bermuda, Belize, the British Virgin Islands and the Cayman Islands.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Thus, the question of activating this ministerial discretion with respect to murder will rarely occur. If it should, however, the legislation does not suggest that Canada will not return accused murderers to these countries, but rather that the Minister of Justice has the discretion to request assurance that a penalty other than death, such as life imprisonment, will be imposed. That is to say that Canada does not necessarily have to return fugitive offenders, perhaps some of whom might be our own nationals, to a punishment greater or more extreme than that to which we ourselves would subject people in this country.

I should like now to discuss the provisions which would allow Canada to refuse to surrender a fugitive who is the subject of political persecution or prejudice based on religion, sex or nationality. As surprising as it may seem, under the present Fugitive Offenders Act a fugitive may not resist surrender to a commonwealth country for offences of a political character. Thus, if a revolution were to take place in some commonwealth country and the new government were of a vindictive disposition, it might conceivably lay serious charges against an individual for legitimate actions carried out while he was in the employ of the deposed government. Under the present act Canada would be obliged to return such an accused person. We have no authority at present, for example, to refuse to surrender a fugitive who is charged with an offence in Uganda. Hon. members will appreciate, therefore, the significance I attach to clause 4 of this bill.

This new act would give the Minister of Justice discretion to refuse to surrender an offender under such circumstances. Discretion may also be used where we believe the person charged with a returnable offence might be discriminated against on his return for reasons having nothing to do with his guilt or innocence but because of his race, religion, sex or nationality.

I must emphasize, however, that persons wanted for offences such as murder of or assault upon a head of state—something which the offender might consider an expression of political opinion—would not be subject to this ministerial discretion. They must be surrendered, subject to the death penalty clause I spoke of earlier.

In closing, I would like to point out that Bill S-8 provides important changes to legislation which is close to 100 years old and would allow Canada to play a much more effective role in modern international crime-fighting.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want first to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for his explanantion of the bill and for his brevity. I will also try to be brief. This bill is entitled "An act respecting fugitive offenders in Canada". It is really what in law we commonly call a bill dealing with extradition. Extradition—and I think I can put this succinctly—means surrender of a fugitive, alleged criminal, by one state or government to another within whose territories the criminal is accused of having committed crime, in order that he may undergo trial and, if convicted, punishment.

As I understand the bill, it applies only to certain crimes which are spelled out. The parliamentary secretary may want to correct me on this, but I believe that the bill applies only to commonwealth countries and not to others. We have been dragging our feet in getting a bill before the House because many of the countries, as the parliamentary secretary has said, have already endorsed and enacted their legislation.

The most questionable feature of this bill is the exclusion of persons who have committed offences of a political character. With the greatest of respect to the parliamentary secretary, I noticed that he quickly slid over that particular phrase regarding offences of a political character. Rather than being positive in the definition of offences of a political character, the bill does not say what that means. It says what it does not mean. It says that an offence of a political character does not include and I quote:

> . . . the murder, kidnapping or other assault on or restriction of the liberty of any person who is an "internationally protected person" as defined in section 2 of the Criminal Code or who would be such a person if
> (i) in the case of a person referred to in paragraph (a) of that definition, he were in a state other than the state in which he holds an office or position referred to in that paragraph, and
> (ii) in the case of a member of a family referred to in paragraph (b) of that definition, he accompanied a person referred to in paragraph (a) of that definition to a state other than the state in which the person referred to in that paragraph (a) holds an office or position referred to in that paragraph (a) . . .

That sounds like a jungle of words, but this offence applies not only to a political prisoner but also to his family or to those connected with him. The definition continues:

> (b) an attack on the official premises, private accommodation or means of transportation of any person referred to in paragraph (a),
> (c) any crime set out in item 22 or 23 of Schedule I . . .

One of the faults I find with this bill, which may lead to some problems in the future, is the lack of definition of a political prisoner. I can give an example. The fugitives to whom I refer are not in a commonwealth country, as far as I can ascertain. However, Your Honour will recall that some years ago Pierre Laporte, labour minister in the Quebec provincial government, was murdered, and Mr. Cross, a British diplomat, was kidnapped and held for many days contrary to his wishes. A deal was made with this government at that time. I am not here tonight to criticize that deal because we were dealing with a very sensitive diplomatic question. If the people involved in the kidnapping were permitted to go to a foreign state—I believe at that time it was Algeria—Mr. Cross would be released. Cross was released, and his kidnappers left the country.

Assuming Canada wanted to extradite them from a commonwealth country because of new evidence, the question would arise as to whether they are political prisoners. As I understand it, they were members of the FLQ or of some agency associated with the FLQ. Where are political prisoners defined? What does the term mean? I have great sympathy for the parliamentary secretary who referred to a revolution taking place in a certain country, and that was a good example. Another good example is the United Kingdom where many revolutions have taken place in the history of that country, where fugitives have left the country to escape with their lives to other countries where they could live in safety.

These were political prisoners in all likelihood and I do not believe that in such circumstances they should be handed over to the country from which they escaped. On the other hand, political prisoners might mean people such as those who murdered Laporte and kidnapped Cross. If, under this bill, they are not extradited because they are political prisoners, then I would like to see a definition of that term in this bill rather than an explanation of what that term does not mean, which is a negative approach. It is like taking four away from ten and ending up with six. You say the four points are what the term does not mean and the six points are unknown.

There is a great deal of ambiguity when you are dealing with extradition, and I have had some experience with that. Generally, a trial is held, as set out in this bill. The intent does not have to be proven at the trial, only that the crime was committed by that person. If that is proven, then generally there is an order of the court for the extradition of that person to the country or state which requests the return of the fugitive, and that is where the word "fugitive" comes from.

In addition to that remedy, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) always has discretion under the bill. I am not too sure—perhaps this will be clarified at the committee stage—at what point the court makes the decision and whether the minister exercises his discretion over and above the court decision or whether he exercises it in certain circumstances independently of the court. Those are some of the points that were left unanswered in the short speech made by the parliamentary secretary this evening.

Another provision in the bill which I believe should be considered very carefully is clause 18 on page 11 of the bill, which reads:

> 18(1) The minister may refuse to order the surrender of a fugitive offender where it appears to him that the fugitive offender would be likely to suffer the death penalty for the returnable offence in respect of which his return is requested if
> (a) that offence is not punishable by death in Canada;

Let us make that very clear. The last time the abolition bill came before the House, the death penalty for all offences in Canada, such as treason and murder, was abolished. In the case of the United States, individual states have reinstated the death penalty for murder in certain circumstances. Of course, that is not a commonwealth country. If that were to occur in a commonwealth country, there would be what I would call a vacuum problem.

I do not wish to reargue the question of the death penalty, the abolition of capital punishment. That is not my job tonight when considering a bill on extradition. What I want to say is that although Canada is one of the great nations of the Commonwealth, has followed the traditions of the Commonwealth and has taken part in the horrible holocaust of the second world war—that holocaust which was described to us on television—during which our armed forces have gained the respect of other nations, not only in the Battle of Britain but in the battle for survival in Europe, the battle to regain the freedom and liberty of those people, some of whom are fighting today the democratic institutions we enjoy, I do not think we should be dictating the law of the land to other nations.

Let me give an example. Suppose a fugitive escapes from another nation where capital punishment is the law and comes to Canada, and that nation asks for his extradition. I am not talking now about political prisoners. If we refuse to return him, we will become a haven for similar fugitives.

Let me refer to a study on that subject which has been done by a professor. Unfortunately I left the paper on my desk in my home in Calgary. It deals with Canadian laws relating to this subject. Since the abolition of capital punishment in Canada 87 people have been found guilty of first degree murder and some 100 found guilty of second degree murder. If that situation continues for three or four years, we will have in our prisons 900 people serving 25 years for first degree murder or 21 years for second degree murder. I do not know whether the institutions we have today are sufficiently well equipped to deal with such a large group of people. We have now in British Columbia a man who has committed his third offence but who cannot be sentenced to more than 25 years. I do not know what kind of law enforcement we would need if there were to be as many as 900 of those people confined in our prisons at one time.

What I am saying is that probably we can handle our own problems—or I trust we can, sir—but can we take care of fugitives from other lands who come here because there is no capital punishment here, and thus we become a haven for people found guilty of first degree murder and similar crimes which call for the death penalty? Under this bill, once they come to Canada they will not be extradited. I have not checked that out but I have the word of the parliamentary secretary that this is also the law in Great Britain. Of course, that does not make it right. I say that if the law of another land calls for either life imprisonment or the death penalty, it is the democratic process of that other country which should prevail for its citizens and it is not our function to dictate our law to other commonwealth nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Having said that, I wish to make the point that we should look at this provision very carefully in committee. I would like to see a witness called who is knowledgeable about the laws regarding this question in Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and other commonwealth nations. I would like to know where they stand on this problem at present. This bill covers all homicide, wounding, maiming and bodily harm, illegal abortion, kidnapping, abduction, false imprisonment, rape, indecent assault, incest and bigamy, procuring, wilful non-support or abandonment of a child or dependent person, robbery, theft, housebreaking, burglary, embezzlement, extortion, fraud, forgery and uttering, perjury, arson, assisting to escape custody, bribery, offences relating to civil disorders and riots, usury, and here is the one which was added, namely, endangering the safety of an aircraft.

Today, most hijacking is carried out internationally, according to the media, generally by political prisoners or in the name of political prisoners escaping. They have attempted to upset things in their own countries, and they want to get out. It is similar to the situation which is ongoing in Italy. They want to trade off the unfortunate former prime minister of Italy, Mr. Moro, for the escape of those people who caused terrorism in that country. So far the Italian government has said no. I do not want to comment on that because it is an international situation. If one was to use the example of a commonwealth country, these fugitives may escape and get on a plane. They could hijack the plane, as well as commit some crimes such as wounding, killing and other things. Are these people to be considered political prisoners? It is for reasons such as this that I would like the term "political prisoners" defined in the act. I am not objecting to what this bill contains. I am indicating that the bill is wrong in what it does not contain. We do not want Canada to become a haven for political prisoners.

I should like to refer to clauses 12(a) and 15(b) of Bill S-8. Clause 15 reads as follows:

> A fugitive offender committed to prison under section 11 shall not be surrendered under this act
> (a) in any case, until the expiration of the fifteen days . . .
> (b) if the fugitive offender makes an application for leave to appeal or for a writ of habeas corpus, until all proceedings on the application and on any appeal arising out of the application have been finally disposed of.

I do not see anything too wrong with that. Habeas corpus is a remedy of special prerogative writs. Actually it came from the United Kingdom. If a person is wrongfully incarcerated in prison because of some basic principle of law, an application is made to a judge to have him released. Habeas corpus application can be made in conjunction with certiorari, where the certiorari is quashing the charge. Then habeas corpus is an order to release the prisoner.

People have the right of appeal, which appeal falls under the jurisdiction of the county courts and the superior courts. If a person loses an application in respect of extradition and is faced with being sent back to a commonwealth country, for example, under the spirit of the act he will have the right of appeal. After 15 days, in the due process of law, he has the right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus. I think that is good protection.

Bill S-8 exempts ambassadors and heads of state to certain degrees. For example, if an English ambassador to Canada went to Australia for a visit and was kidnapped by a Canadian in that country, that Canadian could be extradited because he kidnapped an ambassador. Of course, I will deal with that question more fully at committee level.

I have made my case in reference to the question of capital punishment. We are trying to lay down the law by referring to the situations in other countries. I thank the parliamentary secretary for his brevity. I have attempted to be as brief in my remarks. Basically extradition is necessary in our relationships with other states within the Commonwealth. When this bill becomes law, I hope some of the matters I have referred to will be explained by the committee. I hope amendments will occur to bring it into line. In closing, we endorse this bill in principle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I take it the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) would like to see this bill go to committee. I was going to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to revert to committee of the whole at this point. My understanding is that this proposal was discussed at one time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, the more propitious route would be to refer the matter to committee for it to be dealt with in the usual manner, rather than taking the time of the House by reverting to committee of the whole. We are interested in dealing with whatever legislative program the government has in mind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we think it would be better to let this bill go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Accordingly, the bill has been referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE RESPECTING LANGUAGE USED IN COURT TRIALS

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-42, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-42 represents a very important legislative step in our criminal justice system, and is an amendment to the Criminal Code. It constitutes fulfilment of a commitment made in the last Speech from the Throne to guarantee language rights of accused persons before our criminal courts. All members will appreciate the significance which such a step bears upon the issue of national unity. It is significant at this particular time, because it is being introduced and moved by a British Columbian.

This bill is directed to official language minorities, be it the French minority outside Quebec in the settlements and communities across Canada, or the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec. I will go into the details of this bill a litle later, but I should like to take an opportunity at the outset to emphasize that this bill is not forcing French or English down anyone's throat, nor is it forcing French or English down the throats of the nation's court houses. The intent of this bill is to allow people, whose language is either French or English, to testify or tell their own stories in their own language to people who speak the same language.

This means that the most important part of the case for the accused—his side of the story—is told without the encumbrances and difficulties of translation, because the trier of the fact, be it judge or jury, will understand the language of the accused. It does not mean that any French-speaking or English-speaking person can demand a completely French or English trial in any part of Canada. But it does mean we intend by the provisions of this bill, which have been worked out, I think, very sensitively on this issue, to be careful and deliberate in implementing this measure to provide the protection which I think at the present time in our country's development it is essential to provide.

It seems to me that all persons living in a country which recognizes two official languages must have the right to use and be understood in either of those languages when on trial before courts of criminal jurisdiction. I repeat that a trial before a judge or jury who understand the accused's language should be a fundamental right and not a privilege. The right to be heard in a criminal proceeding by a judge or a judge and jury who speak the accused's own official language, even if it is the minority official language in a given province, surely is a right that is a bare minimum in terms of serving the interests of both justice and Canadian unity. It is essentially a question of fairness that is involved.

I should point out at the outset that Ontario has recently taken some administrative measures within its court system and has introduced legislation to provide greater language rights to accused persons in that province. The House will recall that the province of New Brunswick has in fact implemented through its own judicature act, and through the application of the Official Languages Act, a similar system in the province. Apart from special provisions in the Criminal Code relative to Quebec and Manitoba, the practice in the province of Quebec is to conduct trials in either official language.

Bill C-42 would extend what this government considers to be a basic minimum of equal language rights before the criminal courts to all persons in every province and territory. It does not mean, however, that in every part of each province will such a right apply. Clearly some parts of each province will be better able to provide the required resources more quickly than others.

The bill also provides that persons whose language is neither of the two official languages may be tried in the official language in which they are most proficient, whether that language is English or French in the province where the trial is to be held. Naturally, and I want to underline this, Mr. Speaker, this does not, obviously, abrogate the rights that people now have under the Bill of Rights by which an interpreter is guaranteed for persons on trial who speak neither of Canada's official languages.

We have been discussing the provisions contained in this bill with the provinces since last fall, both at the political and at the official levels, and the legislation was reviewed again very recently at a federal-provincial meeting of deputy attorneys general held in Ottawa earlier this month. Not a single province was opposed to the concept embodied in this bill, and each of them, I think, recognized the need at this particular time for us in Canada and in this parliament to legislate in this area.

Indeed, the very positive and encouraging reaction from many of the provinces bodes very well for the future of this country. The attorney general of Nova Scotia has termed the purpose of this bill a laudable objective. The attorney general of Ontario has written to me to state the following:

I welcome the initiatives set out in your letter, which I understand have now been placed before Parliament with the introduction of Bill C-42 on April 4, 1978.

As you will have noted, Mr. Speaker, last week the attorney general of Ontario introduced complementary provincial legislation to bring into effect within Ontario the provisions of this bill when it is passed. Their chief concern, as is to be understood, is that proclamation of the bill not be carried out until they have been closely consulted on the date of implementation. I have given that undertaking in writing to provincial attorneys general, and I repeat that undertaking here this evening.

Proclamation, as is provided for under the bill, will be on a province by province basis. This means that the law will not come into force throughout the country at the same time. I indicated when I introduced the bill that I hoped it could be proclaimed and implemented very quickly in the province of Quebec. I have today received a letter from the minister of justice for Quebec expressing his appreciation for consultation on the measure, expressing his willingness to go forward and expressing, obviously, his desire to be consulted in working out the mechanics of proclamation and implementation.

As I indicated, the province of Ontario has requested this legislation and has introduced complementary provincial legislation. The provisions apply in New Brunswick where there is a system now under the Official Languages Act that embodies much the same thrust and principle of this bill, and I would hope it could also be implemented as quickly as in the province of Manitoba, thereby covering in those four provinces the largest communities of both French and English-speaking minorities.

I recognize that not all provinces can accommodate these changes at the same moment, and some, understandably, for demographic reasons, have greater resources in personnel and other resources for these measures. This bill and its proposal for implementation are as flexible and as sensitive as possible to assist the provinces in putting the legislation into effect.

We have reassured the provinces that the bill does not require entire court proceedings to be held in the official language of the accused since this would obviously cause serious difficulties in some provinces in respect of the need to hire and train prosecutors and other court officials perfectly fluent in the minority official language.

The scheme of the legislation is that the accused person very quickly at his first appearance in court will be advised by the judge that he has the right to be tried in French or English, at his choice, by a judge or judge and jury who speak that language. The judge may, after receiving that election from the accused, in appropriate cases order that the trial be presided over by a judge and jury who speak both official languages, who are bilingual. Where such orders are made it would be possible, if appropriate, to have trials held in a bilingual fashion, subject to the rights of the accused to be assisted by an an interpreter for those parts of the trial conducted in a language other than his own. Prosecutors and court officers would also be assisted by interpreters, if necessary.

The bill provides that courts may order a change of venue within the same province when the trial cannot be conveniently held within a given territorial division. Some provinces have suggested that we allow change of venue between provinces, but I do not feel this would best serve the interests of justice as far as the accused is concerned. It also raises certain jurisdictional problems, by reason of change of venue of an accused's trial from one province to another, that are very difficult to resolve. Thus we have chosen instead, and in keeping with suggestions made by certain other provinces, to provide for regulations to be made by lieutenant governors in council in each province so that if the province so wishes it may allow for these measures to be in force only in some territorial divisions of a particular province.

This recognizes that there are within many provinces settlements or pockets of population using English or French as a minority language. In such areas these measures can be easily introduced. There are, however, many communities or districts in English-speaking parts of Canada where little French is spoken and where the population is very small and, similarly, communities and districts in provinces in French-speaking parts of Canada where little English is spoken. Thus, courts of other territorial divisions not able to proceed in the official language of the accused because of the lack of adequate language capacity may order the trial transferred to one of these designated territorial divisions.

The provinces and the federal government will have to give greater attention in the future, when making appointments to the bench, to the language capabilities of the candidates. The same should apply when hiring some Crown prosecutors and other court officials. In addition, certain federal-provincial programs for the language training of provincial and municipal officials already exists. I have given provincial attorneys general the assurance that, if need be, consideration will be given to extending these programs in order to better meet the needs of the provinces. As I say, I have undertaken to explore this matter with the provinces.

The question of finding sufficient jurors who speak the minority official language in some provinces has been raised as a potential problem. It is interesting to note that even Newfoundland, which has the smallest Francophone population in Canada, still has some 3,500 Francophones among its half million population. In a usual case it requires at the maximum 100 people to impanel a jury for a trial and therefore even in the smallest province it seems to me possible for the sheriff, bailiff or the appropriate officer to impanel a jury. Prince Edward Island has over 7,000 Francophones and Saskatchewan has over 31,000. We believe that the necessary population exists in each province and territory, keeping in mind the ability to move trials to designated districts, to permit impanelling of the jury speaking the official minority language of that province or territory. Since there is no reason to believe that official minority groups have a higher crime rate than the majority, it is not likely that there will be an inordinately heavy demand for minority language criminal trials which would place unusual strains on the minority population in terms of jury duty.

It is also worth noting that a significant percentage of all criminal trials in Canada are held in the three major centres of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, all of which have a substantial Francophone population and an availability of bilingual judges. Therefore, in expressing and outlining the scheme of this legislation in which the accused person may elect to be tried by a judge or judge and jury in the official language of his choice, and by which the judge thereafter may order that the trial be held bilingually, and by which, if appropriate, the venue of the trial can be changed from one judicial district to another, it seems to me, and I seriously submit, that this piece of legislation can be proclaimed and implemented in all of the provinces of Canada in an orderly way so as not to affect the administration of justice. At the same time it provides this essential right that it is important to preserve and protect at this particular time.

There is in each of the provinces, taking into account the option to have a bilingual trial, taking into account the option of moving the trials from one judicial district to another, in my view the ability to establish at least in one judicial district in fairly short order a system of judges and jury selection to allow this bill to be implemented. The population statistics for each province indicate that that is the case. This bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before this House in that it proposes to guarantee to all persons in Canada a minimum of equal linguistic rights before courts of criminal jurisdiction.

There is nothing in this bill to prevent the provinces from going further and providing, for example, for full court proceedings in either official language or for extending language of trial rights to civil proceedings, which are clearly within their jurisdiction. Indeed, some provinces, notably Quebec and New Brunswick, will offer accused persons in their jurisdiction more than is strictly required by this bill once it becomes law. Ontario has also set machinery in motion, as I indicated, to enhance these language provisions. Obviously, not all provinces have the resources to go much beyond what this bill requires of them, but all have expressed the view that this minimum guarantee is one that is essential if Canada is to survive as a country with two official languages.

I have been heartened since this subject was first raised by my informal discussions with judges across the country, all of whom have indicated to me their capacity to establish in each province a bilingual facility for the hearing of such cases. More importantly, each has indicated to me an understanding that this is something that we as a parliament and as a country should do at this particular time.

It has been said that national unity and the preservation of national unity is not the preserve of any particular political party in this House. I would hope that each of us in this House, regardless of which side we sit on, will examine this bill, and the principle and right that it is designed to protect, preserve and enhance. By supporting this bill members are recognizing that this is a measure that we at this particular time should be passing, should be supporting. All members, regardless of where they sit, would be making their particular contribution to national unity by supporting this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. minister leaves I wonder if he would permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. minister permit a question of the hon. member for Calgary North?

Mr. Basford: Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: I listened very carefully to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), and I would like to get his position very clear in my mind before I make my opening remarks. My question is: Can he assure the House that the attorneys general of all ten provinces agreed to the bill in question as it is worded at the present time? Is that his position, and does he say they all agreed without any changes to the bill?

Mr. Basford: As I indicated in my speech, Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations going back to last fall, mainly between officials of my department and those of the provincial attorneys general. There was one round of consultations which took place regarding the concept of the idea. At that consultation various aspects, problems and suggestions were raised. There was a further consultation when our proposal had been further developed.

Prior to introduction of the bill and in the course of those consultations, the representatives of each province indicated that they supported this concept and these proposals. Just before introduction of the bill I wrote to each provincial attorney general and in a long letter—without sending them the precise copy of the bill in order not to breach the parliamentary tradition—outlined to them in quite complete form the proposed measure I was intending to introduce, asking them for their comments and suggestions. I received no suggestions for change. Obviously, if one were to indicate the need for change, I would consider that very carefully.

As I indicated in my speech, I have had communication with a number of attorneys general—the minister of justice of Quebec, the attorney general of Ontario, the attorney general of Nova Scotia—and they have all indicated their support and willingness to work with us in implementing this bill. I am sorry to take so long in answering the question.

Mr. Woolliams: I thought you could have said yes or no.

Mr. Basford: Having read the comments of the attorney general of Manitoba as reported in the press when the bill was introduced, I can only conclude that he misunderstood its purport and thought it had the requirement that there be trials in both languages in every judicial district of Manitoba. That is not the effect of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is rising on a point of order.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I should also like to ask the minister a number of questions before he leaves, but if the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has additional questions I shall wait until he is finished and then put my questions.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my question was not quite answered by the minister. I have a preamble to this question because we are going to ask for a substantial change to one part of the bill. Have the attorneys general of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and the other provinces that he missed said yes or no to the principle of this bill?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, through official discussions each province has indicated that they support the provisions of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if he provided additional information on this bill to members of the government. I did not catch all of his remarks tonight and I should like to know if he provided additional information to them. If so, did he discuss the question whether or not the government would consider extending the program as it relates to municipal and provincial public servants?

Mr. Basford: I am not sure I understand the question, Mr. Speaker. As is usual, when I introduced the bill I gave members of my caucus my written description of the bill and its effect. Regarding the latter part of the question, as I said in my speech and indicated in the press release that was attached to the bill when it was introduced, there is a program for the support of language training for provincial and municipal officials. I indicated that I would be ready to discuss an extension or enlargement of that program with the provinces in order to include court officers in language training.

The question was whether the bill would be extended to include provincial and municipal officers. That is not true as it relates to the amendment to the Criminal Code, but I indicated that we were ready to discuss extending the program to include court officers.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question. I should like a direct answer. Did he provide additional information on this bill to government members in a two-page document entitled "Background Information"? I ask him directly if he provided additional information to members of the government that was not provided to members of the opposition.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I just answered yes to that. I have not checked the difference between the press release and whatever information I sent to members of my caucus, but if there is a difference the answer is yes, and if there is not a difference the answer is no.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in certain parts of the country such as in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and even some parts of Ontario, both official languages are used. Although we support the bill in principle we will ask for substantial amendment to it. The bill basically covers all the crimes set out in the Criminal Code.

The minister has said that the program will be phased in by the federal government. Clause 6(1) of the bill reads, in part, as follows:

> ... shall come into force in any province only on a day fixed in a proclamation ...

That means a proclamation of the federal government alone. When the bill reaches the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I shall ask that this law not be phased in in any province unless it is done by joint proclamation of the federal and provincial governments or with the consent of the province in question. In other words, before this could become law in the province of Quebec, for example, the Quebec government would have to give its consent to a federal proclamation. Before this could become the law of the land it would require enabling legislation or a proclamation of the federal government as called for in clause 6 with the consent—not in consultation with but with the consent—of the provinces.

I contend on behalf of my party and on behalf of my national leader that provincial rights in this matter must be respected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: According to section 92(14) of the constitution, the administration of justice falls within the sole jurisdiction of the provinces.

I want to emphasize again that we agree with the bill in principle. There are many areas of Canada in which the two linguistic groups co-exist in great numbers. The provinces will also be concerned about the cost of implementing this program and therefore must have some say in it.

The federal government opposed the province of Quebec on certain aspects of an inquiry into organized crime in that province where various criminals and syndicates were being investigated. This government and this Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) actually told the government of Quebec that it could not appoint a commission to investigate crime within its own borders!

As a result of that challenge the Supreme Court of Canada heard the appeal of Nicola Di Iorio and Gérard Fontaine and The Warden of the Common Jail of the City of Montreal and Rhéal Brunet, the Attorney General for Canada, the Attorney General for Quebec, the Attorney General for Ontario, the Attorney General for Alberta, the Attorney General for British Columbia and the Attorney General for New Brunswick. It is interesting to read the remarks of Mr. Justice Martland in the Canada Supreme Court Reports, Part 1, 1978 Vol. 1 at page 154 where, referring to the legislation to set up the commission in the province of Quebec, he said:

> The legislation under attack is based solely on the province's jurisdiction in the "Administration of Justice". This is an independent source of provincial power which does not need to rely on some other head of power.

By "head of power" he means the federal government. In light of that judgment we will be asking for an amendment to clause 6 of this bill to ensure that, if it is to become the law of any province, such province has the right to proclaim it jointly with the federal government so that it can be declared the law of the land. That is what the decision says and that is the law. That is what every province has asked for in order to keep a united Canada and to save confederation from being endangered by the federal government running slipshod over provincial rights.

Let me quote from the Canada Supreme Court Reports at page 155 of the same case:

> BEETZ J: . . . But subject to this provision and to the paramountcy of federal law enacted under primary or ancillary federal jurisdiction, the provinces were to remain responsible in principle for the enforcement of criminal law and to retain such power as they had before with respect to the administration of criminal justice.
> Section 92(14) of the B.N.A. Act does not distinguish between civil and criminal justice the natural meaning of the expression the administration of justice is broad enough to encompass both.

It is broad enough to mean that this falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Having said that—and I want to repeat it to make sure it is clear that our party agrees in principle with this bill. We say we will buy this legislation if this law comes into force only by joint proclamation of both levels of government or by a proclamation of the federal government, as a matter of procedure, with the consent of the provinces, not some wishy-washy consultation we do not know anything about. That is our position.

Now I come to the rights of the judiciary. This is something which is precious to all of us here in parliament, the highest court of the land. I want to set out something I think we should always keep in mind when we are dealing with the judiciary. What is the function of the judiciary? Everybody must have a fair trial. I might say in passing that in this great land of ours are people from all over the world. I can name many countries which are represented, not only in Toronto but in many parts of western Canada. These are people who speak many languages. Our courts have always been understanding of this. Whether a person speaks Ukrainian, Italian or whatever language, when he appears before the bench for trial, or even in a civil matter, if he does not understand English or French there is always an interpreter supplied to ensure that person gets a fair and equitable trial. That is a procedure I have seen. It certainly takes a long time but justice is never great if it is rushed. There is no justice when it is rushed justice.

What is the function of the judiciary? It enables the guarantee of security to the weak against the strong and to the individual against the community. It presents a shield against the tyranny of power and arrogance and against the irresponsibility and irrationality of popular action, whether of opinion or violence. It enables the voice of sanity to rise above the turbulence of passion; and it is to be preserved inviolate.

But what does the independence of judges imply? That can be nothing short of this: That the minister to whom such an authority is committed shall himself be the first to respect what has been entrusted to him, the administration of the rule of justice under law, including loyalty to its institutions. That sets out what our courts are really all about.

We have separation of powers. We have legislative powers, on the one hand, and we have the judiciary, on the other. Then there is the Crown. There is our separation of power. When the minister speaks of Quebec and Manitoba I would bring to the House's attention something in the Criminal Code which every member should appreciate tonight. This adds weight to the argument which I have presented. Section 555 of the Criminal Code deals with mixed juries in Quebec. For the record, because it is so important, I will read part of that section:

> (1) In those districts in the Province of Quebec in which the sheriff is required by law to return a panel of Petit jurors composed one-half of persons who speak the English language and one-half of persons who speak the French language, he shall in his return specify in separate lists those jurors whom he returns as speaking the French language, and the names of the jurors summoned shall be called alternately from those lists.

What does that mean? For example, say a person is charged with murder. A jury panel is assembled composed of half French and half English jurors. If the accused happens to be French and wishes to be tried in the province of Quebec in French, then a French jury is picked, so there is nothing new. We have that now in the province of Quebec.

The other sections give the right as:

(2) The judge may order the sheriff to summon a sufficient panel of jurors who speak the language of the accused unless, in his discretion, it appears that the ends of justice are better served by empanelling a mixed jury.

In some cases they have that. And that is not only in Quebec; this law of the land is in the Code. If one looks at this bill these sections are repealed and they are rewritten pretty well in the same language. I do not want to leave any misunderstanding tonight that the Minister of Justice is doing something new for the province of Quebec.

Now I will deal with the province of Manitoba. Section 556 says:

(1) Where an accused is arraigned before the Court of Queen's Bench for Manitoba demands a jury composed at least half of persons who speak the language of the accused, if that language is either English or French, he shall be tried by a jury composed at least of one-half of the persons whose names stand first in succession upon the general panel and who, not being lawfully challenged, are found, in the judgment of the court, to speak the language of the accused.

In other words, in the province of Quebec and in the province of Manitoba this law has been in effect and has worked well. I have never received or heard any complaints from anyone in those provinces as far as the judiciary is concerned—

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would accept a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. minister mind asking me the question at the end of my speech because I want to keep my thoughts together.

What offences does this bill include? We now turn to Section 462.1, which is the introduction section. It says:

On application by an accused whose language is one of the official languages of Canada, made not later than (a) the time of the appearance of the accused at which his trial date is set, if he is accused of an offence . . .

What offences does this cover? It deals with treason, breaching the peace, intimidating parliament, mutiny, sedition, murder and bribery. In addition to that it deals with all offences under which a provincial judge has absolute jurisdiction, like summary convictions and some indictable offences. It deals with all offences where the accused may be tried by a provincial judge with the accused's consent. It deals with all offences in which the high court has absolute jurisdiction with or without a jury. That is under the Code.

We agree, providing the provinces consent or have a joint proclamation, that a person should be tried in one or the other official language, similar to the provision in sections 555 and 556 of the Criminal Code. We agree providing the provinces consent or have a joint proclamation. A person should be tried in one or the other official language similar to section 5(55) or 5(56) of the Criminal Code. I have asked the question, what does the Code say today? I have recited what it states in Quebec and Manitoba. We have mixed juries in both Quebec and Manitoba. These are some of the things we must think about when the bill gets to the committee level.

Let us not create an expectancy for Canadians that we cannot fulfil. I know something about the make-up of this country. I know what goes on in Vancouver, Victoria, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Toronto and other major cities in Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. Let us not create an expectancy for Canadians we cannot fulfil. The minister was fair in that regard in his speech. I will deal with Calgary. I know more about it because I live there. If you want to have a trial in the French language, unless you can find a venue like St. Paul, you will not get a fair trial. There are not enough people who speak the language fluently.

The practice of law and the judiciary is very sophisticated. In order for a person to make a proper defence, there must be proper communication. The judge can in his discretion change the venue. The big thing in the bill is that there is nothing about the cost. Will the federal government underwrite these costs, particularly in such places as the Atlantic provinces and the western provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia?

I can understand the situation in Ontario because it is part of central Canada. The two provinces of upper and lower Canada are side by side. There is greater communication and immigration from one to the other, if you can call provincial exchange of citizens that. Therefore, you have a greater population of both races and the problem is different. In some areas, it may be very difficult.

What about the practical approach? If you are to have a fair trial, the clerk, registrar, court reporters, judge and jury must speak that official language. If you are to phase this in by federal proclamation without the provinces having a say in it, you are thrusting the problem on the provinces, creating some aggravation and some irritation by these added costs. That is why provincial rights must not be run slipshod over.

Our constitution, the law of this land sets out that the administration of justice falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Criminal law falls under the jurisdiction of the federal government. Section 92(14) reads:

The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

One then asks, is this bill constitutional? The Supreme Court of Canada has said that the administration of justice falls under provincial jurisdiction. The administration of justice is one of those provincial rights that a province has and each should have the right to proclaim this legislation. If they so wish, before the law is enacted it may be done jointly with the federal government and the provincial governments. Is that too much to ask when it is within the provinces' jurisdiction? I do not think so.

That is why we say we agree with the spirit of the bill, but that we will ask, urge, seek and press for that amendment at the committee level. We shall insist on an amendment to this bill after the words:

—shall come into force in any Province only on a day fixed in a Proclamation declaring that the—

It then deals with various sections of the Code, different laws under different parts of the Code. That should be amended to "fixing a proclamation by the federal government and by the provincial government" or "a proclamation by the federal government with the consent of the provinces". In that way, you would keep a happy family together. You would get full co-operation in legislation rather than thrusting it on people as policy, as was done with some other matters that came before this House for expensive programs. The provinces could ill afford them and the federal government did nothing with regard to their financing.

In other words, this amendment would mean that this act creating language rights in the courts and which falls under administration of justice, a provincial right, shall not be thrust on the provinces without their enabling legislation declaring the same, or without obtaining each province's consent before this language bill becomes the law in any province. Surely that is fair. In other words, before any province adopts this law, they must agree and consent to the same.

The minister said he had the consent of the provinces through consultations. However, they may want some time to arrange their affairs. Ontario became a province long before confederation in the west in 1905. Therefore, it has had more time. They have more French Canadians, more people speaking both official languages. It is therefore possible to change the venue from Toronto to northern Ontario with bilingual judges or bilingual or French-speaking staff. It will work. In fact, it must work if we are going to have confederation. However, to thrust it on a province without preparation or consulting them is very dangerous and unconstitutional.

I hope that when I resume my seat I will have made a case. I have said we agree in principle. I hope I have made a case for confederation and a case for provincial rights. I hope the Minister of Justice will not say no just because the bill happens to have been drafted in that way. With regard to the pornography bill, he said he would not change the definition. However, when I read the new bill, I saw it was the one we recommended. That is commendable. I commend the Minister of Justice for his flexibility in that regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Some provinces may agree, some provinces may not, but each province should have the right to make its choice. It is their jurisdiction.

We shall insist on this amendment. We will press hard for it. This bill is really an invasion of provincial rights because the administration of justice falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces. There must be legal consultation between the federal government and all the provincial governments which have to plan what will take place when this amendment is accepted.

Extra costs of the administration of justice must be borne by the federal government. Surely that is fair because it is common to all Canadians. Our constitution divides those things common to all Canadians as being under federal jurisdiction and those that are local as being under provincial jurisdiction.

We will approve this legislation very quickly if the amendment is accepted. It can only be made at the committee stage, unless it is at report stage. However, once it gets to that stage it is buried—voted on and forgotten. We would move the amendment now if the rules of parliament would permit that. The rules do not permit an amendment at second reading but only at the committee and report stages. I want to repeat that our amendment will say that the bill shall come into force in any province only on a day fixed in a federal and provincial proclamation declaring the sub-paragraph to be in force in that province, and for greater certainty it will go on to describe what particular sections of the code we are talking about. If it would make for more comfortable language and drafting, it could be done in consultation.

When we are dealing with matters affecting confederation it is a good time to say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has too long played ducks and drakes with the constitution, and above all, provincial rights. He confronts and thrusts laws illegally on provinces and then wonders why there is trouble in the land. He likes that. He is a man who sets himself up as king to solve all the problems he creates. He is like the fellow who threw a pail of dust, cleaned it up with a vacuum cleaner and said "Look at what a good job I have done".

Mrs. Campagnolo: You support it all in principle.

Mr. Nystrom: What is that?

Mrs. Campagnolo: I said he supports it all in principle.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am glad I was interrupted. What about the sales tax? The Prime Minister said, when questioned by our leaders and others, that there had been consultation. He tried to leave the impression that there was consent. Then we found out that three provinces had not consented at all. Finally, agreements had to be made with two, and there is still no agreement with Quebec. That is not consultation. The Prime Minister said there was negotiation. This is his negotiation: "This is my position, I won't move an inch, and if you don't come to the trough to drink, you don't get any water".

My party is the party of confederation. We want it to work, and it will work. The provision of trial services in both French and English throughout Canada will not be made without problems. Some will see this as essentially a duplication, and a needless one, of services. In parts of this country where little French is spoken these amendments are likely to result, as the Minister of Justice said, in some criticism. It is therefore important that a federal administration intending to implement trial services in French and English be aware of local, regional and provincial concerns. That is why we must have a joint proclamation of this legislation.

No one can pretend that trial services in French and English throughout the country will come cheaply. This is not a matter to be dealt with lightly either, in view of the government's penchant for making greater demands on the private sector to provide resources for more and improved public services and goods. Spokesmen in this party have stated on many occasions the necessity of slowing the growth of government expenditures. We are on record as favouring a permanent tax cut. We have talked about that. The government talks about restraint, but if it is going to thrust legislation on the provinces by its own unilateral proclamation, it should be ready to pay the shot.

It is within this framework that these amendments, which will be approved by this House, must go forward and be implemented in the most efficient and reasonable manner possible. This will require a great deal of consultation with all provincial governments.

I come back to the first point I made. In New Brunswick the right of litigants to elect trials in French or English dates back ten years. It is nothing new. Approximately 37 per cent of the population of that province speaks French as a first language.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): It dates back six years.

Mr. Woolliams: If the hon. member is from New Brunswick, I accept his correction and thank him very much. I said ten years. That figure was given to me by my researchers, and I accepted it. I thank the hon. member very much for that interruption. New Brunswick is now completely bilingual in providing services, including services in the court system.

The official languages act of New Brunswick provides the right to witnesses to testify in the official language—French or English—of their choice. And, subject to the discretion of the trial judge, who must satisfy himself as to the interests of justice, litigants have the right to elect the language of their trial. Because this act is provincial legislation, it applies only to prosecutions under provincial and municipal legislation and in civil matters. Of course, the administration of justice regarding court procedures under the Code comes under the provinces, and that is why we need a joint proclamation.

Trial services in French and English cannot be implemented overnight. In New Brunswick approximately 40 per cent of that province's courtroom staff, including judges, are bilingual. Implementation of recent measures in New Brunswick has been greatly aided by the fact that trials at the magistrate or provincial court level have taken place in French for at least one hundred years in some parts of the province where French is the predominant language. In recent years some expense has been involved in having available courtroom staff which is French-speaking to deal with cases in English-speaking areas of the province. So it works two ways.

In cases where preliminary hearings or jury trials are necessary a change of venue adds to the expense of holding trials. New Brunswick and Ontario have committed funds for trial services in French and English. However, other provinces are of the opinion that federal financial assistance is needed to help in training courtroom staff, in providing the necessary facilities and in defraying the actual expense of holding a trial in the "other" official language.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Here is one example of how onerous a burden this could become: In Newfoundland, the predominant French-speaking area is in Labrador. These amendments allow for a change of venue, so presumably somebody charged with an offence in St. John's who wished to have his trial conducted in French would have to have his trial shifted to Labrador. That would certainly cost money.

Leadership in bringing a bilingual capacity to Canadian courts has been taken by two provinces, New Brunswick and Ontario, which provide trials in both official languages. It is reasonable and to be expected that these two provinces should be leaders in the provision of trials in both official languages. New Brunswick and Ontario are the two provinces with the largest French-speaking populations outside the province of Quebec.

Ontario's efforts at providing trials in both official languages dates back to 1975. The present attorney general of Ontario, Mr. Roy McMurtry, committed his government to the development of French language services in the courts that year. In 1976 the province began a pilot project in Sudbury in the provincial court, the court which deals with 99 per cent of criminal and quasi-criminal cases. Last year the province extended French language services to the judicial district of Ottawa-Carleton, to the united counties of Prescott and Russell and to five communities in northern Ontario: Cochrane, Kapuskasing, Hearst, Hornepayne and Smooth Rock Falls.

With the expansion last year, French language services are now available in 66 per cent of Ontario. What Ontario has done can be done in the remainder of the provinces if the proper procedure is followed.

Ontario's commitment to French language services in the courts has not stopped at this point. Last fall this service was expanded to include the family division of the provincial court in Sudbury. I am told that Mr. McMurtry hopes to be in a position in the next few weeks to announce further expansions of this service to family division courts in other parts of the province.

On April 28 Mr. McMurtry introduced into the Ontario legislature amendments to the province's judicature act and to the juries act in accordance with the constitution. To quote the Ontario attorney general, the amendments "will lay the foundation for the further development and expansion of French language services in Ontario courts". These latest amendments will provide for the official designation of courts and of counties and districts in which French-speaking litigants may elect to testify in their own language. They provide that evidence in these cases will be received and understood by the court without the intervention of an interpreter. These amendments authorize the sheriff in any district with French language service to prepare two jury roles. This party approves and supports the objective of this legislation.

These amendments to the Criminal Code would give accused persons in Canada the right to have testimony at their trials heard in their own official language, either French or English. For persons who speak other languages it would be necessary to have interpreters. This party is committed to guaranteeing language rights of accused before courts where it is practical and where the provinces want it.

● (2142)

I have spoken at some length, Mr. Speaker, so let me say in conclusion that I sincerely hope the Minister of Justice will accept our amendment. As I have said, under the constitution the administration of justice falls under provincial jurisdiction so that both levels of government should proclaim that act with each other's consent.

I appreciate the attention which members of the House have given me tonight on this very difficult legal and sensitive matter. I trust that in my work as a member of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs I will continue to receive the co-operation of hon. members opposite, as I have in the past, and that they will be as fair as they have been when we on this side have proposed amendments.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat—he asked me to put my question at the end of his remarks—I wonder if he would entertain a question.

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly, go ahead.

Mr. Basford: Without commenting on the substance of the policy of the hon. member's amendment, he dwelt at some length on the question of the constitution and the administration of justice and I wonder whether therein he had taken into account the case of Jones and the Attorney General of New Brunswick, in which the Supreme Court held that the power to legislate language in criminal cases was necessarily incidental to the federal power under section 91.27 of the criminal law, including procedures in criminal matters.

The second part of my question regards the fact that the hon. member dealt at some length with the provisions in the Criminal Code relating to Quebec and Manitoba which provide for mixed juries. So far as I can discover—and perhaps the hon. member can add to my information—the last mixed jury in Quebec was in the Coffin murder trial of some years ago, and as far as my counsel from Manitoba can determine, they have never been used in Manitoba, certainly not in recent times.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I will answer the last question first. Sections of the law are there to be used. That was part of the meat of my speech tonight. The law must be practical. It does not mean that a mixture is used. There is a difference between a jury roll and an impanelled jury. If there is a roll of 50 per cent English-speaking and 50 per cent French-speaking members of the jury, it is left to the discretion of the court. So that if the accused says that his language is English, he can have an English jury; but if his language is French, he gets a French jury. It is not good having a mixture of 50-50 because then 50 per cent of the jury would not understand what is going on, and that would be grounds for a new trial.

With reference to the matter relating to the Supreme Court of Canada, I have stated where the last statement was made. I have not read it so I cannot answer the particular case quoted by the Minister of Justice. I can only refer to Abraham Lincoln. One morning he pleaded a case on one side and in the afternoon he pleaded another case on the opposite side. The judge said to him: "This afternoon you say one thing, but this morning you said the opposite." "Well", said Lincoln, "this morning I only thought I was right; this afternoon I know I am right"!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to just say a few words in the second reading debate of the bill that is before us to indicate that we support the bill and the principle of the bill. I think it is the type of bill we need in this country; it is going in the right direction. Perhaps there will be need for some minor housekeeping amendments which I will support at the committee or at the report stage.

I took the minister at his word when he said that he had consulted the provinces and the provinces had indicated their initial support for the principle of the bill. I also took him at his word when he said that in the implementation of the bill the provinces will have a great deal of flexibility, in terms of their own timetables, in such provinces as Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick where the bill will be of much greater use than it would be in British Columbia, Saskatchewan or Newfoundland. For these reasons I would like to indicate that we agree with the bill and we are glad to see the provinces agreeing to it in principle.

Another point which I think is very important—and the minister mentioned it in his communiqué—is that under the Bill of Rights of our country people of other language groups in Canada will have the right to an interpreter before the courts. I know that this type of provision is very important in a riding such as mine where there is a large number of Ukrainian, German and Polish-speaking people, even the odd Scandinavian such as myself, or our Indian people. That right is guaranteed under our Bill of Rights and was reiterated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) as an important right.

May I remind hon. members that in ridings like mine people of other origins make very little use of the courts because they are most law abiding citizens, as we all know, but that right is there for them if they cannot speak the English language, and they can always have an interpreter available to them in court. That is a basic right which we must defend in this country, whether it applies to Italians in Toronto or Ukrainians in Saskatchewan. It must be there for those people so they can testify in their own language before the courts.

Under the bill before us people will be allowed to testify in their own language and to be judged in one of the official languages as well as have a jury which understands either English or French. It is one of the basic rights which must be provided in the country from coast to coast if we want Canada to stay together. There must be an understanding of both language groups, an understanding by Quebec of its English minority and an understanding by English Canada of the French minority. As the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) says, this exists already, and since that good will does exist, it should be put into the law of the land. We should provide bilingual services in the courts, just as we do nationally for the public service.

As I said earlier, some of the provinces will be implementing the legislation sooner than others, and those will be the provinces that have a much larger minority language group than others.

[Translation]

I have here, Mr. Speaker, a news release put out by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the statistics for 1977 on the number of Canadians who speak the language of the minority in each Canadian province. In the province of Newfoundland, for instance, only 0.7 per cent of the people speak French. In Prince Edward Island, 6.6 per cent or 7,365 persons speak French. In the province of New Brunswick, almost 40,000 persons speak French, or 5 per cent of the total population. On the other hand, in that province and especially in the riding of Yarmouth, many people speak French. New Brunswick is a truly bilingual province where the two languages "work" harmoniously together. There are more than 200,000 French-speaking people there, that is 34 per cent of the population.

In the province of Quebec, 13 per cent of the population or 800,000 people speak the minority language, which is English.

In Ontario, 6.3 per cent of the population or 500,000 people speak the minority language, which is French.

In Manitoba, the neighbouring province of Saskatchewan, 10 per cent of the population or 60,500 people speak French.

In my province, Saskatchewan, 3.4 per cent of the population or 31,000 people speak French as their mother tongue. They live in southern Saskatchewan, in the town of Gravelbourg, and in the other nearby villages.

In Alberta, 3 per cent of the population or 46,000 people speak French.

In British Columbia, 1.7 per cent or 38,000 people speak French. But in that province, most French-speaking people live in Vancouver. In that city alone there are nearly 30,000 people who are French-speaking. It would therefore be easy in the area around the city to find a French speaking jury.

As I said earlier, when one looks at the statistics one will find provinces where bilingual courts are being implemented very quickly. The need is obviously present in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick. A large number of people in those provinces speak the minority language, be it English in Quebec or French in the other two provinces. It is not quite as important to have bilingual courts in the remaining provinces, but those provinces have given approval in principle. They are interested in implementing bilingual courts, particularly for some of the regions where there are large Francophone populations. I am thinking of, for example, parts of Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan.

It is important to proceed with this bill. It is one gesture toward keeping this country together. Not just bills similar to this one will keep Canada together. When we talk about national unity and having an understanding between all peoples of our country, we should realize we must resolve the economic problems of Canada. As long as there are more than one million people unemployed, there will not be a positive feeling about unity and staying together. If some of those basic economic problems cannot be resolved, it does not matter how many bills are passed by the House.

There are too many inequities in this country. Too many things in the prairies are unequal and should be resolved, such as freight rates, and there should be an increase in the manufacturing of basic goods and materials. There is too much unemployment in the province of Quebec. There are not enough opportunities for development in the Atlantic provinces. Too many things are discriminated against in the north. Hand in hand with language reform, which is ongoing in the right direction, we must have economic reform so that all Canadians will truly feel they are a part of this great country, which is to their benefit as well as to the benefit of their children and grandchildren in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about this bill before it is referred to committee for consideration and probably amendment, as I heard it tonight. The purpose of this bill is to allow an accused to defend himself before the court in his mother tongue, to have a judge who understands him, to have a jury in his mother tongue. We in Quebec have been doing this for a long time. For 110 years we have been setting the example for all other provinces, and for that reason we are happy tonight to be discussing Bill C-42 which, according to what the minister said, seems to be accepted in principle by all provincial governments. And the minister did say "in principle". For 110 years in principle the other provinces should have protected French minorities and in principle they still hope to have French-speaking courts in their provinces. From what I heard tonight I think that practice will still be long in coming.

When you cannot be accepted as a Canadian in certain provinces because you do not speak English, I tell you it hurts, Mr. Speaker, it really hurts. It makes one wonder what Anglophones have in their minds or in their hearts not to understand that Canada is made up as two peoples. When you go to British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta, you are likely to be called names every day because you speak French.

The members in this House, and I know they are serious and aware of this, should be taking a stand in their provinces with their fellow citizens, as is being done in the province of Quebec. I am proud of the province of Quebec when my fellow citizens respect Anglophones as we like to be respected when we go in English-speaking provinces, Mr. Speaker. I do not know if we are going to speak clearly enough to be understood by Anglophones—even in this House there are English-speaking bigots, and there are bigots in the province of Quebec, and there are even some in this House.

Some hon. Members: Ah, ah!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): There are English-speaking bigots even in this House. I heard them. They will have to change. They will have to think that the issue of the Plains of Abraham is a thing of the past. We are living in today's generation. We want to live together, Mr. Speaker, and you need to have respect to live in perfect harmony. I do not believe in a planned Canadian unity, Mr. Speaker, but I do believe in Canadian harmony through understanding between intelligent people, and I hope that this bill will not remain a principle but will be implemented as was done for 110 years in Quebec to teach Anglophones a lesson, a lesson that they still do not seem to have understood.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to support the bill and I do hope to have a few minutes more, I do hope the bill will be passed and will have its anticipated effects not only in Quebec, but also in Ontario and New Brunswick. We are already making selections among the provinces. We should stop selecting and begin speaking of Canada.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—IRISH MOSS FISHERY IN MARITIMES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday in the House I raised a question of importance to the fishermen of the maritime provinces, particularly those engaged in the Irish moss industry. For many hon. members the Irish moss industry is relatively unheard of. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) can well identify with this important fishery because it occupies an important part of the activities of fishermen in his area, in the western part of Prince Edward Island and parts of Nova Scotia.

Last Wednesday I raised the special plight of these fishermen. In the last two or three years they have suffered a serious setback in the pricing and marketing of their product, as well as in the amount of Irish moss actually available for harvest. I mentioned to the minister a communication I received and know was sent to him, as well as to the provincial minister of fisheries, on March 16, 1978. It was addressed to him on behalf of the Prince County Fishermen's Association and it reads as follows:

● (2202)

Dear Mr. LeBlanc:

Last year the P.E.I. Irish moss harvesters requested aid of your department in the form of deficiency payments and market research. The aid was requested due to a decline in landings from 1975 and similar prices; these payments were made and we thank you and your department.

1977 has been not a good year either as far as landings are concerned, they were close to the 1976 figures.

They were below the 1976 figures, if I understand it correctly. The letter continues:

The price paid to the harvesters increased only slightly and the complete picture did not appear any healthier.

Due to the above factors the Prince County Fishermen's Association requests an extension of these deficiency payments for the 1977 years landings. We however, request that payments be given only to licenced harvesters.

Since then I have met with the president, Tilmon Arsenault, to clarify their specific request because he is well aware that it has only been in the last year we have had a definite body of regulations, which were announced by the minister in fact on January 17 last, that would allow us to identify specifically those who were licensed fishermen for the purpose of the Irish moss fisheries.

At the time the minister made his announcement of last January, in addition to the $375,000 covering Irish moss fishermen in all three maritime provinces he also mentioned the fact that he was instituting and I quote from his press release—an "active market exploration and development program to help stabilize the demand for Irish moss products".

In addition to the specific request received about a month and a half ago from the Prince County Fishermen's Association, there was an inquiry as to what actual steps had been taken to develop more firm, stable and attractive markets for Irish moss fishermen. It would seem to me that to date we have had no answer. The minister did assure me in his reply that he would check immediately with the officials of the fisheries price support board. Just this afternoon I received an acknowledgement from the minister's executive assistant that some inquiry was proceeding but, as members of this House are well aware, these fishermen have suffered this serious hardship over a series of some months and urgently require an answer in order to alleviate at least some of their obvious hardship.

In addition, I also asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) to see if there was any firm basis in fact to the accusations that have been levied in a recent report published by the social action commission of the diocese of Charlottetown in a report entitled "Global Village? Global Pillage Irish Moss from P.E.I. in the World Market". In that report there is the suggestion that there has been some form of collusion on the part of the three multinational companies which basically dominate the Irish moss purchases in Prince Edward Island and, indeed, throughout the Atlantic provinces.

I also asked the minister to determine whether there has been any fixing of buying practices in a way that would drive the newly formed Irish moss harvesters co-operative and the Prince Edward Island marine plants co-operative out of business. These were serious charges, as I mentioned to the minister. After that question asked in the House I gave the Minister a copy of the report directly by hand in order that he or his officials could determine whether there was any substance to these charges. So far I have not had any answer back from the minister in respect of that suggestion.

In addition, there is growing concern, which is again mentioned in this particular report, that much of the federal money being spent through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the National Research Council is going into research and development funding of commercial seaweed extraction, and that is to the benefit of these foreign companies, with little or no guarantee that the benefits will also accrue to Canadians, either in terms of the fishermen who are directly involved with the harvesting of this product, or those who might be involved in a secondary way.

This recent report produced for the social action commission of Prince Edward Island is a significant document. One does not have to agree with all the recommendations or information in it, but this is the first attempt I know of to go beyond merely a technological examination of one aspect of the industry to recognize that there is a serious problem in respect of effective Canadian control on the part of the producers, in order to achieve maximum benefit for those who are directly involved in the industry.

I would recommend that the minister look at the six recommendations and, in particular, the final conclusion, which states:

> There is evidence that the multinationals involved in the Irish moss industry have tried to control the resource through (a) buying practices, (b) control of information, (c) aquacultural research.

These are important comments, if not charges, and ones that I think need to be dealt with by the responsible departments involved. That is why I have circulated three copies of this report and will provide others to relevant ministers if there is a need to do so. I look forward to a response from the parliamentary secretary in order to provide some assurance and information to the fishermen directly concerned.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member dealt with two areas, one under consumer affairs and one under fisheries. I do not know if in the three minutes I will be able to deal with both; however I will reply in writing to the one on consumer affairs.

Last winter the Gulf of St. Lawrence marine plant advisory committee was established, made up of Irish moss harvesters, processors and representatives of provincial and federal departments of fisheries. The main terms of reference of the committee are to advise the government on policies and programs to optimize the marine plant resource; to promote better management of the marine plant industry; to improve communications between harvesters, buyers and government agencies; and to encourage input into management policies from harvesters, buyers and interested citizens.

An investigation of the market situation was begun immediately following the announcement in January 1977 of the federal government's program to assist the Irish moss industry. It is clearly apparent that the marketing problems encountered by the primary producers of Irish moss stem from the market structure of the industry, including the international availability of seaweeds which compete with Irish moss.

In the maritimes, as in other countries, there are a large number of producer/sellers of Irish moss. On the other hand, there are very few buyers. This situation in itself ensures that Canadian producers of Irish moss are price takers, with no control over the market price for their product.

The hydro-colloids industry, which is the primary user of Irish moss, purchases its raw material on a global scale. While other competing seaweeds are only partial substitutes for Irish moss in certain uses, this factor is very largely offset by their ready availability and much cheaper price structure.

The existence of a very competitive market for the end products of seaweeds ensures that buyers of Irish moss give as much weight as possible to price when deciding to purchase one type or source of seaweed rather than another. In the absence of technical barriers to the substitution of competing seaweeds for Irish moss, the size of the market over the long term will continue to be directly related to the relative price level of Irish moss. Over the past year, potential markets have been investigated by both the federal and provincial governments. No new long term markets have been located.

In view of the international market for Irish moss, the scope for government intervention in the market development and stabilization is necessarily extremely limited. Currently under consideration is the possibility of providing Canadian producers with statistical and market information, including the prices of competing products. Such information would enable producers to make more informed decisions concerning the marketing of their products. The availability of accurate and timely market information will enable producers to take action to mitigate the volatile nature of the market for Irish moss.

In 1976, the average price paid to Irish moss harvesters in the maritimes was 3.5 cents per pound, compared to 4.1 cents per pound in 1977. In Prince county, Prince Edward Island, the price for Irish moss in 1977 went from 4.5 cents to 4.9 cents per pound. I am told, Mr. Speaker, that harvesters are currently negotiating prices for the 1978 harvest.

With respect to the request for assistance on the 1977 harvest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired.

FISHERIES—BRITISH COLUMBIA—SEASONAL EMPLOYMENT FOR NATIONALS OF OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on April 10 I put the following question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment or his parliamentary secretary. Is he aware of the fact that the bonanza in the herring roe fishing industry in British Columbia is attracting some seasonal employment, and that Japanese nationals have been hired as technicians for that industry who are really not technicians but are out in the fishing grounds working along with the other fishermen and are taking jobs away from Canadians?

The minister was not in the House so his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), made the following reply:

I am not aware of any Japanese nationals who are fishing with the herring boats off British Columbia.

On April 28 in The Columbian, a British Columbia newspaper, an article appeared under the heading "Jobs taken by Japanese: Union." It reads in part:

Jack McKinstrey, Pacific region immigration director, said Thursday that most of the investigation is complete and no evidence has been found of serious infractions of work permits issued to the Japanese.

I do not know if there was any connection between the question I asked and the fact that an investigation was going on. Perhaps the investigation was already in progress but it strikes me that any Japanese nationals working in the fishing grounds would soon become aware of immigration investigators in the area. An interesting thing about that investigation is that the union did not know it was going on until it was almost complete.

It seems to me that the people most likely to be aware of infractions committed by foreign nationals would be those people who work alongside them. Surely the fishermen would be in the best position to know whether infractions are committed by nationals from Japan.

The policy of bringing nationals from Japan to work as technicians in the roe industry began in 1971 when the department of immigration granted working visas. That was understandable at the time because this was a new industry and Canadians were not yet qualified to perform the inspections and grading which are so sensitive. Today, however, over 400 working permits have been issued to Japanese nationals to work in the roe industry. Of these, 240 are in the hands of people known to be working in the British Columbia fishing industry, 100 working in Prince Rupert alone.

The understanding in 1971 was that if permits were granted to Japanese nationals they would train Canadians to do this work. To date, however, not one Canadian has been trained. Certainly the Japanese nationals have the expertise but I should like to know what the department has been doing about the commitment to train Canadians for this work.

I have learned that some Japanese nationals have been in Canada for as long as 11½ months. As people in British Columbia know, the herring roe industry only lasts about five weeks so why are the Japanese allowed to stay for periods up to 11 months? I hear that they are building fish boxes and salting roe, jobs that could be done by Canadians. The government gives the excuse that as long as they are here they may as well be working and also that they can find no evidence of this. These Japanese nationals are being paid in funds from Japan, not in Canadian funds.

The newspaper report I referred to earlier, as well as reports from the union, indicate that photographs exist showing Canadian technicians working on the production line. Tonight I spoke to someone in the union who told me that they had irrefutable evidence that Japanese nationals are doing jobs in the industry which was not intended when the work permits were granted.

The organizer in the union at Prince Rupert is asking for a full investigation of this matter. When this is complete the union will then produce its evidence. They can hardly do that at the present time in light of the kind of prejudiced investigation which is proceeding but they have evidence to prove that the practice is going on.

It is interesting to note that Mr. McKinstrey admitted that the union spokesmen were correct in saying that there was a commitment on the part of immigration authorities to do that job. Yet that commitment has not been fulfilled. The fact is that we export products in lumber and other kinds of primary products, and we do the inspection and the grading in Canada. Why is it that we cannot train Canadians to do the inspection and the grading in the herring roe industry?

I have one final comment and I know that the parliamentary secretary is not prepared to comment on this because it is an addendum to my question. There is also a report that one of the Canadian-Japanese companies in Richmond has been what we might call strong-armed by a Japanese national company moving in and muscling its way into the Canadian-Japanese company and taking it over through a large Japanese conglomerate called Sumitomo. It has now made the Canadian national—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the original question put forth by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) indicated that Japanese technicians were working along with Canadian fishermen in the fishing grounds. The Japanese nationals to which the hon. member refers are not on fishing boats or packers but are engaged in the processing plants as advisers on roe grading and quality standards.

Since Japan is the sole buyer of B.C. herring roe, and since there is keen competition among the Japanese companies that are purchasing the roe, the individual buyers have requested permission, which had been granted, to place observers in the various processing plants from which they are buying roe. It is conceivable if one processor is supplying five different Japanese customers that there could be observers from five different customers present in one plant. With 34 buyers competing for herring roe in B.C. in 1978, this can create a situation where many such advisers and observers would be required to look after the interests of the various Japanese purchasers. In fact, in 1978, 486 special visas have been issued for such observers for the herring roe and salmon roe processing operations. However, we conducted a survey of the number of Japanese nationals in each of the processing plants in B.C. We found that there are less than half that number actually present, so it is obvious that not all of the visas issued have been used.

The Department of Employment and Immigration, under the terms of the Immigration Act, has authority to issue special visas to permit entry for these people and has done so for the past six years. In the early 1970's when we first entered this market, Japanese technicians did accompany the herring seiners to advise the captains when the roe had reached the stage of maturity suitable for the Japanese market so the fishing operation could proceed. However, this function has now been taken over by the Canadian fishermen and the fisheries and marine service in the field which determines fishing times in discrete areas by maturity of the roe and abundance of herring present. This change for a time caused a decline in the number of Japanese technicians entering Canada, but this number is now escalating again due to the increased number of buyers after roe herring.

By the terms of the temporary visas issued to these people, they are to take no active part in any of the actual work conducted in the processing operation. However, to look after the interests of their employers they may be required to handle and assist in the grading of the roe, so there is a grey area involved where the plant workers' duties terminate and those of the technician commence.

The fisheries and marine service in conjunction with the Department of Employment and Immigration is conducting an investigation into the role and need for these technicians in so far as the herring roe and salmon roe processing operations are concerned. This investigation will touch on such specific points as the number of technicians that may be required in each processing plant, or by each Japanese buyer—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

CANADA COUNCIL—GUIDELINES FOR ALLOCATIONS OF GRANTS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, on March 15 of this year I rose in the House to ask a question of the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) relating to Canada Council grants, the regulations by which they are guided and how many people had written in protest of the lack of regulations. I noted later in response to a question I placed on the order paper that the minister indicated that some 1,000 letters had been received in protest of the regulations for Canada Council grants.

The simple thing I want to make reference to at this time is the fact that we have before us a situation in which there is much to be produced by the Canada Council. While the majority of its work is excellent and it is a very serviceable kind of organization, the laxity of regulation creates a situation wherein we find what many people classify as the printing of pornographic literature, the awarding of grants for projects that many people presume to be useless. One example is the $174,000 grant to study air breathing fish on the Amazon River. That is only one example.

What most people are concerned about with the Canada Council is not the fact that it is an agency of government which gives grants, but that there appears to be no checks or balances on how the money is spent. I want to make it clear my quarrel is not with the agency but with the guidelines and regulations. What I find insulting when I look at some of the poetry supported by Canada Council grants is that when I go to the men's room in the local tavern and read what is written there, the only difference is that in large measure the stuff in the tavern washroom is of higher quality. As a taxpayer, I find it insulting that tax money goes to support things that many people find insulting. That is not what taxpayers want their money spent on.

Before the parliamentary secretary begins to feel that I am chastising only this government, I want to say that it is a problem far more afield. All governments have that problem. However, we cannot hide it under a bushel, simply saying that the matter of political interference means we have a lack of political responsibility.

In today's Ottawa Citizen there is a complaint about a grant of $97,000 to study ethnic and class relationships in the Peruvian Andes. It goes on to state:

> Part of the ethnic and class relationships study, it turns out, involved one of the two professors making about "20" visits to a bordello at a place called San Tuti—
> . . . In a flash, the thing was done, with 364 voting for, 37 against. And only one congressman had the bad grace to point out that it was this appropriation that, in 1977, contained $62,300 for a study of homosexual tendencies among California seagulls.

Although such things as the CBC, CNR and Canada Council should be removed from politics, they should not be removed from responsibility. The question I put forward and am now asking the parliamentary secretary is: Surely there must be some way, when these regulations come to the surface and are brought before the public, that the minister can ask that the guidelines be reviewed? It appears to a mass of people across this country now that there is some abuse. Therefore, the regulations should come before a parliamentary committee.

Before sitting down I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether there is not some way by which he can indicate tonight what action is being taken. Many people have been protesting the lack of regulatory guidelines. Is any action being taken? Is any action contemplated? Could the parliamentary secretary clear up this whole question? Many people have said that they are not against the Canada Council and that it is an excellent organization, but that there are obviously abuses. Those abuses have been detailed. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us what the ministry is doing to live up to its responsibility?

The ministry is the steward of taxpayers' funds, and it simply cannot continue to say that there are abuses but that we have to live with them and that the department cannot get involved in the politics of this question. Surely there is another side to the question. The government is responsible for taxpayers' money. The parliamentary secretary recognizes that all governments from time to time allow certain things to get out of hand, but somehow we must regulate the Canada Council, and whatever regulatory agency is involved should come under the review of a parliamentary committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a question which has obviously caused substantial concern on both sides of this House. This has been evidenced by the discussions which have taken place in the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

As indicated by the hon. member, there have been a number of letters to the minister. At the time of the writing of the document I have before me at least 670 members of the public had written to the minister. As the hon. member pointed out, there may indeed be more. There is no question that there is public perception of some difficulty. There is no question that in fact a number of people have written and indicated that there appears to be something which needs review and revision.

I need not go into great detail on this because there appears to be substantial agreement on the part of the hon. member and myself that the majority of the Canada Council budget goes to worthwhile endeavours. One need only suggest the Canadian Opera Company, the Shaw Festival and the Stratford Festival, all of which are recipients of Canada Council moneys and grants. I think all parties would agree that these are worthy recipients of the money which goes to them.

What we sometimes forget, however, is that the portion of the Canada Council grants at which we look with chagrin refers to a gross of only 16 per cent of the Canada Council budget which is devoted to grants to individual artists. Of that, only a small percentage is currently the subject of criticism and review as suggested by the public at large. It is not the full 16 per cent of those individual artistic grants which are subject to criticism. Indeed, the majority of that 16 per cent would be viewed by most persons as being properly given.

On the other hand, the representations received reflect the very real difficulties involved in choosing which artists are worthy of support. Art is essentially a matter of personal taste, and is, therefore, hard to adjudicate. The council tries to apply the highest contemporary standards, rather than the taste and judgment of any one individual, in its review process. That is why grant applications are reviewed by panels of independent jurors, all of whom are private citizens and experts in their own artistic fields. Public comment such as has been made, on the other hand, provides a valuable indication of contemporary taste and cannot be ignored.

The government believes that a judicious melding of the two elements, expert judgment and public opinion, in an independent review process is the best means of assuring balance and equitable support for all types of artistic expression.

I would not want to agree with the hon. member that there is a lack of control or a lack of accountability. The council is still the subject of control by this parliament and members of the committee. Through votes which come before the committee, members decide what money will be given to the Canada Council, and that committee directs the council in terms of what it should or should not be doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.31 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

COMPENSATION TO QUEBEC FOR REDUCED SALES TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent matter of national interest.

Considering that yesterday in the House the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) officially undertook to give Quebec all the money to which it would be entitled under the original proposal made by the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien); considering that Quebec has already made its position clearly known on the matter, both in its counter-proposal to the federal proposal and in its negative reply to the subsequent arrangement suggested by the central government, and that it is now up to Ottawa to move one way or another; considering finally that this question is vital for Quebec and that its citizens can no longer remain indifferent to the settlement of this deadlock, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

That the House unanimously urge the Minister of Finance to announce as soon as possible how he intends to render justice to Quebec and to accede to the unanimous wish of the provincial legislature.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Presentation of such a motion for debate under the provisions of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTENTIONS RESPECTING COMPENSATION TO QUEBEC FOR REDUCED SALES TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has finally recognized the error made by his government concerning the refusal to compensate the government of Quebec for its selective sales tax cuts, and considering that the opposition and all parties in Quebec have urged the Prime Minister of Canada to put an end to his strategy of confrontation with Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House request the Prime Minister to announce by next Friday his decision to refund the government of Quebec for its selective sales tax cuts because they are constitutionally and economically fair.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF TODAY AS "SUN" DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the realization and promise of solar energy is being observed and celebrated today in Canada and in over 40 countries around the world—

whereas setting aside one day to highlight all the solar energy utilization techniques would contribute to informing the general public, the industry and the labour force and to illustrating the possibilities of using the sun to satisfy the energy needs of our country—

[English]

—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House agree, without debate, to acknowledge this day, May 3, 1978, as "Sun" day and thereby encourage the utilization of solar energy technologies so as to provide humanity with an abundant, economical, safe and environmentally compatible energy supply.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

● (1412)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a phrase in the motion which troubles me in terms of order. I will not delay the proceedings too long, but I suggest the words "without debate" must be deleted from the motion, for obviously any motion is debatable and simply because the language is there in the motion cannot render it otherwise. Therefore, the motion by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), would be:

That this House acknowledges May 3, 1978, as "Sun" day, thereby encouraging the utilization of solar energy technologies so as to provide humanity with an abundant, economical, safe and environmentally compatible energy supply.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the announcement regarding a new direction in housing by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and in light of the fact that the federal minister proceeded without consultation with the provinces, without which the program cannot work, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That the Minister of State for Urban Affairs convene a meeting immediately with all provincial ministers responsible for housing in order to reach agreement on the federal minister's new programs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. According to Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I wish to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls on the government to increase the grants to the Medical Research Council so that medical schools will not find it necessary to eliminate ongoing research projects and to dismiss medical research and support staffs because the grants for the fiscal year 1978-79 will not permit either the continuation of presently ongoing projects or provide for the beginning of necessary new research projects.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can only be done with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WORK HOURS FOR GRAIN ELEVATOR EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and national importance. As negotiations between the grain handlers' union and the Manitoba and Saskatchewan wheat pools have gone nine months with a Department of Labour conciliator, without being any nearer solution, and as wages are not at issue, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski):

That the Minister of Labour exempt permanently from hours of work regulations country elevator managers so that the issue may be settled without destruction of the competitive position of the Manitoba and Saskatchewan wheat pools or disruption of the country elevator grain handling system.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can only be done at this time with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DISPARITY BETWEEN INCOME TAX PAID BY U.S. AND CANADIAN WORKERS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that many international chartered accountant firms are drawing attention to the fact that substantial tax equalization is required when United States employees are transferred by their employers to Canada—in some cases resulting in a person requiring $28,996 in Canada to give him the same after-tax, take-home pay he would have in the United States with an income of $19,700—will the Minister of Finance indicate if he is aware of this imbalance between Canadian and United States taxes; and, if so, does he intend to suggest changes in our income tax level to ensure that this imbalance does not continue?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this type of allegation has been made for a long time. There has always been a differentiation between Canadian and U.S. tax levels because the United States does not give its citizens the same quality of service as the Canadian government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as the minister well knows, the Carter royal commission on taxation pointed out that such an imbalance would result in a brain-drain—as they termed it—to the United States, and that it should not be allowed to continue.

An hon. Member: You don't have to worry.

• (1417)

Mr. Stevens: I will wait, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of Finance indicate if he is aware that the imbalance has reached such proportions that Ernst and Ernst, chartered accountants well known throughout the world, have put out a 146-page booklet describing how you can equalize your position between Canada and the United States in the event that you are an employee in Canada, and that there is a new booklet coming out which will describe why it is much more beneficial to be an employee in the United States than in Canada because of our added tax load?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the United States does not have as many services; for example, they do not have medicare or hospitalization as we have here. I know of a Canadian citizen who was in Florida and had a heart attack: when he received his bill from the hospital there, he had another heart attack.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary to the Minister of Finance must begin with the preamble that the minister obviously has not read the material that I am putting forward, because all medical care plans have been exempted from the calculations.

My final question to the Minister of Finance is this: As a result of the higher tax load in Canada, would he indicate if this in part contributes to the higher wage structure which in turn has made us relatively non-competitive with other employees, especially those in the United States?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I find it very unusual for the hon. member to rise today and speak about the non-competitive position of Canadian products, when in March it was indicated we achieved a record trade surplus of $10 billion, annualized—and that means that we are very competitive.

OUTFLOW OF CAPITAL TO U.S.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. minister mentioned medicare, because many Canadians are sick of his government's policies.

Supplementary to my colleague's question, is the minister aware that for the first time in 33 years the U.S. department of commerce figures show there is a net outflow of money from Canada to the U.S. of $440 million? This is the first year in 33 years since statistics were kept that this has happened: there is this net outflow of capital from Canada to the U.S., and not the other way. The biggest year that we had a capital inflow from the U.S. was 1966—$985 million.

Would the minister explain to the House why he feels the Americans have got cold feet with respect to Canada? What steps is he taking to reverse the outflow of investment moneys to the U.S.? Is the minister, in other words, concerned about this problem? What is he doing?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know some people in Canada are investing money in the United States. We have always had a large surplus in that area. For the last few months there has been some nervousness in the Canadian economy because of the decline of the Canadian dollar, and some people have tried to hedge their bets.

I would like to inform the hon. member for St. John's West that I was speaking to some people from Newfoundland the other day and they told me that the weaker Canadian dollar has been very good for the fisheries business in that province.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, with our nation in the economic situation it is, I wish the minister would be serious. In 1977, in terms of our economy with the U.S., $440 million net left Canada. In 1976 it was $102 million net that came to Canada from the U.S. The bureau of commerce for the U.S., their economic statistician down there, has given certain reasons for that and I want to know if the minister agrees. He said first that FIRA has dampened the enthusiasm of Americans for investing money in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: Does the minister—

Mr Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize he is seeking the minister's opinion as opposed to information. Perhaps he could put an informational question.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, in connection with this imbalance of investments between Canada and the U.S., does the minister agree that the reason this is happening is that our economy is growing so slowly that there is no point in their keeping money here? What steps is he taking to reverse this situation so that we will again encourage American investment here and Canadians will keep their money invested in Canada? What is he doing about this?

• (1422)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member looks at the record he will realize that the economy of Canada has grown much faster in the last seven years than has the economy of the United States. In fact, for 27 months during 1974, 1975 and 1976 the United States was in a recession. In Canada we have managed to maintain a certain growth. The forecasts made by the IMF over the weekend indicated that Canada will have the best growth performance in 1978 of any country except Japan and will beat all other IMF members.

Mr. Crosbie: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. For the first time in 33 years we have a net outflow of funds to the U.S. from Canada. Does the minister consider this to be a problem, is he concerned about it and, if so, what is he going to do about it? The brain-drain is from the government. Is the minister unconcerned that it is a brain-drain from the government? What is he going to do about this, and does he consider it a problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a problem in this regard but the hon. member is not aware, for example, that some transactions are considered as being capital outflow from Canada while in fact they are not. For instance, when Petro-Canada bought Atlantic Richfield, we were indeed reimporting into Canada operations that were run by the United States. Of course we had to pay back the Americans, so this was considered as money flowing out of Canada when in fact Canadians were buying American interests in Canada. Obviously the hon. member does take these facts into account when he quotes the statistics he has before him.

[English]

SUGGESTION CONDITIONS BE ATTACHED TO CANADIAN INVESTMENT ABROAD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate to the Conservative spokesman that a brain-drain from this government is a contradiction in terms.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: With reference to the export of capital, the minister has just indicated that there is one example of some possible benefit to Canada. Mr. Speaker, Canadian Pacific Investments Ltd. have announced that they are investing abroad and that their total investment in the U.S. will reach $185 million. This follows decisions by Northern Telecom, Molson and even the Canadian Development Corporation to do likewise.

I take issue with what the minister just said. If he feels there is possibly some benefit that can occur as a result of some investment abroad, why does the Government of Canada not do what every country in Europe and what Japan has done for years, that is, make it conditional for the export of capital that large companies show there is a benefit at home?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very good at giving a lesson in humility. On this question, of course, if we want to be competitive in the world we must be people who are able to compete. It is not necessarily bad that Canadian industries seek greater performance not only in Canada but elsewhere. This very often opens doors for Canadian technology and Canadian experience to gain new ground in export business. We are following these developments closely. If the hon. member has a specific complaint, we can look into it. Canada often imports capital, and it is quite normal that Canadians export to other markets so that they will increase their base of operations.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, this minister is always late to recognize a crisis. At the current rate of export of capital, in 1978 we will export some $1 billion. That means thousands of jobs lost to Canadians. I should like the minister to answer and not evade the question I just put to him. If, as he said in his reply to an earlier question, benefit can accrue to Canada at times from the export of capital, why does the government not make it a stipulated policy, such as exists in all western European countries and Japan, that in order to export capital large companies must show a domestic benefit?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the government is about to control the flow of capital between Canada and other nations. One of our successes in the past is that we have operated an open economy and have welcomed capital to this country. If we want capital to come into Canada, we must be a society that permits the free movement of capital. I do not think the hon. member would improve the lot of Canada very much if at this moment we were to restrict the flow of capital.

• (1427)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that in recent months the net flow of capital has been out of Canada going abroad, and we have 1½ million people unemployed, I plead with the minister to recognize this reality and do, in this industrial country, what all other industrial countries did a long time ago, with the exception of the United States, and that is to put export controls on the export of large amounts of capital.

PENITENTIARIES

CONSTRUCTION OF PENITENTIARY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

Last year his department officials were asked to look into the possibility of building a penitentiary in the Quebec City area. Would the minister tell the House if this study is finished, if he has requested a report from his officials and if a decision has been made following that report?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse should know that my predecessor made a statement concerning the construction of a penitentiary in the Donnacona area. This decision has been made and work has already begun.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

I remember quite well the statement made by the predecessor of the present Solicitor General but since it was suggested that such a penitentiary might be built close to Montmagny, the mayor of the city of Montmagny asked me to put this question so that the municipal council would know where the matter stands.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I take note of these further details provided by the hon. member and I will give him a complete report on that matter.

RCMP BREAK-INS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. It relates to a Canadian Press story printed today in which the Solicitor General is alleged to have said:

I'm not advancing that my thought processes are absolutely devoid of obscurity—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: I think he would get unanimous consent for that representation. That item relates to a story which, if accurate, means this House was clearly, not deliberately but clearly misled a week ago yesterday, April 25, when in reply to a question from the hon. member for Nickel Belt relating to the 400 surreptitious entries, the minister said, as reported in Hansard of that date:

A legal opinion has been forthcoming from the Department of Justice to the effect that these procedures are legal. There is a decided opinion with reference to their legality.

It indicates in this story today that such is not the case and no such legal opinion was obtained in relation to these activities. Would the Solicitor General take this opportunity to correct any misinformation he may have given the House a week ago yesterday?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the hon. gentleman from Nickel Belt, it was a question that referred generally to surreptitious entry. The question was a general one, and I replied in general terms indicating that there was a legal opinion. I indicated, as well, that in view of the differing opinions relating to the legality of surreptitious entries generally, I wished the matter to be dealt with by the McDonald inquiry so it would address itself to the evidence in total put before the inquiry and make a report. Mr. Speaker, that is the position I have taken in the past and it is the position I will continue to take.

Mr. Jarvis: Would the Solicitor General take the opportunity to indicate to the House the legal opinion he has from the Department of Justice? Does it relate solely to entries for the purpose of installing electronic surveillance devices? Is there any legal opinion with respect to surreptitious entry? If so, would the Solicitor General do the House the courtesy of tabling those legal opinions?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I made it clear outside the House, after that reply was made, that the legal opinion to which I referred had been tabled before the McDonald inquiry. That opinion is available to the hon. gentleman if he wishes to obtain it. It deals with surreptitious entry to install electronic devices.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, would the Solicitor General answer the first part of my last question? Does he have a legal opinion from the Department of Justice, or has one been asked for, with regard to surreptitious entry which does not relate to the installation of electronic surveillance devices?

● (1432)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I do not hold the opinion described by the hon. member and I have never indicated that I had such an opinion.

ROLE OF RCMP IN PROVINCIAL JURISDICTIONS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General about a study of his department's law enforcement task force, entitled "The Role of the Federal Government in Law Enforcement", which states it has two main goals, one of which is to examine the role of the federal government in law enforcement with particular reference to the RCMP.

One of the general points considered in this study is the taking over of the OPP and the QPF by the RCMP. I ask the minister, what ongoing consultations have been developed between the federal government and the affected provinces regarding questions of jurisdiction in this very important matter and the role of provincial police forces vis-à-vis the RCMP which are of particular relevance under the present circumstances?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it becomes evident that if there is a study relating to the role of federal enforcement, or the RCMP in the role of enforcement of federal laws, the question of federal-provincial relations will be dealt with. I would ask the hon. member to review the document to which he has referred, in order to make sure he is not advancing something that is not contained within that document.

Mr. MacKay: I would like to make the same request of the Solicitor General and ask him what ongoing discussions are taking place with the attorneys general or solicitors general of the various provinces. I am seeking information as to whether, on this very interesting study, the provinces have been fully briefed and kept fully informed. I know there were brief discussions in Charlottetown. Is there more than one of these studies? Is there now one that supersedes or changes the first one?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can rest assured that there is no intention of taking over the QPP or the OPP at any time. Nor is there any indication that such is the intention of my ministry.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question on another point related to the same study. Can the minister indicate what the situation is with regard to the possible taking over of harbour policing functions by the RCMP, and the RCMP withdrawing from drug enforcement? Were those points also discussed with the provinces?

Mr. Blais: With regard to the taking over of port policing, I believe a bill has been introduced in this House relating to such a process. I see the Minister of Justice has some hesitation about that. I would have to look at the legislation that has been introduced. With reference to drug enforcement, that is a federal responsibility. It is an ongoing responsibility that we are not ready to give up.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO METHOD OF COMPENSATING QUEBEC FOR LOSS IN SALES TAX REVENUE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the sales tax issue opposing Ottawa to Quebec, the minister will agree with me that the time to juggle with words is long since past. Yesterday the right hon. Prime Minister committed himself formally to giving Quebec the money it would have received under the minister's proposal. To give credibility to the Prime Minister's statement, would the Minister of Finance now be prepared to explain to the House how Quebeckers could receive this money, without going against the unanimous wish of the National Assembly?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister reiterated yesterday what I had myself stated last Friday, namely that we do not intend to penalize Quebeckers just because the Quebec government absolutely refuses to come to an agreement with the federal government, even though I have made concessions on two occasions since my budget in order to find a common ground of understanding. It seems the Quebec government wants confrontation, and the Prime Minister has stated that we will take the necessary action to ensure that Quebeckers are not victimized by the Quebec government's stubbornness. Eventually, if the provincial government does not change its mind and does not decide to cut the sales tax on all other goods by 2 per cent, as I suggested, we will advise.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

I think it is clear that what the Prime Minister said yesterday is absolute nonsense. Can the Minister of Finance tell the House today how Quebeckers will get that money? Under the circumstances, I ask the Minister of Finance, if he has some small measure of honour, to tell us how Quebeckers can receive that money, so that they are not penalized, without violating provincial jurisdiction and the unanimous will of the National Assembly, and the minister knows what I mean.

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to see that the hon. member agrees with the attitude we are adopting in saying that we will not penalize Quebeckers. Our financial year started exactly one month and two days ago, which means that we have ten months and 28 days left in which to solve the problem before the end of the fiscal year.

LABOUR RELATIONS

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING TO SETTLE RADIO-MUTUEL STRIKE

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and in view of his absence to his parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Speaker, since Bill C-8, an Act to amend the Canada Labour Code, has already been passed by the House and the Senate, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether the Minister of Labour intends to implement as soon as possible that part of the act which allows the minister to impose a first collective agreement, and specifically in the case of the conflict at Radio-Mutuel, which has already dragged on for 16 months?

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we have received representations from the two large Quebec unions asking us to intervene. We have also received the recommendations of our officials. The bill has been passed and the royal sanction given. All that remains to be done is to proclaim it law; when it has been so proclaimed, Mr. Speaker, we will see, but I do think we will solve the problem within the next few weeks.

HOUSING

AGREEMENT OF PROVINCES ON NEW POLICY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. We have been treated to another example of the new techniques of federal-provincial relations in the area of housing. With regard to the new, fundamentally changed housing package that the minister will introduce in the House tomorrow, has he secured the agreement of the provinces regarding the new approach presented to us yesterday without consultation with the House of Commons or the committee.

Does the minister have the agreement of the provinces for this new approach, or is it his intention to immediately call together the housing ministers of the provinces to discuss their role in this new federal scheme?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a very short memory. Not very long ago I explained in detail the various aspects of this policy when appearing before a standing committee of this House. Second, the hon. member should know there was a federal-provincial conference of ministers of housing where all these proposals were extensively discussed. The provincial officials participated in those discussions and made some very valuable suggestions. Third, this subject was also raised at the time of the first ministers' conference. I do not know on what basis the hon. member draws the conclusion that there has been no consultation. Indeed, there have been extensive consultations. What we want to do is clearly in line with the priorities established by the provinces.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, my memory serves me quite well. It tells me that the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was not allowed to answer questions in the committee. I did not ask the minister whether there was consultation; rather, I asked whether there was agreement with the provinces, because my information is that there was not. Is this the new way the government arranges its priorities in the field of economic strategy, taking away $500 million from the one sector that has the potential of creating new jobs and alleviating poverty and abolishing any form of subsidy that formerly existed under that program?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that the hon. member is disappointed because this is an excellent policy which was discussed at length with provincial authorities. The proposals put forward are designed essentially to increase the participation of both levels of government, federal and provincial, in the construction of more homes for low income Canadians. The Conservative member may not agree with our objective to provide decent housing to low income families and senior citizens, but it certainly meets the needs and aspirations of most Canadians.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELEVISION PROGRAMS FOR THE DEAF

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Communications. I should like to ask the hon. lady, bearing in mind her concern, what is being done to evaluate a system which would make television more accessible to the two million or so people in Canada who suffer from various degrees of deafness and for whom little has been done, politically or otherwise, because they are not a particularly visible group. What is being done to develop a system which would be acceptable and Canada-wide, instead of the mess of pottage the deaf are now getting?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): I think the hon. member is quite unfair when he says this is a mess. On the contrary, research has been going on to help the deaf follow television programs. I told the hon. member last week, or ten days ago, that we are studying a system incorporating a hidden caption on the television screen coupled to a decoder which would allow the deaf to follow the dialogue.

A prototype of such a decoder exists at the present time. It is, of course, an expensive gadget—it costs about $2,000—but everyone knows there is a great difference between the cost of a prototype and the cost of a product when sold to the public. Nevertheless, price, I would think, would be one of the obstacles. The first thing, though, is to develop the technology which would enable the deaf to have fuller access to national television, and that is what we are doing.

Mr. Rynard: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RCMP BREAK-INS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It is now confirmed that there is no legal opinion which justified the surreptitious entries which do not relate to the placing of electronic devices: that is my understanding of the answer given by the Solicitor General. This being the case, will the hon. gentleman take the House into his confidence and tell us how many such surreptitious entries did not relate to the setting of wiretaps, particularly in view of the fact that 402 of the 419 surreptitious entries took place in British Columbia? Would he advise the House how many were legal; how many were not covered by a legal opinion backing them up?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): As the hon. gentleman knows, the evidence to which he refers has been adduced before the McDonald commission. The whole subject matter of surreptitious entry, including surreptitious entries effected in order to place electronic surveillance equipment and those which were described as intelligence probes, has been identified before the inquiry. The evidence related to those surreptitious entries and to the nature of such entries is not complete.

I hope the hon. gentlemen will now recognize that the commission was acting with all due haste in ascertaining the whole of the evidence material to the discharge of its mandate, and I trust the hon. member will exhibit some forebearance as we await reports from the commission.

Mr. Leggatt: I wish the police would exercise the same amount of haste with regard to the persons against whom they lay charges. My question is this: 402 of those surreptitious entries occurred in British Columbia. Responsibility for laying charges in these cases lies with the attorney general of the province. Can the Solicitor General advise us specifically whether he has made recommendations to the attorney general of British Columbia with regard to this matter? Has he communicated with the attorney general of British Columbia? After all, they have been charging cabinet ministers out there, and they should think about charging some of the RCMP officers who have clearly violated the law.

Mr. Blais: The position of the government has been made very clear. Any procedures of the RCMP which may be questionable will be referred to the McDonald inquiry and the inquiry will carry on its investigation. That is exactly what has happened. I am satisfied that the inquiry is proceeding apace.

IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF GENERAL QUANG—POLICY RESPECTING CERTAIN JAMAICAN IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. We note the minister was able to give General Quang a work permit, and as far as I have read—or have been advised—he has not done much for Canada. On the other hand, several Jamaican women who have made a significant contribution and who have been here for between five and ten years are living under a deportation order. I sent the minister a brief on this matter and I believe he appreciates the facts contained therein. I want to know what is happening. Has the minister considered this matter, and is he able to tell the House whether he has any sympathy for this legitimate cause?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I guess he is making contribution in that he is not drawing on the welfare system of the province of Quebec: the General is at least working a 90-hour week to support himself and his family. So to that extent he is not drawing welfare from Quebec and federal taxpayers.

As far as the Jamaican women are concerned, I will concede that the hon. member wrote what is probably one of the best letters in support of his representations that I have received on this subject. He borrowed generously from the opinion and advice of the lawyer who was assisting him. I was prepared to make a decision based upon the recommendations made by the lawyer and by the hon. member. However, they have seen fit to retain counsel and to file appeals with the Federal Court. They have sought the assistance of the human rights commissioner, the Federal Court has decided that it has no jurisdiction, and an appeal has been taken from that ruling. Rather than usurp the role of the assistance which is in place for these ladies, I think this process should first be exhausted. I will make my decision at the end of it.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have never heard so much nonsense. The minister has indicated—and I thank him for this; I do not ordinarily thank ministers—that the brief I submitted made a lot of sense. All I want to know is whether the minister has any sympathy in this regard. Let us be honest about this matter. If he can look after General Quang, who has done nothing for this country, I want him to stand up and tell me now that he is interested in this matter and that he has some sympathy for these representations. Have the deportation orders been stayed? Further, has the hon. gentleman issued work permits so that these women can continue to make a contribution to this country?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, now we know that the hon. member makes an excellent oral as well as a written presentation. The deportation orders have been stayed: there is nothing to prevent these ladies working. But I think they are entitled to all the rights and benefits of the courts that the law provides. I do not think it is for me to usurp that role. If they choose—as they have chosen—to go that route, I should not say either that they are to be deported or that they will be allowed to stay. Surely these people should be able to use the procedures which are open to them. It is their own counsel who has decided to adopt the appeal procedure, and I think I should respect that decision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACCEPTANCE INTO CANADA OF POLISH NATIONAL

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister take action to assist Renata Jacobs, a disabled Polish olympics athlete married to a Canadian citizen, to come to Canada to join her husband in view of the refusal of the Polish government to allow her to leave her country?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of this question. I made some preliminary inquiries and am advised that the marriage to which the hon. member refers took place in March. To this date we have not received a formal application from the husband who will, presumably, be sponsoring the entry of his new wife to Canada. When we get that letter we will be glad to proceed. As to whether the Polish government has refused an exit permit, we have not yet had an opportunity to check into that part of the question.

FINANCE

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON CORPORATE CONCENTRATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can he tell us what has happened to the report of the Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration? Nothing has been said in the House about it in a definitive way for months. Will he bring out this old chestnut that it is subject to translation at this time?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Responsibility for that commission does not come under me. I will inquire and report to the hon. member.

NATIONAL SECURITY

STATUS OF FORMER RCMP OFFICER

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General is aware that a former RCMP staff sergeant, Ed. Hameluk, has left the co-ordinating law enforcement unit in Vancouver to join John Meirs, a former associate of the late Howard Hughes. Since Mr. Hameluk was in a sensitive security position analysing intelligence and information sources and is now working for Mr. Meirs, who also had contact with CLEU, I ask the Solicitor General whether this matter is being looked into. Also, is he aware of the concern of other police forces in Canada about this matter, and what steps are being taken by him and, to his knowledge, by the attorney general of British Columbia to evaluate the situation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for bringing all those facts to my attention. I will look at the information he has provided, and if his evidence is accurate I will express the concern that he has expressed.

ENERGY

USE OF RENEWABLE ENERGY RESOURCES

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Because of the significance of international "Sun" day and the motion which received unanimous approval today, as well as the need for using renewable energy in homes and businesses, would the minister amend his budget to incorporate incentives to help people in Canada use renewable energy resources in their homes?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the representation of the hon. member.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REGULATIONS RESPECTING CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister who speaks on behalf of Revenue Canada. Is the minister able to reveal to the House the status of document 78-3, of February 27, entitled "Registered Charities, Political Objectives and Activities"?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it very much if the hon. member would be kind enough to repeat his question. I shall gladly answer him.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the minister represents Revenue Canada in this House, and I should like to know the present status of document No. 78-3 dated February 27, 1978, and entitled "Registered Charities—Political Objects and Activities".

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, as far as I can remember—but I will gladly check with the Minister of National Revenue for further details—the document is entitled "Information Circular". These are documents relating to income tax that are issued regularly and distributed to all accounting firms and tax experts. In this case, it was sent to all charitable organizations, of which there are about 40,000, if I am not mistaken, and which are given tax concessions for charitable donations.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wish to ask a supplementary.

If I remember well, the Prime Minister has suspended the document concerned. I should like to know whether, according to the answer the minister gave us a few moments ago, the document's status is actually the one it has today.

Miss Bégin: I am sorry but I was not in the House for a few days. If the Prime Minister has suspended that document, I cannot see why the hon. member bothers to ask me a silly question.

IMMIGRATION

FOREIGN ENTERTAINERS APPLYING FOR WORK VISAS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that the regulations in the new Immigration Act have been proclaimed as of April 10, and in those regulations there is a requirement that foreign entertainers are now obliged to apply at a Canadian consulate or embassy for a work permit, I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of the assurances we have received from him time after time during our study of the bill that fingerprinting would only be used in criminal cases, the requirement still stands that entertainers applying for a work visa to Canada will, in fact, be fingerprinted by the Canadian authorities before getting a visa.

An hon. Member: What about Lassie?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): That is unlikely, Mr. Speaker. However if, in the view of the department an entertainer who applied for a work visa was a member of the "prohibited" class—I cannot think of the right word—that individual would be fingerprinted for the purposes of identification; but only in that particular instance.

Mr. Epp: I find the minister's explanation very ambiguous because, first, he says they will not be fingerprinted, and then he says that perhaps they will. Can he spell it out clearly, because at present even when a name artist who is not Canadian comes to Canada, he will have the back up of Canadian musicians, and that regulation affects Canadian musicians much more adversely than it does foreign musicians.

Would the minister review that regulation, in view of the fact that we have not had a chance even to discuss it in committee and the effect it is having on Canadian commerce, especially in view of the objectives under section 3 of the act?

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member has made a representation, and so have others. Our concern is that we should be treating people who come to this country to entertain in the way we would like Canadian entertainers to be treated abroad. We have been very generous in the approach we have taken. But I do have an obligation: when an individual comes in as an entertainer, under whatever circumstances, if that individual is suspected of being a criminal I must protect the Canadian public from that person.

MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

FUNDS FOR RESEARCH

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has she received representations from the medical research community to the effect that a crisis now exists in the field of medical research because the funds allocated to the Medical Research Council for the coming year have increased by only 3.8 per cent and as a result of this very small increase—less than the increase in the cost of living—20 per cent of the established medical research projects are being cut off in the coming year and the scientific community cannot live with that kind of budget? If that is so, what does she propose to do about it?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I did receive representations from the medical research community of Canada, which is one of the first groups I met when I became Minister of National Health and Welfare. I am very sympathetic to their representations for more funds. However, the facts given by the hon. member are wrong and I would like to correct them. We increased the budget of NRC by 5.6 per cent and we were able to exempt their budget from the exbudget procedure in order to protect to the maximum the funds we can grant them in this difficult economic situation. Therefore, they have received, proportionately, more than any department of government. This is very important and shows our commitment to medical research and our concern for their particular problem.

I have asked the community to provide me with the facts, and I will do my best to help them. I have not received anything from them as yet. They say that respecting medical research equipment, the cost of which amounts to about 80 per cent of the cost of a given project, comes from the United States and therefore they suffer from devaluation of the dollar in addition to inflation.

FINANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER FRENCH BANKING INSTITUTIONS WILL JOIN CANADIAN PAYMENT ASSOCIATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On April 19, the right hon. Prime Minister stated in the House that the caisses populaires and credit unions would be included in the new Bank Act. Could the Minister of Finance indicate whether, under this government policy, the caisses populaires and credit unions would be required to join the Canadian Payment Association?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The decision whether the caisses populaires and credit unions should join the Canadian Payment Association will be known the moment the legislation to amend the Bank Act has been introduced. At the time the green paper was released, neither the caisses populaires nor the credit unions strongly objected to joining this association.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question. In view of the fact that both the caisses populaires and credit unions came previously under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, could the Minister of Finance indicate whether the federal government has held discussions with the provincial governments concerning the possibility of having these organizations come under such a federal agency as the Canadian Payment Association or another federal agency?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the details of this legislation will be announced in due course. Participation will be on a voluntary basis, and the caisses populaires and credit unions will have to decide one way or another, once the legislation has been duly introduced and studied.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—ALLEGED MISLEADING OF HOUSE BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It refers to a question which I directed to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) on Wednesday, April 25, 1978, and the response which he gave at that time. As reported at page 4828 of Hansard dated April 25, 1978, my question was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Solicitor General. It arises from recent testimony before the McDonald commission which has shown that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police took part in illegal activities for which they could be prosecuted under the Criminal Code. The Solicitor General is quoted in today's Globe and Mail as saying he is not planning to take any action in connection with these breaches of the Criminal Code. Can the minister tell us why he does not intend to take action against those who broke the law of Canada?

The Solicitor General's response was very clear. His reply reads as follows:

> The hon. gentleman has undoubtedly read the terms of reference of the McDonald commission. They include power to inquire into procedures which might not have been authorized by specific legal provisions. The evidence in the past week has shown—if this is what the hon. member is referring to—that there have been what are called surreptitious entries. A legal opinion has been forthcoming from the Department of Justice to the effect that these procedures are legal.

I note the Solicitor General did not say "some" or "a few". He said "these procedures are legal." He continued by saying:

> There is a decided opinion with reference to their legality, and I wish the evidence were completely adduced before the commission so that the inquiry, which is proceeding apace, would be able to make a judgment and bring in its own recommendations.

In today's edition of the Globe and Mail, the Solicitor General informed the public of Canada that, in effect, he found his thought processes were indeed obscure. He found there is no such legal opinion forthcoming to indicate that these surreptitious entries were legal.

I submit the Solicitor General misled the House of Commons. He did not know what he was speaking about. He rose and said things which were not correct. I suggest that he has misled the House. He ought to show some courage and commonsense by standing up in the House like a man and by saying to the House and the people of Canada that he was wrong, and that he apologizes for misleading them.

It is fine for him to make the statements he has made as to how he is prepared to lay things before attorneys general, that he is so open, et cetera. But the fact of the matter is that he misled the House last Wednesday. He should rise and apologize for having done so. We would have a lot more respect for him if he would conduct himself in an open and frank fashion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) raises by way of a question of privilege a matter which was touched on during oral questions today. Of course, it does not fall within the realm of a question of privilege. In any case, if it did, it is not followed by a motion which would call for any action on the part of the Chair. I would have to see such a motion to be able to determine in a final way whether or not the matter is a question of privilege. Even if it does come within the general lettering which might touch upon privilege, without a motion there is nothing for the Chair to act upon.

CIDA

Question No. 1,474—Mr. Huntington:

1. Was a German company, BHS awarded a contract by CIDA for construction of a cement plant in Indonesia and, if so, for what reason?

2. Did any companies bid on the project and, if so (a) what are their names (b) what were the bids, in dollars, in each case?

3. Was steel provided by Canada for the project fabricated in Taiwan and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what was the cost of fabricating the steel in Taiwan as compared to the cost of fabricating it in Canada?

4. What is the total (a) cost of the project (b) Canadian content, in dollars, and in materials supplied (c) Canadian content of man years (d) amount of involvement by CIDA in the project?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. No.

2, 3 and 4. Not applicable.

LANGUAGE TRAINING PROGRAM—N.B.

Question No. 1,483—Mr. Howie:

Has the government taken the decision to have public servants discontinue taking second language instruction training at the New Brunswick Provincial Language School and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: it was the New Brunswick public service commission's decision to discontinue providing this service to the federal government. The New Brunswick provincial language school intends to concentrate on the development of their own program and the Public Service Commission (federal) is presently taking steps to ensure the continuation of their language training program in Fredericton through other means. (i.e. University of Fredericton and possibly University of St-Thomas).

EXPENDITURES IN FRASER VALLEY EAST

Question No. 1,505—Mr. Patterson:

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—INEQUITIES IN SOCIAL POLICY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the social policy of the government contains severe inequities for elderly Canadians, and in particular the House considers the practice of terminating the spouse's allowance after the death of the older marriage partner to be cruel and unjust.

She said: Mr. Speaker, once again the opposition is using one of its few allotted days to bring to the attention of the House a matter which seems to be of far too little concern to the government, that is, the increasing financial difficulties confronting elderly Canadians living on fixed and low incomes. Unfortunately, too many Canadians are unaware of the problems and inequities which exist for this particular age group, and many even think that such problems, if they ever did exist, have since been taken care of.

Everyone knows the old adage that if you repeat something often enough, people will begin to believe it. Once they take hold, certain ideas become so commonplace and so taken for granted that a bare bones exposure of the true facts can be downright startling. Current attitudes to social policy reflect this syndrome.

It is taken for granted that our standard of living has risen and that the number of Canadians living in poverty has declined. People equate the one with the other; but why? It is because they have heard for so long about the Prime Minister's just society and about the endless march of government welfare programs which purport to take care of the needs of all sectors of Canadian society.

Many people are inclined to believe they pay high taxes in order to help out those who are less fortunate than themselves. They believe it because the government has told them this is what is being done with their tax money, that it is being used for the benefit of other less fortunate people. As a recent report from the C. D. Howe Research Institute entitled "In Search of Robin Hood", issued in April of 1978, has pointed out:

Whether or not the outcome of government redistributive activity has been desirable, the belief that there has been a substantial increase in redistributive activity has gone unchallenged.

The report states:

It is almost an article of faith that income is being redistributed more and more in Canada.

The report then goes on to explode that article of faith. It shows that the federal government's budgetary policy has provided higher benefits for the higher income families than for the poor, and that the redistribution of income has changed little in the last 25 years. The report asks:

Has the federal government substantially improved the economic position of the poor relative to the highest income families in the 1970's?

It answers that question with an overwhelming conclusion, and that conclusion is "No". The fact is that over the past decade Canadians have been paying more and more taxes, and almost everybody realizes that. We know that in 1978 the average worker is paying $1,500 a year in income tax as compared with less than $400 when this government first took office.

Canadians have been paying these taxes believing that, because of the government's proliferation of welfare programs, fewer and fewer Canadians have been living in poverty and that the gap between the rich and the poor was being narrowed. Now they are waking up from this giant spending spree which has been conducted on their behalf by the government. Canadians are waking up to discover that any narrowing of the gap between the rich and the poor has occurred in spite of, and not because of, the government's policies, and that although inflation may have raised the poverty line, nevertheless, there are still some three million Canadians who live below that poverty line. That is the shocking and bare truth with regard to poverty in this country.

The truth is we do not have a welfare state. Rather, what we have is gross mismanagement of the taxpayers' money and of the country's resources. Sadly, a number of recent reports do indeed show that we have not reduced poverty in Canada. We have shifted the numbers a little. Families are a little bit better off than they were, with some 17 per cent living in poverty in 1969 and almost 12 per cent now. Some 32 per cent of the unattached youth lived in poverty in 1969 and 35 per cent do now. However, overall the basic picture has not substantially changed. There is still too much poverty in this country, and the government's words of self-praise about its success in reducing poverty do not conform to the facts. There is a very real discrepancy between what the government says and what the government does. On the one hand, we have the true facts about poverty in this country; on the other, we have what the government says are the facts.

Just recently, in the last few weeks, we had an even more striking example of the divergence, the differences, between the government's words and the government's actions. That striking example was seen in the recent issuance of guidelines to charitable organizations, those organizations which direct so much effort toward alleviating social and economic problems, particularly in respect of the poor of this country.

In a recent speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had fine words for our country's charitable and voluntary organizations. I should like to quote a paragraph from his March 22 speech to the Economic Club of New York. He said in the course of that speech:

> The not-for-profit and voluntary sectors of our societies could be made to flourish. Historically they have been the source of the humanizing social movements which were the life-blood of our liberal democracies. They have employed the creative energies of many of our people. Their decline has been inevitably reflected in a growth of government and commercial services. It has resulted in a loss of a sense of community. Surely we need this sector. We need to develop alternate styles of work and leisure and we need to demonstrate that there are other ways of doing the community's work. On a broad second front we must give encouragement and sustenance to these efforts. There is no threat here, only boundless opportunity.

[Miss MacDonald.]

Those were the words of the Prime Minister in New York a few weeks ago. Of course, he was right to say we need this voluntary sector. I suggest we need it more than ever with the government's failure to cope with poverty in this country; more than ever we need the work of charitable and voluntary organizations. We need them too to help prod this government into action to even out the economic inequities. The Prime Minister was right to say they could be made to flourish and that we must give encouragement and sustenance to their efforts. What fine words these were on behalf of the Prime Minister.

When it comes to actions instead of words, what do we find? This is where we find the divergence. We find instead a set of guidelines that, far from offering encouragement, gives restrictions to and curtailment of the activities and freedoms of these organizations; which, far from helping those organizations to flourish, effectively serves to muzzle them in their efforts; which, far from providing the boundless opportunity the Prime Minister promised, raises the spectre of intimidation.

How can these charitable organizations, most of which are attempting to ameliorate the plight of certain underprivileged groups of people, be made to flourish when all of the avenues of effecting change are being closed to them? If they are not allowed to lobby, to hold public demonstrations or to conduct letter-writing campaigns to elected representatives, how can they make the government aware of their concerns? How can they get their point across if effective methods of doing so are considered to be what this government terms political and, as it says, "a threat to their status as charitable organizations"? We are not talking about partisan political efforts here at all. What the government says in its circular is that it sees any involvement in the political process, even that of recommending legislation on an issue of national concern, as a questionable and perhaps even subversive activity by these groups.

As it points out in the circular, these groups must do nothing to embarrass the present government because that, too, would be considered illegal or would be questionable enough to have their charitable status withdrawn. We have seen that government legislation, all too often over the years, has reached out to intrude more and more into the lives of Canadians, both of the rich and of the poor. This is a fact of life that Canadians begrudgingly accept, but the corollary of the simple fact of the growth of government activity is that in this day and age any meaningful change in the situation of any particular group which has been overlooked, overburdened or unprotected by the mass of existing legislation can only be affected by changing legislation.

Any legitimate effort to influence changes in legislation has now been declared political by this government, and in its view is therefore unacceptable activity by a charitable organization. We have an absurd situation here, Mr. Speaker: Charitable organizations cannot do their work except by being what the government terms political; but if they engage in political activity, they lose their tax exempt status as a charitable organization. Think about it; they cannot be charitable unless they are political, but if they are political they are not allowed to be charitable. The absurdity of this situation must be evident even to a government as cynical, hard-headed and hard-hearted as the one we have lived with for the past decade.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: The non-profit and voluntary organizations play a much needed role in bringing issues into the open, in highlighting the plight of certain groups, in analysing the situation of the elderly, the unemployed, youth, children, et cetera, both as to present and future needs. Their work cannot be done without promoting change, and this means legislative change.

It is only too obvious that we cannot rely solely on the government to assess and correct the situation of the poor in this country. Their record so far is not an enviable one. The inequities of our social system have not been evened out over the last decade, in spite of the fact that government expenditures have more than quadrupled in the last ten years.

The elderly are the greatest sufferers and the greatest victims of the inequities in our social system. It is indeed discouraging to think that in the Canada of today one-third of the elderly, some one million Canadians, live below the poverty line. The group that concerns me most in that particular age category is the group of unattached elderly, especially single elderly women. Almost one-half of the unattached single Canadians in the age bracket 65 to 69 and almost two-thirds of those over the age of 70 live below the Statistics Canada poverty line.

The situation for unattached women 60 to 65 is even worse. None of the government's pension programs touch the majority of these women. Unable to get work because of their age or because of ill health, ineligible for Canada Pension Plan benefits—because in the government's view housework is not productive labour—and without a husband or a husband's pension to take care of them, these women are at the mercy of the welfare rolls. Many of them eke out a meagre existence on less than $2,000 a year.

Some of these women, in this age category, 60 to 65, previously lived in relative comfort a few steps above the poverty line while their husbands were alive—they could draw between them or jointly the old age security, the guaranteed income supplement and the spouse's allowance as a couple. These women now find themselves alone and pensionless. The situation arises from the government's curious logic in relation to the spouse's allowance, which says that two people may need $6,000 on which to live—and they have to show a need to achieve that—while the pensioner is alive, but when one dies, the one that is left needs nothing to get along on. That remaining spouse has the pension withdrawn. Now, what curious logic, what curious kind of reasoning, is this? One could really laugh at the government's reasoning if the results of it were not so tragic.

Not only must these elderly people—although my main concern here is with women, the situation is equally desperate for many unattached men—cope with meagre incomes, but they must also cope with rising costs, especially with regard to food and shelter. The price of food which has come close to doubling in over-all price since 1972 has risen 12 per cent in the past year. And it cannot all be blamed on the price of coffee, as the government tries to make out. The price of a loaf of bread, a quart of milk, a pound of butter, all basic essentials, has almost doubled. A can of salmon, which is hardly a luxury, cost 72 cents five years ago and now costs $1.41; a box of soda crackers has risen from 28 cents to 55 cents. A basic 15-item food basket that cost $10 in 1973 cost $18 last month. That is what these people have to cope with in addition to having no or low income.

Many of these elderly people on meagre incomes have less than $15 a week for food. Their incomes are, for the most part, static, and doubled food prices for them means not that it costs them twice as much to eat, but that they can only afford half as much. There is a great difference between what you can buy and what you can afford, and this applies particularly to elderly people on fixed and low incomes.

What is of particular concern to me is that their diets have probably only half the nutritional value that they had five years ago. Many of these elderly people are undernourished; more than half of elderly females have a less than adequate intake of iron and vitamins A and B. This has been shown to be true by many reports and statistics. Is it any wonder that is so when the price of onions, turnips and carrots, the most basic Canadian year-round vegetables—not imports but year-round Canadian vegetables—has doubled since 1972?

Even for the elderly whose income from old age security and the guaranteed income supplement is indexed to the cost of living, increased food prices mean less food. They spend proportionately more of their income on food and we see food prices generally rise faster than the overall price index. An income increase of 5 per cent or 6 per cent cannot match the past year's increase in food prices of 12 per cent. It is therefore imperative that a system of indexing be devised which reflects the real expenditures of the elderly and indexes pensions accordingly.

The situation of the elderly is not one in which we can take pride, certainly not one in which the government can take any pride. The situation of elderly women is shocking, as the Canadian Council on Social Development has stated in a recent report on women and pensions. When questioned about this shocking situation the government responds that they are doing all they can. They shrug their shoulders and say "We cannot spend any more money; the taxpayers don't want us to spend any more money." We have heard them say that and it may be true. But we are not asking them to spend more money; we are simply asking them to spend properly the money that they do collect—not to spend more, just to spend it well.

We might be more sympathetic to the government's excuse of lack of money to help ease the plight of widows, for example, if it were not for the government's incredible record of waste. This government wastes millions of dollars of taxpayers' money annually. Some of the wastage we have seen in the last year has been highlighted by the Auditor General's report.

How many spouses could have been maintained with the $2 million the government gave to the nuclear sales agent, Shaul Eisenberg, for services never rendered; with the $17 million that has been committed to renting unoccupied excess property in Vancouver at a cost of $241,000 per year until the year 2045; with the $95 million in overpayments made by the Unemployment Insurance Commission; or with the $4.5 million paid for rental of unoccupied and, in some cases, unfinished office space in Ottawa in 1975-76? Even those few items I have listed total some $120 million of taxpayers' money which was wasted and which could well have gone toward continuing the spouse's allowance for those who have had it cut off.

The government's spending habits are notorious and I will not take any more time listing them. I could go on and on. But I do have to say that it grieves me deeply that the $10,000 in fees that the government is paying without batting an eyelash to cover the damages in a libel suit for one of its tactless ministers, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), would provide for payment of the spouse's allowance to one Canadian widow for the years between age 60 and 65 for which she would be eligible.

It is this kind of extravagance and waste that highlights the meanness of the government's social policy toward elderly widows. It is this kind of extravagance in relation to a select few at the expense of the ordinary Canadian that highlights the government's insensitivity to the problems of the poor and elderly who, for the large part, are one and the same group.

The withdrawal of spouse's allowance is a mean and cruel practice. It victimizes those who least deserve it—people, mostly women, who have devoted years of their lives to the service of family and community. They do not deserve to suffer the double loss of their spouse and their income. This heartless practice, which represents a minimal saving in the phenomenal national budget and which is money already allocated, should be discontinued immediately. The surviving spouse should be allowed to keep the spouse's allowance. Surely the government should not look to the death of the elder marriage partner in order to achieve a "windfall profit".

I want to emphasize that the motion I am putting forward is just a preliminary step toward easing the financial burden of the elderly in this country. It does not cover single, divorced or separated people in the same age group and it could be seen as creating further inequities. I would emphasize, however, that the inequities are already there in abundance and that this one step would serve to remove at least one of the inequities.

Surely nothing can be more unjust than taking away the small pension that is a person's sole livelihood. To not give a pension to a particular group is one inequity; but to take a pension away is surely a greater one. Even members of the government opposite must be able to perceive this injustice. I implore them to take immediate action to correct it.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) had to say on the Progressive Conservative motion, namely that the social policy of the government contains dire inequities for elderly Canadians and that the practice of terminating the spouse's allowance after the death of the older marriage partner is cruel and unjust.

I would like to point out the great intellectual dishonesty of the hon. member's intervention. Instead of dealing with senior citizens' problems, she took the opportunity to make a political and partisan review of many other points and she was allowed to do so by Mr. Speaker, while standing orders of this House preclude my challenging or disputing her arguments. She referred to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), inflation and many other matters and I am not allowed to disprove her statements pursuant to our standing orders.

However, I would like to take on a point which I think--

Mr. McGrath: Read the motion!

Miss Bégin: That is what I did, I read the motion but, apparently, the Progressive Conservative party did not have enough to say on this motion and felt compelled to talk mostly about the sun instead of limiting itself to the motion. As concerns the status of women, I wish to answer a point raised by the hon. member that has nothing to do with the spouse's allowance but casts serious reflections on the actions of this government, and I find it quite dishonest. I am talking about income tax circular No. 78-3 dated February 27, 1978. I will comment on it in relation to the status of women, Mr. Speaker, and I think that you will allow me to say a few words because the subject was brought to my attention similarly when I was Minister of National Revenue.

I particularly remember AFEAS which does a very good job on issues of concern to women and families and has 38,000 members in Quebec. I also remember groups from the Vancouver Committee on the Status of Women and many Canadian associations, namely women's associations, which came to see me and inform me about a situation that seemed unfair to me at the time, that is the possibility of getting a tax exemption number for charitable donations. The officials of the department explained to me that according to tradition, tax exemption registration for charitable donations was given to associations with medical, educational, cultural purposes, sport associations and others of the same type. According to precedents going back to Elizabeth I, on the other hand, any political action prevents an organization from obtaining tax concessions. In other words, if the Association des femmes diplômées des universités, the National Action Committee of the Status of Women of Canada, the Federative Catholic Women's League or AFEAS that I mentioned earlier, the Fédération des femmes du Québec, if any women's association which has been promoting the interests of Canadian women had asked for an exemption for charitable donations under the Income Tax Act, most would have been turned down as were many other volunteer associations in Canada. In fact, their charter allows their members to engage in what might be called political activities under the Income Tax Act.

The Income Tax Act does not allow groups who want to obtain funds and enable people to deduct charitable donations from their income tax to engage in political activities. I therefore asked senior officials to update an interpretation of the act which I thought unfair, and I am very happy to be able to clarify this issue today. When the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) gets all heated up about this, she is getting angry for nothing. We are the first ones to want to update the interpretation of the act, even though this does not come directly under our jurisdiction, but rather under the judiciary when it comes to determining if a certain activity is political or not. I suggest—and I hope this will not make me the target of any criticism—that voluntary organizations which deal with the status of women or any other valid cause in the eyes of Canadian society should be allowed to engage in certain political activities.

This is what we all believe on this side of the House, and circular 78-3 which was published recently by the Department of National Revenue will be completely revised. I am happy to be able to inform the House that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay), has made a commitment to revise the circular and to take our request into consideration. I do not know why the hon. member is laughing. Perhaps she does not understand. I shall try to explain this differently. Oh, I see that the Progressive Conservative party is pleased and supports the status of women! I am happy to see this since we are not used to such support. We want certain activities of a political nature which are acceptable to Canadian society—and the examples I mentioned should not of course be considered binding for the government—to be recognized as valid and legal.

Of course no case has been tested in the courts in 75 years, if my memory serves me right, which makes it difficult for the experts to determine what would be acceptable in the courts today. Writing letters and making representations to members of parliament is in my opinion a political activity which has become part of Canadian customs, can shock no one and is absolutely respectable and important for the health of a democracy. If I understand my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, the senior officials will see what is being done in Great Britain, among other countries, to determine the types of political activities which would not be acceptable and would go against the purpose of the legislation since, after all, it finances indirectly these organizations with the money of all Canadians, and which other types of activities are quite acceptable and give evidence of the health of the Canadian democracy. Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say about the point raised by the hon. member and which has nothing to do with this debate.

[English]

The spouse's allowance program which is at the very core of this motion of non-confidence put forward by the opposition is a program that was brought into effect in October 1975. There are four programs that we know of which have been in existence for the past two and a half years and which we can observe, study and assess. Under the spouse's allowance program, allowances are paid to spouses between the ages of 60 and 64 inclusive. These allowances are for old age pensioners when the need is established by an income test. This income test is one of the most reasonable that I know of. It takes into account that a couple may have a small house, and no matter the value of that house, if it has some reasonable value it would not be deducted from the budgetary list of income and expenses on which they are assessed. This is to find out if the spouse, who in most cases is a woman, is eligible to receive that additional pension called spouse's allowance.

What is most important and what was totally lacking in the contribution made by the hon. member opposite is that the spouse's allowance—in all honesty this should have been mentioned by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald)—was introduced in the context of the guaranteed annual income which her own political party more than anything else has helped kill.

Miss Bégin: If I understood the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) correctly, he used the most pornographic or criminal word one can use in this place concerning the guaranteed annual income, which has always been, no matter what name it is given, a commitment of this government. Many clichés, fears and fairy tales which are frightening instead of hopeful have been described by the hon. member for Athabasca. He is trying to make people believe that a guaranteed income would bring the economy of this country to the worst possible point. Many other members opposite have supported the hon. member in this approach.

● (1552)

I do not know where the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands was during that debate. I do not know what kind of a fight she had to put up in her caucus in order to obtain a formal commitment to any form of guaranteed income. I do not know where she was when the estimates of my department were being studied a few weeks ago by the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. I did not hear her speaking about older people, older women in particular. After a few very good reports were published by some outside groups, it suddenly became a fad to be talking about the issue.

We then heard her voice. Otherwise she was interested in federal-provincial relations and the politics of federal and provincial governments, but not the politics of people.

The spouse's allowance program was introduced in the context of the first step toward a guaranteed annual income. In answer to a question the other day, I informed the House that a guaranteed annual income was rejected by the provinces at one of the last federal-provincial meetings concerned with the social security review. It was rejected for many different reasons. Some of these were explained at that time by my predecessor. They left us with one possibility of action, namely to explore tax related programs of income supplementation which by definition include a selectivity feature and no longer the charcteristic of universality.

We brought about the spouse's allowance in recognition of the hardships faced by many older couples who no longer have a full salary but only the benefits of a single pension. By doing that, we were at the same time introducing another inequity. I do not recall the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands bringing that to the attention of hon. members when this House discussed that bill two and a half years ago.

The spouse's allowance was meant to answer the urgent problem of a couple. It has nothing to do with a principle. There is no principle behind the spouse's allowance. The spouse's allowance was designed to meet a practical situation, no more, no less. It is the first step toward helping those in need between 60 and 65. In saying that, I have just stated the purpose of this government. The purpose of this government, be it through a guaranteed annual income which we know will not take place or any other program of income supplementation that will come about sooner or later, and the sooner the better, is to help all those in need aged 60 to 65.

That is why, when it is recommended that we continue the spouse's allowance for those who receive it until they reach the age of 65, I have to oppose it. It multiplies the inequities for other people, often women who are not married. I refer, for example, to the eldest sister looking after the parents and left without any employment or possibility of employment because of her age, and having not yet reached age 65. This is a lifestyle of our society.

We have to respect those women who might have been married before the age of 60 but are no longer as a result of a divorce, death of her spouse, separation, or any other reason, and who did not fall under the bill proposing the spouse's allowance.

Moreover, we have to help all those aged 60 to 65. One of my colleagues on the government side will address the cost problem that is involved. If there were no cost problem, there would be no problem. It is very nice and easy to exploit the problems of people by trying to create expectations. However, the job of a politician is to choose between resources and priorities, trying to keep a balance and to satisfy the various needs of all the groups in Canada. That is the task of the government.

[Miss Bégin.]

Finding a solution for those in need between 60 and 64 is the second priority I have set for myself. The first is to find a solution for single parents or two-parent families with children who are among the working poor. They are not covered by existing provincial welfare programs because they are working, or they may be earning more than the minimum wage—but not really enough to live.

I set this group as my first priority after a great deal of inquiry among various groups in our society and officials working on these questions, those who are committed to social reform in our country. I attempted to determine the most vulnerable groups in Canada. There is not enough money to look after all groups. Which group should we help first; whose hardships and problems are the most critical? I was told that older people are in the second group. Later this afternoon one of my colleagues will describe the various programs to provide them with an allowance or pension, or exempting them through the tax system, making them slightly less vulnerable.

The second problem in these days of economic uncertainty is to reallocate moneys within the existing expenditures. We are working through the tax system to see what changes can be brought about in order to diminish the gap between the poorest in our society and those with the greatest share of its wealth.

[Translation]

As far as the spouse's allowance program is concerned, the real problem is this. We introduced this program two and a half years ago. We believe that with the support of parliament and public opinion, we could have made headway with the idea of a guaranteed annual income. Honesty compels me to say that the opposition has done everything to kill this idea of a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians. Since I was appointed minister six months ago, members of the opposition have been most conspicuous among those who, during the question period, have repeatedly worried Canadians by suggesting that the government was spending too much under the social programs, which of course is simply not true. Just now, the problem is this: 74,000 Old Age Pension recipients, most of them women, also receive the spouse's allowance.

● (1602)

I have just said that about 74,000 younger spouses receive these pension benefits, which averaged around $130.60 a month during 1977. It is estimated that approximately 200 persons receiving spouse's allowance lose their benefits each month.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Miss Bégin: That is a fact of life. Hon. gentlemen had better address it as such and find a solution rather than saying "Shame". This is based on legislation which was passed by all parties and none of them have the courage to say what should have been done to correct it.

Miss MacDonald: You were not in the committee.

Miss Bégin: Yes, I was. A few members on this side did point out that we might encounter some inequities in respect of older women, unattached individuals between the ages of 60 and 64 who were in need, but who thought a guaranteed annual income would look after their needs. Since the spouse's allowance program began, approximately 5,800 beneficiaries have lost benefits because of the death of the older spouse. Of course, when they reach 65 these persons will themselves become eligible for the old age pension. Therefore, there are approximately 3,750 of all past beneficiaries who have yet to qualify for the old age pension, since they have not yet reached the age of 65. That is the problem to which we should address outselves. Members should decide whether they are ready to allocate resources to this program as a top priority, resources which would have to be taken from funds available for other programs, and I insist on this.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands said the other day, if I am not mistaken, that the department had a hidden $400,000 which could cover the pensions of all the people losing spouse's allowance. I have myself checked with the department and I find there has never been such a hidden sum of money. We do not know what the hon. lady is referring to. She says that extending the spouse's allowance program would not involve additional expenditure, but it would involve addional expenditure and that is the cause of the problem. I will personally not accept any solution which creates, in turn, another inequity. At one time we were pretty sure that a guaranteed annual income was to be expected in the near future but we faced every year more difficult economic conditions and a conservative movement in Canada, both small "c" and big "C", shifting each day more to the right, which did not permit the government to take the action which we think is fair and necessary.

Since it is a question of money I shall talk about money for a few minutes. I shall not accept continuance of the spouse's allowance until the age of 65, as the hon. member proposes. I cannot accept it because it would be creating a worse inequity for the woman next door, on the same street, who is called Miss Somebody instead of being Mrs. Somebody. That is a situation which I cannot support at all. Nor can I support the proposal to lower the age of pension for all persons from 65 to 60.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You will get there some day.

Miss Bégin: No! I think that is a mistaken idea. I regret that the hon. gentleman was not born a few years earlier than he was, before the time he lived in parliament, where he has done a lot of work for social reform because I honestly believe a pension at age 60 is a measure which should have existed at least 30 or 40 years ago but not today. It is the way I would have designed social policy at that time, because in those days life expectancy was much shorter than it is now, when the average is 78 for Canadian women and 76 for men. It was something over 50 years then. In the second place, the hard, physical type of work which was so common, work of a type which is less and less prevalent, should have been recognized as justifying a pension at an earlier age.

Today we are witnessing a reverse movement. We are living in a society in Canada where there is a longer life expectancy, the longest in the world, in fact, due to better diet and living conditions. We are also witnessing a movement among older Canadians against the validity of the idea of compulsory retirement at the age of 65. In addition, I should mention that the cost of providing an old age pension for all at the age 60 would be around $2 billion.

Then again we have never asked ourselves what type of life we would be offering all these Canadians who would be 60 and over and in retirement. I know the New Horizons Program is a good one and I believe members on both sides of the House approve of it, but it is a limited program with limited funds, permitting some initiatives but surely not fulfilling the lives of people who have 20 more years to live after retirement. Our society, like North American society generally, has not yet given sufficient thought to the room it wants to give older Canadians, where it wants them to serve, how they can be integrated into movements and associations without being, in a sense, totally "ghettoized". It is true there are movements and associations of older people only, and there is nothing wrong with old age citizens groups of any sort; but I find it a pity that Canadian society cannot benefit more extensively from the experience, the thinking and imagination of older people who could easily serve, for example, in day care centres, or helping teachers by telling stories or explaining ways of hunting or other skills that they learnt in their own lives to children—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but her allotted time has expired.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say very seriously that Canadian society must make an effort to support senior citizens' groups. This has indeed already started and, to look into this question, we shall certainly hold seminars, symposiums and other such earnest efforts to define the problem and to consider the active role we want them to play in our society. The government gives every assurance to the House in this regard. We carefully consider ways of helping all those in need, particularly those who get the spouse's allowance only to lose it the following month on their spouse's death. It seems to me we could help them, even on a temporary basis.

It takes time to close the small bank account, to cash Quebec or Canada savings bonds, to collect the survivor's benefits under the Canada or Quebec pension plan, possibly to sell the house, however humble it may be, and a few extra months could eliminate the odium of discontinuing their old age security pension the very month their spouse dies. I think that if the opposition were interested in truly helping senior citizens, it is possibly in that direction that we should go.

Social Policy

● (1612)

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I enjoy the friendly teasing I get sometimes around here, Mr. Speaker, about having been here for quite a while, but this is the first time it has been suggested to me that I should have come even before I did!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I could have come here a few years earlier, but back in those days you had to be 21 even to run for this place.

I rise to support the motion presented by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). This will make it necessary for me to answer some of the statements that have been made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), but I hope to relate my remarks directly to the motion and to the import of the motion as I see it.

The motion speaks of severe inequities in the government's arrangements for elderly Canadians, and then cites a particular case having to do with an inequity suffered by women. The facets of the subject of retirement income or the arrangements we make for our older people are many, and the two speeches made thus far demonstrate that point. But I should like, in the time that I have this afternoon, to concentrate on a gross unfairness which, it seems to me, exists and which we should correct, and that is the unfairness of our pension arrangements to women in our society.

I listened with interest when the Minister of National Health and Welfare gave us her priorities in social policy, and I find there is a good deal of merit in the priorities that she outlined. She said that she is, first of all, concerned about those who are in their working years and who do not have enough income to maintain a decent standard of living or to maintain their families. Then she said that the second priority, so far as she is concerned, has to do with older people. Well, I should like to draw to her attention the fact, in terms of older people, that a distinction must be made between the treatment accorded to men and the treatment accorded to women. The fact is that on many counts older women suffer discrimination, and if the minister looks more closely at the suffering of older women, I think she will find that their need has a priority equal to the priority which she gives as number one.

There are several ways, as I said, in which that discrimination stands out, but even before I get to that I might say a word or two on some of the things the minister said. I notice, of course, that she, like many before her on that side, has a great deal of sympathy with the social aims advanced from this side, but there is always the cost problem. I remember reading about it when finance minister Dunning told J. S. Woodsworth that we could not pay a pension of $20 to Canadians 70 years and over because we could not afford it. That was in the 1920s.

When I came here in the early 1940s, Mr. Ilsley was the finance minister. He was also sympathetic to the pleas I was making on behalf of older people, but he told us that the country could not afford the cost.

Down through the years, everything that we have advocated by way of an improvement in social policy has been given that answer—that we cannot afford the cost. Mind you, it is a bit of an experience to sit here today and hear the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) trying to point out that things are so much better in the United States than they are here, and then hear the Liberals on the other side boasting about medicare and about our social programs, programs against which they fought for years, indeed for decades. However, the fact is that we have implemented these programs and we are able to afford them and will go on affording them.

In terms of retirement income, I think the statistics I gave in a speech some time ago spell out the point. At the present time, the older people of this country, people 65 years of age and over, constitute about 9 per cent of the population, but the total income of that 9 per cent is about 4 per cent of the wealth being produced by this country today. That total income includes not only their old age security and other government benefits, but any private income some of them may have.

When we talk about the cost of social programs, that is the reality to which we must address ourselves. Can we not as a society so order our affairs, so distribute the wealth that we produce, that we can give a section of our society, which amounts to 9 per cent, something better than the 4 per cent we are giving them now? If we cannot do that, let us not have all this talk about the cost that we cannot afford.

I was also interested in the comment of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the effect that the government wanted to move in the direction of a guaranteed annual income. At one point she blamed the provinces, but then she blamed the opposition.

Mr. Alexander: I am glad I was not here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I did not know that this was a minority parliament. As far I know, the government has sat there with a solid majority since 1974 and has been able to do anything it wanted to do. If it did not have enough support from the Liberals on its own back benches, it has had our support down the line for social programs, as it had during the minority years from 1972 to 1974.

Mr. Alexander: Foot-dragging.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister can, in some circles, get away with complaints about the provinces—and there are too many Conservative governments in the provinces of this country; she knows that and I know it—but she cannot get away with the argument that this government could not do what it wanted to in the parliament of 1974 to 1978, with the huge majority it has had in all that time.

There is one other matter with which I should like to dispense, and it takes only a sentence or two to do it. The minister said that when legislation respecting spouse's allowance was brought in, nobody on the opposition side of the House complained about the inequities or unfairnesses in it. All she has to do is to get her research people to trot out the record of the speeches that were made. My friend the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was a little annoyed because in my first speech I pointed out that they had been asking in the last election for the pension to be paid at the age of 60 to the wives of pensioners, whereas we wanted more than that. We wanted more than that all the time; we were never satisfied with the pension paid to the spouses of pensioners where the spouses were between the ages of 60 and 65. We wanted it across the board, willing though we might be to accept an income test or some test like that, but not a marital test. So I invite the minister to read the record of the debate which took place in June of 1975, and also to read the debates that went on in the standing committee to which that bill was referred.

● (1622)

At any rate, let me get down to what I think is the thrust of this motion. I am delighted it has been presented this afternoon. For all we can boast about our old age programs being pretty good, or a lot better than they were when I first came here, there are still inequities particularly with respect to women. Women in the older age brackets suffer discrimination, and we ought to straighten that out. Now that a woman is the Minister of National Health and Welfare, perhaps she will see to it that this is done.

There are all sorts of pension programs, led by the government's own pension programs, in which a widow's pension is only 50 per cent of the total pension, whereas the man's pension, if he lives on, is the full amount. How can that be justified?

There are various problems created because the Canada Pension Plan does not provide any equivalent for women who work in the homes, nor even an adequate pension for women who work and contribute to the Canada Pension Plan or for those who contribute to industrial pension plans. Because their wages have been and are still lower than the wages of men, any entitlement they earn in later years is always less. There is the case of widows of veterans, some of whom receive a full widow's pension and some of whom do not. The issue is not what their needs may be, not the attention they may have given to disabled veterans, but the percentage of disability suffered by veterans.

Also there is the situation which I brought out the other day concerning actuarial tables. This was brought to light because of a ruling in the supreme court of the United States which held that employers in that country cannot continue to charge women more for their pensions simply because they are women and are therefore likely to live longer.

This brings to mind the Nellie McClung story about disability pensions being sold by her husband's company. This occurred many decades ago. The insurance was paid in the case of a man whether he was killed or hurt, but in the case of a woman, only if she was killed. What was the reason for that distinction? It was felt a woman might disfigure or hurt herself in some way to collect a benefit.

Miss MacDonald: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We laugh at that today, but other elements of discrimination still continue. It is a black mark on a parliament that, over the course of four or five decades, has done some pretty good work in establishing pension programs, yet has done such a poor job in terms of leaving women discriminated against as seriously as they are in their older years.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare referred to reports which have come out lately concerning women on pensions and so on. These were excellent reports which documented the case. Rather than chiding the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for having seen these reports and making use of them, the Minister of National Health and Welfare should take them to heart and attempt to do something about them both in her department and in the government generally.

Now I should like to come to the particular issue which is before us, namely, that discrimination against women is highlighted by the unfairness of the spouse's allowance. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands brought out a particularly mean practice which is carried on, namely, the discontinuance of that allowance when the younger spouse becomes a widow before she is 65. In order to be correct, I realize I should say, "she or he"; but in most cases the younger spouse, if both spouses are receiving pensions and allowances, is the woman. I have received scores of letters from women in this position. Their husbands have died and their pensions have been cut off. I have not received one letter from a man in that bracket indicating that he has been discriminated against because his wife has died and his pension has been cut off.

The spouse's allowance is essentially a pension program for women between ages 60 and 65. It has been set up on the basis of discrimination of the worst kind. Effectively it says to a woman, "You do not get this pension unless you have got a man".

I do not like means tests or income tests, but I have been required to accept certain income tests. I can see the argument for an income test between the ages of 60 and 65. I think a work test would be better. I want to see a pension available at age 60 to all who are out of the labour market, without any means or income tests. But even if there is a case to be made for income tests, there is no case at all for marital tests. There is no case for saying to a woman, "Need the money though you may, you cannot get it unless you have a man".

The minister has indicated that she will not accept this motion because it adds to the inequities. The inequities are already built into the system. There is no provision for a spinster, a widow, a person who is separated or divorced, be that person male or female. The allowance is there only for the younger spouse, being a woman, who has a man.

Perhaps the minister is technically and logically correct in saying that passing this motion and carrying it out would add a bit more to the situation, because then some widows would be receiving allowances and other widows would not. The minister has indicated that this motion adds to the inequities. One of the reasons I support this motion is that once that happens, it cannot stop there. The government will have to go on and give this allowance to everyone.

Also I say there is a certain practical and humanitarian approach to this. It is bad enough that the government does not give the allowance to a widow who is between 60 and 65, to the spinster, nor to the older single sister who looked after members of her family. It is bad enough that the government does not give the allowance to those people. But to give it to some women between the ages of 60 and 65 who draw the benefits for a month or two or a year or two, and then to take it away, is worse. The government sends a sympathy letter which indicates, "Too bad you lost your husband/wife, but, as you know, this is what the law says".

The minister indicated that this was put forward in the context of a guaranteed annual income. I do not remember the former minister of national health and welfare making very much of that point when he introduced the legislation. That this was the beginning of a guaranteed annual income was a secret on the government side. But the minister was quite correct when she said that it was a means of solving one particular problem, namely, the problem a couple faces when trying to live on one pension. That line has been given to us repeatedly. The minister was quite correct in quoting it again today. The former minister, the present Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Regulations (Mr. Lalonde), indicated that the government was attempting to solve that one problem. I suppose it is logical to say that the government hoped to go on from that point to solve other problems, but this poor government has only an overwhelming majority and could not go any further in this 1974 to 1978 parliament!

We have said it 40 times, and we will say it another 40 times: if two people cannot be expected to live on one pension, how in the world can one person be expected to live on no pension? That is what the government is allowing to happen. It is saying to every single woman, divorced woman and widowed woman between the ages of 60 and 65 that there is nothing for them. Of course, we get the line that those people can go on social assistance or welfare programs which are just as much a right as the assistance under this program; but the fact of the matter is that the Old Age Security Act has been accepted as a basic program which carries with it pride. People are proud to be drawing pensions under the Old Age Security Act. To say to people, "No, you cannot receive benefit under this act; you must go to welfare", is degrading. That is why I feel the spouse's allowance as set up is basically wrong.

● (1632)

I well remember being at home watching the national news on television one night during the 1974 election campaign and hearing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announce that they were going to introduce the spouse's allowance. I remember saying to the television screen right then, "Does he not realize the problems that will be created?", and hearing him come back and state, almost as though we were in conversation, "This will create other problems, but we shall have to solve them later". When will the government solve them, Mr. Speaker? The Liberal party promised pensions, unemployment insurance and health insurance in 1919. It took until 1926 to get the first old age pension, until 1940 to get unemployment insurance, and until the late 1950s to get health insurance. When are we going to solve these problems?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I see that you have been handed a note telling you that my time is running out, Mr. Speaker. Before it does, may I say that although I recognize that the implementation of this motion would create further problems, I would be glad to see this done. It would solve problems for a few widows, but it would hasten the day when the government would have to provide pensions for all between ages 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market.

What is proposed in the motion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) should be implemented forthwith. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House calls on the government to terminate this practice forthwith."

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the mover of the motion. I am also pleased to take part in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald).

As stated so aptly in the motion, I also think it is unjust to terminate the allowance of the spouse aged 60 to 65 after the death of the pensioner. I would like to recall that in March 1977, I moved a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 urging the government to pay at least two thirds of the allowance to the spouse aged 60 to 65 who loses his or her pensioned marriage partner. A great many people between 60 and 65 are faced with serious problems of survival, particularly pensioners' widows since the majority of those aged 60 or over are women.

The economic situation of elderly citizens is precarious since many of them who receive only transfer income from the government are seriously affected by inflation. Indeed, living at the limit or even below the poverty line, the greater part of their budget is spent on food and housing, two areas where price increases are staggering. In this situation pensioners with no investment or work income have no protection other than the quarterly indexing of their pensions.

To make this old age security system more equitable and in line with today's economic situation I suggested various improvements in the past. Indeed, our old age security system has many gaps which the government has failed to bridge so far. One of them is the one we are discussing today. Admittedly it is difficult to explain why a non-pensioned spouse should continue to receive the spouse's allowance when single people in the same conditions were never eligible for that allowance. That is why I suggested on many occasions reducing the age of retirement to 60 and at the same time making retirement optional up to 70. This would go a long way towards solving the problem of the allowance of the spouse who loses his or her pensioned spouse. A number of jobs would also be opened up and could be made available to people drawing unemployment benefits. Any person aged 60 to 70 who is able and wants to work could forego his or her pension and keep working. So optional retirement at 60 would result in lesser outlays for the government than mandatory retirement at 60.

Mr. Speaker, there are now a little more than two million pensioners in Canada with more than half of those in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement. This system of old age security and guaranteed income for people 65 and over is costing the treasury $4.3 billion. There are now nearly 860,000 people between the ages of 60 and 65.

According to the figures for 1976-77, the average pension is $180 a month. A quick calculation shows that lowering pension age to 60 would cost close to $2 billion. But let me quote from the Canadian sociology and anthropology publication to which I referred last February when we were considering Bill C-35. It says that lowering the retirement age to 60—if we accept the reasonable assumption that the current activity rate of people over 65 would be shifted five years back—would open up more than 200,000 jobs for men and 87,000 for women. These figures represent today almost one-third of the Canadian unemployed, according to the latest Statistics Canada survey.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, that allowances must be made when considering these figures because many jobs made vacant in such a way are of a special kind since they are filled by aged workers. But still that would represent a substantial saving in terms of unemployment insurance benefits which would amount to close to $1 billion or even more. The tax burden of bringing the retirement age down to 60 would be lightened by that much.

Mr. Speaker, I concede that, in view of the difficult economic situation we are now experiencing, such a short-term financial commitment could seriously undermine the budget if we once again had to increase the burden of the debt. This is why I suggest lowering the retirement age on a progressive basis within a certain time scale. That way the financial burden would be spread over several years, which would facilitate things for the government. While conceding that over the last few years there has been real improvement regarding old age security, I take this opportunity to remind you that elderly people are always the most vulnerable to inflation and housing difficulties. Because of the many faceted problems of the elderly people, it is difficult to put forth a comprehensive solution.

Yet I would urge the government to realize the difficulties these citizens have to overcome. I am aware that lowering to 60 the age of eligibility for the old age security pension raises many issues, the cost factor not being the least of them. Given the present economic situation, it seems to me that gradually reducing the age of eligibility for the old age security pension would be the most appropriate measure. I also believe that in the short run, a social measure such as early eligibility to pensions for certain persons between the ages of 60 and 65 should seriously be considered. And that I wish to explain. A growing number of persons falling in that age category are finding themselves unemployed because they do not have specific qualifications or are unable to get any. Having little or no investment income and being without dependents, these persons must turn to their province's welfare system for help. It seems to me that according to fair and equitable criteria these persons could be allowed to take an early retirement at 60 and start receiving their benefits under old age security. This would be a first step towards the universalization in Canada of an optional retirement income system at the age of 60.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that the only solution that the government can offer us to correct unfair situations such as those described in the motion presented by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) is to introduce as soon as possible a program aimed at bringing down to 60, at least on a gradual basis, the age of eligibility for the old age security pension plan.

Mr. Speaker, I consider the minister to be an honest person and I think that in the heat of the debate her words exceeded her thoughts; so I should like to remind her that, on this side of the House, my party as well as the other parties of the official opposition and the New Democratic Party, we have repeatedly asked for a guaranteed minimum income. I should also like to point out that the government actually promised it during its 1974 campaign, stressing the fact that a guaranteed minimum income program would be set up in the years following that election.

Mr. Speaker, to prove my point, I gleaned several of my interventions in 1974, and more specifically during the month of—I have that in the official report of the debates for December 3, 1974. I asked the government to lower the old age security pension eligibility age from 65 to 60, and to adopt a guaranteed minimum income. As well, in 1977, on two occasions, I asked that a guaranteed minimum income program be set up for all Canadian citizens from 18 to 60 years of age.

So, the minister may want to tell the truth about the matter and tell the people that, unfortunately, it is not that the opposition put obstacles in the way of a guaranteed minimum income but that in all truth, as the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated it a while ago, the government is responsible for not having done so when, being in the majority, it could easily have respected its 1974 promise and set up, at long last, a guaranteed minimum income for all Canadian citizens.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), for bringing in this resolution. It is a sad commentary that such a resolution would in fact be necessary in the Parliament of Canada. It is a reflection on us, this institution, and it is certainly a reflection on the government of the day that enjoys a majority in this House. Indeed, it is a reflection on Canadian society itself.

While I congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for bringing in this resolution, which would certainly commend itself to all sides of the House, it is not the first time that she has risen to speak in this House to bring forward a glaring injustice in the social structure of Canadian society. She was the first to raise the question in the House about the inequities in the Canada Pension Plan which discriminates against the homemaker in a way equally as unjust as discrimination in the provision to provide for spouse's allowance.

Without equivocation and on behalf of my party, we accept the amendments put forth by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I regret that this resolution will not come to a vote today so that we could watch some of the squirming on the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: If this were coming to a vote, I submit that my learned friend opposite from New Brunswick would not be half as vocal as he is in his seat right now.

The minister, who is not in the House at the moment, referred to intellectual dishonesty in her criticism of the very excellent speech by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. If there is any intellectual dishonesty—and in my opinion there is considerable intellectual dishonesty—it resides in the government of the day. Ten years ago this government came to power with the promise of a just society, yet parliament must spend one of its very important days on supply to debate a resolution which identifies discrimination against women.

I would like to tell the hon. gentleman opposite, who is smiling all over, that if he were half as knowledgeable about the subject that I am addressing to the House as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, then I might be willing to accept his interjections, albeit from his seat; but since he has no appreciation of the subject and since, like most of his colleagues over there, he has little or no sympathy for the people to whom the resolution addresses itself, I suggest he contain himself and hold his tongue.

I can understand the minister in her criticism, and I can understand why she got excited, because anybody who has followed the career of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) would understand the position that she is in today. The word "compassion" is not in her dictionary. If it were, we would not be addressing this resolution today. I suppose the reason for that is that the hon. minister has a background of being a career bureaucrat. She is in fact a bureaucrat's bureaucrat. She is one who has been used to dealing with people as mere statistics or as part of some data coming out of a computer. Otherwise she would be able to put herself in the position of those unfortunate women who today are the forgotten minority in Canadian society. She would be able to put herself in the position of those women who have to pay inflated prices for food and do not have enough money to provide for themselves adequately. The statistics make this point abundantly clear to everybody.

The minister commented in a critical way on the references made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands to the now notorious information circular sent out to registered charities by the Minister of National Revenue, who now resides in another place where he is untouchable by this House. It is well that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands should refer to this insidious document. Were it not for the organizations in this country that speak up for the poor, the forgotten and the social outcasts, it would be a sad day indeed. These people should not be hampered in carrying out these very important activities.

We are told today by the minister—and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has been told by the minister who resides in the other place, by way of courier—that the whole matter of this circular is to be reconsidered, and the inference is that it will be withdrawn. Constraints are placed upon charitable organizations in this country that have to deal with a heartless government such as that in power at the present time. The relevant paragraph reads as follows:

The holding of public events to attract public support, recruit new members, raise funds, explain purposes and programs, and generally publicize the organization and its charitable activities is an acceptable activity of a registered charity, but if the purpose of the demonstration is to embarrass or apply pressure upon a government it is considered a political activity.

What kind of a directive is that for a government to issue in a democratic society such as ours? I say shame to the government that allowed a minister of the Crown to send such a document out to respectable charitable organizations. It is only right and proper that they should be embarrassed and have to admit a mistake, and promise that this scandalous document will be withdrawn or substantially amended.

I referred to the inability of the minister to place herself in the position of an old age pensioner or single person on pension. Imagine the hardships such people undergo in order to provide the basic requirements of life. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands referred to statistics issued by the Anti-Inflation Board a few days ago which indicate that food prices alone in the past year in Canada have risen by 12 per cent and in the past month by 2.6 per cent. This means that a single person over the age of 65 who has an income of $4,634—which is the norm for many people in that category—has to pay over 21 per cent of his or her total income for food. A married couple who enjoy the benefits of spouse's allowance or a pension income are a little better off, but even they must pay 17 per cent of their income for food. I bring this out to illustrate that we have not taken into account the impact of inflation, and especially of food inflation, on old age pensions in this country.

It is all very well to say that we have brought in indexing. When you consider that for the Canada Pension Plan the indexing was approximately 7 per cent for the year and that food prices increased by 12 per cent, it is obvious that the present method of indexing hardly addresses the problem. Indexing for the old age pension plan is equally unjust; it provides an increase of only 8.4 per cent.

On top of all that, Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, with one stroke of the pen, the government eliminated one of the few consumer subsidy programs on food that was still in effect. That is the powdered skim milk subsidy which amounted to $13 million. That amount was too large for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to justify in his budget and he indicated the money should come from elsewhere—for instance, from the budget of the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the budget of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand).

The Minister of Agriculture can claim, on the basis of his surveys, that the subsidy on powdered skim milk was largely going to people in the upper and middle income brackets who did not need it. A closer examination of the facts, however, shows that a large proportion of that consumer subsidy of almost 40 cents per pound on skim milk was going to old age pensioners who prefer such milk, finding it more nutritious and easier to handle, to people with large families who require a great deal of milk in their diet, and to people in the north who cannot afford the price of liquid milk which in most cases has to be imported to the area.

What kind of government do we have, Mr. Speaker? They have lost touch with reality and live in a vacuum. I would say this government have been in power so long that they cannot see the forest for the trees. They cannot see what is happening in this country today. They try to gloss over a study issued by the prestigious C. D. Howe Institute entitled "In Search of Robin Hood", released a few days ago. This report examines the problem which is being exacerbated by this government every week it remains in office. In its opening statement the report has this to say:

> The principal finding is that the federal government's budgetary policies have not, in fact, improved the economic position of the poor relative to the highest-income class in the 1970's.

We do not hear very much about regional disparities in this House any more, despite the fact that regional disparity is still a major factor contributing to the extraordinarily high rate of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces. It is about time we started addressing ourselves to the very serious social disparities that exist in this country, disparities which the C. D. Howe Research Institute thought important enough to study.

This study was necessary because the government tend to ignore the facts, the facts being that in consequence of an inflationary situation which they have not been able to control—especially with regard to food which has been considerably exacerbated by the dollar problem—food inflation in Canada weighs most heavily on the poor. Amongst the poor, none are more pathetic than the senior citizens who constitute far too high a percentage of the poor in this country.

The minister spoke of the spouse's allowance being the first phase of a guaranteed annual income. She tried to blame the opposition for the fact that she has been unable to bring in a co-ordinated plan of guaranteed annual income. What a lot of hogwash! The minister herself was being intellectually dishonest when she said that. All she had to do was look to her colleague, the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan), who spoke against this concept not too long ago, or to her other colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), who came out against the concept in a speech he made not too long ago.

If that is not enough to satisfy her, I would remind her that her colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) was the one who spearheaded the opposition to a guaranteed annual income program when it was first raised by this party a few years ago. This minister now boasts of the fact that as long as he is a member of the Government of Canada he will not permit a guaranteed annual income even to be discussed. So it is about time that the minister was honest.

I support the concept of a guaranteed annual income and for this reason. There is a need for some kind of a guaranteed annual income in this country in order to bring in a comprehensive program to cover the inequities that have crept into the ad hoc system of social welfare which has grown up in this country.

Equally important to me as a Conservative, and there is no contradiction here, a comprehensive guaranteed annual income in this country is needed to address two problems: firstly, the inequities in income distribution, which I have identified in one particular area; and secondly, the problem of incentives. Ad hoc programs have grown up in this country, a lot of them in and of themselves commendable; but without being co-ordinated, they are in fact disincentives in many cases. To work and earn more is a disincentive. People who are on the receiving end of many social welfare programs are not permitted to earn more, otherwise they would be disqualified from the benefits which allow them to eke out some kind of subsistence.

I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that on this question she should address herself not to members on this side of the House who, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out, constitute a minority in this House, but to her colleagues on the government side where the real opposition is coming from. There is no other way to explain the fact that this government has failed during the ten years it has been in power to address itself to this problem in a meaningful way. We get ministers of national health and welfare who come and go and yet who continue to remain insensitive to the problems that still surround us today in this enlightened society of ours. Why should we address ourselves to spouse's allowance? My God, that is fundamental in a just society if there is any kind of justice at all.

There are a number of suggestions I could make to the minister, and I am sorry she is not here. I would like to see her bring in some kind of program which would tie the indexing of the Canada Pension Plan and old age pensions in a real way to the major expenditures of the senior citizens of this country. What are the major expenditures? To most of us who are average income earners of middle age, they are just everyday things; but to an old age pensioner they are major expenses. I am talking about the cost of heat, light, shelter, electricity and food. These are the things that should be taken into account when we review the cost of indexing the Canada Pension Plan and the old age pension.

I believe the Canada Pension Plan should be indexed quarterly. It should reflect these major expenses of senior citizens. Furthermore, I would suggest to the minister very strongly that a survivor's pension under the Canada Pension Plan should not be less than 70 per cent of the contributor's pension, with an eventual goal of 100 per cent. Why not, Mr. Speaker? I would like the minister to address herself to the question of why this reform cannot be brought in and brought in immediately.

I come next to the question of a spouse's allowance. My colleague the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands addressed herself to this most eloquently, as she always does. A person receiving a spouse's allowance should not lose that allowance if the older spouse dies. That is fundamental. It is simple justice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

• (1712)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the opposition gives us the opportunity to examine in a very broad way various suggestions from the opposition, and more particularly from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), namely that the government should undertake a complete review of the old age security pension, that is the basic allowances and the maximum allowances authorized under the guaranteed income supplement.

The most common suggestions are that the age of eligibility be brought down to 60, that the allowances be the same for everyone and raised to approximately $300 a month and, finally, that they be indexed to the cost of living. Since all these questions are directly related to the subject of the spouse's allowance which is the substance of the present motion, and since this proposition, whether it is adopted or not, would eliminate the spouse's allowance, hon. members will understand the importance of my remarks and the reason why it has to be debated here today.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister has already indicated that paying the spouse's allowance to any person under 65 would cost the treasury $2 billion. If the payment were made according to the needs of the spouse, again as regards the same 60 to 65 age group, it would cost the government $600 million.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are just as conscious of and just as sympathetic to the needs of a person who loses a dearly cherished spouse and we believe that as Canadians we must bring, at least for a while until the question has been settled across Canada, temporary relief to that situation, at least for six months. It seems to me a very logical suggestion to continue paying the spouse's allowance, a highly acceptable suggestion at the moment even if we have to review it later on after we have made an in-depth study on the advisability of extending it. Mr. Speaker, as I want to review all the pension programs, I will start with the old age security program.

In 1977 the old age security program cost $4.5 billion, including $3.4 billion for the basic old age security pension, $1 billion in guaranteed income supplement and $100 million in spouse's allowances. Since nearly two million people now benefit from the old age security pension, an increase of $1 in this pension would result in additional costs of $24 million each year. Supposing we raise the old age security pension to $300 a month across the board, the current rate being $156.66, we would be doubling the monthly payment.

It can easily be figured out that two million pensioners each receiving $300 a month or $3,600 a year would cost the federal treasury $7.2 billion every year. This would represent a total increase of nearly $3.8 billion or more than 84 per cent of current outlays. Moreover, as we are often urged to do, we could consider eliminating the means test which is now required to establish eligibility for the guaranteed income supplement. In other words, all pensioners eligible for the old age security pension would also be eligible for the guaranteed income supplement.

If we assume the number of single citizens as compared to married citizens will remain constant, we can make a rough estimate that 1.1 million persons over 65 would receive the guaranteed income supplement at the rate established for single pensioners, and that 900,000 married persons would also be eligible for this income supplement. This additional expenditure would reach $2.4 billion at the current rate or $1.4 billion over the cost of the guaranteed income supplement. Total expenditures for the old age security program would then rise by $5.2 billion a year at the current rate, if we were to apply this program to everyone over 65. Overall annual outlays for this program would be $9.7 billion.

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, and I heard it again this afternoon from the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), that benefits under the old age security program and the Canada Pension Plan be made available at the age of 60 for any person having left the labour force. This suggestion would mean a return to the old income test for all persons over the age of 65 and eligible for the Canada Pension Plan. It is now proposed to come back to that formula and apply it at age 60 without any income test.

[English]

As to how we could achieve any kind of fairness with a retirement test but no earnings test, I am not sure. Certainly there are many questions to be answered about this concept. It appears that a person with $100,000 per year income from investment could state that he is not in the labour market, whereas a person who works part-time for a few dollars to eke out his income could be said to be still in the labour market. Persons such as housewives who are not in the labour force might be able to collect the full OAS benefit even though their spouse is working and making $20,000 per year.

What would happen if someone in receipt of benefits found work and wished to re-enter the labour force? Would the benefits be suspended and overpayments recovered? What would be done for people who are unemployed but continuing to seek work, even though the prospects of finding employment may be slim? Would we force them to give up all hope of employment and permanently withdraw from the labour market before they could obtain benefits? Since unemployment insurance benefits are currently payable up to age 65, would double benefits be permitted, or would we perhaps lower the age limit on UIC eligibility to age 60?

I might note that one of the reasons the CPP retirement test, for persons over age 65, was abolished was to avoid some of the inequities which I have described above, as well as to remove the disincentive to work which such a restriction implied for persons aged 65 to 69. Some would suggest that such a retirement test be applied at age 60 for both the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act. With such measures, the Government of Canada would be very strongly encouraging people to retire at an earlier age, and almost penalizing them if they did not. If past experience is any indication, the Government of Canada would also be encouraging employers to lower compulsory retirement ages, as happened when the eligible age was lowered from 70 to 65.

Because of the possible changes in retirement patterns that such an incentive to early retirement might have, it is not possible accurately to estimate the total cost of permitting voluntary retirement on full pension at age 60 under the Canada Pension Plan and the old age security program. We can, however, make observations and approximations which might prove useful in considering the possible effects of such a decision.

First, I might note that at present 13.3 per cent of the population of Canada is over 65 years of age, whereas 19.3 per cent is over 60 years of age. If we were to imagine for the moment that the entire population between 60 and 65 years of age were to retire, then clearly the cost of retirement programs would increase by at least 45 per cent. This would increase old age security costs which, as hon. members will recall, already have risen to $9.7 billion, by another $4 billion, making the total cost $13.7 billion per year, or nearly three times the present total annual cost of the OAS program.

This speculation of mass retirement is not very far-fetched in the long view if we consider the possibility that lowering the retirement age to 60 for the federal government programs might eventually lead to its being adopted as the normal retirement age in Canada. If we suppose, however, that only the approximately one-half of the population between 60 and 65 who are not now in the labour force were to take advantage of this early retirement proposal, the cost of OAS would still rise by about $1 billion annually at the current benefit rate, or $2 billion at the proposed $300 rate. This in itself is more than ten times the estimated amount currently spent on social assistance for persons aged 60 to 64, excluding the spouse's allowance. If this proposal also suggests that these people in the 60 to 64 age category receive full GIS as well, this would make the total annual program cost of old age security nearly $12.2 billion more than the cost of the current OAS program.

In the Canada Pension Plan we find a similar pattern. If all eligible persons were to retire at age 60 instead of 65, then the CPP beneficiary population would jump by almost one half. In the long run, the contribution rate would also have to rise by almost one half to pay for these benefits. Since it is now projected that the CPP contribution rate will have to more than double in the next 50 years, we might wish to reflect whether we have the right to commit succeeding generations to such an additional burden.

If legislation were introduced to allow CPP retirement pensions to be payable at age 60 in 1979, and if we assume that only half the eligible population takes advantage of early CPP retirement, we find that benefit payments would rise by $40 million in 1979 and would cost an extra $640 million by 1985.

The tale of financial woe does not end, however, with increases in numbers of pensioners and the dollar amount of benefits paid. We must remember also that by increasing the number of pensioners, we decrease the number of people in the labour force who must pay the taxes and make the contributions to support the larger population of pensioners. In other words, we are not simply increasing by five the number of years for which the eventual pension must be paid; we are also lowering by five the number of years in which the individual contributes toward the benefits of others.

The effect might be made clearer if we think of the individual as "earning" his or her own eventual retirement through active participation in the economy and in Canadian society prior to retirement. A person who works from, say, age 20 to age 65, a total of 45 years, and then retires and lives a further 15 years to age 80, has, in effect, worked three years for every year of retirement. If we lower the retirement age by just five years in this example, we find that the individual has worked only two years for every year of retirement. Clearly the amount that is set aside in respect of every working year to pay for the eventual benefit must be considerably increased.

One final and vital factor must also be considered, and that is the changing population profile in Canada. Our birth rate is dropping and is now well below the replacement rate. This means that the average age of our population is rising. If present trends continue, some demographers estimate the ratio of retired persons to workers in the labour force will nearly double in the next 50 years even with the normal retirement age still set at 65. This means that the tax burden placed upon each worker to pay benefits for the retired population will increase over the next 50 years. It is said that if we lower the normal retirement age to 60, the ratio will be three times what it is now and the eventual tax burden therefore three times as great.

There are other hidden costs associated with lowering the retirement ages and increasing benefits on which we can only speculate. If income security benefits such as old age security are drastically increased, will this encourage people to become more dependent on public pensions and to decrease their personal retirement savings? Certainly the average private pension benefit will have to be smaller, or the contribution rate much higher, if we lower the average working career by five years and increase the average payment period by the same amount.

Summing up the costs of these suggestions as far as they can be estimated, we can say that the changes in CPP and OAS benefits which I have outlined could cost at least $7.7 billion extra in the first year after implementation. The annual amount to be expended would increase and not decrease in the long run. At the same time the alterations to our social and economic structures which are implicit might very well lessen our ability to pay the cost.

Hon. members will recognize that these are extreme proposals I have been talking about, but they have all been seriously discussed in this House at one time or another, either under the guise of a solution to the spouse's allowance problem or as more general reforms for our old age security system.

We have considered such proposals, and I will repeat what I said in French a few moments ago: I am in total sympathy with those who, on the death of a spouse, find themselves in straitened circumstances. I know that serious studies are going on within the administration to cope with the problems which hon. members have raised. It is, indeed, a sad situation when a surviving spouse is left without income because he or she is not eligible for OAS payments. I think a proposal might be made on this side that, in the immediate period following the death of an eligible pensioner, his or her spouse would be entitled to six months' allowances as an exceptional measure. During this period he or she could possibly adjust to the new financial situation.

I also spoke of the cost of improving a number of the present programs. We must look seriously toward improving many of these programs and these improvements must represent additions to what I consider to be already very good programs. Consider the financial position of pensioners today compared with a few years ago. In 1965 a married couple was entitled to $150 a month or $1,800 per year provided both were over 70 years of age. In 1977, a retired couple, one of whom was 65 and the other over 60, are guaranteed by the OAS/GIS of an income of $488.24 per month, or $5,858.88 per year. A single pensioner is guaranteed $255.94 per month, or $3,071.28 per year.

But these figures do not tell the whole story, since they ignore the Canada Pension Plan income such a couple would almost undoubtedly have. The maximun CPP benefit in 1978 is $194.44 per month. Even at the end of 1977 the total benefit was $2,083.32 per year. A two-pensioner couple, one of whom was in receipt of this maximum CPP benefit, was guaranteed an income in 1977 of $6,711.30. I might point out that none of this income would exceed the available tax exemptions.

Let us assume that such a couple had a family income of $10,000 per year at the end of 1976, prior to retirement. If they lived in Ontario, their income after deductions in 1976 would have been about $8,000. It can be seen, then, that the Government of Canada has virtually guaranteed such a couple nearly 84 per cent of their pre-retirement net income, even excluding private pension income or provincial supplements.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in this debate because I think it is an extremely important one. First, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) for putting this motion forward. Next, I congratulate my hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for so admirably handling his portfolio as Conservative critic for welfare and social needs. As for the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), I will not say he did not write the speech he made because that is not fair, but he did leave me with the impression that everything was perfectly all right.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I did not say that.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member says he did not say that, but all I heard from him was that our senior citizens are doing all right. On the other hand, my hon. friend from St. John's East stands up in the House day after day telling the government how callous and unconcerned it is about the poor, about our senior citizens and about those who are least able to take a kick in the pants.

Mr. McIsaac: I am sure you don't believe that.

Mr. Alexander: There speaks the hon. member for one of the Saskatchewan ridings—we might as well mention it, Battleford-Kindersley—to show his disregard for our senior citizens. What I would like to say is this: perhaps the minister and her officials need to take a sabbatical and travel around the country as some of us have done to find out just what are the real needs of the senior citizens. It seems to me the minister and her officials are developing policy in Ottawa without knowing what things are like in the real world. They have no idea of the monstrosity they created when they brought in this spouse's allowance.

I recall that we expressed concern at the time the bill was debated. We did so on the grounds that it was discriminatory. Spinsters and bachelors who reach the age of 60 are not eligible for benefit. There is an even worse aspect. In the first instance, the government indicated, in defence of its proposal, that two people could not live on one pension. But when one of the couple dies, the surviving spouse is supposed to live on no pension at all. This is one of the cruellest hoaxes perpetrated since I became a member of parliament. It is the worst piece of legislation I have ever read and it has no place on the statute books of our country.

I had the opportunity of going across this country and I want to put on the record some of the things about which our senior citizens are concerned. We have the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet)—I do not know what he is doing but he seems to be butting into provincial jurisdiction half the time—and we have the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sports (Mrs. Campagnolo), but it is becoming increasingly evident that since the proportion of senior citizens in our population is growing at a rapid pace because people are living longer, there is a requirement for a special minister to be appointed to look after the needs of senior citizens.

It has been suggested to me on my tour that it is time we started to think about such a minister because the number of senior citizens is growing for various reasons, whether owing to better diet, improved medical technology or for other reasons. This means that in the long run there will be more senior citizens, with all the problems that go with them, and that it is high time we started to think about our priorities in terms of a separate department to look after their needs.

Somebody will say, I am sure, that we, a party which always talks about restraint, perhaps should not be proposing ways of spending more money. But let me point out that these are important priorities, and when we see a priority arise in terms of the needs of our senior citizens, we should be prepared to act. When I went across this country I found a need for such a ministry. Surely if we have a minister to look after fitness and amateur sports—and I am not taking anything away from that minister—and a minister to look after small business, we should also have a minister to look after this very important sector of our population, namely, our senior citizens. At present their needs are looked after by three or four ministers. This is unfair, unjust and cruel. That is my first suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

What else have I found on my tour, sir? I will read the following comments regarding housing accommodation. There is a great deal of resentment among senior citizens who would like to live in their own homes rather than be shunted off to senior citizens' homes, no matter how excellent they may be. Senior citizens would like to have money in order to pay their taxes and to pay for heating and maintenance, which cost such exorbitant sums at this time that they must sometimes sell their homes.

In my view, it would be much cheaper to have a form of subsidization to look after these matters than to build senior citizens' homes en masse which, incidentally, cost more than the amount which would be allocated to look after the problems referred to. In other words, senior citizens are demanding more choices. This makes sense. Many of our senior citizens have owned their homes for years, but in their twilight years they cannot maintain their homes, paint them, cut the grass, heat them. These are the sort of services which they need. That is why I say we should take action in that area. If we are cost conscious at all, let us think of the millions of dollars that would be saved if we had programs under which our senior citizens could live in the places they themselves built and furnished and in which they raised their children, programs which would enable them to live the balance of their lives in dignity. Of course, such an idea would escape the imagination of this callous, cold, inept government.

I heard the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier say—and if I am wrong, he will check me—that he does not like the idea of people working after the age of 65. I myself think there is some merit in people over 65 working. These people do not work because they love work although, mind you, they really appreciate the work ethic. They work because they have the need to work, either because of their own personal needs or because of the commitments they made on behalf of their wives, their children and their grandchildren. The inequity which came about as the result of this government's attitude is that they cut off these people from unemployment insurance. That was a terrible day. The government said it would save them—I am not sure of the figure—about $50 million. Then there was the question whether they were ripping off the system.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. I want to make it clear that I never said what the hon. member just attributed to me. I spoke French and the translation might have been incorrect. I will repeat in English what I said. I said that some people would like us to reduce the age of eligibility for OAS from 65 to 60 with a means test. I do not agree with the means test. That is what I said. I never said anything about the capacity for work of older people. As a matter of fact, I am one of those who encourage them to work.

Mr. Alexander: As I was saying, with regard to unemployment insurance, the government destroyed the initiative of countless thousands of people when it said: "You are no longer entitled to unemployment insurance". The government kicked them out to pasture.

Mr. Caccia: You voted for that legislation; you supported it.

Mr. Alexander: That was another cruel hoax and inequity. If the hon. member wants to, he can check it out, but what we did was to register our concern about that inequity. I will not pay any attention to what he says. We took issue with that government program the same as we took issue with the measure regarding spouse's allowances.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: You voted for it.

Mr. Alexander: Is it not significant, Mr. Speaker, how disturbed they become over there when you hit a nerve? I do not want to talk about the polls because that is not the subject of our discussion, but I would have plenty of reason to be concerned if I were a member of the Liberal party and watched it go down the drain. Why is it going down the drain? Because the Liberals are insensitive. They are in this business for the sake of power, and they do not give a damn about the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Now it is coming home to roost. That is why they are sitting over there worried and scared. I heard the clapping they had in caucus this morning which was supposed to be for our benefit, but it was faked, just like most of their policies are in the first instance.

Let me get on with the subject under discussion. Another thing that I admire about my colleagues, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for St. John's East, is that they brought another point to the attention of hon. members opposite.

An hon. Member: Why are you smiling?

Mr. Alexander: I have to smile. I am not really angry; I pity those opposite because they do not understand. My smile is a smile of compassion as I stand here speaking on such a serious matter. They are not bad people; their only problem is that they are Liberals.

My colleagues to whom I have just referred spoke about the cost of living. I want to read again some comments that I passed on to one of my colleagues who was going to deliver a speech or write a letter on the needs of senior citizens. My colleagues really hit a very important point. This is what I wrote to one of my colleagues:

> Cost of Living—it is noted that the senior citizen is primarily interested in heat, clothing, food and shelter, etc., but it is noted that the consumer price index is based on a number of things which do not directly affect senior citizens and therefore they would like a new formula invoked regarding the consumer price index which would take account of the cost of living with which they are involved.

This was not discounted by the former minister of national health and welfare. I do not wish to paraphrase him or take his words out of context, but, as I understand it, he thinks that suggestion interesting. I did not hear the hon. lady's speech, but I put that suggestion before her again, as did the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Both ministers should take a long, hard look at this suggestion, because it seems to me that the formula means nothing when the cost of food and other costs go up 14 per cent while they are only entitled to 8 per cent. I may be wrong, but hon. members will get the idea.

We are moving in the wrong direction and we must look for a new formula. Let them not tell me that it cannot be done, because I remember the time when the government wanted to shaft the unemployed by bringing in amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. member for St. John's East were concerned about the less privileged. I said, after I had discussed it with my colleagues, that we would give this government notice that there should be flexibility. Rather than have a 12-week period, we would have a period from eight weeks to 12 weeks. It would be a flexible period. It would depend on the rate of unemployment and the number of weeks a person would have to work.

● (1742)

At first government members said that it was impossible, that it was a bureaucratic nightmare and could not be done. Government members asked from where we got such a stupid idea. We should thank God that we have opposition members around here. The government eventually bought that policy, after espousing that it was nonsense. Now the government is taking credit for that idea and we are receiving no credit at all. Wait until the Conservative party comes into power.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: If hon. members opposite think those are all the ideas we have, they will be surprised when my party forms the government. Let me point out that after waiting for ten years I am eager.

We require a new cost of living formula to assist our senior citizens. The one which is being applied now does not meet their needs. I should like to put on the record some more of our ideas.

Mr. Paproski: Don't give them too much. We want some policies left for ourselves.

Mr. Alexander: Well, that is right. Hon. members opposite are thieves.

Mr. Martin: Go ahead.

Mr. Alexander: The government listens to our suggestions and indicates that they are no good, yet eventually implements them. What about wage and price controls? I do not want to mention that.

Mr. Paproski: Go ahead.

Mr. Martin: What about wage and price controls?

Mr. Alexander: Government members are thieves.

Mr. Martin: What about indexing?

Mr. Alexander: I should like to refer to wage and price controls, because our senior citizens have been affected by these. In 1974, members of the Liberal party travelled across Canada indicating that price and wage controls did not work in the United States and Great Britain, and that they could never work in our country. At that time they indicated that they would never bring in price and wage controls because they would be disastrous for the country.

Mr. Martin: No freeze.

Mr. Alexander: What is the situation now? That is why the government's credibility is shot at the present time. It indicated that the wages of Canadian workers would never be frozen. Hon. members of the government are the biggest bunch of hypocrites I have ever met. That is why the government is going down the drain and its credibility is shot.

Mr. Huntington: That is why there are over one million unemployed.

Mr. Alexander: Now the government is attempting to pussyfoot and indicate its circumstances have changed. I told the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) about that idea. He had that policy tucked under his armpit. I brought that matter up after the 1974 election. He was as embarrassed as the other members of the government are at the present time. Government members are deceitful. They play hanky-panky with Canadians. They are flimflam artists. They are thieves. I am directing those remarks to the government collectively and not to any individual member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that in the opinion of the Chair he is pretty close to the line. I suggest that he should be careful in what he says about our government.

Mr. Alexander: I never like to tread on Your Honour's toes. I do not mind treading on the toes of government members, but treading on Your Honour's toes is another matter.

I should like to refer to the New Horizons program. It is a magnificent and excellent program. Recently I found out that senior citizens are concerned about young people having so much to say about programs designed for senior citizens. The senior population would like to have more individual, personal input into these programs. That is not happening now.

Mr. Paproski: We will make it happen.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, we will. I should like to refer to very simple matters such as our taxation forms. They are horrendous. I attempted to figure out my form the other day. I am a pretty smart fellow—perhaps hon. members opposite do not think so—but it was an absolutely terrible and frustrating job. I managed to get my return in. I did not do what I was supposed to do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I just dumped all of my papers into the envelope and mailed it. I can imagine what senior citizens face when they attempt to complete their forms with no assistance. The government should give thought to having more assistance available in the offices of the Department of National Revenue for the benefit of senior citizens. Of course, I refer particularly to the city of Hamilton. I feel this is another policy which has some merit.

Another problem which our senior citizens face is in the area of benefits. No matter what the benefit is, the bureaucracy is fantastic and the red tape is too long. Perhaps the government knows about this problem and is coming to grips with it, but it is somewhat lost with the countless millions of people who are involved. It takes too much time for senior citizens to receive benefits. I am sure those members of our population would like to see the red tape cut and the bureaucracy removed as much as possible, so that they will know when to expect receipt of their cheques.

Guaranteed income supplements were referred to earlier. I realize we are getting into the area of shared cost programs, but we must look hard at what we are doing to some of our senior citizens. If they are slightly over a particular limit, they are not entitled to any help whatsoever. When these same people start to receive incomes, and as tough as things are now—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the great hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that his time has expired.

Mr. Alexander: Thank you for the compliment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate this afternoon in this opposition motion which has been put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). On the one hand, I suppose we might call it the "cruel and unjust" motion. On the other hand, based on the discussions which have taken place this afternoon, perhaps it can be labelled as the "$4 billion flip-flop motion".

It is incredible that it is sponsored by the official opposition that hopes to form the government of this country at some point some day in this century; God knows when. The financial critic of that party, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), distinguishes himself by his absence from the chamber this afternoon. I think I can understand why.

Mr. Clark: Where is the minister?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for York-Simcoe said that we should knock $2 billion off the operating expenditures of the government. That sounds great.

Mr. Alexander: Read his entire speech. You should not be selective.

Mr. Martin: Distinguished senior members of the Conservative party, such as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), have now promoted a particular policy which would not reduce the government's budget by $2 billion, but rather would add $2 billion to the budget.

Mr. Alexander: What are you talking about?

Mr. Martin: Even hon. members of the opposition have to face simple arithmetic. They should realize that two plus two equals four.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, a point of order, or whatever Your Honour prefers to call it. I want to second guess the hon. member who has the floor. If he is talking about the spouse's allowance, and I hope he is—

Mr. Martin: That is the motion.

Mr. Alexander: All right, I am glad that is clear. If the hon. member is talking about the spouse's allowance, he should not leave the impression that it will cost $2 billion. I have heard from departmental officials and from the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the cost will be approximately $4 million. I do not think the hon. member should mislead the House by indicating in an offhand fashion that the cost will be $2 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that he is not presenting a point of order, nor a question of privilege. He is raising a point of debate. The Chair has been fair with all hon. members. They have wandered all over the lot in dealing with this subject.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon I was accused by the hon. member for St. John's East of knowing nothing about health and welfare programs.

Mr. Alexander: That is correct.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps I do not know as much as the distinguished hon. member for Halmilton West, because I have not been around here as long. However, in order to implement the spouse's allowance policy for people aged 60 to 65, without any means or needs test of any kind, I understand the full cost would be $2 billion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: You are wrong, sir.

Mr. Paproski: You are wrong.

Mr. Martin: If my figures are incorrect, as hon. members opposite are indicating, I stand to be corrected. Certainly those are the figures I have been given.

Mr. Clark: The problem is that you cannot read your figures.

Mr. Martin: That is the first flip-flop, a $4 billion flip-flop. I am glad the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is present in the chamber. He can participate in the flip-flop being performed by the members of his party. I am delighted.

The second flip-flop might be called the "DDM flip-flop," the displaced deputy ministers' situation. That is another flip-flop on the part of members of the party which is hoping to be elected as the government some time in this century.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will there be an election in this century?

Mr. Martin: A senior member of the Conservative party from the Winnipeg area, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), indicated that when his party forms the government the deputy ministers will be dismissed. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) made a quick about-face and said, "No, no, we will keep the deputy ministers. We would not get rid of deputy ministers." By coincidence, he represents a seat in the area of the nation's capital.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Alexander: Stick to the motion.

Mr. Martin: The third flip-flop was in the areas of capital punishment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) should direct his remarks to the resolution under discussion.

● (1752)

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I am coming to that. I might add that in the course of debate this afternoon we have had introduced a circular put out by the income tax department; we have had reference to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), and the sum of $10,000; and we have had reference to unemployment insurance. However, I am prepared—

An hon. Member: Read the motion; it says "inequities."

Mr. Martin: I am prepared to move from this after just saying in passing that I noted earlier that the hon. member for Hamilton West told us he had supported a piece of legislation in this House which he now calls the worst piece of legislation that has come before the House in all the time he has been here. However, he supported it, I am not clear why, when it first went through. He also supported the unemployment insurance changes which he now intends to condemn because he feels they are cruel and unjust.

Let me make a few more general points before I get into specifics. It needs to be put on the record that there is no country in the western industrialized world where the senior citizens are better looked after than they are in Canada, bar none.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the senior citizens.

Mr. Martin: This is something of which this government, Canadian citizens and the Canadian community at large can, indeed, be extremely proud.

An hon. Member: Tell that to your people in Scarborough during the next election campaign.

Mr. Martin: I will be delighted to tell that to the people of Scarborough West, Mr. Speaker. I have a good number of senior citizen's homes in my riding and I continually have a good deal of interaction with them. Yes, there are a number of things senior citizens would like to see done to add to the benefits in existence today, and that goes without saying. But the senior citizens are very supportive of government programs that exist today in all kinds of areas, including senior citizens' housing, old age pensions, the Canada Pension Plan, disability plans, the New Horizons program, etc., etc., etc. In the past ten years or so this Liberal government has moved the percentage of the federal budget devoted to social programs, administered largely through the Department of National Health and Welfare, from 12 per cent of expenditures to 33 per cent, and that is almost a three-fold increase in percentage terms, to say nothing of what these increases really mean in terms of actual dollars.

At the same time, to show the kind of commitment Canadians have through their elected government, a government that still has the majority support of all Canadians across this country, and will continue to have after the next election, during the same period expenditures on national defence have moved down from about 25 per cent of the budget to about 12 per cent, or roughly one half in proportion to the total budget. That is the commitment of this government and that is the commitment of Canadians who will continue to elect the Liberal party to form the government of this country.

The important thing, which has been mentioned earlier, is that if the program which is being talked about was to be put forward simply for those in need between 60 and 65 years of age, this would cost somewhere in the area of $600 million. Let us not talk about things that have been taken out. This was not something taken out of the legislation. When the legislation was put in, it was to benefit a group in addition to the senior citizens over 65. One can argue that the age should come down to 55, 50 or even 45, but let us keep things in context. If we include only those who are in need, my understanding is that the cost would be somewhere in the area of $600 million, as I have said.

It is my understanding that one of the things that could be looked at and which is receiving some consideration, is a tie-over period to help those senior citizens who suddenly find themselves without this pension, giving them a six months' lead in time in order to adjust to whatever other benefit plans may be available to them. This is something that is currently receiving consideration and hopefully will be done.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We will be hearing about this during the election campaign, no doubt.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I never object to hearing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speak in support of senior citizens, the disabled and those less fortunate in this country, because he is very consistent. He continually speaks on their behalf and I think that is to his credit. I know he does not always tie the dollars in, but at least he is consistent. But in the official opposition we see this incredible flip-flop policy. I only wish the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the hon. Leader of the Opposition had been here for the full debate this afternoon, because it would have been interesting to see how they intend to handle the situation once they have moved outside this chamber.

Mr. Clark: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since attention has been drawn to my presence during the debate, I should like to point out to the hon. member, not simply the fact that he has been misrepresenting the facts, probably with some deliberateness, as was pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), but also that when he speaks about the presence or absence of front bench members and party leaders he should ask where is his leader, where are his ministers, and where is his minister at this time when we are dealing with a matter that is so fundamentally associated with social justice in this country.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. Clark: When will he come to the point of telling the House of Commons what the government intends to do to ensure that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that this is not a point of order but rather a matter for debate.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I resent very strongly, and deny, any suggestion that I am attempting deliberately to mislead anybody. I do not think any hon. member of this House in any party whatever would attempt to do that. Perhaps that remark will be withdrawn on further reflection by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. As far as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is concerned, she just returned from outside the country about ten minutes before the debate began. My understanding is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is taking part in some very important conferences with the leader of an important political party from one of the provinces at this time, in the interest of national unity.

I should like to move away from this flip-flop aspect of what we are hearing today. I would like to get into some specific details of what we are talking about in terms of the actual benefit plans available to senior citizens in this country, including hospital and diagnostic insurance, medical care, the Canada Assistance Plan, the Canada Pension Plan and income tax benefits for senior citizens which result in their having exemptions in excess of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being six o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), the proceedings on the motion have now expired. This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CHURCHILL, MAN.—INTENTION TO CLOSE RADIO STATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will be closing down the Churchill radio station in June. The reason given for closing this station is that it is too costly to operate. For the last three weeks we have seen as many as five large CBC trucks and vans parked on Parliament Hill. It would appear that this is surplus equipment and it has cost thousands of dollars to let it lie idle on Parliament Hill. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the CBC sell off this surplus equipment in order that they can afford to keep the radio station in Churchill.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the statement by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) while at Stoney Creek last night that the press are making more depressing our economic problems when in discussing our disastrous economic figures they compare Canada to other nations with better economic records, such as the United States, West Germany, Japan, France and others, instead of to Argentina where inflation is 150 per cent and strikers are put up against walls, a situation that the minister thinks "very probably would not be palatable to Canadians", and in view of the fact that if the government had said to Argentina "no Candu", it would have saved Canadian taxpayers some $130 million so that even admirers of Luis Firpo, the wild bull of the Pampas, the model for the minister, can restrain their need to be reminded of how Argentina put it over the Canadian government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That this House understands and sympathizes with the statement of the Prime Minister of April 12, 1978, that "it is surprising to see the hon. member paying so much attention to the statements of the hon. member for Crowfoot", and that this House continue the mind of the minister in an "at rest" position by assuring the minister that inflation at 150 per cent and the putting of strikers up against walls is a situation which would not be palatable to Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR SASKATCHEWAN INDIAN COMMUNITY COLLEGE—MOTION UNDER S. O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have an equally sensible motion, Mr. Speaker. The Saskatchewan Indian Community College at Saskatoon has a projected financial need in 1978-79 of $3.3 million. They recently received word from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that they will be receiving only $439,000, and the college may have to close. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House instruct the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to immediately provide the Saskatchewan Indian Community College with the necessary $3.3 million to keep the college open for the Indian people of our province.

SALES TAX AND DUTY ON IMPORTED GRAIN PROTEIN TESTING MACHINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that with the introduction of protein grading, a large number of testers will be required by the various grain companies, in view of the fact that these testers are not manufactured in Canada and must be imported from the United States, and in view of the fact that the cost of these testers will ultimately be borne by the grain producer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the government take immediate steps to waive the sales tax and duty on all protein testing machines imported into Canada.

BUDGETS OF INDIAN BANDS IN SUDBURY BASIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the same Standing Order on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has drastically cut back the budgets for Indian bands in the Sudbury district, and in view of the fact that such cutbacks are having particularly harsh results in the area of post-secondary education where the present budget only covers people presently in post-secondary institutions but makes no provision for students attending for the first time this fall, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instruct the minister to immediately review these cutbacks in budgets for Indian bands in the Sudbury basin and in particular instructs the minister to restore the original budget for post-secondary education for Indian bands in that area.

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN COST OF COPPER CONCENTRATE SHIPPED FROM B.C. TO QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the concern which the government should show in promoting industrial and economic development in all Canadian regions; considering that it costs between $5 and $16 more per ton to import copper concentrate from British Columbia to Noranda than it costs to export that same concentrate from British Columbia to Japan; considering that the company in Noranda would need 100,000 additional tons of concentrate in 1978 and that stock is available in British Columbia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That, given the present circumstances, the federal government negotiate a reduction of $10 per ton for the importation of up to 100,000 tons per year of copper concentrate from British Columbia to Quebec and that the federal government set a two-year freeze on cost increases to ship iron ore on the St. Lawrence Seaway to assess the economic impact of such decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Presentation of such a motion for debate under the provisions of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

DETRIMENTAL EFFECTS OF FOREIGN BORROWINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding an urgent matter. The government has borrowed or has on standby credit over $7 billion at present, costing the Canadian taxpayer over $700,000 in daily interest charges. Since never before in the history of the international financial world has there been a situation in which a country has had a floating dollar as its policy, and at the same time has undertaken massive borrowings to prop up its currency, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House imposes the following cease and desist order:

(1) Stop the policy of burdening the Canadian taxpayer with massive interest costs;

(2) Stimulate production and employment in Canada, and

(3) Allow the Canadian dollar to find its own level in the international money market.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

APPOINTMENT OF MAJOR GENERAL GASTON CLOUTIER AS SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. Speaker: Before beginning the question period, I know that all hon. members would want to join me in calling attention to an appointment that has been made by the governor in council and the fact that the new appointee has assumed for the first time what we hope will be an equally distinguished career for the House of Commons as has been his career as a Canadian, and particularly in the Canadian military. I refer to the new Sergeant-at-Arms, Major General Gaston Cloutier.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

LINE OF CREDIT TO MAINTAIN VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, perhaps—

Some hon. Members: Here he comes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, obviously the government ranks applaud the minister's courage for showing up in parliament today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: My question centres on the $3 billion line of credit that the minister announced in Toronto yesterday evening. Does he feel that the credit he arranged yesterday, on top of the $2.5 billion line of credit he had already arranged for the chartered banks, the $750 million he borrowed earlier in New York and the $1.5 billion Deutschmarks he borrowed in Germany, would have been necessary if he had moved a little faster last October when the dollar crisis first occurred?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the easiest thing I can do in life is face the hon. member. We have followed this policy since the fall and have moved cautiously. I am glad to see that the hon. member now recognizes that, despite what he says, Canada's credit is very good and I have absolutely no problem in finding credit anywhere.

● (1417)

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance, who referred to Canada's credit. Can the minister say whether he will be making a statement on motions, or at least in committee, concerning the over-all borrowing activities and credit arrangements of the government so far as its foreign borrowings are concerned, bearing in mind that the credit he has arranged in New York is costing, for the origination fee, $1.8 million, including legal fees, printing and travel, as they say, and will also cost Canada $7.5 million in standby fees for the year, whether or not it is used? Will he give a full explanation to the House as to what exactly are the ramifications of all the government's credits and borrowings?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I shall attend the committee sitting this afternoon and gladly answer all questions concerning the arrangements I made yesterday with the Canadian banks as well as with the American banks. Naturally, I am not in a position just yet to reveal all the terms and conditions because they have not been completely negotiated and signed, but as soon as the legal document has been accepted by all parties, I shall give the information to the House.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: My supplementary question is again directed to the Minister of Finance. Is he aware that the credit which he announced last night has been offered to certain South African banks? If he is, does this mean there has been a change of policy with respect to our commercial dealings with that country, the policy announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs last December 19?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think it is absurd and incredible that the hon. member would bring up that subject. I have never heard of dealings with South Africa or dealings with a series of banks in the United States. I have never been forced to confuse the two. I do not know how the hon. member can do that.

Mr. Stevens: They have telexes.

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in connection with our economic and financial situation. Last night the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggested that the press and reporters generally are doing Canada a disservice by comparing our economic and financial situation with that in countries which are better off than we are, and suggested we should only compare them with countries which are worse off economically, such as Argentina where there is high inflation and strikers are put up against the wall.

Is the government considering the introduction of sunshine legislation which will permit the press to make comparisons only between Canada and countries which are less well off, if we can find such countries? Is that being contemplated by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the sunshine legislation which would interest the Canadian public is that which would retire the hon. member, and I hope it happens soon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has had many opportunities to call the election, but he is afraid to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: My supplementary question to the Prime Minister is the following: does the Prime Minister accept any responsibility for our current economic situation, or is it all the fault of the Canadian press, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggests, or of the Canadian people because, as the Prime Minister suggests, Canadians are too soft, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport says we are too fat—the fat times are over—the Minister of Finance says—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may recognize a trace of argument in his question.

Mr. Crosbie: My question to the Prime Minister is this: Does the Prime Minister accept any responsibility for our current economic position?

Mr. Trudeau: We are the government, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You could have fooled me.

INTEREST PAID ON FOREIGN BORROWINGS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance: it concerns his announcement last night to borrow up to another $3 billion in foreign money markets. Can the minister confirm that the total of over $7 billion in borrowings and standby credit is costing the Canadian taxpayer over $750,000 a day in interest charges alone? If so, how can he justify this tremendous burden on the Canadian people?

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can give quite a lengthy reply. It is quite complicated. If we borrow abroad, we do not borrow the equivalent amount of money in Canada. If we keep the money we borrow in the reserves, we place that money in treasury bills in the United States, and so on, and receive some interest on that money. It is a very complex proposition. I will be delighted if these questions are asked in the committee this afternoon. I will be there with my experts, when I can give an exact answer; but I cannot do that in the question period.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the minister has stated that it is the Canadian government's policy to have a floating dollar on the exchange markets of the world. Can he explain to the House why the government has felt it necessary to borrow, over the past two or three months, over $7 billion to prop up the Canadian dollar, which is a blatant contradiction of having a policy of a floating dollar?

Since this has never taken place anywhere in the world before, where a country has had to undertake massive borrowings to prop up a so-called floating dollar, can the minister explain the government's position to this House and to the Canadian people and not put if off by saying he will do that before the committee?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have not borrowed $7 billion as the hon. member has stated. We have established a line of credit which we can use if needed. However, we have not borrowed that amount of money. We borrowed $750 million in the United States and $823 million in Germany. We have withdrawn $1.3 billion in standby credit from Canadian banks; we have not used the American facilities. We have sufficient flexibility so that if some people try to push the Canadian dollar up or down in an unreasonable fashion, the governor can intervene to ensure that the dollar floats in a normal fashion, as has been our policy for many years.

Mr. Saltsman: In view of his reply, can the minister explain to the House why this latest borrowing of up to $3 billion in standby credit is required, particularly since the credit facility is designed for an eight-year period? Is the minister expecting that the Canadian dollar will be in continuing difficulty for the next eight years and therefore feels it necessary to undertake these massive foreign borrowings? Also, is the pattern of this borrowing not in fact the very thing that invites speculation against the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that at all. We have established a line of credit that we can stop any day we feel it is necessary. However, we had to establish it for a period of years. That is why we have the period of eight years. If there is stabilization in the money market, we can cancel that on any day.

MANPOWER

INQUIRY WHETHER CANADA WORKS, PHASE III, PROJECTS WILL BE ENCOURAGED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I shall not speak of immigration but of employment today.

Under the Young Canada Works program, the projects that were accepted for subsidizing have been by far fewer than the applications made by sponsors of various projects. Still, I want to thank the minister for the funds granted my riding and other ridings in the province of Quebec. I should like to put the following question: We are now in the process of discussing various projects with their sponsors who are getting ready to apply for grants under Phase III of the Canada Works program. Can the minister tell the House whether we should encourage people in the same way to submit their projects under this program, seeing we have no idea of what funds have been earmarked for the program? Should we, yes or no, encourage people to plan projects and can the minister tell the House whether the amount of funds to be allotted to this project has yet been decided and whether it will be more generous than the funds allotted to the Young Canada Works program?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the global funding has in fact been announced. It is a question of determining the amount that will go to each individual constituency. We hope within the next couple of weeks to be in a position to announce the funding available on a constituency by constituency basis. I hope the hon. member will again encourage people to participate in the Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs because they have been excellent programs. We need about a three or four to one ratio to get excellent projects, which we have had in the past from the hon. member's constituency and from others.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Considering that the present situation is very serious and even very grave; that the private sector is not in a position to offer enough jobs to satisfy current needs; that Canada Manpower Centres respond in a very strange way to those seeking help to find employment, and that jobs are very scarce, would the minister be willing, in view of these special and grave circumstances, to ask the President of the Treasury Board for additional funds so that we might make better and more efficient use of Canadian manpower and thus ensure normal development in our country by using our qualified manpower until the private sector is in a position to do more?

• (1427)

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have reiterated time and time again that something like $1.2 billion has been made available by the federal government for direct job creation and training, and all these enterprises have been most satisfactory. Still on the subject of funding, we have spent about $96.2 million on programs to assist young people and students to find employment—the highest amount ever contributed by any government in this field.

Manpower centres have been giving good advice in the placing of individuals. Last year we placed something like 250,000 young people in employment during the summer months. So we must be doing something right. We hope to do even better this year. We should remember, too, that 300,000 more people are working this year than were working last year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PEACE TALKS ON SOUTHERN LEBANON

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. When I asked the minister on April 18 whether he agreed that any commitment of Canadian troops to a UN peacekeeping force ought to be conditional on the prospect of a political settlement or, at least, a reasonable expectation of one, he replied that the parties in the Lebanon area were, and I quote, "moving toward such an agreement and understanding". Unfortunately for his forecasting, the very next day the government of Lebanon fell and their prime minister resigned. Will the minister now tell us categorically what evidence he has that any of the parties in South Lebanon are moving toward agreement and understanding?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): We were hoping for greater control in that area, as I indicated in reply to the hon. member's question. Obviously, there is need for greater control. The Secretary General has asked for more troops in the area, and we are still working toward stability.

Mr. McKinnon: I would like the minister to confirm, as the man primarily responsible for sending our troops to Southern Lebanon, whether it is true that UN forces are presently engaged in hostilities with one of several organizations in the area, none of which seems to have the slightest intention of negotiating a settlement, though that is one of the main criteria to be met before Canadian troops become involved.

Will the minister press for a revised, tightened-up UN resolution which would be based on criteria set out by the hon. member for Eglinton on the basis of our long experience in peacekeeping?

Mr. Danson: There has been an incident involving one of the dissident groups, as is obvious. Certainly, I will take up the hon. member's suggestion with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UN RESOLUTION ON PEACEKEEPING IN SOUTHERN LEBANON

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): A supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the hon. gentleman appeared before the Standing Committee on External Affairs on April 4, he acknowledged that resolution 425 which sets out the peacekeeping procedure was too loose and needed to be improved.

● (1432)

I ask him now if Canada has pressed for a tightening of that resolution, and what steps did Canada take yesterday when this question was discussed before the Security Council which gave rise to the increase of troops from 4,000 to 6,000?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not actually seen the text of our intervention yesterday, but I can deduce from conversations I have had with officials and with our delegation in New York that we did in fact, I have no doubt, consider either in public or in private sessions tightening up the resolution.

I think the dilemma really stems from the fact that we would like to see a tightening up in a particular way. There are other participants who would also like to see a tightening up but one which is not consistent with our objectives. In other words, as I said before the committee, I believe the task before the Security Council was to find the broadest possible mandate which will encompass all the various points of view.

We will continue to press for a stronger mandate, and we will also continue to press for the total withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon. I have said previously, and I repeat it, that I believe this is a precondition for stabilization in the area. But, of course, as the Israelis themselves have said, until such time as the United Nations forces are in place their withdrawal is to some degree conditional. That is why the Secretary General has asked for additional support, and I was pleased to hear this morning that a number of countries have responded to the Secretary General and that additional forces will be put into place. My reason for saying this is that once a greater degree of stability has been achieved, then I believe the second step of getting a stronger mandate will come more easily.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I think the question the Canadian public wants to have answered is whether there will be any commitment made by the government of more Canadian troops going to this embattled area before the resolution is amended in such a way as to guarantee that the eight criteria set out by the Canadian government some years ago can, in fact, be adhered to, which will ensure the safety of Canadian soldiers on a peace-keeping mission.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, without being in the least argumentative about this, I think the fundamental question to be recalled here is whether we will refuse to participate in any peacekeeping activities unless the so-called eight criteria have been met. These were laid down a number of years ago. They are entirely defensible. But I draw the attention of the hon. member and of the House to the fact that to the best of my knowledge that is an ideal situation which has not been achieved in any peacekeeping activity which has been undertaken. So it really becomes a question of deciding whether, if conditions are not perfect, we will participate at all.

On the more specific part of the question, we have, as the hon. member knows, limited participation in the communications role associated with the group and we have no intentions either to go beyond our particular role or to extend it beyond the six months to which we were committed by the Secretary General. May I conclude by saying that it is an immensely difficult task for the Secretary General and we cannot always meet all the conditions of all sides before moving, so it does come back to a question of whether we want to help under the best conditions we can establish, or simply wash our hands of the whole matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ACTION OF GOVERNMENT TO REDUCE DEFICIT IN FUND

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Statistics Canada figures for January and February of this year show pay-outs on the unemployment insurance account of $971 million, 26 per cent higher than last year, indicating a total pay-out approaching $5 billion in this calendar year. What new action is the government planning to reduce unemployment insurance pay-outs and to cut down on the unemployment insurance account deficit?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there is an indexing arrangement in the Unemployment Insurance Act which is built right into the legislation and for which, I might say, every party in this House voted. I also point out that the average pay-out is about $110 per week. Given the higher level of unemployment this year, we have a slightly higher pay-out. However, to compound that by suggesting that that will be the situation throughout the year, I think does a disservice to the program.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, since the unemployment rate is directly related to the present economic situation, has the minister consulted, or will he consult with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, who seems intent on and content with a high rate of unemployment?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that question, in effect, answers itself. Obviously, the Minister of Finance is not satisfied. That is why we brought in the employment tax credit program which involves about $200 million. That is just one more program in the government's armament against the ogre of unemployment.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Too little, too late.

FINANCE

STATUS OF DEPUTY MINISTER

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister advise whether Mr. Tom Shoyama, the Deputy Minister of Finance, has resigned?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, he is not resigning. He is working with me, and his work is very good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: For how long?

POST OFFICE

REMOVAL OF TELEPHONES FROM RURAL POST OFFICES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. I would like to ask the Postmaster General why the Post Office is going back to the pre-Thomas Edison and Alexander Graham Bell era in communications and removing telephones from rural post offices.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer this question but it seems quite irrelevant to me since the telephone does not come under the jurisdiction of the Post Office. Nevertheless, I would like to ask the hon. member for Brandon-Souris to be more positive in his questions. I cannot see any purpose in asking questions about what happened at the Post Office perhaps 100 or 125 years ago. We are now trying to create a new climate in the Post Office. We are trying to establish more open communications with our employees, and I would ask for the opposition's co-operation in that effort so as to avoid the worst and make the Post Office more efficient throughout Canada.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, with a statement like that, I can understand why the Post Office is in trouble. Inasmuch as the Post Office is in the communications business and improved communications are essential to the restoration of our rural communities, particularly in reversing the shift of population to urban areas, a process which has been gradually eroding rural communities and the family farm, why is the Post Office Department constantly downgrading its services while at the same time increasing postal rates, rather than pursuing the more positive policy of increasing business and revenues by improving service?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a fascinating subject to raise, but surely it is one of argumentation and not a question. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

RAILWAYS

PROPOSED ABANDONMENT OF RAIL LINES ON PRAIRIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport and it concerns the question of rail line abandonment. Because of the recommendation made by the Prairie Rail Action Committee to abandon some 121 miles of rail line, there is now a great deal of concern in many of the communities which are being studied by the PRAC. The communities have been asking whether it is the intention of the minister to instruct the PRAC to consult fully with the communities affected even to the extent of holding hearings in these communities.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Prairie Rail Action Committee is analysing the lines which the Hall commission did not resolve in terms of their future. It is consulting with a number of additional groups on facts and figures, but is relying heavily on work done by the Hall commission. When recommendations are made by the Prairie Rail Action Committee and the nature of those recommendations is such that the positive parts of them favour maintaining and making lines permanent and upgrading lines, those recommendations can be—and have been, in some cases—implemented by the government forthwith.

What we might call the negative part of any recommendation, that is, that a line be abandoned at a certain point in time, can only be referred to the Canadian Transport Commission, and that commission would in the ordinary course have full hearings involving the communities. There is, therefore, an important message to the communities that they are very likely to have an opportunity either before the Canadian Transport Commission, or in due course before a western arm of that commission, to make their views known before any adverse decision is taken.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Transport knows, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has criticized the criteria being used by the PRAC. For example, it is recommended that lines with traffic densities as high as 90,000 bushels per mile be abandoned. I wonder whether the minister can tell the House just what criteria are being used and if it is his intention to instruct the PRAC to change its criteria so that they will be more in line with what Hall was originally thinking.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, following meetings with many farmers, including a group from the Holdfast-Dilke district and others concerned about specific lines, I asked the Prairie Rail Action Committee to make known more widely the criteria it is using. I am sure we will all be interested in looking at those before making a judgment upon them. I think that is the important first step.

● (1442)

Second, the Prairie Rail Action Committee is preparing to make a much more detailed analysis available to each area affected, about their reasoning and about all the factors involved, short only of those which were given to them in confidence by, for instance, the elevator companies.

INDUSTRY

INVESTMENT IN AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. The final communiqué of the first ministers' conference last February said that "federal and provincial governments will provide incentives and take measures to ensure the proportional share of the increasing investment in the new plant for the automotive industry takes place in Canada." Therefore, would the Prime Minister make the carrying out of this commitment one of his personal priorities as first minister of the federal Government of Canada?

In this connection, will he ensure that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce gets together with the treasurer of Ontario to establish an agreed on data base about the entire automotive industry; and to have the Ontario government begin to carry out its side of the commitment in the first ministers' communiqué; but, most important, carry out the priority federal side of the commitment, which must mean ensuring Canada has a fair share of not just investment but primarily of jobs and production; and finally, deal with disturbing indications of the transfer of production from some Canadian auto plants to those of their parent companies in the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take the hon. member's remarks to be more in the nature of a representation than a question. I should like to indicate to the hon. member that the government shares his concern. Not only the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but other ministers, including the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, have been involved in negotiations to obtain, in effect, results in this area.

In this regard, I should tell my colleague and all members of the House that at three o'clock I will table my letter to the premiers, including Premier Davis who wrote to me on this subject. My letter followed up on the February conference and indicated the conclusions which had been reached collectively by the premiers and myself, and the various actions which have been taken and are being taken in this regard by the government. It will be tabled at three o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RAILWAYS

EXTENSION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It relates to the important recommendations of the Hall commission on grain handling and rail line abandonment. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a simple question. Is it the intention of the government to bring forward an extension of the Crowsnest rates in respect of finished products, or at least products of feed grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, any such question would involve very enormous additional expenditure which obviously we could not begin to contemplate at this stage. Indeed, the earlier recommendation of the Hall commission, that we pay to the railways full compensation between the Crow rate and what it costs to move grain, may involve a cost in the order of $200 million, including existing branch line subsidies. We have not been able to do that either, because of the present restraint period. However, we have done the very important thing of committing millions of dollars to rehabilitation. For every dollar being spent there, we will receive work, results and improvements in the lines.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, it is clear from the answer of the minister that either he misunderstands or has not read the recommendations or the full report of the Hall commission. With respect to my first question, I point out to the minister that the cost is estimated to be in the vicinity of $35 million, even with inflation taken into consideration. Will the minister read the report, understand it and come forward with some reasonable proposition in respect of my first question?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that his view that $35 million would do the job is quite wrong. I believe he would find that there would be an immediate insistence that any subsidy applied to rail shipment of meat and other products would be applied to trucking as well. Regardless of whatever logic the hon. member may apply, I do not believe he could say that the freight rate on meat moving 1,000 miles in the west could be much lower than a similar amount of meat moving 1,000 miles in the east. I have tried to be rather even-handed while helping the west significantly in many ways with regard to our policies. I hope the hon. member will speak to his colleague, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte, who already has criticized this government for doing too much for the west in transportation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POLICY RESPECTING SOFT DRUGS OFFENCES

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Can he inform the House of his government's policy for dealing with marijuana and cannabis, in view of the fact that in 1972 the minister of national health and welfare promised a change in legislation and in 1973 the minister of national health and welfare, now the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, also promised a change in legislation? The government introduced Bill S-19 and the Liberal party convention endorsed a change in the law dealing with marijuana and cannabis, changing them from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in reminding the House that the government introduced this bill in the Senate. Indeed, it was approved and passed by the Senate. If the hon. member is making an offer on behalf of his party—

Mr. Lawrence: He is asking what you are prepared to do.

Mr. Trudeau: I will tell the hon. member what we are prepared to do. If there is all-party agreement to deal with this bill at all stages in one day, we will introduce it tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister well knows that we usually like to see the wording of bills before we make agreements, because sometimes they play tricks. Is it a fact that the Prime Minister, in a press conference prior to the week of April 1, indicated that the government would not introduce this legislation unless it was re-elected again?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker; I believe I told the press conference what I have just told the hon. member, that if we have time to pass it, we will pass it. That is why I am making the offer to the hon. member.

An hon. Member: We have all the time to pass it.

Mr. Dick: Introduce the bill.

Mr. Trudeau: What is all the beefing about, Mr. Speaker? One member asks a question and another member is beefing about something. I do not know what he is beefing about.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Dick: I would have liked to pose a final supplementary question.

SMALL BUSINESS

PROTEST AGAINST DECISION TO SELL SACCHARIN ONLY IN DRUGSTORES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Small Business. In view of the fact that products containing saccharin and other sugar substitutes are to be sold only in drugstores by decree of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, considering that this practice greatly discriminates against small rural businesses which traditionally have stocked such products, and further noting that many rural inhabitants are unable to drive the 20 miles or 30 miles to the closest drugstore, will the minister confer with his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and end this unfair and arbitrary discrimination against rural business establishments and rural dwellers?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, without knowing the facts, I presume there must be some prescription sale of saccharin now which did not exist before. But I will check with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to see if it can be ameliorated.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that answer. He is well aware that a great many small municipalities of 200 or 300 people have no stores within 20 or 30 miles other than the general store. Will the minister give the further assurance that steps will be taken in respect of providing research and development grants to small firms previously engaged in manufacturing products containing saccharin which have been adversely affected by the government's decision and may want to establish new product lines? The minister is well aware of this because he visited one such establishment in my constituency where the municipalities are suffering from this situation.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I will take that as a representation as well.

LOANS FROM FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of State for Small Business. More than six weeks ago he gave an undertaking to the House that he would favour removing the penalties which are currently assessed against small businessmen who have loans with the Federal Business Development Bank for prepayment of such loans before they are due. Why has he not yet acted on that undertaking, and when does he intend to do so?

● (1452)

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I undertook to hold a conference with the newly-appointed president of the Federal Business Development Bank the Monday following the hon. member's question, and I did. He assured me that very careful study is being given to this matter, and I hope his decision will be a favourable one.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the minister acknowledged the fact that since he assumed his present responsibilities last fall, the rate of failure of small businesses had increased. I ask the minister why he has yet to present to parliament a single piece of legislation reflecting his present responsibilities.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I did present the CALURA amendments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: I know the hon. member may not have them in his contemplation, but I can assure him we have done a good many other things as well. I would refer him to my speech during the budget debate. I am very hopeful that we will be introducing further initiatives in the future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIAN ATTACK ON SOUTH KOREAN AIRCRAFT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister inquired as to the circumstances surrounding the attack by Russia on the South Korean aircraft, indicating their sensitivity about their military bases and severe action by them against accidental intrusion?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since it is not a matter that directly involves Canada, I have not made any specific inquiries. Of course, I have been advised in a general way about it. If the hon. member has a specific question with regard to the matter, I will be glad to look into it and see what additional information I can obtain.

AGRICULTURE

ADOPTION OF TARIFF BOARD RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. On April 10, the minister, in reply to a question of mine concerning whether the government had made a decision on tariff recommendations, said "if he wants it briefly, it is practically as the Tariff Board reported." The Tariff Board report, at page 150, states, "one of the main recommendations was for the implementation of an automatic surtax." My question to the minister is: Has that particular part of the report been adopted in so far as the minister's statement to myself on April 10 is concerned?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that it has been dealt with in its full content.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I was going to direct my next question to the Minister of Finance, but since he is not here I will direct it to the Minister of Agriculture because he has a passing interest in this matter. The Minister of Finance indicated that we, meaning Canada, have notified our trading partners that we intend to renegotiate certain GATT commitments in relation to Tariff Board proposals. Would the Minister of Agriculture inform the House what commitments the Minister of Finance and hence the government are talking about in terms of renegotiating with our trading partners at the GATT negotiations in Geneva?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the Minister of Finance on this very topic. Since the hon. member has asked his previous question, to make it clearly understood, the Tariff Board report, with some modifications, is being dealt with practically in its entirety for discussion at the tariff talks that are taking place in Geneva. I do not think I am in any different position than I was then to say how these discussions are going or what is being done.

We had discussions this week with our ambassador there, and with our representative, Mr. Warren, to discuss how these negotiations were going. I am sure the hon. member is aware that agriculture is a very touchy thing for them to discuss there, because some countries have much more protective ideas than we do. We will be dealing directly with the United States on most of the Tariff Board suggestions and recommendations.

IMMIGRATION

REUNIFICATION OF FAMILIES—PEDRO CRUZ CASE

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I have given him notice of my intention to ask it. In view of the government's stated immigration policy which gives emphasis to the reunification of families, could the minister explain to the House the department's delay in making its decision in the Pedro Cruz case.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for not only giving me notice but making representations in this case. I have looked into it personally. Mr. Cruz, unfortunately, is a member, under the old bill, of the prohibited class. As a result, he was ordered to be deported but chose to leave voluntarily. His wife subsequently made further application. Because of the hon. member's representations and others, I am taking a look at it; that is what is taking the time. I would like to look at all the circumstances as to why he was in the prohibited class and whether the time-frame that has gone by since the last offence would warrant ministerial permit intervention at this time.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, since Mrs. Cruz and her seven-month old son are being forced to go on public assistance, and since their mortgage company is proceeding with foreclosure action, could the minister assure the House that he will take not only a personal interest but will do all he can to expedite the decision in this matter?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have already given the undertaking that I will expedite the decision. I cannot give an undertaking that the decision will be positive.

POST OFFICE

REMOVAL OF TELEPHONES FROM RURAL POST OFFICES

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General: I previously raised it under Standing Order 43. Removal of phones from rural post offices has caused hardship for rural customers. Also, at this time the safekeeping of the Queen's mail must be a top priority. Would the minister now confirm that he will requisition hand-bells for postmasters, so that in case of fire they can go running down the street shouting "Fire"?

MANPOWER

REQUESTED PROGRAM FOR SHOEMAKER TRAINING

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Unemployment and Immigration. Following some inquiries I made of Manpower, I understand there is no training provided for shoemakers. In light of the fact that shoes are very expensive in northern Ontario, and we could use a number of shoemakers to do repairs, will the minister give consideration to implementing a program of shoemaker training under Manpower facilities?

An hon. Member: It is against their contract.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the initiative and responsibility is provincial in providing the particular sources. Under the various adult occupational training programs, or the $96 million we make available for apprenticeship programs, we must work in agreement with the provinces. I have the hon. member's representation. I know his "soul" is in it, and we will give it every consideration.

Mr. Gillies: Only a "heel" would make a statement like that.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES IN COURTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In light of the debate on Bill C-42, language in the courts, that will continue this afternoon, perhaps the answer to my question will shorten it. I suggested in my speech, on behalf of the party, an amendment under which, if the act is to come into force, it would be jointly proclaimed not only by the federal government but by the provincial governments, if the law is to be adopted by the provinces, in line with the administration of justice which falls under provincial jurisdiction. Would the Minister of Justice comment on that matter, because I am sure it would shorten the debate?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, without getting into a debate with the hon. member, I take some exception in light of my view that the legislation as presented is perfectly constitutional. As I have already indicated, I have not taken a firm position on the proposed amendment. I am having my officers examine it from a constitutional and policy point of view. I have indicated to my colleagues that I want to discuss this matter with them early next week so that I will be in a position to respond to the hon. member in committee if the bill gets that far.

UNREST IN SOUTH WEST AFRICA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister is aware, there has been dissatisfaction expressed by members of the United Nations over the mandate exercised by South Africa over South West Africa, and South Africa has indicated that they will keep their 15,000, approximately, troops in South West Africa just as long as Cuba keeps a similar number of troops, revolutionaries and mercenaries on the southwest Angola border.

My question to the minister is: Has he asked Cuba to withdraw these troops, in the interest of establishing peace in this much troubled area? Also, since it is my understanding that he was delegated as a spokesman to make a presentation which would solve this problem to the South Africans, has his concept been accepted and has SWAPO, the South West African People's Organization, accepted his proposal to establish peace in South West Africa?

• (1502)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is quite difficult to answer all of those points succinctly, but I shall do my best. On the matter of South African troops in Namibia, or South West Africa, the description the hon. member has given probably predates the proposals put before the United Nations last week. These proposals, which I made on behalf of the Western Five and which have been accepted by South Africa, answered the second part of the question.

The proposals did in fact call for the withdrawal of South African troops from Namibia or South West Africa down to a total of 1500. The prior situation with regard to withdrawal being conditional on the Cubans' presence in Angola is therefore not now in play, given the precise meaning of the hon. member's question.

On the second point, with regard to Cuban troops in Angola or any foreign troops in that part of Africa, we have, as Canadians and as members of the Contact Group, indicated our concern over this continuing foreign presence and have made direct representations to the Cubans urging them to withdraw from their involvement in Africa.

On the third part of the question, just briefly, while South Africa has accepted the proposal of the Western Five as detailed by me before the United Nations, SWAPO—the South West Africa People's Organization—has not accepted it to date. But as of yesterday or the day before SWAPO has asked for a further meeting to clarify certain points made in the proposals.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the government House leader his legislative intentions for the balance of this week and for next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Justice has indicated, we will be considering Bill C-42, language of trial, today, followed by Bill C-17, the CNR recapitalization; C-39, currency and exchange; C-6, the ports legislation; C-43, relating to the ombudsman, and I should like to designate May 11 as an allotted day. I suggest it may be possible to arrange that we deal with Bill C-39 on Monday to meet the convenience of the minister and the hon. member opposite.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, Bill S-9 was on a previous list. May I inquire what happened to it?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is still on my list but it is at a later stage. It is a bill dealing with tax conventions, which I will call later.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAWRENCE—INCORRECT PARTY AFFILIATION IN DEPARTMENTAL PUBLICATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have just been handed a publication which is currently being distributed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. This document unfairly reflects upon me; it attacks my integrity; it attacks the very root of what some of us stand for, but I am not sure that the House can do very much about it. I want you to know that this type of material is being distributed by this department. I resent it deeply as I think it is prejudicial to my interests. In it I am described as a Liberal member of parliament.

MR. McCAIN—COMMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not believe it was intentional on the part of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), but I believe it should be brought to his attention that my remarks emphasized what was being done in the west and perhaps gave him a little political credit, they emphasized what was being done in the St. Lawrence River area and from Quebec to Windsor in the transportation system, and also emphasized the total lack of attention being paid to Atlantic Canada and its transportation requirements as well as the disparities in attention and accomplishments in that field, but at no time did I say that too much had been spent on transportation in western Canada as the minister implied.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the hon. member's desire not to have expenditures in the west, the record will speak for itself. I think the hon. member should be fairly corrected in his references to the Atlantic. He referred to a couple of trips I made to the Atlantic region recently. They involved improvements to several harbours, the introduction of a new ferry service, the signing of $100 million worth of highway agreements, about $21 million worth of airport improvements, and many more things, for which the Atlantic region is very grateful.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that there is no procedure whereby I can give him the floor a second time on the same question. He has raised this matter by way of a question of privilege. He knows what he raised was a disagreement with the minister. The minister has continued the disagreement, but nevertheless it is not a question of privilege; it is a disagreement.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I think the remarks of the minister merely amplify the position I have taken. He has now approached what might be termed as deliberate misleading of this House by his remarks in respect of my question of privilege and my earlier remarks in this House. I think—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) is obviously continuing what is essentially a disagreement and not a question of privilege, which was the way I ruled in the first place. I do not think the matter can be pursued any further.

NATIONAL REVENUE—TAXATION

Question No. 762—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. Did the Department of National Revenue (Taxation) conduct a close surveillance operation on Thomas Mighty Midway and Bernard Thomas of Lennox, South Dakota, U.S.A., during the period June 24 and July 23, 1977 at the time the Midway was operating in Canada and, if so, for what reason?

2. How many Departmental members were employed from (a) Calgary (b) Saskatoon (c) Winnipeg (d) Thunder Bay (e) elsewhere, at (i) Thunder Bay, during the period June 24 to July 2, 1977 (ii) Saskatoon, during the period July 11 to July 16, 1977 (iii) Lethbridge, during the period July 18 to July 23, 1977?

3. How many additional persons did the Department employ through Manpower Canada or any other federal agency or department, including the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at (a) Thunder Bay (b) Saskatoon (c) Lethbridge (d) the Customs Port of Entry at Pigeon River, Ontario, during the close surveillance operation?

4. What was the cost of transportation for Departmental staff from their places of regular employment to (a) Thunder Bay (b) Saskatoon (c) Lethbridge?

5. What was the cost of (a) accommodation and meals (b) overtime for Departmental staff during the period of close surveillance at (i) Thunder Bay (ii) Saskatoon (iii) Lethbridge?

6. What was the cost of (a) hand operated unit counting machines (b) light summer headware (c) footwear (d) shirts (e) blue jeans and trousers (f) camp stools (g) mobile homes and campers and parking facilities for same (h) stenographic equipment and staff, purchased and rented for use in (i) Thunder Bay (ii) Saskatoon (iii) Lethbridge?

7. What additional revenue, in total, was assessed Thomas Mighty Midway and Bernard Thomas and all of the midway unit owners and contracting unit managers, as a result of the close surveillance, beyond the total tax revenue declared by all of them in their 1976 income tax returns?

8. Who ordered the close surveillance operation and for what reason?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. The Department of National Revenue, taxation, as part of its normal programs has conducted tax audits, not close surveillance operations, on carnival and midway operations in western Canada. To preserve the confidentiality of taxpayers' affairs, the names of individuals and corporations that are audited, the extent or cost of the audit and the additional taxes levied are not disclosed publicly.

Parts 2 to 8. See answer to part 1.

Question No. 1,488—Mr. Oberle:

1. How many full or part-time staff or operatives are employed by the Security Branch of the Department of Supply and Services?

2. What are the names of all private security agencies, such as the Corps of Commissionaires, or security branch of government defence firms who have been screened by, or are in constant contact with, the Security Branch and, in each case, how many staff are employed full or part-time?

3. Which of the firms conduct investigative or detective functions and under what legislative authority are such services rendered?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Staff: 51 Operatives: Nil

2. (a) The security branch of the Department of Supply and Services does not screen security agencies such as the corps of commissionaires. (b) The security branch of the Department of Supply and Services is responsible for ensuring that departmental and industrial employees engaged in classified contracts are security cleared in accordance with established practices and procedures through the national security agency. The branch does not have an investigative role. Insofar as private guard companies are concerned, the security branch provides a contract quality control function for all private security guard contracts issued by the Department of Supply and Services in the National Capital Region. At the present time, there are 12 contracts with the following companies: National Protective Service Company Limited; General Protection Company Limited; Grant Security Services; S.I.S. Protection Company; Dustbane Security Services; Universal Investigation Services Limited. The numbers and identity of the companies engaged in classified contracts vary with the contracts issued. A list of such contracts issued by the Department of Supply and Services is published weekly. The number of staff employed full or part-time by such industries is unknown.

3. Nil.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 1,515—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Did the government announce in June or July 1976, a $17.1 million loan by the Export Development Corporation to Panama for the construction of a container terminal in Colon, Panama and, if so, on what date is the project to be (a) completed (b) operational?

2. What amount of the loan has been advanced to date?

3. On what date will the loan be completely retired?

4. What is the rate of interest to be paid on the loan?

5. Have gantry cranes for the facility been ordered and, if so, who is the supplier?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Export Development Corporation is concerned: 1. Yes, on June 30, 1976. (a) Completion date early in 1979. (b) Operational date is not yet available.

2. By tradition and as a matter of commercial principle Crown corporations have not been required by parliament to answer detailed questions on their administration and operation, and in the case of Export Development Corporation, the Export Development Act places the responsibility for such matters on its board of directors.

3. The loan will be completely retired July 1, 1989.

4. Please see the answer to part 2.

5. That aspect of the project is one of the commercial features within the province of the exporter, since the exporter awards sub-contracts.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE RESPECTING LANGUAGE USED IN COURT TRIALS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-42, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to make some remarks on Bill C-42, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, aimed at guaranteeing the language rights of Canadians before the courts. I will try, Mr. Speaker, to be as brief as possible and at the same time to restrain my enthusiasm and my pleasure in taking part in a debate I feel is almost historical.

I have been interested for a long time in matters dealing with linguistic equality, and hon. members will remember that once I did introduce Bill C-210 which would have given the accused the right to be heard and tried in his own official language. As it often happens, some hon. members on the other side, particularly Progressive Conservatives, found the bill untimely and killed my private bill.

So I am very pleased, Mr. Speaker, along with all fair-minded Canadians, to see that the government has kept its promise and introduced in this session a piece of legislation, Bill C-42, to amend the Criminal Code and give all Canadians both French- and English-speaking, the right to be tried in their own official language without the help of an interpreter. As I said earlier, this bill is one step further towards linguistic equality. In the minds of many Canadians, this bill confirms the most fundamental right in any society, namely the right of any accused to defend himself in the courts in his own mother tongue. This bill which is being debated on second reading acknowledges this fundamental right which has been denied for too long to French-speaking Canadians living in those provinces where the majority of the population is English-speaking.

Some will say it is not perfect and the best possible compromise in the present context. History will record this important landmark which bears witness to the progress toward equity and justice by our two founding people.

If I say that this legislation is not perfect for those of us who live in French in provinces where the majority is English-speaking it is because the linguistic rights that the province of Quebec has always granted its English-speaking citizens before the courts are more extensive than in any other province of Canada. I recognize readily, Mr. Speaker, the efforts made by certain provinces over the past ten years, and I am fully aware of the resistance, the hesitation and sometimes even the refusal by certain provinces, certain groups, to take up the challenge of guaranteeing their French-speaking minorities the most elementary and nature rights they are entitled to. Whether it be justice, education, health services or a host of other public services, we still have several milestones to go before we reach linguistic equity.

We also know, Mr. Speaker, that in certain regions of Canada where there is a small French-speaking population, some groups will claim and some citizens will not hesitate to use the argument of numbers and costs. It will even be said that this legislation will mean everyone will have to learn French. Well, nothing could be further from the truth. This legislation will not force anyone to speak French. Rather it will allow all Canadians, both English—and French-speaking, to be able to be tried in their mother tongue. I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, with this initiative of the Liberal government which confirms the commitment made in the Speech from the Throne last October and which follows along the line of the linguistic equality process undertaken some ten years ago with the passage of the Official Languages Act.

[English]

As I said, Mr. Speaker, Quebec already gives greater language rights at trials to this minority than is provided under this bill. The province of New Brunswick also adopted similar provisions when it passed the Official Languages of New Brunswick Act. As a matter of fact Section 13 of the act, which came into force on December 20, 1972, granted the right to its citizens to give evidence in the official language of their choice before the courts of that province.

In his news release accompanying the tabling of Bill C-42 the minister said:

> This government made a commitment in the Speech from the Throne to guarantee the language rights of the accused before the courts, a guarantee which we believe to be of particular relevance to national unity. Any person in Canada accused of a crime should not require an interpreter in order to state his or her case in either of Canada's official languages before Canadian courts.

With Quebec and New Brunswick already giving this right to their citizens, and now with the province of Ontario studying a bill to extend language of trial rights, it seems to me that quick passage of Bill C-42 will clear the way for the rapid implementation of its provisions in the province of Ontario. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that 500,000 French-speaking Canadians reside in Ontario and that they constitute the largest French-speaking group in any Canadian province apart from Quebec. The passage of this bill, and the consequent amendment to the Ontario Judicature Act, will no doubt be another milestone in the history of French-speaking Ontarians.

Bill C-42 will also allow and invite other provinces to act as generously and justly with their own citizens.

We will have the opportunity in committee, Mr. Speaker, to clarify certain clauses of Bill C-42. As an example, I will want to clarify, with the minister, circumstances where a judge will retain the discretion to order that the trial be conducted in a bilingual fashion. Let me quote again from the minister's own news release as follows:

> In addition, when circumstances require, the judge retains a discretion to order that the trial be conducted in a bilingual fashion, in other words, a mixed French and English record.

At present, Mr. Speaker, provisions regarding the language of trial vary from province to province. The Criminal Code provides that in Quebec an accused may be tried by jurors who speak his or her official language, or by a mixed jury composed of six persons who speak English and six who speak French. I refer to Sections 555 and 556 of the Criminal Code. The code also provides in Section 556 for mixed juries in Manitoba.

I agree with the minister that these mixed juries were rarely used because of the obvious communications difficulties where jurors could not communicate in their consideration of the evidence. It could very well be that half of them did not understand the language of the other half, and it was difficult indeed for a fair trial to be held. As a matter of fact I believe the last such trial that was held in Quebec was the trial of Mr. Coffin who was eventually hanged in 1956, but mixed juries were not the practice either in that province or in the province of Manitoba. I therefore agree with the minister that Section 556 should be repealed and replaced by Bill C-42.

In reading both the news release and proposed Section 462.1 of the bill, I admit that I had some difficulties in finding the provision which empowers a judge to order a trial in a bilingual fashion with a mixed French and English record. In discussing the bilingual capacity and in trying to understand the provision for a judge, or judge and jury, as the case may be, I had to reread several times those lines which read:

● (1522)

> —who speak the official language of Canada that is the language of the accused or, if the circumstances warrant, who speak both official languages of Canada."

A distinction is to be made as to who speaks the language of the accused, and the second part being who speaks both official languages of Canada. Because I am a Franco-Ontarian and in Ontario all our lawyers and judges are bilingual, I fail to understand why we include in the bill a distinction between one who speaks the language of the accused and one who speaks both official languages. Why a distinction between one who speaks the official language of the accused and one who speaks both official languages of Canada?

The distinction must be made between a unilingual French-speaking judge and a judge who speaks both official languages. In Ontario, as I said, all French-speaking judges are bilingual. There is no problem there. However, in Quebec one can find French-speaking judges who are not fluent in English. A choice will have to be made in certain circumstances whether to designate a bilingual judge rather than a unilingual judge.

To illustrate further the case, a choice may be made as to a judge who speaks the language of the accused and a judge who speaks both official languages in Canada. Let us situate a case in the Gaspé Peninsula or the Lac St. Jean area, where we could find a unilingual French-speaking judge designated to hear a case involving a unilingual French-speaking accused person. Some of the witnesses may be unilingual French and others unilingual English. There is no difficulty for the judge to hear testimony in the French language from those who speak French. For the witnesses who are unilingual English, the law allows the judge to swear in an interpreter who gives the judge an official interpretation. The interpretation in that court will be the language of that judge. Therefore the interpretation will be from English to French. The transcript will be in French, and the judge will make the judgemnt on that.

Another example, but different, is in the same locality. A unilingual French-speaking accused has elected to be tried by a judge who speaks his official language, French. However, all of the witnesses are unilingual English. It could be decided and agreed that in that case a judge who speaks both official languages of Canada would better serve the ends of justice. The judge would be able to follow all proceedings in both official languages of Canada, and the accused, this time, would be given an official interpreter. In the first case, the witness who spoke the other official language was given the interpreter, and in this case the accused is given an interpreter. Again the provisions of Bill C-42, proposed section 462.1 subsection (1), are respected.

These two examples, Mr. Speaker, at least in my understanding of the bill, would explain what is meant in the news release when the minister said, "The judge retains a discretion to order that the trial be conducted in a bilingual fashion, in other words, a mixed French and English record."

I would like to look now at existing legislation in New Brunswick and the proposed amendments to Section 127 of the Ontario Judicature Act. The province of New Brunswick in its existing legislation states at Article 13, subsection (1):

Subject to Section 15, in any proceeding before a court, any person appearing or giving evidence may be heard in the official language of his choice and such choice is not to place that person at any disadvantage.

Subsection (2) of Section 13 continues:

Subject to subsection (1), where

(a) requested by any party, and

(b) the court agrees that the proceedings can effectively be thus conducted, the court may order that the proceedings be conducted totally or partially in one of the official languages.

In Ontario the amendments in Section 127 of the Judicature Act, subsection (5), read:

Where an application is made under subsection 3, the court may further direct that the hearing or any part of the hearing be in the French language if, in the opinion of the court, the hearing or part can be so conducted effectually.

There is a great resemblance between the New Brunswick act and the proposed amendments to the Ontario Judicature Act. As can be seen, in both cases the court is given the discretion to decide if proceedings will be heard totally or partially in one of the official languages. This may be what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) meant when he talked about the bilingual fashion. I do not know. If the judge is given the discretion to decide that part of the hearing will be held in French and part in English, I want the minister to explain in committee how, in law, that will operate.

If all proceedings are to be heard in a bilingual forum with official translations of all testimony available to the accused in the official language that he speaks, Bill C-42 goes further than the provincial legislation existing in New Brunswick and the proposed legislative changes in Ontario. I stand to be corrected. The minister may explain the distinction here when in committee. However, I think we go a bit further than the Ontario and New Brunswick legislation. In my view, it is closer to the situation presently prevailing in the province of Quebec. The accused would have the right to be heard in his official language and also to hear and read testimony in that same language. This would make it possible for trials to be conducted entirely in the language of the accused.

It may be appropriate at this time to recall that, according to the Canadian Bill of Rights, all Canadians are entitled to the services of an interpreter. Bill C-42 does not change this basic right. Bill C-42 confirms that English and French as official languages of Canada can be used equally in our courts.

I am also interested in the pre-trial procedures, more especially pertaining to the preliminary hearing where a decision is made by a judge as to whether there is sufficient evidence to proceed with a trial. Will it be possible to conduct these proceedings in the language of the accused, or is this provision to be included at a later stage? The bill does set minimum standards for language rights before the courts, and I am aware that the provinces will be free to add to these. Preliminary inquiries in the language spoken by the accused could be one of them.

There are many other questions which no doubt will arise in committee.

I understand also that timing of the proclamation of this legislation will be the subject of consultation between the federal government and each province. Province by province, proclamation will provide the flexibility that would allow each province to take the administrative steps required for the efficient implementation of the proposals in the province. Minority official language trials for indictable offences may be proclaimed first, trials for summary offences proclaimed later. Provinces may wish to test their bilingual capacities and capability at trials for indictable offences. When these capabilities are adequate, provisions dealing with trials for summary offences could be proclaimed.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) for introducing this legislation. The government has kept its word. Bill C-42 is just another one of the many statutes which, under the administration of the right hon. Prime Minister Trudeau has made Canada a more united, fairer and more democratic country. I raise my hat to this federal initiative and I thank the Minister of Justice for having piloted with such generosity, patience and understanding a historic piece of legislation which will bring justice and equity to all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to close my comments without congratulating the Attorney General of Ontario, Mr. Roy McMurtry. I would like to thank him publicly for having tangibly contributed to this historic move or rather to these historic gestures in Ontario. If we compare this measure to what has happened in the past in Ontario, such as Regulation 17, we see that the Franco-Ontarian community can now be more hopeful of living in Ontario as first-class citizens. We have come a long way since the time of Regulations 17 which, as we all are aware, restricted and even prohibited the use of French in our schools. We have come a long way since we witnessed the amendment of the Judicature Act, which prohibited the use of French in Ontario, to include both official languages.

However, Mr. Speaker, we Franco-Ontarians, and I am talking on behalf of the 500 cousins, brothers, sisters and so on, all of us Canadians will have to keep a close watch on the situation because this move could be only a symbolic and meaningless gesture if the political will to designate the regions and the courts where the legislation will apply is slow in coming. For those who do not understand my comments, I would recall that in 1968 and 1969, Ontario passed important amendments to allow the establishment of French high schools in Ontario.

I was there, Mr. Speaker, and I was involved for 11 years with the school court of Ontario. We were all very happy and proud about these measures, that is Ontario's bills 140 and 141 passed in 1968.

Many people thought that because of the new Ontario legislation, schools for French-speaking students would be established where they were needed. I will mention only the battles begun in Ottawa in 1970 and then carried out throughout the province. The events in Sturgeon Falls, in Cornwall, and more recently in Essex have shown that even when legislation is passed, implementation can be very slow, difficult and sometimes completed less than half-heartedly.

Finally, the Ontario government, which will be responsible for designating the courts, as well as the districts where trials can be held in French or in English, will have to provide the necessary legal and administrative staff, such as magistrates, clerks, stenographers and so on, and to do so as soon as possible.

We shall be able to ascertain the good faith of the Davis government and Mr. McMurtry if they act rapidly once the act is implemented. And we, Ontario francophones, shall have to keep on the alert to ensure that the bill is implemented. History will tell if most people have realized the importance of this initiative, Mr. Speaker. And in conclusion, I simply wish to say that I take part in what I consider a historical debate which gives to Canadians, wherever they live, a basic right, a natural right, that of defending themselves in their mother tongue before our criminal courts, and I trust it will be extended some day to civil cases, but as this comes under provincial jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker, we shall keep hoping it will happen.

[English]

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I guess it falls to me to throw a pebble into the placid pool of friendship and brotherly love which has so far been in evidence in this chamber with respect to Bill C-42. I suppose that is to be expected.

It is, maybe, ironic that the first speech I am making in the House since moving to a new seat should deal with the question of language. I guess part of my troubles with the Progressive Conservative party over the last number of years is connected with that issue. I was one of those who did not support Bill C-120 in the twenty-eighth parliament and, as a result, was accused of undermining the leadership of my party.

It seems this situation is continuing, since there appears to be a great deal of support for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) by the official opposition in connection with the piece of legislation before us. I guess we should not be surprised at this, because every time the question of language comes up in this House there is a love fest between the official opposition and the government. That was the case in 1969, and again in 1973 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) introduced a resolution patting himself on the back for the way he handled the language problem in this country. On that occasion, too, the official opposition fell smartly behind the government and gave the resolution its full support. Any criticism made by other Conservatives resulted in those members being accused of undermining the leadership of the party; it was never acknowledged that they were speaking for their constituents or putting forward their own point of view.

Mr. Speaker, I have to say I am in total disagreement with Bill C-42. I think it is a gross infringement on the administration of justice in the provinces as set up under our constitution. I suppose that principle did receive a flicker of recognition from the official opposition because the spokesman for that party said he wished to see the bill amended in such a way that the provision would not be imposed in any province without some sort of positive action being taken on the part of that province.

The experience we have had with amendments is another matter which bears consideration. I, for one, do not feel the hon. member's suggestion will receive very real consideration from the Minister of Justice because the Conservatives have "cried wolf" before in this regard. They have proposed amendments to language proposals before, and those amendments have been turned down. But they still went along with the government.

Based on the past performance of the Conservative party on language issues, therefore, why should the government pay any attention to any of the amendments they propose? They know that when the crunch comes the Conservative party will be on the side of the government. After all, their integrity is not too good in that area. I would say it is nothing but hypocrisy, because they go around the constituencies afterward and say the government has done terrible things in the issue of bilingualism. But they do not stand in their places and express that point of view here in this Chamber, nor do they do so in the way they vote. I think it is a disgraceful situation.

I have checked with my constituents on this matter—of course I have my own point of view, in any case—and I am happy to report that when I asked them what they thought of this proposed legislation 88 per cent of them said they did not approve of it and felt it unworthy of support. Six per cent of them felt it was worthy of support, and the other 6 per cent were undecided. It is quite clear what the people around Calgary, Alberta, think of this legislation, but still we find the Progressive Conservative party saying it approves of the legislation in principle. I cannot understand how they can be so far out of touch with the feelings of their constituents.

We hear talk about the need for this legislation. Mr. Speaker, where is the need for it? Where are the miscarriages of justice occurring in the courts of our land, whether in Quebec, Alberta, or in any other province? I have seen no evidence of anyone being deprived of a fair trial on the basis of language in this country, and I am sure we would have heard about it if such had happened.

We hear about the case of Mr. Filion, now proceeding in Toronto. He was charged, along with a few others, with defrauding the taxpayers of Canada while engaged in the dredging business, and has demanded a trial in French. That did not happen. He is a perfectly bilingual person, able to understand the other language well enough to enter into contracts and make contacts with regard to his dredging operations. He is now facing a serious charge but the language barrier did not hinder his business enterprise.

I understand that when the matter came up and when a jury was being chosen for that trial there was a panel of some 240 people. The members of that panel were asked whether they would be prepared to deal with the matter in French, and fewer than the 12 required—I think it was six—said that they could handle a trial in French in Toronto. I suppose the next question would be where to move the trial. Would it have to be moved 400 or 500 miles away in order to find a jury? What would be the cost to the taxpayer? If we are going to be doing things like this, what will be the cost of the administration of justice?

There are all kinds of practical objections to this piece of legislation. The Minister of Justice says it will not be proclaimed until there has been full and complete consultation with the provinces. The minister gave me an undertaking some time ago about proclaiming amendments to the Criminal Code dealing with appeals by way of trial de novo. I suggest the minister has not lived up to his undertaking because those amendments were proclaimed for the province of Alberta when, in fact, the minister said they would not be proclaimed until he was satisfied that there were legally trained provincial judges in that province.

I made it a point to bring this up in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The minister told me not to worry about it because it would not be done until there was a proper system. The judge I had in mind at the time is still sitting and still causing no end of trouble because he does not know very much about the law and certainly has no conception of the principle of reasonable doubt.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has accused me of breaching an undertaking I gave to him. I would obviously like to go back to read the words in the committee report of some two years ago in which that undertaking is recorded. However, I want to assure the hon. member—and I think he appreciates that what he has said about me is rather serious—that the proclamation of that section of the Criminal Code was made only after a formal request by the attorney general of the province of Alberta—

Mr. Woolliams: That's right.

Mr. Basford: —who is in charge of the administration of justice in the province of Alberta. I think I was entitled to presume, as a result of that request, that a proper system was in place in Alberta regarding trials de novo. I believe that was my undertaking, but I will check the record.

Mr. Schumacher: My understanding was that we did not have to worry about that and that the minister would see what the situation was. Perhaps he is correct in saying that he should be able to rely on the attorney general for Alberta. I have a different opinion, and if I were the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) I would not want to support the proclamation of this particular bill if I had to rely on the attorney general of the province of Alberta, because sometimes I think he is completely out of touch with what he is doing. I really cannot see why the hon. member should be trying to pass the buck on to somebody else. We are elected to this House to make decisions. We should know what are the situations in our own provinces. We are elected by the people of those provinces, and we should not be so willing to pass off our responsibility for legislation to other jurisdictions.

The Minister of Justice says I have made a very serious accusation against him. I do not think it compares to the accusation he made against me last summer when he accused me of complicity in the death of an Ottawa policeman who was shot at the time we were discussing gun control legislation. However, these are, of course, matters of opinion.

This bill provides that every accused shall be advised of his right to apply to have his trial conducted by a French-speaking judge or before a French-speaking jury. This application will have to be made at an accused's first appearance in court. This provision does not relate just to superior court judges and juries. Justices of the peace and provincial court judges of first instance are going to have to read out this advice to every accused who comes before them. I can see situations developing where people will just want to make trouble or find a technical defence, and the court system will be clogged up even more with possible frivolous and vexatious applications. It may be that there will be applications that justices of the peace who try cases must speak the official language of accused persons.

I suggest this is directly contrary to the system of government we have now because, if we pass this legislation, the provincial governments will have to provide French-speaking justices of the peace and provincial court judges to deal with cases in which accused persons elect to be tried at that level.

There have been prior situations in which the government has abused its constitutional rights regarding spending. It has imposed large and expensive programs on the provinces in the fields of health and social welfare. Now the government is complaining about the cost of those programs. It says it cannot afford them and that it has to cut back. Those programs were imposed by this Liberal government under the system of 50 cents on the dollar and the like. Now the government wants to back away.

With this bill we have another situation in which the government is going outside its area of jurisdiction without any justification. It is imposing what will ultimately be a very expensive proposition for the provinces. The federal government does not have to pay the bill for most criminal proceedings in the provinces. The government pays the salaries of superior court judges it has appointed and no one else. What about interpreters or court reporters who will have to be used? If there are no bilingual court reporters, there will have to be interpreters for them, or groups of court reporters who are bilingual will have to be provided.

I was interested in the answer to a question put by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) regarding the cost of bilingualism in this country since 1970 which is recorded in Tuesday's Hansard. According to the government's answer, the cost now totals $389,051 million. Are we really in better shape with regard to unity in this country now than we were in 1969 when the Official Languages Act was passed? Can anyone honestly say that, after our spending all that money? I do not think so.

The first reaction to the Official Languages Act was Bill 63 introduced by the Union Nationale government in Quebec which reduced the rights of English-speaking people in that province and which made people upset. That government was succeeded by the Bourassa government which introduced Bill 22, which was probably the main reason for its defeat. Now we have the language charter, Bill 101, which says that the language of the courts of Quebec is going to be French. I suppose that applies only to provincial courts, but there certainly has not been an increased amount of good will among the language groups of this country since the introduction of the Official Languages Act back in 1969. I think everyone who supported that legislation has a lot to answer for regarding present conditions in this country.

This bill is not necessary. We have a tremendous tradition in this country of protecting minority rights in our courts. The legal profession has been very sensitive to the fact that its duty is to protect people's rights and to ensure they receive a fair and just trial.

• (1552)

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) indicated that Newfoundland has a Francophone population of approximately 1 per cent. Yet the figures provided by the Minister of Justice indicate that the Francophone population of that province is seven tenths of 1 per cent. Someone else indicated that most of the Francophone population is located in Labrador.

Mr. Crosbie: The Port au Port peninsula area.

Mr. Schumacher: Perhaps they are situated in a very restricted area. Perhaps that area referred to by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) will become the judicial centre for the province. In any event, it is a very, very small number of people. If it is impossible to impanel a jury capable of dealing with a trial conducted in the French language in a large city such as Toronto, I do not know what can be expected in a province which has a Francophone population of seven tenths of 1 per cent.

The province of Ontario is taking steps toward providing a practical solution for the problems of language in its jurisdiction. One must remember that the Francophone population is declining. Perhaps this will change. In a release dated November 22, 1977, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) indicated that the Francophone population of Ontario dropped from 6.3 per cent to 5.7 per cent. Perhaps this will be reversed, as a result of what has occurred in the last couple of years in the province of Quebec. Nevertheless, it should not be considered to be an increasing problem.

The province of Ontario has attacked this problem in a proper fashion. Where there is a need for bilingual services, Ontario is providing them. Beyond the provinces of New Brunswick and Ontario, there is absolutely zero need for this legislation. If every Canadian justice of the peace and provincial court judge is required to advise people of their right to apply for a special judge and jury, there will be no end to irritation and trouble, the feeling that French is being shoved down the throats of people. That type of attitude is not necessary in our country at the present time.

I cannot understand why the government is bringing this before us at this time, especially when its standing in the country is considered. There have been substantial changes in the polls. We have found out that the Liberal and Conservative parties are tied. I suppose there is good reason for that. There is not much difference between those two parties. We have a Tweedledum and Tweedledee situation. Canadians are demanding more than that. They are unhappy with the bilingual situation.

When the Minister of Justice introduced this piece of legislation on April 4, I suspect he did not have the faintest idea that he would be sitting here today seeing it pass second reading. By the look of things, perhaps he will see it pass all stages. When this legislation was introduced, I suspect it was solely for election purposes, but funny things have occurred on the way to an election. I cannot believe the Minister of Justice, coming from British Columbia and having practised law at one time, feels this legislation has any practical application in the city of Vancouver or other parts of his province. According to the minister's own figures, British Columbia has a Francophone population of 1.7 per cent. He indicated that most of that population was centred in greater Vancouver. One must consider the size of that province, from the lower mainland to the far reaches of the Peace River area.

In my own province of Alberta the Francophone population mainly has settled in the northern part. The Minister of Justice referred to moving people for the purposes of trial. If that is to be implemented, one must remember that it will be necessary to move people distances of 300, 400, or perhaps 500 miles. Millions of people came to Canada not knowing the language. From time to time they broke the law and did not receive harsh treatment. In fact the courts provided proper interpreters for their benefit. Why should an Anglophone or a Francophone be placed in a better position than these people? Are they any better off than people from Spain, Germany, Italy or Portugal? Why should these people be placed on pedestals? Everyone in Canada should receive the same treatment in our courts. The important thing is that their evidence must be understandable.

If this suggestion is implemented, the result will be that judges will be hired because of their knowledge of language rather than their knowledge of law. That is a disgraceful approach on the part if the Minister of Justice, who supposedly has some respect for law. Another result would be in the area of required support staff. Where will these people come from? In the case of Alberta, what will happen when the number of French-speaking support staff employees has to be increased? I am thinking of court reporters, interpreters, or the necessary teachers to instruct them in the French language. Can one imagine the expense involved?

One must remember the expense involved in the federal government supporting a program which has created division and has been a failure. In fact Mr. Keith Spicer, who was our Commissioner of Languages, has declared it to be a failure. When he left that office he indicated that the program did not work and that the government was crazy. I do not know why the government never learns anything. It just carries on in the same crazy fashion. I do not know what it is attempting to do. I do not know if the government is consciously attempting to break up the country or not.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said that the bilingual policies of the government have been terribly divisive. In the same breath, he pointed out that he felt compelled to support the principles of bilingualism in this country. I cannot understand him. On the one hand he indicates the policies are divisive, yet he continues to support them.

I do not know if any member of the Conservative party will participate in this debate other than the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). Perhaps word has gone out that there are to be no speakers and that there should not be a vote. It would be interesting to know whether the Leader of the Opposition has brought strict discipline and unity to his group. It would be interesting to know if all members of the Conservative party are of one mind. It was not that long ago that I was a member of that party. If everyone in that party is in agreement with this bill, there have been some great conversions on the road to Damascus. I see the Minister of Justice beaming broadly. That is the fact of the situation. I do not know what will happen to the idea of represented democracy. It is a very unusual situation.

Mr. McKenzie: Ask him what Jack Horner is going to do, Stan.

Mr. Schumacher: We will have to see what he does. I do not know. Perhaps he will take a walk. I don't know. I would assume there will be lots of people in the Conservative party who will not be around if there happens to be a vote on this question, as well. It really does not make a good point to say, "Well, they are just as bad as we are." The tragedy is that we cannot seem to get any real representation in this House of Commons. Unfortunately, the members are forgetting their constituents, and that is a sad day for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to congratulate the government on having introduced in the House these amendments to the Criminal Code that will allow any individual to be tried in the official language of his choice in every Canadian province.

As my colleague the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) said last Tuesday, Quebec has been setting an example for the other Canadian provinces for 110 years, and I think it is time they adopted measures to give their French-speaking minorities the right to be tried in their mother tongue. We, from the Social Credit party of Canada, feel this is a basic, indefeasible right which does justice to Francophones whose rights have been encroached upon for too long. I say this without any bitterness, because it is the truth. It is time, if we want good will to prevail in Canada, Francophones were finally considered as first class citizens and no longer as second class citizens who are only tolerated in their own country.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is being sponsored by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). I am convinced it is well inspired and after its passage it will be implemented equitably. Injustices are always reprehensible wherever they come from. That is why a public protector or ombudsman urgently needs to be appointed to ensure that the rights of each and everyone in Canada are protected as regards the enforcement of legislation under federal jurisdiction. Some hon. members and a few people have voiced certain apprehensions about the possibility of implementing this legislation all across Canada. They argue that in certain provinces such as Alberta or Saskatchewan, just to name a few, the concentration of Francophones is not high enough to justify the establishment of such services.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this argument is unfounded because if you read clause 462.2 of this bill carefully you will understand that if the linguistic qualifications of judges and jurors in an area are too thin, the trial can be moved to another region in the same province. There may be difficulties in the application of this law but they are not insurmountable inasmuch, Mr. Speaker, as those who have to enforce it act in good faith and really want harmony in Canada. Mr. Speaker, if I cannot be convinced, nobody will be, that even in those provinces where there are few Francophones, like Newfoundland for example, it is impossible to find a region where a trial could be held in French. If you do what is necessary you will find ways and the required people.

We of the Social Credit Party of Canada believe the minister to be sincere until proven otherwise, and I personally think that he is sincere when he says that the linguistic qualifications will be considered when new judges are appointed. That will be a good thing. It will prove that Canada is doing everything necessary to try and reach the objectives set out in Bill C-42.

Mr. Speaker, whether it be in western, eastern or central Canada, judges and juries who can communicate in French will have to be found, otherwise this legislation will be ineffective. We will have lost our time in the House debating this bill and the public will consider our discussion simply as an exercise in hypocrisy. I hesitate to use that term, because I believe the time has gone when they could fool aroung with the language rights of Canadians throughout Canada, that time has gone. One should keep pace with the times, with 1978, with our generation, and take advantage of all the opportunities for language teaching there are throughout Canada, all the money spent to enable Canadians to learn and use both languages. I believe that in the future there should not be any opportunity in the provinces to discriminate against any Canadian whatsoever. Moreover, certain provinces seem reluctant to implement the provisions of the new legislation and are using as a pretext the high cost of implementation. This is possible. As for me, I would reply that we hope that the federal government will not hesitate to provide financial assistance for the provinces. The money of Canadians is used in other areas where we believe that this is justified. I think that in this area it would also be justified and accepted by Canadians. Mr. Speaker, this is why it would not distress me to see such an item in the budgetary estimates of the government. I believe this would be money well spent.

Mr. Speaker, we are sure that passage of this bill will contribute greatly to improving the life of French-speaking people throughout Canada. We hope that all the Canadian provinces will readily accept this new legislation. Unless we are dealing with fanatics, with people who are completely against the use of both official languages in Canada, I believe most people will agree with the use of this new provision to put a stop to this injustice which has been going on for too long in this country.

Mr. Speaker, since Canada is supposedly bilingual, we believe it is essential that such actions be taken so that bilingualism can finally become fact instead of fiction; in other words, it is all very well to say that Canada is bilingual, but if Canadian citizens are denied basic rights, such as bilingualism which exists only on paper, we must correct the situation because if those rights exists only on paper, they can deteriorate to such a point that they will finally disappear altogether.

Mr. Speaker, our party has always favoured more bilingualism in all areas of social and economic activities. It is about time that Francophones be made to feel at home everywhere in Canada, that they not be confined only to Quebec. We do not want to live in a ghetto; we want our province to develop normally, we want French-speaking Canadians who have chosen to live in any other province not to feel like strangers, we want linguistics rights to be recognized, put into practice and respected. And I think we should consider that seriously if we want to live in harmony in this country and to try together to ensure the development and prosperity of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the government party, the majority party, not necessarily the party in power because I would say once again that I am clearly under the impression that power is outside this House. That is unfortunate. As long as I am not sure that the power is really in this House, I will have to remind my colleagues and the people of Canada as may times as necessary, that it is useless to talk about democracy when parliament is under the power of financiers outside this House.

Mr. Speaker, as I just said I wish to assure the government, the excutive, of support on this bill and I hope it will become law before the election so that it will not die on the order paper and be a mere statement of good intentions rather than reality. I hope this initiative of the government is not just an electoral scheme to get votes from Francophones and show the Anglo-phones that the government protects the rights of the English-speaking minority in Quebec against the so-called adverse effects of Bill 101 in that province.

If it wants to be honest with the citizens, and I hope it does, the federal government should do everything necessary to ensure the passage of this bill without delay and do justice to Francophones who have been patiently waiting for that for 110 years. Mr. Speaker, harmony in Canada is made up of many little details and if we keep them in mind we will reach our objective so that each and every Canadian will consider himelf equal to others, whatever his language, his religion and the province where he lives.

I have always considered I was lucky to be a Quebecker and a Canadian and I am proud of it and never shall I accept to grovel before anyone, before other Canadians, whatever their origin or their language. I for one, Mr. Speaker, do not think that we can turn a Francophone into an Anglophone or an Anglophone into a Francophone, but with good will both can become good Canadians. This has always been the ideal of the founder of the Social Credit Party of Canada, the late Réal Caouette, who in his own words has always promoted that ideal throughout Canada.

I consider I am in the right direction in supporting the principle of that bill. Having made my remarks in the few minutes the House has put at my disposal—and I thank the minister for his attention because too often we must deplore the lack of attention from ministers and since we have a minister for a change, a member of the executive who is here listening to hon. members' remarks on this bill, I think we should thank him for his attention. This is how I consider that the business of this House should be conducted and that before our country, before all the people who look at us sometimes on television, because our debates are televised, we should make sure that our remarks become more and more serious and sincere so that the people paying dearly for the administration of our country be at least convinced that we are serious, that we are doing the utmost to give our country the best possible administration, with full justice towards all Canadians, whether they speak English, French or any other language.

Mr. Speaker, we are often blamed for opposing everything and being against every bill introduced by the majority, by the executive. I hope that for once radio and television will tell the whole population of Canada that the opposition approves this bill, wants to see it adopted, but most of all to see it in application, otherwise I will protest as a Canadian against the fact that it will have been sheer hypocrisy and in that case I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will come down hard on the executive.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the significance of the bill we are debating today goes far beyond its legal implications. Why? Because, Mr. Speaker, in 1978, on this fourth day of May, the House has just realized that it must suppress one of the most blatant if not despicable injustices in this country which some people dare call bicultural or bilingual. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is appropriate on this occasion to mention certain historical facts when it has taken so much time to find a solution to the most elementary problem of justice concerning the most elementary freedom, that of being allowed to defend oneself in one's own language. Mr. Speaker, the proverb says better late than never, but we must admit it is often too late. If we analyse the immediate reasons which finally prompted the government to introduce this legislation, we must realize that it was forced by the events, because of very particular circumstances. We can wonder today whether the government would have presented this bill had not something happened in Quebec in 1976. Would the government have been in such a hurry to pass this bill if the Association des Francophones hors Quebec had not suddenly felt a new strength following events and positive and determined affirmations in Quebec? Would the government, Mr. Speaker, have deigned to consider this major and fundamental problem, which I insist is of a basic nature, if Quebec had not passed Bill 101?

Mr. Speaker, of course I am pleased to see that at last the injustice has been acknowledged and that some attempt to remedy this situation is being made. Nevertheless, how far will that action carry if you analyse the motivations and the reasons which have led to the introduction of this bill? I am even under the impression that it was drafted rather hastily if I consider that the French version is just a translation of the original English text. Once again, and perhaps the minister could let me know if I am wrong, I think that this bill which purports to defend the interests of Francophones in this country had to be drafted in English first. Furthermore, in view of the fact that hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) who is a Francophone from outside Quebec fighting for the rights of his fellow Francophones made his intervention earlier mostly in English, I am led to feel quite skeptical about the whole thing, Mr. Speaker. Yet it is high time for us to realize that Canadians, be they French- or English-speaking and especially if they are French-speaking, certainly have no reasons for harbouring inferiority complexes especially from an historical point of view since they were the founders of this country.

Being the representative of a riding which bears the name of the very founder of our country, Champlain, it is for me an honour, Mr. Speaker, to underline these historical facts. Yet, what I do not agree with in the presentation of such bill is again the fact that something is going to be granted to us as a result of a definite attempt to prevent French Canadians from expressing even further their collective self-determination and participation in the future of this country. Mr. Speaker, if these are the feelings which motivate the government in introducing this bill I suggest it will not solve Canada's problems because to solve such problems you just do not do some patching work when it becomes absolutely necessary, otherwise the whole structure will break down. On the contrary, this compulsory solution, this negative approach to bring about changes which have become necessary is not to the credit of this parliament.

This is why I would hope that this bill be considered only as a solution to an emergency because it deals with the basic freedom of the individual. It should not become the method used by the government to coax Quebeckers and Canadians into believing that the government is about to solve all their problems and that it alone has the solution, the proof being that it is capable of bringing remedies by simply introducing bills so that this country may stay united.

• (1632)

Mr. Speaker, if this is the first note of a ditty we will be hearing during an election campaign and it was done for that purpose, I say that this bill will change nothing to the present conditions. I am not being pessimistic, but I would like this negative attitude of the government, this legislation forced upon us make all members realize that we should rather consider the basic major changes which would finally make Canada meet the requirements of its citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I am not overly impressed when I am told that from now on—as I am not entirely convinced—a French Canadian from Toronto, Vancouver or New Brunswick will actually be tried in French, if he so desires. Mr. Speaker, it would please me and I hope it will happen. However, if they think all the problems related to national unity will then be solved, I think they are deluding themselves, Mr. Speaker.

I remember, a few years ago, when I presented a motion opposing that introduced by the Prime Minister on the official languages and their implementation. It was another story we heard during an electoral campaign. The Prime Minister was to solve the problem of Canadian unity by establishing bilingualism across the country.

Mr. Speaker, seven or eight years have passed and what are the results? Do Quebeckers or Francophones make a greater positive contribution to the administration of this country? No, Mr. Speaker. Indeed not. High officials are still almost exclusively Anglophones. The number of mid-level officials has increased by a few percentage points, but there would have been as many, and possibly more, without this legislation or this motion to implement bilingualism in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that these changes would not bring about any concrete results. Why? Because the government would rather ignore the real issue. The problem we are facing in Canada is certainly not linguistic in nature. We have about as much of a linguistic problem as the Irish would have trying to maintain their identity among the English. Mr. Speaker, although an Irishman is no Englishman, there is nothing preventing him from using English as a vehicle for his thoughts here in Canada. The problem has nothing at all to do with linguistic considerations. It is as painful to be laid off in French as it is in English.

The problem is essentially national. French-speaking Quebeckers want to be involved in the activities of Canadian society as equals, not as second class citizens. And there can be no justice in Canada without equality. In 1978, Mr. Speaker, it is about time people understood this basic idea. As the elected representative of the Champlain riding, Mr. Speaker, I am not suffering from any sort of inferiority complex, and I stand here after following in the footsteps of thirteen generations of Canadians who were among the very first to come to this country.

Mr. Speaker, I never asked anybody permission to speak my language, and I wish I never had to ask whether I could be tried in my language if I were outside Quebec. Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker. Quebeckers are no longer satisfied today with band-aid or emergency solutions to hinder the emancipation and the self-fulfilment of Quebec. Everyone in this House, whether from British Columbia or Newfoundland, should be glad to see the founding pioneers of this country developing voluntarily, positively, in order to bring about in Canada a new vitality, new advances, merely with the recognition of their equal status.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of course I would find it absurd to demand a trial in French in an exclusively English area. That would be absurd, ridiculous. I would also find it ridiculous that someone demand a trial in English in Trois-Rivières or Cap-de-la-Madeleine. Let us be logical, let us use common sense and recognize the need to reform this country by granting each of its geographic and demographic entities the autonomy and self-determination each one needs to be able to free themselves and develop as they see fit. Let us not try to force French upon British Columbia; it is as ridiculous as to force English upon Quebec City or Trois-Rivières.

Let us not try to go against the most elementary judgments of people on the pretext of creating an artificial national unity. Mr. Speaker, let us recognize that Canada is vast enough to be made into distinct and independent entities which would be able to bring together a new country, but this time a country meeting the needs of its inhabitants. And so Quebeckers would not have to intrude into the internal affairs of British Columbia and people from the prairies would not have to meddle in Quebec's affairs, and then we would have a united Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been posing for years as the champion of Canadian unity, as if unity or harmony in this country depended only on the ideas of this man. Mr. Speaker, he has been proving to us for ten years that his concept of Canadian unity has led to the imbroglio, the muddle, the chaos we now see in this country. That is why it is high time we woke up and considered first of all not the constitutional alternative of a thrill-seeking Prime Minister but rather the true interests of the Canadian people, and whether these interests lie in giving each part of the country all the prerogatives it needs to develop in harmony. Mr. Speaker, this does not mean hating everybody, but simply to accept an elementary principle of freedom, of brotherly equality, and to realize from the very beginning what we need to create in this country is such a climate that the whole world would be impressed. Mr. Speaker, it is on these principles that we should base our decisions as far as the constitution is concerned.

As a Quebecker, I do not have to wonder how people in British Columbia or in the prairies should solve their problems. They know much better than I do if it is sensible or possible to have trials in French in Vancouver or in Victoria. Mr. Speaker, that is not where the problem lies. It is at the regional level that these rights and privileges must be determined, it is up to each region rather than to the federal government to determine them. That is why even though this piece of legislation would seem to correct certain century-old anomalies, it would have been fairer to ask the provinces to legislate so as to ascertain their requirements in the light of their own needs and capabilities.

So, Mr. Speaker, even though I certainly agree with this action, I disagree that we should blind people to the facts and that the government should use this bill which was railroaded, which was even prepared in a rush, this legislation I repeat, which was drawn up in English in order to protect the rights of the French people.

Mr. Speaker, here we are in 1978, on the eve of the referendum that will determine whether Quebec can go, and therefore Canada, and a timorous effort is being made to solve problems in a way that may not be the right one. Mr. Speaker, like everyone else, I bank of course on the good will of the provinces to implement this proposal, but as others have said before me, nothing will change if it only stays on paper, and nothing will change either if we do not go from those findings to seek out solutions that get to the root of the problem; when time is ripe for a new Canadian constitution, then it should be done by giving the word "constitution" the etymological meaning it can and should have; then, Mr. Speaker, we will have created a new country, a country in which each of its parts can develop without stirring envy, jealousy or hatred. That must be our aim. If this bill only forces individuals to implement something that is more or less logical—as I said before, though I am Francophone and proud of it, I would never dare be senseless enough to the point of ordering a trial in French in Victoria or St. John's Newfoundland. Then it is ridiculous, stupid. So, if an attempt is being made to have us believe that this can be achieved, Mr. Speaker, things will turn out the way did with the policy on bilingualism the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wanted to adopt: it has not progressed one inch. Why? Because the problem in this country is not one of language.

The problem in Canada is a problem of equality, of participation; if French Canadians or Quebeckers felt they were really participating in the progress of their country, Mr. Speaker, there would never have been talk of separatism, of independence or anything else. But as French Canadians have always felt like poor relatives, this is what we have come to. That is why we must now see things as they are, we must not be afraid of seeking and finding solutions that are indicated while respecting the freedom of the individual. Mr. Speaker, I hope my words will not fall upon deaf ears. I hope they reveal the very special concern I have about solving the Canadian problem, but of solving it in its true dimension, that is that of the individual.

Mr. Speaker, if I were to ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) how many bills are originally drafted in French, I would be curious to know the answer. Over 95 per cent of the bills initroduced in the House are the work of people who think exclusively in English.

If the bills introduced in the House are always translated instead of being drafted for the French Canadians from time to time, Mr. Speaker, if I can get a reply to that question it would be easier to understand what goes on in Quebec, because translation is not enough and it is not enough either to grant certain things, because it is done at the United Nations in five languages. That does not turn a Chinese into a Russian or Russian into an American. As I said, It is not a matter of language which is merely a side issue. Irishmen are Irishmen and they resent being told that they are Englishmen. It does not prevent them from speaking English. French Canadians as well could have used English as a means of communication. It is not a linguistic problem, Mr. Speaker. The problem is one of participation. We want to have our share of responsibility and when nearly all activities in this House are conducted in terms of a mentality which is alien to what I am and to what Quebeckers are, that is where the problem lies. And that is why, if we want to correct this situation, we must simply give equal rights to the French-speaking citizens of this country. This is the problem and we will have to deal with it and solve it together one day, otherwise Quebec will do it unilaterally.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, because of the speech of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), will you please call the yeas and nays?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I understand from my colleague, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), that if there were a vote it would be deferred until Tuesday.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am not aware of any such arrangement. Maybe we could take the matter under advisement and carry on with the next item of business in the meantime.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I understood it was the position of the House leader of the official opposition that if there were a vote it would be deferred until Tuesday. However, if the official opposition is ready to vote now, and if my understanding was inaccurate, we shall take the vote right now.

Mr. Speaker: There has been a suggestion that if there is to be a recorded division—

Mr. Paproski: Call in the members!

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It being after 5 o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—External Affairs—Negotiations on proposed flooding of Skagit Valley, B.C.; the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—National Research Council—Proposed removal of employees from Churchill, Manitoba; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie)—Fisheries—Repair of foreign vessels in Canadian shipyards—Government policy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before seeing the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton on a point of order, we have what remains of the private member's hour and we also have procedural argument on a motion to be taken on the next order of government business which, I believe, is the CNR recapitalization bill. I wondered if the House might want to consider if it is appropriate to use the time available for private members' hour—which is in a sense unfair to the proponent of the measure to be debated—and rather than calling it 6 o'clock we might use the time to take the procedural argument on the motion, if it is going to occur. The House would then know whether to proceed with that motion at 8 o'clock or another motion on the same bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I wanted to speak with respect to a matter that was raised just before the bells rang by the Minister of Justice. The minister indicated that there was an agreement between my friend, the government House leader, and myself, with respect to deferring a vote on Bill C-42 to next week. As a matter of fact there was an agreement with respect to deferring a vote, if any, but that agreement was with respect to Bill C-17, through a discussion we had across the floor. I just want to make sure that my friend, the Deputy Prime Minister, was not embarrassed by that misunderstanding.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I obviously misunderstood the hon. gentleman because the conversation was conducted across the aisle. I told the Minister of Justice that the arrangement had been made with respect to the bill we have just dealt with, so certainly the Minister of Justice can be absolved of blame. It is my fault, and I accept the blame very humbly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there is not a disposition to proceed with private members' hour, I wonder if I might have the consent of the House to call the next government order and deal only with the procedural aspects of it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am a little uncertain as to what your wish is, or the wishes of the House are, with respect to private members' hour. I am ready to proceed if it is the wish of the House, as I think it is an important issue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There was no question of setting aside any intended business in private members' hour. If business is ready to go ahead in private members' hour it takes an absolute priority and ought to proceed. The procedural matter in respect of Bill C-17 will take place at 8 o'clock, and the House will now move to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers), and public bills.

Is there any agreement about taking the motion in the name of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)? Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered. Without prejudice to the priority of other items on the order paper the House will proceed to consideration of motion No. 51 in the name of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

[Mr. Speaker.]

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RECOMMENDATIONS ON MANAGEMENT OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the recommendations compiled in conjunction with Hay Associates Limited report concerning the management of the Post Office Department.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion that is before the House this afternoon is one of a series in connection with the tabling of documents that deal with the ongoing problems of the Post Office Department.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest to hon. members that they continue their conversations out behind the curtains.

● (1732)

Mr. Dinsdale: The series of reports have been put out by Hay Associates Limited, which is an American based company which gained a rather formidable reputation with respect to postal affairs because of its excellent studies and reports conducted in the United States. The post office department in the United States in the last decade or so has been going through problems similar to those of the Canadian Post Office Department, and Hay Associates, a consultant firm, were hired to prepare reports which were used as a basis for a thorough-going reorganization of the U.S. postal system. As all hon. members are aware, the reorganization involves the depoliticization of the U.S. postal service, removing it from direct political contact. If we think that our Post Office Department has been involved in politics, I am sure we have to conclude that it was much more so in the United States.

Notwithstanding the deep involvement in the political process at the patronage level of the U.S. postal service, the congress of the U.S. took action based on the recommendations in the reports of Hay Associates and also based on a series of studies and reports which came out of the congress itself. The post office administration in the U.S. was restructured in the form of a public corporation similar to what we in Canada would call a Crown corporation. At the same time, as I have indicated, the Canadian Post Office Department was experiencing similar problems and Hay Associates were hired to conduct a similar series of studies.

The difference between the U.S. experience and the Canadian experience is that the U.S. post office department responded to the advice and recommendations in the Hay reports, whereas in Canada there has been no response whatsoever. The reports still remain buried in the bosom of the Post Office Department, all marked "confidential." The reason that I and other hon. members have been endeavouring to gain access to these studies is the urgent necessity for action on the part of the Canadian Post Office Department. The change came in the United States during the early part of the 1970s. We are now into 1978, and there has been no remedial action on the part of Canada's post office.

As I have indicated, when we discussed this subject some two weeks ago with respect to my motion No. 53, it is inevitable in circumstances of this kind that documents which are really in the public interest tend to leak from the departmental sources. Most of these Hay Associates reports are public property now, even though the Post Office Department still carries on the subterfuge that these documents are highly confidential and it would not be in the public interest that they be released.

Let me refer to some information which is available in these reports which, if the recommendations had been acted upon, would have long ago started the process of reform in the Post Office Department. We are now so late in the process that even postmasters general have been saying that if something is not done soon, the whole Post Office Department might be destroyed by the weight of its own incompetence.

As a result of the Hay Associates reports, an internal document was produced by one of the assistant deputy ministers of the Post Office Department. Among the many recommendations was the following very significant statement, and I am quoting now from page 4 of the so-called Uberig report, section 7, entitled "The Post Office Act". It reads:

> Finally the Post Office Act itself seems outdated in certain respects and overly inhibiting. The process whereby parliament sets first class letter rates acts as a protection that over-zealous officals will not raise rates out of proportion to needs and service.

Perhaps I should interject here to say that this is at least an indication that in some parts of the post office administration they can only raise rates by amending the Post Office Act. The report goes on to read:

> However, it also stymies deserved and needed rate adjustments by subjecting any proposals to the political arena.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) has got around that now. He just ignores the Post Office Act and goes merrily along his way raising rates at random without any restrictions under the Post Office Act. The quotation continues to read:

> Attempts to modernize our authorities and freedom to respond to today's operating demands through legislative change have similarly been thwarted. For several years the government has not considered changes to the Post Office Act as having sufficient priority or being timely to debate in the House. Therefore, although times and needs have changed, post office legislation has not kept pace and deficits pyramided.

That document is dated August 11, 1975, some three years ago. Had it been acted upon, we would be well on the way to solving some of the mounting problems in the Post Office Department today. It might be coincidental that the Hay Associates were hired quite soon after the report of the assistant deputy minister was prepared. The Hay Associates document is dated December, 1975, so it went into operation quite soon after than and came up with a series of recommendations which are quite positive and would, I am sure, if they were acted upon, and if the high priority suggested in the Uberig document with respect to legislative changes had been accepted, have carried the Post Office Department along the road of reform at the present time, just as they did in the United States where they proceeded to grapple with their problems in a positive way.

There are still many problems, as the Postmaster General says from time to time in the House in response to questions. He says that the post office department in the United States is in a mess. Well, it might be in a mess, but if that is so, the Canadian post office system is in a greater mess because there has been no attempt at reform up to the present time.

Hay Associates operated on the basis of a 50-point questionnaire which was based on the experience they had gained in their examination of the United States postal service. Some 5,500 employees completed the questionnaire. Here are some interesting observations:

> The Post Office is the most visible and universal area of government service to the general public.

That is why the report, in a later conclusion, notes that it is the most visible department in parliament as well.

● (1742)

There are more questions asked and more criticisms raised with regard to the post office than any other government department. That alone reflects the public concern expressed through complaints and criticisms from the elected representatives of the people. It should have been sufficient to encourage successive postmasters general to take some urgent action. Here is another interesting observation:

> Departments performance reflects, to some extent, on the government of the day.

That almost goes without saying. This is an interesting report. Very often problems in the post office are laid on the employees. Hay Associates found, and I quote:

> Group generally favourable impressed by the calibre and dedication of the people. As a group employees are highly committed to the P.O.

Perhaps I could add another reason for their declining morale and growing frustration at both the management and worker levels. It is because of the failure of the government to act to remedy obvious difficulties in the Post Office Department. It is not a very happy experience to work for an agency of government that has become the butt of jokes across the country. This was also referred to in this study, and I quote:

> Majority feel very keenly the public criticism levelled at them from every direction. Embarrassed at image the P.O. has acquired of being an arena of union unrest and employee-management confrontation.

That is very good advice, yet no action has been taken to remedy the situation. Here is another interesting observation:

> Most overriding problem over past several years is that of employee-management relations. Issue consumes disproportionate amounts of times, at the expense of other important areas of management.

It also notes that the post office is an extremely complex organization to manage. The Uberig report points out that there are no fewer than seven different government departments involved in post office administration. It refers to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Public Works Act, the Supply and Services Act and finally the Post Office Act. Here is another interesting observation:

Higher levels of management were generally critical of the deputy's preoccupation with labour problems. This preoccupation has resulted in poor management.

In other words, if you have a situation of confrontation between labour and management in the post office, you become completely absorbed in that difficulty. Other areas of concern must of necessity be neglected. Another statement reads:

Advisory Committee agendas are laden with petty issues (committee composed of deputy, assistant deputies and regional general managers).

Because of the confrontation in the post office and the thousands of grievances that constantly overwhelm and threaten to absorb completely the attention of the higher level of management, the more important issues are obviously neglected. It also makes the point that postmasters general are changed too frequently. That is a very good observation. Another point:

Political prominence of the P.O. in each community ensures a high degree of parliamentary and public interest in its operations.

Over past five years (1970-74) the P.O has consistently been the subject of more parliamentary questions than any other major government department or agency. Monopolizes the attention of top people.

Here is the essence of wisdom:

Significant departmental organizational adjustment is essential to correct the deficiency.

It is a marvellous report. If it had been made available to members of parliament, it would have assisted in the process of discussions from the standpoint of knowledge rather than the facade of secrecy in which the post office has attempted to shroud itself. If there is ignorance of what is going on, imagination outraces the actual situation.

As a result of this presentation today, I hope the Postmaster General, who is in the chamber, will be persuaded to table the document so we might get on with the job of constructive criticism and reorganization. The report deals with the decentralization issue. I have received a lot of complaints from postal workers across the country about this particular area. It states and I quote:

It was intended that there be a reduction in employees from a level of approximately 1300, which existed at the beginning of decentralization, to a planned 400-600 on full implementation. Regional offices were also expected to be comparatively lean in man-years, comprising some 30 functional experts. Five years later the headquarters man-years budget had been increased to approximately 1900; the regional offices had virtually quadrupled in size.

This is a complaint I get from the workers. The Post Office Department is top heavy at the management level.

District offices increased significantly.

Mr. Darling: Too many chiefs and not enough Indians.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is one way of putting it.

Increases generated by addition of new areas of expertise such as industrial engineering, mechanization, language training, etc. Introduction of new functions at lower levels seemed inconsistent with the original concept of decentralization.

Since 1971-72, when decentralization first implemented, costs and man-years have risen much more rapidly than mail volumes, stimulating the departments deficit to a record level.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

The organizational concept which was introduced also appears to have been notably divisive.

Decentralization created communications problems.

Study group not persuaded that regionalization is synonymous with decentralization and that the existence of four regions is desirable.

I could go on for some time reading the constructive observations of the Hay report. It made some interesting observations in the area of marketing. I quote:

The majority of marketing programs are seen as being at best non-compensatory and, at worst, sources of heavy financial losses.

Marketing staff are uninformed about postal operations.

Postpak—the service cited most frenquently by marketing as being a notable achievement—was consistently and forcefully criticized by line managers across the country.

A serious communications problem exists within the organization as to the role and contribution of marketing.

Another point raised from time to time is getting trained personnel at the supervisory level, particularly those who are going to be in direct contact with the shop stewards on the floor. The report makes the following criticism:

New supervisors are frequently expected to make what is virtually an overnight transition from mail clerk to supervisor without even basic indoctrination in contemporary management techniques.

Here is one of the major problems. Instead of trying to solve difficulties in industrial relations on the floor of the plant, as is the technique in modern industry—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wonder why I bothered to come to the House this afternoon, since I will waste valuable time answering questions which have been submitted months ago.

I will repeat for the hon. member the answer I gave on April 6, and then I will add some remarks on his comparison between the recommendations of the Hay report and the situation that prevails in the United States. The Hay report consists of a confidential survey of what some management officials think of postal services. The objective of the report was to collect the opinions of different heads in various business enterprises across the country.

Some 5,870 directors of business enterprises were asked to answer a questionnaire frankly and honestly. The respondents had been given the assurance, that their answers would remain confidential. If I were to reveal today the content of the Hay report, I would be breaking this confidentiality commitment towards the respondents. That is why I regret to inform the hon. member that it is impossible for me to reveal the content of this report, first because of its confidential nature and second because it was authorized only for internal distribution.

I hope the hon. member will understand my position. This report was an assessment of a number of postal services. To reveal the names of those services would only demoralize even more the postal workers assigned to these services. Besides, this study was conducted in 1975, so it is already nearly three years old. Corrective measures have been taken since, therefore the current situation is somewhat different. We are in 1978, Mr. Speaker.

Some of the recommendations in the Hay report require, in some cases, very drastic changes. By revealing these recommendations, we would only create concern and anxiety among the employees who would start asking themselves questions such as: Will I lose my job? Will my promotion opportunities be reduced? A conflict might arise between the various services, which would only contribute to lower the morale of the staff.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is getting at. I wonder if he is serious when he asks the same question twice, three times, even. This is the second time he asks the question and he knew the answer before I gave it. I answered him on April 6, 1978, as reported at page 4,215 of Hansard. I get the impression that the hon. member is more interested in downgrading the post office by his questions and interventions—of course, to political advantage—than in working constructively to better the image of the post office, its workers and management.

[Translation]

Furthermore Mr. Speaker, why come back to a report published in 1975 when we have one which is recent?

[English]

The hon. member compares the Hay report to some of the reports in the U.S.A. He told us how efficient and how perfect was the United States post office.

Mr. Dinsdale: No. they have problems, but they recognize them.

Mr. Lamontagne: For his information, so that he can tell his constituents how the post office is doing in the United States, I will give him some of the reports I have from 1978, not from 1975. The Liberal party lives in 1978, it does not live in 1975. Three years have passed and problems have changed since 1975.

Mr. Dinsdale: You can say that! We have gone downhill.

Mr. Lamontagne: I should like to mention something to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) which he will recognize, I think, because apparently he might have some part of the Hay report—he indicated that maybe he had it, I don't know, but I would like to read this to him:

> Both the U.K. and the United States have moved in the direction of Crown corporations for their post offices. Neither country seems to have solved its problems. They have experienced greater rate increases and larger deficits even than Canada.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris must, surely, remember reading that passage.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was over there last week and I read it.

Mr. Lamontagne: I will read, too, from an article which appeared in the Wall Street Journal in 1978, not in 1975. This is what it says about the actual situation of the post office in the United States. The date is January 4, 1978:

> The new postal agency was designed to be run by professional managers, immune to political pressures. It has become clear after seven years of experience that this idyllic arrangement doesn't work.

Here is another citation, this one from the Washington Post dated March 22, 1978—not 1975, the year mentioned by the hon. member. We are in 1978 now, don't forget.

> Postal officials who are trying to run the United States post office like a corporation say they must be allowed to automate certain operations and initiate a number of other economies which will eliminate jobs. The U.S. post office has already asked permission to raise the price of a first class stamp this year from 13 cents to 16 cents.

Mr. Speaker, ours will be the lowest rate in the world when they have raised their rate to 16 cents.

> Legislation now before the House will revamp the United States post office and dramatically increase taxpayers subsidies to hold down rates and stave off service cuts.

The post office is a Crown corporation there. Is that what you want us to become in Canada? I cite another United States newspaper. Again, the date is 1978:

> The U.S. postal service set up as a government corporation in 1970 under the postal reorganization act which transformed the post office from a public service into a so-called public utility, has failed and is dead.

We on this side are much more progressive and we want to live with the problem in 1978. At the moment we are in the stage of conciliation with CUPW. It is going smoothly.

Mr. Dinsdale: Preserve the status quo!

Mr. Lamontagne: We have a study group set up which will look intelligently at this issue and not necessarily affirm that we want a Crown corporation at any cost.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour for private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There have been some indications of a procedural argument with respect to the first motion in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did want to raise a point of order in connection with the first motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). The motion deals with a matter which has frequently concerned hon. members in dealing with pensions, a matter which is negotiated from time to time between the railway and the unions representing the workers in the railway, and from that point of view there might be much interest for hon. members. But it does seem to me that there are two points against it in terms of its being presented to the House at this time. One is that it is completely foreign and strange to the bill itself, which does not deal with the issue to which the amendment directs itself. Therefore, it seems to me to have problems of relevance.

Second, and very briefly, it seems to me that it is clear that the motion fails at this point because of the financial implications involved and the requirement that would be present for a royal recommendation. The amendment appears to require the spending of certain sums by Canadian National, a Crown corporation which is wholly owned by the Government of Canada, and the debts of which are significantly held by the government. Some of those debts are guaranteed by the government, and in that way the proposed amendment involves quite a direct implication financially for the government and for the consolidated fund.

It seems to me, therefore, that on both those grounds the proposed amendment does fail.

I do not propose to raise a similar point of order with regard to the second motion. It is probably closer to being all right on grounds of relevance because it deals with a section which also deals with auditors. On one reading it might be thought to involve some additional expenditure, but I would say that that, at the very least, would be extremely minor because it is a practice which is not uncommon at all with the railway which is here being embraced. Indeed, the second motion is a motion which I probably can for that reason support, even though it adds very little. However, I think the first one does fail on the grounds of relevance and of involving expenditures of funds which have a direct relationship to the fisk.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will want to argue, I am sure, in support of the procedural regularity. I read his motion as adding to the proposed clause 2 on page 3 some language which would require that the financial statement, as it were, of revenues of the CNR be altered so as to accomodate whatever payments would have to be made by the company to the pensions of former CNR employees or, as the hon. member has put it, to the equalization of benefits for CNR pensioners. Obviously if it did not require a payment, the hon. member would not have put the motion. Since it will require a payment, it may cause difficulties. In fact, if some other revenues have to be subtracted from the total financial picture of the CNR, obviously the public treasury will have to make up the difference.

● (2012)

The other matter to which the hon. member will want to address himself is that the final financial picture, as I read clause 2 on page 3 of this amending bill, is determined first by totalling the revenues or the earnings of the national system, and then subtracting those payments which are required by section 9 of the parent act. After that, the balance remains in the hands of the company. The effect of the hon. member's amendment would be to change that, so that an additional charge or obligation would be placed upon the funds which would be called earnings in the system. An additional obligation would be placed on those funds. If that is going to be done, I am wondering whether it should be done by way of an amendment to section 9 of the act and not to this clause of the amending bill.

Therefore, those are the points I want the hon. member to argue.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I understood the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), he indicated that he would accept the second motion. I will be able to make my contribution and raise all my points as to why the two motions have been presented when the second motion is debated. Will Your Honour be making a ruling on the second motion tonight, and then we will enter into debate on that motion?

Mr. Speaker: No, I see no difficulty in respect of the second motion. The second motion raises some concerns which are not serious enough to set it aside on procedural grounds. The minister has indicated that motion will raise some possibility of additional expense in terms of an auditor or an auditing practice. It is not of such a major nature that anyone would consider it to embrace the kind of financial initiatives which would require royal recommendation.

I think the hon. member is inviting me to make a ruling on this motion now. Any ruling I would make on his first motion is without prejudice entirely to his ability to argue on his second motion which may be accepted. Nevertheless, even if it is accepted, certainly he will be provided with a chance to make a contribution at that time.

Clause 2 on page 3 of the amending bill reads as follows:

For the 1977 fiscal year, any earnings of the national system remaining after payment of the amounts described in paragraphs 9(1)(a) to (c) of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act as they read immediately prior to the coming into force of section I shall be retained by the national company.

The hon. member is seeking to add to that the idea that those earnings shall be retained by the company after a further charge; that is, a charge which will be made for the purpose of equalizing pension entitlements for all former CNR employees. In other words, the hon. member is putting forward that an additional charge will be made on the earnings of the system before the final financial accounting is laid in the hands of the national company. In fairness, I think that introduces a new concept into this amending bill. In addition, probably on close analysis, it introduces a possibility of additional charges on the public treasury, which would require a separate royal recommendation.

I understand the motivation of the hon. member. He wants to improve the position of the pensioners. I think all hon. members applaud that initiative. However, if that is to be done, it seems to me the hon. member has an opportunity to present his arguments on behalf of pensioners through his second motion.

Furthermore, both of the arguments put forward by the hon. Minister of Transport seem to be valid. That is, this introduces a new concept, and if a further charge on the revenue earnings of the system is to be made, surely it must be made by way of an amendment to section 9 of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act directly, so that a further obligation is placed upon the system or the company in those circumstances, rather than doing it by way of an amendment to this section.

Therefore, I have to accede to the argument that such an amendment would go beyond the scope of this particular amending bill, and it ought to be made by way of an attempted amendment to the parent act, the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act. Therefore, I set aside the first motion. Of course, it is entirely without prejudice to the right of the hon. member to argue now in respect of his second motion, which has no procedural difficulties.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre) moved:

That Bill C-17, an act to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be amended in clause 4 by striking out lines 31 to 36 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"38.(1) A continuous audit of the accounts of the National Railways and the pension fund of its employees shall be made by independent auditors appointed annually by the governor in council and the auditors shall report annually to parliament in respect of their audits."

He said: Mr. Speaker, your ruling is quite acceptable to me, because I can make my point when arguing on my second motion calling for independent auditors. This was recommended in the Hall report, which was a very expensive study that was conducted regarding railway pensioners. After the report was tabled, we find that practically nothing was done.

My reason for presenting the two motions in the first place was to bring this charade to a stop. The pensioners have been played around with. The two railways have had these great studies done. Representations have been made. The railways have been allowed to come before transportation committee meetings. Their main spokesman, Mr. Earl White, the national president of the Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association, has made representations. Then we received rulings from the chairman of the committee indicating that nothing could be done. It is just a hoax. In fact, what is being done to pensioners regarding this problem is criminal. Many of those people are drawing pensions of $100 a month, pensions which are not indexed at all.

The railways are paying certain amounts per year, but there is no way for them to wipe out the $1,073 million which they owe the pension fund. Over the 43 years the fund has been in existence, they have not been making their proper contributions. If they had been, there would be no problem today.

As I said earlier, the Hall report recommended that there should be independent auditors. The way the fund is being handled and the manner in which money is being invested is absolutely disgraceful. The loss has been in the range of millions of dollars. I will deal with that in a moment.

Railway pensioners have not had too many friends on the government side of the House over the years, but apparently a friend has been found finally in the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). On March 9, 1978 he made a statement in the House respecting legislation concerning the indexing of pensions. As reported at page 3622 of Hansard, he said the following:

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this occasion to announce the government's intention to introduce legislation to amend several features of the public service pension program with respect to the indexing of pensions to changes in the cost of living.

This is what the railway pensioners were asking for. He continued as follows:

The amendments that will be proposed will apply to members of parliament, public servants, military and RCMP personnel, and all other individuals who are subject to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

Something should be done for these pensioners to ensure that their pensions are indexed. CNR pensioners are former public servants, and there is no reason in the world why a similar program cannot be implemented for them.

● (2022)

In addition, the President of the Treasury Board went on to say:

Second, that the first indexing adjustment received by pensioners to be pro-rated monthly so that it only reflects the inflation that occurs after retirement.

This is very similar to what the railway pensioners are asking for, Mr. Speaker. The minister went on to say:

Third, that the current continuing commitment to index pensions fully with changes in the consumer price index be replaced by an arrangement under which cost of living adjustments would be determined on an ad hoc basis, three years at a time.

Railways pensioners are asking for similar arrangements, and this is recommended in the Hall report. That was the purpose of the Hall commission, to do something for pensioners, but nothing has been done. The President of the Treasury Board went on to state:

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the decision to propose that public service pensions be adjusted for changes in the cost of living on an ad hoc basis was only reached after considerable thought and soul searching on my part and that of the government.

The source of the dilemma—and that is what it is, a dilemma—centers around the responsibility the government has to both pensioners and taxpayers.

I can understand the dilemma of railway pensioners who receive $100 a month in the form of a pension which is not indexed. They have a real dilemma. The minister went on to state:

On the one hand, it is the government's view that the measures that have been adopted to protect the purchasing value of public service pensions are based on a sound principle. In the government's view, it is unjust and unfair to allow the rate of inflation to determine arbitrarily the real value of pensions, and that is exactly what happens when pensions are not adjusted for changes in the cost of living.

This is exactly the problem we have with the railway pension fund. The minister went on to state:

In short, the principle of maintaining the purchasing value of pensions so that pensioners can maintain their access to the same basket of goods and services is a principle to which the government is committed, and remains committed.

If the President of the Treasury Board can say that about pensions of retired civil servants he should certainly include railway pensioners, and that is why we must take some decisive action and stop giving them the run-around. The minister went on to say:

The government, however, is also committed to the principle that public service pension arrangements must also be just and fair in terms of their impact on taxpayers.

The railway pensioners are not asking for anything more than that to which they are entitled. The minister went on:

There are experts who feel we can count on seeing a long-term situation in which interest rates, on average, will be 3 per cent to 4 per cent ahead of the rate of inflation, and 1 per cent ahead of salary increases.

My motion calls for the appointment of independent auditors, as recommended in the Hall report, who could start investing the money more wisely, and not as it has been invested over the last 43 years. In addition, the President of the Treasury Board stated:

In recent years, of course, interest rates have not maintained a 3 per cent to 4 per cent margin over inflation and a 1 per cent margin over salary increases.

The minister then stated:

To achieve this goal, the legislation which will be introduced will require the President of the Treasury Board to carry out a triennial review of public service pension arrangements with advice from the chief actuary and in consultation with representatives of interested parties.

At the present time the CNR handles the total pension fund, and this is why we say it is unsatisfactory. The President of the Treasury Board also stated on March 9:

In developing the proposals which would be included in the proposed legislation I shall be consulting with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson)—because of the armed forces pension program—with the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) having the pension interest of the RCMP in mind, and with my own Public Service Superannuation Advisory Committee as well as with other interested parties.

How can we leave railway pensioners out of these discussions about appropriate pensions, Mr. Speaker? They are entitled to have their pensions reviewed and properly indexed. The minister then said:

Finally, I should like to assure hon. members that the whole public service pension program will be up for review upon the completion of the current actuarial evaluation of the program now being carried out by the department of insurance and upon the completion of the government's comprehensive review of the retirement income situation of all Canadians. The review will also take into account all the findings of the consultants, as tabled today, and the detailed analysis of the Treasury Board secretariat.

We made the request at the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications in respect of railway pension programs that the government through the Auditor General conduct a full scale inquiry into the handling of the CNR pension fund. We found it very strange at the committee that the Liberal members organized to defeat our motions calling for the Auditor General to appear before the committee and to conduct a full scale audit of, and an inquiry into, CNR pension funds. Recent statements by the government that it is going to strengthen the Auditor General's department, and that there is to be more scrutiny of Crown corporations and government agencies, is apparently all window dressing. This was one of the first occasions that we put this to the test in the committee and they ganged up to vote this motion down. This gives a clear indication that this is nothing but window dressing.

It was also stated at the committee that the CPR pension fund should be investigated, and this was referred to in the Noel A. Hall report on railway pensions. I understand it is in a worse financial condition than the CNR pension fund.

I should like to quote from some of the statements made at the committee meeting of April 5 when we had the president of the pension union before us. I asked him the following question, and we were talking about investment of pension funds:

These investments you mentioned, have they been paying off? Have you considered them good investments, these mortgages and bonds? Also, it appears that the way we are going, and with inflation the way it is, a pensioner will not be able to survive on his particular pension. This 2 per cent a year they talk about is nowhere going to cover them for inflation.

Mr. Earl White, president of the railway pension union, answered me by stating:

I have something on that particular subject and it is the Hall report. Dr. Noel A. Hall on page 48 refers to Table II of the report.

. . . Dr. Hall has published CNR Pension Trust Fund Investments as at December 31, 1974. The book value and the market value of bonds of the CNR is respectively, $358.8 millions and $281.2 millions . . .

These are round figures. I am just quoting the millions. Three hundred and fifty-eight million is the book value and two hundred and eighty-one million is the market value, which means that there was a loss position on that date of $77,600,000.

I certainly would not want the CNR investing my money, Mr. Speaker. This type of loss is very strange in this day and age of investing money. Mr. White went on to quote from the Hall report as follows:

The book value and the market value of stocks is respectively, $445.9 millions and $344.9 millions, a loss position of $101 millions on common stocks. The board of directors of CNR has appointed Investment Specialists . . .

This is not Dr. Hall speaking, this is me . . .

. . . to invest our pension trust funds. As at December 31, 1974, the loss position on these two types of investments was $178,600,000.

● (2032)

I am sure you must understand, Mr. Speaker, why we requested the Auditor General to do a complete audit as to what the CNR is doing with this pension fund. I find it very strange that the Liberal members of the transport committee could overlook something like this and vote against having the Auditor General examine this fund. It is very strange indeed. Mr. White went on to say:

No disrespect is intended or implied, but to paraphrase Dr. Noel A. Hall's statement quoted in item number 11 it is equally proper and reasonable for me to say . . .

First I would like to read his quotation above. In regard to the $371 million removed from the CNR pension trust fund in 1969, Dr. Hall stated on page 132:

". . . It is also true that changes in actuarial assumptions led to a reduction in the unfunded liability of approximately $371 million. I can only state to those who would believe otherwise that these changes do not in any way reduce the company's obligations under the pension plan . . ."

This is quite true. The company was committed to pay pensions based on service and based on earnings. It does not matter how much money is taken out of the plan; the pensions are guaranteed by CNR. So CNR lost $178 million and I stated in our last annual report:

"I can only state to those who believe otherwise that these losses do not in any way reduce the company's obligations under the pension plan."

If the CNR cannot handle the pension fund properly, then my motion must be accepted. I hope the government will take action as recommended in the Hall report, that it be placed in the hands of independent auditors, people that we hope will act in a more responsible manner. Mr. White went on to say:

Dr. Noel Hall recommended in his report that the pension funds for CNR and CPR should be transferred to an independent Canadian trust company.

I pointed this out earlier, but that is just further evidence as to why we need an independent actuary. We also had minor support from the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae), when he stated:

Which would indicate to me that they do not possess a great deal of competence in terms of investment management.

That, of course, is an understatement, Mr. Speaker.

I would now like to quote briefly from a document presented to me by the Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association:

The CNR statement of assets and liabilities for the year 1976, and Note 4 the statement of long term debt seem to reveal the financial position of the company, however they fall short of doing so. As of December 31, 1976, CNR owes much more than one billion dollars to the pension funds for employees and pensioners, merely to ensure that these will have sufficient assets to meet the actuarial liabilities for accrued benefits.

The unfunded accrued actuarial liability which was not included in the statement of assets and liabilities of the company as at December 31, 1976 was $1,073,062,000. If it has been included the total of the liabilities would have been $5,471,113,000 instead of $4,398,051,000 as shown in the annual report of 1976. The annual report for the year 1977 is not yet available to our association.

You can see how it has been handled, Mr. Speaker.

I just want to read from another document that was presented to me on April 25. Mr. White stated:

"For the year 1976 the president of the company has reported that CNR made a profit of $10,000,000. The suggestion has been made that consideration should be given to changing the corporation from a Crown company to a public company so that shares in CNR could be sold to the public."

"If now you will examine Note. 8 appended to the CNR annual report for 1976, you will find that the increase in the "unfunded liability" recorded during the year 1976 is $264,042,000."

Their handling of this fund has been disastrous and independent auditors should examine the fund to take it right out of the hands of the CNR. I would like to point out what the CNR railway pensioners requested:

That all retired members have their pension benefits increased effective immediately to the level, such pensions would have equalled (including any post retirement increases) had the pension been computed at retirement on the same 2 per cent formula in effect for current retirees.

Of course, the independent auditor could examine this request and see if it is feasible. Most certainly, there has to be some kind of an increase and some formula for indexing the railway pensions. In point two they go on to say:

After making the foregoing benefit increases, there would be created with respect to each of these employer's retirement plans a separate retired life trust fund. This trust fund to be operated by a board of trustees having significant representation (preferably 50 per cent of total board) by retired members under each plan.

They are not being greedy and demanding. In the final paragraph of this letter I received they say that they are not asking for fully indexed cost of living pensions. They are being fair. The letter continues:

We are asking, however, that if inflation continues and this results in higher investment earnings on assets put aside for retired members then these be used to provide such retired employees' higher pensions to the extent possible. Whether such higher pensions will be adequate to offset inflation is another question.

The foregoing arrangement would end the present highly inequitable arrangement whereby retired members are subsidizing active employees and the employers (as a result of inflation). We ask not to be treated overly-generously, merely in a fair and equitable fashion.

They are not making unreasonable demands. This is a problem that has been with us for almost ten years.

The government has seen fit to have very extensive studies, reports and inquiries done, but after they are completed absolutely nothing happens. They deserve better treatment than what they have been receiving. I would ask the government members to look at the March 9 statement by the President of Treasury Board where he is prepared to see that all civil servants are going to be treated fairly and squarely. This is a legitimate request. I hope the government will see fit to act on the Noel Hall report and appoint an independent auditor to audit and manage the CNR pension fund.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not find any particular difficulty in supporting the hon. member's amendment at the report stage. Not that it does any good. All it does is cloud the auditor's report on the pension plan with the auditor's report on the company and the company's annual report to parliament.

The tragedy is that hon. members from all sides of this House have been trying for years to find legal and parliamentary mechanisms to do something once and for all about railway pensions. Over the ten years that I have been here reading debates, and during the years which I was on the railway and listening to my father in the years that he was on the railway, the tragedy is that all of us are to blame for this. I blame railway management, railway employees, railway unions, and I blame successive governments.

I can remember as a member of the order of railway telegraphers in 1950 arguing at several union meetings that rather than striking and shutting down the country over the 40 hour week we should do it over the pension plan. I argued that every two years when we were bargaining with both major railways. I said that we should down tools until something significant, important and equitable was done about the pension plans. Some of the same employees and junior management people who now write to me as a member of parliament telling me how insufficient the railway pension is are the same people who disagreed with me in union meetings in 1952, 1954, 1956, 1958 and 1960. I suppose that is understandable. They were older than I and were more concerned about take-home pay than what was going to happen when they reached age 65. Of course, that is all water under the bridge.

I hope that in current and future negotiations the railway brotherhoods strike the railroads of this country, if necessary, on the issue of adequate, equitable and fair pensions for those who are already retired as well as those yet to be retired.

I am a third generation member of the railway brotherhood. After 32 years' service my father had to retire from the railway two years early because of illness. The company was very good about leave of absence and protecting his seniority. His pension was $44 per month. When he died at age 64 my mother received a pension of $30 a month, but when she reached the age of 70 the pension ceased. I will never forget her saying that when she was 70 was when she needed it most, not when she was 65. However, it was cancelled as soon as she reached 70. Bless her heart, she worked until she was 74 and that $30 per month from the CPR did not matter. How many hundreds and thousands of people, widowers and pensioners, across this country have had to go through that, Mr. Speaker?

The hon. member's amendment would provide only a better check on the bookkeeping of the railways. It would not do anything fundamental about a change in the direction and equity of railway pension plans.

Each year in this House and at the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications we have been able to pound and hound railway management and the government as a result of what appeared in the auditor's report. All the auditor can do, however, is check the books and say that everything is in order, but no auditor has the authority and probably not even the inclination to make recommendations on changes or improvements to pension plans. That is not within his mandate.

There is no harm in the hon. member's amendment and we can support it. I suspect that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will not feel uncomfortable with it mainly because it will not accomplish very much. At least it will provide another avenue for us to continue the battle about railway pensions year after year.

In committee I asked Dr. Bandeen, president of Canadian National Railways—and I think I asked the Minister of Transport as well—why we did not amend this to add $1,063 million of transfer of provision of capital or cash by the people of Canada to Canadian National Railways and that way immediately fully fund the pension plan. Instead of Canadian National Railways taking until the year 2027 to pay in the money that they owe to retired and working employees, they would owe the money to the Government of Canada and have to pay it on the same scale as they are paying to the pension fund. They would have to pay it back to the government. This would immediately fully fund the CNR pension plan. As I recall, Dr. Bandeen said he did not think it would make any difference whether this is fully funded now or in the year 2027.

I do not think he is right, Mr. Speaker, but even if he is, it is none of his business. That money belongs to the pensioners and the employees of Canadian National Railways and to nobody else. In fact, if the pension fund were fully funded now and Canadian National found that it needed capital for expansion or improvement of the system, they could borrow from it. That might reduce the amount they would have to borrow in other markets and they could pay the same return to the pension plan.

The other thing that must happen with the fully funded pension plan is that there be a majority representation of employees and pensioners on the board of directors. That must come about, Mr. Speaker.

When the railways deduct the 6 per cent or 7 per cent of whatever it is from each employee's pay cheque every month, that amount is set aside in trust in the fund. The company's equal contribution is not deducted, however. The railways show that as part of their costs of labour; it is shown as a deduction in the cost of operation and as a deduction for income tax purposes, but they do not put the money into the pension plan. Each year they obtain at least a tax benefit on their legal, contractual obligation—their share of the employees' pension plan which they keep. In less polite circles that is called stealing.

This legislation should pass quickly and allow the CNR an additional $1,063 million to fully fund the pension plan. In fact, perhaps we should throw in another billion dollars for the CPR unfunded liability in their pension plan. Then the railways could repay the government immediately rather than taking 60 years to repay the pensioners and employees. Surely that would be far more sensible and equitable and even common justice.

If this amendment is accepted we will get a good report on the pension plan from the auditors, but they will not be inclined to make improvements on the benefits for pensioners. They are not hired to do that. At least it would provide an opening for members on both sides of the House to make their annual representations about railway pensions.

I understand that the railway brotherhoods have been negotiating in the past year not only on their own behalf as employees but that they are also endeavouring to negotiate improvements in pensions of retired employees to the extent they are prepared to contribute a small percentage out of their pay. I wish members other than members of the Privy Council could make amendments under the rules. That would make the House sit up and take notice and maybe do something about a problem that has been around since the middle of the 1930s.

The problems for those who are on railway pensions are more severe now than they were in the 1960s. A $200 pension that a pensioner received on his retirement ten years ago is worth about $40 now after he has been on retirement for ten years. Whatever the ills or errors in the 1930s and the 1940s, surely it is within our power to correct them now, if for no other reason than common decency. Surely this parliament could say to CNR that for the next X number of years we will forgo the legislative requirement that 20 per cent of their net earnings shall be returned to the national treasury and that money will go to fully fund the CNR pension plan. Surely we can say also to the shareholders of Canadian Pacific that if their dividend is $2 a share this year, they will get only $1 and that the other $1 will go to fully fund the Canadian Pacific pension plan.

Surely there is something immoral about a corporation, be it public or private, capitalizing itself by taking income tax deductions off the backs of its pensioners and out of money that does not belong to them. The money belongs to the pensioners; it is their money and they have a right to administer it, invest it, to have a majority on the board of directors and to make their decisions through the board of directors, through their pension associations, and through the railway brotherhoods. I do not know of any other kind of fund the money of which is kept by someone else, invested and spent by someone else, and over which you have little or no say. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if you were to try that in other financial operations, you would be called to court and sued out of town. Yet we allow this to go on.

Let us accept the hon. member's amendment and we will hear the auditor's reports on the pension plan, but what the hell will that do to enable us to make a fundamental change in the funding, the direction and the control of pension funds which belong to the pensioners and the employees? They do not belong to anybody else.

I remember one time at a meeting of the transport committee in 1971 when I asked an actuary what would happen if we gathered up all the public and private pension plans in Canada and put the money into one fund, thus ending all the duplication and red tape, all the computer set-ups, and insurance arrangements. I asked him what kind of a pension would people then have out of such a fund. This was eight years ago at least. He told me that, off the top of his head, this would provide, generally speaking, a pension of about $1,000 a month at the age of 60.

If there is any kind of social endeavour which all hon. members agree to and support, it is the matter of adequate and equitable pensions, and yet it has been so misused, betrayed and undermined. We could have indexing of pensions also if we placed our priority on people, not profits. This parliament, like many before it, will pass up another opportunity to do something once and for all about pensions for our railroaders. One could pick a lot of other occupations and institutions in this country where the matter of increasing pensions is long overdue as well, but pensions for railroaders is the best subject to debate because the debate about it has been going on for so long.

I hope the minister will accept this amendment and that we will go on to third reading of the bill, but I also hope that my friends, particularly my friend who has moved this amendment, will think beyond an auditor's report and realize that an auditor's report in itself will not be sufficient to bring about these fundamental changes. It may be helpful and will at least provide a vehicle for us to confront once again the management of both railroads, the boards of directors and the minister of transport, whoever he might be. We have been confronting them for 25 or 30 years, and where did it get us?

We did get some changes when the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications held hearings from coast to coast in 1970 and 1971. Finally, we got a 2 per cent escalation back for 20 years, and we raised some railway pensions from $20 to $40 a month. Big deal! It took one year or more of hearings, then it took another year of pushing and forcing the railroads to accept the report which was unanimously approved in this parliament, before they finally made those modest improvements for those already on pension.

We can all sit around here in comfort, but let us not forget the ones who retired ten years ago with $180 a month, which is now worth only about $40 or $50 a month in terms of purchasing power. They are the ones to whom we owe that money. They earned a decent wage and they need this money to live out their last years. They have made their contribution to this country. Why is it that we cannot get through to whoever is the government? I will not be partisan about this and try to pick on any one party; we are all to blame. We mess around with nitpicking amendments about auditors which will not change anything. It will enable the hon. member who moved the amendment, myself and others—if we are all still here next year—to raise a little more hell next time this issue comes up in the transport committee, but will it really change anything? I do not think so. But let us accept the amendment anyway.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the case has been very well made by the two hon. members who have spoken for the passing of this amendment and for doing a great deal more for railway pensioners than has yet been done. It is a case, of course, that I have made a great many times, and perhaps in anything I say tonight I shall be repeating what I have said on other occasions; but it is a battle that, in my view, must go on until we win it.

When my colleague the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) was speaking rather personally about his own father and mother and the small amount of pension that his father had and the smaller amount that his mother had until even it was taken away from her, I was wondering whether I would follow suit. Having gone this far, that is what I shall do.

It just so happens that it is precisely because of a raw deal to a certain railway worker many years ago that I have spent most of my life in parliament. That certain railway machinist was my father. At a time when I was quite deeply involved in my work as a minister of the United Church of Canada, I got word that at the age of 58 he had lost his job. This was because of the depression of the 1930's. Not only did he lose his job, but there was no pension of any kind.

I well remember the feeling I had at the time, that maybe it was not enough for me, whatever others might feel, to confine my advocacy of a better life to the pulpit, but that it was time I tried to do something to change the society that was ruining the lives of so many people, particularly the older ones of that decade. I made up my mind that, although there was nothing I could do in so far as my own father's economic position was concerned, down through the years I would try to get a better deal for railway workers when they reached the age of retirement and that I would try to get a better deal for all of our senior citizens. The loss of his job had not only been an economic blow to my father but a physical blow: three years later he was dead.

I am proud of what we have achieved since the year I made that decision. However, it is a black mark on our society that we have still done so little to improve the pensions of our railway workers, both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific.

I welcome the amendment that has been put forward by my next door neighbour in our home city, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). As my colleague pointed out, it will make it possible for the accounts of the Canadian National pension fund to be brought before this House and the standing committee so we can hammer away at them. I am sure my friend from Winnipeg South Centre will agree that is all than can be accomplished by this amendment. However, it is something. I hope to goodness the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will not turn it down.

Having been given a chance to look more closely at the Canadian National pension fund and railway pension funds in general, I hope we will make up our minds that things very substantial have got to be done. For one thing, the basic amount of the pension ought to be increased substantially. For another, indexing of railway pensions, at least to the extent of the rise in the cost of living, should be built into the scheme.

It is not good enough for Canadian National once in a while to grant an ad hoc escalation. It is not good enough for Canadian Pacific even less often than Canadian National to grant an ad hoc escalation. That provision ought to be there in the scheme, in the pension plan itself.

My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was quite right in drawing on the recommendations of Dr. Noel Hall. He was also quite right in drawing on some of the things said by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) when he made his statement on the indexing of public service pensions in this House on Thursday, March 9 of this year.

In addition to what the President of the Treasury Board said on that occasion to which my hon. friend has referred, there was also a very interesting paragraph in which the President of the Treasury Board pointed out that about 30 per cent of the money in the public service superannuation account, including the employees' contributions and the employer's contributions, belongs to those now retired, the other 70 per cent beloning to those still working. The President of the Treasury Board stated that that 30 per cent which belongs to those already retired is actually earning enough interest, and indeed surplus interest beyond what was expected, to cover in full complete escalation.

I contend that if that fact applies to the public service superannuation account, it applies also to the pension accounts of Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway. I suggest the moneys in those funds which belong to those already retired is earning more than enough interest to provide escalation fully equal to the rise in the cost of living. This parliament should not stand for nothing being done on this matter.

It is not good enough to say that Canadian National is a separate Crown corporation and that Canadian Pacific is a separate private corporation. They are both creations of the Parliament of Canada. They both exist on the basis of needs that have to be met in this country and on the basis of the work of Canadians. We have the right to say to them that, even apart from the morality and ethics and rightness of it, there is enough money there to make it possible for full escalation of the pensions of all retired railway workers. Some of us insist that this is a battle which must be won. I just hope it does not take as many more decades as some of us have spent fighting pension battles in this House.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre referred to his parents' experience and to the report of Dr. Noel Hall. When I spoke of that in an earlier speech, I drew attention to the fact there was a reference in that report to the miserably small pension then being paid to the father of a former president of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There was a slight escalation by the CPR of those pensions. The late Mr. Emmerson, the father of the former president, received that slight escalation but died a few months later.

I am putting these things in personal terms. I mentioned the late Mr. Emmerson. My colleague mentioned his father and mother. I mentioned my father. This is the kind of society in which we live. It is made up of people who experienced rough times in industry. I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) across the way. Sometimes I love her and sometimes I don't.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No confessions, Stanley!

Mr. Benjamin: Sometimes is better than not at all.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yesterday was not one of the times I loved her. She complained that I should not continue to argue for the lowering of the pension age to 60 because conditions have changed and people now want to work longer rather than retire early. She must not be aware of the struggle it is for those who work in railway shops, steel mills, packing plants and clothing establishments. She may not meet these people, but I do. There are men 55 and 58 who look older than I do. They feel they simply cannot maintain the struggle to age 65. I did not have time to say that yesterday when we were speaking on that other motion. I got it in now.

The point I am making is that it is real people who work for these railways. They are human beings. They have their rights, their hopes and their entitlement. This parliament should be doing something for those people. It is not enough just to debate niceties, techniques and so on, and I am glad the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has put down this motion which gives us the right to talk tonight about problems faced by the real people who work for the railways of this country. Not only should there be a better basic pension and built in guaranteed escalation, but there should also be an opportunity for earlier retirement without penalty. There must also be an improvement in the position of the widows of retired railway workers.

I know that what I am about to say now I have said so often that other members could probably quote it back to me. By what rule of decency or common sense or humanity do we stand for the proposition that if a man and wife live and work together and build up their home and their assets and obtain a pension we then provide that if she dies first his pension is 100 per cent, but if he dies first her pension is only 50 per cent? I know it stems from the day when we thought it was a man's world and it was very nice for those who ran this man's world to provide for 50 per cent pensions for widows. It does not stand up. It does not wash to make that type of discrimination. It is not only the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific which practises that discrimination; the federal government does it and the public service and private industry do it everywhere.

But tonight we are talking about railway pensions and, in particular, we are talking about the Canadian National. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, quite appropriately, is asking that we have an audit of their pension plan and pension operation so that we can look at these things every year. My plea, Mr. Speaker, is that we not only look at these things but that we do something about them. I say again, better pensions in terms of the basic amount, capacity for early retirement without penalty, escalation or indexing of railway pensions to the fullest extent of the cost of living, and equal pensions on retirement or death for the husband or the wife. These are things we must achieve. If we do not, then let us not have all this bragging about all the good social legislation we have brought in. Let us not have all this bragging about equal rights for men and women. Men and women, particularly older women, do not enjoy equal rights and this matter brings it to a head tonight.

I have no doubt my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre feels as I do and that he wants to go a lot further than this amendment, but under the rules affecting a private member, this is all he can do. He has performed a service by bringing this issue before us. He is trying to find an arrangement under which we can look more closely every year at the pension operations of the Canadian National Railways and, in an ancillary way, at the pension operations of Canadian Pacific as well. It is to be hoped that, having done so, we will one day become sufficiently human and decent in our treatment of our railway workers, particularly when their working days are over, when they become retired railway workers or leave their wives as widows, to provide better pensions for these people.

Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment and I know the hon. member who moved it will support me in my determination that we still have a lot further to go.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like very briefly to reiterate the commitment made by the minister at the beginning of the sitting tonight when he said that the government intends to support the motion introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

After listening to all the comments on the problems facing CN pensioners and the pension fund at the present time, including the delays on the part of the CN to put up the money it must pay into the pension fund, I think all members of this House will agree that those problems are extremely important. Indeed the Hall Commission was set up in the early 1960's to study that problem which, unfortunately, has not yet been completely solved. However I think that progress has been made in the right direction. For example, during this year's negotiations between the CN and the various unions representing CN employees, an agreement was reached on the heritage fund that had been recommended in the Hall report, but there remains a lot to be done. That is why we welcome the motion of the hon. member from Winnipeg South Centre. In fact, each year parliamentarians now will be able to deal specifically with this problem at the Committee on Transport and Communications since the report of the auditors on the pension fund will now be referred to it. I believe this is a commendable initiative but we should also keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we parliamentarians are here to exert pressure on that Crown corporation to find solutions to this urgent problem. But on the other hand we must realize that all the responsibility does not rest with us but also and mostly with the management of the CN and its unions. So, Mr. Speaker, we will be happy to support the hon. member's motion.

[English]

Motion (Mr. McKenzie) agreed to.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I should like to join other members of the House in congratulating the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) on the acceptance of his important amendment this evening. His first motion was not accepted, although he took the occasion to express the main thrust of his argument particularly as it related to the financial needs of those concerned. My hon. friend has worked very hard and single mindedly for pensioners in Canada and he certainly deserves the credit he has been given.

This is not the first occasion on which the CNR has been before parliament in connection with the reorganization of its capital structure or for the purpose of debt revision. Admittedly, this legislation is quite complicated, and it spent approximately one month at the committee stage. Witnesses brought excellent testimony to the committee. The evidence we received reveals some very deep concerns among some sectors of the transportation industry, especially the trucking industry, in spite of the verbal assurances of the minister and of the president of the CNR that this bill will in no way give the CNR leverage to abuse its powers in terms of affecting the balance of competition. This is one of the main concerns of the Canadian Trucking Association.

We on this side of the House have a great deal of sympathy for the trucking industry in connection with this legislation. The industry made a series of recommendations, which I will not bother reading into the record tonight because of the shortness of time. In any event, the concerns of the industry were expressed eloquently, and those concerns seemed to run through the general course of our committee study of this bill.

The committee meetings brought out the fact that there are still many unknowns about the impact of this legislation. We on this side of the House are concerned about government involvement and participation in the transportation sector. It is important that there be equal treatment for all modes of transportation. That question was never dealt with to our satisfaction during the committee proceedings. In our view this bill could distort the competitive balance which exists in the transportation industry. A paramount rule to which we should adhere is that participation must be on the basis of equality for all modes of transportation. We see in this legislation a possible violation of that basic, fundamental policy.

To date the hearings have failed to convince members of the Conservative party of the need for this bill in terms of the public interest. It seems to us that this bill is an exercise in financial manipulation. In our attempts to tighten up control and accountability from a parliamentary point of view we have basically failed. There was an amendment, however, which was accepted and which would have the effect of ensuring that annual reports of the CNR would be automatically referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

It seems to us that it would have been advisable to wait for the legislative package with respect to Crown corporations which will, presumably, be introduced, before proceeding with a bill of this magnitude which would have the impact of restructuring the capital arrangements of one of our biggest Crown corporations.

The bill sets out to do a number of things. First, it would eliminate the necessity of the government to purchase the 4 per cent preferred shares which amount to roughly $80 million based upon 3 per cent of the gross revenue of the national system. Second, it would eliminate the necessity of the federal treasury having to meet the deficits which arise from time to time. The third point is that the bill would bring about a reduction in the debt, which is now in the neighbourhood of 62 per cent in terms of the company itself. The passage of this bill would adjust that debt somewhere near the level of 42 per cent, which would be precisely the same level as that of Canadian Pacific. The conversion of the $808 million of debt into equity would then place the CNR on a par with the average of the industry. On the other hand, $808 million worth of public money is being written off.

Of the profits after deductions, 20 per cent will go to the treasury, and we are told that over the next five years the government or the federal treasury will be roughly $135 million better off than it is at the present time.

We have also been told that this bill will improve management morale. That is questionable, especially when one views the CNR in relation to VIA Rail, which is just in the process of getting started. Hon. members are beginning to hear about employee concern regarding the transition which is taking place from the passenger services of Canadian National to the VIA Rail corporation.

Many issues have been raised during the rather lengthy debate on Bill C-17. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, has raised an issue regarding pensions. He is deeply concerned about that, but that is only one issue.

In order to follow some of the history of the recapitalization of this corporation one has to go back and look at the financial system of the CNR which was outlined before the recapitalization in 1952. If we go back and look at that outline we find the main purpose for recapitalization. That outline shows very clearly and categorically the position of the CNR before recapitalization and after recapitalization.

For the information of the House, it has to be noted that after recapitalization in 1952 the CNR had a debt equity ratio of some 32.7 per cent to 67.3 per cent, precisely the same as the CPR at that particular time. We are now doing the same thing again. We are adjusting the debt equity ratio of the CNR to correspond with the debt equity ratio of the CPR, and the debt equity ratio of the CPR is in the neighbourhood of 42 per cent.

In the committee it was revealed that if the CNR had been taking depreciation over the intervening years, its losses would have been about $24 million per year over 30 years, if we amortize over that many years. Had the CNR actually been claiming that depreciation, the government would have been reimbursing those amounts annually. Therefore, the equity position of the company would have been that much better. The central point here is that if the CNR had come to the government or to parliament for $24 million additional dollars every year, that naturally would have enlarged its total deficit for each particular year. The main point is that the company would have had to come every year for that amount of money, and it would have had to account for the money. Hence, there would have been some control and parliamentary accountability. Instead we are giving the company $808 million at this one time.

Perhaps in its wisdom at that time parliament would have said to the CNR, "Just a minute." Perhaps we would not have had to have the CN tower. Perhaps we do not need to spend the money which is presently being spent on shopping centres and other allied ventures not directly related to the operations of a transportation system. If we had had parliamentary control on a yearly basis, I think the CNR would not have been so far removed from the public, and the large deficit we are talking about writting off today possibly would not have had to be written off in this year, 1978.

I want to review and place on the record the CNR profit figures because I think it is important to keep these figures in perspective. We have been told—and this has been confirmed—that without recapitalization in 1977 there was a profit of $28 million. In 1978, after some adjustments and after new factors have been taken into consideration with respect to a very successful first quarter, the CNR will probably show a profit of some $28 million. That is without recapitalization. In 1979 the CN has projected a profit of $6.2 million. Incidentally, these are CN's own figures. In 1980 it has projected a profit of $117.6 million; in 1981, a profit of $113.1 million; and in 1982, a profit of $141.3 million. All of these figures are based on the present financial structure of the CNR.

With recapitalization, the 1978 profit figures could reach $68.3 million; the 1979 profit figures could reach $136.7 million; the 1980 profit figures, $192.6 million; the 1981 profit figures, $215.5 million; and in 1982, we could see a projected profit of $267.8 million. Once again, these are the CN's own profit projections.

If we take into consideration that there will be a possible adjustment to the statutory rate, some adjustment in respect of Newfoundland transportation problems, which is the subject of a royal commission study at this time, and the impact of an adjustment in the Crow rate, the 1978 profit figures with recapitalization would reach $130.1 million, as compared to $68.3 million. In 1979 the figure would reach $193.8 million, and it moves up to a figure of $294.2 million in 1982, at which time the CN would be in a tax bracket that would subject it to $116 million of federal income tax. This would be because by that point all the deferred income tax would be exhausted. With that payment of $116 million in taxes, it would still be showing a profit of $238.1 million. Based on CN's figures, it will be a very, very profitable corporation.

There is nothing wrong with a Crown corporation being very profitable, but the fact is that the corporation would be in a good financial position without this recapitalization bill. At the present time, the CNR seems to have a great deal going for it. In fact, before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, some people indicated that CN had too much going for it. We talk about the fact that CN is getting out of passenger service, which will have a direct effect on its earning capacity. Because of pressure brought to bear by the House of Commons, we are continuing to purchase hopper cars for the movement of grain by both CN and CP. There is a continuing consolidation and rationalization process ongoing in western Canada regarding grain handling systems.

This process has the effect of reducing the costs of doing business. We have the potential of some adjustment to the Crowsnest Pass rate. There is the impact of the provisions of the budget, an additional 6 per cent depreciation for the purchase of equipment. All in all, the CNR, with or without this bill, appears to have a rather bright economic future, provided the management of the company remains intact and is constantly on top of all phases of its operations.

We must take the position as a party that this bill is not really needed at this time. At least, it should be postponed until some of the proposed government measures are more widely known. There are many variables at the present time that should have a considerable impact on the total consideration of this piece of legislation. Until such a time as the full impact of these other developments are felt, it would be sheer irresponsibility on our part to pass this bill and give it our full support. Therefore, we recommend that the bill not be proceeded with. Because of CN's financial recovery, the prospect of its moving out from under passenger deficits and the grain handling deficits, another recapitalization should be delayed until such time as the impact of these factors can be assessed properly.

As representatives of Canadians, we must ask ourselves a number of questions. What benefit will accrue to the Canadian public from the passage of this bill? What guarantees do we have that we will not have more CN towers, shopping centres and investment in ventures not necessarily related to the transportation system? What guarantees do we have that we will have a better service? What assurance is there that the service will be more efficient and effective, particularly in those areas where there is a great need for improvement? What assurance do we have that the passage of this bill and the giving of this $808 million bonanza to the CNR will improve grain transportation and maritime rail services, just to name two? Furthermore, what guarantee do we have that additional funds will not distort and disrupt the competitive balance which was such a prominent issue during committee proceedings?

In conclusion, let me point out that we have had extensive hearings on this matter. Questions have arisen which have not been answered fully, in our opinion. Essentially we are concerned about the long term impact of this bill. We genuinely believe that it is not required at this time. We believe the bill should be delayed. My colleagues and I cannot support Bill C-17 at this time.

Because of this, I should like to move:

That Bill C-17, an act to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak to the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta). In my opening remarks, I should like to compliment the incumbent president of the CNR on the very complete job which he has done. He has managed to take what historically has been a very costly Crown corporation and turn it around. I guess the CNR is the grand-daddy of all Crown corporations.

Back in 1975, the CN had a loss of $16 million. It was brought from that point to a profit position of $11.7 million in 1976 and $28 million in 1977.

The hon. member for Lisgar put an analysis of a five-year profit projection on the record. That is a valid projection which must be considered by all hon. members of the House in order for them to understand our reasons for feeling that this matter should be hoisted for six months. In fact, there is no immediate need for it.

● (2142)

The incumbent president has done a very creditable job when one considers what he started with. He has shown abilities that exist in few men. I might also say that now that the annual income of the president of the competing organization, the CPR, is known, it is obvious the president of the CNR is very badly underpaid. The House and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) should bring his salary up to the level of those few men we see in our lives who have the ability and the capability of directing large organizations such as this.

Since being a member I have been quite active on the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and on behalf of my party I have done quite a bit of study. I have had the opportunity of getting to know many of the aspects of both our major railroads. I have been very pleased with the spirit of technology and excitement which appears to exist within the research section, management, the freight section and the people involved in the new technology the CNR is putting in place.

The point was ably made by my colleague the hon. member for Lisgar that the railroad has been turned around. It is showing a potential, with its present balance sheet structure and its present management, to earn a profit and become the pride not only of management and the employees of that Crown corporation but of the shareholders of the Corporation, the people of Canada, whose spokesmen sit in this House.

Historically, for each dollar of revenue the Canadian Pacific Railway has it operates at a cost of 91 cents. Historically, prior to the incumbent management of the CNR, for each dollar of revenue it has operated at a cost of $1.01. We have seen a tremendous improvement, to the credit of Dr. Bandeen.

One of the other reasons for this improvement, and I want to emphasize them, is that the government is in the process of removing substantial burdens, probably political burdens, which the CNR has historically carried. The Newfoundland railroad system would appear to be under study and potentially is to be removed as a burden of cost on the CNR. The Crowsnest rates referred to in the Hall report appear to be under study.

To me it seems quite obsolete to carry on with that kind of pressure on the proprietary operations of a Crown corporation such as the CNR. There will be direct subsidy payments involved there, instead of the operating loss being against the railroad, requiring further subsidy. The government is also involved in underwriting the capital for the hopper cars for this railroad, thus removing that burden. The passenger aspect of the railroad is being removed and put into VIA. That should remove $50 million in costs from its operations. There have been massive appropriations, something like $600 million, for roadbed improvements, and the government is attempting through this bill to remove something like $60 million in interest from the company's operating cost. With these aids the CNR has not only turned around, but is showing potential for substantial profits commensurate with its gross earnings.

I now have to raise a number of prime questions. What is the level of profit we should expect from a Crown corporation, a proprietary corporation that is turning the corner and is moving into a very exciting new area of modernization and technology? How much profit is too much profit in a Crown corporation? Where will the earnings be applied and to what aspect of that operation will they be used? Who makes these decisions? Now that there are no appropriations of funds, and by reducing debt and giving it a ratio that allows it to go into money markets, what control do the shareholders, the people of Canada, or the Parliament of Canada, have over the decisions by its board, its chairman and its officers? These are serious questions today because we have had a whole series of examples in the last four years involving Crown corporations that appear to be operating out of control.

This is the third recapitalization the CNR has undergone. We just have to go back to the statement of the then minister of transport in June of 1952 when he was opening the debate on Bill C-308. Let me quote him as follows:

> ... in this measure we have gone a great distance to grant the CNR relief from the fixed charges and to bring them to a position not on a parallel with that of Class I railways of the U.S. or with that of the CPR for that matter, but to bring them to a more comparable basis.

In other words, back in 1952 we were talking about bringing the CNR to a more comparable basis, rather than about a class I railway, or even one comparable with that of the CPR. In the same speech the minister said:

> The intention of this formula is to lessen charges, to give more incentive to railway management and railway employees and to encourage the railway to earn greater gross revenues. If that can be done, a position should be arrived at which would free the Canadian National Railways from these large deficit operations.

That was back in June of 1952. Another aspect of the minister's opening statement was as follows:

> The interest which will be forgone on converted debt will be more than offset by the elimination of the requirement for the government to purchase CNR preferred shares.

Yet we heard the hon. member for Lisgar state that from 1952 to 1960 we had the obligation to purchase these shares, on a formula based on gross revenues, at 4 per cent. However, for some reason or other the government saw fit to carry on with the $80 million appropriation to the CNR. From 1960 onward there was no obligation at all to do so.

I would also like to remind the House that the CNR has received by way of capital revisions or other contributions from government in excess of $6 billion since the 1923 recapitalization. The CNR has been able to borrow from the federal treasury for both short and long term debt at interest rates at least 2 per cent cheaper than anybody else can borrow in Canada. It has had an awful lot of advantage from the businessman's point of view. It has really not been capitalized, and I really have to question whether the leverage it has been given of three recapitalizations, and the appropriations it has received, has been used with frugality.

A very important member of my family to me spent his whole lifetime serving the CNR. I can remember the time when the Gordon philosophy was: "Borrow all you can because you never have to pay it back." Yet if we go back to the 1972 Benson tax act we get into this stupid philosophy of "a buck is a buck is a buck," trying to get at those in the private sector who have to work under some degree of frugality. Please excuse me if I get a little uptight when I see this type of resource managed loosely, abused or not managed in a true business sense, because every time there is a dollar of waste in the system it is at the expense of distributing that which is available for everybody.

I criticize Crown corporations and the government system for waste, which I think is costing the Canadian people about one million man-years of work. Although this cost of waste within this system and within the discretionary aspect of the system is serious, it is infinitesimal compared to the waste which exists at large within the country. We are not going to start getting at that waste until we start calling on our Crown corporations and our government departments for some measure of financial management control and for some accountability. We must keep parliament in the position of continually reviewing and demanding performance from our departments, agencies and Crown corporations. This is why I feel privileged to speak to the motion of my colleague the hon. member for Lisgar.

If you look at the CNR statement, Mr. Speaker, you will find that it refers to a string of subsidiary companies. How effective are all these companies? I can remember when they were putting them together as a result of the 1952 recapitalization and they got their ratios in line with the CPR so that they could operate in the financial money markets of the country and the world. They immediately went on the wildest spending binge you could imagine. They got themselves into an expenditure of something like $1.8 billion; they ran their debt to something like $900 million in 1961, and by 1977 the debt of the CNR was $2.02 billion.

These figures are hard to comprehend, yet here we are getting into the same thing again of not having carefully put in place measures whereby we could control and put in place overviews on the financial management control systems of a Crown corporation such as this, measures where that Crown corporation is made accountable to parliament through one of the committees that is equipped with research staff to handle it. Are we back into a repeat of the 1952 recapitalization by cancelling this calculated, mysterious $808 million that was found in a depreciation account and which should have been cancelled but was not? Now they want it cancelled to give that Crown corporation debt ratios that are the same as the CPR once again. Are we not going to call for some measure of accountability so that we do not get into another runaway mess where they buy everything in town?

If we start to review what they did following that recapitalization, pretty well overnight, and in at least half the time taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway, they converted their steam plant and all of their steam engines to diesel. The problems they had on their balance sheets during that period were unbelievable. On the other hand, the Canadian Pacific Railway phased out their steam engines as they were depreciated, just as Canadian Pacific phases out its flying equipment—it is depreciated and then they bring on stream and put into its plant new equipment, thereby using a proper depreciation method.

I am very nervous at what the government is doing in this bill, and I think that I have good reason to be. This recapitalization in 1978 is bringing about ratios again that will open up the doors of the private financial institutions, and then what is going to happen? We are going to go in with a briefcase and we are going to come out with a truckload of money. What kind of pressure is this going to put on the private sector? It is going to increase interest rates and reduce the over-all credit that is available.

We already have the Export Development Corporation talking about borrowing billions of dollars, and there does not seem to be an understanding of what costs will be incurred in the future, what speculative risks we are getting into with corporations like CNR and EDC when they have unlimited borrowing capacity in the private sector market. How much speculation is involved in borrowing in Arabia, Switzerland or in the United States with the variable exchange rate that we have? Is there to be no accountability to parliament or to the committees that are trained to oversee these things? Are we just going to give carte blanche approval and authority to a corporation whose management could change and then we have another runaway situation to be debated 10 or 20 years down the road on another recapitalization? That would be to our everlasting shame.

The company is in good shape now. It has overcome its problems and is earning a profit. It does not need this cancellation of a phony $808 million debt in order to get back to ratios that allow it to sweep up the closets of the banks. Apparently CN is not prepared to earn its ratios. It wants big daddy, this government, to keep giving it ratios, as it will do now for the third time.

What is going to be the rate at which they indulge in new capital expenditures? I have not seen anywhere in this booklet current budgets, medium-term budgets, five-year budgets and long-term budgets to show its spending projections. Is the government, on behalf of the people of Canada, asking this corporation in this 1978 recapitalization to give us some projections and some commitment that this is where we are going and what we are going to do? They have already had a big stimulus to their cash flow in the recent budget by having the depreciation allowance increased from 6 per cent to 14 per cent. This is all working capital that is available to them now out of earnings. Why are they rushing for this? Could it be there is some kind of a deal with the CPR that we are going to put the CNR in a position where its profits are going to be so big it has no choice but to cut rates? Is it going to be possible for trucking lines and subsidiary companies in the marketplace to be able to compete with the CNR under this new structure?

These are questions that we have to sit down and talk about, think about and get back into committee where we can get some answers. Let us have some five-year, medium-term budget projections and find out what the long-term goals are. Let us see what the new objectives are for the CNR. Without that we are on a very dangerous wicket tonight if we allow this bill to go through, instead of waiting another six months to have some of these questions answered.

Nothing is going to change for the CNR. They are in good shape; they are doing a good job and they have things going for them right now. They do not need this bill right now. When we did the same thing for Air Canada, they immediately turned around and bought up another airline, or tried to. I hope they do not get it. They cry about the burden on their operating system by having feeder lines out that they have to operate in too lavish a manner, with all this most expensive equipment and staffing in outlying airports; but independent lines get along with farm tractors and wagons and do not get involved in all this malarkey of high overhead and everything else.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—NEGOTIATIONS ON PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT VALLEY, B.C.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that I have to be raising this issue again tonight. The issue that I raise is the potential flooding of the Skagit River valley in British Columbia by the raising of a dam on the American side by Seattle City Light. It is regrettable that I have to raise this matter in the House of Commons of Canada because, despite the fact that hardly any Canadian would for one minute tolerate the flooding of this valley to supply power for the city of Seattle—which is in the state of Washington, United States of America—this issue is not yet resolved.

On November 2, 1973 this House very graciously co-operated with me as an opposition member and unanimously endorsed the following motion:

● (2202)

That the House of Commons of Canada is unalterably and unanimously opposed to the flooding of the Canadian Skagit River valley which will result from the proposed city of Seattle project to raise the height of the present Ross dam situated in the state of Washington and downstream from the Canada-United States border; and

That this House further resolves that the government of Canada deliver the text of this resolution forthwith to the government of the United States of America, the government of the state of Washington, and the council of the city of Seattle.

I want to make it abundantly clear that the issues which have led to this complex and difficult situation, so far as the relations between this country and the United States of America are concerned, are not easy to comprehend. They stem from an order made by the International Joint Commission in 1941 which purported to give to the city of Seattle the right to raise the water on the United States side, which would flood the Canadian side.

There are many serious difficulties which arise when one considers whether that order was valid, but we are in the dilemma of not having a court to which we can take those difficulties. As a consequence, and to make a long and complicated story shorter, the issue now is how we can stop the flooding and at the same time try to provide to our friends in the United States some of the power they say they need in the Pacific Northwest.

That has been the dilemma until reports started to come from the British Columbia Hydro Corporation—which is a publicly owned utility—indicating that we may very well have in British Columbia a significant surplus of power. We know now that certainly the state of Idaho is interested in some of that surplus power. As good neighbours we should consider whether we can provide some of it to them.

The committee that has opposed the flooding of the Skagit River has written to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) asking, in view of the fact we are now going to be in a surplus power position in the province of British Columbia, what co-operation the federal government will offer through the National Energy Board if British Columbia sells this surplus power to our American friends—and they are our friends. The committee suggested that some attempt should be made by the federal authorities in Canada to exercise pressure on the state of Washington and the city of Seattle for a reasonable and fair resolution of the dispute between Canada, the province of British Columbia, the state of Washington and the city of Seattle over this river valley flooding.

Keeping in mind that this House has stated that we are unalterably opposed to the flooding of the river valley, in all fairness and decency perhaps we should make some attempt to provide our American friends—and we who live in British Columbia and are very close to them consider them our friends—with some of the power they need.

● (2207)

The question which I put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a couple of weeks ago was as follows: What steps is the government of Canada prepared to take in terms of its ongoing negotiations with the government of the United States to make sure that its position is made clear to the officials of Seattle City Power and Light Company? Because—and I say this through you, Mr. Speaker, to all members of the House—there is no way that British Columbia will accept the flooding of this river valley and there is no way that Canada, our proud country, should accept that flooding.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the current controversy over the flooding of the Skagit valley results from the fact that in 1942, over thirty years ago, the International Joint Commission approved the application submitted by the Seattle City Power and Light Company to raise the height of the Ross dam in the state of Washington, which would have resulted in the flooding of some 5,000 acres of land on the Canadian side. The commission approved this application, provided the city of Seattle and British Columbia agreed on the compensation to be paid to the province, which they did in 1967. Since then, efforts to block this project have been made by people concerned about the environment. Of course, the possibility exists that this project may be blocked or delayed by U.S. administrative red tape, but we remain convinced that the best way to solve this problem is through direct negotiations between the parties involved, namely British Columbia and the city of Seattle. Besides, the American government is also of that opinion. Over a year ago British Columbia started negotiating directly, offering electricity produced by the province in exchange for cancellation of the project. Those negotiations were interrupted last fall for the Seattle mayoralty election, but it would seems that they will soon resume.

Twice, my hon. colleague from Vancouver South alluded to it a while ago, in November 1973 and in 1977, the House voted unanimously against the destruction of that important part of our natural heritage. That threat has been the subject of lengthy discussions between representatives of both countries, as well as between Prime Minister Trudeau and President Ford at the end of 1974, our government trying to create an atmosphere conducive to a negotiated settlement.

The Secretary of State of External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) recently received a letter from the Ross committee advising him of its suggestions with regard to current negotiations. The latter are now being looked into very seriously. Generally speaking, we are quite pleased with the events mentioned by the hon. member because they improve chances of reaching a negotiated settlement, and we are willing to do everything in our power to achieve that objective. We are convinced, on the other hand, that as in all our relations with the United States, those negotiations must go on in an atmosphere of confidence and harmony, and rest on a sound understanding of the mutual interests of our two countries.

[English]

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—PROPOSED REMOVAL OF EMPLOYEES FROM CHURCHILL, MAN.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak about the National Research Council pulling 18 families out of Churchill, Manitoba. I brought up this matter first under Standing Order 43 on April 3, and again in the question period on April 24 in a question to the minister responsible.

What has happened is that over a period of some 30 years we have seen the building up of Churchill, which started in 1946 with the coming of the armed services to Churchill, and then the building of Fort Churchill. After a period of some 30 years, the government decided to dismantle Fort Churchill and to help redevelop the town of Churchill. The redevelopment cost some $50 million which was shared by the provincial and federal governments. Following the completion of the redevelopment, the federal government withdrew its services from Churchill. The CBC will be leaving Churchill in the month of June. The corporation has 12 people working at that station.

Now the National Research Council, which has 22 families in Churchill, and is responsible for the space research program there, is also partly moving out. Of the 22 NRC families, 18 will be moving to Gimli, Manitoba, probably this fall. That is the plan of the department. They are going to move the 18 families to Gimli, Manitoba. They can no longer afford to keep them in Churchill.

I asked the department why they could no longer afford to keep them there. It is because of the housing subsidy that the National Research Council and space program must pay to Treasury Board, $10,000 per family. With 22 families, that equals $220,000 a year. They say that the money being spent on the housing subsidy can be used in the space research program. However, I feel the federal government has an obligation to keep these families in Churchill. I do not believe the federal government should be able to go into a community, spend $50 million redeveloping and rebuilding it, and then slowly withdraw all of the federal government services.

With regard to the armed services, it has been clarified that 35 families will remain in Churchill. However, many of them will be transferred this summer. I suspect they will be replaced by single people. Therefore, the community will shrink that much more.

Part of the redevelopment in Churchill was a complex which cost $11 million. There are only 1,500 people left in Churchill. I am really concerned for these people who now have an albatross hanging around their necks. It costs $1 million per year to maintain this $11 million recreation complex. Those 1,500 people cannot afford to keep up that facility. Therefore, I feel the National Research Council and the federal government have an obligation to continue their services and to keep the 22 families connected with the space program in Churchill.

What will this do to the town of Churchill? When the business people there saw the redevelopment take place, they thought that if the government had enough interest in Churchill to put in $50 million, there must be some future for that town. Many businessmen expanded their facilities. They now see the slow withdrawal of government services from their town.

What will happen to the government housing that the National Research Council now occupies? Eighty per cent of the housing in Churchill belongs to the federal government. This is almost new housing, built some two and a half years ago. There are no other federal government agencies to fill these quarters. Are they to remain empty?

At the present time, the federal government will not transfer any of this housing to the province. Many provincial people in Churchill are in need of housing now. Health and welfare are in need of accommodation for their clients, but they cannot touch this housing in Churchill.

The removal of these 18 families does not mean the space program will not continue. The plan is that when there are rocket launches to be conducted, the men and women involved will be flown to Churchill and they will stay in motels or hotels while the rocket launching is going on.

It is a well known fact that when these rocket launches take place, ideal weather conditions are required. Sometimes it is necessary to wait up to three weeks before launching one of the particular types of rockets they use. The National Research Council say they will save $220,000. I would like a breakdown of exactly what they will save. I do not believe they will save $220,000 by transferring these families out of Churchill.

I repeat, the federal government has an obligation to keep government services in Churchill and not hang this albatross of $1 million required to maintain the recreation complex around the necks of the few who are left.

• (2217)

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the National Research Council operates the Churchill research range for the prime purpose of launching scientific sounding rockets. Since taking over the operation of the range in 1965, NRC has adjusted the level of manning for operations and maintenance to fit changing circumstances. The resident range staff, which is provided under contract, has been reduced in stages from 220 in 1965 to the present small staff of 22. The main reason for staff reductions has been a steadily declining scientific interest in launching rockets in the auroral zone. The decline in the scientific use of Churchill is attributable to an increased emphasis on the use of scientific satellites, a shift in scientific interest to locations outside the auroral zone, and to curtailed budgets.

The trend in scientific programs brought about by these factors continues to be evident. The Canadian space science program will require so few rockets to be launched from Churchill, in comparison to the number of launches from temporary sites in other locations in Canada, that NRC can no longer justify retaining the launching staff permanently in Churchill. It is therefore planned to make the operation of NRC's facilities 25 per cent more cost effective by relocating the contractor's Churchill staff in Gimli. In addition, the same staff will take over the launching of scientific balloons, most of which are used in the southern part of the prairie provinces. It is thus even more important to have the technical staff located further south. However, Churchill will still be used and after 1979 there will be a small resident caretaking staff retained in Churchill. Scientists and technicians will visit the community for varying periods each year.

Under the circumstances, NRC considers the movement of up to 18 families out of Churchill to be unavoidable. The alternative of leaving the staff in Churchill would have the effect of making the operation of NRC's space research facility in western Canada unduly cumbersome and consequently inefficient and too expensive. The extra cost of retaining an all-year-round facility at Churchill would result in an even smaller scientific program, and the discontinuance of Canada's space science projects using rockets and balloons would be a real possibility. It is in the face of these considerations that NRC is planning the reconfiguration of facilities which regrettably involves the movement of families out of the town of Churchill.

Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that the party opposite, which so often criticizes us for overspending and employing too many people, should, when the government tries to be cost-effective in spending the taxpayers', money, turn around and criticize us for doing that, too.

FISHERIES—REPAIR OF FOREIGN VESSELS IN CANADIAN SHIPYARDS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on February 1, I asked the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) the question whether the government intended to change its policy with respect to permitting fishing vessels to be repaired in Canadian ports. I want to say a few words of praise for the minister in this regard because on April 6 he issued a statement to the effect that the government had changed its policy, which formerly prohibited foreign vessels from using Canadian ports to purchase supplies, exchange crews and undertake major repairs. That policy was changed as a result of the extension of the coastal fishing limit to 200 miles.

Ever since I was elected 20 months ago I have been trying to get the Newfoundland dry dock in St. John's put on a sound basis. This is a very important industry in St. John's. It employs 200 men and women and it used to suffer a loss every year. It is owned by the government but operated by Canadian National for the Government of Canada. They have been losing money there but last year, under the inspired managership of Mr. Albert Burgess and with the co-operation of the employees, they broke even.

One of their problems is that they have only one graving dock and once that dock has vessels on it you cannot take the vessels off and put other vessels on it until that vessel is finished, which means having to turn away business. Last year they turned away, I think it was, 12 vessels because the dock was occupied. They could not wait for the vessels on the dock to be finished. Now the Minister of Fisheries has agreed that foreign fishing trawlers can be repaired in Canadian ports.

At my urging and working with the minister he did agree for the Newfoundland dockyard people to go to Russia several months ago to renew negotiations with the Russians that had started in 1974, because the U.S.S.R. wanted to have their vessels repaired in St. John's, Newfoundland. If this deal goes through, there will be 60 Russian fishing vessels a year being repaired in the dockyard at St. John's, a tremendous boost in employment. It will require 200 more men, bringing the labour force there up to at least 500. It would, of course, mean a lot of new business. It would bring gross revenue up to $13 million—that is the estimate—from $7.2 million last year, and it will be a great thing not just for the CN dock but for ancillary industries in St. John's, and even as far as Marystown where the shipyard there will get additional work. I visualize St. John's, Mr. Speaker, and Newfoundland as being a marine service centre for the North Atlantic, which is what it can and should be with hundreds of fishing trawlers out there from foreign nations needing work done.

So I am pleased with the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. He has been very co-operative. He has changed the policy now. He has permitted our dockyard to enter these negotiations, which look promising. Two Russian vessels are today in the dockyard at St. John's on a trial basis to see what the costs would be as part of this negotiation, and I am very hopeful.

But for this to go through and succeed, Mr. Speaker, something else is needed. This dockyard needs what is called a syncro-lift. Anyone who has visited a dockyard in the modern age, in the last 10 or 15 years, will know what that means. That is a piece of equipment that can lift ships out of the water, and they can be repaired and moved on this syncro-lift. It is not like a graving dock. The ships can be moved and left, and then the lift can be used again to take another ship from the water. What is needed to make it possible for this Russian contract to go through is a synchro-lift to be able to carry a 4,000 ton vessel. In that way all the work on these trawlers can be done on the syncro-lift. Larger vessels can be done on the graving dock, and they will then be equipped to handle the Russian contract; but they cannot handle this prospective Russian contract and other foreign trawlers without first acquiring a syncro-lift, which is going to cost $8 million.

On March 21 the dockyard wrote the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) requesting that the government finance the $8 million syncro-lift extension. It will take 18 months to complete the work. The work should start this spring—certainly by July—because the Russian contract could then start the beginning of 1980. We have been waiting since March 21 for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to get the okay from the government to spend this $8 million.

Now, it is a government-owned shipyard. It is situated in an area of heavy unemployment. The only way we can get these Russian contracts and other contracts is through this syncro-lift. It is a natural, and I am sure the minister is going to come through and give his approval. I am sure because earlier this year the federal government approved $5 million to be spent on the Esquimalt graving dock in British Columbia. It was $12 million all together; $5 million on craneage and $7 million to refurbish existing dock services. The minister approved a million and a half for the design of a floating dock for the Port of Vancouver. He approved $1.7 million for a drydock now under construction at Les Mechins in Quebec. He approved new craneage valued at $5 million at the federally-owned Champlain Dock in Lauzon, Quebec. Of course, there is no reason why the minister wouldn't do in Newfoundland what he is doing in Quebec and what he is doing in British Columbia, particularly when it makes good economic sense.

Now, if the minister didn't do it, if somehow or other this decision is not made to go ahead, then, Mr. Speaker, you will not be hearing tones of sweet reasonableness from the hon. member for St. John's West. There will be such a berserk and vicious attack on the government that the government will fall because of the volume of that alone. But I know that is not going to happen. The Minister of Fisheries has been very co-operative. I have no reason to believe that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will not be because it makes good economic sense; and in an area of high unemployment, Mr. Speaker, we want a successful dockyard that will employ 200 additional people directly. This will have ripple effects throughout the Avalon area, even down to Marystown.

So, Mr. Speaker, tonight I am calling on the government to make a quick decision. It is going to take 18 months to do the work, so we should start now.

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to the hon. member from the east coast. You never know when you come in whether he is carrying a shotgun loaded for bear or a shotgun loaded for duck. Having come prepared for a shotgun loaded for bear I suppose I now have to change around and shoot for ducks!

● (2227)

First of all, I should like to thank the hon. member for his very kind praise of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). At the present time our minister is very efficient and very excellent. That praise is well deserved. This indicates to the House and to the people of the east coast the type of approach the government takes in honouring its commitments to those citizens.

As Your Honour and the hon. member knows, prior to the implementation of the 200-mile limit, foreign fleets were in direct and very strong competition with Canadian fishermen for the stocks off Canada's coasts. One of the few competitive advantages our fishermen had at that time was the geographical advantage of being close to those fishing banks. Our port policy was intended to protect this advantage and to minimize the assistance given to foreign fleets off our coast.

With the advent of the 200-mile limit, it has been found that the fleets are fishing now only for the surplus within our zone. Of course, they are being closely licensed and controlled. Accordingly, the need for a restrictive port policy disappeared with the advent of the 200-mile limit. Since the expansion of port privileges is a major bargaining lever with foreign fishing fleets, it can be used to our advantage.

Under the terms of our bilateral agreements with those nations fishing within Canada's fisheries zone, we have agreed to examine the possibility of extending co-operation in various areas. This co-operation includes the question of transfer and exchange of crews while vessels are in port. That was mentioned by the hon. member tonight.

Recently the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment announced that he would be prepared to permit the exchange of crews. I might add that the minister's decision has been communicated to the minister of industrial and rural development of Newfoundland, with very delightful results. Currently the minister is reviewing the entire question of the use of Canadian ports by foreign vessels, fishing vessels in particular. We must ensure that the increased use of Canadian facilities does not proceed at the expense of our fishermen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

REQUESTED WITHDRAWAL OF SALES TAX ON SMOKE DETECTION EQUIPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Over the past week, in Toronto, we have been told that 12 people lost their lives due to fire. I do not feel we should stand idly by without taking some positive action. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That the Government of Canada withdraw the federal sales tax on smoke detectors and smoke detection equipment.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED INCURSION INTO ANGOLA BY SOUTH AFRICAN TROOPS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I address my question to the acting secretary of state: it concerns the situation in Angola, the overnight developments. While the reports of the operation differ, there seems to be little doubt now that South African troops did cross the border into Angola. Would the minister, first of all, clarify the nature of this operation? Also, in light of the strong criticism which the United States has levelled against South Africa, can the minister say what the Canadian reaction is?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to add very much detail, except to tell the hon. member that we have asked our embassy in Capetown to tell the government of South Africa that Canada is deeply concerned about this military incursion into the territory of a neighbouring sovereign state. We are particularly concerned that this activity should have occurred at a time when negotiations are taking place with the object in mind of achieving a peaceful solution in Namibia.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, the negotiations concerning Namibia have been described as reasonable middle-ground for both parties to seek. What is the effect on the negotiations which have been advanced by Canada, along with its partners on the Security Council representing the western nations? What is the effect of those proposals now, in light of the overnight developments of South Africa invading Angola?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is a little premature to assess the certainty of the effect on these negotiations, but it can only be unsettling. It is a time when restraint ought to be exercised, rather than military activity of this kind, in order to achieve the success of the negotiations.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, the time has come for Canada to clarify the meaning of the announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on December 19, to the effect that "Canada is going to withdraw government-sponsored, commercially-supported activities in South Africa." What has been the effect of that announcement?

I ask this question in light of the meeting of the external affairs committee yesterday during which the committee was told that Canada, with respect to the code of conduct which was one part of the follow-up to the announcement of December 19, has no way of knowing what the conditions are for the black workers employed by Canadian companies in South Africa. There is no way of knowing what those conditions are, so there is no way of knowing whether the code is effective. Can the acting secretary of state clarify the real effect of the step Canada took on December 19 to cut commercial relations with South Africa?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the action taken by the government speaks for itself. Its effect is clear. I cannot add any further detail to the announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

STANDBY CREDIT THROUGH CITIBANK—SUGGESTION SOUTH AFRICAN BANKS INVOLVED

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance follows directly on the questions of my colleague. Given the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on December 19, that Canada is phasing out all its government-sponsored activities in South Africa, why is it possible for part of the standby credit the government is negotiating through Citibank to go to South African banks? Why did the minister say yesterday in committee that he did not put any restrictions whatsoever on where the money should come from?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised yesterday in committee. I said at that time that we are negotiating with a lead bank, that is, Citibank of New York. Of course, they have to gather the credit. I said I was going to look into this question. I am not in a position to answer at the moment. When the question was put to me in the House yesterday, I did not realize the meaning of the question. I am looking into that matter now and will report to the House.

TRADE WITH SOUTH AFRICA—ALLEGED CONTRADICTION IN GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I will put my supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It seems to me there is a direct contradiction here in government policy. On one hand, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the government is phasing out, and will not have, any operations with South Africa of a commercial nature. Yesterday, in committee, the Minister of Finance said, "We do not put any restriction on the people who should participate in the extension of credit."

Is it the policy of the government to have one set of standards for the private sector, and another set of standards for the government in its dealings with South Africa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No. Mr. Speaker, we do not want to have two sets of standards. I think the Minister of Finance is correct in saying that he will investigate this matter. I must say that as an uninformed amateur in what is being borrowed and the way it is being done, I cannot particularly see that a man who is going to borrow from somebody else and asks him to lend him money worries where that person is getting the money. This is in the nature, I would think, of a tertiary boycott: we are going to borrow from some people, then we are going to find out where they got the money from, who lent it to them, and so on.

It seems to me that in the nature of a commercial operation, you borrow money from a respectable lender and that should settle the matter, as far as I am concerned. However, I am prepared to be informed further by the inquiry that the Minister of Finance says he is going to embark upon.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I cannot follow that reasoning at all. Either the Government of Canada has a policy of not dealing in commercial transactions with South Africa, or it has not. The fact that the government is going out to borrow money would indicate to me that it has an obligation to make very clear whether it is dealing with South African commercial transactions or not. It seems to me that the fact the government needs the money should make no difference either way: we either have that policy, or we do not.

I ask if Citibank, the lead bank, is negotiating with South Africa or, to put it the other way, will the government instruct the lead bank in this standby credit not to deal with South African banks in the development of the resources?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member is making a case that the government should not be borrowing money from South Africa. In fact, the government is not borrowing from South Africa, if I understand it. I see the Leader of the Opposition has some thinking on this matter. I would be glad to hear from him, too; but for the moment I am speaking to his colleague on his left, through you, Mr. Speaker.

We are not borrowing from South Africa; we are borrowing from Citibank. Where Citibank gets the money is not an immediate problem to me. If it is to the hon. member, I would be interested in hearing argument. The Minister of Finance said he is going to look into that. I have risen in this House against the idea of tertiary boycotts. Maybe this is a case where the hon. member is suggesting this is the way we should proceed. We are borrowing from somebody who wants to lend to us. Do we have a right to say to this lender, "You should not be borrowing from such and such other people"?

Mr. Lawrence: You are telling the private sector that.

Mr. Trudeau: We are not telling the private sector that they cannot deal with companies dealing with South Africa. We never said that. We do not withdraw our trade services from a company that is dealing with a company in Brazil because it is discovered that the company in Brazil has dealings with South Africa. It seems to me that if we want to deal with both sectors in the same way, my reasoning is good.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—SHARED BENEFITS THEREUNDER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has just said that in terms of international borrowing he would describe himself as an uninformed amateur. Concerning the letter that he tabled yesterday which was sent to Premier Davis of Ontario on April 10, I can only say that in terms of automotive trade and his knowledge of the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement, the Prime Minister is also an uninformed amateur.

Considering that in the letter which was tabled yesterday he said, "The automotive agreement does not include a provision respecting 'fair shares' ", in terms of investment in jobs in the auto industry, and considering that clause (b) of article I of the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement reads as follows, "Both countries to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of the two countries", will the Prime Minister now admit that he misinformed and misled Premier Davis, because this clause which was put in at Canada's insistence in 1965 was put in to clearly state that the Government of Canada did not accept the free trade interpretation of the pact? Will the Prime Minister now admit he was clearly wrong?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that I misinformed Premier Davis. Surely that is one of the most ridiculous statements we have heard this Friday morning, and we have not heard too many yet. I wrote a letter to Premier Davis based on information that my officials gave me on the auto pact. The hon. member brings in the question of article I, subsection (a) about fair markets—

Mr. Broadbent: Fair shares.

Mr. Trudeau: —fair shares of markets. My letter, if I recall, refers to investment and development of the industry. I do not see any contradiction, but I agree with the hon. member that I am not an expert in the automobile trade. I know the agreement was put together by a Liberal government with the United States. I know that the former hon. member for Westmount was the minister at the time.

I know that it brought great benefit to the Canadian industry and to Canadian workers, I know that we have repeatedly tried to improve it, and I believe that the workers rely on this government to get the best possible deal out of the pact. As far as the wording of the letter is concerned, I defer to the hon. member's interpretation, but I just want to check whether he is right.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's disarming modesty at this point surely cannot stand as an acceptable answer. I remind the Prime Minister of the words he used in the letter tabled yesterday, "The automotive agreement does not include a provision respecting 'fair shares' ". Then the Prime Minister went on to talk about free trade. I just quoted to the Prime Minister a section of the pact that, if it means anything—I remind him that it was put in there at Canada's insistence—refers to sharing, " . . . participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market . . ." That is, both countries are to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expansion of the total market in the future.

I would ask the Prime Minister, considering he just said that he sees no contradiction between these two points, what could that mean in the auto pact? What could the Canadian negotiators have intended when they insisted that that clause be put in the pact, if they did not mean that it should pertain to future investment and future job-sharing so that Canadian workers would not end up being shortchanged by some 25,000 jobs as they now are?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's argument. "Fair share" can mean a fair share of the workers in the industry; it can mean a fair share of the sales; it can mean a fair share of the trade; it can mean a fair share of the revenue to the working population or to governments through taxation. I accept the hon. member's point, and I will look into it. I do not know, quite frankly, what the details of the auto pact are. Certainly, I do not think Premier Davis will take such a high-horse attitude about my trying to mislead him. I think he will read the letter, and if he has an argument, he will put it. I do not think the premier needs the hon. member to get indignant about my trying to mislead him.

● (1122)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to accept, without any exaggeration at all, what the Prime Minister is saying. He may well have been mistaken: that is fair enough. When he checks into the matter with the officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and finds, as I think he will, that he was misinformed about what the pact actually says, will he do what Prime Minister Pearson did in 1965 when the pact was first signed between him and President Johnson? The Government of Canada followed the signing of this pact by getting from the three principal automotive manufacturers letters of commitment which pertained to investment in Canada for the following three years. During that three-year period we got our share of investment.

Will the Prime Minister now take steps to ensure that the Government of Canada gets from the automotive industry a commitment for the next three years, so that we will once again get our share of investment which will produce the jobs we ought to get on this side of the border?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, or ought to know, that the government is constantly attempting to get a better deal in our trade with other countries, in all areas, including the automotive area. There is a pact: we have gone through successive phases in the application of this pact. I remember a time in this House not too many years ago when the Americans were complaining the Canadians were getting more then their fair share of the pact; I think it was when Mr. Connally was Secretary of the Treasury. They were talking about reopening the pact. The hon. member who was just speaking rose at that time and said, "How dare the government even talk about reopening the pact. We do not want to reopen it. It is working for us. We do not want it to be touched at all." Now that it is not working for us, he says we should touch it.

You cannot argue at one time that the pact is sacrosanct, as that party was doing, and at another time say we should seek to improve it all the time. A Liberal government brought in the auto pact, and we are constantly trying to get a better deal for Canadians through it. The Americans are trying to do the same for themselves. Obviously, the interests of Mr. Davis, the Premier of Ontario, and his government are the same. We want to get a better deal for Canadians. I will hear any reasonable argument from the hon. member indicating how that can be done. I just do not think it is sufficient to stand up and say we should get more than the Americans. The problem is, how can you get it in a better fashion?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

COMPENSATION TO QUEBEC FOR LOSS OF SALES TAX REVENUE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and concerns the Ottawa-Quebec conflict over the sales tax reimbursement.

As there is more and more agreement with the fact that Ottawa should respect the provincial jurisdiction over the sales tax and that it should therefore reimburse the province of Quebec the $186 million which is at the base of the present discussion which is going on through the media, is the right hon. Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance prepared to meet the premier or the minister of finance of Quebec to come to an agreement which would be in the spirit of the constitution, rather than trying to buy votes in Quebec by reimbursing each individual, as the latest rumours would have it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaks of respecting the constitution and adds that the sales tax comes under provincial jurisdiction. We wholeheartedly agree. That is why the Minister of Finance went to all provincial finance ministers saying: You have this tax, would you be willing to cut it if we reimbursed you? Nine provinces said yes. We never said that this tax came under our jurisdiction. We offered the provinces money to do something. Nine said yes, the tenth one, Quebec, gave no reply.

We never maintained and we do not maintain now that we have the power to lower the sales tax in Quebec. We only said that if Quebec agreed to do certain things, like the other provinces, we would give it money. If it does not want to go along, we certainly will not interfere in its jurisdiction. We will arrange for this money to go to Quebeckers through some other means. The hon. member seems to object to the fact that this money would go to individual Quebeckers, I do not know why; perhaps he could indicate it in a supplementary question.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

In his reply, the Prime Minister stated that he does not interfere in the provincial administration or in the provincial jurisdiction, but by laying down to the provinces a condition which is explicitly rejected by Quebec he is compelling Quebec and the other provinces to meet the requirements of the federal government. This is the central issue of all current discussions and disputes between Quebec and the federal government. It is a bad approach for future discussions on a new Canadian constitution. Now I am concerned about the dangers of giving directly all those funds to Quebec and this is the question which the Prime Minister asked me—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laprise: —he asked me to make myself clear on how to give those $186 million directly to Quebeckers. I say the federal government should give that money to Quebec in an envelope, for the province to manage as it is entitled to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is a new version of social credit. I thought their theory advocated giving money to the people but not to the government.

The hon. member spoke of the conditions or demands the federal government imposed. He did not understand what happened. We imposed no conditions. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), met his provincial counterparts. They all agreed that it would be a good idea to cut the sales tax, and I think the taxpayers agree with it too.

Now, Mr. Chrétien said to the provincial ministers: If you reduce your sales tax, that falls within your jurisdiction. We are not imposing any conditions nor making any demands. We say: How would you go about it? Let us discuss the matter. And seven provinces agreed with the formula suggested by Mr. Chrétien. Two others said: No, we do not agree with that formula, we will change it. Mr. Chrétien agreed with that. So the formula was changed for Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

The tenth province, always "La belle province", Quebec, replied: No, we have no answer to give to you. Go ahead with your budget, and we will let you know after. Mr. Chrétien brought down his budget, then Mr. Parizeau started "shadow boxing". He was going to hit in the mouth the guy who was no longer there. That is no way to negotiate.

FISHERIES

RESTRICTIONS ON FISHERMEN IN BAY OF FUNDY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Last week the Liberal Premier of Nova Scotia forwarded the right hon. gentleman a telegram protesting the arbitrary action of the federal government with regard to the imposition of federal restrictions on fishermen in the Bay of Fundy area. He has asked that all restrictions be lifted until settlement is reached between Canada and the United States over fishing rights on Georges Bank.

In view of the economic hardship created by what the premier has called high-handed and arbitrary tactics by the Minister of Fisheries, I ask the Prime Minister what action he proposes to take to rectify this unfortunate situation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been notified that the Minister of Fisheries is presently meeting with the directors general of fisheries for Newfoundland and the maritimes; he is meeting with them in Halifax. Perhaps the hon. member should make his concern known to the meeting there. I see the hon. lady from Kingston has something to say about fisheries, too. I shall be hearing her question as a supplementary, but for the time being I am answering her colleague, and maybe she could let me finish that answer.

I was telling the hon. member that the meeting is taking place now. Perhaps he was not informed of it. But I think the officials at the meeting should be told of the concerns of the hon. member. I am sure Mr. Regan's officials who are there will be able to express their point of view, but I am also sure they would be thankful to have the hon. member's help.

Mr. Crouse: I thank the Prime Minister for that answer, but I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that he mentioned consultations which I think he said were being held in Newfoundland, whereas the area in question concerns the fishermen in Digby, Nova Scotia. There is quite a bit of difference between the two provinces.

● (1132)

I raised this matter with the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment in this House on April 28. His reply was very brief and I will read it to the Prime Minister for background. He stated, "As for the complaint of the minister from Nova Scotia", that is, the minister of fisheries—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is on a supplementary question and I wonder if he would come to the question.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment implied that he was not interested in consultation with the minister of fisheries of Nova Scotia or with the Premier of Nova Scotia. Therefore, I am asking the Prime Minister whether he will undertake to discuss this very urgent matter with his Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and will he do so in the hope that the minister will consult, rather than confront, Nova Scotia's fishermen on a matter which could have direct and very important economic effects upon them and their livelihood?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I really have some difficulty understanding why the hon. member is making these representations to me when I have just said that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is meeting in Halifax with representatives from Newfoundland and the other maritime provinces. I think possibly the hon. member did not understand because the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands was making a lot of noise during my answer. However, I am now repeating it. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is meeting in Halifax with ministers and officials of the Nova Scotia government. Therefore, it seems to me that the hon. member is perhaps jumping on the minister's bandwagon by telling me that I should tell the minister what the minister is already telling people in Halifax.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED OVERPAYMENT OF BENEFITS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It has been reported in the press that about 15,000 Canadians have received unemployment insurance overpayments. These people are in the provinces of British Columbia, Quebec and Nova Scotia. The overpayments amount to about $4.3 million. Have figures regarding further overpayments come to the attention of the minister and, if so, were they directed to persons in provinces other than those I have named?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has the figures correct and the overpayments took place in the areas he has suggested.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell the House upon what basis these overpayments were made? Can the minister assure the House that the overpayments were not the result of cheating or ripping off the system on the part of the recipients of those overpayments?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. No, it was not the result of cheating or ripping off. It was a mistake, a human error made by an official in my department. We have found it out and we are taking action to correct it. It had to do with the extended benefit phase structure of the program but nothing to do with the individuals themselves. There was no ripping off; there was no cheating.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, if my information is correct, most of these overpayments go back to the year 1977. When the minister says the situation is being corrected, is it the intention of the government to collect this money back from the recipients who were overpaid and, if it is, what means is the government using, keeping in mind that some of these recipients are not in a position economically to meet a claim for overpayment which, as the minister has said, was certainly not their fault?

Mr. Cullen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are going to collect the money because it was an overpayment. We will do so imposing as little hardship as possible, given the fact that it was our mistake. We have written letters to the individual claimants informing them of our error, that we have to get the money back and that we will make whatever arrangements are necessary in order to impose as little hardship as possible.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CIRCULAR TO CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS RESPECTING POLITICAL ACTIVITY

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of National Revenue who I believe is the Minister of National Health and Welfare. With respect to the information circular of February 27, published under the authority of the Deputy Minister of National Revenue, dealing with the political activities of charities, has the minister had a chance to give consideration to this question?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the House that the minister, Senator Guay, has withdrawn circular 78-3—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: —and that it is going to be clarified after consultations with the various parties involved.

INSTRUCTIONS TO DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS RESPECTING CIRCULAR

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister who initiated this circular, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the testimony in committee this morning by the Minister of National Revenue to the effect that the circular put out was not the kind of circular he wanted and was, in fact, not even the kind of circular that the former minister wanted, would the minister say exactly what she had in mind when she instructed her officials to bring forward a circular outlining the political activities of charitable organizations in this country?

[Mr. Cullen.]

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not I must account for the portfolio I held previously, but I already—Do not get excited, keep quite!

I already said Wednesday afternoon in the House of Commons, as reported in Hansard, that when I was Minister of National Revenue, I received numerous representations from movements, mostly women's associations, pointing out to me that the legal interpretation did not allow social, cultural, educational and other movements which promote social change in our society to be registered for tax deduction purposes. So, I asked departmental officials to refer to foreign laws and practices in order to define what was acceptable in 1977 or 1978 as regards political activities and what was not for charitable purposes.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Minister of National Revenue. I would like to ask the acting minister, exactly what were the instructions given to the department which resulted in a circular being sent out which was not in accordance with the wishes of the current minister and which he says was not in accordance with the wishes of the former minister?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the hon. person opposite understands the way administration works—

An hon. Member: Do you understand it?

Miss Bégin: —when we update an interpretation bulletin. I do not recall in what month this happened, but I do not think this is a trial or that I have to give the exact date. It was during the time I was minister of national revenue. This circular is dated February, 1978, if my memory serves me well. I do not have a copy of it with me, but I had not been minister of national revenue for a few months. I gather that when the work of the small internal task force which worked on that was ready, it was presented for the approval of the deputy minister at the time who, by the way, has also changed.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The noisy ones over there should quieten down.

Mr. Clark: The minister has suggested that perhaps my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, does not understand administrative practices. What is clear from the minister's reply is one more indication that she and her colleagues do not understand the concept of ministerial responsibility. What she is trying to do is blame anonymous public servants for giving effect to an order which was given by a minister. What the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has asked, and what I ask now—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must ask the Leader of the Opposition to put a question.

Mr. Clark: I was putting a question, sir, but Your Honour was not able to hear me because of the shouting from across the way. The question put by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is of very real importance to this House. What, precisely, were the instructions of the minister which gave rise to the preparation by public servants of this circular?

● (1142)

Miss Bégin: The question, sir, was to update the circular in light of what Canadians want these days and what they have voted through this parliament as being charitable donations. We know so well what responsible government is that the circular has been withdrawn for clarification, after consultation with the parties concerned.

Mr. Clark: I wonder, just so we might be very clear as to what instructions were given, if the minister would agree to table in the House of Commons any written record or any transcript of a verbal instruction from her or from her successor to officials which gave rise to the preparation of this circular. May we have something more concrete than the word of the minister in this House?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: May we have the words which the minister gave to the public servants upon whom she is now proposing to settle the blame for this circular?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the Leader of the Opposition keeps talking of blame. There is no blame in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: We are talking of satisfying the Income Tax Act and recognizing what are appropriate charitable donations in the interface of political activities. I repeat that he is not very familiar with the administration, but everybody in this chamber who is an accountant by training would know that an interpretation bulletin is a bulletin sent to the trade for reaction, and we had plenty of reaction on this one—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: —and readjustment. We are now in the readjustment phase. We have not changed the text of the law without coming to the House, and we have not blamed any civil servants: they did their work very well. It seems to me that we, the politicians, are the specialists in political activity, and we are in the process of defining acceptable political activity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what we want the minister to do, and what she is apparently reluctant to do, is table in the House of Commons and make available for the scrutiny of parliament and the public of Canada the precise instructions she gave to her public servants. I would like her to do that. But my question now is the following. The minister has said that this document was withdrawn, or that they are withdrawing the circular. Is the policy stated in that circular still in effect, as her successor, the unavailable Minister of National Revenue, said it was when he appeared before the committee today?

Miss Bégin: The Income Tax Act is in effect and the jurisprudence behind it is in effect. The previous circular, if it has not been withdrawn—that, I do not know—is, of course, the one prevailing. The newer circular defining political activities has been withdrawn. The law stands the way it is. We will produce a new circular defining acceptable political activities and giving examples of non-acceptable political activities. May I repeat what I said about the administration, that a working session is a session around a table with some officials, the minister and eventually people of her staff, discussing ways of improving things for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: We are not blaming people here; that is the job of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BELL CANADA CONTRACT WITH SAUDI ARABIA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister: it is in connection with the Bell Canada contract with Saudi Arabia about which questions were asked several days ago. Is the Prime Minister aware that the statement of a non-business relationship with the State of Israel in the contract which Bell Canada signed would be completely prohibited in the United States under that country's anti-boycott laws, and would he undertake to see that the Government of Canada will at least direct that a similar course of action be followed by Canadian companies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take that as a representation and I will attempt to answer the question about what happens in the United States.

Mr. Orlikow: Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that the United States government, having made repeated representations to the Saudi Arabian government regarding that government's policy of religious discrimination in the granting of visas, has now succeeded in establishing a situation in which all Americans applying for visas to Saudi Arabia do not answer questions in the application form with regard to their religion, and would the Prime Minister consider arranging for a similar policy regarding visas for Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think that, too, is a representation. It seems to me that the United States, which sells arms and a lot of important things to Saudi Arabia, is perhaps in a stronger bargaining position than is Canada in some of these matters. We are not selling arms to Saudi Arabia, the United States is, and from the point of view of the interests of the hon. member, this should be a relevant element in the equation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REPORT OF LAW REFORM COMMISSION ON SEXUAL OFFENCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Last year it came to my attention that a working paper was being produced by the Law Reform Commission on the subject of rape and other sexual offences. We attempted to obtain copies of that working paper late last fall but it seemed to be unavailable, yet there was a meeting some time in December with selected women's groups to discuss the working paper. We were told that the report would be published early this spring on the whole area of rape and other sexual offences and amendments to the Criminal Code.

Can the minister indicate why it seems to be taking so long for the Law Reform Commission to produce that report, in light of the tabled amendments which the minister brought forward this week?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the chairman has not explained to me the length of time, except that I know they have been working on it for quite some time. As I indicated in my press release on Monday, I hoped that the working paper of the Law Reform Commission would be made available to the public and to all of us as quickly as possible, and that the views expressed therein could become part of the general debate on this whole subject. I understand that it is in the course of being printed.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it now appears from direct contacts with the Law Reform Commission that they deny that any working paper was ever produced; but I have a copy here in my hand. In addition, the final, or the major report of the Law Reform Commission in this area, according to the commission, has been either in printing or under translation for the last three months. There are many groups in this country who are concerned with this legislation who feel that the report may, in fact, never be published.

Can the minister give us an assurance that this report will be published, so that we can look at the report in concert with the amendments proposed before the final legislation is put before parliament?

Mr. Basford: I am sure that that fear is totally unfounded. I am not sure that legally I can give that assurance, because whether the report is published or not is up to the chairman of the commission. Let me say that I have no indication that there is no intention to publish it and I will do all in my power, as minister, to ensure that it is published.

ELECTIONS

DATE OF NEXT ELECTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Because of the needless expense in both the public and private sectors, the uncertainty caused in the whole country due to the inability of the Prime Minister to make up his mind about whether or not we are going to have an election, and because it is somewhat of an implied insult to members of the House that they have to read in the press that in his magnanimous way he will be good enough within one week to tell, at least the press, whether or not we are going to have an election in July, I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell members of the House of Commons now, today in the House, whether or not we are going to have an election in July—of 1978.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is not an urgent question. I can reassure the hon. member by telling him that I am not having any trouble making up my mind, particularly when I hear the hon. member ask such silly questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: My supplementary question is also to the rather touchy and grouchy Prime Minister. I wonder what bolt of clairvoyance from the blue, or what further information or inspiration is going to strike the Prime Minister within the next seven days that he will be able to tell us this next week, rather than this week—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

REPLACEMENT FOR "SIR ROBERT BOND" RAIL CAR FERRY

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is to the Minister of Transport. I have not had an opportunity to advise him of the subject matter, but it is current and I am sure he is familiar with it. Now that the Sir Robert Bond rail car ferry that has been operating between North Sydney and Newfoundland has been taken out of service on that run and sent to Quebec for renovations to operate on the Labrador coast, can the minister advise the House what steps he has taken to find a replacement or another rail car ferry to operate between the port of North Sydney and Newfoundland?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the analysis which was provided to me indicated that the existing rail car ferry capacity without the Sir Robert Bond would ordinarily be adequate to deal with the movement of cars. It has been made clear that the refitted Sir Robert Bond, while normally serving other routes, would be available as a standby vessel in case there is a clearcut need where it is now serving. In other words, it would be brought back if there was a problem with one of the vessels. Indeed, we would examine as well the situation of a rapid increase in the number of rail cars offering to move across that particular route.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's reply, although it is not too encouraging. As he is aware, there is a backlog of railway cars at the port of North Sydney. Since the Frederick Carter is the only remaining rail car ferry left to operate between North Sydney and Newfoundland to carry goods to that province, and despite the fact that he says the Sir Robert Bond would be available in an emergency, or as a contingency plan, how could that work when they have welded-over the railway tracks, leaving no means of putting rail cars on the Sir Robert Bond?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a different plan for the Sir Robert Bond than I have in mind. My plan, as it was shown to me, certainly left the Sir Robert Bond available to carry rail cars when needed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

VALUE OF DOLLAR—EFFECT ON CANADIAN ENTREPRENEURS

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, one aspect of the 88-cent dollar that seems to have eluded this House is that the higher cost of imports confers a competitive advantage on Canadian entrepreneurs selling in the Canadian market. Have we any indication of how much advantage has been gained and to what degree Canadian entrepreneurs have taken advantage of this aspect of the Canadian dollar? Also, are we encouraging movement in this direction on the part of Canadian business?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the answer is in the figures that were released last Friday. From March to March the increase in exports went from $40 billion to $50 billion and imports did not increase from last year. Thus, we had a year-average $10 billion surplus from March to March. What is happening is that we have increased our exports by 25 per cent from last March and we have not increased our imports because Canadian entrepreneurs have been able to supply the Canadian market with Canadian goods as foreign goods are more expensive.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Let's have a 50-cent dollar.

AIR TRANSPORT

PATRICIA AIRWAYS—CHARGES UNDER AERONAUTICS ACT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Last February, in Dryden, Ontario, three charges under the Aeronautics Act were dismissed against Patricia Airways because the Department of Justice attorney did not make it to court. I also raised this matter in the transport committee in February and the minister informed me that charges would be laid again. I was informed this week that the federal prosecutor in Thunder Bay, Mr. Paul Gordon, is going to drop the charges because Patricia Airways is now bankrupt. Could the minister confirm that statement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is the information I received. It had been our intention to lay the charges again, but obviously that is simply and practically not possible with the disappearance of the proposed defendant.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the owners of Patricia Airways have disappeared. There have been 24 deaths in the north since 1975 and during some of the earlier investigations into these fatal crashes there were very startling revelations. I would suggest to the minister that he reconsider the matter and have the owners of Patricia Airways appear before the courts on these three charges.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is getting bad legal advice, or none at all, in assuming that the defendant could be other than the airline company in question, as the operator of the airline. That is certainly the advice I have before me. I do not think that he helps the situation by once again referring to statistics relating to accidents or deaths. That simply causes people to worry. We have gone over these facts many times before and the hon. member knows that the over-all safety record in northern Ontario, while of concern because we want to improve it, compares favourably with that of equivalent areas. Canadian safety records are very sound and would stand up against any in the world. I wish the hon. member would not continue to indict the companies and worry people with his statistics.

MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

REDUCTION IN RESEARCH BUDGET

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the devasting effect that the reduction in the Medical Research Council budget has had on research in this country this year, I ask the minister whether she has any plans to rearrange her department's budget in order to come up with an extra $4 million or $5 million to at least keep the level of last year's medical research going this year.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, three witnesses appeared this morning before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs regarding medical research and I understand that the request of the hon. member for an additional $4 million or $5 million was a point they raised. I would like to read the record regarding the testimony that was given. In any event, I am well aware of the fact that the Medical Research Council received a 5.6 per cent increase in their budget this year, which is—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Miss Bégin: I beg your pardon; it is, of course, true. This is less than the rate of inflation, but far more than the vast majority of our departments and agencies have received. As I said earlier this week in the House, there is a problem in that field with regard to equipment, 80 per cent of which comes from the United States. I am waiting for the medical research community to provide me with facts and figures on that; then we will see what we can do.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, the minister's figure of 5.6 per cent seems to be at variance with that indicated in the letter signed by the Prime Minister in which he said it was 7.8 per cent. Of course, both those percentages are wrong. I ask the minister whether she has consulted with her colleague, the Minister of Transport, to determine whether he would be willing to rearrange his travel plans for this year so that at least $700,000 or $800,000 might be reallocated to medical research?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Huron-Middlesex.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of DREE responsible for ARDA. He has left the House, so perhaps I could be recognized on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE VETERANS' PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, but I understand that he had to leave so I shall put it to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister indicated, in respect of a certain piece of legislation, that if there could be a guarantee that it would be put through all stages in one day, the government would proceed with it. May I ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will consult with the representatives of the parties as to the possibility, which I am sure exists, of putting through in one day a bill to improve veterans pensions? If so, will he do his best to get that legislation through next week?

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, when the decision has been taken to give effect to the suggestion, I will be glad to consult with hon. members.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ARDA—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH ONTARIO

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who is responsible for ARDA. In view of the fact that the federal government's agreement with the province of Ontario concerning ARDA ran out in 1975 and has been extended twice since because a new five-year agreement could not be reached, could the minister advise as to the status of current negotiations with the government of Ontario, so that another short extension will not be necessary and that the regular agreement for five years can be set up? More specifically, can he assure us that the province of Ontario will be offered agreements that are as advantageous as those which other provinces have received?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the benefits which will be offered to the province of Ontario will certainly be consistent with those we have negotiated in the past with that province as well as with the others. We have extended the ARDA agreement and we are now discussing the future of ARDA on a longer term basis. We are also considering the proposals made by the province concerning the development of a number of areas in southern and south-eastern Ontario, and I hope that the current discussions will be concluded within the next few weeks or months and result in the ratification of agreements and the setting up of structures to complete a number of projects already under way.

As to concluding a new long term ARDA agreement, I cannot say that it will materialize. It is quite possible, but we are now considering a number of proposals which the government has put forward recently, and this may, of course, affect the future decision on this matter.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister agree to fund some special projects in Ontario to well over the 50 per cent share, as he has done for other provinces? I am sure it is common knowledge that more money comes to the federal government from Ontario than any other province. Surely that province should be entitled to equal treatment.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the statement that some provinces benefit more from the ARDA program. As far as I know, it is not the case. The ARDA agreement still provides that cost-sharing is on a 50 per cent basis, and it is only under the special ARDA act which deals rather with projects concerning Indians or native groups throughout Canada that we contribute a large amount. Under the ARDA program, sharing is always on a 50 per cent basis.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BASFORD—UNDERTAKINGS GIVEN TO HON. MEMBER FOR PALLISER FULFILLED

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday I rose on a question of privilege because the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) alleged that I had breached some undertakings I had given him with respect to certain sections of the Criminal Code. I indicated that my recollection was I had performed the undertakings given him. I have checked the record of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for November 27, 1975, on this matter. I gave the hon. member two undertakings, and the record indicates that they had been fulfilled. It also indicates that he asked for a third undertaking which I specifically refused to give him.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following question will be answered today: 1,149.

Order Paper Questions

[Text]

WINTER COLD

Question No. 1,149—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. How many fatalities in Canada were related to exposure to winter cold in (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974 (d) 1975 (e) 1976?

2. How many serious cases of frostbite were reported in Canada in (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974 (d) 1975 (e) 1976?

3. To which common illnesses in Canada can the winter cold be considered to be a significant contributing or complicating factor?

4. What studies have been carried out by the government into the risks offered to the health of Canadians by styles of clothing affording adequate protection from winter cold?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Health and Welfare and National Defence as follows: 1. According to Statistics Canada data, the numbers of deaths reported due to excessive cold (code E901, ICDA-8 revised) in these years were: (a) 1972, 111; (b) 1973, 122; (c) 1974, 123; (d) 1975, 104. (e) Data for 1976 are not yet available.

2. According to Statistics Canada data, the numbers of admissions to general and allied special hospitals in Canada for frostbite, excessive cold and freezing (codes 991.0, 991.1, 991.2, 991.3 and 991.9, ICDA-8 revised) in these years were: (a) 1972, 1,059; (b) 1973, 559; (c) 1974, 672; (d) 1975, 590; (e) 1976,—Data for this year are not yet available.

3. It is a common observation that an increase in the frequency of colds occurs in the winter. Sometimes this has been correlated with sharp changes in the temperature, humidity or pollution of the air, but the popular belief that cold weather causes common colds cannot be substantiated from epidemiologic observations in the arctic or tropics or from studies in volunteers. Exposure of volunteer subjects to cold did not activate latent respiratory viruses. The reason for the apparent relation between the season and common colds remains unclear. However, winter cold is recognized to be a contributing factor in the syndrome of hypothermia. This condition is not common in Canada. Winter cold is also a predisposing factor in a number of unrelated accidents and illnesses. For example: unusual exercise (shovelling snow) is responsible for precipitating numerous myocardial infarctions, and icy roads and sidewalks cause people to slip and fall, resulting in broken bones, strains and sprains.

4. With respect to the National Health Research and Development Program, no projects have been funded relating to clothing affording adequate protection from winter cold. The Department of National Defence has carried out long term studies on the research, development, testing and evaluation of winter clothing systems designed to provide optimum protection for Canadian Forces personnel operating in the cold. DND also instructs and trains servicemen on the proper use and care of this equipment and related materiel to ensure that correct and safe cold weather procedures are employed to minimize risks and hazards to health which may result from exposure to winter cold.

TEMPORARY ASSIGNMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 916—Mr. Alexander:

1. Since the establishment of the Temporary Assignment Programme, who has worked for this Programme and what assignments did they undertake?

2. Of all Programme assignments, which ones were internal Treasury Board Secretariat and which ones were in response to external (departmental or agency) demands?

3. For each fiscal year since the Programme was established (a) what has been the expenditure on salaries for Programme employees (b) how much of the expenditure, in each fiscal year, was recovered from departments and agencies (c) how much of the expenditure, in each fiscal year, was paid by the Treasury Board Secretariat?

4. What is the average length of time between assignments?

5. Who was working for the Programme as of December 12, 1977 and, in each case, what was their assignment on December 12, 1977?

6. Which employees on December 12, 1977 were working on (a) internal Treasury Board Secretariat assignments (b) external (departmental or agency) assignments?

7. Was responsibility for administration of the Programme shifted to the Program Branch, Treasury Board Secretariat and, if so, for what reason?

Return tabled.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed, from Thursday, May 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott (for Mr. Lang) that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass, and of the amendment (Mr. Murta) (p. 5176).

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on this bill. I am glad to see that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is here and I hope he will remain because I want to leave some thoughts with him. I know that as he is going out west he will in any event read Hansard carefully to see what I have said today on some matters of considerable importance to western Canada, particularly the area he now represents.

This bill has received a fair amount of scrutiny and attention. Many of my colleagues have indicated a number of reservations, in this House and in committee, with respect to the content of the bill. It is an important piece of legislation in one sense as it deals with an important Crown corporation, the CNR. It is also part of a proposition to review the transportation policy of this country, so it gives each of us an opportunity to make suggestions and recommendations on that subject.

It is in this way that I want to approach this bill. If I am critical of some provisions of the bill it is not merely that I want to be negative but rather that I sincerely believe that some of these considerations must be and ought to be in the minds of government if we are to have a truly effective transportation policy and to have the CNR function as an integral and important part of our transportation system.

One of the things that surprised me about the bill when it was brought before the House was the reaction of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). During question period he seemed to indicate that it would involve a very substantial saving of public money. I think that should be put in perspective. This bill merely involves a process of financial manipulation and will not mean any saving to the people of Canada. The bill purports to convert $808 million of debt owing to the government by the CNR to an equity position. Of course a mere bill cannot do away with that debt. It is clear that the burden of the debt remains and will not be dismissed by the passing of this legislation.

There are other aspects of this bill that require our serious attention before it is passed. It has been suggested in committee that the bill is necessary if the CNR is to be allowed to borrow money on the private markets. It seems to me that we are deluding ourselves if we think any one involved in lending money to the CNR is not going to understand completely the financial basis on which this Crown corporation operates. It is a rather specious argument, in my estimation for the government to come forward and to say that by transferring this debt the CNR will be in a better position to go out to the private markets and acquire money for its operations and capital expenditures.

● (1212)

In respect to this particular bill I am concerned about the failure of the government to respond positively to suggestions made by my colleagues at different times during the course of debate and during the course of committee hearings. These suggestions were for a stronger and more thorough process of accountability as far as this Crown corporation is concerned, and generally with respect to Crown corporations.

We have experienced some dreadful horror stories of spending within Crown corporations during the course of this parliament. There is one lesson that should have been learned by all members of this House, that we must all come to grips with the concept of accountability as far as Crown corporations are concerned. I say this in the context of the CNR. Of course I am not suggesting by my remarks today that a finger should be pointed to the CNR particularly, but that there should be some system set up to strengthen the accountability of Crown corporations to parliament. We have many examples, and I do not want to stray too far from this particular legislation. But I am sure an exasperating feeling comes on a member of parliament when he starts to ask questions about Crown corporations.

I remember asking a question once about the CBC. I had heard a rumour—my questions are only sometimes based on rumours—but I will put it this way that I had heard a story that the CBC had spent considerable amounts of money for the creation of a new logo. As a parliamentarian, due to inquiries I had received from constituents about this expenditure, I felt it was my duty to inquire into how much was spent for the production of this new logo for the CBC. In response to a question on the order paper I was told that it was not in the interests of the corporation to give this information to parliamentarians, let alone to the public, that somehow this was a matter of internal financial management and concern, and therefore was not available to me as a member of parliament. Commercial considerations notwithstanding, that kind of approach is all too prevalent with respect to questions relating to financial operations of Crown corporations.

If we are to create these Crown corporations and have them go into public markets and into business of one sort or another, and if we are expected to fund and pay for these Crown corporations, the very minimum we should expect is to have some reasonable ability through parliament to examine and scrutinize the legitimacy of expenditures and the advisability of spending, not just in the past, but also in the future.

The committee, in this particular instance, dealt in an unfortunate way with the suggestions that I made about strengthening the accountability of the CNR. The committee, dominated as it is by government members, used the flimsy excuse that this request was an attempt to stall passage of the bill. As a result it refused to allow the Auditor General or a representative from his office to appear before the committee respecting suggestions that might be coming from that office relating to the examination of expenditures, policies, and procedures within the CNR.

I want to deal at this point with the CNR in terms of rail transportation and in particular with an aspect of vital interest to me and, I am sure, to all members from western Canada. This concerns a theme I have been bringing forward in parliament from time to time with the government and particularly with the Minister of Transport, without much success, I am sorry to say. This relates to the effect of the recommendations of the Hall commission. In my view, in the terms of the efficiency of the operation of the CNR, and indeed the operation of the other railway system in Canada, and the implications as far as western Canada and the Hall commission are concerned, these recommendations are of the utmost importance. As parliamentarians representing not only the interests of western Canada but looking at the situation in the national context we should be most interested in and supportive of these recommendations.

What brings me to talk about the Hall commission as it relates to the CNR and the other railway is the attitude which the minister has been taking regarding the recommendations of the Hall commission. Reluctant is maybe too soft a term to use about the attitude which I have detected coming from the Minister of Transport concerning the total package of the Hall commission.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I asked a question of the minister with respect to the proposal in the report of the Hall commission concerning the extension of the Crowsnest rates relating to livestock, meat, and finished products. I received a negative answer. The gist of the minister's answer was that this would somehow involve an enormous amount of money. He could not see his way clear, I suppose, to recommend to his colleagues in cabinet that the amount of money required to put into effect the recommendations set out in the Hall commission report would be legitimate expenditures for western Canada. I was sorry to hear that negative response from the minister, coming as he does from western Canada.

I get the impression more and more that the minister in his own mind thinks these proposals will mean a large amount of money, which he indicates, but he does not specify what the amount is. He talks about vast amounts of money. The fact of the matter is, in my opinion, that the amount of money involved is not in the first place an increase in the expenditure that we are now facing respecting transportation facilities in western Canada as it relates to rail, but indeed they are nominal expenditures to place western Canada more in a position of equity concerning freight rates paid on the products to which I have referred.

I do not think there is any question the railways should be adequately and properly compensated for the goods which they carry, as a general principle. However, if one examines the record and looks over the past financial statements of the railway, the years in which the profits were greatest were the years in which the railway carried a large tonnage of grain.

That is a very important comparison. When the railways carried a lot of grain, that was the time when profits were the highest. Somehow I think the people in Canada believe that the moneys expended through Crowsnest and other methods are being poured into western Canada particularly as some sort of unrecoverable subsidy. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

The expenditure for transportation of grain is an expenditure and investment by the people of Canada in their own interest. I made this point in the last debate we had on transportation policy on the last allotted day. It concerned the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I tried to demonstrate that payments which are being made for the delivery of grain, and payments with respect to grain generally, in the final analysis accrue to the benefit of people in central Canada. This relates to the cost of bread as well as in other ways in which the western farmer, out of his own pocket, subsidizes the consumer in central Canada. That should be understood. The fact is the government has a very peculiar concept of the way in which subsidies with regard to grain delivery ought to be handled.

When I first came to this House I was confronted with a speech made by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, in Edmonton. At that time he cast some doubt on this government's determination to retain the statutory Crownsnest Pass rates within Canada. That caused me the greatest of concern. Since that time the minister has wriggled and wriggled to avoid coming down and getting away from the original statement. However, there is still suspicion in the mind of every western Canadian as to his dedication to the retention of the statutory Crowsnest Pass rates.

By subsequent statements the minister has merely exacerbated that concern in western Canada. Although he has not yet articulated it fully, it appears he has some idea of changing the whole basis of payment of any compensation to western Canadians. Rather than the proposition of payments to the railways for the short haul, payments will be made directly by cheque, I take it signed by the minister, to farmers across western Canada, on a cultivated acreage basis. The minister has the idea of individualizing these payments. While that proposition may be politically attractive in the mind of the minister, it is a waste of the taxpayers' money. It is an inefficient and wrong attitude to take toward the payment of the subsidy.

An hon. Member: Shades of Jimmy Gardiner.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: My colleague says "shades of Jimmy Gardiner." One reason people in western Canada are so adamant about retaining the statutory Crowsnest Pass rates is that it takes away any sense of arbitrariness, either on the part of this government or the Conservatives when they form the government after the next election, with regard to the basis upon which payments will be made with respect to Crowsnest.

There is a built-in advantage now with Crowsnest as far as international trade is concerned. It helps us remain competitive in the sale of grain. It assists in maintaining some reasonable balance of trade. However, once it is left at the discretion of any government, whether Liberal or Conservative, an arbitrary aspect comes into the matter. This makes western Canadians very nervous. It should be left in the statute. In that way, any changes are made by act of parliament and public discussion, not by order in council or some order taken by cabinet in the dead of night without the fullest discussion and public participation.

From what I can gather, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board feels that the farmer should pay the full shot, that is to say, the compensatory rate for carrying grain, and the difference between the Crow rates and the compensatory rates would be paid to the farmer by the government. I suggest that on this basis the farmer would be without the use of his money for a period of 12 to 18 months. This is another suggestion put forward by the minister.

I want to deal with another aspect before terminating my remarks, that is, the concept of extending the Crowsnest Pass rates which I raised in the House yesterday. The Hall commission recommended that rates on livestock and meat products be set at levels which do not discriminate against the national locational advantage of prairie livestock producers and processors. Presently the compensatory level of rates on meat and meat products and the low statutory level of grain rates distort the locational advantage.

The Hall commission further recommended that the present statutory levels of grain rates remain in force. Therefore, a subsidy would be required to remove the current rate distortion on livestock and meat products. What does this amount to?

The Hall commission recommendations must be construed to mean that livestock and meat rates are to be "Crow related" or subsidized to the extent of grain consumed by the animal unit concerned. The often stated belief that the Hall Commission advocated the extension of Crow rates to livestock and meat is just not correct.

In the case of beef, a 1,050 pound live steer will have consumed 4,120 pounds of barley to reach that marketable weight. If you look at Volume I of that report, table 9-6 at page 306, that is the basis of the contention and point that I am now making.

Second, a 1,050 pound live steer will dress out at 550 pounds of beef as meat and meat products. Assuming that the costs of moving grain are 2.6 times the Crow rate, the movement of grain is subsidized to the extent of 35 cents per 100 pounds. The Crow subsidy of 35.2 cents per hundredweight equals $14.50 per steer. This is based on the assumption that a steer consumes 4,120 pounds of barley times 35.2. That would equal $14.50.

The $14.50 per steer subsidy equals $1.38 per one hundred pounds subsidy on live cattle, or $2.63 per hundred pounds on dressed meat and meat products. In 1974, the last year the commission had before it, the movement of live beef from west to east totalled 160,000 tons, and the movement of meat and meat products totalled 157,000 tons. This is verified at page 294 of the report. The subsidy "Crow related" rates on beef and meat products totals, live beef 160,000 tons times (1.38 x 20), $4,416,000, and dressed beef 157,000 tons times (2.63 x 20), $8,258,200, for a total of $12,674,200.

I now move on to deal with hogs. I want to document this because I know the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board will read this speech very carefully. I do not think he understands the recommendations of the Hall commission. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac) is often in the House. I know he listens. He will pass on the basis of my remarks to the minister and aid him in understanding the recommendations of the Hall commission.

Notwithstanding this very important report, the minister unfortunately has not taken upon himself to see its author and architect in order to get an explanation so that he can fully understand what is going on as far as the report is concerned. A 200-pound live hog consumes 600 pounds of barley and dresses out at 160 pounds of pork products. In 1975, the flow of pork west to east equalled 6.5 per cent of Canadian production of 7.5 million head, or 490,000 head. A Crow subsidy of 35.2 per hundredweight on grain would be the equivalent of $2.11 per head of hogs on the basis of their consuming 600 pounds of barley. The total subsidy necessary to equalize hog rates to Crow grain rates totals $1,033,900 per year.

I put forward these statistics to show that any increase in livestock production as a result of equalization of rates through the extension of the Crow subsidy to livestock would not result in an increase in total subsidy expenditures, since the difference would be made up from increased grain shipments. This is a point which seems to have escaped the minister.

In his answers to questions put to him from this side of the House the minister shrugs off suggestions we make to improve the transportation system in western Canada. He tells us the government is already making large sums available for transportation and that, in a period of restraint, it is not possible to consider further large expenditures. However, he knows that the effect of rail line abandonment as recommended by the commission—I believe some 2,160 miles of branch line are involved—will be a saving to the federal treasury of roughly $400 million annually.

What happens when we come forward and ask that maybe $30 million extra a year be considered with respect to extending the Crow rate in such a way as to help the livestock producers of western Canada? The minister says he cannot afford the money. How can the minister justify this parsimonious attitude? Does he not have sufficient influence in cabinet to persuade his colleagues to accept the reasonable proposition I have put forward? The minister always puts his case in terms of spending money in western Canada, though he must realize that we in western Canada are losing money which has been forthcoming directly or indirectly through the subsidy program.

If we consider the Crow rates on cattle and hogs, if we include rapeseed and payment upon an equalization basis on rapeseed and on other products, even with an inflationary factor of 10 per cent based on the figures I have quoted for 1974 on an annual basis—I have been a little generous; I did not want to understate it yesterday in my question to the minister when I mentioned $35 million, because I think the figure would be in the neighbourhood of $30 million—

An hon. Member: Is that $30 million?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Yes, $30 million. That would be required to give western Canadians a small indication that Ottawa understands and is sympathetic to the hopes and aspirations of western Canada and our desire to take advantage of our location as the breadbasket of the world and the centre of the livestock industry in Canada.

The minister's attitude mystifies me. After all, only a week or so ago we were asked to agree to extend the scope of the EDC to $25 billion. Here is a request from western Canadians for an expenditure of something like $30 million. If it were accepted, the gesture would go a long way to making westerners feel that there is at least some concern being shown by the federal government about the way in which rates have been treated in the past, and some desire to encourage farmers and processors. It is not asking for the world, by any means, especially in the light of the savings which will be made by the closing down of branch lines and the cutting off of certain subsidies.

It is not hard to see where the government's priorities lie. Its interest is, as ever, political: win the two central provinces and forget the hinterland. That is what the government thinks and talks about.

My hon. friend from Carleton-Charlotte was misquoted by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). He is a spokesman for the interests of Atlantic Canada and the maritime provinces, and he expressed a natural concern about the situation there. What he said was not that western Canada was getting all the attention but that eastern Canada was getting no attention with respect to its serious transportation problems. He got up on a question of privilege to correct the record, and I can understand his exasperation. The government is concerned only with keeping its power base, regardless of the consequences for western Canada and the maritimes. The hinterlands are a low priority when it comes to transportation policy.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, we can always tell when our arguments are cogent and accurate because, all of a sudden, there is squealing from the back benches opposite. They try to shout us down, they try to make a noise, because they know what we are saying is completely accurate. People in western Canada and Atlantic Canada understand this too, as they will demonstrate when the Prime Minister screws up his courage and makes the trip to see the Governor General. They will express their opinion in no uncertain terms of this kind of manipulative approach—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest we all squeal back to the subject under discussion, Bill C-17.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am encouraged that you are stopping the squealing from the other side, and I know you are as repulsed as I am by the interjections. As far as transportation policy is concerned, we on this side are interested and extend our congratulations to the president of the CNR. As I say, he has taken hold of this Crown corporation, and I congratulate him on the admirable job he has done. I have no quarrel with Mr. Bandeen. Every once in a while I write to him about a particular grievance I have.

We all know in western Canada that CN transport is "out" as far as Saskatchewan is concerned. Many of the towns in my constituency have suffered a loss of services. It is my duty, as it is the duty of every member representing a Saskatchewan constituency, to attempt to resist what we consider to be a short term and misguided policy. But as to the operation of the railway there seems to be a new sense of enthusiasm and optimism. I repeat that I do not take issue with management in a serious way. I do object to the attitude of the government with respect to transportation and the constraints within which the government places the operations of our railways.

I want to allude just briefly to another grievance we in western Canada have about the way in which rail passenger service is developing. I realize that support for rail passenger policy is sometimes based upon a rather romantic view many of us have with respect to railways, but for a long time we have heard the argument that rail passenger service is on the way out. I am concerned that rail passenger service is not being given a serious chance. I hope that VIA Rail will do something to change my mind in that regard.

As we look at what is happening to trans-continental rail passenger service, there is nothing but apprehension and concern on the part of western Canadians. My colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), has pointed out some of the ludicrous scheduling propositions which are being laid down for transcontinental passenger service. It is not the kind of scheduling which will encourage people to travel on trains.

I took my family on a train east from Saskatoon last summer when we had a chance to take a little holiday. It was a superb trip. The service was excellent. There was a fine staff and fine food. I do not think we are doing enough to encourage patronage at this very crucial time, in view of energy consumption forecasts and energy costs, to retain the basis of our rail passenger service, especially in terms of trans-Canada service and passenger service. I support policies which encourage continuation and expansion of fast, efficient, and enjoyable rail passenger service. I think that point of view is shared by members of my party generally.

I have indicated my concern about accountability of Crown corporations and the necessity of having a serious look at that, especially in terms of legislation such as this which deals with refinancing the CNR. We had an excellent opportunity to have the Auditor General come before the committee to give us his views on the expenditures and the control of expenditures within the corporation, but the government backed away from that on very flimsy grounds.

As pointed out by my colleagues, this bill should have been deferred until the Royal Commission on Government Management handed down its recommendations, or at least until the government produced the legislation promised by the Minister of Transport for the next session regarding Crown corporations.

In my opinion this bill is premature. I do not want to speak much longer, but I want to express as strongly as I am able to do some of my concerns and some of the concerns which have been expressed to me by western Canadians generally with respect to the direction in which transportation policy in this country has taken us. The most important aspect of that in western Canada relates to rail transportation.

I want to leave with the House and with the minister some of the concerns of hon. members on his side of the House with respect to the way in which this government and the Minister of Transport have failed to deal with the key recommendations of the Hall commission. As I said before, it is our view that the chief commissioner, the Hon. Emmett Hall, should be consulted. He is the architect and chief spokesman of the Hall commission, and his expertise with respect to the implementation of the recommendations contained in his report ought to be used. If the government persists in refusing to do this, we can only assume that it has no interest in putting into effect the key recommendations of the commission. The Prairie Rail Action Committee was set up by the minister rather than by the prairie rail authority which was recommended by the Hall commission.

There is every appearance of a stall, and this will put us right back to where we were before the commission handed down its recommendations. We are going to be under the control of the eastern-dominated Canadian Transport Commission. The people of western Canada are concerned that they will not have enough input as far as transportation policy is concerned in western Canada. They do not feel that they are getting a fair hearing. I am simply reporting that the people of western Canada do not feel a sense of participation in the development of transportation policy in western Canada. There is an opportunity to have consultation on the Hall commission recommendations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: So soon? May I finish a few sentences?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the development of transportation policy in western Canada is of great concern and the subject of much debate. We are surprised to find out that the the railways themselves, because they are their most lucrative lines in the main. Those are the secondary main lines and the most heavily used branch lines on which the railways do not railways in the past have been receiving too much taxpayers' money without having to account for the way it is spent as it relates to western Canada. I am not sure whether any of the subsidy for branch lines was ever put into rehabilitation or into maintaining branch lines in western Canada. I think it went to the general fund.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): To build the CN Tower.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) points out that the money was probably used to build something like the CN Tower in Toronto instead of being used in western Canada.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I see that the minister is back. I want to finish my remarks. The House wants me to finish my remarks as well. I want to leave these things in a logical manner so that even the minister can understand and comprehend the points I am making.

We in western Canada are concerned about the fact that there is no government policy to assist the prairie livestock feed industry or oil seed crushers by offsetting the low statutory freight rates for grain.

I think there are some fundamental things which have to be done, and I have tried to point them out in the course of my remarks. We on this side of the House stand behind the statutory Crowsnest Pass rates. We will not tolerate any tinkering whatsoever with that concept for the reasons I have mentioned in the course of my remarks. We think that the government must pick up the difference between the Crow rate and the compensatory rate and pay it directly to the railways. There should not be some other method of payment directed to farmers, which I am sure the minister would like to see.

We on this side of the House are in favour of the concept of having a subsidy to remove the current freight rate distortion on livestock, meat products, and oil seed products.

● (1252)

The railroads must be responsible for maintaining and upgrading their prairie rail network on the basis of the recommendations contained within the commission report without further subsidy from the taxpayers. That is a position which I think is well taken.

I appreciate the fact that this House has given me an extension of time, and I want to thank you again for your attention in this particular matter, Mr. Speaker. I hope my remarks will have some therapeutic effect on the attitude the government is taking in respect of transportation matters, particularly relating to western Canada. I would simply terminate my remarks by saying that as far as this bill is concerned some very legitimate concerns have been expressed by my colleagues, not only in the course of this debate but also in the course of committee hearings. These are concerns to which the government might well pay attention in the interests of a more efficient transportation system.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in the third reading debate on this bill in order to refer to some ramifications, such as further public and private action in respect of transportation, particularly rail transportation in this country, and I hope this action will be taken with some measure of urgency.

At the outset let me say that in our caucus we approved of the passage of this legislation. We have been asking in this party for recapitalization of the CNR both long before and ever since I came to this House in 1968. In fact, sir, we could make some arguments in favour of greater recapitalization than is proposed in this bill.

I have difficulty understanding the reasoning of the official opposition in moving a six months hoist. We spent many days on this bill, and colleagues in the Conservative party seized many opportunities to go into detailed questioning of the management of Canadian National, of the minister, and other witnesses. Members of the committee obtained the passage of one amendment to the bill which was approved of by members on all sides. We obtained the passage of another amendment yesterday at the report stage. All members agreed to that, but now members of that party want to hoist the bill for six months. I had thought they might now be happier with the bill and that, other than a few hours of debate at third reading, we could proceed to let it pass. In spite of that inconsistency on their part, I hope this legislation receives approval over the next few sitting days so that we can get on with the job that needs to be done in this country, particularly in respect of rail transportation.

If the passage of this legislation makes it easier for the CNR to do a better job in respect of its cash flow and in terms of capital expenditures for the needed improvements to the system, then it seems to me this is a worth-while bill. It seems to me also that additional public investment and direction by this parliament and the Ministry of Transport are required both in respect of the investment of monies and the priorities on the part of the railroads regarding improvements to be made to the system over the next five or six years.

There is also a need for a change of heart on the part of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in terms of the activities of that group in the prairie provinces which is in some respects subverting and perverting the recommendations of the Hall commission. I refer to the Prairie Rail Action Committee which should at this point be disbanded. The minister should ask for the resignations of its members. In fact I would even suggest a reconstitution of the Hall commission to carry out the decision-making over the next year or two regarding the two thousand and more miles of track to be considered for improvement and inclusion in the basic rail network.

This PRAC group has made three recommendations recently that I suggest are horrendous. They fly in the face of the demands of the people in the areas affected; they fly in the face of the wishes of the railway companies as well as the elevator companies, and are contrary to the submissions to the commission and the recommendations of the Hall commission itself.

Surely when the Prairie Rail Action Committee makes recommendations concerning certain branch lines or parts of branch lines, which fly in the face of all these things, the Minister of Transport should make a journey out west to sit down with these boys and have a heart to heart talk, or get their resignations. As a minimum, the minister should reject these three recommendations out of hand. I want to refer to them a little later in my remarks, but I hope he will reject them in that way.

Rather than spending another minute getting into that, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would allow me to call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for lunch, I was suggesting that this legislation deserves to be passed, even though I do not think it goes far enough, and I was in the process of illustrating one or two areas where I thought the railroads, parliament, and the Minister of Transport should be taking some urgent and top priority action. The item which I was discussing before we adjourned for lunch had to do with the Prairie Rail Action Committee, a creature of the Minister of Transport, despite what Mr. Justice Hall and his commissioners recommended, which has been making recommendations in recent weeks to the minister which fly in the face of the Hall commission's recommendations, of what the wheat pool wants, what the citizens and what the producers want.

I wish to mention specifically four items which are under the purview of this so-called Prairie Rail Action Committee—it is more of a destruction committee. The committee has recommended that the line from Shamrock to Courval be abandoned, in spite of and in the face of what the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool says, that is, that there are three primary elevator points on that line which they intend to upgrade or build new facilities. That is in the constituency of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), and I suspect the Minister of Transport will be hearing further representations on that.

Another one is in my own area, the Colonsay subdivision where, in spite of the fact the Hall commission recommends that the entire line is a heavy grain line and, to quote the Hall commission, must be maintained, the minister's committee recommends that the south end of the line from Liberty to Dilke be abandoned. That line moves 60,000 bushels per mile per year, and there are a couple of viable communities there, particularly Holdfast. I feel sorry for the poor Liberal candidate who runs around in that area. They will run him out of town, tarred and feathered, and send him back to the Minister of Transport.

Another line that is even more serious runs from Eston to Lacadena. That line moves 90,000 bushels of grain per mile of track and CNR wants to keep it, but the minister's committee recommends that it be abandoned. We do not need that kind of help in western Canada.

Members of the commission told me—I have already mentioned this on another occasion in the House, but I will remind the minister of it—that in the case of the Colonsay subdivision, for example, their reasoning for recommending that it be put under the proposed prairie rail authority was so that it would receive first priority for rehabilitation, rebuilding, and returning it to the basic rail network in western Canada. That was their reason; otherwise they would have put it in the basic network in the first place.

● (1412)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Benjamin: Of course.

Mr. Lang: I would like to have the hon. member acknowledge that in fact many of the lines in the basic rail network are in very great need of upgrading and the upgrading work on them has already begun. I wonder if he will confirm that in fact what the Hall commission did was indicate it had doubt about the future of the lines it referred to the prairie rail authority, and very clearly said some of these may in fact be abandoned by that authority on further consideration, and in that sense the work of the Prairie Rail Action Committee is very much following the work of the prairie rail authority both in allocating certain parts of those lines for rehabilitation and dealing with some other lines for abandonment?

Mr. Benjamin: As I recall the Hall recommendations they did not say that, but said in actual words that it was too soon to judge whether some lines should be kept. The members of that commission made it very plain at a meeting of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool or the National Farmers' Union, and it does not matter which, when I questioned them personally, that this was the case in respect of the Colonsay subdivision, which I specifically mentioned. I understand that in the case of many other subdivisions their reasoning for recommending they be under a prairie rail authority was in order that they receive priority.

The minister shakes his head, but I could call many witnesses to retell him what they heard when the commission was questioned about that particular subdivision and about other lines. It was my understanding, and I may have been wrong, that the basic rail network would be a major responsibility of the railways themselves, because they are their most lucrative lines in the main. Those are the secondary main lines and the most heavily used branch lines on which the railways do not lose any money, or, if they do, lose very little. I just do not understand the priority the minister places on helping the railways to upgrade the lines in the basic network before looking after the ones in the network that need to be upgraded and added to the basic system.

There is another subdivision about which many people are waiting to hear what the Prairie Rail Action Committee has to say. I hope the minister will tell that committee ahead of time that it better not play around with that line which runs from Sturgis to Kelvington through Preeceville. That one had better be upgraded and put into the basic network very quickly. Kelvington is a community of over 1,000 people and Preeceville is a community of over 1,100 people; there are over 12 delivery points on that line with a ten year average of 8.3 million bushels of grain; 73,000 bushels per mile of line. We need a decision, and we need it quickly, for that line to be upgraded, rehabilitated, and placed in the basic rail network, and we do not need any playing around by the tame committee the minister appointed, in my opinion, to give the railways everything they asked for in the first place before the Hall commission was appointed.

Let me move to another area where there needs to be urgent and immediate action involving investment and capital allocation. Whether we recapitalize the CNR to the extent this bill allows, the direction of future capital investment, the direction of the investment of the Canadian Pacific and additional public investment voted by the Parliament of Canada, as well as drawing upon private investment to the tune of several billions of dollars, are a necessity in respect of transportation in this country.

Let me illustrate what I mean. In the area of electrification of rail lines in Canada—North America for that matter—we are lagging far behind other countries. More important, we are wasting energy and wasting an opportunity to move quickly. To do the right thing in the way of operating our rail system in this country would create employment and would be a remarkable investment in the assets of this nation in respect of rail transportation.

The Syncrude project is to cost about $3 billion. To electrify 5,000 miles of rail line in western Canada would cost in the order of $1 billion, including the cost of purchasing electric locomotives. The electrification of 1,000 miles of track a year over the next fives years would mean a total saving in crude oil equivalent of 43 million barrels. In terms of energy value, allowing about $1 billion per year for the electricity required, the savings would be some $400 million a year. With the price of oil being $11, $12 or $13 a barrel, the savings would be far more than enough to complete the entire electrification of the railway system.

I want to tell this House, and I know the minister and the people in his department already know this, that the saving of about 33 million barrels of oil per year, or a total of 43 million barrels of crude oil equivalent, is almost exactly the same as the output of the Syncrude development which is to cost about $3 billion. In other words, the electrification of 5,000 miles of railway track in western Canada would save more oil at a cost of $1 billion than Syncrude will produce at a cost of $3 billion. What kind of capital investment direction is that?

I suggest the government has gone at this backwards. We could electrify 9,000 miles of railway lines in Canada, including the cost of purchasing the electric locomotives, at a savings of crude oil equivalent equal to the amount of energy equivalent used by Air Canada each year, and at a cost lower than the cost of operations in the tar sands of Alberta. We have to develop the tar sands in Alberta, but it seems to me we have placed the priorities in the wrong order. Other countries have moved into electrification at a rate which we should be moving.

When you have a publicly owned railroad system which is in the process of recapitalizing its capital requirements that it uses out of its own earnings, that it borrows on the private market and that it obtains from the public through the Government of Canada, it has to be directed in an urgent priority manner into its transportation operations, the rehabilitation and updating of them. That means, aside from what will require financial capital assistance from the public on branch lines in the prairie provinces, that there needs to be a doubling of capital investment by Canadian National into its own plant that it considers to be commercially viable and profitable, excluding electrification.

Both Canadian National and Canadian Pacific have many hundreds of miles of railway lines that require hundreds of millions of dollars of investment. There is little purpose in recapitalizing Canadian National if all that is to be accomplished is to make Canadian National more like Canadian Pacific and then it is more profitable. If that is the objective, then I would be inclined to vote against this bill, which is why I said at second reading I could make just as good an argument against the legislation as I could for it. However, I am more of an optimist than I am a pessimist.

I worried about the motives of the government in terms of making Canadian National a private corporation. I received assurance from both the ministers and legal advice from the Department of Justice and others that there is no way they can sell off shares of Canadian National to the public without permission of parliament. Now I am worrying about the official opposition wanting to sell it off. The fact they do not want this bill to pass causes me to be suspicious about their motives regarding this legislation. When are we going to learn in this country that when you give priority to profits and profitability in a public utility, such as a transportation company, then the service that that public utility provides is going to suffer.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) talked about statutory rates, not only for grain and grain products but for livestock and livestock products. That is the only thing you can do in a country with as large a geography and as thinly and widely scattered population as we have. If not only your primary production, but your processing of raw products and manufacturing of products are going to occur in the prairies, the Atlantic region, northern Ontario or the Northwest Territories, then the nation as a whole must share the cost of moving the processed products and manufactured products to the markets of central Canada, the United States, and of other countries in the world.

The only way to share that cost is through statutory rates that apply to the processors and manufacturers of those products, and any deficit in the cost of moving those products is borne by the nationa as a whole. We have to move beyond just the Crow rates on grain. We have to move into livestock, livestock products, and the malting industry. In the Atlantic provinces we have to move into areas where they can process and manufacture because they know how to do it and are very good at it. These areas should not be discriminated against in transportation costs merely because of where they happen to live or be located.

If you have a transport policy and transport legislation that say profitability and competition shall be the criteria for your transportation costs, you will not be able to accomplish what I have suggested in terms of statutory rates. It would reverse the discrimination so that you would be discriminating in favour of, instead of against, areas of this nation and people who live in them. The nation as a whole shares the cost. It is called Confederation and such a policy would be a contribution to national unity.

Mr. Justice Emmett Hall and his commissioners were very wise in the recommendations they made regarding the extension of statutory freight rates to products other than grain and grain products. It is obvious that the principle should apply not only to the prairie provinces but to other outlying regions. It will be expensive, but why expect the industries and the populations of those regions to bear the cost by themselves? We could call it "co-operative federalism" or "renewed confederation," or whatever you like. We must share together if this country's unity is to mean anything at all.

Our nation has over one million people unemployed and yet there are several thousand miles of railway line that need rebuilding, 9,000 miles that should be electrified, plus we require approximately 25,000 to 30,000 new items of rolling stock. In the ten years I have been here it has come up every year—"not enough cars to haul potatoes out of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island—not enough stock cars". The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) will verify even better than I that that is the case. When I was a telegraph operator in 1948 there were not enough cars then, not enough locomotive power and not enough priority given by the government to rail passenger service. They are just playing around.

A good beginning for VIA Rail is ten sets of trains, but if you are not going to provide the finances and the policy backing, then it is doomed. In five years we will be writing it off as a dead loss unless it is given the kind of priority and opportunity that it deserves. Unless we reorganize transportation and quit the nonsense of flying multi-engine jet planes 200 or 300 miles when you can move passengers on the ground in a fast, efficient, comfortable, and reasonably priced system, unless that kind of attitude and state of mind take place in transportation management of privately and publicly owned companies, in governmental policy and legislation, we are going to continue with this patchwork, hodge-podge transportation mess that the minister's predecessor baptized.

In making a move to recapitalize our national railway system that is publicly owned—the other one is not publicly owned but it was publicly paid for—and a move to do something about the financial mess and the bookkeeping of that company, it is nothing more than a first step. It is a beginning.

● (1432)

When things are done in my part of Canada that fly in the face of reason, equity, and the proper treatment of people and communities, such as the three recommendations of the so-called Prairie Rail Action Committee, and when primary producers have no opportunity to process their products or convey them to markets in central Canada and the United States because of geographical or climatic considerations, then we know that the difficulties of decades past will remain with us. Transportation is such an essential tool of economic development and national unity, such an essential part of the foundation of any national economy, that it requires a greater priority and capital investment than are envisaged by this government.

A year and one half ago when the government announced the $100 million program for branch line rehabilitation I was very pleased. I think only $30 million was spent on branch lines, however, and the other $70 million was spent on equipment for the railroads—which would have had to be purchased in any case. The minister used the figure of $600 million that I had used many years ago that would be required for that operation. Over the next six or seven years $1 billion per year will be needed if we are to do something about our transportation system. That is not inflationary. I am not going to worry about how much the financial critic of the official opposition or even the minister will cry about it. It just has to be done, and it is something that increases the assets of the nation, increases and strengthens our nationhood. It is not some sentimental desire to have choo-choo trains running around the country. It is an essential reordering of the way we communicate and move around the country. We cannot continue in the way we have been operating since 1881.

This is not some socialistic dogma, Mr. Speaker. It is a priority. We must use transportation in a better manner—as it is used in nation after nation around the world of all political stripes, from the extreme left to the extreme right. Only in Canada and in the United States do we cling to theories and principles that were out of date 40 years ago. Some of these principles and theories in transportation are hangovers from the railroad barons of the 1880's.

Subsequent to this legislation, which I hope passes next week, this government and the next government, and the two or three after that, must give priority to transportation and come up with a provision for the directing of capital investment. When this nation allows the Canadian Pacific Railway to use its capital resources to buy something called the Syracuse China Corporation in Syracuse, New York, that is a disgrace. I think it is time for parliament and the government to tell the CPR that it is not going to buy the Syracuse China Corporation but that it is going to fix up its transportation equipment, invest in improved rail lines, faster trains, and electrification.

We cannot allow the profit motive to take priority over the transportation needs of the country as a whole. We direct that investment, and those who invest should receive a reasonable return and should have reasonable security. That is not too much to guarantee. Surely the government should have some say about that investment. If it means that the shareholders of the CPR have to take 50 cents or $1 less per share for a while, that could be regarded as their contribution along with the rest of the country to the rebuilding and enlarging of a transportation system to serve the people.

I regret that the official opposition has proposed a six-month on this legislation. I think the legislation does not go far enough, but we in this party approve of it as far as it goes so we will vote against the motion for a six-month hoist. While we will agree to passage of the legislation, I hope the government will use some imagination in the direction and the amount of funding available for our transportation systems. We could proceed more sensibly and begin now on such projects as rail line rehabilitation, electrification, faster intercity trains and other such improvements.

Another area where we must use better sense is the environment, and energy consumption. The research of energy consumption experts shows that an investment of $3 billion in Syncrude will be required and that one third of that amount invested in the electrification of 5,000 miles of railway track would save the same amount of crude oil as will be produced by Syncrude. Sufficient crude oil would be saved to enable farmers in the three prairie provinces to seed their crops, summer fallow their fields, and harvest their crops.

What are we waiting for, Mr. Speaker? There are one million people out of work and yet we are indulging in financial nit-picking on this bill. Let us get it out of the way. We will not object to passage of the legislation, and indeed will insist upon a lot more from whichever government is in power in order to rebuild and enlarge our transportation system on a scale that has not been seen since the CPR was built, and in a manner that will put an end to discrimination in transportation and which will ensure Confederation and national unity much more than in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, we have noted that bills designed to make changes in the transportation system give rise to many comments, and that this is the case, of course, of the bill now under consideration since it concerns the transfer of a relatively large amount of money. Such a debate calls for many interventions. When we consider bill C-17, to amend Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and to amend and repeal certain of the statutes in consequence thereof, it is easy to see that it aims at solving a debt problem.

We often have the opportunity to discuss debt problems in today's topsy-turvy system. This is an area where Canadian legislators acquire some experience, since the administration is always faced with all types of debt problems. In March 1977, a way was found to convert the $842 million Seaway debt by providing a $625 million loan in shares held by the federal government for investment purposes and by converting $217 million into a loan which will gradually be cancelled by the 1 per cent profit that the Seaway will have to earn every fiscal year.

We have suggested at various times capital works financing methods by the Bank of Canada by means of which appropriate improvements could be made without getting the Canadian people constantly in debt. Unfortunately, the government does not find this procedure appropriate and prefers to remain deep in debt about which very few government members can say when it will be paid off. In the explanatory notes contained in Bill C-17, we find the following about clause 1:

> These amendments would provide for a revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways.

The new section 6 allows the governor in council to cancel, and I quote:

> —not more than eight hundred and eight million dollars of the debt owed by the National Company to Her Majesty in right of Canada;

This includes the interest due after December 31, 1977. This section also provides for the consolidation of the remaining debts owed by the company to the Crown. Section 7 provides that the minister shall surrender to the company for cancellation all shares of the 4 per cent preferred stock of the company held by him on December 31, 1977. Section 8 provides for a new evaluation in the accounts of the company of its capital stock of no par value. Section 9 establishes the authorized and issued capital stock of the Canadian National at 6 million common shares of no par value and provides the value of these shares to be registered in the accounts of the company.

● (1442)

Under the amendments in clause 10, the company must pay to the Receiver General of Canada a dividend equal to 20 per cent of its annual earnings or to such higher percentage as determined by the governor in council. If we consider the terms of implementation of that financial amendment, we realize that a rather flexible accounting system should be established to adjust the expected variations, which shows that everything is controlled by money and that as usual Canadians will again have to pay high interest under that new debt readjustment plan. It is quite obvious that the difficulty in balancing a budget arises from accumulated debts and astronomical interest.

In 1972, the Canadian National long term debt was evaluated at $1,894 million. Interest paid over the last 25 years amounted to $1,334 million. As concerns the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority in 1972, its long term debt was $845 million. Interest paid since 1954 totals $141 million and, unpaid interest reaches $122 million. We realize that they were not even able to pay that interest and it is shocking that that kind of administration and our politicians continue to splash and flounder in an utterly confused system; they have been looking for a solution for many years without any success and they are facing complex problems. This is probably why the government chose to convert the St. Lawrence Seaway debt, as I said earlier.

Important changes should be made to the rail service. I already mentioned in this House that for various reasons railways have a social role to play. First a well organized passenger service is the safest and most comfortable transportation means, but as I said it should be well organized, which means convenient schedules, enough work crews to ensure the maintenance of the lines to avoid accidents, and comfortable cars, not only from Montreal to Toronto, but for people of every area of the country. Everybody appreciates comfort.

I have had the opportunity to experience the conditions in which rail service operates between Montreal and Toronto, and between Montreal and the Gaspé area. These conditions are not the same, and the lack of comfort inside individual cars is not the same either; why not maintain a passenger service which is universally satisfactory, no matter the region, instead of discriminating among the regions?

Hon. members are certainly aware that the Transport Act which the House adopted in 1960 set up the Canadian Transport Commission, with Mr. Pickersgill as its first President. He had created a position he could fill after retiring from Parliament. It is under his administration that the railways were allowed to abandon a number of passenger service runs, while others were maintained with government subsidies. I understand that people must be allowed to travel as they please either by train, by bus, or by plane, but we must also take the energy problem into account. We hear quite often about energy shortage. I sincerely think that by using the best incentives to encourage people to travel by train, we could make this type of transportation more financially rewarding and possibly also reduce the amounts of subsidies.

Railways in Europe and Asia are still very popular thanks to the improvement made in passenger services. One has to take into account the continuous increase in the cost of gasoline. Today you pay as much tax on a gallon of gas as the gas itself is worth. That is a factor which cannot be ignored and which would tend to increase the preference for a means of transportation which is as cheap as possible. The issue of the day is not whether we need to have the choice of a passenger transportation railway service but rather whether we must start preparing right now for the needs of future transportation by improving existing facilities and railway equipment. If we do not start working towards that now, within 10 years we will have to bear the enormous cost of starting anew. This is a decision which must be taken right now.

The issue is no longer whether Canadians prefer driving their cars instead of riding trains, whether businessmen whose travel expenses are generally paid for prefer the comfort of a jet plane to that of a train. Truck and bus services should complement rail services but not replace them. Even for long distance trips, high speed trains are the most pleasant means of transportation. Modern trains could offer restaurant cars, movies and television. You can take a stroll on a train and have a drink with new acquaintances while looking at the landscape instead of the clouds.

Furthermore, with a greater number of passengers, fares should stop increasing. Besides, it would be quite interesting to know how many millions or billions of dollars are spent on the construction and especially the maintenance of freeways and highways. Snow removal, patch paving in the spring, salt and calcium spraying, accident tolls, all these may not be included in the cost of a bus fare but they are actually paid for through income tax. The maintenance of a rail line is ten times cheaper. It is false to say that the public prefers the road network. It is rather the poor service presently offered by a railway system which has not evolved since 1920 which is responsible for it and has compelled people to turn towards the road network.

At first, considerable investments would be required. Stations would have to be made attractive, heated in winter, equipped with stores, restaurants, free parking lots for cars and bikes. It would be healthy for many people to get there by foot; for others, a local bus service would have to be provided. Where would we get the money? Just go around Montreal and look at the mass of asphalt on the roads—I could have named other cities—bridges, overpasses and tunnel crossings, and they cannot seem to be able to find the necessary funds to eliminate railway crossings that kill every year.

The important thing is to improve the train service. This would require the introduction of ultra-rapid trains, the elimination of railway crossings and even the fencing of the track. Today track maintenance is being delayed, and I had an opportunity to talk about this very often. Fences are being neglected, and farmers near railway tracks are always concerned, wondering whether they will be able to keep their cattle on their land or if they will slip through the CN fences. But those investments could become viable with time. The main improvements would be in the quality of life, the ecology and passenger comfort. This reorganization would undoubtedly result in lay-offs but a lot less than in the implementation of the plans now being considered. It would be a matter of giving employees the opportunity of being rehired by the reorganized railway companies.

At present, the more we study the federal government transport policy the more confused it looks; its various organizations are working at cross purposes undertaking contradictory projects that have nothing in common except that they all cost the taxpayers millions of dollars. The Canadian Railway Labour Association mentioned in the brief it submitted to the Government of Canada on March 20, 1978, that it still believed strongly that the National Transportation Act and or the Railway Act should be amended so as to include provisions dealing with the protection of employees affected by the changes the government made to Canadian railways in the public interest and by the amalgamation of present railway companies with larger public or private corporations.

I shall quote, from a brief, an excerpt which I consider timely:

In past briefs and, in particular, in those recently presented to the government, the Canadian Railway Labour Association asked that railway employees unions be consulted, and that the government take steps to protect employees when it makes changes in the railway transportation system in Canada.

When we intervene in this regard, because many employees are worried about the future of their jobs, we are always told sweetly: We will protect those employees and transfer them to other services. But the fact remains that Canadian National or Canadian Pacific employees still worry in the face of coming changes. To go back to my quotation:

We are happy to point out the fact that the government has accepted that principle . . .

It has accepted the principle; it is now a matter of working towards achieving that goal.

. . . principle for changes it made in passenger services in Canada. Meaningful consultations were held with the government in 1977. One of the results of the consultations with the Minister of Transport and the officials of the Department of Labour and the Department of Transport was order in council P.C. 1977-2987, which was passed on October 20, 1977.

We congratulate the government on that initiative and we see in the provisions on the regulations dealing with the assistance to be given railway companies and employees who have to adjust to the changes in the railway passenger services a progressive step which should underlie all alterations made in the railway system in Canada, no matter what government brings them in, for the protection of the employees affected by those changes.

Special attention must be given the matter of employees transfers, bearing in mind their seniority in the service. I travel quite frequently by train. I meet a lot of employees who have 30, 32 or 35 years' seniority and who are really concerned about what may happen to them. Last night, I listened to those who, in this House, spoke intelligently about pensions. I know many railway employees who are deeply concerned about the poor allottment of pensions. As for those who feel still capable of working, they have given several years of their lives to maintening the transportation system.

Of course a great many factors cannot be ignored in the reorganization of those services. Members of the United Transportation Union (conductors and brakemen), local 415 Charny and 721 Quebec, and of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, local 558, Quebec and Charny, have brought to the attention of the minister the possible disadvantages of the proposed changes. They produced evidence based on statistics they had to indicate that some of these changes, particularly those related to the run along the CP tracks via Trois-Rivières, will be much less popular and profitable than the present CN route via Ste. Foy and Drummondville. I have here the text of a rather recent editorial dated February 27, 1978, of CJRP radio station which clearly indicates that some of the proposed changes are far from improving the services. And I think it will be useful to quote the text of this editorial prepared by people well aware of the situation. It is entitled: Where are our railway services going?, and I quote:

We have seldom dealt with the problem of local railway services in our editorials. The population probably thinks that the removal of railway tracks in St. Roch puts an end to the problem. The Gare du Palais was replaced by some kind of waiting room near St. Sacrement Avenue and the Ste. Foy station was renovated, but now we learn that it will be closed soon.

Of course, I heard many comments on this subject during my trips. The Gare du Palais will probably be reorganized because they will finally understand that this station in downtown Quebec City should be readily accessible to travellers. That is what it was designed for in the first place. The changes made do not satisfy the public. The quotation goes further:

The "Via Rail" service will soon be introduced between Quebec City and Montreal. It will use the Canadian Pacific tracks on the north shore, thereby condemning to oblivion the Ste. Foy station which is very frequently used by the CN rapido trains.

We find a little abnormal that only one station, badly located at that, should serve the localities of the north shore. It seems unthinkable to us that no plan has been devised to provide Quebec City with better installations. Services should originate from a more central point, say Limoilou, at the rear of the Colisee, in order to connect Montreal through Ste. Foy. As a matter of fact, it has been noted recently that the viaducts needed for the CN lines already exist: on Highway 2, at Saules, on Highway 175 towards Chicoutimi, on First Avenue, on 22nd street and on La Canardière. Consequently, the automobile traffic will not suffer. There is also another alternative, that is to use the maritime station of Foulons, which is already connected to the Ste. Foy station. Before, Quebec and Ste. Foy were well served by two stations, but soon there will be only one, and at a bad location.

Decisions such as those will not help the public see the advantages of train transportation. Moreover, millions are invested to upgrade the north shore lines, namely the CP line, while there is a sufficient number of good lines on the south shore. Besides, it should not be forgotten that it is the people of Ste. Foy who somehow filled the Rapidos. Perhaps that should be considered, instead of improving service by reducing it, in the hope that customers will also possibly decrease, which would be a pretext to discontinue the service altogether. That is a well known strategy of some North American carriers. Perhaps we should not consider Quebecers so dumb.

So, that is clear. I have had the opportunity to discuss it and we observe it regularly. Management tries to cut the staff down allegedly because that spells savings. Maintenance crews look after sections that are so long that they have a hard time doing their job, yet the number of office employees increases. Three or four $10,000 a year employees will be laid off so the company can put another $40,000 a year man behind a desk. That is definitely not the way to run a railroad, but it has been going on for a long time. The schedules are made up by those office people who know almost nothing of what a passenger service should be. I am certain of what I am saying; most of those who draw up the train schedules travel by car or plane. If they travelled more by train they would know what a well planned train schedule is.

Also, there is another thing those divisional office big shots forget, that is to consult the conductors and the train employees. Some of them have 25, 30, 35 years of service and invaluable experience. Instead of consulting these people, our high salaried office big shots decide with pencils and maps where and when the train will stop.

That is the kind of decisions they take, with the result that people have deserted the train. People have tried other means of transportation, and this has created such deficits that the railways can no longer pay the interests and the government has to take over and assume the debt, which is exactly what they are doing. This morning I listened to the answer to a question put by my colleague about taxation, about tax transfer. For example, a new conception of the Social Credit Party of Canada was mentioned, that is not to give tax refunds directly to the citizens. I should say that when it comes to taxes, the government should try to reduce theirs. They have so many taxes in their own jurisdiction that they have no need to rummage in the jurisdiction of the provinces.

I have here a copy of the newspaper Le Devoir. It says it cost $100,000 a day to support the dollar. Is that the new idea of the government on how to maintain an adequate financial system? This is a strange conception, and I wonder where this is leading us. It is surely not the way to establish a just society and to distribute fairly among Canadians the opportunities to improve living conditions.

I will add in conclusion that it must be admitted that the rail service has not always received the necessary promotion. This is due to different factors, such as the schedule which I mentioned a while ago and which is often altered without any consideration for regional needs. As I said the officials of the CN passenger service should consult experts to establish their schedules. The conductors who have been travelling on the railroad for years are knowledgeable. They are acquainted with the problems. They have generally a well-disposed crew. I do not criticize the train service as such. The crew is generally well trained. They are nice people but they are under a team of individuals who know nothing about the needs of prospective passengers. I hope that those matters will be seriously studied and that effective decisions will be taken to improve appreciably passenger services in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, first I would draw attention to a couple of the remarks I made in this House during an earlier stage of this debate. As reported at page 4860 on April 25 I said:

> The government has chosen to buy many rail cars for the west. I do not quarrel with that, if that is the right approach, but why has there not been a rationalized program to examine equipment shortages which exist across Canada and not just in the area of Canada in which the minister lives?

I would draw attention to one phrase I used in that quotation—the words "I do not quarrel with that".

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

As reported later, I said: "I do not want to be misinterpreted by any member of this House." I would almost think the minister qualifies in that category. I went on to say:

> I do not begrudge the St. Lawrence Valley the policy that the Government of Canada is exercising, but I want the same policy in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

I said I have no quarrel with the ports policy being exercised in the St. Lawrence Valley.

Now I should like to quote from the minister, as reported at page 5053. The minister stated:

> I find it extraordinary that a member of the Conservative Party can say that, when a colleague of his, a Conservative from New Brunswick, said in the debate the other day that we in this government are doing everything in transportation for the west.

Mr. Speaker, there is a sharp distinction of meaning between what I said and what the minister said, and he has pictured me in a mood which I did not express. I take umbrage at his accusation.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has chosen to make that accusation against me I would ask him whether he would not also like on the record at the same time the words he used, as recorded at page 4860 of Hansard:

> The government is selecting its political plums and spending its money in an unjust fashion, which brings about disunity in this nation. That is discrimination of the rankest kind. We are talking about the CNR and its recapitalization. We are going to double track through the Rockies, fix tracks across the prairies and examine tracks from Quebec City to Windsor—

That sounds to me like an accusation, a suggestion we are being unfair.

● (1512)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think we are actually getting into a debate. The minister is allowed to correct a declaration made by the hon. member but not to make another one. Otherwise, we would have a debate between two members.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this House is debate, and I assure Your Honour that I acknowledge having said precisely what I said. I do not retract it, nor do I qualify my statements in any way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: I do not quarrel with the expenditures in the west.

Mr. Lang: You call them unjust.

Mr. McCain: I do not quarrel with the expenditures in the west, and I made that extremely clear. The minister has chosen to refer to a single sentence from a speech of about 40 minutes. I said that I do not want anybody to misunderstand—and I quoted that for the record—that I do not quarrel with the expenditures which were being made, but that I do quarrel with the political plums which are being passed to some areas of Canada while the rest of Canada is ignored.

I repeat that the minister is responsible for policy and that he has not been capable of a rational transportation policy for all of Canada. Perhaps the minister would care to take note of the fact that at no time have I quarrelled with any recommendation in the Hall report which, among other things, encouraged the Government of Canada to spend more money to bring about a better grain transportation system in the west. The minister chooses to turn a deaf ear and to pay no heed to remarks which he does not care to hear, but I trust that in future he will be fair enough—if his past record does not show that—to quote the spirit of the remarks I make today and the remarks I have made earlier in this debate. I think a member of this House is entitled to fair play and to proper interpretation, not distortion. I submit that the remarks of the minister indicate that he is somewhat of a mental contortionist, and I wonder if his remarks could not be attributed to one who had malice aforethought in the expression of his opinion on the interpretation of my remarks.

The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) made a few remarks in this House about the wonderful transportation policy we presently have, but there were also things he did not say.

The spade which turns the sod at Charlo is almost worn out. There were promises in 1972, 1974 and in 1978, but we have nothing in Charlo yet. That was one of the political plums the hon. member was speaking about. It is needed. It is part of the government's policy. I have no quarrel with it, but I hope that the people in the area of Charlo and the hon. member who represents them will see to it this time that the government is held to its promises and that it does produce.

In his remarks the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador did not ask the government for a replacement for the Carson. There has been little, if any, conversation about a replacement for the Carson and about the service which is no longer of the same calibre. I was surprised when he was discussing this that the hon. member said he hoped there might be money for the development of transportation in Labrador, a part of his constituency. The hon. member was not as brave as other Liberal politicians have been. He did not promise Labrador that there would be development, but after all these years of being part of this country Labrador should certainly be entitled to federal expenditures of money to facilitate the development of that part of Newfoundland which is so subject to unemployment.

Transportation could well have been the key if we had had a rational, over-all national transportation policy long ago. It is easy to ignore the things which a backbencher cannot correct, so I presume that is the philosophy upon which he based his speech.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) made some extremely pertinent remarks today, but he closed them of in a rather irresponsible way when he referred to financial nit-picking. When we are dealing with a multi-billion dollar concern, I am sorry, but I cannot agree with anyone that any discussion of money in connection with this bill can be properly termed nit-picking. You cannot nit-pick with billions, and those are the amounts with which this bill deals.

Perhaps the minister would better understand what I mean by rationalizing the policy if I become repetitive. It is imperative in some debates that one be repetitive. I want to refer to a paper entitled "Opening remarks before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture, Ottawa, April 11, 1978 re: Main Estimates 1978-79, Canadian Livestock Feed Board". At page 15 of that submission to the Standing Committee on Agriculture there is a chart indicating freight rates for grains to selected destinations, July 31, 1970-1977. That shows that the rate from Thunder Bay to Moncton in 1970 was about $14.25, to be as accurate as I can reading from this chart. As of July 31, 1977 the rate was $25.20 per ton, an increase of between 85 per cent and 90 per cent, in round figures. The rate from Thunder Bay to Woodstock in 1970 was about $9.75, and in 1977 it was about $15.75, an increase of about 60 per cent to 65 per cent. In 1970 the rate from Thunder Bay to Sherbrooke was about $10.60, but it increased to $18.75 in 1977, an increase of about 80 per cent. From Calgary to Vancouver the rate was approximately $14.25 in 1970 and about $18.60 in 1977, a rate of increase of about 30 per cent.

I fault the transportation policy of this government because there is no rationalization and no basis upon which one can make proper comparisons or justify rate changes and increases. When rates increase by 30 per cent to 80 per cent in a seven-year period, there is evidence that this government is negligent regarding Canada's transportation needs. The fact that the government has withdrawn subsidies for grain transportation compounds the issue. It has voted a fixed sum of money for subsidies for grain transportation. That has distorted the cost of production of that part of the agricultural industry which requires feed for its product, which is detrimental to its competitive position in eastern Canada relative to the rest of Canada. That never was the intention of that part of agricultural transportation policy, yet that is what in fact has happened.

We are just scratching the surface when we talk about the CNR and its recapitalization. We are talking about a Crown corporation, yet since 1972 the minister has not favoured the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications with a single financial report of that Crown corporation. As the bill was introduced, there was no measure by which the House would ever see the financial statement of CNR in a recapitalized structure, and only by virtue of the fact that an amendment has been introduced, which we hope will be accepted on third reading, is there any hope whatsoever that the House shall be responsible to the people and to the electorate for knowledge of what the CNR is going to do.

The government did not choose to have many witnesses present and it did not choose to put many statements, briefs or outlines of what CNR proposes to do after this act is passed; it was only by painful extraction that some facts came to light. For instance, among the subsidiaries of CNR is CN trucking.

The Trucking Association appeared before the committee. I do not know whether or not they had these figures at their disposal at the time they made their appearance, but the intention of CNR for this year, 1978, is to spend $8.4 million in capital expenditures for trucking. In 1979 they will spend $8.3 million; in 1980 they will spend $9.5 million; in 1981, $13.4 million; in 1982, $11.6 million.

The trucking industry came to the rescue of Canada when the railways failed to serve as they historically had served this nation in the field of transportation, and people were compelled to turn to trucks. Trucking is now controlled by the various provincial authorities and by an element of influence at the federal level. What I want to point out to the House is that CNR projected expenditures in the trucking industry are in excess of $51 million in the next five years, and $51 million far, far exceeds the capital investment of the trucking companies which may run fourth, fifth or sixth of the individual trucking companies in that range in Canada.

What CNR plans to do is to spend more in five years than most trucking companies in Canada have accumulated in their lifetime, and this is publicly guaranteed, borrowed money which will go into competition with every trucker, bigger or smaller than CNR, in the private enterprise field in Canada. The minister smirks; that is his defence, a smirk or a contortion of facts.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on point of order. Since the hon. member chooses to refer to the fact that I was smiling, I think it is only fair to say that I was smiling because he obviously missed the point that was made in the committee, that if at any time he is arguing that railway rates are too low, thereby causing an undue problem for trucks, he should let us know and we would be glad to deal with it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Don't you know a point of order?

Mr. McCain: The minister is understandably touchy because he is on unstable and unpopular ground. My information is that this knowledge was not at the disposal of the trucking industry as it appeared before the committee. Whether it is right or wrong I have no way of proving, but I can tell him, as the trucking industry learned when this piece of paper was tabled in the committee, that although major capital expenditure is being authorized to enable CNR to compete with every other company in Canada, government guaranteed money is not available to their competitors, and this is unfair competition in the rankest sense of the word. They do not like it, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that if ever a motion for a six months' hoist of a bill was in order and was needed for the information of this House and for the public of Canada at large, it is on this subject matter.

Let us take a look at the communications investment which is anticipated. In 1978 they plan to spend $42 million; in 1979, $48 million; in 1980, $48 million; in 1981, $53 million; and in 1982, $58 million. In other words, every provincial telephone system, whether publicly or privately owned, will run into competition with government financed borrowing in excess of $200 million. I submit that this is pretty rough competition by a Crown corporation over which the House has no control. I think the telecommunications structure of Canada needs an opportunity to express itself on what impact $200 million of public money directly or indirectly invested in communications will have upon the systems which we presently have.

The government was made aware some years ago of the fact that telecommunications, the electronic transmission of messages, data, et cetera, were in competition with existing private companies, and they imposed upon every one of those companies in Canada a fee for the use of Telesat, which was premature and not required at that time. So whether it was a private corporation, such as NB Tel, or a public corporation, such as the provincial prairie-owned telephone structure, the subscribers, the taxpayers of Canada, paid extra money because of the almost compulsory subscription to the services of Telesat. Are we, in recapitalizing CNR and in authorizing, according to this sheet, $200 million of capital expenditure in the field of telecommunications again superimposing the investment of public money upon provincial and private money, to the detriment of the returns of either? I think we need to have the answers and the details as to how the $200 million are to be spent in this field.

I submit that the indication in this statement of capital intent by CNR shows that although we discussed the CN Tower in 1972, 1973 and 1974, public money is still going into that tower at the rate of $1.2 million in 1977 and $0.4 million in 1978; and I think this is perhaps one of the examples of how money can continue to be poured into publicly-owned structures or structures owned by Crown corporations.

We need six more months for a proper consideration of this bill and we need it in the worst possible way. We need it because the competition which will be generated through this Crown corporation will borrow all its money with the hidden guarantee of the Crown, because when a Crown corporation borrows money, it is implicit that the Crown is responsible for the repayment of the borrowings of its child. Yet these borrowings will go into competition with a lot of little people and some big people as expenditures are made down the line.

I suppose the greatest weakness in the bill can be found if one goes back and reads the story of the 1952 recapitalization of CNR. One finds that the arguments of CNR at that time were almost identical with those presented by the company today. But once they got rid of the debt which they then had, they went on a spending binge and in a ten-year period found they were further in debt than they had been in 1952 when the indebtedness was forgiven. The history of forgiveness of debt to CNR has been that it was merely a licence to embark upon the same program of indebtedness and obligation that it had practised prior to the time of its forgiveness. This has been the case in every instance.

If parliament, through this bill, can exercise any restraint over the operations of CNR, if it obliged the corporation to report to the House that it wishes to borrow $100 million to $500 million and to explain the purpose, it would be an entirely different kettle of fish; but by turning this creature loose, are we not loosening another menace on the treasury of Canada? Why can we in this House not have an element of opportunity to examine what is going on? I repeat, we have not had the privilege of looking at a financial statement of the CNR since 1971, and that is too long. We are to get a financial statement now by virtue of an amendment introduced by opposition members. That will give us an opportunity to look at the statement, and that is better than nothing; but a statement is a record of the past performance of the company and does not include any of its functions.

It may not be in order, if the Chairman were to be very careful in his rulings, for one to ask of a corporation at a given moment in time what its operating intentions are, where it is going to invest what it borrows and where is it going to invest what it earns. Theoretically and in practice we might be able to ask those questions, but with a minister of the type we presently have I anticipate we would be ruled out of order and not allowed to inquire into items because it would be said they are none of our business. I suggest they also would involve a competitive position with others.

We, then, have utterly and totally lost control of another Crown corporation. When we think of the record which has been revealed by former Crown corporations, I shudder to think of this. Historically the CNR has not acted in a responsible fashion. Historically AECL has been a problem child. Historically Crown corporations have not been coming forward under the policies of this government so that Canada may know what their performance is and what they may cost us.

We are putting another chapter in history where again a Crown corporation may act in the same irresponsible fashion as the CNR has prior to its dire need at this moment in time for recapitalization.

When I take a look at the various business sectors of this country in which the CNR, as a Crown corporation, will be competing, and when I think of some of my friends in the trucking industry, I cannot help but wonder how David can compete with Goliath, which is precisely what we will be allowing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg-North Centre): David won.

Mr. McCain: We are letting loose an economic Goliath which plans to spend $51 million to compete with the truckers of Canada, to compete with the communications system in Canada, to compete with the hotel system in Canada and to compete in every field that every one of the seventy odd subsidiaries of the CNR are engaged in now.

I wonder whether the government is prepared to give comparable income tax concessions to those companies which will be in competition, because this Goliath is not going to have to pay income tax as do the other corporations. Eventually, when its profits get massive enough, it has been decreed that it will pay a stipend to the Government of Canada. Are we then prepared to extend to all the competitors of the CNR in all its fields of endeavour the same income tax concessions? If we are not, we may be doing a favour to the CNR, but we may be doing a gross disfavour to those people in Canadan who depend upon other than the CNR for their transportation services and who find that those upon whom they depend are operating in a position of serious economic disadvantage.

This measure needs a six month hoist, and it needs input from all the fields of business in this country with which the CNR conglomerate will compete.

I think the public is entitled to know why this government would not allow the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of this House to invite the Auditor General to put some of the facts of the accounting and management practices of the CNR before it. What was there to hide? There was something to hide. It seems there was something the government did not want known.

The next question which I think logically follows is, why would the government's power in that committee refuse to allow the committee to invite the Auditor General to come before it to lay a plan for its future accounting before the House and the people of Canada, to outline to people who are perhaps not the best in the accounting field, namely, the members of this House, what plan could be adopted, what plan the government might insist should be adopted, and what one might expect, on the basis of the Auditor General's record in examining the company, to look forward to down the line if the same practices were to be followed? The government has something to hide, but what is it? I cannot see why there has not been a broader consideration of transportation policy just as much as the recapitalization of the CNR.

One of the studies made in respect of transportation showed that it took 23 days in time cycle for a carload of grain bound for an export destination. No country, no company and no businessman can afford to tie up a piece of equipment for 23 days on one round trip. Why should we not be allowed as a committee to go into the reasons for such an extension of time? Some years ago the fact was placed before the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that it took 23 days for a potato car to make a complete cycle, and that the competitive line took 14 to 18 days, on rather short hauls.

What is needed is a rationalization or study of the management of the railways. Why are they functioning in this way? Do they need more rates? Do they need more equipment? Or do they need better management? What is the minister and the department doing to examine the use of the &equipment which is presently in place? This is what we need to know, but there is no such information available to us because no study has been made, to the best of my knowledge, of management capabilities in the rail transportation system, or, for that matter, in the trucking transportation system in Canada.

Until such time as an evaluation of management capabilities of the CNR can be placed before us, should we be asked to sever from the railway Air Canada, the ferry services, passenger services and express services—all those loss leaders they have claimed? We should not be asked to sever these until there is a measurement of the company's capability in the management structure. That capability is not always measured by profit alone. It can be measured by degree of profit, but not by profit alone. When we find ourselves in a position of trying to determine what the traffic will bear, as the railways and the truckers do, without any knowledge of the cost of the operation, then we are being asked again to sign a blank cheque.

I should like to see a study of management capabilities and the utilization of equipment as it might relate to other transportation, and as we think it might relate to our own, because what such a study would show is that 50 years ago the time cycle for cars was better than it is today, and I am sure that would be the case based on the actual experience of people using the service at that point in time.

Let me repeat a statement I have made. Under this minister and this government the people of Canada have paid more to and received less from the transportation industry as the years have gone by, and that is something which does not apply to very many industries of a progressive nature in this nation.

● (1542)

Another thing that disturbs me is the fact that five years down the line the CNR will be at least as deeply in debt as it is on the days on which we are considering this bill. Something else that disturbs me is that they have announced this time that with recapitalization they are going on a massive expenditure program of capital investment, including equipment. When this was done in 1953 it was followed in a very short period of time by an expenditure of $751 million on equipment. The argument was, "Well, if we had the capital equipment we could move more stuff and make more money." History shows that they did not move more stock and they did not make more money but in fact had a debt which they never did pay off.

So here we go on another spending binge, another multi-billion dollar indebtedness program for a corporation which, by its record, has proven that it cannot make a profit. What we are doing is turning this Goliath loose and beyond our control where we will have nothing whatsoever to say about it. It is time we came back to what I call the discrimination of the transportation program as it relates to this government.

Do what the government must for transportation in British Columbia, the prairie area, Ontario, Quebec, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, for I will not criticize. I repeat for the minister's advantage, I do not criticize what has been sent to other jurisdictions. But I notice that the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta are not asked to pay for the double tracking through the Rockies. However, to upgrade transportation in New Brunswick, P.E.I., Nova Scotia and Newfoundland the government is prepared to do away with certain transportation subsidies which have been paid there if the four Atlantic provinces, the four poorest provinces in Canada, will match that great Santa Claus, the Minister of Transport, dollar for dollar.

I have no complaint with any other expenditure, but let us not go on two different courses in different regions in Canada. I will draw to the minister's attention again that I do not quarrel with the expenditures in the port structures of the St. Lawrence Valley, but I do quarrel with the insistence of this government that the province of New Brunswick use its money to develop the port of Saint John, and that the municipality of Dartmouth-Halifax and the province of Nova Scotia use its money for the development in the port of Halifax to any degree whatsoever, unless the same stands are to be applied elsewhere.

I do not complain that equipment is bought for the CNR or the CPR for the moving of Canadian products, but I do complain when Canadian producers of Canadian materials must use American railroads to ship apples from British Columbia to Toronto because of exorbitant Canadian freight rates. I do complain because wood producers in New Brunswick haul wood to Maine to load it on American lines because of exorbitant Canadian rates. I do complain that the rate structure applied in Atlantic Canada does not give us access to Canadian markets. And I do complain that the rate structure of export products through the ports of Canada in the maritime provinces is virtually prohibitive and far in excess of those of our competitors. I also complain that the facilities through which these products must be shipped are not maintained, nor are they expanded as required for the service of Atlantic Canada.

One might say that there is political pressure being brought to bear by Nova Scotia because it is a sort of sympathetic government down there, but it was not enough pressure to get the province and its municipalities off the financial hook for the development of the Nova Scotia harbour. They do not have to spend as much as Conservative New Brunswick, but they could not get off the hook completely.

This bill is just another partial approach to a major problem facing Canada. This country cannot and never will develop until such time as we have a totally rationalized transportation system which will spend the taxpayers' money where necessary for the proper development of Canada and the proper utilization of its resources, human, renewable and unrenewable. Until that time we have no right as a House of Commons to be asked to consider the recapitalization of the CNR, to turn Goliath loose to compete with the Davids in this country and making small businesses compete with the Crown corporation which we are creating. Its magnitude, Mr. Speaker, makes it impossible for the little guy to compete. The minister has suggested that if the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCain: Whether trucking rates are not competitive, whether they are too high or too low, is not the point that we are discussing in this bill. If the CNR rates are subsidized by Canadian money, then they in turn make it difficult for the trucking industry to survive in the private sector. That is the matter we must examine, and no more snide insinuations by the minister are necessary. We must have a study that will ensure national, rational development of policies in the field of transportation for all of Canada and not just parts.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to follow the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain). I have always been an admirer of his voice and his wisdom and I feel somewhat humble having to stand up and follow a man who can deliver a speech in the way that this member has put his shots to the CNR recapitalization bill.

Transportation, Mr. Speaker, is the key to achieving the development of many provinces in Canada. We are a large country and we have to get our goods and services from the interior to the ports in order that we can sell those goods and services. That is why it is important that every member in this House be concerned about the CNR and CPR trucking industry and other modes of transportation that are available to us.

I sat on the tranportation committee when I first came here as a member of parliament, and I enjoyed it very much. The past few years I have had to deal with other responsibilities, and I have not been able to get there as often as I would like. I still have a great interest, however, in the bills that come before this House regarding transportation and particularly in this bill, Bill C-17, regarding the recapitalization of the CNR.

The government has asked us to approve a bill recapitalizing the CNR. We have said, through our experience and questioning in committee, that at this time we would rather take a second look at the bill for six months to see whether it is really necessary that we pass this legislation at the present time. There are many circumstances that have come to light. One is the possible introduction of legislation dealing with Crown corporations. Another is the fact that the CNR is being relieved of one of its greatest non-economic burdens, the railway passenger system. Another that has been talked about by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is the readjustment of the Crowsnest pass rates. I shall come to that later, Mr. Speaker. Yet another is the question of the extent to which the Hall report recommendations regarding transportation will be implemented.

It was pointed out in committee that the projection of profits for the CNR is quite healthy, and I must say I am pleased to hear that. Figures were produced which give a comparison between what the profit for the company would be if this bill were passed and if it were not passed. They show the profits increasing from now until 1982 from $62 million per year to $141 million if the bill should pass, and from $136 million to $267 million if it should not pass.

In his remarks the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte showed that if the bill is passed the CNR will have a great amount of money to deal with and may go into another capitalization project, such as competition in the trucking or communication industries. It is therefore natural that members of the House would like more time to question the government and the CNR about whether it is entirely necessary to have this legislation at this time.

It bothers me that in committee, when Crown corporations are being considered, members have a great deal of difficulty—and we are elected to be the responsible shareholders of Crown corporations—getting answers to questions regarding their operations and intentions. It is time we took a long, hard look—perhaps even in camera—at giving committees authority to investigate the intentions and direction of Crown corporations. If we had that authority, then when we are asked to pass a bill involving $800 million we would know what would happen to the money. I think most members have experienced frustration in committees through our inability to get information.

I should like now to deal briefly with some of the history of th CNR and the Crowsnest pass rates. I think members of parliament and particularly those from agricultural areas in the prairie provinces will have to discuss these very intensively in the next few years. The Hall report—which this government has almost ignored—said that it is essential that agricultural produce be processed where there is the greatest advantage—that is, on the prairies.

In the beginning years of railway transportation in Canada, tracks criss-crossed many parts of the country that some enterprising people thought would be quite profitable; but it was soon realized that all areas were not profitable. Resolution of the problems involved led to the founding of the CNR. At the same time, the government was involved in building the CPR, so two great rail lines developed.

The various histories of the CPR—and I suggest hon. members should read all views—show that historians agree that when Mr. Van Horne wanted access to the Crowsnest area of Alberta and British Columbia, he was prepared to accept the Crowsnest pass rates in perpetuity. This was to allow the Crowsnest producers in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba to deliver their products to both coasts at a favourable rate.

When the CNR was created, members from all sides of this House realized it was essential that these rates also apply to that company. If we consult the debates of this House on this subject in 1925, we learn that even members from central Canada who had nothing to gain by allowing these rates to become statutory sided with members from western Canada. Thus, the Crowsnest rates were put on the law books of Canada.

Over the last 50 or 60 years, many royal commissions and study groups have examined the problems of these statutory rates. I suggest that all farmers in western Canada should be very cautious about giving them up for some unknown program of $200 million—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to resume consideration of notice of motion No. 16 and that the preceding notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the request of the parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED PROMOTION OF CLOSER RELATIONS WITH COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN

The House resumed, from Friday, December 16, 1977, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macquarrie:

That, in the opinion of this House, a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons should be established to consider the advisability of taking an initiative in promoting closer commercial and cultural relations between the Dominion of Canada and the communities of the Commonwealth Caribbean and that inter alia such committee should consider (a) subsidization of sea-borne transport between this country and the Commonwealth area (b) Canadian governmental assistance in the upgrading of the sea ports of Atlantic Canada (c) such tariff changes as might facilitate the exchange of commodities between the two areas (d) encouragement of the exchange of students of the two areas (e) recommending assistance towards meetings of political, business and educational leaders of the two regions with a view to stimulating a north-south exchange of goods, people, services and technology in a mutually advantageous way.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon it gives me great pleasure to resume debate on a motion put forward by our former colleague the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) who, over the years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. In the comings and goings of hon. members to this post and that post I apologize to him and to members of the House. It is not that his personality is so insignificant that he should not be noticed, but he used to sit up at this end of the House. One can understand he used to be up here at this end of the House, but he has now been transferred to a geographical location much to the left. But I am glad to say his political philosophies remain over here on the right.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

• (1602)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you sure?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Of that I am more than satisfied.

However, this motion fortunately comes back for its second round. I must say that during the period of some six or seven months that this House has been sitting that situation does not happen to very many motions. It was my good fortune to have one come up about three weeks ago, and now we have this one. This motion deserves this further debate. One has but to read Hansard of December 16 when, in a House that appears to have been much more populated on the eve of the Christmas holiday than this one, hon. members debated the motion put forward by my hon. friend.

It is a motion which I think is a classic example of one which should have come to a vote and decision many years ago. Our colleague the hon. member for Hillsborough has put forward the subject for discussion some 13 times in 13 sessions. He has certainly been faithful to his ideals in regard to the Caribbean. I think this House has done a disservice to our colleague in that it has never come to any decision on this. It has not expressed a definite opinion on the subject of Canada's relations with the Caribbean, notwithstanding the ingenuity, linguistic and otherwise, that the hon. member has shown in drafting his motions and changing their tenor. Now we see that he has gone to the extent of suggesting that a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons should be established to consider the advisability of taking an initiative. Gracious me, we have never seen such diplomatic language! It is "to consider the advisability of taking an initiative". That in itself is barely asking this House to breathe.

There is a motion of mine that was debated again the second time about three weeks ago. It is only the first time it has been presented in the House. I did not expect it to have any definite expression of opinion of the House but I have seen by the time of its second reading that there has been quite a different change in attitude toward the motion. There is a good chance that, if such a motion were presented by some hon. member some time next year when the House composition undoubtedly will be changed, it would not fall to a government backbencher to present such a motion and there would be a degree of acceptability.

I am very encouraged by the debate we have had in the House on the subject of removing the mandatory retirement age of 65. We have had expressions favourable to the principle that I have advocated from both sides of the House, and some hon. members on the government side delivered very thoughtful and well prepared speeches on the subject. We know that in the other place the motion has gone to a Senate committee where it is receiving favourable consideration.

I would have hoped that in this place a motion dealing with the relations of Canada and the Caribbean would have come to a conclusion. We have had many debates in which that subject has been canvassed. We have had many visits of delegations from the Caribbean, and vice versa. The hon. member for Hillsborough and myself, under the leadership of the hon. member of Algoma (Mr. Foster) as the president of the CPA, visited Trinidad and Jamaica late in January and early February. From time to time we receive members from the Caribbean legislatures as observers and participants in the Canadian CPA regional conferences. These are valuable exchanges and I hope to see many more.

But I do want to emphasize to hon. members that while my hon. friend from Hillsborough has used the vehicle of suggesting that we should appoint a special joint committee to consider the question, he is after something much more than that. I think he is right, and, of course, he does not exhaust the subject in any way at all. First of all, he has asked for consideration of the subsidization of sea-borne transport between this country and the Commonwealth area. When he and I entered this House there was regular ship traffic between the east coast ports and the Caribbean and it was subsidized. For some reason or another which is lost to me, ever since that sea-borne transport came to an end our relations with the Caribbean have not been nearly so good. Certainly I do not think our trade has advanced to the point it should had that transport remained in position. Then my friend wants to get in a little, shall we say, home development, or, as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) said, a little bit of local improvements, by the upgrading of the sea ports of Atlantic Canada.

Then we come to tariff changes. There have been some tariff changes. I must commend the hon. member for Algoma for his exposé of the formal relationships between Canada and the various Caribbean countries, CARICOM, and whatever may be the ultimate results of negotiations under way in the trade arrangements that may exist between Canada and the Caribbean countries. Of course, tariff changes have been put into effect about three years ago with regard to general preferences for developing countries. Mind you, one or two of them may not much longer be developing countries if one examines their economies. In some instances it would be difficult to look upon Trinidad as a developing country. It has a stable government and an enviable financial position because of its resources, and for a number of other reasons.

In so far as other countries are concerned, they have come away from colonial status only in recent years. Their economies are not diversified enough. Others have populations which are far too small and fragmented. The over-all picture must be considered. In Canada we cannot consider our relations with any particular one of the Caribbean countries. It seems to me that here is a heaven-sent opportunity for Canada tc really get down to brass tacks and, to use a trite phrase, "to put its money where its mouth is", at the same time without imposing our own standards. There is a very grave risk of doing that. It is our choice as to what should be done in some of these smaller countries in the Caribbean in order to improve their transportation facilities, whether they be port facilities or airports. There are some countries where educational facilities can help. I do not know whether it is any great help to bring some of their brighter people here to attend university because the tendency has been that they want to stay here. Then they are a permanent loss to their own country. In many instances I would prefer them to establish their own base of education rather than try to jump into the twentieth or twenty-first century in one leap. Let us look at it in the longer term of one or two generations.

In this connection, what happened in Taiwan in so far as education is concerned is a good example of what can be done. In 1949 there was general illiteracy, even down to the primary level. Now there is about 99 per cent attendance at elementary school, there is a correspondingly high attendance at secondary school and a very high attendance at university. Those attending university are not necessarily abroad. However, some are sent abroad and brought back.

The over-all advances in education in Taiwan are a good example of what should happen in countries we can help with education. Our plan should be on the basis of one to two generations. We should start at the elementary level and bring the children up through the high schools. We should not take the top 10 per cent and suddenly convert them into university students. We know that causes problems.

The provincial governments have decided to charge students from third world countries higher fees because of their colour. Most of it is racially motivated. Unfortunately, it has that inspiration. The Immigration Act which this House passed and the regulations come into force this month. A foreign student now has to come in almost like an immigrant. Application has to be made offshore. This is done without the student examining or being seen by the school which he or she wishes to attend. We are going at it in the wrong way. In this area I think we can do a great deal to help our Caribbean friends. I do not think we should look at them down our noses and say, "We will help you". There is then a tendency to patronize.

They also require capital for investment. However, we should not give the impression that we are offering plundering capital, that it is going to come in to skim off and to develop industry, using the people of those countries at the lower levels without teaching them management skills and what-have-you so that they can do the job.

I cannot say that I have a solution. The problem is difficult. There is the question whether there is going to be an investment which will be politically safe and whether there will be an adequate return on it without having negative effects upon the people in any country in which Canadians might wish to invest, whether it be in hotels or other businesses. They need the capital. We needed capital. In fact, we still need it. We resent it if owners of capital tell us how we are to do things or that Canadians in whatever business is developed will be kept down to be hewers of wood and drawers of water.

The idea of the hon. member for Hillsborough is the right way to proceed. Better relations between Canada and the Caribbean have to be developed after mature thought and careful examination.

If there is to be a body on parliament hill with the time to draw upon as wide experience as possible in order to examine a problem such as this, I believe a special joint committee is one of those structures. Adequately staffed or populated, the other House could certainly furnish the personnel or the structure for these deeper studies.

On that score I would commend our friend. I would also like to say that this is one of the motions one should be able to put to this House for an expression of opinion after a limited time. There is no sense bringing it forward year after year, which we see so much of on the order paper at the present time. This is an area where our rules committee should be able to make recommendations that can be brought forward for this House to adopt. On ten of these motions a year, for example, there could then be, after suitable debate, the provision of time for a vote. In that way we would be making progress.

The last idea I wish to put forward with regard to this question has to do with our own procedure. It would be very simple to handle. The hon. member for Hillsborough, the hon. member for Algoma, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and myself went to Trinidad and Jamaica in January. However, there has been no way to report to this House on what we saw. We travelled on a CPA organized tour for which parliament pays. It seems to me there should be some degree of reporting to the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. The hon. member may continue with unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I could complete my remarks before my time expired. I suggest that maybe half a dozen periods of private members' hour should be set aside for reports from presidents and leaders of various parliamentary delegations that go out on behalf of the parliamentarians of Canada. In this way we could share in the experiences of those hon. members and discuss the conclusions they have reached. After all, if the senators have found a way of doing this, there is no reason why we should not. It would be simple, to agree on a trial basis that the report of the president of the CPA, for example, on events at a particular conference might be made here in the House so that members could comment on it. Why has such a thing not been attempted?

● (1622)

I thank the hon. member for Hillsborough for providing me with this vehicle for putting forward some ideas with regard to the Caribbean and consideration of reports from members of travelling groups from this chamber, as well as with regard to bringing private members' motions to a decision so that this hour might be more useful as a forum for expressing our ideas.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I, too, congratulate the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) on putting forward this motion in the first place and on managing to have it debated a second time.

The hon. member is fond of harking back to the days of wind and sail when the normal trade routes ran north and south. This trading pattern, in which the Caribbean area was a vital element, resulted in an era of prosperity relative to the rest of the country which has not been equalled since. As an historian, the hon. member enjoys calling, in this instance, on the lessons of the past to predict the future, and I think he is on the right track now because of the extension of Canadian sovereignty out to 200 miles. There is, I am convinced, a new prospect for the prosperity of the maritime provinces. In the last two years we have added approximately 600,000 square miles to the waters under Canadian sovereignty, and over the next generation this will produce thousands of new jobs, mainly in the Atlantic provinces. The suggestion in the motion that we should now move to strengthen our relationship with the Caribbean is valid. It makes a lot of sense and I hope we can persuade the government to act on it.

One method by which we might proceed is suggested in the motion. If, by chance, we do not get through the debate today in time to vote on the establishment of this commitee, perhaps the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence could devote a number of hours to the study of the subject matter. There have been no discussions about this in advance so perhaps it would not be possible to arrange this today. Nevertheless, we have all known cases where the subject matter of motions has been referred to committees, and this is the suggestion I am throwing out.

There are certain guiding principles which I feel Canadian policy should adhere to strictly in this part of the world. First, we must try to treat all the Caribbean islands in the same way. We should not give more aid to one than to another. Second, we should never place ourselves in the position of creating a Canadian sphere of influence in the Caribbean because this would lead to the creation of an image of imperialism which no Canadian would wish to place upon our great northern democracy.

Finally, I should like to make a suggestion with regard to those islands in the Caribbean which have made overtures to Canada in favour of some kind of special relationship. I refer particularly to the Turks and Caicos. I am opposed to any such special relationship. I feel, though, the time is long overdue for an initiative by the Commonwealth itself which would provide for some kind of supranational authority or arrangement whereby colonies of the Commonwealth which do not wish to remain under colonial status but do not have the population to go it alone, would have an alternative whereby they could transfer sovereignty to a supranational authority in return for assistance and guidance from all Commonwealth countries. This idea might be discussed at some future Commonwealth conference. I hope we can provide an alternative for these small groups of islands which no longer wish to be administered from London but which do not want to try to go it alone for various reasons, possibly because if they did they would risk dangers to their own democratic institutions which would not be worth taking.

There are other things which we could do in the Caribbean as a helpful government if our aid is requested. We have all heard about the sugar cartel, how that London-based monopoly, Tate and Lyle, has over the centuries maintained a stranglehold on the economies of some of these islands. It strikes me that Canada could do more than it has done to assist these island economies to break this commercial stranglehold in line with the objective of the government to create a food policy which would assure long term prices for certain basic food products, of which sugar is one. Sugar ranks among the most important of those products. We could be doing something in the Caribbean which would help the local economies and over the long-term the Canadian consumer. If, however, the only result of our effort to stabilize sugar prices was to benefit this sugar monopoly operating out of London, I am afraid I simply would not support that kind of Canadian effort.

• (1632)

Finally, I want to tell the hon. member for Hillsborough that I personally will strongly support any effort by this House through the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence within the next few week to give consideration to the various suggestions contained in his motion.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to contribute briefly to this debate. I do not intend to use up my full time because I want there to be time for this matter to proceed to a vote. I congratulate the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for the breadth of his view over and above that other proposal which came before us at one time to single out one group of Caribbean islands for preferential treatment. I think the approach that the hon. member has taken in this motion to single out the Commonwealth Caribbean Islands as those to which we should direct our attention particularly is to be highly commended.

I also want to thank the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for the notion he brought forward toward the end of his remarks about the great need for all interparliamentary groups who attend meetings outside this country or even inside this country—because some of them do meet in Canada—to report to this House. I think this should not be a permissive operation; it should be mandatory that reports of the visits be made to this House in a formal way, and there should be provision for some sort of discussion on them, if only to indicate where visits have taken place, who has taken part in them, and what profit we as parliamentarians, whether we were part of the visiting group or not, derived from those visits.

There was a time when reports were made to this House. I recall very clearly in the opening days of the Canada-U.S. interparliamentary group that reports were prepared regularly and laid on the table here for all hon. members to see. They were entered into the record and were available to hon. members. I happen to have some recollection of that because I was secretary to the first three or four of those meetings in my capacity as head of the Commonwealth division in the Department of External Affairs. I was surprised when I came to this House to find that there was no provision for making reports of that sort.

I just wanted to comment on that and then come back to this Caribbean operation. I like the notion regarding seaborne traffic. I was very happy when there was a connection by sea from the east coast down through the Caribbean Islands to Trinidad and Tobago. A more delightful way of spending a holiday I cannot imagine. Unfortunately, I never had occasion to make use of those ships. I think they were called the Maple Leaf line.

Mr. Macquarrie: The "Lady" boats.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The "Lady" boats were there before the war and during the war. Unfortunately, some of them were lost during the war, if I remember correctly, some very sadly. In fact, some relatives of mine were lost with them. After the war there was the Maple Leaf line which was a gift, I believe, of the Canadian Commercial Corporation or CIDA to the Caribbean Islands for inter-island trade.

I think there is much to be said for developing a similar route from an eastern Canadian port to the Islands and back to Canada. In that connection I think it is important that we try to develop trade in those products for which the Caribbean Islands are highly reputed, and with good reason. I think it was the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) who mentioned sugar. Sugar certainly is one of them. That is a freight cargo, but there are other perishable commodities which we should be able to buy from our Caribbean neighbours, to our advantage. We now buy many of our products from that producer immediately to the south of us, so much so that our trade has become unbalanced.

It is strange that in the trade figures of many banana exporters in Central and South America Canada is not mentioned. We buy our bananas from the United States which, with the exception of Hawaii, does not produce bananas. We buy our bananas through the United States, and our trade in bananas is regulated with the United States, which is absolute nonsense. When the time comes to work out reciprocal trade agreements with Central American or Caribbean countries—I think Caribbean countries ship their bananas mainly to Britain—we should be buying our bananas directly from the Caribbean and not from the United States, which imports them from Equador, Hawaii, Costa Rica or Nicaragua.

We should be trading with countries of origin, which is a very simple matter. I wonder where our coffee comes from and how much of it is imported directly. I cannot remember on that one. Jamaica produces a very good grade of coffee; I think they call it Blue Mountain coffee. They are proud of it, and rightly so. There are other products as well. I think we buy pineapples from the United States and perhaps a few from the Caribbean. We buy papaws, mangoes and avocados. I suppose we get mangoes from the Caribbean, but not in the quantities we ought. We probably buy our mangoes mainly from California.

I am not going to push this too much longer, but in the regulation of this trade I do not think it is beyond the wit of man in this special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons suggested by the hon. member for Hillsborough to work out some means for developing a monetary policy which would facilitate transfers of capital and settlement of trade in international accounts on preferential terms between Canada and the Caribbean. There once was a thing called the British preference. That British preference has largely disappeared. If it has not disappeared entirely, I think with the Tokyo Round in Geneva it will have completely disappeared as far as Canada is concerned. Why can we not develop a Canada-Caribbean preferential trade system? That could be done within the GATT, if necessary, to our mutual advantage. It would be advantageous not just for Canada but also for the countries which could supply the things we need. Those countries could provide a lot of produce for us. In that way they would be able to stand on their own feet, knowing that they would be paying their own way, as they want to do, and not just be recipients of aid. They want to pay their own way by producing the things people want.

We would want in return, of course, to visit, possibly under preferential money terms. Why should we not? I am not suggesting a monetary union. Maybe that would be the long term objective, but we can work towards it. We could have a sort of Common Market, if you like; not as the first stage, not in the first year, but we might work towards it.

In these respects—I am thinking particularly of the transport of goods and of the goods themselves—there are many areas where we might give assistance. The hon. member for Edmonton West mentioned schooling. We have assisted in the development of the University of the West Indies. I think we should go on doing that, provided the local circumstances are such that people within the area can improve their educational standards and return and deliver to the countries from which they came the techniques and the cultural development which are so necessary there. And we should send some of our university students there to learn something of the ways of that part of the world.

There is so much to be commended in this resolution that I think it is time we had a vote on it. It is before us now a second time. I hope that it is not the intention of the government to talk it out on this occasion.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, as others have done before me, I, too, wish to commend the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for presenting this motion. He has been a good friend of the Caribbean for a very long period of time. I attended many Canadian-Caribbean lunches under the auspices of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, Canadian branch, and these luncheons were hosted by the hon. member for Hillsborough. I would say that hon. members who went to those meetings learned a great deal from the hon. member for Hillsborough, who always presided graciously and with generous amounts of wit and wisdom.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: I note that the hon. member for Hillsborough is present in the House today, and I wish to express publicly what I have already said to him privately, that we will miss the hon. member here in this chamber. His speeches, as we all know, were always models of good English usage and, I would add, they were never unduly long.

I know all members of the House hope that the hon. member for Hillsborough will find his return to the academic world satisfying and stimulating. We know that his students will be well tutored in the science as well as in the art of politics.

As I said at the beginning, my colleague and my friend, the hon. member for Hillsborough, the mover of this motion, has exhibited a long standing interest in the Caribbean, and he is once again to be commended for the dedication he brings to ensuring that the attention of parliament is directed towards our policy vis-à-vis the Commonwealth Caribbean. Canada's long relationship with this part of the world goes well back in history, to a period when particularly our maritime provinces were in constant contact with the sugar, rum and spice producing islands. What a sight these eighteenth century ships must have presented in the Canadian and Caribbean harbours!

Today's traffic between Canada and these Caribbean countries may be less dramatic, given the absence of sailing ships, but it is no less extensive. Quite the contrary, in terms of cargo volumes and passengers travelling in each direction, the relationship has expanded dramatically over the past two centuries, to say nothing of the increased cultural and other contacts which have become a feature of the last few decades. I shall have more to say on this subject in a moment.

I presume that the motion, in referring to the Commonwealth Caribbean, addresses the entire range of former British possessions in and around the Caribbean, including the now independent countries of the Bahamas, Grenada, Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago, Guyana and Jamaica as well as the other islands which have different constitutional status. It would be well to bear in mind not only the physical differences among the islands, but also their constitutional variety.

The countries just mentioned are completely independent of Great Britain, while others such as Montserrat, the Turks and Caicos, the British Virgin Islands and the Caymans are Crown colonies. Still others comprise the West Indies Associated States. These states—Antigua, Dominica, St. Vincent, St. Lucia and St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla—are self-governing countries for whom Britain retains responsibility over defence and external affairs. Bermuda and Belize are in a similar situation. The House will note that these territories, with different constitutional status, are widely scattered—from Guyana in South America to Bermuda in the Atlantic. Some cannot accurately be described as Caribbean at all, but for purposes of further discussion I shall include them all since they do have the common denomination of a British colonial background.

The great distances between these islands and their different histories have contributed considerably to their individual identities which, to a casual observer, may not be evident at first glance. The Caribbeans are nevertheless as proud of their individual countries and traditions as we are. Their cultural variety is frequently as profoundly different as is their topography, which can vary from lush volcanic to arid and rocky, most, of course, being liberally endowed with glorious sunny beaches, many of which Canadians know very well. We must not, therefore, make the mistake of considering them as a homogeneous unit even when we speak in terms of the Commonwealth Caribbean.

I have mentioned the constitutional diversity in part to point out another aspect of these island nations' futures, namely that several of them will soon achieve independence and will therefore be taking their rightful place in the international councils of the world. We should not be surprised to see at least two Associated States become independent this year and possibly two or even three in the following year. Even once they become independent, however, they will still share with us, despite all of their rich diversity, the bond of Commonwealth traditions.

Because we are aware of our bond with the Caribbean and of all the elements particular to each of these nations, we have always proceeded, in our desire constantly to develop and intensify our relations with them in a pragmatic manner, without ever imposing rigid and artificial constraints which would not correspond to our mutual interests and would not be a true reflection of reality. Thus our relations have developed on three levels: that of bilateral relations through direct government-to-government contacts; that of regional relations within the context of organizations developed by the Caribbean Commonwealth itself, such as the Caribbean Development Bank and CARICOM, Caribbean Common Market; and the third level of relations is multilateral, particularly within the Commonwealth. I should point out that in each of these levels Canadian action has been intensified in the course of the past ten years, nor has it ever before been so visible or varied. We should, therefore, congratulate ourselves on the mechanisms put in place which have permitted us to achieve considerable positive results.

Our aid program in the Commonwealth Caribbean is constantly increasing and is currently set at $30 million per year, which represents the largest per capita disbursement of aid furnished by Canada throughout the world. We began this program in 1958 at which time our assistance went to the Federation of the West Indies, as it was then constituted. At that time it included Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, Barbados, and some of the Leeward and Windward Islands.

Up to that time our aid funds had been reserved for the Colombo Plan. When the Federation was dissolved in 1962 we carried on the program and it has been increasing ever since. Our chief preoccupation at that time was to encourage the development of the common services which the islands needed to facilitate relations among themselves. For example, of the $10 million spread over the first five years of our program, $7 million were employed to develop a transportation system between the islands. Subsequently Canadian development assistance was accorded for distinct programs with each of the islands. Guyana, then British Guiana, and Belize, then British Honduras, were not included in the original programs but they did benefit from the commonwealth technical assistance program which was launched in 1958, and since 1963 they too have become CIDA aid recipients.

In 1964 Jamaica, Guyana and Trinidad and Tobago received separate budgetary allocations as well as lines of credit. In 1966 the program had achieved a minimum value of $15 million per year for the region. This did not include such special projects as that of the University of the West Indies, in respect of which we gave $5 million. In fact, between 1966 and 1971 we spent $100 million, which was 33 per cent more than we had committed ourselves to spending. Since then this sum has nearly doubled for that area of the world.

As hon. members know, the Canadian International Development Agency revised its aid strategy in 1966 and modified its priorities in the Commonwealth Caribbean. Of course, the region will continue to receive our largest per capita aid disbursements, but the program will no longer be based on the social and industrial infrastructure but rather on the development of productive employment and agriculture.

This will not eliminate all of their problems considering the current world economic climate and the serious problems which these countries will face in the domains of unemployment, instability of primary material prices, the great expense of imports and deficits in their balance of payments. This situation has brought about certain special measures on the bilateral level and through the international multilateral organizations such as the International Monetary Fund. But Canada is determined to pursue more than ever its policy of development aid to permit these countries to arrive at the economic take-off point.

A number of these developments of the past few years in our development aid to the Caribbean Commonwealth, I am pleased to report, correspond to the recommendations made by the Standing Committee for Foreign Affairs of the Canadian Senate, in its report of 1970 on Canadian-Caribbean relations. As this report suggested, Canada has continued to concentrate a good part of its aid in this region on the smallest of the islands, placing a major emphasis on developing the resources of these countries and giving to the program a maximum effectiveness, thanks to a systematic co-ordination of its initiatives.

Let me say a word on the commercial side. The volume of exchanges is also very considerable, and in 1976 it reached the level of $120 million, which was made up of $90 million of Canadian exports and $30 million of imports from the Caribbean. Unfortunately, these figures are lower than they were in the previous year because we were faced with two serious difficulties. The first was certain restrictions which countries such as Dominica and Guyana imposed on our products, and the over-all effect of the cancellation of preferential tariffs which was brought about by the Lomé Convention signed between the European Economic Community and a large part of the third world. Nevertheless, we continue to be optimistic about future prospects in this region. The eventual signature of a commercial agreement between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean could well serve as a stimulant to this exchange.

From the point of view of investment, if I may say a word about that, Canada plays a substantial role in sectors such as tourism, the aluminum and bauxite industries and banking. It appears that investment possibilities will increase despite the priority given by certain of these countries to public investment. We hope that here, too, the eventual signature of an agreement between Canada and the members of the Caribbean Common Market, called CARICOM, will facilitate this type of development.

Finally, in the political domain we should bear in mind the constant exchange of visits in both directions which, in the recent past few years, have included visits to Canada by the Prime Ministers of Guyana and Jamaica. In addition, in 1977 we had the pleasure of receiving Prime Minister Gairy of Grenada, Prime Minister Bradshaw of St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, Prime Minister Bird of Antigua, Prime Minister Price of Belize, President Clarke of Trinidad and Tobago, Governor General deGale of Grenada, and no less than a dozen other distinguished personalities from these various countries who attended the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference held here in Ottawa.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Penner: I think some hon. members who are failing to pay attention to the importance of these relations will recall that they met some of these distinguished gentlemen, if they were free to attend the conference.

These meetings were equally numerous in the Commonwealth context both at the level of heads of state or government, such as the meeting in London last spring, and at the ministerial level, such as the finance ministers' conference in Kingston last October. It seems evident to me—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RIGHT OF ISRAEL TO PEACE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope the government will take cognizance of my motion and not say "No". I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the fact that today is the thirtieth anniversary of the foundation of the State of Israel following the holocaust in which six million Jews lost their lives during World War II.

In view of the fact that in just three decades the Israelis have pioneered what is today a great nation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek):

That this House reaffirms the right of the State of Israel to exist in peace with its neighbours, and further reaffirms the right of Israel to secure borders consistent with the need of all the peoples of the Middle East for a just and lasting peace.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this is an important motion and we would like to consider it before registering an opinion. Perhaps it could be held over until tomorrow.

FISHERIES

PRESERVATION OF CANADIAN FISHING INTERESTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Canadian and U.S. fisheries negotiators have met regularly since last October and consulted closely with their respective provincial, state and industry interests regarding reciprocal fishing agreements in coastal waters, and in view of the fact that arrangements—at least for the 1978 fishing year—have been successfully negotiated and await only Congressional approval, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Canadian government move in the quickest possible fashion to promote and preserve Canadian fishing interests by appealing the U.S. District Court injunction forbidding Canadian boats from fishing in western U.S. coastal waters.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT OF MEMBER REGARDING LAY-OFFS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. All members of this House have learned to appreciate the humour of the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). However, it is no funny matter for that member to say publicly that if his leader becomes prime minister of this country, 60,000 public servants will be laid off. I, therefore move, seconded by the member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That the hon. member cease and desist from making such deplorable and irresponsible statements.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SPORTS

INQUIRY INTO MANAGEMENT OF SPORT CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity related to the incompetence of the ministry of amateur sport under whose responsibility Sport Canada and many amateur sport and recreational associations have cost taxpayers nearly $9 million over a period of five years due to errors, mismanagement and sloppy administration.

In view of the fact that official recommendations were made as much as 2½ years before a new and separate ministry was established with the objective of providing competent management to the many Canadians dedicated to the betterment of sport and fitness in Canada, and because it is now apparent that no such positive management has been provided, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House instruct the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) to initiate forthwith either a public or departmental inquiry under the Inquiries Act into the mismanagement and incompetent activities of the ministry and its officials at Sport Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL MARINE OPERATIONS ON EAST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. In view of the assurance given me by the general manager of Canadian National Marine, Mr. Rupert Tingley, on Thursday last that "there was no foundation whatsoever to rumours that CN Marine was contemplating any removal of their operations at the port of North Sydney", and in view of the information provided last Friday—the next day—by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in this House that the second rail car ferry, the Sir Robert Bond now taken out of service between North Sydney and Newfoundland was not going to be replaced, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the minister or his deputy minister attend an urgent meeting on Wednesday, May 10, called by Mayor T. R. Young of North Sydney to discuss the present and future status at both the Port aux Basques and North Sydney ferry terminals with reference to the disastrous cutbacks by CN Marine and the effect that they are having on the economic and social lives of both communities, and if either the minister or his deputy minister cannot attend, that a top official from Canadian National attend and provide answers to the many questions that are causing such great concern to all Canadian National workers involved and the public in general.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE WAR DISABILITY PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in the hope that the legislation referred to in my motion will be presented this week. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That it be a House order that any bill introduced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs at any time this month to raise the basic rate of the war disability pension, or to modify the 48 per cent rule respecting pensions for the widows of veterans, or both, be dealt with at second reading, considered in a committee of the whole House and given third reading in one sitting day.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HOUSING

UNEMPLOYMENT IN CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): My question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs whose tenure at his post has been marked by an obsession with the numbers game when it comes to housing starts. Now that the housing starts for the month of April are revealed to have fallen over 100,000 at a time in the spring when they should be rising, will the minister tell the House whether he can confirm Central Mortgage and Housing projections that the number of houses built this year will decline, and will he tell the House what his government plans to do to provide a measure of security to the construction industry where unemployment now stands at 30 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the number of housing starts has decreased during the past month, but we should not be unduly concerned. The projections extending over several months show indeed that we will attain our objectives and build about one million houses during a four-year period. We are well within that projection and there is nothing to be worried about.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is an adequate answer, having regard to the current rate of decline in housing starts of some 17 per cent over the last year and the fact that 74,000 workers in the construction industry will lose their jobs this year if the decline continues.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mrs. Pigott: My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, relates to the shocking disregard for federal-provincial relations which the minister showed when he rushed out his election package last week to the provincial housing ministers. Bearing in mind the telegrams the minister has received from provincial ministers, one of which sent by the Ontario minister of housing itemized four major areas of concern and another of which called into question the minister's and I quote—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, will she please put it.

Mrs. Pigott: I ask the minister why he cancelled the consultative meeting in April with his provincial counterparts and sent the peremptory telegrams instead? Will he tell the House why he has not answered the ministers' request to meet with them this month?

Mr. Paproski: He does not believe in consultation.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is drafting the hon. member's questions but they are full of incredible inaccuracies. It would take me too much time to answer each point raised by the hon. member. Next week I will appear before the committee responsible for housing and I will take this opportunity to answer specifically the mistaken statements made by the hon. member.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister would specify exactly what he means by "incorrect." All my figures are taken from his department.

An hon. Member: That is what is wrong.

Mrs. Pigott: There is a specific program I would ask the minister about. His proposals will increase the cost of a $35,000 mortgage by nearly $10,000, according to industry spokesmen. When the Minister of Finance's increase of one full percentage point in interest rates is added on top of that, it is easy to see why people are defaulting in record numbers on AHOP mortgages. Bearing in mind that under this government real incomes are actually falling, will the minister tell the House why he still refuses to adopt the policy of this party and allow for at least partial deductibility of mortgage interest against income tax?

● (1417)

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the proposal which I advanced last week following consultations with the provinces has been welcomed, in spite of what the hon. member believes, by the most important group in the house building trade in Canada, the HUDAC group. Indeed, their president stated that it was quite a suitable step taken in the right direction.

THE BUDGET

MEASURES TO ASSIST HOUSING INDUSTRY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister prepared to admit that the budget which was brought down a short while ago has done almost nothing to aid the construction industry and housing? Will he tell the House why he has not brought forth measures to assist the industry, which is one of the worst hit in Canada with, as my colleague said, 30 per cent unemployment at the present time—a figure which may even increase?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what my colleague said. We, of course, recognize that in the month of April starts were less than predicted. However, I must tell the hon. member that for the first three months of the year starts were greater in number than had been predicted.

HOUSING

APPEARANCE OF CMHC PRESIDENT BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In keeping with the tradition and duty of this institution of being the guardian of the public purse, and in exercising this duty through scrutiny of estimates in committee, and in view of the mounting concern about housing in this country, will the minister consider allowing the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to appear before the standing committee of the House?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And give evidence.

Mr. Darling: And give evidence?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did appear before that committee and I was accompanied by a group of officials from my department who were ready and willing to answer questions provided the opposition members would agree to ask them through the chairman of that committee according to our long-standing procedure which stipulates that a minister can be asked questions and that if he agrees, he can have his department officials answer on his behalf. Now the argument which was raised last week by the hon. member for St. John's East had to do with quite an inappropriate point of procedure. As a matter of fact, I was never asked directly to allow my official to answer on my behalf. If that question had been put to him, he would most certainly have been allowed to answer but the hon. member for St. John's East was definitely more interested in raising a point of order than in actually obtaining answers.

[English]

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I was present at that meeting. I ask, again, because we directed questions to the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and I will concede that the chairman ruled it out—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, he should put it rather than make an argument.

Mr. Darling: Will the Minister of State for Urban Affairs let the chief administrative officer of CMHC answer questions when we are in committee next week?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can arrive on time at the meeting and stay until the end, he will get answers to all the questions he may be prepared to ask.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN VESSELS FISHING OFF WEST COAST

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Considering that a United States District Court judge has issued an injunction forbidding Canadian fishermen to fish off the west coast of the United States, will the minister inform the House what action the Government of Canada has taken? More specifically, since this is the second year in a row that there has been violation of this treaty on the American side, can the minister assure the House that so long as Canadian fishermen are prohibited from enjoying the right they have under the treaty to fish off the United States coast, similar action will be taken restricting American fishermen from fishing off the coast of Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the judge who granted the injunction gave the United States' administration, according to the memo I have, seven days to appeal the order; therefore, the order will not come into effect before May 12. As the hon. member may not know, I should inform him that there have been discussions between our officials and the American officials about this temporary agreement. The two special negotiators, Ambassadors Cadieux and Cutler, are to meet this week in Ottawa. If the agreement is not operative, or if it is not valid, obviously neither side, Canadian or American, will be bound by it. However, I would prefer to see the two fisheries negotiators try to find common ground before answering the hon. member's second question.

I might add that the preface to the hon. member's question was somewhat misleading. In response to the American action last year there was, in fact, a Canadian reaction which was to close our own shrimp fishery to United States boats.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not comment on whether there was reciprocal action last year; my question concerned whether serious action would be taken this year. I ask the minister this question and perhaps his reply will be more specific: If the decision is finally reached in the United States on this matter within a week or so, can the minister assure us that should Canadian fishermen be denied the right under the treaty to fish off the west coast of the United States, the Canadian government will take similar action vis-à-vis American fishermen off the coast of Canada?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): It is evident that if the American side does not live up to the agreement, the Canadian side would not be bound to it either.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister is still not being perfectly clear: not being bound by a treaty is not the same as saying the other side will not be allowed to fish. I ask the minister this question: Considering that on May 15, under the provisions of the same treaty, Canadian halibut vessels were guaranteed access to fisheries off the coast of Alaska, can the hon. gentleman assure the House that last week's decision in the United States will not affect this commitment also?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I understand that last week's decision related to salmon only. However, I will check to make sure that I am not giving the hon. member inaccurate information. If that is not the case, I will, of course, inform him and the House tomorrow.

HOUSING

CMHC MORTGAGE LOAN REPAYMENTS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

The minister announced recently a new policy providing for graduated payment mortgages which would have the effect of increasing by more than $9,000 the financial cost of housing. Can he tell us whether this measure which has an adverse effect on the small owner was taken following a meeting with private lenders or whether this decision was taken at their request?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when talking about this mode of financing by graduated payments, the hon. member should understand that this method gives access to ownership to a relatively young family which would like to buy a house but has not got the financial resources of a person who has been established for a long time, and provides for much lower monthly payments in the first years of occupancy. These graduated payments increase as the incomes of the family increase. This method, which is largely used in the United States, enables young families to buy a house sooner than expected to live in it and to benefit from it from the very first years of their family life.

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF MORTGAGE SYSTEM BY PROGRESSIVE REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the problems encountered by wage earners who want to become home owners, precisely because of the high cost of housing, and since this additional $10,000 charge will only increase those problems—if not when a family is starting off then later on, there is not much difference—would the minister be willing to reconsider his decision and agree to lower the interest rate so that more people may actually own their own homes?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member does not understand the basic difference. The rate at which the mortgage is paid off increases along with the owner's income. In other words, we assist him when he has just bought the house and cannot repay a large sum. So the payments are very low in the first years and gradually increase as the individual's income increases over the years. So this is a crucial aid we want to provide to the new home owner. With regard to the hon. member's suggestion that we reduce the interest rate, the government did consider it, not for workers who earn a good salary, but for very low income groups. We will provide an annual subsidy which will largely help in lowering the interest rate to almost 1 per cent for non-profit organizations and cooperative groups.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE STATUS FOR SOUTH KOREAN VICE-CONSUL

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I would direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It relates to reported activities of foreign agents, namely, those in the employ of the Korean Central Intelligence Agency and specifically to the situation whereby a vice-consul of the South Korean consulate has applied for refugee status. Can the minister tell the House whether that refugee status has been granted and, more particularly, can he confirm that there were intelligence activities in Canada directed against that vice-consul, Mr. Yang, by members of the KCIA?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to answer the second part of the hon. member's question, he is correct that there are only allegations to that effect. I am certainly not privy to that particular information at this time. With respect to the first part of the question, an application for refugee status was made by a vice-consul, Yung-Man Yang.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I asked whether that application had been favourably received. I am not sure what the minister is privy to, but I hope that if there are agents of the KCIA operating in Canada and harassing those of Korean nationality or Korean origin, the minister would be privy to what is going on. I therefore ask for his assurance that this was a specific, isolated incident in which four of these agents allegedly had as their objective, Mr. Yang. If he cannot give us that assurance, will he undertake to inform the House, at the earliest possible date, of the nature and extent of the activities of the KCIA in Canada?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. The application for refugee status is being studied at the present time by the Refugee Status Advisory Committee. We anticipate a decision within a month. In so far as allegations of the nature suggested by the hon. member are concerned, obviously if they existed they would be checked out by the RCMP.

SPORTS

MANAGEMENT OF SPORTS AND RECREATIONAL ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport): it relates to the massive and costly blunders within the minister's portfolio which have left 50 or so amateur sport and recreation associations in debt to the tune of $8.3 million.

The minister well knows that I respect her objectives. However, in light of these revelations by official auditors, will the minister tell the House why she or her predecessor, who is now the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, failed to provide competent management to the many sport and recreation associations, and what counter-measures are being taken against the incompetence which failed to protect taxpayer's money as well as the interests of amateur sport in Canada?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I think the most important point is that all the moneys have been retrieved. They have been retrieved under my direction. This action has been strongly and decisively taken with the full co-operation of all the sport-governing bodies involved.

I want to give the hon. member some facts and figures. There was not $8 million outstanding; the amount outstanding was $5.258 million. There were over 756 projects and 98 associations. That was the audit as of March 31, 1977. The audit as of March 31, 1978, is as follows: seven associations, 26 projects, and $200,000 outstanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1432)

Mrs. Campagnolo: I would still like to give the hon. member one small piece of information: to date there has been no cost to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the minister's answer, it is my understanding that the result of the mismanagement which did occur is that it threatens the basis of a number of amateur sport bodies in this country. Can the minister say what disciplinary action she has taken against those responsible for creating the mess—whether or not the mess has now been established—and what steps is the minister taking to ensure that it will not happen again in this country? It is obvious that a lot of mismanagement did take place in her department in the past.

Mrs. Campagnolo: The hon. member is well aware of how sport-governing bodies in this country operate. They are autonomous and they have operated through a different style of adminstration, through amateurs and volunteers, from one end of the country to the other. They have done their very best to be responsible, but in difficult circumstances. It was for that reason that this government undertook to put into force the National Sport and Recreation Administration Centre which allowed a proper base of administration for the various sport-governing bodies which are part of the over-all sport group in Canada.

I believe that on the matter of fiscal responsibility, the facts and figures which I have already given the hon. member speak for themselves; but I am also determined that there must be stronger action—which was needed—so I did a rather unusual thing: I asked the Auditor General to set up a specific program for sport-governing bodies in this country. This was undertaken many months ago. It is now in full force and all sport-governing bodies are co-operating and returning dollars in the way they should, and advancing their programs in an orderly manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: We want Iona as minister of finance.

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

POST OFFICE

CLOSING OF TERMINAL IN TORONTO

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Postmaster General. Could he inform the House if terminal A, on Front Street in Toronto, has been closed down, resulting in the transfer of the bulk and parcel mailing facility on a temporary basis to the Canadian Arsenals warehouses which are not ready for handling this procedure? Also, can the hon. gentleman inform us whether this is causing a backlog in mail from and to western Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in view of what happened to my colleague from Brandon-Souris, I had better answer in French to avoid any play on words in English and make sure that I am perfectly understood. I have no information concerning any backlog of parcels at the present time in the Toronto area. I think that any backlog at this time is minor and normal and that it should be possible to deliver these parcels without any delay.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: With respect to the emergency operation at Canadian Arsenals warehouses, can the hon. gentleman indicate whether this results from the breakdown of the computerized operation at the Gateway terminal because of the failure of the COMDEV computers to operate successfully? Also, to overcome the problem is the Postmaster General considering calling for new tenders for new equipment which will make it possible to use the expensive equipment at Gateway and remove the backlog which, I am sure, if he inquires, he will find is already occurring in the warehouse operation and also will remove the hazards to inside postal workers at the Gateway plant referred to in a recent article in the Globe and Mail?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the postal workers are running any risks by working in Gateway. There is no question either of calling for new tenders to replace the equipment already there. Any problems resulting from mechanization are only normal. In the development of a technology such as the one we are now developing in the Post Office, which is practically unique in the world, snags are to be expected, and it may be necessary at times to close down a plant or part of a computerized operation in order to improve it and make it more efficient.

FISHERIES

RECIPROCAL ACTION AGAINST U.S. FISHERMEN

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): To come back to the question of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Fisheries.

Since the minister expects to take similar steps against American fishermen, can he tell the House in detail what means he has at his disposal to implement such measures effectively, probably forbidding access to our waters to the American fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I should like to check the exact translation of what I said. If my memory serves me right, I did not speak of taking reciprocal measures. I said that if the temporary agreement arrived at by the two governments has not been ratified and is not in effect, obviously we are not committed to an agreement that is neither ratified nor existent.

NEGOTIATIONS ON COASTAL ISSUES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us what the effects will be of that conflict on the negotiations which have been dragging along on boundary matters, and in particular on the west coast boundaries in the Juan de Fuca and Dixon straits?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, obviously we should look into the implications of the situation where there would be no reciprocal agreement, but I feel that it is more important that in coming days we should concentrate on the possibility of reaching an agreement. It would be very naive to believe, as do some commentators and even representatives of the fishing industry, that forbidding access to all waters would solve everything. On the contrary, we would then have a situation where relations between Canadian and American fishermen would be most complex, and in which both might find serious disadvantages.

FINANCE

IMPORT TAX ON CERTAIN AIRCRAFT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is he aware of, and is there any cause for concern in Canada as a result of the reports of a strong lobby building up in the United States by some aircraft manufacturers for the imposition of a 25 per cent import tax against the Dash-7 and the Challenger aircraft, perhaps as a result of the substantial taxes against certain types of U.S. aircraft, as well as the fall-out from the unfortunate test conducted by the Canadian ministry of transport last year in the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any report, any rumour in that respect. I will check, but I would be very surprised if the U.S. administration had decided to act that way.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: The minister, of course, is aware that there was a 10 per cent excise tax imposed in 1974 by his predecessor, Mr. Turner, on American aircraft, which was part of the so-called Canada energy conservation program at that time. In view of the fact that this tax appears to have been poorly conceived and is discriminatory in its application, is the minister thinking of removing the tax at this time?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have received several representations on that subject and I am now examining the problem.

ENERGY

TASK FORCE ON HEAVY OIL RESERVES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Having regard to the key role which heavy oil reserves must play in overcoming Canada's dependence on imported oil, and given the fact that there has been considerable delay in reaching agreement of the Lloydminster heavy oil upgrading facility, can the minister tell the House what position the government has taken on the proposal by the president of Husky Oil that a task force be made up of representatives from Husky, the federal government, provincial governments and other interested parties to speed up the decision on this much needed facility?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): It is being discussed at the present time. I think there is a good chance that the task force will come into being in the not too distant future.

Mr. Mazankowski: With regard to the continuing delay in reaching agreement on this very important facility, and given the great amount of lead time that is required in terms of establishing a facility of this magnitude, is the minister prepared to state to the House today or in the immediate future what new initiatives the federal government might be proposing in order that this project can be lifted from the negotiating table onto the drawing board?

● (1442)

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that the budget made a number of very significant changes which should help to bring on the development of heavy oils: the Cold Lake heavy oils, the tar sands, the expansion of GCOS and projects of that kind—very considerable projects. Also, I suspect the hon. member is aware that the federal government now is awaiting a response from the provinces. The federal government has placed a series of incentives on the table. The House passed a bill which provides a world price for the product of these new, major undertakings. Now we are waiting to hear from the provinces as to what they are prepared to do to get these very significant projects off the drawing board.

TRANSPORT

EXPANSION OF FACILITIES AT PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct my question to the acting minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On March 7 the Minister of Transport left the impression across the country that the government is providing some $16.3 million in terms of grants to expand the port of Prince Rupert in British Columbia. Recently, the Albert Wheat Pool was informed by the National Harbours Board that the users will have to pay for these developmental costs, namely, the farmers who use the terminal at the port of Prince Rupert. Can the minister clarify the government's position? Is it the government's intention to provide these facilities, as it has in the past, or will the user indeed have to pay?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I am not in possession of the details, at least not sufficiently to answer the hon. member fully. I would ask his indulgence to take the question as notice and I will pass it on to the Minister of Transport.

SMALL BUSINESS

REBATE ON METRIC TOOLS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Business who has the unpopular responsibility for metric conversion. Recently, I was advised that mix-ups and delays seem to be the order of the day when the metric commission is processing applications for the rebate on metric tools from mechanics and others who have no way of deducting these purchases as business expenses. Can the minister tell us what the problem is, or is this just another case of government inefficiency?

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, there have been some 4,000 applications for refunds under the metric tool assistance program, and I think some 1,200 have been paid $135,000. The others have not been paid, as a result of insufficient information or some mistake in the applications. I have urged the officials to take what steps they can to make it as easy as possible for applicants to receive their refunds.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister saying that he has made it as easy as possible. However, I would like to know why it takes six weeks to send out a notice indicating that the commission has received the application and another six weeks to send out a notice indicating that more information is necessary. Why cannot the information indicating that the application has been received be sent out within two weeks and, if more information is necessary, why cannot a notice be sent out at the same time?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I must say I am inclined to take the hon. member's representation as a valid one.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW SOURCES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last night, on the CBC program "The Nation's Business", the Minister of National Defence stated—

An hon. Member: Is that who it was?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: —that the country would receive imminent economic growth largely as a result of significant energy projects coming on stream. Specifically, he mentioned the tar sands plants, heavy oils, the Polar gas pipeline and Fundy Bay tidal power. I must have missed the press release in this regard. Therefore, can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tell the House when these projects were approved by cabinet, when construction will be started and when they will be finished? Also, when we can receive all the other details about cost, sponsors and those things which will lead to this great economic growth in the near future?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to go down the list with the hon. member. Let us start with tar sands III in the Athabasca area: the federal government has put a series of proposals forward which will make it much easier for that particular consortium, headed by Shell, to bring it to fruition. I believe Shell is waiting to hear from the Alberta government; similarly, the Imperial Oil project at Cold Lake, to produce 140,000 barrels a day. It is well advanced. We have put our proposals on the table in respect of tax incentives. Imperial Oil has indicated a favourable response to our proposals and also is waiting to hear from the Alberta government. Of course, GCOS is another very significant—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. One supplementary, the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I gather none has been approved by cabinet as yet. Also, the Minister of National Defence talked about the Liberal policy of self-sufficiency in energy. Given that on January 27, during debate on Bill C-12, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources ridiculed the policy of self-sufficiency as put forward by myself, can the minister tell the House when cabinet dropped his policy of self-reliance and adopted the Progressive Conservative policy of self-sufficiency?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I was unable to complete my list. I had reached GCOS and I intended to talk about some of the other heavy oil projects in western Canada. I can shift very easily to the maritimes because the hon. member also asked about the Maritime Energy Corporation and the Bay of Fundy tidal power. The federal government has taken the decision to move forward to phase II. We have taken the decision, with the Newfoundland government, to move forward with the creation of a Lower Churchill Falls Development Corporation for bringing that massive source of energy, roughly 2,000 megawatts, into production.

An hon. Member: It is 3,000 megawatts.

Mr. Gillespie: We are unable to be a self-sufficient nation overnight.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did you hear that, Barney?

Mr. Gillespie: By pursuing these policies of self-reliance, I think we can look forward to the day when we can be substantially self-sufficient. As hon. members from maritime areas will recognize, there may well be occasions where we would not be able to generate or provide all the energy from western Canada in the form of oil for the use of people in the maritimes. In that case, we will have to import some. To that extent, we are not completely self-sufficient; we will have to continue using our buying power where we can. Our policies of self-reliance are aimed at making Canadians self-reliant in every energy sense of that word. I would very much like to refer to some of the other projects we have. I have not dealt with—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING NEW SOURCES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would he assure the House, in all the negotiations which will be required for these projects yet to be considered by the federal government and the provinces, that the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council will be carrying on those negotiations, rather than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, so we can be assured there will be none of this nonsense during the course of negotiations which we have observed during oral questions today?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I was trying to give the hon. member opposite the benefit of the doubt. I thought the hon. member asked a serious question when he wanted to know what the government's position was in respect of some of these massive western projects, projects in the maritime area and Quebec. If hon. members opposite are not serious about these massive projects, let me assure them and all Canadians that we are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

QUOTAS AND CONSERVATION RESPECTING 200-MILE LIMIT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Will the minister tell the House if the new treaty has been negotiated to succeed the International Commission of the North Atlantic Fisheries? What protection is provided for Canada by attempting to enforce some meaningful system of quotas, and hence conservation, on the area adjacent to the 200-mile limit, specifically Canada's continental shelf where there is growing evidence of increased overfishing activities?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, certainly I am gratified that the large majority of the nations which attended the conference that took place in Ottawa last week expressed approval of the clause which recognizes Canada's special interest for the area outside the 200 miles where stocks either intermingle or stocks move in and out.

• (1452)

This agreement has now been referred back to governments and will be open to signature, possibly in Ottawa, before the end of June. Once this is done there would be a legal and fully authorized successor to ICNAF which would deal with the type of problem the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary to the minister is: Will we have the right of boarding and inspection, as we had under the old agreement, in order to ensure that quotas are being respected? Also, can the minister assure us that we will put our own house in order within the 200-mile limit to stop some of the hanky-panky that is going on between Canadian fishing companies? The minister knows what I am talking about.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's last point is a very important one. In fact, I reaffirmed the suspension of a large trawler from Nova Scotia last week because I felt that if we are penalizing small lobster fishermen for a half dozen lobsters, we should start penalizing large vessels even if it means some hardship for those plant workers who are dependent on the landing of that fish. The time when companies could say they could not control their captains is finished as far as I am concerned. We will control the company and the captain, if we have to, with the power of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): As for the new regime, obviously the surveillance regime which will be in place when the successor to ICNAF—which will be known as NAFO—has a regime like ICNAF. We will be allowed to board and report violations.

ARRANGEMENTS WITH U.S. ON RECIPROCAL FISHING

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. Just five days ago the minister made a speech in Quebec City, part of which was entitled "What Can Go Wrong". As we know now on the west coast, plenty can go wrong. I would like to read a sentence or two from the joint report to the governments of Canada and the United States:

> The negotiators have agreed to recommend to governments the terms of interim arrangements to govern reciprocal fishing during 1978. The proposed arrangements would continue reciprocal fishing as previously agreed, with new mechanisms for consultation and resolution of differences and to help ensure that existing fishing patterns are maintained.

Could the minister tell me what has gone wrong?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, nothing has gone wrong yet. There was an injunction, and that will be dealt with according to the normal process. As I said in answer to an earlier question, the two special negotiators who signed this recommendation to the two governments are meeting this week. The hon. member should also know that the American agreement has to be ratified by the U.S. Congress. To my knowledge, this has not yet been done and that, obviously, poses some difficulties when the administration goes before the courts.

SCALLOP FISHING ON GEORGES BANK

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker I direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. We are overworking him today, but we are glad to see him back in the House following his visit to Halifax. At the present time, American scallop fishermen operating in the Georges Bank area do not adhere to any conservation regulations as they apply to catching scallops in that area. In view of the controversy raging among Nova Scotians at the present time over restrictive fishing regulations as arbitrarily applied by the minister without consultation with the fishermen, I ask the minister, following his discussions with Canada's most eastern Liberal premier, Mr. Regan, whether he is now going to permit our Nova Scotia fishermen to fish in their traditional manner until dispute over ownership and the boundary line on Georges Bank is settled and the boundary line is firmly established?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to associate the two questions. Contrary to reports, the American increase of efforts in scallop fishing has taken place mainly on the American side of what would be a line between the two countries. In fact, there are only two American scallop vessels fishing in what could be a disputed zone between the Canadian claim and the American claim. That is the only evidence that we have.

On the matter of access to Georges Bank by what is traditionally called "the Bay of Fundy fleet", we had a very thorough review of this matter and, contrary to reports, the Nova Scotia government had been fully consulted and in fact had been informed about the closing. The fishermen had been consulted. I had met with them in November and officials of my department had met with them repeatedly. There was not an easy solution because it could mean transferring a problem from one group of fishermen to another group. We are trying to find a solution which would not, as the scallop stock goes down, and scientists predict this will occur on Georges Bank, simply increase the problem of the scallop fishermen in general.

I mention, in particular, those scallop fishermen from the hon. member's own riding who do not hold groundfish licences which they could go back to should the scallop stock fail.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICA MILITARY INCURSION INTO ANGOLA

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Over the weekend the United Nations Security Council condemned South Africa for its raid deep inside Angola. This raid may have sabotaged the prospects of SWAPO agreeing to the western compromise plan for independence in Namibia because SWAPO will fear further South African intervention. Because Canada presented the UN plan for Namibia on behalf of the western nations, what steps is Canada now taking to maintain the momentum for a peaceful settlement of the Namibian question in ways that go beyond condemning South Africa—for example, putting pressure on SWAPO to accept the western proposal before it is too late?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, in his last sentence, answered his own question. Obviously, the answer now is indeed to condemn the South African action which we did unanimously in the Security Council on the weekend, and also to continue to do everything possible to persuade the South West Africa People's Organization that their best interests are going to be served by accepting the proposals of the Group of Five.

As to what Canada has done, I have met personally with Mr. Nujoma to urge him to take this course of action. I did that at the United Nations, and I believe it is today—certainly this week—that all five of the countries represented in this initiative will also be meeting with him to provide clarification for him as to just what our proposals entail.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, the South African strike at the guerillas in Angola highlights once more how Cuba is recklessly endangering world peace by maintaining 30,000 troops in Africa, including Angola—action that undermines Canadian influence for a peaceful settlement in Namibia. Does Canada intend to exert pressure on Cuba to get out of Africa by terminating our aid program in Cuba and, even more importantly, taking further steps through the United Nations to put economic pressure on Cuba?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question in a number of different places and also on a number of occasions here in the House. I have said that by my personal recollection we have declared, both directly to the Cubans at the United Nations and in other fora, our reluctance to do anything by way of encouraging the situation in Angola and our high regard and high desire—that would be the more appropriate word—that the Cubans should withdraw from that area and that there should be no foreign troops in Africa.

The next part of the hon. member's question is whether we will exert more pressure and use that through the foreign development fund. I have said before, and I repeat now, that what is in place in Cuba is a series of programs which have been active for a number of years and which are now coming to an end. There is a great necessity—I want to remind the House of this—for us to retain a relationship with Cuba with regard to, for instance, the sale of cattle and a variety of other Canadian products to that country. If the hon. member wishes to propose a complete abandonment of all relations with the country, that is something we can consider. We are phasing down, or at least winding up, those programs which were in place some time ago.

I have said before, and I repeat now, no new programs have been made. I would think there is a reasonable assumption to be drawn from this, that obviously we will be much more inclined to co-operate and to develop our relationship with that country and with others if there is a stable situation with regard to Africa. I emphasize once again that we have joined in every condemnation of Cuban participation in Angola and elsewhere in Africa, and we will continue to do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEUTRON BOMB—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON DEPLOYMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to my congenial friend, the Minister of National Defence? I think it was on April 8 that he told the hon. member for Victoria that Canada had not developed any attitude at all with regard to the proposed deployment of the neutron bomb. A month has gone by since then. I now ask the minister, in light of the importance of NATO to Canada, the fact that the neutron bomb is supposed to be used there, and the fact that deployment of the neutron bomb may be important to the future peace of the world, has the government made up its mind regarding its attitude toward the neutron bomb? If so, will it announce that view to the House and the public so we can see where Canada stands on this important issue?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as members of the alliance, we are the non-nuclear power. We do not have any nuclear weapons, nor would they be deployed on our soil. Until there is some reasonable degree of consensus within NATO of those nations who would stock or use the weapons or have them deployed on their soil, it would be a little unbecoming of us to make our position known. We must have a better idea of how the NATO nations themselves feel about it and, indeed, whether the United States decides to proceed with the production of those weapons.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of the fact that the governments of Holland, Norway, Denmark and Iceland, for example, have made a clear and positive stand in regard to this matter? How long is the minister going to say that it is not of concern to the people of Canada? I know we are not a primary nuclear power, but we are part of the set-up of NATO: we have troops there. I suggest to the minister that it is irresponsible not to make clear where we stand on this issue.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, certainly those nations would be much more directly involved than ourselves. My colleagues and I have had discussions on this matter with our allies, but a definitive position has not yet been developed. While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say how happy I am to see the hon. member back in good health. I hope he will be with us for a long time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—CBC COVERAGE OF SOCIAL CREDIT PARTY CONVENTION IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege and, under our rules, I take the first opportunity to do so and tell the Chair and all hon. members how indignant I as well as my colleagues are with the CBC, as members of a registered Canadian political party whose national leadership convention took place in Winnipeg on May 7, 1978. In my opinion, that convention was a national event which deserved to be broadcast live, particularly by a Crown corporation which is supposed to promote harmony in Canada by reporting in an objective way the most significant national events either of a political, economic or social nature. Now, on May 6 and 7, a national leadership convention was held in Winnipeg to elect a new national leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada, the successor to André Fortin who was killed in an accident on June 24, 1977, after only seven months as leader and successor to Réal Caouette, this great Canadian who has founded our party and directed it for 14 years.

Mr. Speaker, CBC was aware of this national political event since it had several reporters on the field who did their best considering they were not provided with the facilities for direct broadcasting of the main highlights of this convention. I do not blame the reporters but the management. I fail to understand why CBC, with a yearly budget of half a billion dollars out of the taxpayer's pocket, would not use part of this money to broadcast such an important political event, while it does not hesitate to allot broadcasting time to all kinds of sports programs. In this area, it goes to great lengths, but when the time comes to inform the public objectively on State affairs, it does not seem interested in promoting the commonweal as well as national harmony.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit Party of Canada is a national party whose activities deserve to be broadcast by the CBC at least as much as those of the Quebec Liberal party whose convention, last April, was extensively covered by the CBC. The Social Credit Party of Canada convention, which I attended together with many delegates from Quebec, took place in an orderly fashion, and we believe our activities are likely to promote harmony in Canada. I am convinced that our activities and the positions we took were not likely to urge the people to dissent and question the established order, to promote disorder, but were designed rather to explain to the people what options we have to offer as our contribution to the administration of our country.

Mr. Speaker, do we want or not to ensure the survival of our democratic system? If so, it is essential that all Canadians be given a fair deal in all areas, particularly with regard to information, especially from a Crown corporation like the CBC. What is happening exactly? For two weeks, we have seen on Parliament Hill several vans with CBC equipment and employees; I do not know for sure what they were doing there, but anyhow, it is a fact. I will not believe for a minute that it was not possible for the CBC to be in Winnipeg on May 7 with the required equipment to broadcast live at least the movers' and the candidates' speeches from 11 a.m. to noon, as well as part of the vote and the speech of the elected leader, as is done when the other Canadian parties hold their conventions.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that our party strongly opposes the financial dictatorship and the monopolistic handling of the nation's credit but that is no reason to treat us unfairly. Those are the kind of injustices which raise indignation among honest people who have the right to know the various options offered to them by the different Canadian political parties. The new leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada is the leader of a nationwide party and, as such, he is entitled to the same consideration as any other leader by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The economic, financial and political ideology which has inspired the administrative principles of provincial governments in Alberta for 35 years and in British Columbia for a quarter of a century deserved another kind of treatment, particularly when one considers that our political formation has had and still has members duly elected in the House of Commons, whether from the east or from the west.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian television viewers, either from the west or from the east, expected to have live coverage of the proceedings of that convention. They were deeply disappointed. The people of Quebec with more than 300 delegates attending the convention in an effort of co-operation toward greater harmony between eastern, central and western Canadians hoped to live those developments via the television. Air time is used for other things, offensive movies, cruel and violent movies, there is time for that! Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, and I draw your attention more particularly on that, on Saturday May 6 on the 10.30 news the words Progressive Conservative party were used to announce a convention of the Social Credit Party of Canada. Was that a mistake? If so, well, we have people who do not have much brains to carry out their responsibilities. If it was done on purpose, they should be fired. This is not the way to run democracy in this country.

Mr. Speaker, you will understand why as House leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada I am taking advantage of the first opportunity available to point that fact out to the whole people of this country so such situations will not be repeated, otherwise we are headed toward disorder. When they are treated injustly people end up revolting. Such injustices can turn pacific people into revolutionaries. Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude with a motion to show how logic we are in our comments and protests. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That this House force the management of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to appear before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to give before the said committee the reasons which prevented the corporation from broadcasting live the main events of the convention of the Social Credit Party of Canada which ended in Winnipeg on May 7, 1978.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kind attention.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am under the impression the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has raised a grievance against the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation rather than a question of privilege concerning the proceedings of the House. But of course we will have to wait for the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), who is responsible for the CBC, to have an opportunity to comment on this matter. I will then make a final decision.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. DARLING—ATTENDANCE AT COMMITTEE MEETING

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the answer given to me by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). The Minister of State inadvertently, I presume misled the House when he said that I was not there at the committee meeting. I was certainly at the committee meeting in plenty of time. I believe the minister was about 20 minutes late—

An hon. Member: Thirty minutes late.

Mr. Darling: I appreciate the position of the minister, that he was held up on business, but nevertheless I wanted to clear up that point. That committee meeting, I believe, was held Tuesday, April 18. I was trying to elicit from the minister an answer that his officials were there with him, and that we wanted the president of CMHC to be allowed to answer questions. Furthermore I understand the deputy minister who would normally be there to answer questions is on a four-month sabbatical for something or other, and will not be available to the next meeting of the committee.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, by a happy coincidence, I have the "blues" right here and the hon. member says that I accused him of being late for a meeting. He was asking me whether he would be authorized to ask questions at the next meeting of the parliamentary committee. The "blues" I have here show that I gave him the following reply: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can arrive on time at the meeting of next week and stay until the end, he will get answers to all the questions he may be prepared to ask. I do not think I said he had been late at a previous meeting. If he can be on time at the next meeting, he will get answers to his questions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 31, 355 and 1,238.

[Text]

PROBUCOL

Question No. 31—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware of a new drug known as Probucol with the trade name of Lorelco that has recently been made available through drug store outlets in the United States for the reduction of cholesterol levels and approved by the United States Food and Drug Administration after twelve years of research?

2. Is the government aware that one of the three doctors involved in the introduction of the drug is a Canadian from Montreal?

3. (a) What knowledge does the Department of National Health and Welfare have concerning this drug (b) is it being tested in Canada and on what date will it be approved for use in Canada?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. (a) The bureau of drugs of the health protection branch has evaluated the new drug submission for probucol (lorelco) and for this drug the letter of compliance was issued on August 11, 1977. (b) As of August 11, 1977, the drug manufacturer is authorized to market probucol (lorelco) in Canada as a prescription drug.

PROGRAMS—MEDICAL EDUCATION

Question No. 355—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the government contribute financially to the education in training of medical doctors in Canadian universities and other institutions such as research centres, hospitals and laboratories in the form of operating grants, research grants and other forms and, if so, in what amount for each of the past six fiscal years?

2. Did the government conduct studies concerning the cost of medical education and training in Canada, including post-graduate studies and training and, if so, in each case (a) what was the title, author and date of the study (b) result of the study in terms of distribution of cost of such education and training amongst the students, provincial and federal governments and other contributors?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Minister of National Health and Welfare is concerned: Yes. 1. Programs administered by National Health and Welfare made related contributions or were involved in medical education, in the following manner: (a) Contributions from the health resources fund for construction, acquisition, renovation and equipping of medical schools, health science centres and teaching hospitals: 1971-72, $35,861,010.20; 1972-73, $35,803,553.54; 1973-74, $36,008,-671.48; 1974-75, $29,205,366.38; 1975-76, $17,712,447.68; 1976-77, $23,738,038.74. These facilities are substantially, but not solely, utilized for the teaching of medical students and post-doctoral training. (b) The Professional Training Program has supported the training of 83,617 health manpower personnel from April 1, 1948 to March 31, 1977, of which 9,761 were physicians. Data is not available on a year to year basis. In addition, data on that part of the department's contribution towards physicians is not available. (c) Remuneration paid by hospitals to interns and residents qualifies for federal contributions under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Program as part of the cost of insured hospital services. While payments to interns and residents relate to their services to hospitals, they are made while these doctors are in training and, hence, facilitate the acquisition of such training, which these physicians might otherwise be unable to afford. The federal government contributed approximately 50 per cent with respect to the following salaries and wages (including stipends and perquisites) paid to interns, residents and students in public general and allied special hospitals in Canada. 1971, $60,410,187; 1972, $60,275,200; 1973, $63,560,175; 1974, $71,808,493; 1975, $85,766,946. (d) The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Program also contributes towards the costs of full-time geographic professors in teaching hospitals. The portion accepted under HIDS relates to these doctors' services to the hospitals, and not to their teaching function. However, these payments by the hospitals represent an important part of the income related to these teaching positions, and indirectly contributes towards educational objectives. These contributions are not reported separately, therefore there are no data available.

2. No.

STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Question No. 1,238—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. F. C. Passy, Chief of the Canada Student Loans Programme, receive a letter dated September 22, 1977 from Ms. Liz Grogan of CFTO-TV Ltd., Toronto, Ontario, asking for certain information including the "percentage of outstanding loans not repaid at the end of terms" for certain years?

2. Did Mr. Passy reply to Ms. Grogan in a letter dated October 4, 1977 and did the letter state in part that the default ratio in 1974 was 6.9%, in 1975—7.2%, in 1976—7.4% and in 1977—7.4%?

3. Is the government aware that photocopies of computer print out sheets showing the figures and default ratios for the years concerned are in the hands of the honourable Member for Leeds?

4. Do the computer print out sheets show a default ratio of 7.02 in 1974, 7.85 in 1975, 8.54 in 1976 and 9.01 in 1977 and, if so, what is the reason for the difference in the figures processed by the Department of Finance and the figures issued by Mr. Passy to the news media?

5. Were any employees instructed to falsify figures at any time and, if so (a) under whose instructions (b) what are their names and job descriptions (c) what are the names of the employees (i) accepting (ii) refusing such instructions?

6. Was the Student Loan Programme transferred from the Department of Finance to the Department of the Secretary of State on December 1, 1977 and, if so (a) is Mr. Passy still in charge (b) how many employees were transferred with the Programme and what are their names?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): In so far as the Secretary of State is concerned: 1. Yes.

2. Yes. The figure quoted for 1977 was described as preliminary.

3. No.

4. Computer printout sheets are produced on a monthly basis, but not on an annual basis. The figures cited in this question seem to be monthly figures. In any case they are not annual figures. The figure of 7.02 per cent for 1974 cannot be identified as to month. The department has identified the other figures as follows: 7.85 per cent in 1975 is for September; 8.54 per cent in 1976 is for September; 9.01 per cent in 1977 could be either April or September. The figures quoted in question number 2 are not monthly figures, but are the ratios at the year end, in this instance June 30, for each year cited, and are for that reason different from the monthly figures cited in question number 4.

5. No.

6. Yes. (a) Yes. (b) Forty-three full-time staff as follows were transferred effective, December 1, 1977 except where otherwise indicated: F. C. Passy (transferred May 1, 1977); N. L. Davis, M. E. Temple; R. M. Dodd; J. A. Murphy; R. Leckie; M. Kallio; C. D. Mahony; G. R. Greason; C. G. M. Desrosiers; S. M. Kennelly; N. E. Reeves; L. F. Donegan; M. C. Maley; M. Paquette; J. A. Thorpe; C. A. Bigras; D. Scott; K. M. Maddocks; H. Curtis; K. Miller; B. Downey; G. E. R. Young; E. Villeneuve; E. Pearse; J. A. Kipp; C. A. O'Brady; M. C. Y. S. Parizeau; P. J. Farmer; W. Magladray; G. Shane; L. Nitschky; I. Bedard; R. R. Jarvis; D. P. Meagher; P. M. Costin; N. Hough; D. L. Woodland; R. L. Wallace; R. Pantalone; A. Saulnier; C. S. Kimber; I. Liss.

[English]

Mr. Young: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Those questions enumerated have been answered. The hon. member for Huron-Middlesex (Mr. McKinley).

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKINLEY—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS NOS. 560 TO 673

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron Middlesex): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My patience is getting very thin concerning the answering of questions by the government. I have had questions Nos. 560 to 673 on the order paper since November 14, 1977. I think it is time they were answered before this parliament is dissolved.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

AMENDMENT TO AUTHORIZE ISSUANCE OF CERTAIN GOLD COINS

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services) moved that Bill C-39, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services) moved that Bill C-39 be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part today in the debate on this bill which includes such interesting objectives as the creation of many jobs, the export of finished products which use our natural resources, the creation of an additional source of revenue for the federal government as well as for the provincial governments, an interesting, profitable and very promising breakthrough for a totally Canadian product on foreign markets, and last but not least, an excellent opportunity to enhance the international image of Canada through the work of our craftsmen and artists.

You are no doubt aware, Mr. Speaker, that the Royal Canadian Mint has succeeded for several years already in getting and maintaining the reputation of being one of the best mints in the whole world. Our special coins programs have always drawn very special attention on national and international numismatic markets. Within a few years, in hardly three years, we have succeeded in getting major deals for minting in Canada coins for more than 30 foreign countries.

Those successes, added to the great success of our coins programs in 1976 for the Olympics and last year to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the coronation of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, have allowed us to secure privileged position on the international numismatic market. Should we be proud of those successes? Yes, Mr. Speaker. Should we be satisfied with those successes? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. New opportunities are available to us and we want to take advantage of them. That is in summary what is prompting us to introduce this legislation. Through this amendment which is really an administrative measure, we want to allow the Royal Canadian Mint to take greater advantage of the world numismatic market where last year we sold coins worth some $31 million. That is a very impressive performance. However, the overall annual coin market being evaluated at $1 billion, the government believes that the Royal Canadian Mint must continue to draw maximum benefit from it.

We realize that a gold bullion coin program as presented to us by the representatives of the Canadian Mining Association appears to harbour a tremendous potential. Far from trying to dispute their claims, we have listened with an open mind. We have been impressed. We sense that for a number of reasons this market might be very ripe for Canada and, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared and ready to pursue actively with the Canadian Mining Association, the other interested industries, and in conjunction with the officials from the Department of Finance, the in-depth study of the potential of such a program and of its various implications for the Canadian government and for Canada as a whole. It would be less than responsible for me to recommend to cabinet a proposition that has not been thoroughly researched and which still contains a number of unanswered questions.

There are currency implications that need to be identified, clarified, and researched, in a more thorough manner than we have had time to do.

There are gold sourcing complications that so obviously require both short and long term planning far beyond what has been done up to this point. Although Canada happens to be the third largest gold producer in the world, our total output at present is approximately 1.5 million ounces of gold a year. This bullion coin program could absorb 2 million to 3 million ounces a year. Even if the prospects are very exciting, hon. members will agree with me that the question of the gold supply is one that will require a great deal of consultation, compromises, and commitments both from the gold mining industry and from the government as the holder of the Canadian gold reserves.

There are production and distribution set-ups that have to be put in place and that have to be guaranteed before the first coin ever reaches that market.

These are some of the questions that I and my officials have been asking ourselves concerning this program. But let me not leave hon. members with a feeling of pessimism about this program. That would be too easy a solution and one that Canada certainly does not need at this point in time. My comments should not be construed as being negative toward this new idea but rather of expressing my willingness to explore this innovative concept.

Let me assure hon. members that, although we have been asking questions, we know the answers will be forthcoming. We know that we have the people, the resources, and the desire to pursue this idea and to bring forth in due time recommendations to cabinet as to its feasibility and profitability.

[Translation]

If on the one hand we did not have time yet to explore thoroughly that new project, on the other hand we certainly have concrete evidence of the success obtained by our two previous gold coin programs. Our $100 gold coin program commemorating the Olympic Games, our first major initiative in that field, sold nearly one million coins, which represents a total exceeding $100 million.

Last year, to mark the Jubilee of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, the Royal Canadian Mint issued another $100 gold coin. Over only four months, about 180,000 coins were sold for a total value of almost $25 million.

Those two programs were very successful owing to the numismatic quality of those coins and also to our strong marketing efforts. Now that this distribution system has been established and its efficiency proven, it deserves to be supported regularly to produce maximum benefits. Through this bill, the Royal Canadian Mint will be able to establish long term planning for that kind of numismatic coins which would certainly guarantee it an increasing share of that enormous international market and better profitability for its production facilities. This year we intend to issue once again a $100 gold coin. If one of the major assets of a numismatic coin is its technical quality, its artistic quality is also very important. There are excellent Canadian artists in this field and I wish to mention only one of them, Raymond Lee, a Toronto artist whose design of provincial floral emblems was chosen for the gold coin commemorating the Queen's Jubilee.

To facilitate the work of the artists and ensure a certain uniformity in their submissions it has been decided this year to select the theme of national unity. And the submissions already received seem particularly interesting. To conclude I wish to mention the excellent co-operation of several hon. members who have studied this bill in committee and particularly the work of my excellent parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson). Following their representations we made some amendments that will certainly facilitate its passage. First, the governor in council will be given this power for a period of three years only. The government will have to review that decision before January 1, 1981. Finally, the minister in charge commits himself to report to Parliament every six months on the relevant details of this gold coin program. Far from infringing on the rights of Parliament, this bill will enable hon. members to follow very closely the progress made, and to judge over the next few years the benefits derived from such a program.

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the minister would permit one or two questions before I commence my speech.

Mr. Goyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: It has been rumoured that there may be other countries bringing out bullion gold coins, something contemplated by our mining industry in Canada. What is the timeframe the government is thinking of with regard to deciding definitively whether it is going to have a Canadian bullion gold coin or not?

[Mr. Goyer.]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have already met with the representatives of the Canadian Mining Association. The officials of the Mint have met with them on a number of occasions to explore the different problems and to try to find the right solutions to those problems. In fact I am meeting again tomorrow with the representatives of this important industry.

The main problems are the question of currency, and to look, with the industry, not at a bullion bust production but a normal production, and the extent of our needs. When we find solutions to these problems, I intend to present a proposal to cabinet. Of course my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), will have to parallel his mind with regard to the problem of currency.

Mr. Stevens: How soon?

Mr. Goyer: As soon as we have the authority, which will come from this bill, to proceed.

• (1532)

Mr. Stevens: The minister referred to the commemorative coins which, it is contemplated, are to be brought out this year, and suggested that national unity would be the theme. Is there still time to dissuade him from adopting the theme of national unity for this purpose, or has a definite commitment already been made within the cabinet? Further, can the minister tell us the deadline toward which he is working in connection with the minting of these coins, should the bill receive speedy passage?

Mr. Goyer: In answer to the first part of the question, the theme for the current year was the choice of the board of directors of the Royal Canadian Mint. It was not imposed by the government. In fact, the reverse is the case. Now that the board of directors has decided on a theme, the ratification of the governor general in council needs to be obtained, so whether it is advisable to use this particular theme in the present year has still to be considered. I am ready to take into account arguments directed to this question. Indeed, the expression of such opinions will help the cabinet make a final decision.

With regard to the later part of the question, if we are given authority within the next four hours to proceed with the gold coin program, the first pieces will normally be issued next fall—I cannot give a specific date. That is what I am told. The urgency is this: we do not wish to lose the momentum of what we now consider to be an established world market for Canadian coins of this type. Every year, now, collectors will expect Canada to issue such a coin and, if we are not in a position to do so, the marketing of this national resource in the form of a finished product would suffer an important disruption.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as the first to take part in this debate on behalf of the official opposition I should like to say at the outset that we have some rather grave reservations with respect to the bill now before us.

We expressed those reservations during the committee stage and were able to secure two significant amendments to the bill as presented. First, the authority we could be giving to the cabinet with respect to the minting of gold coinage would be operative only between the present date and January 1, 1981. In the second place, there would be a provision for reporting at six-month intervals back to parliament setting out exactly what had been done in terms of the coinage which had been minted.

These amendments have made the bill somewhat more acceptable, but there is a fundamental misunderstanding with respect to what we are now considering. The mining industry in Canada is interested, almost eager, to see the Mint put out what is generally referred to as a bullion gold coin. The most popular form of such a coin is, of course, the South Africa Krueger Rand, a 1-ounce gold coin priced directly in relation to the current value of gold. If, for example, the price of gold is $160 an ounce, the price of the Krueger Rand coin would be $160, give or take whatever is needed for the commission. This is what the mining industry is hoping will be minted in Canada.

However, I sense that what the government is mainly interested in is not the production of a gold bullion coin but another commemorative coin. And, of all things, what it is thinking of, to judge what was said by the minister, is a gold coin commemorating national unity! Such a coin, to be widely distributed throughout the world, would, by its very terminology be broadcasting to all the other nations, in effect, that there is some kind of disunity question. This is a strange twist. The domestic problem suddenly becomes glossed over by the minting of a gold coin on the theme of national unity, a coin which will be circulated around the world, broadcasting the message that somehow or other disunity in Canada is something which must be considered.

I do not know who are the public relations officers for the government or for the Mint. The minister told us it was the board of directors of the Mint who decided on this theme. In my opinion a new set of public relations officers is needed.

It is utter rubbish to suggest that a country as great as Canada, which has experienced 110 years of Confederation, can find no theme to put on a coin other than that of national unity. Let us take a more positive theme, for example, a theme commemorating our great scientists, or, if you like, our great statesmen, or our great northern frontier. Let us choose a theme based on the positive things we have to be proud of, and let us not become consumed with the issue of national unity when it comes to an application of this kind.

We have misgivings about what the government is trying to do, on three grounds. First, we believe the government should be more candid on the subject of the issuance of a gold bullion coin. If the minister has no interest in issuing such coins, let him say so, and let those concerned judge the government accordingly. In any case, he should quit pussyfooting around—today, for instance, the minister indicated that an in-depth study would be conducted. Our second reservation has to do with the theme of these commemorative coins which are to be brought forward in the fall. Our third and more fundamental concern has to do with the way in which the government is treating the coinage of this country.

• (1542)

Hon. members will recall that the government got into a very odd deal at the time of the Olympics. In order to get the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) off the hook with regard to his promise that he would never use taxpayers' money to fund the Olympics, the government came up with the odd concept of minting Olympic coins. They were legal tender, but as far as their seigniorage was concerned the proceeds were to go to the Olympic Corporation as opposed to the treasury of Canada. At various stages of that legislation we in the official opposition opposed it because we felt the government was being reckless with the coin of the realm and that greater safeguards should have been included. In fact, to some extent at our urging safeguards were put into the legislation to ensure that the coinage would not be completely debased or used in a way which traditionally coinage of this country is never used, that is, for private gain of some concern outside the government or the people of Canada. There was a rather sad spectacle with regard to the Olympic coinage.

The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) said today that the government has had great success with its coin programs and that he was hoping that this would continue. That is just balderdash. There has not been success with coinage programs. Let me give the House some figures. For those who are interested I am referring to the report to parliament as of September 30, 1977, of the Minister of Finance with respect to the Olympic coins. As we all know, the Minister of Finance was required to report to parliament regarding various aspects of that program.

As of September 30 the face value of Olympic coins issued pursuant to the Olympic (1976) Act was $279,692,765. Olympic coinage of a face value of almost $280 million was sold. Here is the real grabber. Guess how much of that money ended up with the Olympic Corporation? How much of the almost $280 million actually found its way to the Olympic Corporation? At the bottom of page nine of the report of the Minister of Finance it shows that the aggregate amount of all payments to the Olympic Corporation was $100 million. By the time sales costs, which were astronomical, and other costs—the various minting costs and so forth—were written off—almost $180 million had dribbled away, and only $100 million went to the Olympic Corporation.

Our coinage was debased. We put a few grains of silver into coins and called them silver coins. We then put a few grains of gold into some other coins and called them gold coins. We sold them around the world saying that they were silver and gold coins, but the fact is that they were neither. In each case there was only a percentage of silver or gold. There has to be a stop to this debasing of the nation's currency.

The inflation we have in this country is due largely to the unfortunate printing of money which has been carried out by this government through its control of the Bank of Canada. I am not saying that we should return to the gold standard, that somehow gold should become a new standard or barometer or that we should not issue a gold coin which is not 100 per cent gold, but I think it is questionable as to how long Canada should be in this game of minting coins, not because we need them for general commerce or for trade, but because the government thinks this is a cute little gimmick it can use to sell coins to people around the world who are coin collectors. That is what is before us today. How long should we tolerate gimmicks with regard to our coinage?

The coin which is contemplated to be sold under the theme of national unity will not be 100 per cent gold. It will have some portion of gold. We will hear later how much gold will be in it. It will sell for something over $100. It will have a face value of $100, but the truth is that, just like the Franklin mint or any other private minting operation, the government more and more is getting into the game of creating coinage, not because it is needed for commerce, which is the basic reason we have coinage and paper money, but because it is a cute gimmick to make a few dollars on the side and because there are many people who are willing to buy these coins. This is Barnum and Bailey stuff. If Barnum and Bailey had had the authority, they certainly would have been involved in this in order to get a few more shekels into their coffers.

The sad thing is that this illustrates as much as anything how this government is not inclined to deal with the fundamental problems we have, but is going for tokenism and for these symbolic things, and thinking it is solving problems by bringing out a $100 gold coin and calling it a national unity coin. What would have had a more positive effect would have been a government which showed proper restraint in its spending and which demonstrated to Canadians and to other investors throughout the world that it did have meaningful plans to reduce the deficit with which we are living.

The tokenism has to end. The idea of creating coinage with a theme which will be beneficial as far as national unity is concerned misses the point. There are basic problems which must be solved. Let the government get on with solving them, and the national unity problem it speaks of will solve itself. We need something more fundamental than the minting of another coin.

The inflation we have in Canada is due in large measure to the overprinting of money in relation to our real growth. Let there be no doubt that the inflation we have is due, to a large extent, to the overprinting of money. From 1973 to the end of 1977 our average inflation rate has been 9.3 per cent. If we were to project that ahead until 1981, the purchasing power of the 1977 dollar would be 70 cents, and the purchasing power of the 1971 dollar would be only 44 cents. Since the emperor took power in Canada our dollar has fallen below 50 cents in value compared with what it was valued at in purchasing terms the year the emperor took over. With that type of inflation and with that type of devaluation in terms of purchasing power, this government now comes before us and tells us that one of the top priorities of the government is to get parliament to pass Bill C-39 permitting the government to mint a debased gold coin. That is nothing short of shocking.

Let me give the House some other figures. If the government allows 9.3 per cent inflation to continue—and we certainly have no evidence that it will try to restrain its spending—every eight years we will double the level of inflation.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Not only have we inflation, but now we have the result of virtually uncontrolled inflation, which is rising unemployment. Here again, if we are to project ahead and if this government, heaven forbid, should ever be allowed to continue in power, we will have, by 1981, 1,280,000 Canadians out of work. That figure is compiled by simply following the trend that has developed since 1973 as a result of the economic activities of this government.

These are hard figures. For example, real growth has fallen in the last four years to slightly over 3 per cent. In fact, if it is projected ahead to 1981, we will find that we will be five years behind so far as our target of social growth is concerned. Those are the facts, and here we have the government of the day saying that there is nothing more serious in Canada than the authority, which it wants, to mint a $100 gold coin in the name of national unity. There are over one million Canadians out of work; inflation in Canada is running at 9.3 per cent; real growth, if it is projected ahead to 1981, is five years behind; and the government of the day is saying that the most urgent thing for Canadians is to mint a new gold coin commemorating national unity.

Let me mention something else, and this is perhaps the saddest spectacle of all. Let us take a look at the deterioration of revenue in this country so far as the federal budgetary position is concerned compared with federal budgetary expenditures. In 1975 revenue went up about 28 per cent at the federal level. In that year the government's expenditure went up 28 per cent. In other words, the government spent 28 per cent more in 1975 than in 1974 and that was, luckily for members of the government, the amount of revenue they had that year.

I mentioned that year because let us not forget that was the year the government spent money to be re-elected. The 28 per cent spending spree which we saw in the fiscal year 1975 started in 1973 and was amplified in 1974. The name of the game was to get re-elected at any cost, come what may. If inflation in the country were to go up, Mr. Turner, who was the minister of finance, under the dictates of the emperor of the day, the Prime Minister, obviously said, "Let her go". That is what we in Canada are now living with. We are living with the aftermath of what the government did to secure its re-election in 1974, because it was so disturbed by being put in a minority position on October 30, 1972, that it said, "Turn up the printing presses, get federal government spending in motion, give the people an illusion of wealth, and let the inflationary consequences come later". Ministers thought they could ride out the inflationary consequences as well as the unemployment which would result.

Here are the figures. They said they were on a restraint kick. The fact is that in 1976 expenditures in this country went up by 16 per cent; in 1977 they went up 14 per cent; and in 1978 they went up 10 per cent. The average rate of increase in expenditures since 1974, the last year that we had an election in this country, has been 17 per cent. For the government of the day, with that kind of background, with a 17 per cent increase in fiscal spending, to be coming to parliament on May 8 saying; "Give speedy passage to the currency exchange Bill C-39 so that we can mint a few more gold coins on the national unity theme" shows the priority that this government has and how little concern it has for the level of inflation which exists now in the country, and for the unemployment levels.

Having said that, I would like to state, if I may, why I feel it is unfortunate that the government has developed the attitude it has with regard to gold. Gold is a unique commodity, whether we like it or not, and has been in that unique position for centuries. In any civilized country you will find that gold has played a unique role for centuries.

Various books have been written on the subject of gold. One which I read over the Easter break was entitled "The Golden Constant—The English and American Experience, 1560-1976". It was written by Roy W. Jastram, Professor of Business Administration at the University of California, Berkeley. In this book, which is a compilation of various data concerning prices, the price of gold and the relationship of prices to gold, the author reaches some very interesting conclusions. If I may, I should like to read parts of the book into the record. At page 179 of this book, Mr. Jastram says:

> Gold prices do not chase after commodities; commodity prices return to the index level of gold over and over. This is one of the principal findings of my study.

Let me explain. It is commonly said—and certainly the author of this book has mentioned—that gold is thought to be a good hedge against inflation. The author points out that, if you look at the last 400 years, that assumption is not correct. Gold is not necessarily a good hedge against inflation. But he does point out that it is a tremendous hedge in times of a depression because, as a rule, if you have held gold during depression periods, you have made your best money.

What the author is saying in what I have just quoted is that there seems to be an odd relationship between commodity prices and gold, and that commodity prices can get out of line but eventually they return to the constant price of gold. He gives decade by decade, and in fact century by century, proof of what he is saying. To quote him again from page 179 of his book, he writes:

> My feeling is that it is beyond rational belief that this event could occur by chance alone, with the observed frequency, over the last three centuries.

He points out that this is why gold is constant. He then goes on to point out that there are various forms that a gold standard can take if a nation wishes to go on the gold standard. He says:

> The essential characteristics of the classical gold-coin standard are as follows:
>
> All forms of money, paper and otherwise, are held at a parity with a coined monetary unit defined by its gold content and are convertible into this gold coin on demand.
>
> This monetary unit is coined freely, without an appreciable charge for the process itself.
>
> Gold coins circulate freely and may be freely exported, imported, or melted down.
>
> Gold is unlimited legal tender.
> Gold constitutes a large part of the nation's central monetary reserve.

The author then goes on to state that, with some risk of oversimplification, it can be said that governments of the day tend to change this type of gold standard in various ways, which he enumerates as follows:

> 1. Paper currency does not have a 100 per cent gold reserve behind it. There is not enough bullion in the world today to support world-wide trade, commerce, and finance on a one-to-one basis of paper to gold . . .
> 2. The world price of gold may increase (drastically, as it has in the 1970s) so that either the admissible volume of paper currency will automatically inflate or the required reserve ratio of gold will have to be reduced correspondingly.

● (1602)

> 3. If the price of gold is to be held constant by the marketplace, gold must be bought or sold by the government in quantities precisely decided by the government, or interest rates adjusted by central banks to accomplish the same purpose by indirection.
>
> 4. If the price of gold is to be held constant by edict, the market for gold must be interdicted by the government, for example, exports forbidden, imports embargoed, private boardings outlawed, and so on.
>
> Governmental interference at any one of these points is, of course, a denial of laissez faire. This is not to say that a gold standard would be impossible today. It is to say that the gold standard as a dehumanized, self-disciplining dispenser of monetary justice is a myth.
> Any monetary system needs to be managed. The real questions are how and to what extent.

What are the basics people understand when it is said that we should follow the gold standard? To what degree is it realistic to expect any nation to go on a gold standard today? As the author indicated, it is not realistic to expect nations to return to any type of gold standard.

Why is there concern about gold? There is concern about gold because it has remained a rather constant thing through the centuries. If our citizens wish to have a convenient way to hold gold, they should be allowed to do that. That is why we support the concept of a $100 or $50 gold bullion coin. It provides Canadians with a convenient way to acquire gold coins. It saves them from buying the most popular bullion coin, the Kruger Rand. It provides them with a convenient way to hold gold, which has been done traditionally by people over the centuries. It is not that those people will be able to keep up with inflation by holding gold, but it will provide them with a constant which they can hold, along with their other investments, in order to ensure, if economic problems occur, that constant will retain its buying power, whereas various other investments will not hold the same buying power.

Page 189 of the same book in part reads as follows:

> Gold has two interesting properties: it is cherished and it is indestructible. It is never cast away and it never diminishes, except by outright loss. It can be melted down, but it never changes its chemistry or weight in the process . . .
> Its price has been remarkably similar for centuries at a time. Its purchasing power in the middle of the twentieth century was nearly the same as in the midst of the seventeenth century.

As far as I am concerned, that is a significant thing. Gold has remained relatively constant in its purchasing power over the centuries. It is unfortunate that our government has taken the concept of minting gold coins and debased it in the name of making money. There is nothing wrong with bringing out a gold coin in Canada. In fact a $20 gold coin was brought out at one point. That coin contained $20 worth of gold. Now it sells at a substantial premium of well over $100 because the gold contained in that coin has a purchasing power today which is comparable to what it was then.

If the government is given the authority to mint the commemorative coins it talks about, a fraud will be perpetuated on the buyers of those coins. This coin is referred to as a $100 gold coin. Many people will buy it thinking that it contains $100 worth of gold, without realizing that it contains very much less gold. In short, they are paying for something at a premium which does not contain $100 worth of gold. It is a shame to use our currency in that manner. It is a shame that money cannot be made internationally in a more effective manner than simply taking the coin of the realm, striking new themes, and attempting to flog it around the world in order to make whatever revenue the government sees fit. With the billions of dollars of imbalance in Canada, surely there is a more meaningful way to bring revenues into the coffers of our country without debasing the coinage of our land.

We have grave doubts about parliament's wisdom in providing the cabinet with authority to go ahead with any minting program concerning gold coins. Those doubts have been lessened somewhat by the 30-month limitation on the authority and the six-month reporting under the Olympic Coinage Act. It is time for the government to come to its senses. It should realize that many of the things it has done over the past decade obviously are not working. One cannot count on building a credit economy indefinitely, without the resultant repercussions of inflation and unemployment such as we are experiencing today.

If I had more time, I would speak—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have a little more time.

Mr. Stevens: I see my socialist friends are egging me on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You can take time until parliament is dissolved.

Mr. Stevens: If I were to talk until parliament is dissolved, knowing how upset the emperor is with the polls today, perhaps I would talk well into 1979.

In conclusion, I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to a book entitled, The Coming Credit Collapse. It is an interesting book which deals with world economy and currencies. It is authored by Mr. Alexander P. Paris, who is well known in the economic world. His degrees include a B.A. and an M.B.A. from Michigan State, and an M.A. in economics from Wayne State. He has been an active executive with various international trading organizations. In his book Mr. Paris pointed out that the credit explosion which has occurred cannot continue, and it will collapse if there is not more restraint and responsibility at the governmental level. In view of that, we should be very careful when we deal with the bill before the House now. It is another small step toward further irresponsibility in the handling of Canadian economic affairs.

How much trust can we have in the government of the day? Because of the current account deficit, the government went into international markets to borrow funds, and it is not even aware of who its creditors are at the present time. I was not present in the Chamber on Friday, but I read Hansard of that date. I could hardly believe what I read when I discovered the Prime Minister thought he had borrowed $3 billion on behalf of the Canadian public from Citibank in New York. How totally out of touch can the Prime Minister be, and presumably the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien)? They went to bed on Thursday night believing that the $3 billion credit was arranged with Citibank in New York. Yet the Prime Minister indicated that if Citibank took in deposits from somebody in South Africa, so what, that was their business. I invite Your Honour to telephone New York and find out the facts. Citibank did not put up more than $175 million of that $3 billion credit. They could not because they are restricted to the amount they can put out on any one credit and they in turn syndicated the loan around the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member, would he please limit his remarks to the bill before the House and not on what was said in the House last Thursday.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much more directly I can deal with the bill. The bill is the new Currency and Exchange Act, and the specific power that the government is asking for is the right to mint various gold coins. These gold coins become part of our over-all money supply, and what I am saying is that that money supply has been over-inflated and extended through the unwise use of credit in this country beyond all limits. I am simply saying that, considering the past decade, how much trust we have in the government of the day which, come 1978, is forced to borrow on international markets, and the Prime Minister does not even know who his creditors are with respect to the borrowings that they have had to arrange in New York to shore up our dollar?

It is all one ball of wax, and all I am saying is that I would have expected, at least days after the event, that the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance would have realized that the loan or line of credit they received was one that was actually syndicated around the world, and that a portion of that standy-by credit was offered to South African banks as it was offered to various other banks including Arab banks and so on. I find it rather shocking that they are so little in touch with what in reality is happening that they did not know that simple fact.

I know that hon. members wish to speak further on this bill. I hope that it will not be passed simply as an administrative function because it is much more serious than that. In short, I think it is another example of a rather irresponsible attitude on the part of this government with respect to a very, very serious matter in this country, and that is the unsatisfactory economic condition of the nation.

Perhaps I did not have to speak so long, but surely if anybody had watched "The Nation's Business" on Sunday night they would have seen the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) trying to defend the economic record of this government, and they would have drawn only one conclusion, and that would be it is a dismal record.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on third reading, I would like to say first that I come from an area where much of the economy has been built on the gold mining industry. In my opinion, we have done a great deal for the rest of Canada and its development, through the gold mining industry. It was with deep regret that we saw the passing of gold mines in Kirkland Lake, Larder Lake, Timmins and Matachewan, Pickel Crow, and other little communities across northern Ontario, and the fact that not much could be done to help them.

Over the years I have followed with great interest this argument that the member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) raised in relation to gold. I take very seriously his comment, which was facetious I know, when he said that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) did not really know where he was borrowing the money from and thought he was borrowing it from someone, but it turns out he is borrowing it from somebody else altogether, with a very small portion of it actually coming from Citibank. That highlights the inability of this government and of preceding governments, both Conservative and Liberal, to get through the morass of financial arrangements that exist around the myth, and I think it is a myth, of gold, the gold standard, the silver standard, and other backings we have for money.

The only things you can back money with are resources and work. Those are really the only two things that back any economy, and you can use whatever yardstick you want. We got along fine in this country without either gold or money for a long time, when we used beaver pelts. You piled them up so high against a rifle and that was the number of pelts you paid to purchase that rifle. When we talked about gold 20 years ago we were only talking about a yardstick. The yardstick got too expensive and was artificially controlled at a very low price. We controlled it throughout the world at $35 for years, after going up from $28. Now the actual price is $42.50, but in practice it does not amount to that at all.

In 1976 the mining industry came to the minister of mines in Ottawa and asked him for some help because the price of gold rose up to $150 and dropped back to a little over $100. When he was asked for help he made the statement that "he could not subsidize the gold industry to protect the miners and the mining communities because, if he did, he would have to subsidize other industries as well." Well, we have subsidized those other industries. It would be very interesting to know how much money we have paid to keep the rubber goods industry in this country, and how much we have subsidized the textile industry. However, we have not been able to do too much to save either one of them in the process. We could not do anything to help the gold mining industry for the very simple reason that we were in love with the International Monetary Fund.

The International Monetary Fund was born out of the failure of the Bretton Woods Agreement, when the Bretton Woods Agreement decided that one of the major factors in the last depression, which really resulted in World War II, was the inability of governments to provide enough money to make the purchases that were necessary. There was an unequal balance between the cost of goods, the necessity of those goods, and the dollars that were looking for those goods. It was decided that we would not curtail our money supply but that we would operate it on the basis suggested under the Bretton Woods Agreement where we would, in effect, maintain gold at $35 but "demonetize" the gold to the point where it was no longer the official backing of the money that was being put out.

They went further in the International Monetary Fund to where they allowed the world to establish drawing rights, and those drawing rights did not have to be backed with gold. That has failed because, while the countries and the banks put up a large amount of money for the International Monetary Fund to assist in the very worth-while project of developing the third world countries, almost none of those third world projects have repaid the money. There are billions of dollars, approximately $500 billion, floating around the world. Approximately $300 billion American are floating in Europe, and if those dollars were called, the United States would be bankrupt tomorrow. For this reason the President of the United States withdrew the backing of gold on dollars so that you can no longer redeem a dollar with gold backing. This has resulted in $300 billion floating around in Europe that are not worth the paper on which they are written. They are only worth that amount if they will be accepted by somebody else in trade, and everyone is very nervous about that. For this reason there is much collection of gold by private individuals.

● (1622)

There has been a lot of manipulation in gold by governments. The reason the mining industry was hurt in 1976 was not because of anything they did. They had raised wages in the industry over the years and had done some other things which brought them into the twentieth century. When I worked in that industry we often accused them of being in the nineteenth century because of their attitude toward workers and working conditions, but eventually they brought wages and conditions into line. That brought their cost up to $130, but they maintained that theirs was only a temporary problem and that gold would go to $200. They asked the government for help, but were refused. That was shortsighted of the government, Mr. Speaker. There are about 22 million ounces of gold in the treasury which were accumulated between 1948 and 1974 when we operated under what was called the Emergency Gold Mines Assistance Program. We accumulated about $1 billion worth of gold at $35 per ounce plus the maximum assistance of $10.27. If we are still holding that gold which was accumulated at about $47 per ounce and which is now worth $200 per ounce on the market—in fact we could sell it to the United States for more than $200 per ounce—we are in good shape.

We helped the mining communities for 15 years and made a lot of money. We only did badly when we took the advice of the Department of Finance to send it to Fort Knox in the United States at $35 per ounce. We lost $10.27, the EGMA subsidy, in that way but made a lot of money on the gold we have—in fact something in excess of $150 on today's market.

For these reasons I was interested in the gold coin proposition. It was an indication that the government was on the right track—not the officials of the Department of Finance, because they are plain stupid. There are 2,000 economists working for the government, who earn in excess of $30,000 per year. I think every one of them went to the same school and learned the same thing, but since they left the universities they have not learned anything. They really are not very bright.

The government decided to issue a gold coin, for two reasons: first, it is a good way to commemorate certain events and, second, there is a big market in the numismatic field. The government was already selling silver dollars. At one time it sold one of each coin in a celophane package, worth about $1.91 for $3. The mint did quite well on that. Now they package them in boxes and, for a coin worth $20, you pay $40, but it can sell for $200 on the market. I would not be surprised if the Department of Finance, being a bunch of pack-rats, put the lot in a backroom somewhere and eventually they will really be worth something. I know that in my office I put them in a drawer in a cabinet, and eventually they disappeared by attrition. Perhaps that also happens in the Department of Finance, but eventually they will reach the market and make some money, we hope.

I am in favour of the coin business, Mr. Speaker, and I think we have done a good job. I am quite proud of the Mint. In fact I am quite proud of the Post Office because our artists produce some excellent designs and they are well executed. Proof coins in this country are as good as any I have seen anywhere. I did not see anything wrong with the first $20 coin we issued, although ministers of finance made a lot of fuss. When the Hon. Donald Fleming was minister of finance we had not seen gold coins in Canada for 20 years. He got some bad advice from his departmental officials who told him we would be back on the gold standard and be the laughing stock of the world if we issued a gold coin. As a result he decided not to issue one. The next minister was the late George Nowlan, who got the same bad advice and did not issue a coin either. When Walter Gordon became minister of finance he was persuaded it would be a good idea to issue a gold coin for the centennial. That turned out to be successful, and a number of gold coins have been produced since.

It is interesting now to see how the Department of Finance officials are all in favour of this program and even suggest that the Mint can run a night shift. If we are going to issue something in the order of 190,000 of these coins with a half ounce or less of gold in each, that will not use much of the 22 million ounces of gold that we have. If we were going to go to the bullion coin, that is, a coin issued by the country which has to be coinage and has to be legal tender, I would suggest that it be low in face value, say a $50 coin. The government is going to be broke and the mines are going to be broke. We will be looking at a new economic ball game because, if the price of gold falls to $50 per ounce, so will everything else fall. I hope I have lived out my days by the time these gold coins turn up in the banks at $50 each. The $50 will not be the redeemable amount but it will be legal tender.

That one ounce of gold will be in competition with the Krueger Rand and the Swiss and French gold coins—

An hon. Member: And popcorn souvenirs.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member mentioned popcorn souvenirs. Right now they are selling for something like $176 so, if that is a popcorn souvenir, that is fine because a lot of people are buying them. In October, 1977, South Africa sold 405,000 Krueger Rands versus 216,000 in the year before that. As I understand it, South Africa is only issuing one coin, the one-ounce gold Krueger Rand which is not legal tender. The price is set by their government and is subject to change. South Africa is by far the world's largest producer of gold and we are told that they use between 10 and 15 per cent in this form. There is a fast growing international market for the coin.

● (1632)

A representative of the mining industry told us in committee that we are producing about 1.6 million ounces a year. There were 110 producing mines and today there are only ten or 12 left. Two or three of those mines are threatening to close within the next few years unless incentives are provided for development of new ore properties to make them worth-while.

I was impressed by the minister indicating that he really had not been advised up to that date of the potential. The minister's role is not really to sell gold. That job belongs to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). He said there is no way he would have anything to do with that. So I was not surprised that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) was not too familiar with this matter. I think he was pleasantly surprised to learn that the mining industry anticipates that sales in the first year could consume two million ounces of newly minted gold. If that is so, it would mean that we would have to increase our production to close to the three million ounces a year to meet the new demand and continue with the contracts the mining industry already has in the industrial field. It does mean an increase in mining, and that would only be the beginning.

There are not many people in Canada, unless they are in the finance department, who would not agree that gold being produced in Canada and sold as a coin, backed by the Canadian government to a degree by indicating its fineness, its karat and other characteristics as well as a limited legal tender, would not have a better appeal than South African gold on the world market. How many people in the United States buying gold in large quantities are buying Krueger Rand because there is no alternative? I believe these people would buy Canadian coins if there were no difference in price or in any other way simply because they are not satisfied with the political regime in South Africa. I believe it would soon evolve into a voluntary boycott by all sales agents in the United States and, instead of handling South African coinage, they would handle Canadian coinage as a replacement. If that were the case we would have to be prepared to go into production on a large scale in the first year. The Master of the Mint has said there would be no difficulty in his field in going into production to that degree very quickly. As well, he has expressed the view that the Mint could go into production within a very short time.

I believe the minister was enthusiastic in this regard. As I said he does not hold the mining portfolio or the financial portfolio. I am sure that he saw an opportunity for one of the agencies under his control, the Canadian Mint, to expand its operation, employ more people, and maybe make a profit as well. There was no indication that we would do this for nothing. It would carry a cost that would cover the production costs of the Mint and carry the cost of the Department of Finance for picking up the gold and having it for a short period of time. There was no indication that this would be a cost. However, I believe he will run into all those red necks, or whatever you call them, who are terrified there will be an implication that we will hurt in any way, shape or form, the International Monetary Fund and that we will establish the gold standard in Canada again.

It seems to me that Canada is lucky because there is a large amount of gold available in this country. There are and have been mining prospects in every province of the nation, with the exception of Prince Edward Island. These prospects add a price. The price of gold depends entirely upon the amount of reserves there are available. The higher the price goes, the larger the reserves are; the lower the price, the less reserves there are. By doubling the price of gold it is probable that the lifetime of some of those mines that are to close within the next two or three years will be extended by 20 times. What yesterday was waste will be valuable ore tomorrow.

On behalf of the gold mining industry I sincerely hope that the minister will be able to persuade some of the other cabinet ministers that what we are talking about is not going back on to the gold standard and not going back into monetized gold in the true sense, but going into business to take gold, prefabricate it into a coin, and to put it on the market for those who wish to buy it as a commodity.

It is interesting to note that holdings are not that large. In 1970 767 tons were being prefabricated in the world. In 1976 that figure went up to 823 tons. In 1976 total fabrication was 1,359 metric tons of gold. For medallions, fake coins and official coins there were 178 metric tons. For private bullion, which category these coins fit into, there were 89 metric tons going into that field.

Our gold production last year was only 52.4 metric tons. The bullion market was 89 million tons. For Canada to get involved in that to the degree anticipated, we would be talking about several hundred metric tons. That would mean a great increase in the production of gold across Canada.

I do not see that this proposal will upset, influence, or shake money markets. If there is any way that could be done, it is already in effect. Money markets are being shaken all over the world. Revaluation and devaluation are rapidly taking place. In my opinion, very shortly in some countries around the world there will be a devaluation and deflation will take place. That will create a large market for this type of bullion coin which will be used as a hedge.

I support the idea of this matter coming back to parliament by regular report. I appreciate the minister making that decision in committee. He said he would do it without consulting anybody, which is a good sign. He also made the suggestion, without consulting anybody, that he would be prepared to pursue this idea of bullion coins. I hope he will have great success. This is the first bright light that has shone on the gold mining industry since the price of gold started fluctuating so rapidly two or three years ago. It does not mean that the gold mining industry will make more money. What it does mean is that the amount used in fabrication each year will be stabilized.

These gold bullion coins will provide a stabilizing factor in our mines. They are not asking for a hand out. However, the relationship between the Canadian dollar and the United States, Europe, and other parts of the world, means that this industry is more the victim of our economic structure than any other segment of our economy. They will certainly be more than appreciative if the government brings about some stability, even if that is through the minting of gold coins.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I entered the debate on second reading some days ago. At that time I was pleased to give approval to the bill for second reading in order to get it into committee where we could properly examine what was going on. That, of course, happened. It had three days in committee where, I am sorry to say, we did not get the kind of answers that the government should have provided to the opposition parties.

The overwhelming complaint that was raised at second reading of this bill was the fact that these coins would be produced by the authority of an order in council. In other words, it was the government's intention to take away the power of parliament in one fell swoop for all time with regard to gold coins. That point was raised over and over again, in particular by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That avenue was explored in the committee. It is my opinion that the government and the minister did not come up with the proper answers to that complaint.

It was said at one of the committee hearings that it would not be possible for the Mint to plan ahead sufficiently without a bill like this in order to lay out the possibilities for production and planning in the Mint. I wish to refer to the minutes of the April 27 meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance,

Trade and Economic Affairs, issue No. 24. I asked the Master of the Mint the following question:

Would it be possible to operate the coin scheme that the Mint wants to operate under the guidance of a bill which was more specific than this?

The Master of the Mint replied:

It would surely be possible, Mr. Clarke, because in the past I think the approvals of gold coins have been specific approvals. The problem with a specific approval is you have approval for one program but the market for gold coins is a very important one abroad.

He went on to explain the marketing of gold coins. I may touch on that later. At that meeting the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services (Miss Nicholson) was only able to refer to the legislation on Olympic coins with specific authority. That was not what I was asking about in committee that day.

At that same meeting I asked the Master of the Mint if he was looking for more specific direction from this kind of a bill. I said:

If the Mint has already projected a plan for producing and marketing coins, then why can we not hear about it? I think that is the problem that faces us with this bill.

The Master of the Mint replied:

There is no plan because there was no act of parliament on the basis of which we could produce a gold coin in advance.

He stressed the fact that they needed to be able to plan for up to five years. He went on to say, and I quote:

If we knew in advance that we could have a gold coin program for five years to come, we could plan in advance for themes for the five yeas to come,—

The point is that parliament could have considered a bill which could have given the Mint authority to conduct a program over a period of years. However, we are being asked to approve a bill which gives authority to the governor in council to approve any kind of coin program. It is true the government has indicated it would be able to live with a time limit. In fact, the time limit will be something less than three years if this bill and amendment are approved.

Planning is obviously lacking both on the part of the government and the minister. I want to refer to the minister's remarks. He stated today that obviously further planning is needed and that there are further details that need to be laid out in order to get this program going.

I do not think hon. members, particularly those on this side, can approve a bill which states that the power of parliament will be taken away and given to cabinet on important matters such as issuing coins of any denomination, and in any quantity, all the way down the line. The minister said today that he cannot tell us the government's plans in the precise confines we would like to know about them. If the minister is not able to tell us, we cannot expect the Master of the Mint to tell us what is going on.

I want to refer again to the meeting of April 27. In answer to a question, the parliamentary secretary stated with regard to the planning for a program that the government had had in mind to introduce a Mint Act and possibly some amendments to the Currency and Exchange Act. We now have another example of the government changing its mind. The parliamentary secretary stated at that time, and I quote:

As time seemed to be going past, what was lifted out of that package was this bill, which was intended to give the authority to get on with the commemorative coins and protect that market, with the idea that the more in-depth discussion you are talking about, Mr. Clarke, would happen at a later date.

I can understand that, but I do not really like it. I asked:

Is there no more specific plan the Mint could give us now as to the plans, broad plans, they have for this program?

The Master of the Mint replied:

—we do not have a plan now, but it would not be a problem to prepare such a plan because we know how many coins we sold in 1977.

I hope that is an adequate illustration of the fact that we should give very serious consideration to whether this bill should be supported at this stage because of what it will do to the power of parliament with regard to issuing coins, to the Mint which is not able to plan, as well as to the cabinet which will have to decide what will be issued under this bill, because that really has not been decided at this time.

One indicator that more planning is needed before, not after, this bill is passed is that only one theme has been determined, national unity. That is to be the theme of the first coin. The Master of the Mint indicated that it had not yet been decided what other themes might be used down the road.

I cannot imagine how a national unity theme could be depicted on a coin. We did not hear anything about that in committee. How will it look to outsiders? After all, these coins are aimed at the outside market, not the Canadian market. How will it appear to the purchasers of these coins to have Canada telling the world, by some theme on a coin, that Canada has a national unity problem? After ten years under the direction of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) it should be obvious that we do have a national unity problem, but I am not sure I want to see Canada's problems aired abroad on the face of a coin. I find this theme an objectionable one. And to me it seems strange the government should want to advertise the fact that there is a unity problem here by making unity the theme of a coin to be circulated in the world market.

Furthermore, the government has made no commitment with regard to the priority it would place on the issuance of the various coins in respect of which it is seeking our approval. My point is that the bullion coin program is one seen by the mining industry and by the government itself, according to speeches which have been made, as being the salient one. Yet neither the minister nor the parliamentary secretary in the committee was able to give us any assurance that the bullion program would be stressed. The Master of the Mint had certainly received no instructions from the government telling him which would be regarded as the primary program.

It is interesting to note that the industry, in its representations, stressed the number of jobs which would be created by the program which is proposed. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) expressing his support for the gold mining industry. I do not often hear hon.

members in that group to my left speaking as did the hon. member for Timiskaming today on behalf of the gold mining industry, but I can understand his doing so because there are a lot of people in his area who are employed by this industry.

It appears the industry was told by the government that this was a non-partisan bill and given the impression that their cause would be helped if they were able to get around and visit as many members of parliament as possible to seek support for the measure. There is certainly no lack of support on this side of the House for the gold mining industry, but we must take into account that the bill has implications which may be more serious than the question of jobs in the gold mining industry, for example, the request to delegate these additional powers to cabinet.

I should like to deal with the job aspect for a few moments and see how the industry's submissions stand up to examination. In committee, on April 24, I was asking about the creation of jobs at the Mint as well as outside in connection with related products such as blanks and cases, as well as in mining and related industries. The representative of the industry was asked why the gold had to be made in the form of a coin. He replied that if there were to be sales in a foreign market the object had to be a coin. A coin could not be produced by a private corporation; it had to be produced by a government. The representative of the mining industry went on to explain that it would be unsatisfactory to issue a medallion because such a product would be dutiable on entry, say, into the United States. The amount of duty was later identified as being 17.5 per cent. A medallion would not be the equivalent of a bullion coin.

We have heard from my hon. friend from York-Simcoe about the degree of fluctuation in the price of gold. The value of a gold medallion could vary widely, but in the case of a $100 gold coin the "downside risk" is a lot less than in the case of a gold medallion. The language of the trade describes such a coin as an investment vehicle. I asked why the effect on employment would be greater if a coin were issued, and why a similar effect could not be obtained from minting medallions. The representative of the industry replied that the gold mines could not sell enough of their production at a price which would make a profit—

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 40, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—The Canadian economy; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—Transport; the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—Post Office.

[English]

Order. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to private members' business, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis).

Should this item be allowed to stand by unanimous consent?

Mr. Herbert: This item should now be dropped from the order paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 11 in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies).

Mr. Herbert: This item, too, should be dropped from the order paper.

Mr. Peters: With the consent of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 21 in the name of Mr. McCleave.

Mr. Herbert: This item should be dropped from the order paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Item No. 24 in the name of Mr. Haidasz.

Mr. Herbert: This item also should be dropped from the order paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF BENEFITS TO PARENTS ADOPTING CHILDREN

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide benefits to the adoptive parent of an infant, similar to the maternity benefits now provided to workers who are unemployed due to pregnancy.

● (1702)

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I have on previous occasions with respect to this motion, I will attempt to be brief. The purpose of the resolution is to give some indication to the government that there is concern in the country about this omission from the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. We know that the act very generously and, I think, wisely, provides for the accommodation of mothers prior to and immediately after their terms of pregnancy. That is very good, progressive, and reflective of a concerned society. However, it has always struck me as strange that we have not given consideration to adoptive mothers who bring infant children into their homes. We have not given to these people the attention we perhaps could have.

While bringing an adoptive infant into the home does not necessarily have the same physical stresses of natural motherhood, the adoptive mother, nevertheless, is under some emotional strain. If it is a first adopted child, the situation in the home is not unlike that of the situation in which a child who is the result of natural childbirth is brought into the home. The same care is required, and both mother and father have the same concern for the adopted child. However, we make no provision for the adoptive parent to have the time at home necessary to adapt properly to the new member of the family and to assist that child in adapting to its new environment.

I raised this matter in 1976 and again in 1977. All I have been asking is that the House give some consideration to amending the act to extend benefits to mothers who adopt infants. Perhaps I should qualify my proposal by saying that I do not think this should apply to people who adopt children over a year or a year and a half old. It should perhaps be restricted to parents who adopt children 18 months old or younger, or 12 months old or younger. However, adoptive parents adopting infant children should be extended the same benefits we afford to natural parents.

I raised this matter on March 21, 1977, and also on November 22, 1976. In January of 1976 I wrote to the then minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I received a reply from his departmental assistant in which he attempted to justify the government's stance on the ground of the differing voluntary and involuntary nature of adoption and pregnancy. So that hon. gentlemen will be aware of my continuing concern I would like to quote the crux of his argument as follows:

> The payment of benefits to major-attachment claimants who have incurred an interruption of earnings due to sickness or pregnancy, is in recognition of the principle that these conditions, generally involuntary—

I wonder what the mothers and wives of today think of that phrase.

> —cause a claimant to be incapable of work. As a generality, the adoptive parents cannot be said to have incurred an involuntary condition which renders him or her incapable of work, as the adoption was, in fact, an act at the discretion of the parents and, under these circumstances, it is not possible to consider the granting of benefits.

I said then and I say today that I think that reeks of bureaucratic idiocy. It makes no sense at all. I want to make the point that that is an argument against the extension to adoptive mothers of provisions similar to those extended to natural mothers. It is wrong, and I think this House would like to indicate to the government that it should be corrected.

We have an opportunity for a few minutes this afternoon to address ourselves to this. I hope there will be comments from the other side of the House. I want only to commend this motion to the House. I have dealt with it in this chamber on at least two previous occasions, and my comments, feeling, and attitude about this discrepancy have not changed in the two or three years during which we have been confronted with it. Having had a couple of years to consider this matter, and considering that this proposal has the support of hon. gentlemen such as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) and others, perhaps we could persuade the appropriate people to consider extending this simple yet meaningful and very much desired help.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

I myself am an adoptive parent. Adoptive parents are very real people who have very real feelings and concerns for the children who come into their homes and lives. When there is an adoption, there is an interruption of work. Perhaps it is not involuntary as it is in the case of pregnancy, but I suggest that it is involuntary in the sense that families which want children and which cannot have them are in fact not doing something voluntary. They are responding to natural instincts. Indeed, of those hon. members in this chamber who are adoptive parents it might even be said that they responded to very deep seated and unselfish urges.

I ask those who follow me to look at the simplicity of this motion. A very simple amendment could be dealt with quite quickly. This is just a resolution but, if the House saw fit, an appropriate and positive conclusion of this debate in general support of the resolution might just cause the government to consider the matter. There are thousands and thousands of families in Canada which would appreciate such a measure. In many instances it is needed, and the need is not superficial. It is real.

Without prolonging the debate or repeating the points I made in previous debates with respect to this matter I would like to commend this motion to hon. members and to suggest to them that it is a further indication of our concern for our society and the people who are in it, and particularly for those who want to bring into their homes infant children and to make them part of their families and lives. It seems only fair that the benefits made available for the involuntary act should be made available for the voluntary act.

● (1712)

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) deserves to be commended for his initiative. It shows that he is inspired by humanistic thoughts and motives. Today there is only one member of his party present in the House, but if he were surrounded by his colleagues he would stand out as a unique member of parliament on his side in that his attitude is different from that of his colleagues.

We have been witnessing for years now a striking contrast in the Progressive Conservative party, the majority of members of which have been going in the opposite direction from that taken by the hon. member. They have been supporting measures and suggestions which would reduce the extent of unemployment insurance and cut down the number of beneficiaries.

The measure which is being proposed to us this afternoon would expand the number of potential beneficiaries of unemployment insurance. I certainly support that approach for the reasons so well explained by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

His proposal is in even sharper contrast with the attitude of his colleagues when, on the one hand, they rise in the House to protest against unemployment insurance payments and the figures which are announced from time to time in the form of benefits paid to Canadians, and, on the other hand, within a matter of hours or days, they rise during the question period, as did the leader of their party, and bring forward the cases of municipalities in distress because of welfare payments made to unemployed people in certain regions of the country.

I well remember the time—and probably you do too, Mr. Speaker—when members of the PC party were urging the government to reduce UIC payments from 75 per cent to 66 per cent and were urging that certain beneficiaries be cut off the program. Now, when the effects of those measures are being felt in many parts of the country where municipalities are facing difficulties because of the increased number of unemployed people in receipt of welfare, they are the first ones to complain and scream about it.

I sympathize with the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East and I understand his frustrations when he finds himself surrounded by people who do not think like him. We all remember the votes taken in the past on unemployment insurance at the time when the system was modified considerably and when members of the PC party from eastern Canada, from the maritimes, voted against certain measures, understandably so, because they knew very well that unemployment insurance is a good program which brings benefits to people who lose employment for reasons beyond their control, for reasons which have nothing to do with their behaviour and nothing to do with their willingness to work, but who, because of certain economic variations and vagaries over which they have no control at all, find themselves without work.

That is why I am glad to have this opportunity to support the motion of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. I think he is quite right. Maternity, whether natural or adoptive, should receive the recognition of society, and the mother should be able to stay with the child in the early, fragile months when the new relationship is developing between them. In that sense he has touched on a fine theme and I think he has the support of the majority of members of the House. It gives us also an opportunity to stress, despite what we read in newspapers and despite what we hear from some quarters, that unemployment insurance is a good program, good for Canada and good for all those Canadians who are unemployed.

Perhaps I should add, before concluding my remarks, that this House needs new measures of the kind brought forward by the hon. member and others, such as, for instance, for injured workers who believe that when they are convalescing and in the process of rehabilitation they should be given the opportunity to contribute to the UIC fund in anticipation of re-entering the labour market, so that when they return to the labour market they will at least be covered in case they are not able to find employment with their previous employer.

To those who say that the program is too rich or is costing too much, perhaps we should suggest the desirability of establishing higher premiums and for making better use of the fund because, basically, Canadians want to work, and if they are given an opportunity to take advantage of the UIC fund to undergo certain training, that is for the best. If there is an opportunity to make creative use of the unemployment insurance fund by creating certain jobs in cases where the private sector does not wish to take that initiative, then by all means let us do that. Certainly we can do much more in the utilization of unemployment insurance funds than we have done so far, and the motion put forward by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East gives us a good opportunity to air a few of our thoughts on this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to commend the sponsor of this private member motion to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide benefits to the adoptive parent of an infant, similar to the maternity benefits now provided to workers who are unemployed due to pregnancy.

Mr. Speaker, I think this initiative deserves much consideration given the fact that we are in a changing world where the rules governing the family and society have been changed substantially. I have no intention to discuss whether those changes have improved the quality of life. But we are indeed in a world which is constantly changing and I think the idea of the hon. member deserves some consideration.

● (1722)

But before making any comments on such an initiative I wish to say a few words about the action taken by the Canadian government concerning the status of women. If you refer for instance to the creation in 1967 of the Commission of Inquiry on the Status of Women in Canada which was responsible for looking into the status of women to give women opportunities equal to those of men in all areas of Canadian society, I think that initiative of the Canadian Liberal government was a first major step towards a solution to the problem of the status of women in Canada.

Early in 1971, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took position about those conclusions and announced the intention of the Canadian government to give high priority to the recommendations of that commission by appointing a minister responsible for the status of women and the elimination of discrimination as well as promoting equal opportunities for women in all areas of Canadian activity. And I could continue, Mr. Speaker, by mentioning that in 1973 an advisory council of 30 members was appointed to represent all Canadian regions. Their aim was again to make the Canadian government aware of issues interesting and concerning women and of all measures needed to improve their situation within Canadian society. And I might also, Mr. Speaker, mention the creation of a committee and a co-ordination bureau responsible for studying the status of women in Canada. I might suggest that the hon. member discuss the issue he just raised in this House with the various organizations concerned so that a serious study be made about the representations he made tonight.

But with your leave, Mr. Speaker, I wish to describe a situation that occurred this morning concerning improvements that might be made to the Unemployment Insurance Act. It was amended recently and we should continue to improve it. This morning I received a lady who told me about her situation. She is working at home and has worked five years for an employer. As I said before, she did her work at home. She worked for a clothing manufacturer and, after five years, she found herself unemployed, without a job. She asked for unemployment insurance benefits which she got in an amount of $276. Later, on April 4 last, she was asked to reimburse the $276 because her job was considered by Revenue Canada as non insurable; she is therefore asked to reimburse the unemployment insurance she got as a result of her employment.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we want to look into the changes that should be brought in unemployment insurance, we should consider the possibility of making work in the home insurable for unemployment insurance purposes. After having discussed the matter with the Department of National Revenue whose representatives mentioned that it was difficult for them to determine how many hours of work the person involved would have put in, it seems to me we should be able to determine easily, through the income tax T-4 slip, the income of those persons who could perform their work at home while taking care of the family and without having to hire a helper to mind the children.

It seems to me that in line with these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and with a view to improving the status of women, working in the home should be considered for a woman who wants to earn a salary, who wants to bring in extra money, as in the case of this woman living on Fridolin Street in Fabreville, who paid UIC premiums for five years but who was told by the unemployment insurance officer that the employer should have informed her that her job was not insurable for UIC purposes. I therefore wholeheartedly agree with the hon. member who introduced this motion which could improve the status of women, but it seems to me that some improvement could also be made in the sense that I indicated, as in the example I just gave.

Could I suggest to the hon. member that the request he just put before the House should be considered by the committee which was set up to study the status of women in all these fields. I would suggest to the hon. member that he ask the advice of the Council on the Status of Women rather than asking an immediate amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Gamelin): Mr. Speaker, the payment of unemployment insurance to adoptive parents is a matter regularly reviewed by the commission which has been considering that complex and multifaceted problem for about six years. Let us see, for example, how society looks upon adoption. We must point out immediately that the number of children put up for adoption has dropped appreciably in recent years because single mothers are more inclined to keep their child. In short, while the number of children has declined, that of parents who would like to adopt has increased. Today a single parent can adopt a child, something which was unthinkable some ten years ago.

The phenomenon of adoption has also changed. The adoption of older children who often have physical or emotional problems is no longer an unusual occurrence nowadays. Therefore, the needs of those children and their adoptive parents are no longer the same. They also have changed during the past 15 years.

Today most adoptive parents earn an adequate annual income. It is an important criterion in the eyes of adoption agencies. This is why it is good to question the idea of supporting these families financially.

Before deciding on the advisability of giving maternity benefits to the persons who adopt a child, let us recall that the main objective of unemployment insurance is to give temporary support to any person who loses his or her insurable employment. To obtain this temporary help, namely unemployment insurance benefits, the person must look actively for a job, except of course if the work stoppage is due to illness or pregnancy. So, are eligible to this temporary financial help those persons who lose their jobs, who are unable to work or who try to find a job or those who are physically unable to work for a certain period of time.

That is the main objective of unemployment insurance. Does it meet the needs of the adoptive parent? Does the adoption of a child imply automatically that the parent will have to stay out of work? I think the answer is no. Generally speaking, to draw unemployment insurance benefits, one has to be able to work and to be available to this end. An adoptive parent can sometimes meet these two primary requirements. For example, it is possible that the child may need constant care from one of both parents. The parent who goes out of the labour market is, according to the Unemployment Insurance Act, able to work but not available to this end. Furthermore, a mother who has a baby is considered as being physically apt to work. Consequently, if the adoptive parent is not available for work according to the law, he or she cannot draw unemployment insurance benefits. Those two major conditions, that is ability and availability, enable the authorities to determine unequivocally the entitlement of a claimant.

The concept of extending benefit eligibility to adoptive parents is to be commended. However, in so doing we would be paying people who have voluntarily left the labour force and who are able to work. Their motives cannot be compared to the physical and uncontrollable reasons that I mentioned earlier. It is certain that adoptive parents may have to stay at home to take care of the new child. However, adoption agencies always explain to the parents the needs of the child to be adopted. Therefore, during the adoption process, the parents are aware that one of them will have to stay at home. Their decision is voluntary.

By paying them benefits, the government would establish a precedent and undermine the basic principles of the unemployment insurance plan. Someone who is physically able but not available to work for reasons other than those which concern the labour force could then receive unemployment insurance. Availability would no longer be a condition of eligibility for those who can explain why they do not meet this condition.

I would like to emphasize that I am not attacking the idea of adoption. Adopting a child is a very laudable social action through which many children can become part of a family. It gives the possibility to many adoptive parents of knowing the joy of raising children. Moreover, this is not a matter of saying whether we are for or against some sort of assistance for adoptive parents. The Unemployment Insurance Act was simply not designed for this purpose.

Some adoptive parents need financial assistance and others do not. In both cases, the decisions to adopt a child and to leave the labour market go together and must be made voluntarily. We must also remember that the main purpose of the unemployment insurance plan is to give temporary assistance to anyone who loses his insurable employment to allow him to find new employment quickly.

Canada's employment picture is not very good. The unemployment insurance program is not a welfare program. It is not designed to cover all social needs. I suggest it would be unwise to grant unemployment insurance benefits to adoptive parents because they must stay home for a given period of time. Since maternity benefits do exist, it is understandable that some would like these benefits also to be paid to adoptive parents. Yet this would contradict the basic principles of this program. Women collect maternity benefits only because they are physically unable to work. Adoptive parents are physically capable of working even though adoption agencies may require that they temporarily give up their employment.

The unemployment insurance program should not become a substitute for other social aid programs. The program is not designed to meet all the income needs of Canadians. I have no doubt that adoptive parents might need some form of financial support. Their problems can even be more complex than those of natural parents. I am, however, opposed to this motion because in my opinion unemployment insurance is not the proper instrument to help them.

• (1732)

[English]

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on the motion of the hon. member even though I will not be speaking in support of it. The notion of paying unemployment insurance benefits to adoptive parents, in much the same way that benefits are now paid to workers unemployed due to pregnancy, is not new. However, unemployment insurance was designed to provide adequate, short-term income maintenance for workers who, for reasons beyond their control, are unemployed, capable of work and available and actively searching for work, or temporarily physically incapable of work.

Unemployment insurance, then, is for workers who are unemployed for reasons beyond their control. While collecting unemployment insurance, unemployed claimants must actively look for work unless they are physically unable to do so. Adopting a child is a deliberate, conscious decision. The parent of an adopted child, although physically able to work, would not be available and would not be actively looking for a job. To give people in this situation unemployment insurance benefits would be to distort the purpose of the whole unemployment scheme.

Mr. Forrestall: Balderdash, nonsense. Get that grin off your face.

Mr. Herbert: Fortunately, in this House we are all entitled to our opinion.

Mr. Forrestall: Get that grin off your face. You do not believe what you are saying either.

Mr. Herbert: As most of us know, in the adoption process the particular needs of the child are outlined ahead of time to the prospective parents. If there is the need for one parent to remain in the home, this is known almost from the beginning.

If the parents work outside the home and decide to adopt a child and this requires one parent to leave the labour force, the adoption becomes a conscious decision that one parent leave the labour force. It becomes a responsibility that the parents assume jointly. The conscious element in the parents' decision to adopt puts the matter outside the principles and the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

If the government were to consider giving unemployment insurance benefits to adopting parents, a precedent would be set that would distort the purpose of unemployment insurance. With this precedent, why not pay benefits to any capable but unavailable insured person whose unemployment was caused by conditions other than the labour market? Using this reasoning process, I can envisage thousands of persons deciding to be unavailable for work for what they, in their own minds, saw as good reason. They would argue that they were entitled to unemployment insurance on the grounds that their decision made them unavailable for work. The implications of this are obvious and too far-reaching. I must emphasize here that the issue before us is not the process of adoption itself. Adoption plays a vital role in our society, providing good homes for children who are disadvantaged or parentless. It gives childless couples the chance to experience the joy of parenthood. The issue at stake is not to decide whether adopting parents should get some form of special aid from the government either. The point in question is whether unemployment insurance is the appropriate vehicle for such assistance. In other words, my concern is not whether adopting parents may need some kind of support. There will be those who will and those who will not. My concern is to retain intact the principles of the unemployment insurance program in this country. These principles have remained essentially the same over the nearly 40 years since the first Unemployment Insurance Act was passed.

Unemployment insurance is not a welfare program. We are all aware that unemployment is a problem in Canada today. But to use the unemployment insurance legislation as a sort of catch-all instrument to cure our social ills, however valid these needs may be, would be unwise.

Because the unemployment insurance program pays maternity benefits, I can understand people assuming that a parallel exists between that and the payment of support to adopting parents. Once it is understood, though, that maternity benefits are paid because of physical incapacity to work, the parallel disappears.

At a time when we are all concerned about unemployment, we must not attempt to force the unemployment insurance program to encompass areas it was not designed to cover. We must not use it as a substitute for other social aid programs. I do not agree with those who see unemployment insurance as the general aid mechanism through which the federal government can solve virtually any legitimate social need of Canadians. Unemployment insurance is a type of social insurance and not the answer to Canadians' income needs, regardless of their nature. If we were to remove the link between unemployment insurance and the labour force and give workers the right voluntarily to remain out of work, we would completely defeat long-established principles.

In discussing the principles of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the words "capability" and "availability" are crucial. Regular unemployment insurance claimants must be both capable of work and available for work. They must also search actively for a job. In the case of claimants on maternity benefits, the person is considered to be incapable of working because of her pregnancy. Maternity claimants do not have to prove that they are available for work because of this incapacity to work. Adopting parents fit into neither category. An adopting parent who has withdrawn from the labour force is physically capable of work, but not available for work.

Under the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act, then, this parent is not entitled to any benefit. To pay benefit to adoptive parents—laudable though this may seem in principle—would be to pay people who, although capable of work, have made a conscious decision to withdraw from the labour force. As I stated earlier, this would set a precedent that would erode the very base of unemployment insurance in Canada.

I said earlier that unemployment insurance is not welfare. Insurance spreads financial losses over the large numbers who face the risk. The benefits, paid out when financial loss occurs, are met from a fund made up of premiums paid by contributors. Welfare, on the other hand, is payable on a condition, such as need. Need is a subjective thing and it changes over time. Need cannot be financed using actuarially-determined premiums, as insurance is. This is why welfare benefits are usually financed from general taxation.

Insurance benefits, of course, are financed from pooling premiums. For unemployment insurance, premiums paid by employers and employees are calculated to cover the basic cost of benefits, including administrative cost. This is actuarially sound and meets insurance principles. To attempt to distort an insurance scheme so that it covers both the contingency of unemployment and the element of need inherent in social welfare programs would mean weakening the whole structure of the labour market and its relationship with jobs and people in this country.

Late last summer, this House passed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in Bill C-27. These changes were evidence of the government's continuing desire to respond, within the framework of unemployment insurance principles, to the needs of Canadian workers. May I add at this point that it is my opinion that we should be seriously considering introducing additional amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act so that persons drawing benefits which are a considerable drain on the economy and who, in my opinion, are not entitled to them should be excluded from those presently listed as unemployed. I refer specifically to persons who would ordinarily be on contract for periods of six, eight or nine months and who now are able to draw unemployment benefits for the remaining months of the year. I speak specifically of classes such as golf professionals and others who up to a certain point in time used to consider themselves fortunate to earn enough income in eight months to last for twelve but who in my opinion are now drawing from the taxpayer moneys to which they should not be entitled.

One of the most significant of the changes made in Bill C-27 was what is called the variable entrance requirement. This amendment made eligibility for unemployment insurance dependent on the rate of unemployment in the region of the country where the claimant ordinarily lives. What this means in practice is that the worker in a region of high unemployment would need fewer weeks of insurable unemployment than the worker in a region of relatively low unemployment. But let me stress here again that this kind of response to conditions in the labour market was done within the framework of the Unemployment Insurance Act and the principles enshrined in it.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, when the department makes an error, such as it did recently in using a wrong calculation which resulted in an overpayment of $4.3 million to some 15,000 claimants, it is my personal opinion that this is not the fault of the claimants, and under such circumstances the department should accept its responsibility and absorb that loss.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herbert: I think it would be fair to say that many adopting families have adequate means of income. The Children's Aid Societies are very careful in selecting parents for the adoption process and income is one of the criteria used in their decision. Because of this, many adopting families are in the middle or upper income range.

That is not to say that we should not be thinking of some programs to aid parents who do not have the income to adopt children and who should have the benefit and privilege of children in their home. What I am arguing this afternoon is that the unemployment insurance scheme is not the vehicle to be used. That is not to say there may not be a need for some form of financial support for the parents, probably as a provincial area of responsibility, although with our difficulties today perhaps we should not be emphasizing what is provincial and what is federal. But a deliberate decision must be made by adoptive parents, presumably after discussions have taken place with the Children's Aid people on the needs of the child and the parents' ability to provide these needs. So it seems to me that unemployment insurance is not the appropriate place to look for aid in these circumstances.

This is not the first time this House has considered the proposal to pay unemployment insurance to a parent who adopts a child. The issue has been raised on other occasions and the arguments for and against have been aired. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to appear to discredit the adoption process in any way. As I mentioned earlier, adoption does play an important role in finding homes for orphaned and disadvantaged children.

Personally, I think we should take every measure to make it possible for those parents who are in the unfortunate position of not having children of their own to be able to adopt. Adoption plays an important role in finding homes for orphans and disadvantaged children. It gives people who are childless the chance to experience the joys and the rewards of parenthood. The give and take of parent-child relationships is extended through this adoption process and society as a whole benefits. I have no argument against this process. I applaud it most warmly.

Neither do I dispute that adoptive parents may very well need some form of support in their very worth-while endeavours. Indeed, in many ways I believe the role of adoptive parent is often more difficult than that of natural parent. Those parents who decide to contribute so much of themselves in the adoption process are greatly to be admired. But I find myself unable to support this motion to pay unemployment insurance benefits to adoptive parents because I firmly believe the Unemployment Insurance Act is not the right place to provide this kind of assistance. There must be other places to look for help of this kind, not tied firmly to existing insurance principles and not strictly based on capability to work.

I am most pleased that the hon. member has brought forward this motion for discussion. Maybe as a result of our discussions this afternoon some other way will be found to provide the assistance which is requested in the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to speak to this motion today because I had hoped it might get passed and I did not want to contribute to the so-called talking-out process. However, that process seems to be in full flight, so I may as well say a few words.

I am prompted to do so mainly by the remarks of the last two speakers. It is rather interesting to note today that the only speech we have had on this motion from the Conservatives was a Liberal speech, and the last two speeches from the Liberal side have been Tory speeches. I suppose at election time things like that can happen. My hon. friend who just took his seat and the member who preceded him both spoke as though unemployment insurance is based on some basic principle that has never been tampered with or breached at all. I can say that when the program started the idea was that unemployment insurance was to be paid only in cases where there was no work and only to persons who were available for that work.

In the early years when we argued that it should be paid to people who were not at work because they were ill, we were told that would violate the basic principle of the Unemployment Insurance Act. After a while the principle was modified slightly and the law changed so that if a person was collecting unemployment insurance because there was no work and then took sick afterwards, his unemployment insurance benefits were continued. Then after a period of time we said that if we paid unemployment insurance to certain persons who were sick, why not to those who had to leave their work because they were sick, and finally that category was added. Of course, for a long time it was argued that we could not bend the provisions for persons who needed unemployment insurance because of maternity, but we eventually breached that and decided that that too was a legitimate reason for being away from work.

My hon. friend who has just taken his seat, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), suggests that if we go a step further and allow unemployment insurance benefits to be paid to adoptive parents, we will be opening the way to anyone who says "I am not available, I want to go on a holiday" or to someone to say "I want to write a thesis". I suggest this whole matter is under our control.

There is a relationship between the process of adopting children and the process of having children. Most of us in this place do not know what it is like to bear children, but there are a few who can tell us about the experience. It seems to me there are times when natural mothers can work almost up to the time of childbirth and then are able to go back to work right after. I have known of other cases of parents adopting children who have gone through such an emotional experience that they needed to stay home. So I suggest this attempt to draw a hard and fast line really does not match the situation, and it certainly does not match the fine sentiments about our being a society that ought to encourage home building through the adopting process. So, Mr. Speaker, the arguments I have listened to do not carry any weight with me. I should still like to see this motion passed.

Incidentally, my hon. friend from Vaudreuil said that he should like to see something done to encourage the adoption of children but he does not want to see it done through the unemployment insurance route. Even if we passed this motion, it would not legislate anything. It would just express the opinion that something ought to be done for adoptive parents. True, it suggests it might be done through unemployment insurance, but it would give the government a lead to do some thinking about this issue. I hope that we will not have to listen to much more of the kind of argument we have had from the last two speakers. I see another Liberal getting up. I hope that like the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) his speech will be a Liberal one, instead of a Tory speech such as we have had from the last two Liberal speakers.

I support the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) uses the term "a Liberal speech" and "a Tory speech". He does not bother to define at any great length exactly what categorizes these particular kinds of speeches.

In opposing the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), it seems to me he is taking a restrictive and confined point of view concerning the unemployment insurance program. In my opinion, the hon. member for Vaudreuil was quite correct in saying that we are in fact opening the door to a great many social problems in this country that require solution. There are a great many social situations where financial aid is needed. The question is: Should we open the door in such a way that the unemployment insurance program becomes a catch-all for every social program that presents itself to this House?

Like the hon. member for Vaudreuil, I think the issue before the House is not whether some adoptive parents require financial support but whether the unemployment insurance program is the proper program to provide it. We know that there are a great many social programs in existence at the federal and provincial levels. If hon. members in this House detect a significant gap and a need in our present complex and widespread social assistance program, it should be remedied. For example, if there are adoptive parents—I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would agree with me entirely—who are not financially able to be adoptive parents, but who do meet the other requirements of providing the stability, the emotional and psychological environment to take adoptive children into their home, then they should not be precluded from becoming adoptive parents. If hon. members in this House detect that there is a glaring gap in this program and that it must be addressed, then let us address ourselves to this problem and solve it. But if we say that we detect a need and that the obvious answer to it is through the unemployment insurance program, then we are saying that next week or the week after when another need is detected we can open the door again. By doing that we would not have an unemployment insurance program at all; we would have a new, all-encompassing, comprehensive social assistance program.

I know that when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre sat in the committee—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Another Tory speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. It being six o'clock the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CURRENCY AND EXCHANGE ACT

AMENDMENT TO AUTHORIZE ISSUANCE OF CERTAIN GOLD COINS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Goyer that Bill C-39, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): At five o'clock the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) had the floor. He has 22 minutes remaining.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, as it came up to five o'clock, I was explaining the severe reservations that we on this side have concerning this bill. Primarily, the bill will remove the power from parliament and give it to the governor in council to make rulings as far as the gold coinage of Canada is concerned. Also, I spoke about the lack of planning the government have shown in introducing a bill of this sort when the concept of what it is they plan to do has not been spelled out.

Just before five o'clock I had reached the point where I was talking about the production of jobs, what the program was going to do and how the mining industry representative had said to the committee that at the moment the industry cannot sell enough of its production at a price that enables it to make a profit. They want the price of gold to be determined in world markets. This program will provide additional demand. They expect this demand will lead to an orderly upward movement in the price of gold. He stressed the word "orderly".

The problem is that the government has not given any commitment to the production of the bullion coin, simply to the production of the medallion. It has been adequately demonstrated that the medallion will not have any particular value from the point of view of the mining industry. The demand for a medallion will be rather poor. There are a couple of very good reasons for that.

I want to illustrate before going on that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) had some very severe reservations concerning the production of a gold coin for sale as a piece of gold. In a letter written by the Minister of Finance in December 1977 referring to the proposal for a gold bullion coin, he said:

> First of all, it would seem to me that the term "coin" should not be used in this instance.

The production and sale of tokens whose selling price would be related to the commodity value of gold would be acceptable, he said. He then said:

> We would want to ensure that the tokens were not marketed with any implied guarantees by the government as to future value.

Of course, this is why the gold coin idea will sell, because it has a stop loss value of $100 Canadian, if that is the amount decided on by the government. The minister went on in his letter:

> We would want it clearly understood by potential buyers that these tokens were not legal tender and had no monetary value.

Of course, there has been a grave danger since then because they would have a monetary value. They would be put out by the government through the Mint.

The minister summarized his views by saying:

> —while I have no objection to a private manufacturer producing and marketing gold tokens, I would not wish to see these described as "gold bullion coins" which might have an implied monetary value or guarantee on the part of the government.

● (2012)

We can see that the government has made many changes in planning and that the planning has many deficiencies. Parliament is being asked, in approving this bill, to countenance aiding and abetting those who would like to move their investments in gold across international borders without attracting duty. I mentioned this afternoon that the rate of duty in the United States would be 17.5 per cent in the case of somewhat similar products. I raised this matter in committee on April 27. The Master of the Mint had admitted that the value of the coins bore no relation to the face value. The value of the gold was what counted, just as the value of the medallion would fluctuate with the price of gold. But if the government of Canada lends its name, investors are able to buy them with a stop loss value and thereby circumvent duties imposed by other countries on valuables moved across their borders.

I refer again to the minutes of the committee for April 27. A question was raised on that occasion having to do with sales tax on coins issued by the government. If one takes ten $20 bills to a bank and exchanges them for two $100 bills there is, of course, no imposition of sales tax. The idea of a sales tax imposed on the exchange of one combination of notes for another is ridiculous, I would be the first to agree. But the government allows provincial governments to levy provincial sales tax on legal tender. I am referring specifically to other coins produced by the Mint. In the committee I expressed the point as follows:

> What concerns me is the matter of sales tax on these coins within Canada at the moment, particularly the gold coins commemorating the Silver Jubilee of Queen Elizabeth II. When one goes into a bank and buys a $50 bill or a $100 bill there is no suggestion that sales tax is payable and there is no question that $100 Silver Jubilee coins are legal tender; yet, when one buys them, particularly in British Columbia, one must pay the 7 per cent provincial tax. Of course, the defence given is that, to use the minister's words:
> > . . . the determination of what goods are subject to provincial sales tax is the responsibility of the provincial governments.

I was quoting from the minister's letter to me. To continue the quotation:

> The minister presumes that
> > . . . the provinces imposing tax are doing so on the basis that these items are considered to be commodities when traded and not legal tender. As to why such a levy should be allowed, I can only state that to date the courts have not found that the provinces cannot impose these levies.

I would ask hon. members to compare this situation, in which the federal government accepts the position of provincial sales tax on Canadian legal tender, with the provision in the budget established some four weeks ago on April 10 when the cabinet found it was not too difficult to get all the ministers of finance of the provinces, or at least the overwhelming majority of them, to agree that concerted action be taken at Ottawa's behest. The result, as we know, is that provincial sales taxes were reduced.

In summary, we have many things to complain about in this bill and not very much to agree with. We support the intention to provide jobs in the mining industry and in certain areas outside, including the Mint. But the measure has implications which go beyond this. There is the aspect involving the further erosion of parliamentary powers—the emasculation of this institution. Then again, by voting for this bill, we would be aiding and abetting people who want to move gold across international borders duty-free. All this, together with the general lack of planning and the fact that the government has refused to commit itself to going ahead with the bullion program, is not good enough. I hope the minister and his colleagues will reconsider their approach before the question comes to the final vote.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this little bill involving the minting of commemorative coins, tokens and so on is not one of great importance, in my opinion, and we might be better occupied dealing with some of the tax bills flowing from the recent budget. But it does give rise to certain difficulties. The government itself does not seem very clear as to its objectives.

The government would like authority to mint coins of a commemorative nature, for example, coins marking the 25th anniversary of the Coronation or the holding of the Olympic Games. Such coins would be limited in face value but the face value would be much greater than the gold in the coin is worth. The minister has informed us that the governors of the Mint have suggested a unity theme for one proposed issue. In my view this is a stupid proposal. Other speakers in this debate have pointed out that presumably the country is unified already and that the issuance of a gold coin is not likely to appeal to many as being a very practical manifestation of unity.

As things are, parliament is the sole body, as I understand it, which can authorize the minting of coins for a particular purpose such as the commemoration of the Olympics. I am inclined to think that this authority should remain with parliament. It would seem as though the government really intends to run a type of lottery, and I would place many of these proposed coins in that category.

● (2022)

By minting coins such as this we are, in essence, competing with private mints, and I am not sure that that is the right thing to do. I believe that parliament should retain the authority to authorize a commemorative gold coin, but only under certain circumstances. This should not be given up to the whims of the cabinet, and especially not the present minister. The problem of unity is ongoing and will certainly not be solved by minting such a coin. I am more interested in a gold bullion coin. The mining industry has pushed the idea of a concept based on the South African Kruger rand, which is a coin bought at the price of gold of the day plus a small amount for minting and distribution. It is somewhat of an anomaly that nations around the world are getting rid of gold as a monetizing agent—in other words, attempting to demonetize gold and remove it as a standard. Gold has been a standard, I suppose, for 5,000 years or more, and gold has retained its value.

While governments may be demonetizing gold, people are turning to gold as a hedge against inflation. While governments tend to rely on the International Monetary Fund, individuals are buying gold to deal with inflation. It is interesting that at the present time the United States has something like $55 billion in gold based on $180 an ounce, or $270 million in troy ounces. However, much of it is impure. It is called coin melt and has a gold content of only about 90 per cent. West Germany has about $50 billion worth of gold at present day prices, France, $17 billion and Switzerland and Italy, $14 billion, while Canada and Britain each have only about $3.6 billion. It interesting to note that the most desired currency in the world is the Swiss franc, which is, relatively, the most heavily gold-backed currency in the world.

Incidentally, it has been suggested that the gold reserves of the central banks of the leading countries now amount to nearly $180 billion at present day market prices. It is an important reserve because it exceeds SDER's on special drawing rights from the International Monetary Fund by some 1,800 per cent. So although on the one hand governments talk about demonetizing gold, on the other hand gold is now one of the biggest reserves in banks throughout the world.

Many people are now interested in acquiring gold in the form of coins such as the Kruger rand. It is interesting that in their testimony outside experts quoted the fact that the only refugees from Viet Nam who were able to bring in valuables were those who had gold in some form or another. So it is a form of savings. It is something we can carry with us. It has been used over the centuries as a valuable commodity which can be moved.

It seems to me that with the inflation we have gold has value. It had a value in the past, even 5,000 years ago, and it continues to have a value. Even if governments do not wish to accumulate gold any more and wish to demonetize it, the mere fact that our citizens want to accumulate it makes the minting of a gold bullion coin very practical. I mentioned that the Swiss franc, which is, relatively speaking, the largest gold-backed currency for a small country, is in demand, and it seems to me practical that citizens should hold gold in coins, bullion coins or in some other form. That would be endorsed by the public, and would, in the long run, strengthen and stabilize our credit and financial institutions. The present monetary system is based on paper and confidence in it. At this time it shows serious signs of erosion. There are violent currency fluctuations.

All over the world people in many countries are buying Kruger rands. It is interesting that in January of 1978 some 700,000 units of Kruger rands were sold. That represents something like 700,000 ounces. In February some 600,000 were sold. The financial pages are full of articles indicating that gold is increasing in popularity. People are buying gold shares, gold bullion or gold stocks. If a Canadian bullion coin was available, Canadians would likely buy a few. In addition, markets in the United States and West Germany would be prime for gold bullion coins.

It has been suggested that the coins should be half-ounce or one ounce. Some studies have indicated that international markets would probably absorb one million one-ounce gold coins a year. That would still only amount to one and one-half month's Kruger rand sales. However, it would contribute to the international currency market. An increasing number of investors of very modest means are placing some of their assets in gold as an ultimate hedge against any drastic altering of existing relationships among major currencies. Indeed, some economists are suggesting that gold is one of the best holdings with which to provide a hedge against severe inflation. Some have suggested that perhaps one quarter of one's assets should be held personally in the form of gold, so it does not seem as though there is any disadvantage to minting a gold bullion coin.

However, unfortunately the government has not seen fit to say whether it is in favour of a gold bullion coin. There was talk about that in committee, but we did not hear the government say that it expected to mint one. I think that a gold bullion coin would meet with general approval and would be a major thrust in creating stability in the industry. It would provide more jobs. In the 1930's gold mines produced income and jobs for a relatively large number of miners when other mines were at a low ebb. As I understand it, gold mines are relatively labour intensive, so more jobs are created by a given amount of capital investment in gold mines than in other types of mines.

We in Canada are encouraged to export more, but we often export goods which are not very competitive. We have heard about our exports in manufactured goods. We have heard that the Export Development Corporation has to underwrite some 42 per cent of capital goods exported from Canada to destinations other than on the North American continent. If we were to export gold bullion coins, job creation would be accelerated because of increased mining activity. By exporting coins we would be exporting finished products. That would fulfil the wishes of those who suggest that raw products should be upgraded before being exported.

It has been suggested that as we are the third largest gold producing nation in the world we would not need to be financed by the Export Development Corporation because there is a solid market for gold coins. If the market holds up to what has been projected in studies, it would indicate that all our present day gold production would be used up, and presumably we would bring into play substantial amounts from other mines. The Mint would benefit from the minting of the bullion coins and should return a modest profit.

It seems to me that it is much more desirable to mint a gold bullion coin, which people wish to have as a hedge against inflation, even if governments do not always agree as to its value, than to run what I consider to be a kind of lottery on commemorative coins. Many people, including myself, believe that a $100 gold piece contains $100 worth of gold, but in reality it does not. The value of gold would have to be inflated many times over before it reached the face value of the coin, as we realized when we studied this bill.

In conclusion, I certainly support the minting of a bullion coin, but I am most unhappy at the fact that the government seems to prefer minting a token unity coin in attempting to supply the market when a bullion coin would go a long way toward providing incentives to our gold mining industry, resulting in over-all stability for our miners. I believe that the United States and West Germany would provide markets for the minted bullion coin and that individuals in the western world who wished to buy gold as a hedge against inflation would also be interested in buying the minted coin.

In view of the fact that the government has not been clear with regard to what it wishes to do in this situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That Bill C-39, to amend the Currency and Exchange Act, be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for the purpose of reconsidering the method of authorizing the issuance of gold coins and in particular gold bullion coins.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Ritchie) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the amendment lost.

The question is upon the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed, from Friday, May 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott (for Mr. Lang) that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass, and of the amendment (Mr. Murta) (p. 5176).

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of the amendment advanced by my colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has the floor. If hon. members want to have conversations, I suggest they have them behind the curtains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This bill has undergone considerable debate both in the House and in committee. The evidence presented and the information elicited during the committee proceedings has caused members on this side of the House very genuine concern.

Mr. Benjamin: Some members.

Mr. Mazankowski: I hear the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) say "Some members". Had he been at all of the committee hearings, he would have followed the bill in a much more effective fashion and would understand it better than he obviously does. We call that kind of member a hit and miss member. He was missing more times than he was hitting. The hon. member tried to jump on the bandwagon of the members of the Conservative party who had worked very diligently trying to bring about an improved bill. He came along at the eleventh hour and bootlegged in an amendment. Now he can go back home to tell his constituents what a great job he does. However, we will probably send out the attendance record, which will not look so good.

An hon. Member: Get up on a question of privilege.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member can certainly get up on a question of privilege if he has the guts and credibility to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has enticed me to get up. It is not a question of guts. It is more a matter of the content of his speech, which he has read three times during the course of second and third reading debates. I remind the hon. member on a point of order or question of privilege, whichever your Honour wishes to choose, that the two or three meetings I missed on the transport committee are no greater than the number he missed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I suggest to the hon. member that is not a point of order but a point of debate.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, that is about as phony a point of order as the points the hon. member made in committee, which were very phony. As I was attempting to say before I was so rudely interrupted by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, we have some very genuine concerns about the impact of this bill upon certain sectors of the transportation industry.

I wish to review very briefly the position our party has taken on this bill. At second reading, we allowed the bill to advance to committee stage, at which time we were to call witnesses and study the details of the legislation and the impact it would have on the transportation industry. Implicit in that decision was the condition that various factors would then be taken into consideration, namely the impact this legislation would have upon other modes of transportation. We were concerned about what it would do with regard to distorting the competitive balance of the transportation industry.

Secondly, we were concerned about the provision of adequate safeguards to ensure that the measures of control and accountability of this corporation were enshrined in legislation. As well, we wanted to ensure that the funds which would supposedly be earmarked for improving the transportation system would in fact be earmarked for that purpose.

The third point we wanted to consider was whether this legislation was really needed and whether it would serve the benefit of the public interest.

Fourth, we were interested in examining the impact upon CNR, with recapitalization and without recapitalization, over a projected five-year period.

Having considered all these points, the members of our party concluded that this bill does not appear to be needed at the present time. In our view, it does not provide any degree of significant benefit to the national interest of Canada.

Second, notwithstanding the amendment that was accepted whereby the annual reports of the corporation will be automatically referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, which is an improvement, in our view this is not sufficient to adequately provide for the kind of control and accountability mechanisms that we seem to be aspiring to put in place with all Crown corporations.

Third, because the CNR have now proven to themselves, their shareholders and the country that they can turn the operations of the corporation into a profit on the basis of the existing financial structure, this implies that the current management team are in fact doing a very good job. The fact that they are turning the corporation around is very commendable. We, and I am sure all members of the House, join in commending the president of CNR, Dr. Robert Bandeen, and his management team on a job very well done. They have demonstrated that with sound management and good business practices the corporation can turn a profit on the basis of the existing financial structure.

• (2132)

It may be argued that the profit is not high enough to meet the cash requirement in terms of maintaining equipment, upgrading roadbeds and so on, but the fact remains there has been a major achievement on the basis of the existing structure. But most serious of all is the concern we have that the CN could disrupt the competitive balance in the transportation industry, particularly one of the major private sectors in the industry, that is to say, the trucking industry, and that the interest of the public would not be served as a result.

We feel strongly about this. The Canadian Trucking Association presented a detailed and comprehensive brief to the committee—

Mr. Benjamin: And you bought it!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member is out in his constituency he is a great supporter of private enterprise, but back here in the Commons he is a doctrinaire socialist and nothing else. He speaks out of both sides of his mouth. He really does not support the trucking industry at all. He would like to see the whole trucking industry nationalized, as should be very clear from his utterances.

There are other considerations involved here, such as intentions on the part of the government which are not fully known at present, adjustments in the freight rates, the full impact of the removal of passenger service from the CN rail system and other consequences of government policy. For these reasons we believe the bill should not be proceeded with at this time.

Other speakers have dealt in detail with certain of our misgivings; I have myself expressed them in committee and I do not wish to cover the whole ground again. Nevertheless, I shall attempt to outline some of the circumstances which have led me to believe that it would be wise to defer this legislation. Mr. Speaker, we see this bill as an exercise in financial manipulation. When it was introduced, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said: Pass it, and it will save the taxpayers $100 million. As a result of the cross-examination which took place in the committee hearings we found out that this statement was utter nonsense. We can only conclude that, like the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), who confirmed it, has become a master in the art of deceit. That statement about saving the taxpayers money is totally inaccurate and untrue. Anyone who cares to read the transcript of evidence will find that such is the case.

The other argument which was put forward concerned depreciation. That argument was almost as phony. If the depreciation had been assessed when we were told it should have been, perhaps at the time of the last recapitalization in 1952—or it could have been calculated on an annual basis thereafter—it would have had the effect of increasing the deficit by some $24 million annually. The CN would have ended up with a debt equity ratio of 1 per cent to 99 per cent, which would have been totally unacceptable.

What did happen was this. Throughout the course of the CN recapitalization of 1952 the net effect was to put the company on a debt equity basis comparable to that of the North American industry. It was at that time of the order of 65 per cent, which was reduced to some 40 per cent as a result of recapitalization. To achieve a debt equity ratio which would be similar to that of the North American industry we have, with the conversion of $808 million worth of debt which was considered unclaimed appreciation in the equity, here again improved the debt equity ratio from 62 per cent to 42 per cent.

> However, the result of this long-standing obligation for the company to rely on loans for the bulk of its capital requirements has been a debt ratio of about 62 per cent compared with the rail industry average in North America of approximately 35 per cent, and about 35 per cent for the CPR in particular.

There, again, is a statement which is completely untrue. We found out during the committee hearings that there was no inherited debt to speak of after the 1952 recapitalization, so there really was not any long-standing obligation, as the minister stated. The evidence before the committee confirmed that all the inherited debt had been removed by 1952 and that the CN debt ratio was improved from about 65 per cent to 32 per cent, putting the company on the same basis as its major competitor, the CPR. So the depreciation argument is another argument which amounts to nothing more than hogwash.

What really happened after the 1952 recapitalization was that CN went on a spending spree. It purchased new equipment, bought out many trucking companies and engaged in the acquisition of many allied ventures. Then it found within ten years that it was back in the position it had occupied prior to recapitalization. Mr. Speaker, I am sure there are many private companies which would like to carry on their refinancing on such a basis. I would point out that the trucking industry, which the hon. member over there wants to nationalize, has to finance its requirements out of earnings, not from debt cancellation or the accrual of unused depreciation.

During the committee hearings I was talking about the ability or otherwise of Crown corporations to make a profit. I will mention two major hotels. First, the Macdonald Hotel in Edmonton, in 1973, showed a loss of $.1 million. It broke even in 1974, 1975 and 1976 and then showed a profit of $.1 million in 1977. So over a five-year period it was a break even proposition. I suggest that there probably is not another hotel in the city of Edmonton with that kind of record. The same holds true for the Fort Garry, except it is a little worse: $.1 million for 1973, $.1 million for 1974, $.2 million for 1975, $.2 million for 1976 and $.3 million for 1977, all losses. When we look at legislation like this, we are concerned about those kinds of things. Legislation like this really does nothing more than relieve the burden of debt from a Crown corporation which should do better.

I now come to what I refer to as the impact of the unknowns. Things which are taking place, either being enacted at the present time as a result of government policy or being contemplated, I submit will have a very significant impact upon the earning power and the operations of CN. I refer to branch line abandonment. Branch lines are constantly being abandoned, and branch lines will continue to be abandoned over the next 10, 15 or 20 years. This will place a heavier burden on farmers because the result of consolidation in the grain handling system will be more efficiency, and it will be easier for rail lines to move grain from country elevators to ports. However, it will entail much longer hauling distances for the average producer.

We have also talked about the withdrawal of passenger services. That too removes a liability or a deficit operation from the railway, some of which has been taken into consideration in the projected figures. We also have the prospect of an adjustment in the statutory freight rates, which the minister indicates will come about in due course and which will have a major and significant impact upon the earning potential of the CNR. There are fairly hefty grants from the government for railway rehabilitation and for the upgrading of tracks. The minister has indicated the figure of some $600 million going to both railways, the bulk of which will probably go to the CNR. We have budget relief measures which will accelerate depreciation on the purchase of equipment. There will be further purchases of hopper cars and continuing maintenance of a number of articles of rolling stock. Stated government policy provides for the payment of subsidies for the provision of any service which may not be economic, but which is deemed necessary in the public interest. We have the record of the CNR in terms of its improving its efficiency and its rationalization and in terms of cutting down its labour force, thereby improving productivity.

The total impact of these measures has not yet been felt, but I suggest that they will have a very major and significant impact upon the operations of the CNR from a cash generating point of view. The evidence in the committee suggested that taking into account some of these items, but not necessarily all of them, would result in CN's showing a profit of up to $294.2 million by the year 1981. Of course, this raises a couple of questions. First, can CN justify that level of profit? It is a Crown corporation. Second, we have to question what impact that much profit may have upon labour-management relations and particularly the negotiations which would take place between the unions and management. I think those two points are very important, relevant and germane to this legislation. In addition to those two points the impact upon CN's competitors will, I suggest, be very substantial.

That brings me to the point which I consider to be the most important in this bill, and that is the impact upon other modes of transport, particularly those which are in direct competition with CN. Of course, once again I refer particularly to the trucking industry. I think that the minister and his colleagues have failed to recognize the legitimate concerns of the trucking industry. I think those concerns have been sloughed off. Notwithstanding, the minister has made assurances, and the officials of the CNR have made assurances, that these fears are unfounded. However, unfortunately the words expressed in the committee are not enshrined in the legislation. Therefore, any guarantees which may have been suggested or implied during consideration of this bill in committee are hollow and meaningless.

I believe that the Canadian trucking industry can say with some justification what it said in a statement which I wish to place on the record at this time. This statement was contained in the submission presented to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications by the Canadian Trucking Association. The Association said this:

> CN management should be encouraged to compete in the marketplace on an equitable basis with private enterprise where transporation services can be self-supporting. We do not believe this can happen where the Crown-owned railway is given an overwhelming financial advantage. To be more specific, we are concerned that given enough financial leeway, CN management will again be tempted to try and buy their way into a self-contained empire of inter-connecting services where they would otherwise have to compete with other carriers for much of the interline business they would control. CN might decide that with one final cast of the dice they could revolutionize domestic transportation on a multi-modal basis and in the process effectively bury the competition.

The Association made the following concluding statement:

> A condition precedent to passage of C-17 should be some kind of guarantee to parliament that CN will refrain from indulging in massive new investment schemes in an attempt to corner profitable domestic transportation markets while neglecting its responsibility to maintain, if not upgrade, services in those regions of the country where CN may be the dominant transportation undertaking and where return on investment is less attractive. Present procedures obviously aren't adequate.

I think those concerns are very fundamental and should be considered very seriously, because fundamental to sustaining an efficient and effective transportation system, the concept of equal treatment for all modes of transport by the government must certainly prevail. In this case I see this legislation discriminating against the trucking industry and, for that matter, the CPR.

I come to my final point. It is touched on in that final passage which I quoted, and it has to do with control and accountability and the assurance that the CNR will not be back to this parliament in 20 years for another recapitalization or another debt cancellation.

Mr. Benjamin: It will be if you are running it.

Mr. Mazankowski: We do not have that assurance in this legislation. We tried to build in that kind of mechanism. We tried to have the Auditor General appear before the committee to give us his advice and wisdom. The loudmouth from Regina-Lake Centre was not at the committee at that time, so he really would not know what I am talking about.

● (2152)

Mr. Benjamin: I was so. I voted for your motion, you idiot.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member he should watch his language, and I also suggest that he withdraw the remark.

Mr. Mazankowski: He may have been there in body, but he certainly was not there in spirit.

Mr. Benjamin: I voted for your motion, you dummy.

Mr. Mazankowski: He certainly was not there in spirit. In committee we attempted to improve the legislation so as to ensure that the mechanism which we provide for a greater degree of control and accountability to the House, and thereby to the shareholders of this major Crown corporation, is put into place; and in that connection we attempted to have the Auditor General appear before the committee. We felt that he would have been the expert on this matter, given the fact that he had undertaken a major comprehensive study of the financial management and control of Crown corporations and that he had advanced some very thoughtful suggestions. Unfortunately, members of the Liberal government were not prepared to explore ways and means of improving the legislation and they voted our motion down.

We hear that the government is proposing new Crown corporation legislation. We know there is a royal commission to study the financial management control and accountability of Crown corporations. Perhaps that is all the more reason why we should not be fooling around with this legislation at this time, writing off an $808 million debt without providing as a balance an adequate control mechanism. It is with a great deal of concern that we express our belief that this bill is not complete in terms of providing an adequate check and balance of one of the largest Crown corporations in Canada.

I must remind you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very large corporation which has some 50 consolidated companies in addition to CNR, plus 20 companies which are jointly operated with other entities. Had we been able to look at this piece of legislation with a view to improving it, it could very well have become the example for other Crown corporations to follow. At least there should have been a sincere attempt to explore every conceivable avenue, and we thought the Auditor General would certainly have been the right person to have come before the committee. We felt we would then have been in a position to advance some thoughtful suggestions and proposals which could have been incorporated into the legislation.

I think we should ask ourselves this question: will we have a better national railway as a result of this piece of legislation? Will the corporation be able to discharge its mandate in a more effective fashion? Will it be much more efficient? Will we have a railway which will cut down the car cycle? When I speak about car cycle I am referring to the movement of grain. Until now it has been 23 days from the elevator to the port. I need not remind hon. members about the problems we have had with moving grain, about the ships waiting in the harbour and the grain piling up on the prairies. Yesterday I had a call from a point where six box cars had been waiting for the last six and a half months. Surely that is no way to run a national railway.

There was no commitment that the passage of this bill would give us a better railway and a better service. We have had no assurance that there will not be more towers, more shopping centres and more investments in other allied and collateral ventures. The president of CNR indicated that he was committed to making CNR the finest railway in North America. He said he was committed to improving the over-all efficiency and effectiveness of the corporation. But again those words are not carved in the legislation before us; they are only recorded in the committee proceedings. We must look at this legislation on the basis of how it will stand the test of time. Judging from the evidence that we have elicited, we can only come to the conclusion that there is no reason why we should proceed with this bill at present because of the various unknown factors and points which I have outlined here. We believe there is absolute justification for postponing and deferring this bill, and for that reason I support the amendment which has been advanced by the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in the remaining one or two minutes this evening I want to re-emphasize one or two of the points made by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). A little later in the adjournment debate I will deal with one or two specifics, which I will take up at greater length tomorrow.

Before calling it ten o'clock I should like to indicate to hon. members opposite the disappointment of those of us on this side of the House as well as of the whole of Canada that neither the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) nor his parliamentary secretary are present in the chamber this evening. I find this to be a measure of contempt for the House, which characterizes the attitude—

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is hardly fair for the hon. member to make the comment he just made. The minister was very concerned that this bill should be passed tonight. He was hoping it would be passed and made a specific request that I be here to follow the debate, in the hope the bill would be passed. He has a concern about this bill. The hon. member of all people should know that there are times when members of parliament have responsibilities in other parts of the country.

Mr. Forrestall: I accept that chastisement, if that is what it is, from the distinguished member who is here representing the Minister of Transport. Notwithstanding that, if this bill is so damn important, where the hell is the minister? What is he doing in the dying days of this parliament? My point is this: such an attitude as characterized by the absence of the Minister of Transport tonight epitomizes the attitude the government has taken toward transport in this country in the last couple of years.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—FORECAST OF UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES AND REAL GROWTH

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the question which is under debate this evening was one asked by myself of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on April 21. My question was twofold. I asked the minister to indicate what was the estimated level of unemployment that had been used by his department in the April 10 budget which was tabled in the House; and secondly, what did he anticipate the real growth in the economy will be in the current year. Unfortunately the Minister of Finance indicated that it had not been the government's custom to indicate unemployment levels, and in effect he fudged that issue. So far as real growth is concerned, he stated that it would be approximately 5 per cent, which is slightly down from the earlier figures the minister had indicated for real growth.

I think it is particularly important when we are considering the economic plight of Canada that the government be pressed to indicate what they see in the coming years in terms of unemployment, real growth, inflation and the other standard indices. We cannot operate in a vacuum. Certainly to judge from past years, it is alarming to see the dramatic increases which occurred in Canada respecting unemployment. As far as numbers are concerned, unemployment has approximately tripled compared to the level in 1968. Inflation has more than doubled since 1968. Real growth has gone down. Government spending has soared. It is not enough for a budget to be introduced; it would also be helpful if the government would indicate what it sees for the unemployment level this year and in coming years.

The government has been inclined to rationalize its sad performance. It likes to pull various pictures out of the air to convince the public that it is doing a little better than most of us believe. For example, it is customary for the government to talk in terms of creation of jobs in Canada. It uses that as an excuse to justify the relatively high unemployment level in the country. In short, the government likes to say that it is not so much the fact that jobs have not been created as that the participation rate has been rising. Also it indicates that unemployment levels are higher than anticipated, and it is difficult to identify what unemployment levels will be in the coming months or years. That is not true.

If one takes a look at the past 30 months in Canada, it is startling to see since controls were imposed on our economy in October 1975 that inflation has gone up a full 4 per cent faster than in the United States. I compare our percentage to that in the United States because that country is our main trading partner and has no controls. On the other hand, real growth has been 4 per cent faster in the United States than in Canada. But most significantly, employment growth has been virtually nil in Canada, compared to 7 per cent in the United States. If Canada had had even half the rate of growth in the past 30 months of that in the United States, our unemployment levels would be down to the 5 per cent range. That is what we are talking about tonight. If the government are not anticipating unemployment at those levels, they owe the House and Canadians an explanation.

If we take a look at the past record, we find unemployment in Canada has risen from 5.3 per cent in 1974, to 6.9 per cent in 1975, to 7.1 per cent in 1976 and to 8.1 per cent on the average in 1977. The figure for 1977 indicates that there are 862,000 Canadians out of work. If that trend continues, it is startling to realize that by 1981 there will be 1,280,000 Canadians out of work and our unemployment level will be 10.6 per cent.

Dealing with real economic growth, on average the real economic growth has been 3.06 per cent since 1973. If that trend continues, it will mean the loss of a full three years of real growth by 1981. That will be tough to catch up with. Surely the government must indicate in more concrete terms where it is going. For example, in the "Economic Review" of April 1978, which was tabled approximately a week ago, at page 88 it is indicated that on a cyclically adjusted basis our deficit will be $4.4 billion in 1977 if various things are taken into account.

At committee we asked the minister what level of unemployment would have given the $4.4 billion deficit figure that they referred to. I was startled to find that they said 6.2 per cent unemployment would still leave a $4.4 billion deficit in this country. Clearly the government is holding back facts concerning our economy at the present time. Private forecasters, for example—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I want to thank the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) for asking this question in the adjournment debate because it gives me an opportunity to expand on the minister's answer which he gave on April 21. I am sure the hon. member will agree there was a great deal of confusion and misunderstanding generated by the perhaps less than clear report of the most recent Conference Board numbers. It seems that the hon. member was one of many who have been captured by this confusion.

First of all, and most importantly, the Conference Board has not revised down its 4.5 per cent forecast for real growth as measured by the increase in real gross national product. Moreover, this 4.5 per cent forecast does not include the effects of the budget which everyone agrees will give a significant boost to real growth this year, nor does it include the Quebec budget which is also stimulative.

The 3.9 per cent figure referred to by the hon. member relates to the increase in real domestic product, not to g.n.p. What has happened is that the rates of increase for two quite different measures of output have been taken from the same forecast and reported as the same number. This confusion arose partly because the Conference Board released its national forecast, from which the 4.5 per cent g.n.p. number was taken, a few weeks before its provincial forecasts, from which the 3.9 per cent RDP number was taken. But the provincial forecasts in aggregate are consistent with the national forecast of 4.5 per cent real growth in g.n.p. It is my understanding that the Conference Board itself is quite concerned that this confusion has arisen. In fact, the Board is actively considering releasing the national forecast and the provincial detail simultaneously in the future precisely so that this mix-up will not arise again.

Secondly, the aggregation of unemployment rates from the Conference Board's provincial forecasts shows a national rate of 8.5 per cent compared to a rate of 8.4 per cent in their national forecast. The reason for this is again one of timing. The Conference Board's national forecast was prepared before the March labour force data was available while their provincial forecasts included this information. Despite very strong employment growth in that month, the unemployment rate rose as the participation rate increased by more than anyone had thought likely, the Conference Board included. The inclusion of the unexpectedly high March figure had the effect of raising the annual average marginally. Thus, there has not really been any revision in the forecast of the unemployment rate; rather, new past historical observations have been included in the 1978 base.

On the conceptual side, gross national product measures, as its name suggests, national product; that is, the boundary of production is drawn to include all of the production of Canadian factors of production irrespective of what country the production originates in. With the real domestic product, on the other hand, the boundaries of production are confined to the geographic boundaries of Canada, irrespective of whether the factors of production are Canadian or non-resident.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

Adjournment Debate

TRANSPORT—HALIFAX—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE RATE FOR CONTAINERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the temptation, of course, is to continue where I left off at ten o'clock, but I will do that when the debate resumes tomorrow, as I hope it will, with respect to the CNR finances.

My question this evening involves Canadian National Railways and its rate structures out of Halifax. Almost three months ago now, I made inquiries of the minister with respect to the 115 per cent increase in container rates out of and through—I am sorry, it is not you responding this evening?

Mr. Lumley: Yes. I am sorry.

Mr. Forrestall: Of course, come back when you are ready.

● (2212)

The question of the 115 per cent increase in the cost of moving containers from the port of Halifax to the port of Montreal was raised in the face of a clear indication from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) that the rate would be raised again early in June. Subsequently, we had an indication from Canadian National that it might not be necessary to increase by 6 or 8 per cent the cost of moving containers from the port of Halifax. Now we have every indication that the CNR is backing away from that and once again there is likely to be an increase on June 1.

My concern is that we have a 115 per cent increase since the base year of 1969-70 against reported increases in costs of some 50 per cent. The usury aspect of this is what bothers me. Notwithstanding the important matters that keep the Minister of Transport out of this chamber, he should be here once in a while to respond to the concerns expressed by some of the ports outside the St. Lawrence River area.

We are on the brink of being priced out of the North American container business by a government which permits a 115 per cent increase in 8 or 9 years and sits still while Canadian National Railways proposes an additional increase on June 1. Dart Container Lines claim that every move in this direction takes us one step closer to moving out of the business and moving Canadian traffic and mid-west United States traffic through a principal Atlantic east coast port, which I suggest in this particular instance could be either the port of Halifax or Saint John, New Brunswick.

It is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. The response from the minister was equivocal, evasive and had nothing to do with whether he had any intention of bringing the influence of his office in government to bear on this crucial problem. I should like to put my question to the parliamentary secretary this evening, who is good enough to be here and to bring us his judgment with respect to these matters.

Have Canadian National's costs from 1969-70 up to today gone up by 115 per cent or 50 per cent? Users of the service are convinced that the cost increase is somewhere in the order of 45 to 50 per cent, yet the company has increased its container rates 115 per cent and are threatening us with a further increase on June 1. That is not fair, Mr. Speaker. We are talking about Canadian National Railways and their attitude toward east coast ports.

I continue to be concerned that Canadian National Railways have invested in Cast Lines, a company which is owned outside Canada and is competing with non-conference line carriers of containers between Europe and North America. They can only do that at the expense of the ports of Halifax and Saint John, and to the advantage of the port of Montreal. Canadian National Railways have a substantial financial investment in Cast Lines.

We have had a 115 per cent increase in rates over the last 8 or 9 years against a 50 per cent increase in costs, and right in the middle of this period Canadian National invested in a foreign-owned company moving containers outside of the non-conference line into North America. The port of Halifax is getting the short end of the stick, Mr. Speaker. I have no bias against any of the ports in eastern Canada but I expect my government to have a bias towards non-positions with respect to the various ports. To remain silent and let the principal Crown corporation, the principal carrier, exercise its right, indeed its might—

• (2217)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to apologize to the hon. member for Darmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) for the confusion at the start of the adjournment debate. I have been asked by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to reply on his behalf. I did not want to interrupt him at the start of my discussion with his colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

As the hon. member is aware, the government through proposed legislation in the last session, Bill C-33, recommended new freight rate provisions which would lead to more equitable rates and better regulatory procedures. The minister in response to the hon. member's questions invited the opposition to prove their sincerity in wishing to clear up the freight rate inequities by consulting with the government with a view to swiftly passing amendments to the National Transportation Act which would do just that.

The government's proposals to amend the legislation governing railway freight rates are generally intended to promote a greater degree of fairness, both regionally and to shippers, while taking into account the financial need of the Canadian railways. The government envisages that Canadian railways should continue to exercise considerable freedom in establishing freight rates where competitive forces can be expected to protect the public interest. Nevertheless, because of the importance of the railway system to the national economy and the continued existence of some railway monopoly power in certain markets, it is proposed that the maximum and minimum rate provisions of the Railway Act should be strengthened.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

New legislation would also address the problem of long-haul/short-haul rate differentials. This proposal is intended to modify an element of railway pricing which has been perceived as an example of unfair discrimination. At the same time, it will permit exceptions where a complete prohibition could place Canadian producers at a competitive disadvantage vis-à-vis foreign producers.

In his question of February 15, the hon. member called attention to the Halifax gateway study by A. O. Little. With respect to rail freight rates for containers the study indicates that those involving Halifax are quite reasonable relative to equivalent rates charged for container movement by rail in the U.S. Specifically, with respect to the existing container rate from Halifax to Chicago of $510 as opposed to $359 from Montreal to Chicago, this difference is reasonable when the distances for the two movements, 1,600 miles as compared to 800 miles, are considered. Mr. Speaker, rates reflect both distance and the cost of providing the service.

The study findings foresee continued growth in port and related distribution activity for Halifax and are therefore positive in terms of a growing and expanding role for the port of Halifax. Toward this goal, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada will continue to work with all concerned. I think the hon. member opposite will agree that federal moneys for the construction of $35.6 million container handling facilities at Fairview Cove, Halifax, is just one demonstration of the federal government's commitment to this goal.

POST OFFICE—REMOVAL OF TELEPHONES FROM RURAL POST OFFICES

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, just prior to April 14 I received a phone call from a constituent in Ashern, Manitoba. I was informed by that constituent that the local post office had just been advised that their telephone was to be removed. I could not believe my ears when I heard that the post office, as part of their restraint program, was going to start removing telephones from rural post offices in Manitoba. That is why on April 14, under Standing Order 43, I brought up a motion which I felt was an urgent and pressing matter asking the post office to stop any further removal of telephones from rural post offices, because the telephone in a rural post office is the lifeline of the community.

At that particular time I thought the Post Office Department may have had the courtesy to advise me that telephones were to be removed from rural post offices in Manitoba. I was anxious to know if this procedure would be done Canada-wide or if it would be strictly confined to the province of Manitoba. I am glad to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) in the House tonight so he can answer this important question. To the rural people of Manitoba and maybe to people right across Canada I think this is certainly a sign that this government does not have much respect for the rural people and for the service which the post office should give them.

• (2222)

On May 4, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) asked the Postmaster General why the post office was going back some 100 years to the Thomas Edison and Alexander Graham Bell era. The Postmaster General replied:

Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer this question but it seems quite irrelevant to me since the telephone does not come under the jurisdiction of the Post Office.

I learned something. I thought that would be under the jurisdiction of the post office. I was wondering if the Postmaster General had actually issued the order to remove the telephones.

Just what does the telephone mean to the local community? Let us take a typical rural community in my constituency in Manitoba. The postmaster knows everyone in that area. When someone's seed order, a COD parcel, eyeglasses that have been repaired or senior citizen's parcel arrives, it it only courtesy for the postmaster to telephone and inform that person. In many cases rural people live ten or 15 miles from the post office. The government says we must conserve energy. With the telephone removed from the post office, a person must drive to town to find out if a parcel has arrived. The post office is there to provide a service. When a parcel shipped by bus arrives in a rural community, the manager of the bus depot calls the person to tell him the parcel has arrived. If a parcel arrives by rail, the railway office makes a similar call. I feel we have gone back 100 years in this regard.

About 12 years ago in Manitoba, telephones were installed in grade five and grade four post office so that they could supervise the operations of some five or six smaller post offices in that region. Grade four post offices were generally in the immediate area of a grade five. The grade five postmaster was the supervisor of that area. He could make telephone calls regarding regulations and generally advise people of what was going on in the post office. It was toll free at that level.

The supervisoryship has been done away with. Some of the smaller post offices still telephone as a service regarding regulations and the availability of forms which post offices keep for the general public. Nowadays there is the steady telephone trade that has been created by the use of postal codes.

It appears that the decision to remove the telephones in Manitoba was made by one of the supervisors in Winnipeg. I understand his name is Mr. Gardner of the Winnipeg district office. While it may not be looked on as a cost-saving device, I understand it is a way of getting a little more money at the district level.

Most of the mail in the rural areas is now trucked from the major centres. There is always the chance that the truck driver may have trouble on the road, and he can call the postmaster and say that he will be four hours late. The postmaster will then not call in the extra help required for sorting mail.

I feel we have gone backward instead of forward. I would like to know exactly what security the Postmaster General is now giving the mail. The Queen's mail must have top priority as far as security is concerned.

What will happen in the rural post office if there is a fire? What can the postmaster do? He cannot telephone the local fire department. That is why on May 4 I asked the Postmaster-General whether he had requisitioned hand bells. The postmaster could then run up and down the street, ringing his hand bell, shouting "Fire, fire". That is what was done before the telephone was invented.

• (2227)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the question the hon. member has raised with respect to the control by Canada Post of telephones in rural post offices is certainly a surprising one. We are constantly beleaguered in this House by members across the aisle about post office deficits and alleged extravagance and incompetence in the operation of postal services. Yet when we move to rationalize an area in which taxpayers can save money, they complain.

The issue goes far beyond the line costs. These telephones were in use for many purposes which had nothing to do with the delivery of mail. Much of the time used on the phone and attending to the phone was related to personal rather than to post office business. So this is not just a financial but also a social issue and our policy with respect to it has been going on for many years without complaint. The great majority of rural post offices are situated in private homes or in small local businesses which have telephones of their own.

Again, we are faced with a question intended to dramatize the problem. What problem, Mr. Speaker? The hon. member has asked why we are now expecting people from outlying areas to drive into town to find out whether there is a parcel for them rather than telephone ahead to the post office before they leave their homes. Mr. Speaker, the population of Churchill riding—and I have great respect for them—know better. Citizens in urban areas are faced with the same problem, if indeed this is a problem. If a person living in a city is at work when our courier calls, the post office will deliver a notice that the parcel is at the post office. There is no need for the telephone. Our customers in rural areas are treated in the same manner. They, too, receive a notice that their parcel is at the post office where it can be picked up during regular hours. In the constituency of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith), the communities of Church, Gillam, Lynn Lake, Leaf Rapids and Norway House still have phones and will continue to have phones if they wish. Our service concerns first class mail and we can efficiently maintain a good level of service by using first class mail.

The removal of the phone from some of these offices will not adversely affect the level of our service. If, for security or for some other good reason, a phone is needed, we at the post office are always open to consider such matters.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE LATE ALDO MORO

EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY ON TRAGIC DEATH OF FORMER ITALIAN PREMIER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the death of the Honourable Aldo Moro has been confirmed. May I express my sadness and indignation following the murder of a great statesman who was a true friend of Canada, a man whom I had the privilege to meet on many occasions. I knew him as a humanist as well as a democrat. He was also one of the most famous sons of Italy, a nation, as we all know, to which we extend our thoughts and our friendship.

Our countries were closely connected not only through the great number of Canadians of Italian origin, those who came here and helped build our country, but also through the basic values of democracy and freedom which we both preserved and upheld.

Mr. Moro was a courageous champion of those values. He was elected to the Italian government in 1946. He was co-author of the post-war Italian constitution. We was to become justice minister, then education minister and finally external affairs minister. Several times he was president of the Italian cabinet.

[English]

It required enormous courage on the part of the Italian government not to give into the terrorists' contemptible threats. May that government's example of steadfast determination to maintain the rule of law in the face of sustained pressure, and despite the deepest personal anguish, be the lasting good which emerges from this vicious deed. The tragedy that has befallen Italy today concerns us all, because no free and open society is safe from terrorism that is devoid of any sense of human kindness, that attempts to discredit the state, its institutions and its values and to subvert its laws.

May these events strengthen the resolve of free peoples the world over to resist terrorism wherever it appears, so that the gun and the bomb in the hands of incredibly arrogant fanatics will not be allowed to weaken or destroy the democratic institutions which so many men and women have struggled for so long to create and preserve.

Only when the world community presents a solid front of unyielding courage and fierce resistance to terrorism will the hooded murderers of the innocent be persuaded that they have nothing to gain and everything to lose by violently challenging the democratic rule of law.

The nobility of the Italian government during this terrible ordeal has been a contribution of priceless value to the entire world community. While we mourn with Italy, let us also salute what the Italian government has done for the cause of freedom.

While our attention is understandly focused on the enormity of the crime which has been committed, let us also be mindful of the private grief and anguish of those who were closest to Aldo Moro. To Signora Moro and her family, I extend the profound sympathy of the government and the people of Canada.

I believe there will be agreement to adjourn the House later, but I will not move the motion at this time: I understand that other party leaders wish to express their grief.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my first words at this moment are of the grief and the outrage that all of us in this House feel at the death of the Honourable Aldo Moro. To the wife of Aldo Moro, to his four children, to the people of Italy, we express our heartfelt sympathy. This moment of loss is felt most intensely by his family, and for them we in this chamber grieve.

A devout Christian and leader of the Christian Democrats, the former premier was acknowledged to be one of the most able political leaders in Italy, and he would likely have been the next president. He spoke softly, but his convictions were strong and he saw the way to form a workable coalition to govern his country. His was the course of unity and moderation. And his reward was execution by extremists who seek to destroy freedom and reason.

The meaning of this senseless act of terrorism extends well beyond Italy and, indeed, becomes an essential preoccupation of all of us. Aldo Moro was, in the words of Pope Paul, "a common brother in humanity." Who can ever forget Pope Paul's appeal to the kidnappers? "I beg you, on my knees," he said, "free the Honourable Aldo Moro simply, unconditionally". Yet an appeal to compassion was rebuffed. The barbarians who commit such acts know nothing of charity, of justice, of humanity itself.

● (1412)

[Translation]

In the face of steadily increasing terrorist acts in our changing world, violent as well as senseless, the world community must continue to stand firm. We cannot eradicate international terrorism by gracing it with some form of respect or recognition. The peoples of the world must all join in one common voice to oppose terrorism.

[English]

These terrorists think of themselves as heroes. They are not heroes; they are vicious and ruthless killers who, unable to make a case of rational and democratic argument, can resort only to the tactics of terror and murder. The hero we acknowledge and mourn is Aldo Moro.

If we learn anything from the tragic events of today, it is this: like-minded governments must join together, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said, to defeat the perpetrators of terrorism. Never can we admit that terrorism may be permitted for supposedly good ends. The work of the United Nations in producing a strong convention on terrorism must be intensified. Nor can we take refuge from terrorism in simple acts of defence.

[Translation]

The world community must concern itself with the sources of terrorism and violence. The economic and social problems that beget frustrations, alienation and revolts in today's world, those are the problems we must face with greater courage and greater zeal than ever before.

It is not good enough to sincerely express our grief today: the House owes it to itself to reaffirm its will to create a world of peace, a world devoid of terrorism, a world in which the distressed can hope anew.

[English]

Today we suffer the outrages of extremism. Let us go on in a spirit of renewed determination to make of our world a safer place. That will become our lasting tribute, our real memorial to the martyrdom of Aldo Moro.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, today a cruel act of terrorism has struck down a distinguished politician, a distinguished Italian, a distinguished European, a distinguished human being. Today's act was a tragedy for Mr. Moro and his family, a tragedy for Italian politics, a tragedy for free men and women everywhere who believe that non-violent means in politics are the only legitimate means for changing things in a free society.

On behalf of my colleagues in and out of the House, I extend our deepest sympathy to Mr. Moro's family, to his countrymen and to all those in this country, and indeed the world, who will be so sadly moved today by this tragic, violent, unnecessary event.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I wish to join all party leaders who have just taken the floor to speak about the tragedy that has happened in Italy. We have always steadfastly denounced violence in the world in this century, a violence which has been tolerated far too long in all countries. It seems that no country has the will to oppose this violence.

We may wonder today if we have too much freedom or if we do not properly interpret the notion of freedom in democratic countries. We are always afraid to limit individual rights but terrorists do not. The Bill of Rights has no meaning for them. Mr. Speaker, I wonder when all governments throughout the world will decide once and for all to learn from the lesson that we have been given again today in Italy, and that we have been given in our own country, Mr. Speaker, but we may still wonder who is really behind all those crimes. I read that Italy was asking itself the same question. We read in today's newspapers that a party is wondering if a mysterious individual is not hindering the proper development of the inquiry into the Moro case. When we scrutinize all those acts of terrorism we realize there is always an underlying force in the background and I say that the Red Brigades are only the tools of terrorism.

Mr. Speaker, all of us as well as all governments all over the world must find out what is the underlying force supporting and directing all those organizations. Only then, shall we be able to eradicate evil in our society.

I join all my colleagues to offer my deepest sympathy to Signora Moro and her family. It is a terrible ordeal and probably the most painful experience one can go through on this earth. Even prayers and appeals by the Pope himself failed to sway those terrorist brigades. We must realize that those brigades are appropriately named. They get their orders, they are not the real culprits; the same is true of many governments nowadays who, when they take some form of action are not the real culprits either. Mr. Speaker, we have the duty as democratic governments to find the real culprits and in particular to assume the responsibilities which are truly ours.

• (1417)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

That this House do now adjourn.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Therefore, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

FISHERIES

AGREEMENT WITH U.S. ON WEST COAST FISHING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of the importance of the matter and the wish to strengthen the hand of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) in these difficult days, I hope I will be granted unanimous consent.

In view of the injunction issued in the state of Washington last week, designed to prevent Canadian fishermen on the west coast from drawing all expected advantage from the interim agreement worked out by the two negotiators for the purpose of providing a temporary legal umbrella under which the fishermen of our two nations could fish in the waters of our two nations under certain conditions, and under which, as well, the negotiators could push forward toward a definitive bilateral agreement covering fishing rights and obligations, on the one hand, and an acceptable delineation of the boundary between our two zones of national jurisdiction, on the other, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That this House instruct the Minister of Fisheries to notify U.S. authorities immediately that any application of the injunction granted last week by a Washington judge, under which Canadian fishermen would be prevented from fishing in U.S. waters in accordance with the terms of the interim agreement, would create a completely new set of circumstances in the bilateral talks and would, specifically, have two immediate and unfortunate consequences, namely, a total prohibition applied to U.S. fishermen who might otherwise have been able to fish, for the time being, in Canadian waters in accordance with the terms of that interim agreement—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I remind the hon. member that there is a limited time for motions pursuant to Standing Order 43.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am just coming to the end, Mr. Speaker.

—and a complete re-examination of Canada's stand on all issues on which interim agreement had been reached.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—EQUITABLE SHARING OF BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of reports yesterday that the federal government has decided to subsidize the construction of two new auto parts plants by General Motors Limited and Ford Motors Limited to the tune of $116 million.

In light of the fact that the auto pact signed by Canada and the United States in 1965 commits both countries to policies that would allow the industry on both sides of the border to "participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of both countries", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce be instructed to reopen talks with the major auto makers in order to impress upon them the view that a level of investment consistent with our share of the North American automobile market is a legal and moral obligation on the part of the auto makers; that he be instructed to demand from them, within six months, plans as to how they intend to meet this quota of investment every year between now and 1985; and, finally, that he be instructed to refuse any requests for assistance from the auto makers in the form of grants or subsidies until they have presented satisfactory plans for meeting their target levels of investment and jobs in line with the Canadian share of the over-all North American automobile market.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF HOME MAIL DELIVERY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the remarks of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) in Vancouver that just as door to door milk and bread deliveries were discontinued, and hinting that a reduction of home mail delivery service from five days to three days a week may be one way of combating the $550 million Post Office deficit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Postmaster General end the confusion by stating whether it is the policy of his department to begin phasing in three times a week door to door mail delivery service.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ELECTIONS

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on an urgent matter concerning the recent, obvious fact that the government and parliament are no longer running the country, which is now in the hands of an unholy triumvirate, the Gallup poll, the Goldfarb poll and Senator Keith Davey. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the House deplores the failure of the government to deal with unemployment, inflation and the fallen dollar, that the House condemns the Prime Minister for withholding, up to now, an election from the Canadian people whereby they can pass judgment on this situation and, finally, that the Prime Minister request dissolution of the House by the Governor General immediately, in order to permit democracy to function and to dispel the widespread idea that the Liberal party colour has turned from red to yellow.

HISTORIC SITES

BIRTHPLACE OF J. S. WOODSWORTH, FOUNDER OF CCF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity and appeal for the unanimous support of this House. In view of the fact that the birthplace of James Shaver Woodsworth, the founder of the CCF in Canada, is in the borough of Etobicoke and is threatened with imminent demolition to become the site for an apartment building, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), who represents the riding formerly held by Grace MacInnis, the daughter of J. S. Woodsworth:

That this home be declared a national historic site, that the government take immediate steps to prevent its demolition and take action to ensure that this home be preserved in perpetuity for future generations of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF BILL C-28—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, in view of the complete absence of consultation by the government with the public service unions prior to the introduction of Bill C-28, and the grave misgivings it has caused, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That Bill C-28 be withdrawn until there has been open and extensive consultation with all the affected parties in the public service.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT SURVEY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing business. During the summer of 1976, the government, in an attempt to conceal the poor performance of its summer job-creation program, cancelled the summer student employment survey. Through public pressure, it was forced to reinstitute this survey in 1977.

Now that the summer of 1978 is almost upon us and university and secondary school students are about to enter the labour market, we find that the government has again discontinued the student summer employment survey, as a result of which student summer employment will no longer be reported by Statistics Canada. Since this will make long-range planning impossible for both the private and public sectors, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt):

That the government stop playing games with the future of Canada's young people, undertake to be forthright in the reporting of student unemployment, and stop trying to hide its job-creation failures by deleting reports; and further, that the student summer employment survey be conducted through the summer of 1978.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GOVERNMENT URGED TO INCREASE SHIPMENTS OF GRAIN THROUGH CHURCHILL, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. A steady movement of grain from the prairies through Prince Rupert and Vancouver would appear to present problems which the government has been unable to correct. The port of Churchill is the most efficient grain handling port in Canada and is not being utilized to its full capacity. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the minister responsible for the Wheat Board direct an increase in grain shipments through the port of Churchill for the 1978 season by a minimum of five million bushels.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be debated only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RIGHT OF ISRAEL TO PEACE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to proceedings under Standing Order 43. It relates to a matter raised in the House on Monday by my hon. friend from Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) when he sought unanimous consent for the following motion:

That this House reaffirms the right of the State of Israel to exist in peace with its neighbours, and further reaffirms the right of Israel to secure borders consistent with the need of all the peoples of the Middle East for a just and lasting peace.

Your Honour called for the consent of the House on that occasion, and the government House leader said this:

Mr. Speaker, this is an important motion and we would like to consider it before registering an opinion. Perhaps it could be held over until tomorrow.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the House adjourned yesterday because of the tragic death of the Hon. Aldo Moro. Could the government House leader now indicate the feelings of the government with respect to this motion, so that it might be proceeded with today if your Honour agrees with that procedure?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the more appropriate thing to do would be to put the question immediately.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): With regard to the matter the opposition House leader has just raised, I may say there is no objection except as far as the precise wording of the motion is concerned. I should have been in touch with the hon. member this morning: it is my error. It is not a matter of the substance, but on questions of this kind I believe the wording should conform to that which is traditionally accepted in connection with these matters. If I might have the indulgence of the House for another day, I can assure the hon. member there will be no problem tomorrow.

Mr. Paproski: I agree, Mr. Speaker. I will consult with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

FISHERIES

POLICING OF FISHING QUOTAS WITHIN 200-MILE LIMIT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In light of the open and apparent disagreements and conflicts in policy which have been so evident over the past few months between the federal Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, provincial premiers and provincial fisheries ministers, can the federal minister indicate whether there has been some reconciliation of views or a common approach to the very serious problems affecting our east and west coast fishermen, and can he indicate whether there has been a final solution to the inadequate policing and surveillance of fishing quotas which presently exist within the 200-mile limit?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the consultations we had with provincial ministers in December and February there was general agreement as to the policy direction which should be taken. I recognize that provincial ministers will differ in degree with some of the policies we are putting forward, but the fact remains—I have indicated this before—that I cannot delegate and, in fact, the constitution as it is presently written does not allow me to delegate the final authority for management of the fisheries.

On the second question raised by the hon. member, there have been reported acts of violation. Legal advice is being sought as to whether identification of fishing vessels' locations by plane will stand up in court. If they will, violators will be taken to court.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, since the fishing industry needs a program covering the licensing of inshore and offshore vessels which will ensure the present balance in the catching capacities of these two segments of the industry, plus a licensing policy which will permit Canadian-owned freezer trawlers to catch some of the quotas of silver hake, squid, round-nosed grenadier and capelin which are being allocated by the present government to foreign countries, will the minister agree to meet with his provincial counterparts and fisheries' representatives in the hope that the present shortsighted policy of the federal government as it relates to freezer trawlers may at least be examined and, hopefully, altered?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member does not know it, but this is the second year in which there has been a fishing plan for the whole Atlantic region. The fishing plan is working astonishingly well, with regions and quotas reserved both for inshore and for offshore. This, of course, is subject to consultation with representatives of the industry, processors and fishermen, provincial governments and those who have an interest in the subject.

With regard to the second question, I have before me no applications for licensing of freezer trawlers which would take species like capelin, hake, grenadier or argentine. All the applications I have for licences—although they do mention these species in the first paragraph of the letter—always seek access to red fish, flat fish or northern cod. I have indicated very clearly that the present fleet has the capacity to catch the stocks which are available to Canada, which are over 80 per cent for 1979 and 76 per cent for 1978. The problem is not one of expansion; it is one of increasing the catch rate of the vessels which are just now becoming economical.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the minister is well aware that we do not have any freezer trawlers, and therefore we are incapable of catching and processing the soft species to which I referred. We certainly cannot accept his answer as it presently stands, because without freezer trawlers it is impossible to catch, process and market the species to which I have referred. Has there been any final solution to the Digby scallop fishermen's problem? The economy of the entire area has been threatened by the minister's arbitrary regulations.

● (1422)

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member says, some trawlers in Newfoundland have a freezing capacity and, in fact, they were used in the fishery in the far north in the past season. I am trying to explain to the hon. member—I am sure that as a former fishing captain he understands this—that a freezer trawler, with the type of expenditure it represents, would never be economical just fishing for underutilized species. The other species are now being caught by our fishermen and utilized in our plants. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting that I should direct the industry to go into uneconomic ventures.

As for the question of the Bay of Fundy scallop fleet, the disaster to which the hon. member alluded is really not taking place. In fact, fishing in the Bay of Fundy and on Browns Bank had a higher catch rate last year than in the years before. I am looking at possible alternatives. However, I have to remind the hon. member, as I did the other day, that transferring the problem to another group of fishermen, although it may be temporarily popular, will not be popular when the Georges Bank fishery faces what the biologists are predicting, which is a lowering of the catch level, because the Georges Bank fleet will find itself with fewer and fewer scallops to catch.

[Mr. Crouse.]

CANADA-U.S. DISPUTE ON WEST COAST FISHERIES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In view of the deterioration in the situation of west coast fisheries, particularly in light of the injunction which was issued last week, will the minister tell us what positive steps he has taken to ensure that the Canadian viewpoint is given a good hearing during the injunction proceedings before the U.S. courts?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is no disaster on the west coast: in fact, the fishing which was covered under a temporary agreement is going on; the injunction is not yet operative. Whether or not it will be sustained—if that is the legal term—this week remains to be seen. Meanwhile, the special negotiators, Ambassadors Cadieux and Cutler, are meeting in Ottawa tomorrow. Our point of view is well known to the United States authorities. In fact, they are before Congress now, arguing for quick passage of the temporary agreement which would contain the problem covered by the injunction.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In light of the one-week delay in the imposition of the injunction, has the minister any special words of comfort to issue to the fishermen as they set out this weekend for the salmon fishing grounds, so that they may know with assurance that they will be able to go into those grounds freely and fish under the terms of the interim agreement? Or are they going to be harassed?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): They will not be harassed if the injunction is not sustained. If the injunction is sustained, then there will be real difficulty. We will meet with the special negotiator again; we are meeting with him tomorrow and on Friday. We also said that if the agreement was not respected by the other side, we would not feel bound by it.

REQUEST PRIME MINISTER PERSONALLY INTERVENE WITH PRESIDENT CARTER RESPECTING DISPUTE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister arising out of the hardship which may be imposed on British Columbia fishermen by the ban which has been imposed by the court in the United States with respect to Canadian fishermen operating in U.S. coastal waters.

I ask the Prime Minister if he would personally intervene with President Carter so that, if the ban is upheld, the U.S. government would undertake not to enforce it until such time as the two negotiators for Canada and the United States are able to work out a temporary agreement pending ratification of the Canadian-American fisheries agreement.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that it was as a result of my representations to President Carter a little more than a year ago, assisted by the Minister of Fisheries, that we obtained this interim agreement.

I should also like to remind him that the form in which his question was put is not correct, in the sense that there has not been a ban. There is a question of a ban, an injunction, before the courts now and, as the Minister of Fisheries reminded the House, President Carter's administration is fighting against this injunction. Surely that indicates that President Carter is not only aware of what Canada told him last year through the minister and myself, but is fighting to uphold the message that both of us agreed to last year. Regarding the rest of the question, the hon. member will recall that in its very form it was hypothetical.

● (1427)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the proposed temporary agreement has not been ratified by the United States Congress, there is every likelihood that the prohibition on Canadian fishermen will be upheld by the courts.

In view of the fact that Monday, May 15, is the opening of the halibut season, and that the fisheries' representative on the Pacific coast has informed already British Columbia fishermen that they should plan to continue their fishing off the Alaska coast, and I am sure the Prime Minister recognizes what could happen if there were confrontations, does he not think it is sufficiently important to take it up with the American government, so that we do not have a situation wherein British Columbia fishermen are intercepted off the Alaskan coast in the event that the prohibition and the injunction are sustained in the course of the next few days?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid, once again, the question indicates that the hon. member is misinformed. He suggests that I take something up with the American government. He knows, or he should know, that the American government is on our side on this question and, indeed, is before the courts to plead our side of it. Therefore, it is of little avail to suggest that I take it up with the American government: they are on our side and they are acting in a sense for us.

The hon. member has suggested the difficulty: it is that Congress itself has not passed this agreement. But the administration is doing its best to get it passed. I do not think the hon. member would suggest that I could tell Congress what it should be doing. Neither do I agree with the hon. member when he predicts what the courts will decide. If the courts go against us, Your Honour will realize that we are in an hypothesis here and the question is hypothetical. Let me just remind the hon. member what our government, and particularly the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, did last year when we had to apply pressure on the Americans. We banned some of their fishing in our waters.

One does not like to talk like this, because we are hoping Congress will see where justice lies in this question. Perhaps the hon. member is unintentionally provoking the government into making some retaliatory threats before even the cause for such threats has become evident. So I suggest this line of questioning is not appropriate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the government to make threats; I am asking the Prime Minister to get some assurance from the American government, if British Columbia fishermen go up next Monday to the coast of Alaska to fish for halibut, that the American government will not enforce any injunction which may have come into effect until such time as the two countries can work out an agreement.

Also, I am asking the Prime Minister to state categorically to the American government, not only here, but to President Carter, in the event that Canadian fishermen are barred from American waters that the Canadian government will have no choice but to take a similar course of action in respect of American fishermen operating in the coastal waters of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that we do not make threats; then his question ends up with a suggested threat to the American administration.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is not a threat.

Mr. Trudeau: Also, he is suggesting that I make representations to them to do something if they should lose the case they are pleading before their courts. The administration intends to win their case, which is our case. It seems very, very unproductive for me to get them to say now to the courts that if we lose, we will not do certain things, including obeying the injunction.

I should like to remind the hon. member that this situation prevailed last year when this danger existed and President Carter gave me the personal assurance that he would work out some interim arrangement. The hon. member has been told by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment that Mr. Cutler and Mr. Cadieux are meeting tomorrow in this city. Surely it is a little premature to talk about threats, as the hon. member is doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

AID TO QUEBEC FISHERMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. Minister of Finance?

The Information Division of the Department of Finance indicated in a news release issued on May 2 that $5.778 millions were used for loans to fishing operations throughout the country. I notice that of this amount no loan was made either in 1976 or in 1977 to Quebec fishermen. Would the minister indicate whether this is under a special agreement between the federal government and the province of Quebec or whether he considers that Quebec fishermen are rich enough to finance their operations themselves?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know that there is a particular problem as far as Quebec fisheries are concerned, but I am not aware of the details on this matter. This special matter I am going to inquire on, and report to the hon. member. I do not know if my colleague the Minister of Fisheries is more knowledgeable about this than I am.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Since the minister does not know whether there is an agreement with Quebec or if it is a direct instruction, can he assure us that between July 1 and December 31 this year there will be, at least if it was not the case last year or in 1976, some advertising for Quebec fishermen so that they can also obtain their fair share of special loans for fishing operations?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, all federal programs are entirely applicable to Quebec. It is a special program but we will consider why the hon. member has come to that conclusion. However, under all circumstances we endeavour to make all government programs applicable to Quebeckers, even if it is suggested in some parts of the country that programs dealing with Quebec are more generous than those elsewhere.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTION MEASURES BE ADOPTED TO IMPROVE INDUSTRY CONDITIONS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. I am sure the minister is aware of the feelings of hostility by some fishermen toward the imposition of regulations that seriously affect their livelihood, without what they consider proper consultation.

Is the minister considering a directive or a general investigation to see what can be done to improve relations, not only between his department and fishermen but to co-ordinate policy among federal and provincial ministries so that inshore fishermen can be given better bait-freezing and storage facilities, improved slipways and things like this which are required to improve conditions in the industry?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, where the federal government is responsible in the case, for example, of the management of stocks, changes in the conditions of access to stocks, licensing, etc., obviously we have a very high level of consultation. In fact, I decentralized, not only to Halifax as a region and to St. John's but to area managers in places like Sydney, northern New Brunswick, etc., a fair level of authority so local problems can be dealt with by local officials in co-operation with local fishermen. I also instituted a program whereby 20 community service officers of the Department of Fisheries have the responsibility of constantly being in touch with the fishermen.

Obviously, there are times when decisions have to be made, for conservation reasons, where no level of consultation will produce agreement and at one point you simply cannot delegate the final decision to anyone. In the area of federal-provincial co-operation, it is obvious that, for example in respect of both subsidies and other programs, they are synchronized with programs such as the fishermen's loan boards of the provincial governments.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer and I ask him, with respect—while most fishermen, I believe, will concede he has their best interests at heart—will he not take a look at the attitude that prevails among scallop fishermen, people who are concerned with aquaculture, for example, and people very much concerned that there is no sensitivity shown to setting proper seasons for scallop fishing, for example, in Nova Scotia, in order that he can be satisfied that his officials, the people he has appointed, are really doing their job in consulting with and getting the benefit of the experience the industry has? Will he give us that assurance?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, not only can I give him the assurance but I can indicate the fact that when the fishermen in his own area, the Northumberland Strait area, came up with alternatives and proposals which appeared to be better than the policy which we had suggested, we were quite willing to adjust. There is a problem at times, obviously, when that fishery is in competition with another fishery—I am thinking of scallops and lobsters—or when there is an obvious need for conservation and a season may have to be shortened or a freeze on licences is required; but in this case we are trying to protect the long-term interests of the fishermen, whose continued income is obviously of great concern to us.

INDUSTRY

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—MEASURES TO INCREASE JOBS IN MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On January 30, the minister presented a paper to the provinces in which he pointed out that the manufacturing industry in Canada was supplying 80,000 less jobs at the end of 1977 than it was three years earlier. In April, the Minister of Finance continued certain temporary tariff cuts that were instituted in 1973, without any quid pro quo at Geneva.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Crosbie: Don't worry, the question is coming, hon. gentlemen opposite. My question is: What steps has the minister taken to increase the number of jobs in the manufacturing sector and, secondly, what instructions have been given our negotiators at Geneva as to which of the most vulnerable Canadian industries are to be protected by exemptions in the GATT negotiations?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we seem to go over and over this question of manufacturing in Canada. The hon. member asks what steps are being taken. I have informed the House that we have called together 22 sector studies, and involved in those studies we have management, the provincial governments and the unions. We are studying the role of governments, taxation and regulations in respect of industry; we are studying potential markets for each industry in those 22 sectors.

Having particular regard to the tariff negotiations at Geneva, I have told the House over and over again that all things are on the table: none is being exempted in the negotiations. However, if one examined that manufacturing paper, he could readily see there are five specific industries in which imports have already made great inroads into our market. One could assume from that that those five might be the most vulnerable, of course. Our negotiators are very much aware of this and we are bearing it in mind during our negotiations.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, there have been sector studies going on now, it seems to me, for at least six years. Sectors are being studied more than sex these days, and I am asking for action. Let me give the minister a specific example. In the manufacturing of colour television sets, the Canadian industry sold 12,000 sets in March, compared to 22,000 last March. Five companies have closed; or the fifth one is closing in June. These are companies manufacturing colour television sets. The United States has exempted colour television sets from the GATT negotiations. It has done that now.

I would like to ask the minister, in connection with this industry—because Canadian workers and Canadian manufacturers want to know—are they to be exempt from these tariff reductions at GATT, and what other industries are to be exempt? Surely, the thousands of Canadian workers and the people who have their money in these industries are entitled to know, just as they know in the U.S.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member knows of what is going on in the U.S. I do know, though, that the U.S. put forward its proposals, we put our proposals forward, and the U.S. government and its negotiators there were not at all satisfied with our proposals. They said we had not been generous enough in our offer. Now the hon. gentlemen is suggesting to the House that we have been too generous. We are attempting to negotiate all stages of the negotiations. Our negotiators are bargaining very hard, as is obvious from the United States government's complaints about what we have put on the table.

URBAN AFFAIRS

HOUSING AND COMMUNITY PROGRAMS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Will he inform the House when the new housing and community programs will be implemented in British Columbia?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some elements of the new federal housing proposal are already in force, or will be, subject to ratification by the provinces. As for the new community services program, it will become operational after steps relevant to each province have been clarified.

● (1442)

In this regard I concluded this morning some very fruitful discussions with the minister of housing and municipal affairs for British Columbia who came to Ottawa with his officials specifically to discuss these proposals. I would like to draw to the attention of the House the presence of the minister in the gallery, the Hon. Hugh Curtis of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT—EQUITABLE SHARING OF BENEFITS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since the auto pact between Canada and the United States commits both countries to "participate on a fair and equitable basis in expanding the total market" of both countries, and since Canada has lost approximately 25,000 jobs by not getting its fair share, can the minister indicate to this House and to the Canadian people why the federal government has decided to subsidize the construction of two new auto parts plants by General Motors and Ford Motors Limited to the tune of $116 million?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed grateful for the opportunity to answer this question because I want to clear up once and for all, if I can, the whole question of the Canada-U.S. auto pact. I have a copy of the agreement with me and I will read the pertinent clause to which the hon. member is referring:

The liberalization of Canadian and United States automotive trade in respect of tariff barriers and other factors tending to impede it, with a view to enabling the industries of both countries to participate on a fair and equitable basis in the expanding total market of the two countries—

If hon. members will look at the expanding total market since that agreement was signed, they will see that in 1965 we produced something like 855,000 vehicles and in 1976 we produced approximately 1,641,000 vehicles. So our market has expanded considerably since the signing of the automotive pact. Dealing specifically with the so-called imbalance, we have a surplus in automobile production to the tune of $2 billion. We have a surplus in the production of automobiles.

An hon. Member: What about parts?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member wanted to hear about parts. Let me say clearly, there are no—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Brant on a supplementary, but it is obvious that the general nature of the question is provoking an answer which perhpas, quite necessarily and justifiably, may be too long for the question period. Perhpas consideration might be given to dealing with it under the adjournment debate proceedings.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary will be very brief. In view of the fact that both these corporations are multinational giants, and in view of the fact they have an obligation under the auto pact to invest in the interests of both sides of the border, why is $116 million of ordinary, Canadian taxpayers' dollars going toward subsidizing these two huge, multinational conglomerates which should have already invested money in the parts industry in this country?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I will neither confirm nor deny the article that was printed in the Globe and Mail yesterday with regard to the $116 million. Let me point out quite clearly, as I did when I was ending my last answer, we had a surplus of $2 billion in automobile manufacture in Canada last year. In the automotive agreement there are no requirements put on the independent parts manufacturing and reproduction levels in Canada.

What I am saying, for the benefit of the House in answering this question, is there is no part of the automotive agreement which deals with independent parts producers. Therefore, if we have a deficit in parts, it behooves us, as the Canadian government interested in the Canadian automobile manufacturing industry, to do everything we can to entice greater manufacturing of parts and automobiles within this country. I would like to assure the House that we are doing our utmost to encourage all three of the large manufacturers to build more plants in Canada.

GATT NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING CERTAIN INDUSTRIES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last year we had a trade deficit in communications equipment, heating, refrigeration and domestic appliances of $2.336 billion, according to the figures from Statistics Canada. The government helped put together the CAMCO and white goods business, and their employment is down from 1,000 people to 500—a 50 per cent drop. We have heard about strategies, strategies and strategies—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member please put his question.

Mr. Kempling: What I would like to know is, when are you going to exempt these industries at the GATT negotiations? Is a $2 billion market not large enough to protect?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has listed a number of commodities and suggested that we have a deficit in their trading. I do not deny that, because his figures are more than likely correct. However, with regard to refrigeration in particular, I have toured the plants, and we have a tremendously automated refrigerating industry in Canada today.

We hope to work out a duty remission deal of some kind respecting the manufacture of refrigerators in Canada. That industry is eargerly looking forward to getting into the American market, because it has the capacity and can manufacture in competition with American manufacturers. In fact, just two weeks ago the plant I toured hired an additional 112 people and it now has a labour force of 700 men and women.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, there is almost $1 billion alone in refrigeration equipment. Let me ask the hon. minister this: A report out of Geneva said that the industrial equipment and machinery business may go by the boards as a result of negotiations. Considering that we have a $3 billion deficit in industrial machinery and equipment—we imported $16 billion last year—is that market not large enough to protect, and what are you doing about it?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House believe that with greater liberalization of free trade, the whole of Canada will benefit. I would be interested in hearing about the protectionism of the Conservative party. If it is as protectionist as the hon. member says, it is a good thing I did leave it, because I was never that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRANSPORT

RECALL OF AUTOMOBILES FOR MODIFICATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the hon. Minister of Transport. Because of safety considerations there has been a massive recall of certain Ford products in the United States over the last few days, ordered to be policed by the federal authorities in Washington. Can the minister inform the House of the situation in Canada because, obviously, a number of these makes—namely, Pintos and Mercury Bobcats are on the Canadian market? What has the Canadian government done to make sure a similar recall has been effected in Canada, and what has it done to police this matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our ordinary procedures are in play, which means that we are attempting on our own to determine the state of the evidence in relation to this particular vehicle. We have had contact with the makers as well as watching the situation very closely in the United States. The hon. member may know that the automobile manufacturers very frequently, and almost invariably, follow their actions in the United States with parallel action in Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, because the proof was very conclusive in the United States that there was a major infraction of safety considerations relating to the Pinto and Mercury Bobcat, and there are thousands of these cars on Canadian roads, will the minister assure the House that his department will order their recall and make sure, as is done in the United States, that the recall is properly effected?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that the legal regime in Canada is slightly different from that in the United States; but I can assure the hon. member that within that limitation we will do everything we can.

AIRPORTS

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPING HAMILTON AIRPORT

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Early in the year he committed the government to the support and development of the airport at Hamilton. At this time, can he give the House any kind of time-frame as to what is occurring there, particularly with regard to runway 06 which seems to be in all the plans; and is anything being done that will prevent the costly diversion of Nordair aircraft to Toronto which seems to occur on a daily basis?

● (1452)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe that runway, in fact, is one which has been identified as being a clear part of the development plan at Hamilton, and accordingly we will be moving forward immediately with improvements to the landing system. I can assure the hon. member that in Toronto not long ago, I stated that in my view the Mount Hope airport stands in a really good position to help with the overload that we see at different times at Malton. I will certainly try to see that my officials move forward as rapidly as possible with the Hamilton development plans and, indeed, encourage additional flights by regularly scheduled airlines through Hamilton.

NATIONAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT'S KNOWLEDGE OF KCIA ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. He will be aware of reports on the activities of foreign security service agents in Canada, namely, agents employed by the Korean Central Intelligence Agency, the alleged harassment of Vice-Consul Yang in Toronto, subsequent reports of harassment of Korean nationals resident in Canada and, indeed, Canadian citizens of Korean origin. Could the Solicitor General tell the House when he was first made aware of the activities of KCIA agents and what steps have been taken to terminate those activities?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question of alleged harassment, I want to assure the House and the hon. gentleman that the allegations are under very close investigation by the security forces. In view of the fact that there is an investigation being carried on, I am sure the hon. gentleman will understand my desire not to comment further.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I am becoming accustomed to the Solicitor General not commenting. When he indicates to the House that there is an investigation being carried on, does it relate in part to the three documents supplied to the law enforcement agency by Reverend Lee of the Korean community? In answering that question, could the minister indicate to the House whether the three or four KCIA agents who allegedly came to Canada did so under some diplomatic status?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I understand there were four alleged KCIA agents or officials who were supposed to come into Canada. I suggest there has not been any entry into Canada of any officials from South Korea. With reference to the alleged three documents to which the hon. gentleman refers, again, that would be subject to a comment that I am not ready to make.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED TRAINING OF ANTI-TERRORIST SQUAD

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in a media event several months ago, the CBC showed what was purported to be a Canadian anti-terrorist squad in training. Can the minister now inform the House if such a squad has actually been formed and, if so, where are they and who are they?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, no, I cannot.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence. If the formation of such unit has been authorized by the cabinet, who is to be the responsible minister: the Minister of Transport, the Solicitor

General, or the Minister of National Defence? If it has not yet been authorized, has he made application for it to be authorized?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say.

RECRUITMENT OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In light of the fact that numerous qualified young people, after passing the necessary tests to join the armed services, are told that there is little chance they will be accepted into the forces due to lengthy waiting lists, can the minister explain how he justifies a continuing aggressive advertising campaign designed to attract individuals to apparently non-existent positions in the service?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it gives us an opportunity to be highly selective in the armed forces. We have highly skilled people and it is not that easy to get in. At the moment we probably have five times as many people who would like to get in as we have positions.

An hon. Member: With a million unemployed it is not difficult.

Mr. Danson: That maintains the high standard of our armed forces and makes them among the best in the world.

RECRUITMENT OF PERSONS COMPLYING WITH COURT ORDERS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the same minister. In the past, individuals on probation could sign up for the forces and thus come under the type of situation which assisted in their rehabilitation. Now, however, policy has changed and individuals are not accepted until proven free of court orders for six months. Will the minister consider reverting to the former system, so that probation officers will once again be assisted, rather than hindered, by the forces in their efforts at rehabilitation?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, there is a six months' waiting period after that. This is something that has been considered, and it is always under consideration. We wish to co-operate to the extent we can. As the hon. member indicates, there is a long waiting list to get into the armed forces. We have to balance these requirements and our requirements against the other needs of society, which we also serve.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

TRANSPORT

LIABILITY FOR COST OF EXPANDING PORT OF PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On March 7 the Minister of Transport gave the impression to the country that the government is providing a $16.3 million grant to expand the port of Prince Rupert in B.C. Recently, the Alberta Wheat Pool was informed by the National Harbours Board that the users, mainly the farmers in this case, will have to pay for the capital cost of that expansion.

I ask the minister whether he could clarify the government's position. Is it the government's intention to pay for the total cost of these facilities, namely, $16.3 million, or will the users have to pay for them?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, what was announced, and what is the fact, is that the government is making available $16 million for the development of the Ridley Island site initially for grain facilities and, indeed, for other purposes. No doubt a bulk handling coal facility will also be possible there. It is our ordinary practice to have charges against the product, and those who make use of these sites, through leases and the like. Obviously, that is designed initially to cover operating and maintenance costs. In addition to that, in certain cases, when it is appropriate, more than that. I think that will be part of our over-all approach to our ports throughout the country.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a bit of a departure from the policy of the government at airports such as Mirabel. I ask the minister whether he can say categorically that the farmers of this country will not be held responsible for paying any of that $16.3 million? Or, indeed, through the minister's announcement in the House today, will the farmers be responsible for paying some of this capital cost?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the hon. member is quite wrong in his reference to Mirabel, since that airport, as with other major airports, is now part of our airport revolving fund. Those costs are incorporated into the over-all costs of flying in the country, which I hoped the hon. member would endorse, rather than seeing them constantly put onto the backs of the taxpayers. I am really amazed that the hon. member is so negative about our action in moving forward with a major development. I hope he will applaud when the grain companies, hopefully, get together and put up the money to place a terminal in Prince Rupert.

Of course, a great portion of that is part of the ongoing costs and operations of marketing our grain. The hon. member need not be negative about that. This is a fantastic development of what could be a great port for the whole of the west. Let him not spread his negativism about to further dampen spirits in the west.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

OPERATIONS OF NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO. LTD.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It relates to Northern Transportation Co. Ltd. which the minister will know has a mandate that is limited to serving as a common carrier in the Mackenzie watershed in the western Arctic. The minister will also know that that particular Crown corporation has gone beyond its mandate to acquire Grimshaw Trucking and Distributing Ltd. which is now underbidding private employee-owned trucking companies like Byers Trucking Co. in serving routes into Hinton, Grande Cache and Fort McMurray, Alberta.

Will the minister tell the House of Commons why a government-owned company is underbidding a private employee-owned company in a way that may result in the government company gaining a monopoly on certain trucking routes?

● (1502)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into the question and see whether this is an ordinary aspect of competition between the companies involved. Obviously, I would not want to see the fact that the parent corporation is government-owned lead it into encouraging loss operations in competition with private enterprise. I can give the hon. member great assurance about that. I am interested, though, in apparently indirectly encouraging, that we see to it that certain freight rates are higher than they otherwise would be.

I gather the hon. member has been reading the speeches of a couple of his colleagues who were worried about rail freight rates getting so low that they would compete with various truckers throughout the country. That is a delightful general statement but, as with the previous hon. member's question, if he has any examples let him specify where it is thought that their freight rates are so low as to be a danger.

Mr. Clark: I ask the Minister of Transport whether it is the policy of the government to have Crown corporations establish subsidiaries that go beyond the original mandate of the Crown corporation, entering into activities which are wholly foreign to the original mandate, and under that new, expanded mandate to enter into competition with private sector companies. Is that the policy of the government?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government is to take careful consideration of any subsidiary operations by one of our Crown corporations. Put simply, the answer to the Leader of the Opposition's question would be no, it would not be the intention, ordinarily, to see them go into business that is completely unrelated to the original mandate.

However, one may want to look at that mandate to see whether there is a relationship which makes a particular acquisition desirable. I think I gave the Leader of the Opposition adequate assurance when I told him I did not want to see the fact that a Crown corporation exists lead to an operation being subsidized in competition with private enterprise. That is very important and it is a principle that I have adhered to constantly.

PRIVILEGE

CONSIDERATION OF OUTSTANDING QUESTIONS

Mr. Speaker: There are outstanding two questions of privilege, one raised by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) and the other raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). With regard to the one by the hon. member for Capilano, I can proceed with that tomorrow.

With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Halifax, I wish to indicate to him and the House that I want a little further time to consider it. In fact the basic subject matter of the motion of the hon. member for Halifax, as I have indicated on a previous occasion, gives me no difficulty. I am in great sympathy with the concern that has been expressed that any suggestion that the offering for candidacy by any citizen of this country for membership in this House might result in even the slightest surveillance of any sort, be a matter of very high priority for the House. However, I am having difficulty in extending the concept of parliamentary privilege into the field of candidacy for election. It would be quite a considerable extension on the basis of precedent. I simply want to indicate that the matter is under careful and very intensive study and I would like a few more days to consider it.

MR. CROSBIE—PUBLIC SERVICE—INCORRECT STATEMENT ON LAY-OFF OF 60,000 PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of a breach of my privileges as a member of this House. It relates to a motion put to the House on Monday, May 8, page 5219, by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan). I was not here at that time. I will try to be succinct. The relevant part of that motion is where the hon. member stated:

However, it is no funny matter for that member to say publicly that if his leader becomes prime minister of this country, 60,000 public servants will be laid off.

That is not a correct statement. It is an incorrect statement. It is part of a deliberate campaign by members of the NDP to allege across this country words that I have never said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: If I might continue, Mr. Speaker. I spoke in Thompson, Manitoba, on Friday, April 7. Not being a Liberal, I did not have a script. I spoke off the cuff for 40 minutes. That speech was reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 11, four days later. There was a small report. I need to refer to that to show how this canard got started. It is being used by the NDP outside this House, and now inside.

In that report in the Winnipeg Free Press it states that I said that a federal Progressive Conservative government would make, and I quote:

—"Premier Sterling Lyon look like a pussycat" in cutting back on excessive civil servants,—

It adds that I told the federal PC meeting for Churchill that "Joe Clark's government would trim 60,000 civil servants by attrition". I never mentioned 60,000; I never mentioned 100; I never mentioned one civil servant being cut, in the speech.

I wrote the Winnipeg Free Press on April 19 telling them that their account was inaccurate, and telling them what I did say. What I did say was that the Conservative party would free the private sector from unnecessary regulation, restrain the growth of government expenditure, restrain the growth of government public servants and that we meant what we said, not like the Liberals, and that in that direction we would make Sterling Lyon look like a pussycat. Nothing was mentioned about laying off any civil servants.

On April 25 I sent a copy of that letter to the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) because I knew he was going to prevaricate around the country with this statement. I already had a tipoff on that. Therefore I sent the Leader of the NDP a copy of my letter to the Free Press. It was published in the Winnipeg Free Press on April 26.

Next, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, the Leader of the NDP, used it outside the House. Now the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond changes even what I was supposed to have said by the Winnipeg Free Press, stating that I said that 60,000 public servants will be laid off. That is a libel on a member, in my opinion. As Mark Twain said, "A lie can travel half way around the world while the truth is putting on its shoes." While I am putting on my shoes, this lie is travelling around the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: As the election approaches, the New Democratic Party becomes the "nasty, devious, prevaricating" party. The hon. member suffers from "pseudomnesia". He has a memory for things that never happen. I call on him now to retract his inaccurate statement, play the game fairly, and stop trying to put this lie half way around the world while I am putting on my shoes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think the libel has been perpetrated in this House this afternoon by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) against me. I am quoting from the Ottawa Journal, which I was told was a notorious PC paper, although the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) told me before the House today that that is no longer true. I want to quote from that article of May 6, 1978, datelined Manitoba, by Mr. Cleverley, a correspondent. This is what got me upset. I quote:

The present Conservative member of the federal parliament for Churchill, Cecil Smith, was visibly uncomfortable during his own nomination meeting when John Crosbie of Newfoundland promised that the next federal Conservative government would make Sterling Lyon "look like a pussycat" in reducing the size of the civil service. Crosbie said Joe Clark would cut 60,000 federal jobs.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

There are two different reports. I am a relatively new member in this House, as is the hon. member for St. John's West. I am sorry if I did not know the Journal is a Tory paper. I quoted Mr. Cleverley on this point.

The hon. member says he did not say it, and he says he has nothing in writing. I was told by their members to see what he had in writing, but he was not here yesterday, so I raised the matter largely because I did not think we should be talking like this when there are one million unemployed in this country. People from the Atlantic region should be talking about decentralizing the bureaucracy, not cutting people off from it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The basic point still remains that the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has indicated that he is clearly referred to in the motion by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) as having used a specific figure of 60,000.

I took it from the latter sentences of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond that he was indicating to the House that, if he had said that on the basis of mistaken information, he was apologizing to the House for that. At least I understood that was the sense of that remark. If I have not that confirmed, I would certainly want to insist.

There may be a dispute as to facts generally involved here. However, if the hon. member for St. John's West says that he did not use the specific figure of 60,000, and that figure is contained in the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, I would think it appropriate that the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond indicate to the House now that he either stands by that figure and that statement, or that he withdraws it.

● (1512)

Mr. Hogan: I never said the hon. member said it. I quoted from the newspaper, the Journal.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have in my hand the text of the hon. member's motion and it does not make any reference to any quotations or any other source of information. The text reads:

All members of this House have learned to appreciate the humour of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). However, it is no funny matter for that member to say publicly that if his leader becomes prime minister of this country, 60,000 public servants will be laid off.

That seems a very direct allegation to me, and if the hon. member does not have any information upon which it is based it appears to me he should withdraw it.

Mr. Hogan: As a member of this House I take the hon. member's word. But I was quoting the Journal, not the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have formally asked the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond to withdraw that allegation.

Mr. Hogan: I will withdraw it in the light of what the hon. member for St. John's West has said today, but I should like to see the evidence presented to me directly because, although I did not say it in the motion, I was quoting a Journal article. Very well, I withdraw.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PENSION INCREASES FOR DISABLED VETERANS

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to inform the House that it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation to increase the basic rate of pensions for disabled veterans by $310.76 annually to $7,471.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): The proposed increase is in addition to the automatic increase provided under the Pension Act each January in accordance with the consumer price index.

This increase is significant at a time when, as all Canadians recognize, government expenditures must be restrained, and it demonstrates the government's determination to honour a long-standing commitment to ensure an adequate income to disabled veterans and their dependents in recognition of the service they have rendered to their country. The enabling legislation will be introduced as soon as possible to make the increase effective July 1, and will provide for proportionate increases with respect to lesser disabilities and related pensions. Similar appropriate increases will be provided to those who qualify for prisoner of war compensation.

I am sure all hon. members will co-operate to ensure that this legislation receives quick passage.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the official opposition I want to say we welcome this announcement. I am sure the House will understand if, in the course of my short statement, I pay tribute to the former member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe who, along with other members—and I have no hesitation about mentioning particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—worked hard to obtain this benefit for our veterans.

I regret that this announcement should have come so late in the session, especially when there is some question as to how long the session will last.

An hon. Member: Lots of time yet.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): But whatever the situation might be, I want to say on behalf of my party that we shall be prepared to discuss ways in which the legislation flowing from this statement could be expedited. The proposals announced by the minister go a significant distance in honouring the obligation which all of us have, and will have for our lifetime, to those who served in the wars in which our country has been engaged and who were disabled as a result of that service. We owe them, as a nation, a great obligation. It is in that spirit my colleagues and I welcome the statement made today. I assure the minister that if he would confer with his colleague, the government House leader, with respect to the expedition of this legislation we would be most pleased to co-operate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as one who has raised this matter scores—perhaps hundreds—of times during the last two or three years, I congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) on his success in getting the cabinet to approve the announcement he has made today. I am happy to join with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) in making reference to my good friend, Jack Marshall. As has been said, he and I have been working very hard for this. The only thing one can really say today is that we welcome the announcement most warmly.

I suggested the other day, in a motion under Standing Order 43, that a bill of this kind could be put through the House in all its stages in one day. I now believe, in the light of the statement just made by the House leader for the Progressive Conservatives, that we could do it in about half an hour.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope the government will make arrangements to bring in the necessary bill right away so that it can be put into effect and not get lost in any shuffle which could take place.

I must say I am sorry this proposed increase is to be simply on an ad hoc basis. As I understand it, the raising of the basic rate to the average level of the five designated levels in the Public Service is for the current year only, leaving increases in future years to be determined by the rise in the consumer price index. I hope that some day there will be built into the act itself an automatic provision which will keep the level of the 100 per cent disability pension in line with the level of the five categories in the Public Service. But for the moment we have corrected a wrong which veterans have suffered for a few years, and I am glad to indicate our full support.

Now that the minister has won this battle I hope he will work just as hard to get a correction in the rule regarding widows of veterans. Some day, and some day soon, we must alter the provision which deprives widows of any pension at all if the veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent. We welcome the announcement and give the minister the assurance that, if he will bring in legislation, we will pass it quickly. I believe my estimate of half an hour is probably correct.

● (1522)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must inform the minister that I did not receive a copy of the statement he has just made, but I listened carefully. It sometimes happens that we do not receive the French copy, but this time I received neither the French nor the English copy, but I do not hold it against him. He is a very decent fellow; only yesterday I was speaking with him and I congratulated him on the excellent measures he introduced and which have been passed by parliament since he has been minister.

I am satisfied that the legislation he has just outlined will be tabled before the House and will contain all the provisions mentioned in his statement. In extending my gratitude to the minister, I am certain that I am speaking on behalf of all veterans and all those who were waiting impatiently for even more improvements in that sector. As the leader of the New Democratic Party said, we hope that the legislation will be introduced shortly and that we may pass it so that those who stand to benefit from it will be able to do so as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to apologize to the hon. member in the Social Credit party. I understood that the statement was sent to all parties.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether the legislation is in fact drafted and whether there has been consultation between the government House leader and the minister. If so, can the minister tell us when he plans to introduce the legislation, bearing in mind the assurance which has been given by all opposition House leaders today?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the legislation is not drafted. We went as far as we could go without finalizing it. I am not worried about discussions with the government House leader. I am not worried about whether the legislation will be forthcoming. I think it will be coming in quite soon.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO RESTORE CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-454, to amend the Criminal Code (death sentence).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, this amendment would, in effect, reinstate capital punishment for all capital crime, excluding that of high treason.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Speaker: As I have indicated in the past with respect to the subject matter of bills, the House should understand that I choose a seconder to afford an hon. member the right to introduce a bill, and that seconder is not necessarily associated with the subject matter of the bill itself.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO DEAL WITH OBSCENITY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to present a petition. As the House is well aware, the last year has seen much progress made in an attempt to define pornography and obscenity in Canada. A bill has been introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). The bill is in conformity with the report made by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The public outcry has been—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a petition, he should simply explain its contents.

Mr. Epp: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The petition I have with me today calls on the government to re-define obscenity and encourages the government to move forward with the bill it has introduced.

In so far as the Law Reform Commission, the Tax Review Board, the Canadian Human Rights Commission are concerned: Nil.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

Question No. 937—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Is the UIC initial claims data form still in use and, if so, what methods are taken to test if a claimant's card is authentic?

2. Did Mr. Guy Cousineau, former Chairman of the UIC or the Honourable Robert Andras, former Minister of Manpower and Immigration direct persons to destroy Special Investigation Division documents into criminal fraudulent activities in 1975?

3. Did Mr. Raymond Dupont, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration state in the House on December 5, 1977, that 60,000 fines were imposed and, if so (a) what is a breakdown of the regions, by numbers, when such fines were levied (b) how many were due to the fraudulent use of social insurance cards (c) how many of the individuals charged had more than one SIN number (d) how many of the individuals charged had inside assistance?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Yes, the initial claims data form is still in use. The computer verifies all claimant's cards and will reject, for investigation, any card that it cannot authenticate.

2. No.

3. He stated that an estimated 60,000 fines were imposed. (a) The estimated breakdown of these administrative penalties is: Atlantic, 10,000; Quebec, 20,000; Ontario, 20,000; Prairies, 5,000; Pacific, 5,000. (b) Statistics of this nature are not available. (c) Statistics of this nature are not available. (d) Of the people prosecuted by the commission, seven had inside assistance.

EXPENDITURES IN NICKEL BELT

Question No. 1,120—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of Nickel Belt by the Department of Communications and those agencies that report to it?

Mr. C. Douglas (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned: none. In so far as CRTC is concerned: none.

CANADAIR LIMITED

Question No. 1,232—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the government approve a proposal by Canadair Ltd. to raise $70 million (US) in five year promissory notes in international capital markets for use in the CL-600 Challenger Programme and, if so, in what manner is the financing to be arranged and what is its purpose?

Order Paper Questions

2. Is money for the Challenger Programme still being supplied by Canadian banks and (a) if so, by which banks and in what amounts (b) if not, for what reason?

3. What are all the conditions to which the government has agreed with respect to the financing?

4. Will the financing agreement have any effect whatsoever on the government's declared intention eventually to return Canadair to the private sector and, if so, in what way?

5. Has a foreign partner been found to participate in the Challenger Programme and (a) if so, what is that partner's name and what is the extent of its participation (b) if not, is a foreign partner being sought?

6. Has Canadair repaid the $6 million loan plus accrued interest it received from the Defence Production Revolving Fund in 1972 and (a) if so, what was the total amount and on what date was repayment made (b) if not, what is the total amount due and on what date will repayment be made?

7. What is the total amount of the government's involvement in Canadair, including (a) original purchase price (b) additional investment (c) loans (d) guarantees for loans raised in (i) international (ii) domestic markets?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. (a) The government has approved a proposal by Canadair Limited to raise $70 million US in five year promissory notes in international capital markets. (b) The notes will be placed by an underwriters group led by the Merrill Lynch group. (c) To remove the need for direct government guarantees to the Canadair bankers against a line of credit of up to $70 million established for the Canadair Challenger program.

2. (a) At present the financing of the Canadair Challenger program is provided by a credit line of $120 million in the form of demand loans with two Canadian banks. 80 per cent of the funds would come from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and 20 per cent from the Provincial Bank of Canada. (b) Not applicable.

3. The associated undertakings and acknowledgements of the government are as follows: (i) So long as any of the notes remain outstanding, Her Majesty will not sell, nor transfer ownership of, nor dispose, nor alter, nor assign, nor encumber any shares of Canadair if the effect thereof: (a) is to reduce the voting rights of Her Majesty associated with the shares of Canadair to less than 66⅔ per cent. (b) does not permit Her Majesty to continue to elect all of the members of the board of directors of Canadair. Unless prior thereto Her Majesty shall have fully and unconditionally guaranteed the payment of all amounts then due and to become due in respect of the notes. (ii) The government confirms its dedication to seeing Canadair operated in a manner consistent with the honouring of all its obligations to creditors, including the notes. (iii) The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce confirms that it would be his intention to seek authority from parliament, if necessary, for appropriate financial measures to enable Canadair to meet unforeseen expenditures resulting from cost overruns which might occur in the CL600 development and production program. (iv) The minister recognizes Canadair's covenant that so long as any of the notes are outstanding Canadair will not reduce the amount of its share capital nor will it pay dividends on any of its shares nor will issue any additional shares except to Her Majesty.

4. The undertakings place a time constraint on the full return of the company to the private sector so long as the notes remain outstanding unless prior thereto Her Majesty shall have fully and unconditionally guaranteed the payment of all amounts then due and to become due in respect of the notes.

5. Participation has not been arranged with a foreign partner in the Challenger program. The desirability of such an arrangement declined as the program progressed. (a) Not applicable. (b) No.

6. Yes. (a) The principal sum of $6 million plus accrued interest of $2,599, 853.35 was paid to the Defence Production Revolving Fund on March 31, 1977. (b) Not applicable.

7. (a) Original purchase of Canadair, $38,150,000; (b) Additional investment as at December 31, 1976, $8,468,715; (c) Refundable inventory financing, during period since Crown took ownership of Canadair resulting from agreements standing at the time of purchase, $16,006,996; (d) (i) Nil. (ii) The Government of Canada is currently guaranteeing a line of bank credit to Canadair up to $70 million in connection with the financing of the Challenger program.

AIR CANADA'S PASS POLICY

Question No. 1,329—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Does Air Canada have a policy on free travel passes and, if so (a) what is it (b) to whom does it apply (c) is it presently under review?

2. How many such passes are issued each year and on what basis?

3. What is the average annual cost to Air Canada for such passes?

4. Does Air Canada obtain any kind of approval from the Canadian Transport Commission regarding free travel passes and, if so (a) what is the rationale for this approval (b) what effect does the dispensing of the passes have on applications made by Air Canada to the Canadian Transport Commission to increase the rate of air fares?

5. Did Air Canada obtain a ruling from the Department of National Revenue with respect to the application of complimentary passes under the conditions of the Income Tax Act?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. (a) and (b) Air Canada's pass policy applies to its 20,000 employees and their qualified dependents who are eligible for limited personal passes which are subject to the availability of open seats at flight time. Passes are also issued to employees as required for company business travel, and to non-company persons such as cabinet ministers, Transport Canada officials with aviation responsibility, officials of Canada Post Office, of other airlines, and to certain CN employees performing functions for Air Canada. A certain number of individual trip passes are also issued for commercial promotional purposes. (c) Like all the airline's policies, it is under constant review.

2. The issuance of free and reduced rate transportation by all Canadian airlines is governed by the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission under the Aeronautics Act. Air Canada's practice in the application of these passes is similar to other Canadian carriers and the airline regards details of its promotional pass issuance as proprietary.

[Mr. Horner.]

3. Employee personal passes are contingent upon the availability of open seats and a service charge is levied; blackout periods during heavy travel peaks apply to promotional passes with the result that these passes are also normally used when there are open seats available and the cost is minimal.

4. (a) See No. 2. (b) Pass issuances have no effect. Rate increase applications to the Canadian Transport Commission are accompanied by a comprehensive economic justification of costs for the airline to operate its approved schedule at a load factor reflecting the convenience of scheduled service. This load factor for the airline as a whole averages in the mid 60 per cent range which means there are generally unused seats available for pass travel.

5. No.

CANADIANS WORKING IN THE UNITED STATES

Question No. 1,385—Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska):

During (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977, did any Canadians work in the forest industry in the United States, particularly in the States of Maine and New Hampshire and, if so, how many?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The commission does not maintain any record of Canadians working outside the country.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Question No. 1,393—Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska):

From 1965 to 1977, what amount did the government spend annually to administer the Unemployment Insurance Act for (a) salaries of (i) employees of different categories (ii) members of the Appeal Board (b) the upkeep of buildings?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): (a)(i) As the financial system is not designed to identify salaries by categories, the information cannot be provided. (ii) The information is not available prior to 1975. 1975, $1,207,-748; 1976, $1,471,562; 1977, $1,490,227. (b) As the financial system does not identify the upkeep of buildings separately, the information cannot be provided.

CNR—PENSIONS

Question No. 1,414—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25.00 per month?

2. How many are in receipt of a pension of $25.00 per month?

3. How many are in receipt of pensions of (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month (b) $30.00 to $39.99 per month (c) $40.00 to $49.99 per month (d) $50.00 to $59.99 per month (e) $60.00 to $69.99 per month (f) $70.00 to $79.99 per month (g) $80.00 to $89.99 per month (h) $90.00 to $99.99 per month (i) $100.00 to $124.99 per month (j) $125.00 to $149.99 per month (k) $150.00 to $199.99 per month (l) $200.00 to $299.99 per month (m) $300.00 to $399.99 per month (n) $400.00 to $499.99 per month (o) $500.00 to $599.99 per month (p) $600.00 to $699.99 per month (q) $700.00 to $799.99 per month (r) $800.00 per month and over?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. One hundred eighty three.

2. Five hundred thirty five.

3. (a) 181; (b) 144; (c) 454; (d) 378; (e) 433; (f) 372; (g) 1,011; (h) 454; (i) 1,015; (j) 1,106; (k) 2,628; (l) 5,991; (m) 4,566; (n) 2,964; (o) 2,071; (p) 1,348; (q) 898; (r) 1,606. In a number of cases, the amount of pensions paid by Canadian National Railways do not represent the total pensions payable to employees for railway service. Pensions payable by CNR to international employees (service in both Canada and the United States) relate to their service in Canada only. Such employees also receive annuities respecting eligibility for which CN has made contributions payable under the U.S. railroad retirement act or the social security act for service performed in the United States. For example, in the group receiving pensions under $25 a month, in 1977 there are 30 former international employees who receive U.S. railroad retirement or social security annuities in respect of CN service rendered in the United States. In addition, there are various pension agreements between CN and other companies, such as Canadian Pacific Limited, CP Telecommunications and the Ontario Northland Railway, where each company issued separate cheques for its portion of the total pension. Only the pension payable by CN is in this statement Also, since the passing of the Pension Benefits Standards Act by the federal government on October 1, 1967, there are 60 employees who have terminated service with CN and are receiving rather small compulsory deferred pensions for service performed only from October 1, 1967. The balance of those receiving small pensions are employees who elected early retirement (before age 65) with reduced basic pensions ($25) and employees who had very short service and very small contributions.

CNR—PENSION FUNDS

Question No. 1,415—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. What was the total amount on the books of the pension funds of the Canadian National Railways as at December 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

2. What rate of interest was earned on such funds during (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

3. What amount of interest was credited to the funds during the year ending December 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

4. What amount was added to the funds from employee contributions during the year ending December 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

5. What amount was added to the funds as regular or current contributions by the Canadian National Railways during the year ending December 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

6. What amount was added to the funds in any other way by the Canadian National Railways during the year ending December 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

7. Is money owed to the above funds by the Canadian National Railways and, if so, how much and what arrangements are being made to meet such debt?

8. What was the total amount paid of the above funds in pensions during the year ending December 31 (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. As at December 31, 1975, $1,295,992,657; As at December 31, 1976, 1,461,873,667; As at December 31, 1977, 1,615,469,748.

2. To calculate the yield we have used the Statistics Canada formula, under which the investment is deemed to be opening investments plus closing investments, less earnings, divided by two: On this basis, the yield is: 1975, 5.95 per cent; 1976, 6.33 per cent; 1977, 6.75 per cent.

3. Year ended December 31, 1975, $69,727,964; Year ended December 31, 1976, 83,377,841; Year ended December 31, 1977, 99,146,414.

4. Year ended December 31, 1975, $51,609,714; Year ended December 31, 1976, 50,057,197; Year ended December 31, 1977, 55,857,289.

5. Year ended December 31, 1975, $94,746,365; Year ended December 31, 1976, 116,673,842; Year ended December 31, 1977, 122,454,430.

6. Year ended December 31, 1975, $14,766,374; Year ended December 31, 1976, 25,080,781; Year ended December 31, 1977, 1,131,400.

7. At December 31, 1977, Canadian National Railways owed $6,198,839 representing December items. This amount was paid in January, 1978.

8. Year ended December 31, 1975, $93,567,159; Year ended December 31, 1976, 109,308,650; Year ended December 31, 1977, 125,003,230.

AIRPORTS

Question No. 1,422—Mr. Broadbent:

1. For the years 1970 to 1977, what was the annual number of passenger movements through Dorval Airport?

2. For the year 1977 (a) what was the number of passenger movements through Mirabel Airport (b) how many of these passenger movements involved a transfer to or from Dorval Airport?

3. For the years 1970 to 1977, what was the annual number of passenger movements through the Toronto International Airport (Malton)?

4. For the years 1970 to 1977, using the 1973 population distribution datum that is referred to in the Airport Inquiry Commission (AIC), what is the number of persons annually exposed to a noise level of 28 NEF or larger?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Lists below present arriving/departing passenger data for Dorval Airport for the years 1970 to 1976 (see also 2(a)).

2. (a) Annual 1977 figures are not yet available and therefore nine months of preliminary data on passenger traffic at Dorval, Mirabel and Toronto International Airports have been provided in lists below. (b) Formal statistics are not kept on the number of passengers connecting between Mirabel and Dorval. Estimates based on passenger surveys and other sources range from 70,000 to 120,000 for the year 1976.

3. Lists below present arriving/departing passenger data for Toronto International Airport for the years 1970 to 1976 (see also 2(a)).

4. With respect to the final question regarding noise exposure, these data are presently being produced for the years required. This information will be supplied as soon as it is available.

CANADIAN NATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Question No. 1,430—Mr. McGrath:

1. Did CNT make a decision to move its personnel from St. John's to Gander and, if so (a) for what reason (b) how many persons will be affected?

2. What is the total number of persons to be moved from Toronto to Gander by CNT?

3. What provision is CNT prepared to make for long-term employees who, for family reasons, do not wish to make the move?

4. Is CNT prepared to pay a special allowance to persons who are unable to move their families to Gander?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Relocation of the headquarters for CNT's operations in Newfoundland from St. John's to Gander has been approved in principle. No detailed implementation plan has yet been formally ratified but the matter is under active study. (a) Telephone operations is the major sector of CNT's business in Newfoundland and Gander is the centre of such services. (b) The number of persons who may be affected is not yet determined. In any event relocations would be placed gradually over a period of several years in order to minimize inconvenience to employees and impact on communities involved.

2, 3, and 4. A study of the functions to be transferred from Toronto areas has not yet been sufficiently advanced to enable the determination of the precise numbers of persons who will be affected or to indicate what assistance should be provided; this information will be determined following analysis of all aspects of the relocation and will have an influence on the decisions to be reached.

CHALLENGER AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,451—Mr. McKinnon:

As of November 1, 1977, December 1, 1977, January 1, 1978 and February 1, 1978, what amounts have been received as deposits for orders of the "Challenger" business jet to be produced by Canadair?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Value of deposits held on Challenger aircraft orders at Canadair Limited are reported as follows: November 1, $20.9M; December 1, 22.4; January 1, 24.3; February 1, 24.6.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Question No. 1,470—Mr. Allard:

1. Since the implementation of the Opportunities for Youth Programme, did the government allocate money to the Constituency of Rimouski and, if so, in what amount?

2. For each project accepted, what was the (a) name of the project (b) amount allocated (c) year of acceptance (d) name of the municipality involved (e) number of jobs created?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. and 2. The Opportunities for Youth Program did not operate on a constituency basis and as a result the data is not available by constituency.

GRANTS IN FRASER VALLEY

Question No. 1,501—Mr. Patterson:

1. What amount was spent by the government in the Constituency of Fraser Valley East under the Opportunities for Youth Programme in each year of its duration?

2. What amount was spent by the government in the Constituency of Fraser Valley East under the Local Employment Assistance Programme (LEAP) in each year since its inception?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. The Opportunities for Youth Program did not operate on a constituency basis and, as a result, data is not available by constituency.

2. $66,444 in 1973-74.

IMPAIRED DRIVERS STUDY

Question No. 1,508—Mr. Huntington:

1. Has the government been involved in a research study investigating drinking and driving carried out by the Cranfield Institute of Technology in

Beds, England and, if so (a) for how long (b) what has been the total contribution by Canada to date, in terms of dollars (c) how many Canadians are involved in the study and how many man-years does this represent (d) for what period of time does the government plan to remain involved in the study (e) what does the government hope to gain from its involvement in the study?

2. Will a report or summary of findings be published and, if so, will they be utilized by proper agencies in Canada and will they be available to the public?

3. For what reason is this type of research being carried out in England and not in Canada, thus utilizing Canadians in the study?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. (a) Since October 1, 1977. (b) Approximately $11,000 has been paid to date on a contract with a total value of $20,000. (c) One Canadian is involved in the study and his time represents almost nine man-months. (d) The contract with the Cranfield Institute of Technology is to be completed on August 1, 1978 with the submission of a final report on the project. (e) An evaluation of the feasibility of using simple on-highway driving tests to identify drivers whose ability is impaired by alcohol, thereby to increase the efficiency of conventional enforcement practices.

2. A full report of the study will be published and the results will be communicated to responsible federal and provincial agencies. The results are expected to be used principally by law enforcement agencies.

3. A combination of factors, specifically the availability in one location of: (i) an instrumented vehicle and the necessary technical support functions (ii) an extensive, paved, off-highway test area with controlled access; (iii) maximum available test time provided by a temperate climate and long nights; and (iv) a co-investigator with expertise in relevant research areas.

TAXATION—HUTTERITE COLONIES

Question No. 1,534—Mr. Schumacher:

1. How much tax money was declared owing to the government by the Hutterite colonies as a result of the recent court decisions and what arrangements were made by the government to collect?

2. Has the recent counter action by the Hutterian Brethern stopped the government collecting the taxes declared owing in the original judgements by the Supreme Court of Canada and the Federal Courts?

3. Has the government made provisions to ensure that, in the future, taxes will be properly (a) levied (b) collected in each case involving Hutterian Brethern?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. The appeals submitted by the Hutterite colonies have not yet been heard by the Tax Review Board or the courts.

2. No. Revenue Canada has proceeded to fully secure the outstanding accounts by registering encumbrances against land owned by the colonies who have appealed the assessments.

3. (a) Revisions to section 143 of the Income Tax Act, explained in Revenue Canada's Information Circular 78-5, have clarified the determination of taxable income for communal organizations. (b) Collection of taxes from these organizations is no different than from all other taxpayers.

WAYS AND MEANS

CONCURRENCE IN MOTION TO AMEND THE INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved:

That a ways and means motion to amend the Income Tax Act, laid upon the table, Monday, April 10, 1978, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed, from Monday, May 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott (for Mr. Lang) that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass, and of the amendment (Mr. Murta) (p. 5176).

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate again in the debate on Bill C-17, the CNR refinancing bill, as it is known. I also want to support the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta). I spoke during second reading debate for the purpose of making known some of my views on this CNR refinancing and also on the Hall commission and on railway abandonment in my home province of Manitoba. A little later I would like to add to some of those earlier remarks.

As hon. members know, our party intends to vote against this bill. Our reasons for not supporting Bill C-17 have been put on the record by other members of the Progressive Conservative party. We do not feel that this bill serves any real purpose. The government has tried to make it appear as if the passage of this bill will save Canadian taxpayers money, but a close examination shows that this is merely an illusion, a stage trick.

The CNR's own profit projections for the next five years show that the capital restructuring provided in this bill is not necessary for the corporation to make a profit. The first quarter of this year has produced a healthy profit for the railway, and its own projections show that this is going to be the case for the next few years whether this bill is passed or not. With this bill the profits will be only that much greater.

CN is a Crown corporation, and therefore its shareholders are the citizens of Canada. Under our democratic parliamentary system we are the peoples' representatives, and therefore CN is accountable first and foremost to parliament and not to the capital market. The problem, however, is how to make CN accountable to parliament.

As hon. members are aware, there is at present another royal commission in existence apart from the McDonald commission which is getting so much publicity, namely, the commission on corporate concentration, which will shortly hand down its recommendations on the basis of which the government has promised to prepare its legislation governing Crown corporations. We think that the bill before us should be deferred until that time.

The last time that CNR came before parliament asking to be relieved of its debts was in 1952 when the railway began a huge program of capital expenditures, and less than a decade later, in 1961, generated a debt of slightly under $1 billion. But despite all the expenditures, CN transportation service began to decline after that. The CN became involved in many other ventures, but CN railway transport has not improved at all in the 26 years since 1952.

We in the Conservative party believe that now is not the time to give passage to Bill C-17. There are just too many questions hanging over the future of rail service in this country. The government has committed itself to a large expenditure in order to upgrade the grain handling lines in western Canada. There may be an adjustment of the Crow rates—something which I personally fear—but that is uncertain, and I am not reassured by the odd noises from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to the effect that there will be no tampering with the Crow rates. However, that is another subject.

Also, CN has been relieved of what is perhaps its biggest burden, that is, the rail passenger service, with the formation of VIA Rail, but no one really knows yet whether VIA Rail will prove to be a wise decision or a big mistake. Personally I support VIA Rail but the experience in the United States with Amtrak, in a country with a much larger travelling public to support such a venture, has brought a mixed reaction. I wonder what our experience in Canada will be. In light of these uncertainties, we believe that this is not the time to consider Bill C-17 and that it would be more sensible to defer it until these various uncertainties have been cleared away.

Now I would like to make some comments about a subject that is of great concern to me and to my constituents, that is, railway abandonment. It continues to be a very hot topic in Manitoba, particularly in my constituency where there are so many branch lines. Perhaps the reason is that, according to the Hall commission, the province of Manitoba was the province most "overbuilt" with railways during the great period of railway expansion in Canada from about 1880 to 1920. The result is that today there is a multitude of branch lines in the province which are concentrated in the narrow southern quarter of Manitoba. Most of these lines are not economical and some have already been abandoned, or will be soon.

In the central Interlake region of my constituency there is an 80 mile long CNR branch line which is known as the Inwood subdivision. The grain receiving points on this line are three Manitoba pool elevators, one at Broad Valley, and two at Fisher Branch. The Fisher Branch facilities were expanded not too long ago. The amount of grain handled by these three elevators fluctuates, depending on the type of crop year in that region. As of March 1 of this year, the three elevators at Fisher Branch and Broad Valley together handled a total of 8,585 metric tonnes of grain. In other words, this is what the Inwood line handled in the first three months of this year.

The Hall commission recommended that this line be abandoned. I am against the abandonment of this line, and I have always been. I want that clearly understood. I have argued for the retention of this line as part of the basic rail network on many occasions. However, the Hall commission recommended its abandonment, in spite of my representations as well as those of many others, of course, made to Mr. Justice Hall and to the other commissioners.

For the Inwood line, the Hall commission made a unique recommendation. It suggested that the two elevators at Fisher Branch be retained in service on the abandoned line as off-line loaders and that farmers continue to deliver to Fisher Branch. From Fisher Branch the grain would be trucked by commercial truck to the CP's Arborg railhead, which is about 20 miles distant. This off-line loading experiment has not been instituted by this government, and may never be. However, I have a great many reservations about the practicality of such an operation.

In the Interlake there are four branch lines. Of these, the Inwood line is the only one which is not paralleled by a paved provincial trunk highway along most of its length. There is some pavement in the north, but it is not parallel to the Inwood line. The roads are all low grade. The Inwood subdivision is in the very special position of being the primary mode of transportation in most of the area which it serves.

The principal commodity moved over this line is, of course, grain, but there is some other traffic as well. Grain makes up about 85 per cent of the total, pulpwood makes up 7 per cent, and the other 8 per cent is made up by coal, fertilizer, lumber, and farm implements and machinery. For the grain traffic, the Hall commission recommended the off-line concept. I must admit that I would be very interested to observe such an experiment in operation but, for all that I know of this region, it is not really an answer to the grain handling problems of the Interlake.

The biggest single reason that such an operation is neither practical nor viable is that the roads in the area are completely inadequate for large capacity grain trucks. The Inwood line runs through two of the three local government districts, or LGDs, in the Interlake, Fisher and Armstrong. These LGDs do not have the resource tax base to undertake the road development and upgrading which would be required for heavy hauling by truck. It is not only the expense of truck hauling, and which would be very great in any case, which is involved. There is also the consideration that trucking is an inefficient and fuel-wasteful means of transport as compared with the diesel locomotive which the experts variously estimate to be 18 times more efficient than the gasoline powered truck, based on ton capacity and fuel consumption.

In all of Canada only about 8 per cent of the total land is farm land, and this is declining every year. However, this is not true of the Interlake. If hon. members want to see a real frontier where raw virgin land is still being broken by the plough, they should visit the north central Interlake area of Manitoba in my constituency.

In the Dallas-Red Rose area Canada's arable farm land is being developed at present. This is in contrast to what is happening in most other parts of the country where agricultural land is disappearing. This is only possible in that part of the province of Manitoba because of the existence of the Inwood rail line. Even so, the local delivery point for these new farms now is Fisher Branch, which is more than 40 miles away for many of the producers. However, the off-line concept would involve a further haulage by truck from Fisher Branch to CP's Arborg railhead, a further 30 miles or so. Of course, this would make the new farms in the Dallas-Red Rose region completely uneconomic. It is clear that closure of the Inwood subdivision would effectively halt agricultural expansion in the north central Interlake.

When I last spoke in the House on March 2 about the problems of rail transportation in the Interlake, and about the Hall commission's recommendations for the Inwood line, I believe I stated that the farmers of the area wanted the commission's off-line experiment for Fisher Branch to be undertaken. The farmers have told me, however, that this is decidedly not the case. Naturally they do not want to lose their Inwood line, any more than I do. We are not against the experiment, but we do not want to lose our railway for the sake of it.

I should like to quote from a letter which I received a short time ago from the president of the Fisher Branch and District Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Tom Magnusson. I believe it sums up very well how the grain producers of the Interlake feel about the Inwood subdivision. In part the letter reads as follows:

● (1542)

. . . In our investigations locally, the farmers do not feel that the off-line elevator concept is indeed the most economical in the long term, nor even feasible, given the present infrastructure and circumstances. The Fisher Branch and District Chamber of Commerce takes the following position in support of our local farmers: (1) that rail service must be maintained to Fisher Branch through either (A) continuance of the present line and the upgrading of same, or (B) construction of a spur line from Fisher Branch—Broad Valley area to either the CPR Arborg line or the CNR along provincial trunk highway number 6; or (2) should the off-line elevator concept be instituted, that the CNR Inwood subdivision be left intact and maintained until the success and feasibility of the trucking operation to Arborg be determined. This would allow the CTC to reverse its decision if the trucking operation is not successful.

My position is exactly the same. It is the only way in which I would support the Hall recommendation. Mr. Magnusson's letter continues:

You will likely be aware of why our farmers have taken this stand. I would point out, however, that the data the Hall commission based its recommendations on is not without challenge and therefore the recommendations should not be etched in stone. In fact our information is that the Prairie Rail Action Committee has commissioned another study on the cost factors involved in this "off-line elevator" recommendation. Also, our last year's crop indicates that we indeed have a much greater production potential than the 750,000 bushel handle used by the Hall commission as the basis of their recommendation.

On many occasions the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that he believes that in Canada today nothing is carved in stone—not the constitutional arrangements, not federal-provincial relations, not anything. He is very flexible and willing to negotiate anything except outright separatism. Members of the Conservative party are not entirely convinced that all things are negotiable. However, in view of the government's stated willingness to be amiable and flexible, perhaps the Minister of Transport will re-examine the matter of the Inwood line and the recommendations of the Hall commission. Certainly there are extenuating circumstances here. In any case, the recommendations of the commission are now two years out of date. I urge the Minister of Transport to re-examine the entire question of the future of the Inwood subdivision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make brief comments on the bill now under consideration.

The primary objective of Bill C-17 is to allow the CN to proceed with recapitalization. The conversion of the $800 million debt in no par value capital stock will allow the CN to reimburse the treasury through dividends on its earnings instead of being compelled, mostly in theory it must be added, to repay its debt. Considering that the CN balance sheet has shown profits for the past two years, that fact seriously prompts us to pass the bill. We would thus show our confidence in the management of that Crown corporation. In light of those factors, I feel that the bill is constructive. On the other hand, as a member of the opposition it is my duty to point out some dangers of giving carte blanche to the CN.

One of the indirect and no less significant results of the adoption of this bill would be to place the Crown corporation in a favourable position to borrow funds on money markets. This is not bad in itself, for everything would depend on the final use of these funds. If these funds are to be used to improve the railway system, make it more practical both for travellers and shippers, that is to serve the Canadian public better, this indirect result is desirable. On the other hand, if these funds are earmarked for investments in areas which are not consistent with the traditional vocation of the CN, I am against it. The CN is not an industrial and commercial holding company but a public utility. Its first function is to transport people and merchandise to destination, and to do so economically, whenever possible. It is a fact that there are circumstances where we cannot have both effectiveness and profitability. Under such circumstances, the service to the public must prevail over profitability, at least within certain limits. In fact, the CN is a Crown corporation because it is a recognized public utility. I feel many hon. members in this House would like to know more about the CN's medium and long-term plans in light of this possibility of getting new funds.

I know that several of my western colleagues are not satisfied with the CN performance in their region. On the other hand I would not like them to feel that everything is perfect in the east. If western shippers cannot find cars to ship grains, there is a similar problem in the east in relation with the lumber industry. Many lumber companies cannot get the cars they need to ship sawed lumber to American markets. Those companies are faced with the impossibility of meeting their delivery schedule and are therefore losing many new contracts. The problem does not stem from the employees' slow productivity or lack of leadership by the management which made efforts to get those contracts abroad. Everyone knows that the government likes to use both those excuses to hide its negligence. No, in this case it is the lack of foresight by the Canadian National which is clearly responsible for those lost contracts.

I was saying the CN must not launch into all sorts of investment which are not within its field of competence. To this I would add that the CN will have to be monitored closely even for some investments which may be within its field of competence. A related example which comes to mind is the proposed acquisition of Nordair by Air Canada. Although by doing so Air Canada would stay in its particular area of competence, it is not at all certain this transaction would be to the advantage of travellers and Canadians in general. On the other hand, whoever cares to open his eyes will see clearly that this transaction would severely limit the possibilities of expansion of another airline, namely Quebecair. I do not think a Crown corporation should have the right to take advantage of some privileges that are peculiar to nationally owned corporations to harm privately owned corporations. That kind of abuse should never be allowed.

We will have to be on our guard and see to it that this kind of abuse does not happen in the CN. For this reason, I wish the government had taken advantage of the presentation of this legislation to introduce controls and the obligation for the CN to report on a more direct basis than it does now. I would not want this wish to be interpreted as a lack of confidence in CN management. On the opposite, as I said earlier those people are to be commended for their healthy financial administration in the last few years. Indeed, the figures are revealing: in two years the CN went from a deficit of $16 million in 1975 to profits of $28 million in 1977. But if its record is so good, I do not see why the CN should be afraid of the right of representatives of the people to have some control and especially to ask some questions. We sometimes make a lot of noise in this House, but God knows that we are not so bad. After all, we are entitled to know about the operations of such an important company, a Crown corporation. It would be only normal for the elected representatives of the people to be better informed on the operations of this company.

Finally, I would like to suggest a possibility that I believe very progressive. Following passage of this bill, the CN will most probably decide to look for new capital on the money markets. According to tradition, these funds will come either from the Canadian market or, as is the case too often, from foreign markets. I believe that if the government really wanted to innovate and be progressive, it could consider allowing the Bank of Canada, which is the bank of all Canadians, to lend to the CN the funds it might need. Of course, the interest rate charged would be the minimum. Canadians should not exploit one another. It would be quite normal for them to co-operate.

Since the Bank of Canada belongs to the people, I think it would be quite normal for it to help a Crown corporation like the CN. Under the formula that I have suggested, the development of the CN would benefit all Canadians and not only the bankers, whether Canadian or foreign. Moreover, this would allow better control over the development of the CN since the loans could include very specific conditions which would meet the needs of Canadians. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this suggestion should be considered very seriously and I hope that, in doing so, the government will be open-minded and even innovative.

I believe that the cabinet should review this bill so as to include the means of financing this utility that I have suggested, which would make it more acceptable. This is why I sincerely believe that consideration of this bill should be postponed for some time as suggested in the motion which has been moved to allow the cabinet to make the improvements that I have suggested.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, it may be, as Gordie Lightfoot said, there was a time in this great land when the railroads did not run, but it seems that must have been a very long time ago. I am always amazed in looking back at some of our history, economical and political, to find since how many years railways have had almost a fatal fascination for politicians, perhaps even before they did for economists.

Railways in Canada, said Robert McQueen in the "Canadian Historical Review" back in 1936, are far from being an economic problem. He said, they are born of, nourished in, are and will continue to be a part of Canadian politics.

Back in 1851 that great Nova Scotian, Joseph Howe, in a speech in Quebec, said in respect of railways, when talking about the future of what was then the colonies in North America:

To the advocates of legislative union I say, your scheme is impracticable without the railroads.

He went on to say as well, on another occasion:

I am neither a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, yet I will venture to predict that in five years we shall make the journey hence to Quebec and Montreal and Home through Portland and St. John by rail;—

This is the part that fascinates me:

—and I believe that many in this room will live to hear the whistle of the stream-engine in the passes of the Rocky Mountains and to make the journey from Halifax to the Pacific in five or six days.

He said that in Halifax on May 15, 1851.

With 127 years or so having passed, we are still not able to get to the Pacific from the eastern coast in much less than five days by rail.

I suggest, when we look at this particular bill and the amendment that I am speaking on today, we should consider why the railways, despite the fact that many hundreds of millions of dollars have been written off capital indebtedness, have been so slow in many areas to adopt modern technology.

Since the war, for example, in the U.S.S.R., a country with climatic and geographical conditions resembling Canada, we have seen the electrification of literally thousands of miles of railway track. This point was made very strikingly by Professor J. Lukasiewicz, a well known Carleton University professor, who has written from time to time on both the modernization and the obsolescence of the Canadian railway system.

As members of parliament, and as Canadians, I think we should demand to know more from the top management of the major railways in this country why they have been so slow to adopt in trains what would appear to be fairly rudimentary technological advances. Now with the advent of VIA Rail, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) quite rightly is emphasizing that it would be to the advantage of all Canadians, for many reasons, to promote greater use of passenger facilities. Yet I do not understand why more has not been done to make the use of railways more attractive to businessmen and, indeed, to all types of commuters and passengers.

I believe it is possible in this day and age for railway passengers to be provided access to telephones so that businessmen, for example, who wished to make a trip from Montreal to Toronto or from Montreal to Halifax would be able to use the railway as sort of a mobile office, if they had reasonable access to radio or some other type of telephone communications.

The same is true, I suggest, of other technological advances that could be brought in to make the trains more attractive for a journey which is, of necessity, much longer than one has to endure by aircraft. Why should television not be available in some parts of the modern train? Why should there not be a rudimentary library available, and a more attractive and less expensive canteen service? All these things would do a great deal in a practical way to help encourage greater usage of the railways. This, of course, has to be the bottom line; if railways are not used by a greater percentage of travellers, then certainly they will not be profitable and we will continue to be the recipient of requests by the CNR to come in every once in a while and write off several hundreds of millions or, as one member said, "another great train robbery" at the expense of the taxpayers.

I think it is also pretty obvious that the benefits the legislation we are discussing today is supposed to provide, while superficially attractive, are not necessarily indicative of what will really happen. We are told that one of the main purposes of the bill is to convert approximately $800 million of debt owed the government by the CNR to equity. A lot of benefits are supposed to flow from this. We are supposed to eliminate the necessity of the federal government picking up deficits which occur from time to time.

We are supposed, as well, to improve the debt-equity ratio, as was done recently with our national air carrier, and it will also supposedly free the government from having to purchase 4 per cent of preferred shares at an annual cost to the government of $80 million, which supposedly is based upon 3 per cent of the gross revenues of the CN system. However, it was well documented before the committee that the governmemt was never obliged to purchase preferred shares of the CN from 1960 onwards. The government was compelled to purchase the shares only from 1952 to 1960 as stipulated in the 1952 recapitalization act. However, the statement that was first made in this House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) some time ago, that the passing of Bill C-17 would be an automatic saving to the public of Canada because of the readjustment of the capital structure, is not at this time very self-evident. It places the bona fides of the entire bill under some suspicion.

As I understand it, the CNR has proven that it is going to make a modest profit in the next few years anyway whether this bill is passed or not. The projection for 1979 is a profit in excess of $60 million without Bill C-17. If it does become law the projection is for $136 million profit. By 1982, the profit, if Bill C-17 is not passed, is supposed to be in the vicinity of $140 million, whereas if it is passed the profit will be $267 million. This may be, however laudable the bottom line from the point of view of the accountant or economist, an excessive profit, taking into account that CN, like Air Canada, also has a primary duty to provide service as well as to make a profit. Ideally, of course, they have to do both, but to concentrate too much on the profit motive is not necessarily in the best interests of either the railway or the country.

Coming back to the object of the CNR and how, in the past, I feel in some ways it has been derelict in its duties, I would like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Transport, and to CN management as a whole, that greater emphasis be placed on carrying non-perishable commodities by rail. It is not only inefficient, as my colleague from Portage just pointed out, to carry some of these commodities by truck, but it is also energy wasting and very destructive to our highways. Pulp wood, particularly in the province of Nova Scotia, is one of the commodities that lends itself to being moved far more efficiently by rail. In doing this it would be more energy efficient, make our highways safer and less congested, and it would also be a much more satisfactory method for the industry.

However, herein lies another problem, Mr. Speaker. Car allocation by the CNR to do this, periodically presents a problem. It presents a problem in my constituency for many industries, but principally it presents a problem for pulp companies. Another problem that we find is that the CNR is not very aggressive in its attempts to go after new business, which is part and parcel of making railways profitable. Like most businesses, if you do not achieve a reasonable amount of volume you are not going to be able to achieve very much efficiency. The Halifax Chronicle-Herald in an editorial a few weeks ago commented, and they were speaking about the CNR at the time:

> The railway has not made an impressive showing in seeking new business. One wonders, for example, how much better business might be on the south shore line (of N.S.) if as much energy has been poured into an aggressive marketing and service as was expended in trying to get permission for abandonment.

Assuming that the railways eventually gets the benefit of this recapitalization, and assuming that management have additional funds, either as a result of the capital they generate in profits or as a result of the benefits which parliament may see fit to give them, surely they must undertake a comprehensive effort to purchase more railway rolling stock and to upgrade not only the quality and quantity of their cars—refrigeration cars, pulp cars, flatcars, and so on—but they have to do some more meaningful work on upgrading the roadbeds. It is literally possible between Halifax and Montreal, on some of the passenger trains, on the steep grades, to jump out of the car and run alongside the train for several hundred yards, and get back on again. I do not know whether or not this is a fault of the diesel engines that are pulling the train because they are under powered. I rather suspect it is as a result of the conditions of the roadbed in some areas, which make it very hazardous for these trains to achieve a reasonable amount of speed. When one examines the average speed of a passenger train in Canada, and I am relying on my memory for this and going back to something that Professor Lukasiewicz wrote, it is something around 35 miles an hour, which is a very painful contrast to the 500 miles an hour that one can achieve with most jet aircraft today.

Railways must also take a more human view and more direct interest in their customers and employees as well. As a member of parliament I have received representations from people who complain bitterly that the service reps and the railway management in general are not interested sometimes in providing cars for some of their seasonal and short-term needs. I would trust, in connection with this more or less general consideration of the future of the CN, that management will take a sweeping look at their sales promotion techniques as well as their labour-management techniques because, as I started to say a few moments ago, at times the shortage of railway rolling stock is exacerbated by the fact that many of the needed cars are kept in the United States and cannot be recalled to Canada during certain peak periods of usage when they are needed.

I am quite prepared to admit that I have a special interest in seeing the CNR purchase a reasonable amount of modern and much-needed rolling stock. In my constituency in Trenton, Nova Scotia, we have one of the most capable railway producing industries in Canada, or in the world for that matter. As I said publicly a few days ago, I want to express my appreciation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for keeping me informed, and for his encouragement in making certain that we recently had an order for railway rolling stock for the continent of Africa, and he indicated several other countries where we might expect further business. The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say at that time that one of the reasons that Canadian manufacturers in this area are able to compete internationally is because of the efficiency and capability of our domestic industry. I am particularly proud that we have an industry in Nova Scotia that, despite its geographic disadvantages, has proven over the years that it can produce a very fine product.

One of the obvious failures of Bill C-17, and one of the justifications for this particular amendment, is that it is not necessarily the time to pass this legislation until we see, for example, what the Sullivan commission in Newfoundland is going to say, until we see how the activities of VIA Rail are going to be reflected throughout the system, and particularly because Bill C-17 does not appear to provide or strengthen accountability to parliament to any significant degree.

Coming back to the primary purpose of our national railway system, our transportation policy in general has always been based on competition where market forces are in play. There has been some vacillation in this regard over the years. The current Minister of Transport has brought forward a user-pay policy, and his predecessor had a different policy, in some cases there was no policy, and in some areas there may still be none, but by and large any transportation company of the size of CNR affects to a great extent the entire transportation network across the country.

It is fair comment to say, and it may have been said already, and perhaps the CPR has said something about this as well that the CPR has been very, very quiet on this particular bill, and I am wondering why that is. Do they see it as a forerunner to the nationalization of the CPR? It is no secret that CPR in recent years would have been very pleased to get out of the transportation business.

• (1612)

For several reasons, some of them have been stated by previous speakers and some I have enumerated today, it will do no harm and it will provide a better opportunity to assess the whole situation with regard to our national railway system if this particular piece of legislation is given a six-months' hoist and not passed at this time. There is no particular need at this time for this bill to be passed. Therefore I am pleased to speak in support of the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta).

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the amendment standing in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), regarding Bill C-17, an act to recapitalize the CNR.

I am far from being the oldest member of this House and yet I can remember in my lifetime—and I do not mind saying I am under 34 years of age—of going up to what we called the "tank" in Shelburne, Nova Scotia. Literally it was a tank on a tower by Blacks Brook. Anyone from the south shore of Nova Scotia will certainly know where Blacks Brook is. Once or twice a day the steam engines would come up to the tank at Blacks Brook and fill up, and I used to watch them. So, in my lifetime we have changed from that kind of locomotion in the rail industry to the modern diesels.

I can remember the first day when a diesel came down the tracks into Shelburne and the whole town turned out. It was a great spectacle to see what a diesel engine looked like. That is all in my short lifetime.

I am in support of the amendment that will hoist this legislation for some six months primarily because of what the bill and what the government have not done. Here it is, May 10, 1978, and we are in the House of Commons without legislation regarding rail transportation within our cities—I am talking about modern rapid transit systems—despite the promises made some four years ago during the election campaign of 1974 by this government. I have a copy of those promises. I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is in the House. I know that this government hoped that these election promises had been lost. But not so, sir. I diligently kept them over the years. Later on I will read them to this government and ministers can hear what they promised to do for rail transportation in this country.

Why should this bill not contain matters relevant to rapid transit systems? There are several reasons. Our major centres in Canada are centres of consumption. We know that right now some 65 per cent of Canadians live in urban centres. In another ten to 12 years, at least by 1990, 90 per cent of Canadians will live in urban centres, and yet today we do not have in place in Canada a strategy for rapid transit systems for our major centres. I am speaking of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, at least those three cities, if not others.

We know as well that this country is facing an oil gap. Prior to 1975 the term "oil gap" was unheard of. It was not in the vocabulary of Canadians. We know that at the moment half of the energy consumed in Canada in terms of oil and gas is in intra-city transportation. By the projections of the National Energy Board, and I am somewhat alarmed as other Canadians are that these projections change from time to time, their last projection showed that we will be facing a critical shortage of energy within the next 15 to 20 years. This means that Canada will import offshore oil in an amount of around 25 per cent to 30 per cent of our needs.

If we could put into place in our large urban centres, which will house 90 per cent of Canadians in another decade, mass rapid transportation systems that Canadians in those cities would use, we could effectively reduce the energy consumption of the automobile by 25 per cent. Translated to the national scene that would mean a saving of at least 12 per cent to 14 per cent of our oil needs. If that is then projected ten to 15 years hence, we are talking about a dramatic reduction in our reliance on offshore oil.

Lastly we need mass rapid transit systems in our cities because of the quality of life Canadians expect to find in large urban centres. Surely every member in this House has been in an automobile in a traffic jam at rush hour. These traffic jams could be avoided by rapid transit systems. Yet, we are debating a bill that would recapitalize the CNR and there is not a murmur from this government and the minister relating to mass transit systems. It is difficult to understand that a government that has been in power for 15 years in this country has yet to put in place that kind of a national urban transit strategy.

I see the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs in the House. He is from Toronto and I hope he stays around for awhile because I will have some things to say about him.

Just a couple of weeks ago the Premier of Ontario, the Hon. William Davis, took up a chisel officially to start a $58-million program in alterations in Toronto's union station. I do not know whether my friend, the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs was there, but I would not expect so because he would be somewhat embarrassed by the fact that the province of Ontario has had to go it alone. I do not live in Toronto but I have been there and I have been to Union Station. Union Station ought to be perserved for history. Sir, that is a usable archive. If hon. members have ever been to Union Station during lunch hour, they will have noticed that it is jammed packed with people. The vision of the Ontario government was its GO Transit service. It has gone it alone to modernize and upgrade the facilities, especially at Union Station.

This government promised $100 million of the $258 million for mass transit systems in this country, and in particular for metro Toronto. Of the $58 million the province is spending, at least $26.5 million should be coming from the federal government as said by those election promises made in June, 1974. We have facts with relation to Toronto. However, there is another city that found it necessary to go it alone, Edmonton. That is as a result of this government reneging on its grandiose statements and promises which it makes so fluently during an election campaign.

The city of Edmonton had to go it alone for $65.9 million. The provincial commitment was $45 million, and $20.9 million for the city of Edmonton. The federal government did not put up even one devalued dollar, in fact not a penny. The province of Alberta and the city of Edmonton pleaded with them to put into place a mass rapid transit system there.

I could speak of the south-west transit study in my city of Winnipeg. That study was undertaken as a direct result of the election promise in 1974. I know the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs is anxious to hear about that. I am sure he is one of the Liberals who hopes these promises will be long forgotten by Canadians.

Because of the promises made during the election campaign in 1974, Manitoba, and in particular Winnipeg, undertook the south-west transit system study to see whether it would be feasible to use existing rail lines owned by CNR and CPR which run from downtown Winnipeg to the university. That is the most heavily populated area of Winnipeg. Phase two, and a million and a half dollars later, the then mayor of Winnipeg, Mayor Juba, a fine man who has done our city proud, received word that the game was off, he would have to go it alone.

What was the result? Neither Winnipeg nor Manitoba has the kinds of funds that it can commit up to $100 million for a mass rapid transit system. The dream of Mayor Juba and of many Winnipeggers of a uni-rail or a rapid transit system went down the drain. A million and a half dollars later, that study had to be shelved because of this government reneging on its promises.

I am going to quote from a document dated June 17, 1974. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has just entered the Chamber. His eyes lit up because he recognized that date. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was speaking in the great city of Toronto. What I have in my hand is a copy of the very paper that the Prime Minister held in his hand on June 17, 1974, in Toronto. Your Honour will recall that the election was on July 8. We were only a couple of weeks from polling day. I will read only the main points of what the Prime Minister said. I quote:

[Mr. Whiteway.]

The Liberal government will—

Notice the word "will", not maybe, hopefully, or "we promise." He did not say the Government of Canada, the government of the nation, but the Liberal government. That did not commit the opposition or the hoped-for Stanfield government. He said:

The Liberal government will pay 100 per cent of the cost of new commuter vehicles manufactured in Canada, . . .

The Liberal government will pay 25 per cent of the capital cost of all vehicles purchased each year for public transit within Canadian cities and which are manufactured in Canada.

Financial support will be made available to encourage Canadian design . . .

For Canada's smaller municipalities, the Liberal government will offer assistance . . .

Canadian industry will be encouraged to develop "off the shelf" standardized systems . . .

The Liberal government will encourage urban transit systems innovations, . . .

The Liberal government is committed—

I looked up the word "committed" because I wanted to know exactly what the Prime Minister was getting at. I looked it up in both the Oxford and Webster dictionaries. I certainly did not want to be biased in any definition I might find. Forgive me, Mr. Speaker, but I have a cold. Otherwise I would be much more adamant in what I am saying today.

Mr. Blais: More eloquent, too.

Mr. Whiteway: The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has just entered the chamber. He speaks well in both official languages, but says nothing in either. I am glad he has come into the chamber to be refreshed with regard to these Liberal government pledges and promises of June 17, 1974. I was talking about the word "committed". It means entrust. The Prime Minister was saying that if the Canadian people would elect a Liberal government, that government would entrust. That is a very interesting word for this government.

The Liberal government is committed to removing the 12 per cent sales tax—

That was four years ago.

The Liberal government will offer the best use of existing railway rights of way and track in urban and suburban areas for new commuter and urban transit lines—

It was that which precipitated the south-west transit study in Winnipeg. On February 16, in Toronto, that was scrapped after a cost of $1.5 million. What is a million and a half dollars to this government which this year is spending $10 billion it does not have?

The Liberal government will rapidly implement the Railway Relocation Act, to ensure that railway relocation in cities also contributes to the right kinds of city growth.

I am not saying the only reason the people in Toronto voted Liberal was because of that statement of the Prime Minister, but it certainly gave them something to hope for, a vision, a dream, a quality of life, that they would no longer have to ride in automobiles along crowded streets during rush hour.

It was promised that the Union Station would be upgraded. There would no longer be the mass confusion that exists in Union Station. In large part the hopes of Torontonians were placed in this government because of those promises made on June 17, 1974. This government was re-elected. I do not know exactly how many members it has from metro-Toronto, but I expect the number would be around 18 or 19. Two years passed. Then came the black day for Toronto, indeed for all urban centres in this country which had placed hope and trust in this government as far as urban transportation is concerned.

On February 16, 1977, at eleven o'clock in the morning, the then minister of finance, Mr. Macdonald, made an announcement. The headline in the Globe and Mail for that date read "Promised in 1974, $290 Million Transit Plan Dead". It was finished. Two years before that the cities and municipalities were told that the government had a scheme, that they could count on the government. Two years later, when half the cities across this country had proceeded with plans, they were told that the government was withdrawing, the game was over. First they were in, then were out; now they don't know. This is the kind of government we have.

Here it is May 10, 1978, and we have not heard a peep, not even a squeak, about urban transportation. I expect the game plan is to wait until the writ is issued. Then they will take this sheet I have been reading from, resurrect these policies, and reprint it word for word. Well, it will not work. Canadians will not buy it. They do not trust the government.

I have other articles here. This is from the Globe and Mail of March 3, 1977: "The Liberals Might Break Ranks Over Transit Grants". The subheading reads: "Broken Election Promise Upsets two MPs." There was a great stir among the backbenchers of the Liberal party at that time. The members from Toronto were not going to stand for what was happening. They were elected on this promise and they were determined to stand up and be counted. There was a revolution, and one of the leaders was the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette). We understood that all the Toronto members were joining. The ranks of the dissidents were growing daily to swell the strength of the revolution and oblige the government to make good the promise it gave in 1974. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that the revolution was stamped out. It failed.

I want to go over the list of those revolutionaries and name them by their constituencies. There was the Minister of State for Small Business, the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott). He failed. There was the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni). The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) failed. The hon. member for York East failed. The revolution he started was stamped out. The Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) failed. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) failed. The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) failed. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) failed. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services, the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) failed. The hon. member for Scarborough-East (Mr. O'Connell) failed. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) failed. I remember him.

I raised this very matter only a couple of days after this bitter blow to the urban centres of this country and I remember the hon. member for Halton getting to his feet to speak—he, certainly, did not intend to allow this promise made in June, 1974 to be forgotten. He failed as well.

The Secretary of State from St. Paul's (Mr. Roberts) failed. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, from Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) failed. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) failed. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) failed. I want to get all this on the record because those are the ridings which returned members of parliament who supported the Liberal government which on June 17, 1974, promised through its leader to provide a mass rapid transit system to meet the needs of the urban centres of Canada, in particular, Toronto. Yet today we are asked to debate a bill which has to do with the recapitalization of the CNR involving the transfer of millions of dollars from debt to equity. The government expects the opposition to agree to this notwithstanding the fact that the promise made in the election campaign of 1974 has been so flagrantly broken.

Bearing in mind the dearth of information which has been given to parliament on this subject, I think it is an act of responsibility on the part of my hon. friend from Lisgar to move that the bill be given a six-month hoist. It is idle for the government to expect us to pass this bill in the absence of proper information on the subject. Moreover, as my hon. friend has stated, the CNR will probably make a profit this year in any event. I oppose the measure for these reasons, but mainly because I, for one, along with most of the people who live in this country, cannot trust the government to do what it pledges it will do for the people.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am glad to join with other members on this side of the House in trying to give this bill a six-month hoist, and I hope that if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can summon up his nerve tomorrow we can start the campaign to give the government a 20-year hoist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I never thought a couple of weeks ago that we would still be in the chamber talking. I thought we would be into the election now and that the people of Canada would be given a chance to decide whether this shambles opposite should continue or whether it should be brought to an end. But we are still here. Hopefully, tomorrow we shall be off. So I am assuming, now, I am speaking on the last day of this parliament. I wish all members opposite Godspeed and I shall miss them here in the next parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: We shall miss you!

Mr. Crosbie: The bill should have a six-month hoist and the government should have a 20-year hoist. My hon. friend from Selkirk said the government had made some commitment in 1974 in Toronto. I say the government itself should be committed. That would put an end to it all. Hon. gentlemen opposite should be arrested on a charge of impaired governing. There should be an amendment to the Criminal Code to provide for impaired governing. Why should we pick on impaired drivers alone? Hon. gentlemen opposite should all be in the hoosegow.

I am glad to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is taking his seat. I spoke in the adjournment debate on May 2. At that time I expressed my opinion on the action of the Minister of Transport and delivered a heartfelt wish that his 29-month tenure as Minister of Transport would soon be concluded. However, despite my words of warning, the hon. gentleman is still there, hanging on. I am glad he is here this afternoon. I do not want to repeat what I said on May 2. I was talking then about the action which was needed to repair the damage done to the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland by the action of the CN and government, or by their lack of action, in diverting most of the freight and express from Newfoundland on to the trans-Canada highway. The highway itself is a rather inferior, narrow highway, not up to mainland standards. As I said the other night, the slogan in 1965 was "We'll finish the drive in '65, thanks to Mr. Pearson." That had a certain right sound to it.

This year the Minister of Transport has acted in a somewhat unfriendly fashion. He said he was only prepared to assist Newfoundland in improving and renovating the trans-Canada highway to the extent of 50 per cent of the cost. He brutalized the Newfoundland government into finally surrendering and accepting his offer—it was 50 per cent or nothing, and our government certainly cannot afford to spend $250 million on the trans-Canada highway in the next ten years out of its own coffers. So they had to accept this 50 per cent offer. The new slogan in Newfoundland is, "We'll drive at risk and with a bang until we're rid of Otto Lang." That time is coming. If the Prime Minister does his duty as a patriot and as a citizen of Canada he will call an election tomorrow and we shall terminate this whole business. Members opposite who want a copy of my remarks concerning the trans-Canada highway can just notify my office and we will send a copy to any member who missed my speech on that occasion.

• (1642)

Mr. Lang: Do they come autographed?

Mr. Crosbie: They can be autographed if necessary. Now, Mr. Speaker, to come back to transportation—

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Can you write, John?

Mr. Crosbie: That is the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick there who signs all his mail with an X. I must say it much faster if you just put the old X there, and you do not have to sign your name.

To come back to transportation, Mr. Speaker, and this bill which deals with the CNR which is in all facets of transportation—and therefore we can be in all facets of transportation in discussing this—there was a commission appointed in March of 1977 to consider the state of transportation facilities in Newfoundland, the Sullivan commission, chaired by Dr. Art Sullivan, and an interim report is to be made by that commission by the end of May to the minister. What has happened to the commission is that Mr. Esau Thoms, from Freshwater in my district, Mr. Speaker, who was a member of the commission, has become seriously ill, which is sad news to all those people in Newfoundland who know him.

He has been a railway union leader for many years and has done a lot of work for the federal government on commissions and groups like that studying transportation questions. Esau has become seriously ill. The commission is putting in an interim report based on the recommendations that he had agreed to up to the time he became ill. They are naturally hoping that he will be back with them to complete the report, but the final report will not be in for some six or eight months because of it. Now, when the commission was appointed it was hoped that it would conclude its report by the end of '77. That has not been possible, so in speaking today, Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to express my hope that Mr. Thoms' health will improve and to let him know that we are thinking of him and that many people in Newfoundland are thinking of him and hoping that he is going to recover and continue his valuable contribution to our province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was a royal commission on transportation in Newfoundland in 1962, and it must have been a royal commission that had never heard of the phrase "user pay" that became the motto of the present Minister of Transport.

An hon. Member: An Otto motto.

Mr. Crosbie: It became the motto of Otto. It's going to become the political death of Otto also.

There was an article in the Newfoundland Telegram on March 5, 1977. There is a cartoon in it about government taking over rail service, and somebody's got marked here, "It's too bad Newfoundland is not a part of Canada". Mr. Speaker, I come from the only province of Canada that has no railway passenger service. It was assassinated by the Liberal government in 1967 with the connivance of the then Liberal premier, Mr. Smallwood. He was an accessory before the fact and an accessory after the fact to the killing and the assassination of the railway passenger service in Newfoundland, and therefore he bears a lot of guilt particularly, Mr. Speaker, because in return he got an inferior trans-Canada highway that is less than the quality of the highway in every other province of Canada and which now in 1978 is a fearsome sight indeed as you drive along that highway because of what has happened with the traffic it has had to bear in the last ten years.

This commission was the MacPherson commission of 1962 appointed by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert and his government. They did their study about ten years after we entered confederation, and they said, and I quote:

> The situation in Newfoundland is a special case distinct from the rest of Canada.

That was a finding of this commission, and our case is distinct from the rest of Canada. They went on to say, and I quote again:

> The situation in Newfoundland is such that it may prove necessary in the short run to eliminate competition, to favour by subsidization or special treatment one mode (of transport) against another . . . and to do other things that would be totally unacceptable in other parts of Canada . . .

The Liberal government certainly adopted part of that quotation because they have done things that would be totally unacceptable in other parts of Canada. They did away with our rail passenger service, Mr. Speaker. That is one of the things they did, so they did not carry out that recommendation, but they decided to do things that would not be acceptable in any other part of Canada, and we are not taking it lying down, Mr. Speaker. Another thing that they did and the minister did—and this minister is responsible—this Minister of Transport was the minister on July 16, 1976, when an order in council was passed here at Ottawa removing the CN bus service which had replaced the railway passenger service, removing the CN bus passenger service from the jurisdiction of the Newfoundland Public Utilities Commission which had regulated their affairs and services and putting them under the Canadian Transport Commission.

The Canadian Transport Commission, the federal body, since July of 1976 has been in charge of rates and jurisdiction over the CN bus service. Mr. Speaker, that was done without consultation with the Newfoundland government. It was an abysmal example of barbaric federalism, of Kung-Fu federalism. It was a barbaric act of arrogance here at Ottawa just to do that without consultation with the province. And what has been the result? The CN bus service has been removed from the Public Utilities Commission of Newfoundland, and it has been left by the Canadian Transport Commission to do what it wishes. The first thing that happened, Mr. Speaker, was that they got an 8 per cent increase immediately, and then, Mr. Speaker, last year the CN bus—yes, 1977—the CN bus system decided that they had to have another increase of 15 per cent in bus fares down in Newfoundland. So they had gotten 8 per cent in March of 1977. All right, Mr. Speaker, that is an 8 per cent increase in March, 1977, for the CN bus system. Then they applied in August to the Canadian Transport Commission for another 15 per cent hike in their rates in what they charged consumers in Newfoundland, and they wanted that on October 1.

Mr. Speaker, do you know that the commission came to Newfoundland to have a hearing, I believe, in November of 1977? October or November. The commission said that they had to give them the 15 per cent increase, that they didn't have the power to stop them, although they hadn't concluded their hearing. They hadn't made a decision. The commission said that they were going to allow the CN bus system to have another 15 per cent increase in fares, and they would give their decision later. I believe the last hearing was in March. Sorry, the last hearing was held down in Newfoundland in late November, 1977. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is December, January, February, March, April—this is May. It's about six months. December, January, February, March, April—yes, five months, almost six months since they held their hearings and, Mr. Speaker, I checked again today with the Canadian Transport Commission, and there is no decision yet on that application, and the CN for the last five months has imposed these higher fares, the 15 per cent hike, and the Canadian Transport Commission has not brought down a decision. Well, what are we in Newfoundland? Are we to be treated as nothings by the Minister of Transport opposite and his federal agencies here in Ottawa?

Mr. Murta: They just don't care.

Mr. Crosbie: All the CN has to do to get a fare increase is to make the application, and the Canadian Transport Commission says they can do nothing about it, and this commission comes and holds hearings and does not give an answer and does not make a judgment or a decision for five months. I say, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission cannot do better than that, he should put CN bus services back under the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission of Newfoundland where they were not allowed to have increase until the rate hearings were over and the board had made a decision. Since the Minister of Transport took them away from the jurisdiction of Newfoundland in July of 1976 they have had increases in fares of 23 per cent, Mr. Speaker—23 per cent—and they are getting away with murder. They can do what they like.

Either there is something wrong with the Canadian Transport Commission, either they have not got enough personnel, they have too much work, or the committee that deals with these things has got too many hearings. Surely this is not right that the CN can apply and get an increase in their bus fares last October and the committee has the hearings in the fall of 1977 and there is still no announced decision. What is to happen if they decide they should not have had 15 per cent? How are you going to be able to prove who were the bus passengers and decide how much each bus passenger should get back if the board finds they should not have taken that 15 per cent increase?

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is just one example of how we are being treated in Newfoundland by the Canadian Department of Transport and its minister and the Canadian government. We do not like it, and we are not putting up with it. We have heard no one from the other side say anything about it. It is left to us poor people over here in opposition to raise our voices against this high-handed and arbitrary treatment by the Canadian Transport Commission and the CN bus service. They are not strange bedfellows, but they are certainly in bed together if better than this cannot be done.

So I bring that to the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, as some of the things that have been done in Newfoundland. It is totally unacceptable in other parts of Canada, but because it is down in Newfoundland, it is out of sight, out of mind. Only when we, members here, are aggravated or provoked, does anybody up here hear about it, and even then it is difficult to get coverage on the mainland, unless it is under Standing Order 43.

● (1652)

The MacPherson commission of 1962 went on to say the following. It pointed out that no part in Canada had prospered until it had good transportation facilities. It stated:

The history of Canada is replete with examples of massive public spending on transport facilities such as canals, railways and more recently highways and airports . . . There is no question that the economy of Newfoundland cannot develop at a satisfactory pace without more transportation facilities. A highway network of the size necessary is beyond the present (1962) resources of Newfoundland . . . The situation calls for assistance by the federal government and there are enough precedents for such a program.

This is still the situation 16 years later. The MacPherson commission's principles were never implemented. The Minister of Transport is not interested in doing anything in Newfoundland except to decrease his expenditures and costs. He is trying to crush with an iron heel the minister of transport in Newfoundland, and he is threatening the Newfoundland government that if they do not accept 50 per cent for reconstructing the trans-Canada highway, they will get nothing, not a sou. He sweetened it by saying that they would help Newfoundland with the cash flow, if it surrendered, which Newfoundland had to do, that the province would get 75 per cent of the money spent, the following year, a different percentage, and the third year 50 per cent, or in the third year it would decline to 25 per cent. In other words, the Newfoundland government will get 75 per cent now, but over a three year period it will receive a contribution of 50 per cent from the Government of Canada.

The provincial minister of transport has accepted this on the condition that if the Sullivan commission makes a contrary recommendation or recommends that the federal government should give more assistance, the Minister of Transport will agree that the trans-Canada highway can be opened up. Of course, the Minister of Transport wil not be here when the final report comes in. God willing, and the public of Canada willing, we will be over there dealing with that matter fairly and justly next fall.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Some people think that Newfoundland should lose its rail service altogether. We are not losing the rail service. I do not care what any royal commission recommends, there will be a rail service in Newfoundland and it will not be taken away from us. Unless the rail service is totally abandoned in Canada, it will not be abandoned in Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Crosbie: We know what CN points out. CN did not come out before the commission and say we should abandon the rail service. It stated that their total loss on rail express in 1976 amounted to $24 million. Of that amount, CN rail lost $14 million—$7 million was lost on CN express and $2 million on the road cruiser service, the bus service. The total loss was $24 million. I do not blame the CN entirely for what has happened in these areas; I blame the government for it.

I should like to quote now from the Evening Telegram of Wednesday, September 21, 1977, reporting on CN's presentation to the commission. It says:

CN, like many other witnesses before the commission, feels the only possible way the rail service can be improved is by direct federal subsidy for losses.

We know that the minister does not like to hear that. This is a rail service that will not break even, not without a lot of money spent on it first. Mr. Gratwick of the CN told the commission that in Newfoundland we should do the same as is done out west. This sounds like an excellent suggestion, but I do not know that it is as easy as this. He said:

You apply to abandon a railway and then you get a federal subsidy . . . That's what happens.

If that is what happens out west, we want some of the action. We have no objection whatsoever to CN applying, or we can apply, to abandon the railway and that the federal government should then come in and give us a federal subsidy so that the railway can operate the same as it does out west.

The article goes on to read:

He suggested the same argument might not stand up in Newfoundland, but added, "I think it's worth a try."

The CN Railway in Newfoundland was owned by the Newfoundland government before 1949. It was taken over by the Canadian government and is operated by CN. The Canadian government should meet the deficits if deficits are unavoidable, but the Canadian government has not done that. The Canadian government has allowed losses on the Newfoundland railway to be absorded by CN, and CN, in their attempt to lessen their losses, has done everything it can to trash the Newfoundland railway, to let it go down and to put the freight and the cargo on the highway. It does not want more losses. So it is up to the Government of Canada to meet these losses directly.

The article goes on to read:

He said an application can be made for the abandonment of a "branch line",

In Newfoundland, of course, the railway might not be considered a branch line. However, if the government wants to consider it a branch line, it can. That will have to be the solution in Newfoundland.

The railway's share of the freight traffic in Newfoundland declined from 87 per cent in 1971 to 61 per cent in 1976, and it has declined more since then. The number of employees on the railway in Newfoundland has declined considerably, by at least 200, according to the evidence before the Sullivan commission, that is, on the railway part of the operation alone, not including all CN services. In 1974 there were 1,891 employees with CN Rail; in 1976 there were 1,715, that is, 176 less. We do not want this attrition to continue. Once the Sullivan commission has reported, we want the government to confirm that the railway service is continuing. Improvements will be made.

The railway is necessary because heavy freight and cargo should be moved by rail. Also, the railway is found to be a better conserver of energy than having everything hauled by truck or car. There is railway service in every other province of Canada—we want it in Newfoundland. That is what we want the government to say and do if the commission's report comes out before we take over.

A loan of $100 million was made by the government to CNR in 1952 with no interest charge until 1974 after the government was re-elected. Now there is an interest charge of $5.5 million a year on that loan charged to the Newfoundland service of the railway. When we consider what CN is allegedly losing in Newfoundland, let us remember that the Liberal government imposed a further $5.5 million interest burden on the Newfoundland service in 1974. That has been included in those figures.

What else is the minister doing? He is planning to have the Newfoundland railway abandoned. That is what he hopes will result from the Sullivan commission report. He has allowed CN to do everything they want in removing CN employees of CN Marine and other services, moving them to Moncton and other places, moving them out of Newfoundland. I do not know whether the minister has been successful in this as yet, but he wants to remove federal participation in ferry services in Newfoundland. That is spelled ferry, not fairy, the leprechaun.

There was an interesting article in the Globe and Mail of May 12, 1977, which pointed out the various subsidies which were paid to waterborne services in Newfoundland and other areas, but principally in Newfoundland. It stated:

The shortfall of the CN operated Newfoundland coastal service alone was $23.9 million.

I do not know whether the article was supposed to lead everyone to conclude that the coastal service in Newfoundland should be eliminated. We know the coastal service cannot break even, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think even the government wants to eliminate it. It pointed out that the ferry service to Port aux Basques required $44.3 million, while the run to Argentia consumed $4.59 million. "Consumed", Mr. Speaker! You see the weasel wording that is supposed to induce the reader to say to himself, "By God, Newfoundlanders are consuming our money at a rapid rate". The run to Argentia consumed $4.59 million. What is the run from Montreal to Toronto consuming? What is the run from Ottawa to Quebec City, if there is one, consuming? What is the run from Montreal to Halifax consuming? We only hear such weasel words when they are talking about service to Newfoundland.

● (1702)

Is that an argument to do away with the service from the mainland to Newfoundland, to Argentia and Port aux Basques, because it loses money? We know it loses money. The ferry to Prince Edward Island loses money also.

Then they go on to say that the privately operated service from St. Barbe, Newfoundland, to Blanc Sablon Bay received $219,000 last year. The federal government now wants Newfoundland to take that over, Mr. Speaker. It wants to impose and push this burden on the province of Canada which can least afford any additional financial burdens imposed on it. The honourable crowd opposite who do not mind their own deficits in billions, are trying to push a $219,000 deficit, if you go on the vessel ferry from St. Barbe in northern Newfoundland to Blanc Sablon, on to the province. Then they say the ferry from Burnside and St. Brendan's—these are islands—St. Brendan's is an island off the coast of Newfoundland—they want to push $82,000 on to Newfoundland; and Cobbs Arm and Change Islands, $86,000. They want to push that on to Newfoundland. These are all in the district of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Then the minister wants to push on to Newfoundland the cost of the service between Carmanville and Fogo Island, $173,000; and from Greenspond to Badger's Quay, $55,750; and from Portugal Cove to Bell Island, $993,000; and from Middle Bay Islands to St. Patrick's, $209,000. All of these ferry services, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport opposite now wants the Newfoundland government to pick up, assume, and carry that financial burden. What is wrong with the man? Has he any sense of honour or any sense of observing any commitments that this government has got?

Of the several millions of dollars of subsidies that the federal government has been paying out for many years, many of them were instituted because, Mr. Speaker, certain communities were resettled and the coastal boat service no longer went to these other communities. In other words, these services were instituted to assist the federal government which was saving money because the coastal service did not have to go to a lot of other small communities that were being resettled. Now ten years later the Minister of Transport of Canada said to the Newfoundland government, "You have got to take over these ferry services, and you have got to meet their losses". I mean, the man is a Barbarossa. He is a relic from the dark ages. He is Hagar the Hun gone berserk. This is user-pay to the utmost, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian public would have to be flagellating itself to re-elect the likes of them and put them back in power in Ottawa, Mr. Speaker. It would certainly be flagellating Newfoundland and giving us a whipping. The whip will be back on our backs if they are ever returned to office again. Now, Mr. Speaker, those are the certain ferry services the minister wants to force back on Newfoundland.

Then there is another peculiar group of subsidies, $3.6 million paid by the Government of Canada toward the major steamship service between Montreal, St. John's, and Corner Brook. There is a subsidy paid to Clarke Transportation. It has been going on for years. It is for them to provide a service from Montreal to St. John's and Corner Brook. The initial subsidy was $7 a ton. It was intended as interim assistance to Clarke Transportation. That subsidy has now gone to $15.64 a ton for every ton of cargo they move between Montreal, St. John's and Corner Brook during the shipping season. That increase is not enough. Apparently Clarke wants the subsidy increased. They have a 13-year subsidy contract with the government now. It expires in 1986, I am advised. They want the subsidy increased from $15.64 a ton up to $25 a ton, I think it is.

At the old rate of $15.64 it cost the federal government $3.5 million two years ago for that subsidy. Now Clarke wants a much bigger subsidy, because they want to get another ship to put on the Montreal-St. John's run. They want a bigger subsidy and a longer commitment because of that.

I took this matter up with the minister. I am advised that the government does not control the rates charged by Clarke. They are only indirectly controlled. Clarke files its rates, and the Liberal subsidy can be changed, depending on the revenues and profits of the company. The government has access to Clarke's books in the annual subsidy review. This is all done behind the scenes. We have no access to know what they are making or what they are not making.

In the meantime, other shipping lines have started services from the mainland to Newfoundland by sea: Newfoundland Container Lines, Ltd., owned by A. Harvey & Company, from Halifax to St. John's; and Chimo Container Service, owned by Chimo Shipping, Ltd. has inaugurated a service from Montreal to St. John's, using the vessel Sir John Crosbie.

Let me say that Chimo Shipping Ltd. is owned by relatives of mine. I have no interest in it. I mention that because when I took this matter up with the minister in June, 1977, as is some people's wont, the first thing I saw was a story in the St. John's Evening Telegram. It was a statement by the manager of Newfoundland Steamships, the Clarke company in St. John's, one Elmer Edison, indicating that I have ulterior motives. He said that I never spoke before the Crosbies started their own service. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am an independent operator. I never spoke before because I was not a federal member before. Well, I am a federal member now, and I do not care if Chimo Shipping is owned by the Crosbies, the Smiths, the Langs, the Chrétiens, or who owns it. If I think this is not in the public interest, I am going to bring it forward in this House.

No pip-squeak of a Clarke's manager in St. John's is going to frighten me by suggesting that I have some ulterior motive. I say this House is entitled to know what is happening with this subsidy to Clarke. The Chimo Shipping service is operating without a subsidy. The Harvey service is operating without a subsidy. Clarke is getting a subsidy which we know cost $3.6 million in 1976. Are we going to know how the rates are regulated? If there is going to be a continued subsidy of rates why are other companies not entitled to a subsidy? What value is the consumer getting through these rates?

Is Clarke going to get another contract for higher subsidy rates? How are we going to ensure that the consumer gets the benefit, and it is not just a benefit to Clarke? That is what we want to know. How are we going to be assured that it is going to reduce the cost of cargo moving into Newfoundland and moving out? I do not know what has happened with their application to get an increase in subsidies, or what will happen with those services. It is time that there was some information given to this House and to the transport committee of it.

There is another matter I want to mention. I do not want to take too long here because this is our last day, I believe.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: We heard a great yelp of enthusiasm, a great screech and howl from the Liberal caucus this morning. When someone mentioned that there was going to be an election, they all howled no. They are like scared pups, Mr. Speaker. We are hoping the Prime Minister will go ahead anyway. So, this is our last stand in this parliament.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Your last stand.

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: One never knows with the electorate. They are very fickle, but I hope to be back, Mr. Speaker.

I happened to receive a letter. I am sure most members did. It was dated April 25, and it was from the Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association. It brought up questions to do with their pension funds and whether the unfunded liability is going to be met in full. They seem to be quite concerned about it. Before concluding, I just want to point out that I brought that matter up before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, when we had the superintendent of insurance of the Department of Finance before us. I asked the superintendent if they also supervised pension funds, whether he was familiar with the CN pension fund, and whether he was satisfied with it. I am looking for the relevant page. At page 27:12 I asked Mr. Humphrys if he had any reason to be concerned about the soundness of the CN plan. He said:

> No, Mr. Chairman, we believe the plan is being managed and financed in accordance with the requirements of the Pension Benefits Standards Act and we believe adequate provision is being made to cover the liabilities.

Then I asked him, if I sent him a copy of the brief, would he look at it and give me his comments on it. He said that he would.

● (1712)

On May 5 I did write Mr. Humphrys and asked him to examine this submission from the Employees' Pension Association. I asked him to advise me whether, in his opinion, it is being managed and financed properly, and whether adequate provision had been made to cover liabilities; he had said that in committee. I have asked him to deal with the points and fears expressed in this brief from the railway pensioners. Certainly as members of this House we have to concern ourselves and make sure their concerns are needless, we hope, and therefore I have asked Mr. Humphrys to do that and he has said he would. He has already given the opinion that he does not think there is anything to be concerned about and that the liabilities to pensioners can be met.

I want the people who live in St. John's West who are railway pensioners to know that I share their concern, and I am going to pursue this matter for them as they would expect me to do. I am sure other members take the same position in respect of pensioners of the CN with whom they are dealing.

I am going to come to a close because there are other speakers, and I think we want to conclude this today. I won't go into all the other points I could make on transportation in Newfoundland. We are concerned about a replacement for the William Carson which sank a year ago. It was very important to the ferry service of Newfoundland and she has not been replaced as yet.

An hon. Member: Like the Frank Moore; that should be replaced.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the William Carson, not the Broadbent, she has already floundered. I say replace the Carson with the Broadbent. That would be a good idea. He is going to need his bottom scraped before the election is over, Mr. Speaker. There has been no vessel ordered that we know of; the construction of no vessel has been ordered to replace the William Carson. There should be a vessel ordered from a Canadian shipyard, and it should be ordered now because of the time lag, and a vessel should be chartered in the meantime.

We are not satisfied with the ferry service to Argentia, nor are we satisfied with the ferry service generally from the mainland to Newfoundland. There are many complaints and I cannot go into them today, but it is not a satisfactory service for the travelling public. It has very badly affected the tourist trade. Tourists do not like to go through what they have to go through to get to Newfoundland and from it with their cars, when the tourist season comes. Because there are other speakers I will not go into anything else except to say this, Mr. Speaker. This is my last speech in the House, I feel sure—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Perhaps I could finish. This is my last speech in this House on this side. At the next session of the House I hope to speak from the benches opposite. It is my wish and hope that this House will be dissolved tomorrow and we can get on to the business of saving Canada from the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on third reading of Bill C-17 concerning the amortization of $808 million in CN debt. I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), that this bill be given a six-month hoist.

When speaking on second reading of Bill C-17 I expressed a number of the problems that concern people of the constituency of Churchill about the track running from The Pas to Churchill, some 509 miles, and from The Pas to Lynn Lake, another 170 miles. I am only going to deal with that one small segment of the mass problem of the CN. Of course it has the same problem just mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). This problem runs all the way from Cobbs Arm Island in Newfoundland to Pukatawagan in northern Manitoba; the same problem seems to exist everywhere.

The CN's obligation, as far as I am concerned, is to provide service to all areas of Canada. What we have seen over the past five years is service which has now reached the point of desperation in many parts of the Churchill constituency. In that constituency between The Pas and Churchill, the 509 miles of railway, we have observed communities such as Thicket Portage, Pikwitonei, Ilford, Gillam and Churchill without highway access, but with a service provided by the CNR faced with no competitive rates. As a result it has been ripping off the people of these communities. I want to get into that particular aspect a little later in my remarks.

We have just noticed very recently, now that passenger service has been turned over to VIA Rail, that excursion trains going to Churchill this summer will continue to have the same rates that applied last year. This is great for the people who are going to be travelling to Churchill on those excursion trains. We certainly welcome those tourists who come up to see that great sea port of Churchill which is now being underutilized because this government cannot seem to get its act in order, using that port to full capacity in respect of grain shipments.

While these excursion rates are to remain unchanged from last year, the Car-Go-Rail rates which have been in effect for some time will be discontinued. When we talk of Car-Go-Rail rates we refer to the main concern of the CNR being with the Toronto to Winnipeg run. That seems to be its major market area. What does this really mean to communities such as Gillam, Ilford, Pukatawagan, Pikwitonei and Thicket Portage where there is no off-rail transportation whatsoever? These communities must use the rail to transport their vehicles out to a highway system.

On April 29 the CN advised, and I have a copy of that letter, that the Car-Go-Rail rates and services which had been provided by the passenger division for the past number of years would be discontinued. Insofar as the major market areas such as Toronto to Winnipeg served by Car-Go-Rail in the past are concerned, CN will be announcing a new service called "transAuto". I do not know if this has anything to do with the minister because it is spelled "A-u-t-o", but that is probably the only way the minister could get his name into it. The letter suggests that transAuto will be substantially different from Car-Go-Rail in that it will be available as a whole sale service only to household moving companies, car rental companies, and similar organizations. Apparently private individuals wishing to move their vehicles between the points covered will have to go to one of these companies for retail service.

The letter goes on to state that CN recognizes it must continue to provide a retail service to residents of points in northern Manitoba not served by roads, and to meet this need it is publishing new freight rates to cover the movement of private passenger vehicles effective May 1, and I have a copy of this. Between Thompson and Gillam the rate is to be $87 per unit one way, and between Thompson and Churchill it is to be $128 per unit one way. Under the Car-Go-Rail system an individual taking his car out of Churchill or Gillam, and those are the two places referred to here, could buy a ticket, put his car on the train, ride with his car and have his car unloaded, and continue on his way. This really provided a much needed service to those communities that do not have access to highway transportation.

This letter goes on to state:

● (1722)

If a need develops for rates to and from other points not served by highway, they will be provided as required.

I would say that, instead of waiting for the rates to be provided as required, there are still the rates that must be worked out between Ilford and Thompson, Pikwitonei and Thompson, Thicket Portage and Thompson as well as from Pukatawagan to The Pas and Sherridon to The Pas. These people are also in the same situation. They cannot get their vehicles out unless they put them on the railway.

The letter ends up by saying:

Our personnel are being notified immediately of the availability of these rates after 1 May, and we will advise the media in the hope that they will inform the general public.

Well, Mr. Speaker, many of the communities in northern Manitoba do not have daily newspapers. They now have radio stations and television, but an announcement like this would probably not be carried over the particular television program that might be aired in northern Manitoba.

The letter from the CNR was dated April 12. On April 25 a letter was sent to the vice-president of the prairie region. This letter was from Mr. Banman, the minister of transportation in Manitoba. Mr. Banman in his letter pointed out his concern over the withdrawal of Car-Go-Rail service as a result of the transfer of rail passenger service to VIA Rail. Mr. Banman said in part:

I appreciate the fact that CN has introduced alternative arrangements to provide for the essential movement of vehicles between points in northern Manitoba not served by roads. However, we do have several concerns on this issue.

These are the same concerns that I raised in this House under Standing Order 43 as reported at page 5048 of Hansard.

Mr. Banman went on to say:

I note that the charge per vehicle effective May 1 has been set at $87 between Thompson and Gillam, and $128 between Thompson and Churchill. This represents increases of $27 and $59 per vehicle respectively over the charges currently applicable under the Car-Go-Rail plan. These increases appear to be rather excessive. Also, the absence of specific commodity rates to cover shipments between other points could result in the application of extremely high charges under class or express rate structures. There is also a requirement for maintaining rates between some northern communities served by road as a result of circuitous routes as well as long distances through desolate and isolated terrain.

In view of the foregoing, I would respectfully ask that Items 11650 and 11880 of tariff CNR W.1150 be reinstated as soon as possible. In addition, as it will be some time before VIA absorbs local passenger services, I would also ask for your consideration in extending the Car-Go-Rail plan at least until such time the transfer is made.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

What has happened here is that the CN in their expertise and before VIA Rail had actually taken over was going to implement these particular changes using the transAuto rates and the new rates set up by VIA Rail thereby doing away with the Car-Go-Rail system.

On May 3 Mr. Banman received a letter from the CNR prairie region manager, a copy of which I have here. It says:

I would like to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 25 April, concerning the withdrawal of Gar-Go-Rail services.

Due to some problems experienced in the establishment of our proposed transAuto service, Car-Go-Rail service on our main line routes has been extended to 31 May.

Because of my intervention and the intervention of the minister of transport from Manitoba, the CN is now saying that the rates will not be in effect on May 1, but will be extended to May 31.

He goes on to say:

It is anticipated that on 1 June VIA will assume full responsibility for rail passenger operations including those to northern Manitoba.

I would like to point out here that when people talk about a re-amortization of the CNR's $8.8 million debt, what they are really asking for is that the CN not forget that they have to provide a service. It is their mandate to provide service to areas that have no other means of transportation. I can assure you if there were other means of transportation out of those particular communities I probably would not get a single complaint because, after complaining for years about the poor service the CNR has supplied to those communities, the people have given up in total frustration.

The letter from the CNR goes on:

In response to your request that we extend the Car-Go-Rail plan until such time as the transfer is made, I have arranged for the freight rates on private passenger automobiles between Thompson, Gillam and Churchill to be reduced to the existing Car-Go-Rail level for the month of May, and enclose a copy of CNR Limited Freight Tariff W.4190 which publishes these rates. I should point out that these rates do not require the purchase of a passenger ticket, as was the case under Car-Go-Rail.

Regarding your comments on the rate levels that will take effect on 1 June, I would like to point out that the Car-Go-Rail charges were in effect for many years without increase and were, of course, an integral part of a rail passenger service package. These rates were very substantially below the costs of a freight operation.

I can appreciate that the Car-Go-Rail system was used right across Canada and that the major part of it was between Toronto and Winnipeg, but there are still the northern communities—and I am sure there are some in other provinces—that have no off-highway transportation. The people must use CNR to transport their vehicles when they go out on their annual leave. It is going to be a costly operation when these rates take effect.

As I specified before, the rate from Gillam to Thompson is going up $27, and the rate from Churchill to Thompson is going up $59. That places a real hardship on the people who want to take their families out for a vacation and who want to move their private vehicles. I am sure a lot of people who do travel out of these particular communities would be very happy to sit down with the officials and discuss this particular aspect because it certainly is a burden on them, and they have no other means of transportation. The CNR is taking advantage of these people, and I would like to see a system set up where the cargo rail rate would still remain in place.

What irritates the people living in these isolated communities is that they must use this particular means of transporting their vehicles out, and yet VIA Rail or CNR says they are going to keep excursion rates for tourists coming into the north the same as last year, but they are going to increase the rate to move a private vehicle when you want to go out on holidays. VIA Rail has given absolutely no consideration to the people living in the north who have to use the facilities. They are the ones who have to bear the burden, but the tourists get the break.

To show the shortsightedness of the CNR, in the same letter in the last paragraph they gave an example to illustrate the number of vehicles that might be moved from any particular community. Of all places the example was Cranberry Portage and the number of vehicles transported from there to Lynn Lake. Everyone living up in that country knows that there is a road from Cranberry Portage to Lynn Lake and there is no need to move a vehicle by railway between those two communities. They say that they cannot justify running a service between Cranberry Portage and Lynn Lake for the simple reason there were only two vehicles moved in the year 1977. That just goes to show that people who live in communities with road access will not use that system. I am looking at the people who must use that system, and who have no other alternative.

● (1732)

Another colleague of mine wants to wrap up this debate. But I would just like to say that we have experienced exactly what the CNR is attempting to do by using the transAuto system to change the rates. We are moving private vehicles out of the north where people have no alternative. That is the same sort of thing the CNR tried to do by eliminating the station agents from those particular communities, Thicket Portage, Pikwitonei, Ilford, Gillam and Sherridon. The CNR arbitrarily made a decision they would move the station agents out of those particular communities. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, the people who live in those isolated communities must depend on the CNR for their freight, mail, express, groceries, and they were heard from. They went to the CNR and demanded that the railway come into those communities just so that the officials who make those decisions could actually see what happens in a small isolated community and how dependent they are on the railway, and how they give them no consideration whatsoever.

The railway cars would arrive with groceries and the railway employees would heave them out of the train. They would not even bother to set them off carefully. There were complaints of eggs and milk being spilled all over the platform. These were items needed by families. Those people in these communities were successful in getting the CNR to withdraw that decision to close those particular stations and remove the station agents. Once the communities made their representations the CNR saw just how essential those services were to the communities.

This is what I would like to see, and I would challenge those particular communities now. I will certainly give them my support to take the CNR to task and have those rates remain the same as they are now under the Car-Go-Rail system.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I promise that I will finish in good time to have the vote and to have our supper.

I might say that I am happy to speak on this amendment on final reading of Bill C-17. I would like to put on the record some of the fears and thoughts I have as a western Canadian, particularly in regard to the constituency which I represent which is served almost wholly by the Canadian National Railways.

In the last few years in the eastern prairies it would appear that the CNR has acted as if it wanted to abandon most of its railway lines and to give up the job of transporting goods and providing services for the rural communities. First of all we had the Servo centres which were brought in by order of the CTC. This was to phase out the station agents. Gradually these agents were phased out, but when they did that they also phased out the person who was the Canadian National's representative in the community to whom businessmen could turn to get their shipments of goods. These people vanished. In their place they put a Servo centre with a long distance connection to Winnipeg.

Unfortunately, they cannot even man the Servo centres all the time. Customers complain that when they would phone there was no answer. I have found out through railway management that there are so few people around that they cannot always man the telephones in the Servo centres. It happens that business that might belong to the CNR goes elsewhere. It is impossible for shippers to get much satisfaction from the Servo centre by telephone.

The CNR Express have gradually reduced their service. I understand from reading about the situation in Saskatchewan that CN Express have suddenly pulled out from there almost overnight. Shipment of small parcels by railway has all but vanished. This may well be by design, and it is perhaps the result of changing attitudes and changing circumstances. In my opinion, most of us feel that the railways want to reduce their traditional role of carrying heavy bulk cargoes such as grain, or at least to reduce the number of branch lines and to restrict the railways to a few major lines in western Canada running through the country so that grain handling will be carried on by large unit handling elevators located at relatively few points on the prairies. Certainly the dispute carried on now concerning the hours of work whereby the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) wants to declare the country elevator managers covered by the 48-hour week will go a long way to speed up the consolidation of the grain handling system.

The railways may well be expecting too much. Maybe farmers will be driven to use trucks, by changes in the railway system, and if farmers must haul their grain 100 miles or so, it is not all that difficult to haul it considerably farther. Everyone has stated that for the western part of the country the railway is far superior to the highway for the hauling of grain. But in fact there are considerable doubts about this and the mere fact that the steel on steel requires much less energy than the rubber on tarmack is not the only factor in the movement of grain.

My observation is that this bill will hasten the relative reduction of importance of railways in the west with rises in the trucking industry, and particularly for individual farmers who will use their own trucks. Indeed, it has now become evident that individual farms of even a quite small size will have to own their own trucks in order to facilitate the movement of their goods throughout western Canada.

When one observes on the highway the various trucks hauling goods belonging to large chain stores such as Safeways or the Federated Cooperatives or implement companies, indeed it is becoming obvious that the necessity for moving goods in western Canada largely must be met by the companies' own trucks. Franchise trucking firms seem to have difficulty delivering goods as to time and price. It is particularly difficult for small firms, especially retail firms, to have their shipments made efficiently and at a reasonable cost. Indeed, it seems as if many small retail outlets on the prairies will have to pick up their own freight in the larger centres and transport it to their retail stores with their own trucks and vehicles.

The Canadian National Railways in this bill are obviously withdrawing from being a major factor in the transportation system of the west except for some trunk lines. There are a number of reasons for this, some of which are inherent and structural. Trucks can deliver goods cheaply and with a much better time schedule in certain ways.

But there are many other reasons why the CN Railways, at least in my area, are finding their role reduced. Railways are by nature monopolies. To have only the railway to ship is not an unmixed blessing. Trucking lends itself to individuals, to small units of operation whereby the entrepreneurial spirit can certainly thrive much more than in the rigidity of a large organization such as the CNR. Wage structures are more variable and efficiencies are perhaps easier to come by.

In the matter of management the CNR has obviously one serious fault so far as western Canada is concerned. It is the fact that the management is concentrated in Montreal, and that the concentration in Quebec of management has a serious and detrimental effect on the efficiency of the railways in western Canada. Perhaps it is partly because of geographical, cultural, and linguistic difference. But to have the management so closely controlled in the city of Montreal where railways in the east must compete mostly with water, and when in fact the largest operation of railway activity is concentrated in western Canada, means that management is at a serious disadvantage in dealing with the prairies. Certainly the attitude of the president and management in Montreal, and their actions so far as they affect the west, indicate they have little concept of what is the actual fact there, otherwise they would be doing things differently.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

I understand that in years gone by the western region was semi-autonomous and while the final authority rested in Montreal for practical purposes, in the day to day running of the rail line it rested fairly firmly in Winnipeg. There are great disadvantages to the present situation, in that it is much better to manage with on-the-spot knowledge compared to the alternative of a thousand miles away with people who are not familiar with the circumstances in western Canada.

● (1742)

Discussion with many railway employees, and particularly with middle and senior management, although they were reluctant to say much due to their fear of retaliation and job discrimination, indicates that many railway employees in the west are suspicious and uncertain and, in fact, at times are openly resentful of the policies foisted on them by a management based in Montreal making decisions. There was at one time a considerable body of loyalty, trust, and pride in the work force, but this seems to have gone.

Resentment against management is rife, and indeed many railway workers are looking for means only of finishing out their careers and obtaining other security before moving. Employee morale has probably never been lower. Many of the decisions made affecting the running of the railways make little sense. Sometimes these decisions appear only to be made for the sake of doing something. In any case, railways are greatly cutting themselves off from the communities they serve.

In this legislation, the railway is in fact being forgiven a debt of $800 million. It will make its financial appearance considerably better and it would seem to have a much better chance of overruling its main competition, the Canadian Pacific Railway on one hand and, on the other hand, moving into the trucking field in order to squeeze out independents and the myriad of small trucking concerns across this land.

We hear much of corporate power from the boardrooms. There is no more dangerous concentration of corporate power than in the boardrooms of the large Crown corporations. Air Canada is assiduously trying, through every means possible, to wipe out its competitors. CNR management seem intent on wiping out their competitors and also a substantial portion of the trucking industry.

These are some of the main fears that I have about this bill. Does the CNR intend to reduce its railroading in the west? Does it intend to reduce its services to farmers in the grain handling industry which, after all, is the main reason for railroads in the west? Does it intend to move into the trucking field and establish a trucking monopoly in that field, and then attempt to have restrictive legislation passed so that the commercial life in the trucking field will be dominated by one large Crown corporation?

The movement of the CNR into the field for trucking means that it is attempting to get rid of one of its major competitors. In the riding I represent, the CNR has bought out one of the more profitable truck lines, the Swan River-The Pas Transfer. This gives a partial monopoly on freight transportation to the CNR and it is an object of some concern to many in the area. Transportation is certainly an area where it is difficult to have competition, but I think it is essentially wrong that the railway can smother its competition by buying out a trucking firm. Certainly it can afford to pay any price to obtain that trucking firm. There are no constraints so far as expenditures are concerned because, in the final analysis, the CNR has the backing of the treasury behind it.

Wherever possible we should preserve as many companies in the field as practical. That is why I certainly am concerned about the excursions of the CNR, taking over trucking firms and establishing what is a virtual monopoly in some areas. This has already occurred in the area I represent. It has not had a good response.

This bill allows CN to get out of railway passenger service, giving it to VIA Rail. We do know of course that rail passenger services in Canada as in all western countries, with the advent of the automobile have been much less popular, and have been a losing proposition so far as money is concerned. But all this bill does with the formation of VIA Rail is to transfer the deficit of rail passenger service on to VIA Rail. There is no evidence whatsoever that VIA Rail will be any more viable than under the present rail structure. As VIA Rail will still be using trains and passenger cars, the government will still have to meet VIA Rail's deficit.

One of the advantages of Bill C-17 is that it will eliminate the necessity of the federal treasury meeting the deficits of the CNR that rise from time to time. But the government can still guarantee CNR's loans from the private market. Like the Export Development Corporation's loans, all this does is that it allows the government to go on the note at the bank as a co-signer without the items actually appearing as a debit on the government's ledger. This is a deception of the worst order. Actually, borrowings that must be guaranteed by the federal treasury, either by the Export Development Corporation, the CNR, or other Crown corporations, should so appear on the ledger of the government.

I would like to speak briefly on the Churchill export movement and the necessity of the railways to upgrade the Churchill line to carry more grain. It represents Manitoba's alternate card that it can play, as well as other parts of the prairies, in attempting to get a better deal from eastern grain handling companies and installations. Depending on the circumstances, grain shipped through Thunder Bay averages about 25 cents a bushel less than shipped through the west coast. That is, it costs that much more.

Through a rather ingenious method of redistribution, shippers on the western half of the prairies pay some of this extra money received to shippers in the eastern half of the prairies. I think it is fair to say that the relative importance of western movements of grain will increase while the eastern movement through Thunder Bay will decrease in the foreseeable future. Indeed, if the laws of the markets prevail and if the true shipping costs were reflected, a much larger proportion of grain would go out through west coast ports and the dividing line would be considerably east of what it is now. But tradition, the earlier development of the Thunder Bay route and greater structures to handle grain on this traditional route have caused a reduced volume of west coast shipping that might have been expected to have happened. To the northeastern prairies and parkland regions of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, Churchill offers an alternative to prevent exorbitant tariff charges by eastern interests, and we have an example of this with the rise in tolls in the St. Lawrence Seaway. While the rise of tolls may be justified, still it has seriously compromised the income of western farmers.

Churchill lies on the ocean and, with a grain haul of 500 odd miles, it is as close as Thunder Bay is to the prairie grain region. It has been artificially constrained by government action and by port interests in Montreal and other eastern ports. This is a political fact of life and it is time that these constraints were removed. Greater use should be made of Churchill and, while it may have certain disadvantages, it has certain inherently great advantages. One is that with the weather being cold, grain can be stored indefinitely.

In conclusion, the port of Churchill is a logical grain shipping point for the future. A highway will eventually be built into Churchill. It will provide much of western Canada with an ocean port of a distance less than 500 miles away. If the CNR does not want to haul grain into Churchill, the trucks will.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RIGHT OF ISRAEL TO PEACE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday I moved a motion to express the profound support which exists in this House for the State of Israel. Unfortunately, the government saw fit not to allow the motion to be presented.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: I rise again today because I believe members of this House want, and deserve, the opportunity to express the support which I believe exists on both sides. I therefore hope the government House leader will not deny unanimous consent. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the House reaffirms the right of the State of Israel to exist in peace with its neighbours, and further reaffirms the right of Israel and its neighbours to secure and recognized borders in accordance with Security Council Resolution 242 and consistent with the need of all the peoples of the Middle East for a just and lasting peace.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): We accept this motion, Mr. Speaker. It is acceptable because of the amendments suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson).

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be put only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TIMING OF NEXT GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, for different, but equally cogent reasons I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) will rise to indicate the support of the government for the following motion. Considering that the first constitutional responsibility of the Prime Minister in our system of government is to the House of Commons duly elected by the people of Canada, and considering that the Prime Minister has indicated that he will announce whether or not there will be a general election for this summer by the end of this week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Prime Minister to meet his responsibility by announcing his decision on this fundamentally important matter by making a statement today in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES TO DETERMINE ROLE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the startling statements made recently by Senator Marchand at the Richelieu Club of the Outaouais, namely that he no longer has any confidence in the Canadian constitution which the authorities have constantly and gleefully violated, witness the various federal interventions in exclusively provincial areas, especially since 1927 with old age security pensions, family allowances and so on after having taken over the best provincial taxation fields.

Considering that the British North America Act never did create a country and that 90 per cent of French Canadians were convinced of the fact since we have always considered the act as a royal order of Her Majesty to her colony, Canada, and finally that the senator—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a motion, would he introduce it now?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker—and finally that the senator states that he agrees 98 per cent with the "independentist" idea.

S.O. 43

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House instruct that a special debate be held as soon as possible to stir genuine interest among Canadians in the organization of a provincial meeting to draw up a constitution specifying the duties of the federal government in order to create the harmony which we advocate.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF FERTILIZER IN MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the fact that many fertilizer dealers in Manitoba are out of fertilizer, or very nearly so, because of the almost total lack of railway cars to carry this product from its source to the dealer. If this situation continues, it could spell disaster not only for the dealers but for their farmer customers. The supply of fertilizer in Manitoba for the critical spring period can only be described as desperate. Accordingly, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Stewart):

● (1412)

That the Minister of Transport use all the power and persuasion he can muster to ensure that by this weekend a sufficient number of railway cars will be directed to the hauling of fertilizer, and that these cars will continue hauling fertilizer for the balance of the spring seeding period.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of this motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPBUILDING

POSITION TAKEN BY CANADIAN NEGOTIATORS AT GATT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that it has been reported that the Canadian GATT negotiators in Geneva have been instructed to downplay the shipbuilding industry in Canada, in other words, to sacrifice this important industry to obtain trading concessions from other countries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

That the government issue immediate instructions to its negotiators to countermand any such instructions so that the 45,000 direct and related jobs which depend on the shipbuilding industry will not be jeopardized.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR IMMEDIATE GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my motion is under Standing Order 43: it is a variation of the motion already proposed by my leader. I move:

That this House instructs the Prime Minister to ask the Governor General of Canada forthwith for a dissolution for the purpose of an election at the earliest possible moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

ENTRY INTO CANADA OF UNDESIRABLE PERSONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning recently revealed information that a self-admitted Rhodesian terrorist, John Conradie, known as "Bomber John", is in Canada on a ministerial permit. In his recent statement to the press, he said, among other things, "We should have blown up one or two of the department stores . . . I thought we should have tried to destroy as much property as possible". I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration make public all details of the case, specifically including whether the government will cancel Mr. Conradie's work permit and expel him, all reasons justifying the presence of this man in Canada and, finally, whether the government plans stricter admission requirements to prohibit entry of such persons as John Conradie, General Quang and other such undesirables.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED DIVERSION OF KOOTENAY RIVER, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) has on two occasions publicly rejected the proposal of a Kootenay River diversion under the Columbia River Treaty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That the minister use his heavy influence in the cabinet to obtain the support of the cabinet for rejecting the B.C. Hydro proposal of a Kootenay River diversion and that this position be transmitted forthwith to the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ELECTIONS

PRIME MINISTER'S INTENTIONS ON TIMING OF ELECTION—ECONOMIC MEASURES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister, who indicated last week that he would announce his decision on an election by the end of this week. I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell this House of Commons whether he proposes to ask the Governor General to dissolve parliament this week and, if he does not, can he tell us when he will announce significant, new economic measures to deal with the serious economic problems facing the country?

● (1417)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been apparent in the House that we are all concerned with the issues with which the Canadian people are concerned, and they want solutions to these problems at this time. The question arises as to whether these issues can best be dealt with during a general election, or by continuing the work in the House. I have reached the conclusion, because, I must say, of the co-operation of hon. members opposite and their anxiety to get on with the work, that we should stay in this House and deal with these issues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I am pleased to have that question resolved, Mr. Speaker. I would remind the Prime Minister that he has only a little more than a year to go before he has to face that decision. I think the people of Canada would have preferred to have an election. But if the Prime Minister is serious about having the House of Commons deal with important legislation, I wonder if he will tell us when he intends to introduce a new package of economic messures, and particularly when he intends to put before the House of Commons the government's proposed changes to the Bank Act.

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad the Leader of the Opposition is on the same wavelength as I am when he is talking about another year of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Your last hurrah.

An hon. Member: You're on a short-circuit.

Mr. Trudeau: Having lived through a spate of speculation last fall and another one this spring, I hope we will not hear any more about elections in the way of speculation until some time around March or April of next year. In the meantime, the Leader of the Opposition is quite justified in wanting to see the House get on with certain measures. I can assure him that our purpose in staying here is to proceed with various measures. I do not take it that the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting another budget, but other types of economic measures. I can assure him that they will be forthcoming and we will expect co-operation from both sides of the House. I am sure that both sides of the House are particularly pleased with the fact that the Canadian dollar seems to be strengthening a bit—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —and, as the minister said the other day, that we are setting new records in export trade. I would not expect the dollar to be the subject of speculation. I am very happy to see that in the last few days we have not had any questions on this subject from the opposite side.

Mr. Clark: I am pleased to have the general assurance that there will be some specific legislation brought before the House of Commons. I wonder if the Prime Minister would bring himself to be a little more specific and indicate when we will have the Bank Act before the House, when we will have the legislation he has promised to aid small business in the country, and when we can expect to have before the House of Commons in bill form other legislation which the government proposes to deal with the very serious economic problems the country is facing.

Mr. Trudeau: I appreciate the hon. member's concern. On the order paper now there are various measures which we hope the House will be dealing with, and I can assure him we will be giving first reading to other measures next week and in the weeks to come.

DATE OF BY-ELECTIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has ended the speculation with respect to a general election, but there remains in the country the problem of a large number of Canadians, about 1,300,000, who are unrepresented in this parliament because there are 15 vacancies for various reasons. Given the situation with respect to that lack of representation, is the Prime Minister in a position today to announce when the by-elections will be held to fill the balance of seats for which by-election dates have not been announced? If he is not in a position to do it today, will he be able to do it tomorrow?

● (1422)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate, as the hon. member does, that members from both sides of the House, but I think in greater number from the Tory side, have indicated that they will not be running again and have either gone on to other things or will be going on to other things.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is irrelevant.

Mr. Trudeau: What is your problem, David?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): You.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Egmont is anxious to get on this gravy train, as I think he calls it. We will be taking names as soon as we adjourn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting commentary on the Prime Minister's view on representation in this House to have him make jokes about this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Shameful arrogance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I wonder if he is prepared to answer another question which has caused concern among some people who have declared themselves candidates for office in the House of Commons. These are public servants who have obtained leave under section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act.

In a telephone conversation with me, Mr. Gallant, the chairman of the Public Service Commission, indicated that he had spoken to representatives of the Prime Minister's party and said that these people cannot have a second leave as a result of the failure to call an election today, and the delay. Therefore, without statutory change, this can deprive some of them or put an onerous burden on some of them in the Prime Minister's party and mine in standing for parliament. Aside from the question of other candidates, has the government any specific plans to deal in a special manner with those who are inconvenienced in that particular way in standing for parliament?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, regarding the preamble to the question of the hon. member, I must point out to him that I was dealing seriously with this question when his seatmate, the hon. member for Egmont, interrupted me and did not seem to want a serious answer. Therefore, it is not this side which is not dealing with this matter seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as the substance of the question is concerned, perhaps because of the hon. member's circumscription he is making a special plea for public servants. He realizes that many citizens of this country will run for various parties and have declared themselves with some consequence, I imagine, for their present situation. I am not sure how the hon. member proposes to deal with all the people who were erroneously going on the speculation that there might be an election and now find there is not one.

If the hon. member is prepared to suggest some solution for this short of changing the constitution and having elections at a fixed date, then I think I will be prepared to hear it. I cannot see any way in which we can anticipate for all people who might have thought there would be a general election and have either put some money on it or put their jobs on the line and have lost their wagers.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, for the edification of the Prime Minister, I say, with respect, that the chairman of the Public Service Commission has suggested a review of section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act. That is one thing which might be proposed or considered by the government. I offer that to the Prime Minister as a suggestion.

The Prime Minister did not answer the first question I put to him in respect of an announcement of the dates of the by-elections for the seats which are vacant now and for which by-elections have not been announced. When does the Prime Minister intend to do that? Can he do that today, or can he do it tomorrow?
