Mr. St. Laurent: I cannot say what is the general practice. I have never been an investigator. I was quite surprised to learn that this investigator had felt that it was the proper thing to be done. But apparently it was a consequence of the fact that very much of the information upon which the report was to be based had been obtained from the department, and that the investigator had received from the department, as the minister had requested, the fullest possible co-operation, as he expressly states on the first page of the report. And, having received that information through departmental sources, it is perhaps not unnatural that he should have wished to have at the last moment the accuracy of figures checked at the source from which those figures had been obtained by his representatives.

Mr. Green: Does the Prime Minister think it was the proper thing to do?

Mr. St. Laurent: Now, I would not like to express any opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of the conduct of Mr. Currie. He was appointed because of the reputation he enjoys. He has had in that field much greater experience than the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), or than I have had. And it is the intention to have the report, together with the memorandum of the chief of the general staff, referred to the committee on defence expenditures for such action as the committee may see fit to take. I would be surprised if they did not wish to have Mr. Currie before them; and I think there that question can be gone into.

There are other questions that I would be very curious to have gone into, and that is when this report was actually signed. It bears the date of November 26. The draft that was in the hands of the deputy minister was not a signed draft. There was no signed draft that got to the department until December 8. I would be curious to know when actually the report was completed and signed by Mr. Currie; but I have felt it would be improper for me to communicate with Mr. Currie. I will be very careful not to do anything that any hon. member could look upon as interference.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that in explaining the changes which did take place he has not explained the circumstance under which the words "at or near the top" were replaced by other words.

Mr. St. Laurent: There I have no explanation to offer, and I am informed that the department has no explanation to offer—that those words were not discussed between Mr. Drury and Mr. Currie's representatives on the 1st of December.

Mr. Drew: Has the Prime Minister any information as to the first date upon which this document described as the offset reproduction was first discussed with the chief of general staff?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know that it was discussed with the chief of general staff. I do not know. But I do know that the deputy minister had it for his consideration over the last week end of November, and he made his comments to the representatives of Mr. Currie on the Monday, December 1.

Mr. Drew: And then, do I gather from the Prime Minister's words that he had discussed with the minister the fact that this offset reproduction was being considered at that time before he discussed it with Mr. Currie?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, he had, before he got it, been authorized by the minister to go over it. After he got it, my information is that he told the minister that he had it and asked the minister if he wished to see it. The minister said, "No, I do not want to see anything but the report itself when it is signed and filed with the department."

Mr. Drew: Then, so that there will be no misunderstanding, the deputy minister at that time explained to Mr. Currie that he had received the offset reproduction of the report, and that it was being considered at that time for the purpose of making any factual corrections that might be considered appropriate; is that correct?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I would not take it that that is actually correct. There had been received an offset reproduction of a draft which appeared to be complete. Now, whether or not that was going to be the report was not stated. What was being done was to consider this, and to check the statements of facts that it contained on information that had been obtained from the departmental officials. It was expected, I have no doubt, that that, with such modifications as the commissioner might find it appropriate to make, before he signed it, would be the report. And that is why the minister said that he was informed by the deputy minister that it should be available within a week or two.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? The Prime Minister intimated that Mr. Currie could be called before the defence expenditures committee, if they wish. Would he also say whether the chief of general staff could be called before that committee?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, the hon. member has an advantage over me. I must confess that I am quite ignorant about army regulations and army set-up. I am not giving any permission to call Mr. Currie. I am merely stating that I would imagine that the committee would want to call Mr. Currie. And perhaps it will wish to call the chief of general staff—and I would be surprised if the chief of general staff were not anxious to go before the committee.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, so that we will not leave this matter with any uncertainty, as I understand the explanation that the Prime Minister has given, a representative of Mr. Currie's office brought a copy of the report and that was the copy which was under consideration—

An hon. Member: A draft.

Mr. Drew: That was the copy that was under consideration during the first week end of November.

An hon. Member: The last week end.

Mr. Drew: I am sorry, the last week end in November. Will he indicate which minister authorized the deputy minister to take the steps he described.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: I would point out to the Prime Minister that the copy under discussion is not an office copy from Mr. Currie's office, but would appear, from the descriptions that have been given to this house by the hon. member who introduced the subject, to be a similar printing and in fact an exact printing except for those pages where changes have been made.

I would suggest that this would indicate quite clearly that the offset reproduction, to use the term which the Prime Minister has used, was in fact a reproduction by the same printing presses that turned out the final copy and that there had not only been the office copy from Mr. Currie but that somebody had already authorized the printing of that copy prior to the time the deputy minister had examined it and had received permission during the last week end of November to make certain representations to Mr. Currie. I ask the Prime Minister for information on what appears to be a fairly obvious presentation of the situation.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not going to make any comments on the implications that the hon. gentleman finds in what I have stated. I have stated as fully and as frankly as I could what are the facts. I do not know whether this offset reproduction process was carried out in Mr. Currie's office. I know that there are many business offices which have this offset reproduction process, just as there are many more which have the multigraphing system. What I do know is that the draft that was brought was something that looked like the document that was finally signed and that has been tabled in this house as the report. Evidently it was something that had been produced by the same process as the thing that became the report and has been tabled. Whether that was produced in Mr. Currie's office or produced outside Mr. Currie's office, I do not know.

Mr. Drew: I wish to clarify this. As I understand it, then, the only changes that were contemplated and in fact that would be permitted under such an arrangement would be changes of essential facts following a discussion in regard to those in the manner described, and that this first draft that was presented was recognized as the report, subject to those corrections that would be made from a factual point of view to the copy.

Mr. St. Laurent: I did not understand it in that sense at all. Speaking from my own experience with respect to the speech from the throne, we get prints and we consider the speech from the throne as it is in that printed document. Frequently there are two or three of those prints before the speech is submitted to His Excellency as the recommendation for the speech which should be made. Now what was Mr. Currie's intention, what personal work he put on this draft before it got to the deputy minister of national defence, I do not know. What I know is that the suggestion was made that the deputy minister go over it to check the facts and to check that aspect as to whether or not it was going to be embarrassing to the prosecutions or would affect the rights of persons who had been, are being or were going to be prosecuted.

The deputy minister's representations were made to two of Mr. Currie's representatives on the 1st of December. Nothing further was heard until December 8 when a representative of Mr. Currie came forward with five signed copies and delivered them and the deputy minister then returned this offset reproduction draft that he had had in his possession since November 27.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think I should be obliged to precise the hon. gentleman's understanding. I have said everything I can say and he must draw his own conclusions from it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will decide just how much information he will give in regard to a subject about which we know a great deal.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will give all the information I can get. I have said I have done that. I am not going to try to agree or disagree with any paraphrasing the hon. gentleman may choose to make.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, both on a question of privilege and to continue the examination of this, I point out that there has been no paraphrasing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I point out that there has been no paraphrasing and that I have been seeking to obtain information in regard to a most important matter. I point out to the Prime Minister that at the time the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said that he had received no recommendations or suggestions, written or oral, he was aware that this actual offset reproduction was in the possession of the department and being discussed.

NEWFOUNDLAND DEFENCE PROJECT—MAINTENANCE OF ROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct an inquiry to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence or the acting minister. On Monday I asked the acting minister if any notice was being taken of damage to roads in the municipality of St. John's by national defence projects. The acting minister was going to answer later. Would the parliamentary assistant be able to answer it today?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Unfortunately, no, but I will take the matter as a further notice.

HOUSING

DOWN PAYMENTS ON HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Resources and Development. Would he care to comment on a newspaper article stating that the first step has been taken to reduce the down payment on N.H.A. homes to 10 per cent?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. members know, there is a 10 per cent down payment arrangement obtaining now on houses for defence workers.

This applies to defence workers who are employed in plants certified as defence plants by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). The down payment on joint loans was reduced some time ago to 20 per cent of the agreed sale price and the government has no plans now for changing that general arrangement.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the government take steps leading to the appointment by the house of a special committee of the house at an early date to review the report and operations and policies of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the government have no objection to following that course and I will place the matter before my colleagues immediately.

SHIPPING

UNITED STATES PORTS—
INQUIRY AS TO SCREENING OF SHIPS' PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), but as he is not in his place this morning I would pass the question on to whoever is acting in that capacity. Has the government made any representations to the government of the United States in regard to the new policy adopted in that country of screening of personnel of foreign ships entering the United States ports before they are allowed to land? I am prompted to ask this question because of representations made to me by sailors and others on the Pacific coast.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take the question as notice and the answer will be given later.

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR—PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport what are the names, addresses and occupations of the members of the special committee, referred to by the minister in his speech of December 15, as reported on page 654 of Hansard of that date, established by—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: —the hon. minister's department to study the economic and operative features of the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor, Maine, ferry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is the type of question usually put upon the order paper.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

KOOTENAY DIVISION—PROTECTION FOR TRAIN CREWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Have any recent representations been made to the federal government asking the government to provide protection for train crews in the Kootenay division of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? If so, will the minister inform the house what the government's intention is with respect to these representations?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. The answer is no.

POSTAL SERVICE

TWICE DAILY MAIL DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Has the Postmaster General or his department given any consideration to the demands of business and private individuals for the return of two deliveries of mail a day in cities?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I am glad to refer my hon. friend to the statement I made at the last session on the same subject. This question is still under consideration.

Mr. Fraser: Is that as far as you have got?

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that new legislation is coming forward with respect to rural mail delivery contracts, has any consideration been given to contracts which are now expiring and are up for tender before the new legislation is passed?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I hope eventually, and at not too distant a time, that I will be in a position to make a statement which will satisfy my hon. friend.

RESALE PRICE MAINTENANCE

LEGALITY OF PRICE SUGGESTION BY SUPPLIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It is based on a tobacco tin which I sent to the minister this morning on which it says: "Suggested price $1.30". Is this legal in view of the legislation passed last Christmas?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. In reply, it is not an offence for a supplier merely to suggest a resale price so long as he does nothing else which could be construed as intended to require or induce the vendor to maintain such price, or as having that effect.

LEGISLATION

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ACTS OF QUEBEC LEGISLATURE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the government considered referring certain acts of the Quebec legislature, particularly one authorizing the seizure of vehicles transporting certain products, to the Supreme Court of Canada in order that that court might decide on the constitutionality of such legislation, having regard to such matters as interprovincial trade? Is so, what is the result of such consideration?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): This question in substance, although somewhat different in form, is the same as the question which was asked by the hon. gentleman's leader on December 10, and which I refused to answer at that time upon the grounds that are set out in Hansard. With respect to the question in its present form, I would say that in all matters of this kind the government's decision is announced when it is taken, and in the meantime no member of council, as I understand it, has any right to disclose what is being considered by the government. Indeed, I have sworn not to disclose such information, and I think my hon. friend has no right to ask me to divulge it.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Argue.

(Translation):

Mr. L. E. Roberge (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, although I am not a disciple of Themis, I would like to make my little contribution to the debates of the house. But first, I wish to offer my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The excellent way in which they fulfilled the duty entrusted to them honours their constituents. That is why I make it a point to congratulate them.

Mr. Speaker, in the dark hours in which the people of this country and of other peace-loving nations are living, we are confronted with an atmosphere of tension and suspense, resulting, as we all know, from Russia's subversive activities. It is therefore essential that we consolidate our strength, tighten our ranks, and keep together—and I am thinking more particularly of the democratic nations—if we want to survive.

As for the country in which we are living, its history is one of the most fascinating; it is to the self-denial and hard work of our ancestors that we owe our liberty. This heritage must be preserved by us and handed over, in the years to come, to our children so that they may, in turn, preserve this liberty which is so dear to us.

Some of our sons are now fighting in Korea in the defence of that liberty. We also maintain in Europe another contingent, ready to answer the first call in the defence of our liberty. But when we ask these young men to go and fight for their country, they must be sure that they have a country, a town, or a village where their families are living, to fight for. They must also be convinced that our way of life is worth fighting for, as, in order to make those sacrifices, their morale must be excellent and they must tend towards an ideal which incites them to fight for this liberty.

Listening to the promises which certain members of the opposition are making in order to win public favour, many are under the impression that they have to rely entirely for their subsistence on the planning of social security by the state. This conception of the role of the government, which is shared by a large number of people, goes back to the history of Rome where it was believed that any problem could be solved by saying: "Give them bread and games!" Of course the idea that the government is ready to support the people in every field is quite attractive. On the other hand, such a system is bound to encourage shiftlessness, an unacceptable state of affairs in a democracy such as ours. Bread and games, that is all very well, but how do we go about it when these very people cry out against regimentation whenever the government, for example, decides to control certain aspects of industry? We must not forget either that the establishment of controls throughout the various branches of our social security system would entail the loss of our freedom, the undoing of the rights of man and of private enterprise. In other words, we would fall victim to a dictatorship.

This liberty which we all cherish cannot, of course, nourish us in the sense that our faith, our honour or our honesty do, since these enable us to hold our heads high and walk proudly everywhere we go. It cannot bring us the advantages or consolation of our religion.

We may experience sublime feelings in believing in the Supreme Being. All these things help us support the trials of life; in fact life would be very monotonous if we did not have these wonderful things to help us live it through.

It is to be noted that a nation living under a great number of government controls feeds itself on a rather bitter bread. In my opinion, democracy should be based on wisdom, moderation and a great charity toward one's neighbour.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer for a moment to the difficulties with which we are faced today. The ship of state, having at its helm such a fine captain as our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will manage, I am sure, to see its way through.

Several electors have sent me their requests for an increase in family allowances. Owing to the increase in the cost of living and present circumstances, these claims may seem to be justified, but I still rely on the sound leadership given by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, and his colleagues.

I noticed yesterday that a number of our opponents seemed somewhat worried, more worried, I would say, than the crew of the ship which has the Prime Minister at its helm. Last night, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), in his capacity as Acting Minister of Finance, gave us such a good account of our taxation system that the members of the opposition were left worried and had to realize that we have men who are able to discharge any responsibility at any time. I am sure that, under the able guidance of the Prime Minister and his cabinet, all social security measures that are conducive to the welfare of our people will be initiated in due course.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to a matter of vital importance to our district. Western farmers, through their members of parliament, have managed to get a lot of assistance in order to carry on their farming activities. I believe the time has come to look after the eastern farmers who, to my mind, are in a far more difficult position. As a matter of fact, mixed farming in eastern Canada is especially difficult as it requires continuous supervision, whereas the western farmers have only one branch of farming to look after and thus can become highly specialized farmers. Conditions are widely different in the province of Quebec, and especially in my own county, where our very active and very industrious farmers have to look after a lot of things.

Nowadays, to be a good farmer, one practically has to be a botanist, enough of a veterinarian to take care of one's cattle, enough of a businessman to sell one's crop. All of those things contribute to make life in the country a very hectic one. If things go well on the one hand, but are pretty bad on the other, the farmer must, in order to succeed, keep on striving to balance the over-all situation.

The embargo our friends to the south have imposed at the news of the outbreak of the famous hoof-and-mouth disease has hit my constituents a very hard blow. My riding being adjacent to the American border, our farmers, like those of most of the eastern townships, were engaged in a fairly remunerative business with the United States. The application of that embargo has forced us to adopt new methods and the prices of our products, including vegetables, have come down, the fall having been extremely great in the case of beef and pork, while the price of feed has, in the meantime, risen sharply. In my opinion, our farmers, though somewhat discouraged by those hardships, have cut a good figure and weathered this magnificently.

By the way, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on the clear-sightedness he has shown in signing with Great Britain and New Zealand agreements which are highly favourable to marketing of our meat in those countries. The market thus open to some of our animal products has been a great help to our farmers but unfortunately the prices of feeds were so high and the market so low that our farmers have more or less found themselves with their backs to the wall. I call the minister's attention to this anomaly in the hope that he may be able to correct it.

Mr. Speaker, it being one o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker, just before the recess, I was talking about the agricultural problems of my constituency. I was telling you that the price of farm products was not consistent with that of equipment, machinery, seeds, feed, etc., that our farmers have to buy.

Above all, I wish to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the very sad incidents which took place in my constituency. When the embargo on cattle was put into force, two of our good farmers, conscious of their duty, had some of their cattle grazing along the border. These animals had the misfortune of breaking the fence and of crossing the border. Since the embargo was in force, the American authorities seized them and took them to the slaughterhouse. In one case especially, the animals had gone but a few steps across the border when the U.S. authorities seized them; one of the neighbours of the farmer involved offered to bring his animals back, but unfortunately, the die was cast and the old Latin motto dura lex sed lex was applied.

I would like to ask the government, and especially the Right Hon. the Minister of Agriculture, to take into consideration these two very regrettable cases and to compensate, in some way, these two unfortunate farmers. I am convinced that this problem will be brought to the attention of the minister concerned and, once the embargo has been lifted, in a few months, I hope that some arrangement can be made to the satisfaction of the farmers involved.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, there is one class of people with whom I sympathize greatly; I refer to the blind, those who have lost their sight. It is true that today they have a certain amount of relief in the form of a pension but unfortunately there is a means test in connection with this pension. I do not quite understand how this means test is applied. The blind person who is in normally good health and can look after himself to a certain extent receives his pension and, because of his ability, undertakes to do some kind of work. When his return from it comes to a certain amount, it is taken from his pension. I do not think that is a desirable state of affairs. On behalf of the blind I wish to place before this house a request that the government reconsider these regulations and amend them in such a way that this means test for the blind will be abolished.

Another matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the house is that of exemption on income tax for students. When I spoke in the house last, I mentioned that matter and requested that an exemption on income tax be made for senior students in colleges and universities and that the age limit be increased from 18 to 25 years of age. We all understand the situation. Many of our people have boys and girls who, after attending school for eight or ten years, enter high schools and universities; and that is where expenses accumulate fast. I hope the minister concerned will give consideration to a new ruling that might be put into effect and providing for exemption on income tax for students and that the limit be brought from the present age up to 25 years. Naturally these exemptions would not be given freely but probably under certain regulations prescribed by the department requiring that these students have a certificate or sworn statement from the college they attend, which statement would be taken into account. I hope that suggestion will be given consideration.

In the Massey report we find that a national library has been advocated, and I am pleased to hear that it is taking form. Along with this I should like to suggest to the government another form of scientific institution, namely a kind of national arts and sciences council which would work in co-operation with the national library and with the national research council. The idea of this national arts and sciences council would be to create something of our own—in other words, something really Canadian—which we should have. For centuries we have been copying music from Germany such as the works of Beethoven, Bach and so on and we have been copying paintings from various other countries. I think it is about time that our own country, Canada, stood on its own feet. As we are growing and are becoming, as one might say, of age, we ought to be able to produce something that is really Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to spend too long on this subject, but in order to implement this idea, I might suggest that throughout the country we have many teachers in high schools, universities and so on who are pensioned off. They are still available to do fine work and they could be employed on this national council to the great benefit of the country. They might be engaged in the arts of various kinds such as sculpture or music and in the sciences of various sorts. I think those teachers would be a great asset to the country if they could be permitted to carry on their work. When they reach the age of 55, 60 or 65, many of them could work for at least another ten years, having a small pension. They would be interested in these high sciences and in trying to create something that is really Canadian. I put this suggestion before the house so that it may be kept in mind when the national library comes into being.

In order to follow up this suggestion and to have good understanding throughout the country, in our schools in Quebec we generally teach two languages. This is done in order to learn the views of our fellow Canadians and to create a better understanding throughout the country. We are now able to telephone from one coast to the other, and in a few years' time we may be able to see each other from coast to coast. Therefore, I should like to suggest that in the English-speaking schools where they now teach foreign languages, a preference be given to the teaching of the French language, thereby creating a better understanding of the east and the west. If the English schools in the west would do as we do in Quebec, a better spirit would be created in the whole country. We know very well that those of each nationality are proud of their ancestors, and that is as it should be. We who are of French descent are proud of our French ancestors, as the English, the Scots and the Irish, or whatever they may be, are proud of theirs. The mother tongue must be taught first and fully; that is understood. As an alternative, if the students in other parts of the country who are learning some of the foreign languages that they may not use for years and years would give a little preference to the French language it would make for a better understanding and spirit throughout the whole country. I recommend that the schools and universities that are today teaching foreign languages take my suggestion under advisement and implement it in the very near future.

In closing, it is my hope that what we shall read in the newspapers in the next few weeks that peace on earth and good will to men is being meditated upon by all thinking people throughout the democracies and other countries, and that peace will prevail in the world.

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland, N. B.): Mr. Speaker, it is my wish and desire to follow the time-honoured custom and extend congratulations to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They both did credit to their constituencies and to themselves.

I wish to use the time allotted to me to try to bring to the attention of hon. members certain problems that face the maritime provinces generally, and in particular Northumberland, the constituency that I have the honour to represent.

Much has been said in this house by maritime members about the centralization of industries, and in this regard I also wish to impress upon the government that if the maritimes are to continue as an important part of Canada, the establishment and development of industries must be considered as vital to the economy, yes, vital to the very existence of the maritimes, which have given so much in the past and made so many sacrifices toward the development of central and western Canada.

While it is appreciated that we live in a country of free enterprise, nevertheless it is the government's duty to assist existing industry and to aid in the establishment of new industry and the development of power in sections of Canada where the economy is seriously threatened, as is the case in the maritimes.

The people of the constituency I represent recognize the need for large expenditures of money for national defence both at home and abroad. They are not unmindful of the employment provided by the construction and expansion of the Chatham jet operational and training base, the Renous naval ammunition depot and the St. Margarets radar station. Northumberland is the only constituency in Canada that embraces all three of these major defence installations. However, from a long range economic point of view, industries are needed to secure the future economy of the Miramichi. Hydro power is vitally needed in the province of New Brunswick to supply the requisite to the establishment of industries.

Like many other constituencies, Northumberland has local problems of grave importance which do not receive much attention on a national level. True, these problems to a large extent are left to our free enterprise system, or to provincial and municipal governments. The establishment of industries on the Miramichi to permit the manufacture of wood products such as pulp and paper mills, rayon mills, and other types of plants producing commodities made of wood, is looked upon as the only security of our future.

A former government of the province of New Brunswick was instrumental in having the Fraser companies erect a large pulp mill in this county. The public, the owners of the crown lands, have strong feelings in this matter and consider it only right and just that lease holders of large sections of crown woodlands should fully process, locally, the wood taken off the lands under lease.

Canada has had a large immigration increase and I again request the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to place new Canadian farmers on abandoned farms in New Brunswick, in an effort towards increasing farm products. Defence construction has been the largest single factor in the employment situation in Northumberland for the past four years. History has proven that markets for lumber, pitwood and pulpwood can be lost overnight. Now is the time to plan and establish industries and farming on a permanent basis.

Since the first settlers engaged in shipbuilding and the export of squared timber to Great Britain, Northumberland's chief industry has been lumbering. The fishing industry has made great strides in late years in the processing, grading and marketing of its products. It is hoped that further strides will be made with an increase in the number of draggers in the Miramichi fleet and the erection of cold storage plants, together with improved conditions in all phases of the industry. The Miramichi river, which flows for a hundred miles through the centre of the constituency of Northumberland, provides world famous delicacies of fish, among which are lobsters, oysters, salmon, smelts, clams, quahogs, and other species, as well as many standard varieties. Despite the many kinds of fish that live in the waters of the Miramichi river there are seasons when the catch is small owing to conditions beyond control. The maritime fishermen, like the western wheat farmers, run into bad weather, destructive storms, poor harvests and adverse market conditions. However, unlike the wheat farmers, they do not present a sad tale to parliament. They have suffered their losses of nets and gear, to say nothing of their catch of fish, and have relied on their determination to carry on—not on a vote of financial assistance from the government to recoup their losses. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, eastern fishermen work long and hard, year after year, against adverse elements to eke out a livelihood. They, as true Canadians, are worthy of every assistance.

The fishermen of the maritime provinces are entitled to the same degree of protection and assistance that is given to other classes of Canadian producers. With this thought in mind, I supplement my appeal made in the house on June 12, 1951, to the new Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the government, to take immediate steps to provide protection for the future of the smelt fishing industry of the Miramichi.

Further improvements of wharf and harbour facilities are needed on the Miramichi river for the fishing and wood products trades. I appeal to the government to give further consideration to my requests for improved facilities for certain small groups of fishermen along the shores of the Miramichi bay and Miramichi river.

In this regard I wish to commend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), and their officials, for the improvements already made, and again ask that consideration be given to requests made for further facilities.

While the smelt fishing industry of the Miramichi faces an insecure future unless additional protective measures are taken, the lobster fishing industry of the east coast of New Brunswick faces a more serious threat. Poaching of lobsters on the east coast of New Brunswick, if continued at its present tempo, can only lead to the loss of the industry in the years to come, with subsequent economic disaster.

Undersized and "berried" lobsters are poached by the thousands of pounds every year. The vast majority of the lobster fishermen are law-abiding citizens. Are they to stand by and watch a very small minority destroy their future livelihood? Additional water and land patrols are needed to cope with this situation. A rigid check must be maintained. Destroy the illegal markets and poaching will stop.

Reports are also heard of alleged illegal and wholesale taking of salmon, grilse and trout at the heads of Miramichi rivers and streams during spawning seasons. It is alleged that groups from outside Northumberland county take canning outfits to the spawning grounds, clean out the pools, and can the illegal catch. I urge the Minister of Fisheries to supplement protective measures, and eliminate these grim reapers by providing adequate protection.

A number of fish exporters of the Miramichi have expressed the opinion that Department of Fisheries inspectors of oysters, smelts and alewives make a much more rigid inspection in the Miramichi area than do officials in other parts of the province. The Miramichi fish exporters feel that the crux of the situation lies in the interpretation of the regulations and the individual differences in applying them.

At this time I wish to make a request of the Minister of Fisheries that departmental officials meet with Miramichi fish exporters and members of the Miramichi fisheries advisory council to discuss inspection and grading matters.

Once again I urge the Department of Fisheries and the government to give consideration to the setting up of a form of contributory storm-loss insurance, to protect maritime fishermen against loss of gear and nets by storms that are placed in the category of acts of God.

Direction is needed in setting up a contributory system of insurance; and I feel that this direction and assistance should come from the federal Department of Fisheries, in conjunction with the provincial governments.

Before I leave the important matter of fisheries, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an appeal to the Minister of Fisheries that immediate and full-scale action be taken to rid the Miramichi waters of great destroyers of fish, namely the seals. They not only destroy the fish, they also destroy nets; and their numbers are increasing each year. This is a most serious situation, and adequate measures should be undertaken now to eliminate these marauders.

I wish at this time to congratulate our Minister of Fisheries on his recent appointment. The people of the maritimes know of his many qualifications, his initiative, and his keen desire to bring his department up to the level it should have as an important department of the government. New Brunswickers feel that the maritime fishing industry will make many advances under the new minister.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express the thanks of the people of Northumberland, and in particular the thanks of the citizens of Newcastle, to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for selecting Newcastle as the site of the first post-war armoury in the province. Newcastle is a focal point of military strategic importance. It is surrounded by three major defence installations, among the largest of their kind in Canada. The selection of Newcastle was well warranted, and I am pleased to say that the armoury will be completed very soon.

On a comparison with cities and towns in New Brunswick, the Miramichi area ranks first in military importance in respect to defence installations. In regard to the future program for the erection of armouries I wish to point out that the town of Chatham is in dire need of armoury facilities. With a jet operational and training base located there, its proximity to the St. Margarets radar station should give Chatham top priority when the erection of additional armouries is being considered.

It has long been the maritime cry that we have a deplorable lack of electrical power which would serve as an inducement to bring industries into our provinces. Many hydro developments have been suggested and it is hoped that surveys will be undertaken without further delay. The joint United States-Canada projects, in conjunction with the state of Maine and New Brunswick, such as the Saint John river power development, and the Quoddy power project as well as the St. Mary's-Shepody bay development are pressing matters. All of these should receive further consideration by the dominion government.

The people of the maritimes, generally, favour the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. They have proven in the past that they support any measure that is to the advantage of Canada as a whole. However, the maritimes should receive the same consideration as other parts of Canada in respect to the development of natural resources. Maritime developments should not be left in the wake of projects in other parts of Canada.

There is a most important matter of vital concern to the constituency I represent, a matter that affects every part and every citizen of the riding, about which I wish to make some remarks. This matter of concern is the 1953 production of pit-props, also called pitwood—a wood that is used in coal and salt mines in many parts of the world. I am glad to notice the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) is in his seat. He represents the riding next to mine, and I think what I have to say will be of interest to him.

The Miramichi area of New Brunswick is the main source of production of pit-props, owing to the fact that there are large stands of jack pine in this area, a kind of tree that is most acceptable as pitwood, and which does not have very much commercial value other than as pit-props. The Miramichi area with its deep-water terminals is a natural outlet. Large amounts of money are derived by woodsmen, truckers and longshoremen from this industry, which plays an important part in the economy of the area.

In 1950 the United Kingdom withdrew completely from the Canadian market, on the basis that they were able to obtain their requirements from European sources at greatly reduced costs. Difficulties were encountered in 1951, and the United Kingdom returned to the Canadian market for some of their 1951 requirements.

Since that time very large purchases have been made from Canada. Up to the end of October of this year 306,719 cords of pitwood valued at $11,749,257 were shipped to the United Kingdom. It is estimated that close to 350,000 cords will be shipped to the United Kingdom by the end of the year.

In addition it is expected that exports of pit-props to West Germany will reach some 25,000 cords, and that approximately 20,000 cords will be exported to Turkey by the end of this year.

For the ten-month period of January-October 1952, 13,112 cords at a value of $483,284 were shipped to Turkey and 18,741 cords, at a value of $776,913, were shipped to Germany. The figures just mentioned represent a total of $13,009,454 for the 1952 export of pit-props for the first ten months of the year.

The values of pulpwood exports for the first ten months of 1952 are:

United States	$45,406,987
United Kingdom	4,299,045
France	1,953,829
Germany	762,984
Netherlands	98,713
Switzerland	693,905
Italy	128,233
Turkey	158,473

The hon. member for Gloucester, speaking in this debate on December 1, said that for the first nine months of 1952 shipments of pit-props amounted to $1,812,902. This figure is for the month of September only.

The actual value of shipments of pit-props for the first nine months was $9,566,687. This amount is the highest value of pit-props that has ever been shipped in any nine-months period to any country; it is greater than the value of the total 1946 shipments, the previous highest year.

The member for Gloucester also erred in stating the value of exports of peeled pulpwood to the United Kingdom at $152,086. This figure is the value of shipments for the month of September only; the actual value of shipments of peeled pulpwood to the United Kingdom for the first nine months of 1952 is $2,279,051.

Again his figure of $6,507 as the value of rough pulpwood shipped to the United Kingdom for the nine-months period, January to September, 1952, is incorrect; the correct figure is $1,393,644.

The foregoing correct figures present an entirely different picture from the one the hon. member for Gloucester gave to this house on December 1. It is clear he was confused between the September figures and the total for the nine-months period.

I place the correct figures on the records as I feel that the member for Gloucester, a riding adjacent to the one I represent, must have compiled figures from an unofficial source. I feel sure that he does not wish to place incorrect figures on Hansard, thereby misleading the members of this house and the public.

The hon. member for Gloucester, speaking on the figures he placed on Hansard, said, as reported at page 227 of Hansard of December 1:

These figures, Mr. Speaker, are tragically eloquent in their significance to the pit-prop and pulpwood operators, to the woodsmen and farmers of the northern and eastern part of New Brunswick.

I say, Mr. Speaker, the correct figures are magnificently eloquent. The Miramichi 1952 pit-prop export season is reported as the largest in volume and dollar value in the history of the port. Latest reports for the 1952 season of pitwood exports to the United Kingdom from the Miramichi area show:

	Cords	Value
From Chatham and Millbank	28,225	$1,139,980
From Newcastle and Nelson	77,232	3,248,909
From Richibucto	9,503	393,820

1952 pitwood exports to European countries, not including the United Kingdom, were valued at:

From Newcastle and Nelson, $227,628; from Chatham and Millbank, $39,527; from Richibucto, $166,337; from Buctouche, $339,153.

Latest reports for the same area for 1952 exports of peeled and rough pulpwood to the United Kingdom and United States show:

Chatham and Millbank, $380,640; Newcastle and Nelson, $370,833; Richibucto, $643,018; Buctouche, $623,687.

I place these figures on Hansard because I feel there are many people in all parts of the maritimes who would like to see them, particularly in view of the fact that many newspapers have carried different sets of figures which in most cases were incorrect.

I wish to speak now about another industry in Northumberland county, the Christmas tree industry. Christmas trees to the approximate value of $325,000 were shipped to United States by rail and highway from Chatham, Newcastle and adjacent points on the Miramichi. This industry, a seasonal one, operates during the months of October, November and December and plays an important part in the economy of Northumberland. By proper cutting and rotation the small fir trees that grow on the Miramichi can furnish the Christmas tree markets for years to come, from which can be derived substantial revenues.

The year 1952 being the largest export season for pitwood and pulpwood in the life of the Miramichi, together with the long lumber and the fishing industries, the Christmas tree industry and large-scale defence construction programs of millions of dollars, with other phases of industry and business enjoying an accelerated pace, resulted in Northumberland reaching its peak year.

[Mr. McWilliam.]

The present outlook for 1953 points to a drop in quantity and per cord price of pitwood for the U.K. market. Scandinavian prices for pit-props have been reduced and at the present time the U.K. inventories are substantial. It is anticipated that the United Kingdom will place a fair volume of pit-prop contracts with eastern Canada for 1953 shipment. Present indications are that quantities will be considerably lower than the 1952 shipments. It is also anticipated that France and Turkey will take a volume of pit-props during 1953. The United Kingdom's experience in 1950 in depending solely upon European sources should be a deterrent which should make her hesitate to again withdraw from the Canadian market.

I am sure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and his officials, particularly Canada's trade commissioner in London, are doing everything within their power to secure the largest possible order from the United Kingdom for 1953 purchases of pit-props as well as from other countries.

While it is appreciated that this industry is of a free enterprise nature, the trade and those connected with it, from the woods to the wharves, can feel sure that every assistance is being rendered by the federal government.

The long lumber demand from Miramichi producers is at present normal. Early orders for 1953 requirements are being received, and while the price is down about $10 a standard it is hoped that overseas, United States and domestic demands will keep this industry on an even keel during 1953. The defence construction program in the Miramichi area is expected to be very substantial in 1953. This of course depends on the international situation. Other industries and business generally are expected to maintain the 1952 level.

I should like to ask members of the house, and particularly the members of the cabinet, to seriously consider the problems of the maritimes in the light of future existence and the necessity of industrial expansion. The constituency of Northumberland, New Brunswick, through which flows the historic and important Miramichi river, a shipping lane for ocean-going vessels of the largest types, like other parts of the maritimes, forms a part of this great Canada of ours. In it the descendants of the English, French, Scottish and Irish pioneers live in perfect harmony side by side, resolved, individually and collectively, to make Canada a still greater nation and to foster national unity in a true Canadian spirit.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, what Canada makes makes Canada.

What Canada produces produces Canada. Blessed is the country that can, and does, make and produce its own. Such a nation, wisely governed, is beholden to no man and to no combination of men.

On December 4, as recorded at pages 339 to 344 of Hansard, I discussed the matter of the Canadian beet sugar industry as it relates to national defence. It is my purpose today to consider the question of the Canadian sugar beet growing industry as an eminently respectable branch of farm business in Canada.

Sugar beets are grown in soil and generally on farms. There can be no doubt that sugar beet raising is a farming enterprise. True, the sugar beets are processed in a sugar factory before their product, sugar, becomes available to supply human needs. But wool growing requires a processing factory to render available yarn, cloth and clothing. Wheat growing requires a mill to produce flour. Generally vegetables and small fruits go through a canning factory to produce canned goods. Milk is often processed—in creameries to become butter, or in the cheese factories to become cheese.

Therefore I maintain that, notwithstanding the fact that sugar beet growing depends for its welfare upon the sugar factory, there can be no doubt whatever that sugar beet growing is a branch of Canadian agriculture. Sugar beet raising has an unchallengeable right to a recognized place and a respected and even honoured membership in the splendid sisterhood of Canadian agricultural industries. Therefore I contend that no man or group of men has any right to kick the sugar beet industry around as though it were a no-account cur that amounted to nothing. Sugar beet raising in Canada has by past achievement merited, and should freely be accorded, full title to a standard equal to that of grain growing, fruit growing, potato growing, dairying, fur farming, meat raising, sheep raising, tobacco growing, soya bean growing and the rest of them—and I may say that in the case of nearly all these products the constituency of Lethbridge, Alberta, is famous for its achievements.

Sugar beet raising is a branch of agriculture and therefore has an incontestable right to be exempt from all forms of discrimination from which other branches of agriculture are exempted. It has a complete right to be entitled to all forms of assistance to which other branches of agriculture are entitled, and that without reservation or question. Is there any conceivable reason why sugar beet growing should not, for example, come under the Agricultural Prices Support Act? While we are on the matter, how would you feel about the consistency of a nation that would put an agricultural price support under a given commodity and then let in vast quantities of that same commodity from another nation, thus destroying its domestic production?

First let it be known without qualification that beet sugar, the major end product of the sugar beet, is in every respect exactly the same as the finest cane sugar. There are still people spreading lies around Canada that beet sugar is somehow or other inferior to cane sugar. These people are either deceived or they are downright hypocritical. Let me read a passage to support the statement I have just made. The United States department of agriculture, bureau of chemistry and soils, says:

> It is not possible to chemically differentiate cane sugar and beet sugar by the physical appearance of the two sugars, and there is no evidence to show that cane sugar is sweeter than beet sugar or vice versa. It has been alleged at times that beet sugar has an unfavourable effect in making jelly and preserves. It has been stated, for instance, that beet sugar prevents jellying. The bureau of chemistry has conducted experiments in the manufacture of apple and grape jelly, using commercial granulated beet sugar and commercial granulated cane sugar under identical conditions. As a result of these experiments, no difference was found to exist in the finished products in any of their characteristics, and no difference could be detected between jellies made with beet sugar and those made with cane sugar. In all probability the failure to produce the desired jellying effect, which has been observed at times, has been due to such factors as deficiency of pectin in the fruit juice, absence of proper acidity, etc. The highest grades of granulated sugar on the market reach an ideal state of purity so far as all practical purposes are concerned, and it is believed that where the highest grades of commercial granulated sugar are used there is no choice between beet and cane sugar.

It would be in the interests of Canada if the government would issue a statement similar to the one I have just read from the United States government. How can a country be wisely governed and well informed when people are deluded by misstatements?

The sugar beet is a king amongst vegetables. The average sugar beet is from ten to twelve inches long, it weighs from 1½ to 2 pounds, it is light in colour, something like a parsnip. I am taking some care to go into detail in the matter because I realize that a good many members in the house have never seen a sugar beet and there are certainly millions of people in Canada who have not seen one.

Sugar beets have yielded as high as 23 tons to an acre, a colossal per acre yield. A good average crop is 12 tons per acre which, in itself, is an enormous yield. A good sugar beet, if well bred and well cared for in good soil with enough water and sunshine, will carry a high percentage of sugar—as high as 16 to 18 per cent or more. That percentage stands among the very top achievements in the world. The average sugar content in Alberta sugar beets over the past twenty years has bordered closely upon 17 per cent.

Canadian land where sugar beets are now grown has good soil, adequate sunshine and water. Canadian irrigated lands are especially blessed in all three of these respects. The sugar beet is one of the surest crops—one of the great anxieties in agricultural industries is the uncertainty of the crop, but sugar beets are almost a certain crop under most conditions.

No disease comparable to rust in wheat, or smut in grains, or blight in potatoes, remains unconquered in Canadian sugar beets. No insect pest comparable to the wheat-stem saw-fly, the corn borer and various kinds of weevil, is uncontrolled in sugar beets. Sugar beets, growing, are successfully resistant to slight frost, frost which would normally come during their period of growth. Sugar beets in summer have a fair chance of recovering from hail—which is again an important matter. The average Canadian fall weather does not prevent the harvest, or harm the beets seriously after harvest. Beet harvesting, usually, comes after the garnering of most farm crops and consequently the work of gathering sugar beets is economical in the farm schedule of yearly activity.

Sugar beets have a sure market in Canada if governmental wisdom preserves it for them. It ought to be recognized ordinarily, and I believe it is by all realistic persons, that it is proper for the producers of the country to have the first right to the market of that country. Sugar beet growers are assured of a fair cash price because the farmers and beet processors sign contracts, before seeding begins—guaranteeing the beet raisers an attractive initial payment on the beets when delivered, and participation in returns from sales of the sugar and by-products as the sales are made.

How well do sugar beets yield in Canada? The average tonnage per acre from 1925 to 1950 in Alberta was good. It was rarely lower than 12 tons to the acre. The average sugar content percentage through the same years was, generally speaking, good. Very rarely did it fall below 16 per cent and several times it went above 18 per cent. The average sugar yield per ton in Alberta is good, as compared with sugar beets in almost any part of the world.

The sugar beet is a king and a queen amongst vegetables in respect of the by-products that it yields Canadians. Someone has said that if a sugar beet could squeal we would utilize even the squeal. That is how completely the sugar beet is used.

May we consider these by-products and what they mean in terms of nutrients for livestock? According to the fifteenth report and financial statement of the Alberta co-operative sugar beet growers, a very reliable organization in point of accuracy of knowledge, "in meat production the various by-products alone from an average acre of beets, not counting sugar, produces as much meat as will the product of an average acre of corn." Now that is a most important fact.

While primarily it might be said that we raise sugar beets to produce sugar, yet in raising sugar beets we are producing per acre a crop of nutrients—animal food—equivalent to what could be raised if you were raising on that acre almost any forage crop that can be named, and raising it for forage alone.

There are four by-products. They are beet tops, beet pulp, beet molasses, and beet tailings. Now, what are beet tops? Those who have had experience with raising beets know that the upward part of the beet, probably to an inch to an inch and a half below the base of the leaves, does not contain sugar and may contain undesirable elements which can mar the value of the sugar. Consequently the upper inch or inch and a half is cut off when the beets are harvested. Thus we see there are left all the leaves and the upper portion of the beet itself. Those portions remain on the field or are gathered up and hauled in to be treated as any other kind of valuable nutrient would be treated. They constitute what is called beet tops.

How valuable are those beet tops? Silver Sunshine, the 1946 fall issue, at page 31, tells us that tops from the average ton of beet contain approximately 200 pounds of dry matter. This according to 27 experiments conducted throughout the western United States in 1943, will replace 100 pounds of alfalfa hay and 46 pounds of grain in fattening cattle and sheep. One hundred pounds of beet tops therefore equal 50 pounds of alfalfa hay and 23 pounds of grain. Now, a rapid computation of the figures I have given will readily enable any ordinary member to estimate just how much nutrient value there is in beet tops from a 12 ton crop.

What is the value of beet tops? Beet tops from an average 12 ton crop are worth $19.50 per acre as feed when alfalfa hay is $14 per ton and barley is 60 cents a bushel. Tops cured and well dried will replace grain at the rate of one pound of tops for half a pound of grain. This is all authenticated and vouched for in the periodical, Silver Sunshine, to which I have referred.

The Canada and Dominion Sugar Company, at page 49 of its submission to the tariff board in 1939, reference 106, quoted from reports of the statistical branch of the Ontario department of agriculture to the effect that the past five-year average yield of alfalfa, per acre in Ontario, was 2·32 tons.

Then the report says "so that a sugar beet grower gets on an average about two-thirds as much value in stock feed from his beet tops as if he had cropped his land solely to alfalfa hay".

"Beet tops properly siloed are worth as much as the beets". So says the Silver Sunshine periodical in the fall of 1946, at page 10.

I have shown that one ton of beets will yield 200 pounds of dried beet tops, equal to 100 pounds of alfalfa hay and 46 pounds of grain. A 12 ton beet crop will yield 12 times 200 pounds or 2,400 pounds of dried beet tops equalling 1,200 pounds of alfalfa hay and 552 pounds of grain. Silver Sunshine in the spring of 1948, at page 22, says: "Livestock prefer beet top silage above all other feeds".

It must be obvious to everyone who is at all concerned about the welfare of Canadian agriculture that the sugar beet growing industry is not a matter to be lightly treated.

The second by-product is beet pulp. Beet pulp is fed to livestock both wet and dry. What is it? It consists of the remains of the beet after the beet has been passed through the factory, sliced and the sugar containing fluid drawn out of the beet. One ton of beets produce 100 pounds of dried beet pulp, according to reference No. 106, 1939, which I referred to a few moments ago as having been presented by the Canada and Dominion sugar factory.

In the last few years men have perfected processes whereby the beet pulp can be dried, shipped far away and preserved indefinitely. This fact is of great importance to our nation in the matter of feed supply in the event that we should, for any reason, have a failure in our forage crops in any given year; and that is something which can easily take place in any part of Canada.

Dried beet pulp is an extremely valuable feed. No other product on the market possesses its virtues. It is both an appetizer and a conditioner. It makes cattle eat more of other feed, digest it better and improve in condition. Milk cows fed with it produce more milk and more milk per pound of feed consumed. Feeder cattle fed with it gain weight faster and add more flesh per pound of feed. Show cattle take on a bloom which cannot be produced as economically in any other way. In 1938 the price was $15.30 f.o.b. the factory. This I gather from this reference to which I referred, namely reference No. 106 which will be the name by which I will refer to it from now on.

Beet pulp fresh has succulence of tremendous virtue for stock. Those who have fed milk cows without beet pulp and who have then fed beet pulp for the first time find themselves completely astounded at the results which come from feeding the cows beet pulp. W. N. Hermis, R. E. Miller and R. D. Jones say in Sugar Beet Bulletin, volume 5, 1941, No. 3, paragraphs 61-63: "A ton of silage pulp replaces 139·9 pounds of ground barley, 636 pounds of alfalfa hay, 44·2 pounds of molasses in feeding lambs." This is mentioned in the Alberta sugar beet growers' 1941 report at page 27. Lambs fed on wet pulp made even faster and cheaper gains.

Here is the second by-product of sugar beet. I ask any man in the house or in the country this question: Does he suppose for one minute that the Canadian people and the Canadian government can afford to neglect beet sugar production in this country, judging from the standard of feed alone?

I come now to the third of the by-products, namely beet molasses. What is it? It is what is left after the sugar has been taken out of the beet juice drawn from the beets. There is a certain point beyond which it is not economical to take the sugar out; it costs more to take it out than to leave it in. What is left is called beet molasses. It is a thick, dark substance, in some respects resembling crude molasses with which most hon. members are at least in some degree familiar.

How much beet molasses comes from beets? Four per cent of the beets is the general amount or 80 pounds of beet molasses per ton of beets. This varies to some extent, according to a number of factors, but that is a good general rule. It consists of sucrose to the extent of 50 per cent, soluble salts and water. It is rich in potash and contains some nitrogen. Beet molasses is useful for stock feed, for yeast making, for distilling, and for mixing with dried beet pulp. It is used increasingly in chemical processes, according to Messrs. F. O. Licht in a memorandum prepared for the economic committee of the league of nations in 1929 at page 25. This will be found in reference No. 106 to which I have referred, 1939, at page 25.

Approximately four gallons of alcohol is procured from the molasses of one ton of beets. The average sale price of beet molasses was $20.04 per ton in Alberta, according to E. D. Battrum in the 1943 report, page 12, of the Alberta beet growers' association. Canada and Dominion Sugar Company's submission, reference No. 106, 1939, says of molasses at page 52:

> From ten to fifteen thousand tons are produced annually, depending on the yield, test and purity of the beet crop. The total gross value in recent years has averaged over $100,000 annually.

That is from the Ontario factory areas with which most hon. members from Ontario are familiar. So much for the molasses. Judged from the molasses alone from beet sugar production, one would say that, under ordinary circumstances, any nation would be well advised to have the guarantee of an abundance of such molasses being produced domestically every year.

I mentioned beet tailings. What are they? Beet tailings are the little roots on the beets which are broken off when the beets begin to be processed. They are good for feeding swine, sheep and other animals as long as they last, which of course is not long. They are a fairly valuable by-product.

Because of the drying of beet pulp, sugar factories have begun to mix beet molasses along with the beet pulp and dry the two together. This mixture is being found to be an exceedingly valuable feed. I am reading now from an article by T. George Wood who was for years the president of Canadian Sugar Factories Limited in southern Alberta. In an article which appeared in Silver Sunshine in 1950 he says:

> Weight and water in wet beet pulp has restricted its use to those beet farmers within a somewhat close radius of the sugar factories. Only from 10 to 12 per cent of wet beet pulp is actual feed, and hauling costs are high.

He goes on to discuss dried beet pulp as follows:

> Dried molasses beet pulp, as produced at the Taber sugar factory, will contain about 25 per cent of molasses dried with the sliced beet residue. It can be used to make up balanced rations of such combination of feeds that will allow every beet farmer to get full livestock production at lower costs. Such a ration should be based largely on home produced feeds.
> Dried molasses beet pulp is in all beet districts where it is produced, one of the best and most popular concentrates for feeding to dairy cows, beef cattle and for finishing sheep and lambs.

And again:

> Nutritionists stress the need of making concentrate mixtures with sufficient bulk to aid disgestion.
> Every farmer knows that in feeding grain alone there is a tendency to form a sticky, pasty mass that becomes indigestible, and is likely to cause bloat and other disgestive troubles causing animals to go off feed.
> Now that dried molasses beet pulp becomes available, it should form 25 per cent of the feeding ration throughout all the feeding projects in southern Alberta.
> The expanding bulk of dried molasses beet pulp plays a most vital part as a digestive aid because of its water absorbing quality. It will take up five or six times its original weight in water without producing gas or bloat.
> It is easy to feed. Used dry the animal will provide the water. It will make cheap farm feeds palatable and nutritious.

And further:

> According to a summary of 42 fattening tests conducted by agricultural experiment stations, each ton of dried beet pulp fed with grain and alfalfa replaced 1782·2 pounds of corn and 835·6 pounds of alfalfa in producing gains on cattle or lambs. This means that each pound of dried pulp saved ·89 pounds of grain and ·42 pounds of alfalfa, or was approximately equal to 1·15 pounds of grain. The high fattening value of dried pulp is in part due to its ability when mixed with grain to keep fattening animals on feed without any set-backs and thereby to produce steady and uninterrupted gains. As a rule, it is customary to feed dried pulp, if available, as one-quarter to one-half of the grain ration. When used with supplemental feeds, however, such as mill feed, bran, corn-fodder or ensilage, it can be substituted for the entire grain ration if necessary.

I apologize to hon. members for taking so much time to read, but I should like them to know that what I am saying is absolutely authentic and can be relied on one hundred per cent. So much for the pulp and molasses mixture.

How does sugar beet culture affect the soil? Sugar beet culture wisely employed by Germany between 1870 and September 1, 1903, increased that nation's yield of cereals from 14 bushels an acre to 34·9 bushels an acre, which sounds astonishing, does it not? Over that same period Germany paid out $340 million in subsidies, benefiting the beet sugar industry.

Sugar beet culture thereby enabled Germany to support her population in respect of wheat, barley, oats and rye. Germany, in becoming the greatest grower of sugar beets, increased her average yield of cereals 80 per cent over the period 1879 to 1909. Over the period 1919 to 1923 the average yield of wheat in Germany was 26 bushels an acre as against 16·04 bushels an acre for Canada. Messrs. F. O. Licht, the well-known international sugar statisticians, reported these facts to the economic committee of the league of nations in 1929.

How comes this about? Well, in producing sugar beets they use a rotation. This is a rotation which is being worked upon by the Lethbridge experimental farm: Thirty tons per acre of manure are scattered upon the land upon which it is intended to raise beets. Then beets are raised for two years; then wheat is raised one year; then alfalfa is raised for three years; then wheat for one year, and then 30 tons of manure are put on again. Now, in order to get the best results with sugar beets some such rotation has to be used. Consequently the result is an encouraging improvement of the soil.

Here is a vegetable, through the growing of which, Canadian farmers in certain regions can produce for Canadians two highly valuable crops at the same time, sugar, an indispensable human food, and sugar beet by-products, which, taken together, constitute perhaps the finest stock feed known to man. Surely the considered conclusion of all informed and enlightened Canadians must be that the sugar beet growing industry must be recognized, respected and then treated, as a branch of Canadian agriculture, second to none, the peer of all, worthy to be the queen of all.

What must be the estimate of any Canadian government that would permit the agricultural business of beet growing to be seriously injured?

Mr. W. M. Mott (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have this opportunity to say a few words at this time. First of all, I am sure I cannot add to the many kind expressions that have been conveyed to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At the same time I should like to convey to them my personal congratulations on the very fine addresses they gave at the opening of this session of parliament.

Since I represent a British Columbia constituency I want to say to our own Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) how much we appreciate the fact that two outstanding members of our province have been elevated to high and honoured positions in the cabinet. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) does not come here as a man inexperienced in that industry. Fifty per cent of his constituency is bordered by the fishing industry. He has always been closely connected with it, and as an engineer by profession I am sure he will make an outstanding and successful job of his position as Minister of Fisheries in the federal government. The Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) is certainly well qualified to hold the position he occupies in the Department of Justice, since he is a member of one of the largest legal firms in the west. Because of that I am sure he comes here with considerable knowledge to fulfil that position. He is also Associate Minister of National Defence. I might say that he is one of many of us who had to do the tough job of marching as private soldiers in the first world war. Later on he was promoted to the ranks of the flying corps as a flying officer. I am sure his outstanding knowledge as a veteran fits him well for the position of Associate Minister of National Defence.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I also wish to convey my thanks to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and his colleagues in the cabinet for their assistance and help last year in the development of the harbour and port of New Westminster. The loan of $1,250,000 to the harbour board for the extension and expansion of our docks, that we need in the west so urgently at this time, will go a long way toward taking care of the extensions that we can foresee before many years. I should like to express sincere appreciation to the citizens for the fact that only a few days ago they passed a bylaw in which they turned waterfront property valued at about $100,000 over to the crown for the sum of one dollar. That bylaw was passed by a majority of four to one. It shows the deep appreciation of the people of New Westminster.

Then there are some other matters I should like to discuss at this time, matters which have been brought to my attention in my own constituency, and which I think it is only proper that I place on record. The first of these has to do with the returned veterans. I do not refer to all of them, but more particularly to the burnt-out pensioners to whom the war veterans allowance would apply.

A few days ago I listened to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) when he spoke concerning the veterans. I noted that during his observations he made use of an old saying we always associate with the late R. L. Borden. I think many of us will remember those words all too well. They were brief. His statement was that nothing would be too good for the veterans of the war when they returned. I may not be using his exact words, but I believe my recollection of them gives the proper meaning.

Let me say here that, along with many thousands of others, I returned from the first war. We might very easily place emphasis on the word "nothing" in that saying. Each of us received $70 a month for six months if we had served three years in the Canadian expeditionary force. We received $35 for a suit of clothes—and while clothing might not have been as expensive as it is today, it was certainly more expensive than it was at the time those young fellows entered the army. That $70 a month was given to us while we were looking for employment, and we know that in that same year there were some 55,000 returned soldiers from the first war who went to the United States looking for employment. At that time there was no organization such as the Canadian Legion to look after the veterans who returned from the war. That is why I now mention that in my view it is necessary that some further assistance be given to them.

I am not going to quote what the hon. member for Battle River said, because it is all to be found at page 314 of Hansard for December 3 and hon. members may look it up if they wish. I would point out, however, that he quoted the remarks made in 1931 by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, in which he set out the plan he had at that time for the veterans of the first war. It showed progressive thinking, and anyone wishing to read it will understand it as well as I do. It shows that not only the late Mr. Mackenzie King but other governments since that time have been acting progressively in trying to assist the veterans. It is true those veterans have not received everything for which they have asked, and this, of course, is no indication that they are not entitled to what they have asked. In this connection my mind goes back to the veterans affairs committee, of which I was a member, and the efforts of the opposition to embarrass the government by pointing out that everything that had been requested had not been given. I believe the disabled veterans received more than they asked for. Then there have been many other grants to widows and also for the educational advancement of orphans. I do feel, however, that the burnt-out pensioner has not received, to the full extent, what he should have had.

I am not going to follow the example of my hon. friends opposite by saying that we should give them this and give them that and then, in the next breath, preach economy and ask the government to cut down personal and corporation income tax. I am not going to ask that, while at the same time asking for large amounts for social services. I agree to a certain extent with our friends in the C.C.F. party when they ask for increased social services. I do not know whether I have heard them ask that the income tax be cut, but I do know the party sitting to the right of them, from where I stand, in company with the official opposition, seem to be preaching a program of economy at this time.

I have noticed that other hon. members who have discussed veterans' problems have not made the fiery speeches they have made on so many occasions. They have not placed themselves on record with such high pressure as they have formerly. Some have said that if a committee on veterans' affairs is appointed they would like to serve on it, but I have noticed that they have quietened down considerably in their pressure on behalf of the veterans, if one compares what they have said recently with what they have said in the past.

While I stand in my place and ask the government to assist these veterans, and go along with hon. members of the opposition and on this side of the house in stating that it is necessary to give further assistance to burnt-out pensioners, I cannot in the same breath ask the government to cut down on personal and corporation taxation. I am not one who believes that on the one hand you can ask for heavier expenditures by the government and, on the other, expect lower taxation.

This is all I am going to say, except that I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) will take note of what I have said. I realize, of course, that even this small request would cost two or three million dollars. The war veterans assistance fund, which was taken away last year for two months after the increase in the war veterans allowance, has not worked out very satisfactorily, but it is my hope that even today the allowance will be of great assistance to them, and I would hope that something further will be done to restore it.

I should like to say a few words about our situation on the lower mainland in British Columbia, in connection with television. I come from a constituency located twelve miles from Vancouver, known as the hub of the Fraser valley—and I am sorry the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) is not in his seat, because I know he would have some comment to make. For many years, however, my constituency has been so described. There are some 150,000 people in the area, including one who has the funds and the equipment to instal television. I have no quarrel with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as I think they have done a wonderful job in providing service in places where private stations would not have spread out if it had been left to private enterprise to handle our radio in the past. I think the same about television. We need cultural and other types of programs which they will broadcast. We are going to require that type of program. We now get certain television programs from the United States. I have a television set and I get good programs from Seattle, 145 miles away, the type of television program that the ordinary person wants to see. I have been connected with sports nearly all my life, and when I am home on a Friday night I like to see four or five good boxing matches from Madison Square Garden or Detroit. I have seen practically every big football game which has been played in the United States. We receive many good sports programs, besides plays and other things of interest which we enjoy.

My main reason for bringing up this matter is what is happening in Bellingham, a city of some 35,000 people about 19 miles from the border and about 40 miles from New Westminster. A television station is being installed in that city. The following article appeared in a New Westminster newspaper. It is a B.U.P. dispatch from Victoria and reads:

> Plans of Bellingham radio station operator Roger Jones to set up a television station serving both Washington and British Columbia will be proceeded with immediately, it was learned today in Victoria.
> David M. Armstrong, manager of Victoria radio station CKDA, said he learned from Jones that the Bellingham television outlet is expected to be approved within a few months, and will not be delayed three years, as first reported.
> Jones, operator of radio station KVOS, confirmed that he planned to beam programs to British Columbia, using B.C. talent, and said he will accept advertising from B.C. firms.
> Armstrong conferred with Jones today in Bellingham, discussing technical problems in establishing television outlets. The Victoria radio station manager plans to set up a TV outlet in the capital city as soon as his application is approved by the C.B.C.

I hope the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) will take notice of that. Here is a station being set up in a city only 20 miles from the Canadian border with the avowed intention of coming into Canada to get advertising and beaming programs to Canada from the United States. I know it is the intention of the government to put television in Vancouver, but I submit that where there is need for a station the government should fix a certain time limit for private industry to indicate whether they wish to set up a station. That is all I am going to say about television at this time.

I do want to say a few words with regard to this great discussion that has taken place during the last few days regarding the Currie report. I want to reply to some of the points brought out in the criticism by the official opposition and other parties. First I want to make it clear that my army experience was as a private soldier. As you all know, that is the lowest rank you can have; there is no one under you. I see the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) smiling. I am not ashamed to say that I served three years and two months in the Canadian expeditionary force and came out a private soldier. I must have been a good private to remain in that position three years and two months. Nevertheless I did gain some experience of the Canadian army.

Reference has been made to pilfering, but I think the only pilfering I did was to take the $1.10 per day they gave me for three years. Some of the things in this report amused me and some of the points raised by the opposition also amused me. I think one of the main things on which you should have put your finger has been left out absolutely. The other day when this matter first came up for consideration it reminded me of a real military operation somewhere, with all the lieutenant colonels that were taking part. I have nothing against lieutenant colonels or generals. All these lieutenant colonels and other marched in just as they used to years ago; they had their operation orders under their arms, but instead of using heavy artillery, all they had was pop guns and firecrackers.

One thing was quite noticeable. In this report which had taken that length of time to prepare and which covered so many matters, you had to jump one, two, three and four pages to find one line to complain about.

An hon. Member: What a line.

Mr. Mott: It was quite noticeable that you stayed down at the bottom with some of the things, where some of this trouble started, and then went to the top to hit the administration. Why did you hit the administration? You hit the administration because you wanted to get at the minister. The only way you could get at him was to attack the administration.

An order was sent out by the deputy minister to the quartermaster general. Did any of the lieutenant colonels on that side repeat that? I never heard one of them refer to it. They know enough about organization and military matters, and I know enough about them as a private, to know that 90 per cent of the troubles refer to discipline. It does not come from the Minister of National Defence; it is discipline.

All those who are returned soldiers know that when we were over in England and wanted an extra bucket of coal in the night, we formed our own little operation. We went up to the guard at the fence and two of us kept him engaged there while two more crawled over the fence to get the coal. That is part of army life, and everyone knows that.

Those who were in the army of occupation after the war know that these things happened. How many of those officers across from us in the official opposition who were speaking on this question walked down the streets of cities in the Ruhr, in Brussels and other places and saw girl after girl and young lady after young lady walking by in beautiful coats made out of our blankets. They never had such clothes. These things occur in the army to a certain extent and the only way to stop them is through discipline, not by trying to get at the administration or the Minister of National Defence.

I notice some other things. Reference has been made to a hobby horse or something else. Today with our mechanized army we really have an army of tradesmen. If you are up in Churchill, not at Petawawa, gracious sakes alive; if someone wanted to build something, should that be investigated in this manner? These things can be enlarged upon, it can be said they are made out of mahogany or gold or something else, but it is much better for soldiers or officers to be busy making these things in their spare time. If they have nothing else to do in their spare time I think they should be encouraged to follow a hobby and make these things. It may not be horses but something else. Take the air force in the last war. Look at the number of A-1 mechanics who came out of it. Some of them were overenergetic, and while they were studying and learning their trades they made many small things that they brought out of the service with them as souvenirs. I do not think we should be too critical of these things.

I get a laugh out of the horses. In the war in which I served horses were used for transportation. Horses or our feet; that was all we had. In our mechanized army of today I wonder if we have requisitions with "horse" marked on them. In looking over the requisitions to find one marked "horse" probably they could not find one, so the cost was charged to labour. It is labour just the same as the labour of man. The horse is a living animal just as man is a living person, and probably that is why it was charged to labour, although that may not be the case. We should look into these problems to find out whether or not the criticism that has been levelled is correct.

As one who served under the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) when he was general officer commanding the reserve army on the Pacific coast in the last war, I should like to ask him in a friendly spirit—he does not need to reply but I know he will agree with me—if many thousands of courts of inquiries were not reported to him concerning things that were lost. We all know what happened when a pair of binoculars or a revolver was lost. If you were the officer commanding a small unit with the rank of captain you got $240 a year and were charged with looking after $80,000 worth of equipment. They gave you two sergeants, a quartermaster sergeant and an orderly room sergeant and expected you, on a salary of $240 a year, to be responsible for $80,000 worth of equipment. I can prove that because I was in that position. If you lost something you did not have much to pay for it out of $240 a year when you had to provide your army equipment, buy a suit of clothes and other small things and keep up with the Joneses. What did you do? In your own mind you probably knew that a certain article was gone, so you sent to brigade headquarters and they set up a court of inquiry. You could call the article lost or stolen, but it was gone. It did not always fall through the floor.

I know there have probably been thousands of such courts of inquiry. A lot of these things go with the army and always will. There is no doubt about that. Today in Canada it is difficult to get men to serve in the permanent forces. Men were quite willing to do so when they could go overseas and get into action, for the adventure or otherwise, but they are not so willing to serve in the permanent forces. Therefore I wonder how serious some of these things are from the point of view of the veteran. I think when the facts become well known to the thousands of private soldiers and other ranks of the first war and to the thousands who served in the last war they will realize that they ran into the same thing during their army life. I do not say they should steal railway tracks, but at the same time I was amused by that incident. I will be fair with the opposition. I do not condone the removal of two Canadian Pacific railway tracks and their replacement by tracks taken from the Canadian National but it is a strange thing that the railway companies did not notice what was taking place.

In any event I will be interested in hearing the remarks that are still to be made, but as a private soldier I want to assure the opposition that they certainly have not convinced me that this matter is as serious as their speeches would indicate. In the first place we had already heard about the Petawawa scandal on the floor of the house. Now we are opening up the matter again, which is only the right and proper thing to do; but I do not think the matter is going to turn out to be as serious as the opposition are trying to make it appear.

I am very glad to have had the opportunity of saying a few words. I am leaving tomorrow morning, and I appreciate the opportunity of being allowed to speak at this time. Three years ago I said a few words in the house and this is only my second attempt. I am not going to take up any more time, because I am certain there are many others who wish to speak before we adjourn for the Christmas holidays.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Richard (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep emotion and a sense of profound national pride that I address the house. May I first be permitted to offer my sincere congratulations and thanks to the mover (Mr. Deslieres) and the seconder (Mr. Schneider) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne; they have both fulfilled their task in an admirable way.

Without going into every detail, I must say that the speech from the throne delivered at the beginning of this session of the twenty-first parliament mentions projects of the highest importance for the economic development and general welfare of the country at large. I am confident that all members of the house, including those of the opposition, are greatly desirous of fulfilling their important duty as representatives of their compatriots, conscientiously and without ever losing sight of the common good and general interest of the people.

From the house I wish to send my best regards to the people of St. Maurice-Lafleche, whom I have the honour and privilege of representing, and I wish to thank them sincerely for the confidence they have placed in me.

It gives me great pleasure to associate myself with the other members of the house who have tendered their congratulations to His Eminence Cardinal Leger, Archbishop of Montreal, who has been raised to the rank of cardinal of the Roman Catholic church. I do so on behalf of all those of the same faith and in particular in the name of the good people of the constituency of St. Maurice-Lafleche. His Eminence may be assured of our admiration, deep respect and filial devotion.

I also congratulate our Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, whose talents are recognized all over the commonwealth and have brought him his new title of doctor of the university of London. Our whole country is, undoubtedly, very proud of her brilliant Prime Minister.

There is another member of this house who, since he has been in public life, has spared neither his time nor his experience in the administration of the department entrusted to him and whose task is probably one of the most delicate and difficult. I refer to the Hon. the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who was recently honoured with a doctor's degree from Laval university. I beg the hon. minister to accept my most sincere compliments and congratulations.

In awarding this doctorate to such an outstanding person, Laval university has given recognition to one of the best promoters of national unity. For this we must give thanks to the broad-mindedness of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to French language and culture in this country. All my fellow Quebeckers are, I am sure, happy at what Laval university has just done.

Mr. Speaker, I turn now to another subject. I wish to acquaint you better with the St. Maurice district and particularly with the constituency of St. Maurice-Lafleche which I represent here. I will attempt to make these remarks as brief as possible, after which I will submit my suggestions for the industrial, agricultural and touristic advancement of this lovely part of my province.

My constituency has three main industrial towns, all situated on the banks of the St. Maurice river, whose total population now exceeds sixty thousand. First we have the town of Shawinigan, where I live, and whose population is now up to the thirty thousand mark, exclusive of the suburban community of Almaville or Shawinigan South, known as the largest village in Canada, with a population of ten thousand in itself. The town of Shawinigan is twenty miles north of Three Rivers. Although only fifty-one years old, she is the princess city of Mauricia. Her people hope that, before long, she will become the queen of Mauricia, with all due deference to my worthy colleague, the member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). You will find in our city a peaceful population, hard-working citizens and a competent labouring class. In addition to the electric power plants of the Shawinigan Water and Power, we have pulp and paper mills, aluminum carbide, textile and electro-chemical products plants of great importance. In addition to those already mentioned, there are about twenty industries of secondary importance which provide work for the people.

The city of Grand Mere is today separated from Shawinigan, so to speak, only by an imaginary line, since owing to the progress and expansion of these two sister cities, houses have multiplied along the whole distance between these two industrial centres. The population of Grand Mere is about 13,000. Its main industries are paper, textile and shoemaking.

If one travels northward for about sixty miles, along the St. Maurice, one comes to the nice little city of La Tuque, which has a population of 12,000; these people derive their living from an important pulp mill and numerous other private enterprises. In the neighbourhood of these three cities I have just mentioned, there are twenty-seven rural parishes. We may say, therefore, that the farmers of this area have ready markets which, in spite of the difficulties inherent to the area, are very useful to them.

I should like also to point out that the St. Maurice valley with its large fields, beautiful mountains, game-abounding forests and well-stocked lakes is admired and enjoyed by all nature-loving people. The tourist who pays a visit to this district cannot but be wonder-struck, cannot but prolong his stay and come back to it. This area offers all facilities for industrial development, so much so that, at a congress of professional engineers held recently at Shawinigan, a famous engineer stated that the St. Maurice area has known such an industrial expansion for the last fifty years that it deserves to be called the industrial valley of Canada.

Is this not an eloquent testimony to the participation of our district in Canadian industry? Hydroelectric power has always been the main factor in this rapid development; it is responsible for all our industrial production in its various forms. As a matter of fact there are seven power plants set up over a 125 mile stretch of the St. Maurice river, with a total capacity of approximately 200,000,000 horsepower. The total value of industrial production in the town of Shawinigan alone exceeds $90 million. The towns of Grand Mere and La Tuque also have industries with an annual production figure of several million dollars.

Our standing orders prevent me from reading into the record the names of any of the industrial concerns of a particular district. Nevertheless I would invite anybody who is interested to come and visit them on the spot.

I therefore suggest to the government the possibility of further developing Canadian industry with due regard to all the advantages offered by the St. Maurice district. According to Mr. G. K. Sheils, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, industrialists will, in the next few months, invest one billion dollars in plant construction and equipment.

As for the tourist trade, which always brings in considerable returns, I suggest we come to some agreement with our neighbours, concerning the stabilization at parity level of both currencies. Either side would thus succeed in avoiding numerous annoyances and such an agreement would further profit the tourist trade.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of numerous heads of families in my county may I address the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)? I should like to voice their complaints about the income tax scale. They have asked for exemptions up to $3,000. Considering the very high cost of living and the numerous obligations of those who have a wife and children, I feel convinced that all the complaints I have received are absolutely sincere.

I agree that a tax reduction in this category of wage earners would entail a notable reduction in public revenue. However, considering the normal increase in the budget for each fiscal year, would it not be possible to find compensation for this loss of revenue, while granting relief to the small wage earners?

It is no secret that there is in the province of Quebec a political movement known as the "Union des Electeurs". Like most hon. members, I believe, I receive numerous protests, resolutions and requests for amendment regarding some of our social and economic legislation. I have no doubt about the complete sincerity of those people. This at least tends to show the deep interest they are taking in all that pertains to public business, and I congratulate them for it. Some of their requests are fair and deserve to be taken into consideration by the government. However, for the time being, it is impossible under our constitution to implement some of the reforms advocated by the "Union des Electeurs". These gentlemen may rest assured that I am always willing to receive their constructive suggestions and help them whenever possible.

In regard to the thorny problem of taxation agreements between the province of Quebec and the central government, there is little I could add to the recent and quite appropriate speech made by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) and the comments of the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). However, I ask all members of the house to take the trouble of examining the facts, not from the point of view of self-interest, but carefully and objectively.

I might add that it would be much easier to come to an agreement if the Quebec government did not make a political issue out of the matter. In spite of what our opponents may think, the central government has always been very generous towards the provinces, although it does not seek all the credit for it. Too many people are completely in the dark about the large contribution made by the federal government to the cost of old age pensions and family allowances, which in my constituency amount to $2,804,000 per year. In addition, there are grants to universities, to hospitals and other national contributions to all kinds of associations devoted to the improvement of health services, to mention but those.

To come back to this business of publicity, I wonder how we must take the audacity of a certain Union Nationale member who, merely for reasons of publicity, no doubt, had his picture printed in a daily newspaper, handing over a cheque for $100,000 to the mother superior of a religious congregation in a great fit of generosity. Now this happens to be a federal grant. I was anxious to put matters right for the information of several people who have been misled and in order to warn the people against this type of political propaganda indulged in by our opponents.

I now come to another matter which has been mentioned very often in previous debates, that is, the question of a national flag. It will undoubtedly be said that the matter is under consideration, that a committee has already been formed to investigate the matter and so on and so forth, but the fact remains that Canada is still without a national flag.

Don't you find it rather strange, Mr. Speaker, that a free country like ours, both great and rich, a country that ranks among the great nations of the world, has been so long without a truly distinctive national flag?

In 1950, I had the great privilege of making a pilgrimage to Rome. Before leaving Europe, I made it a point to stay a few weeks in France, Belgium and Holland in order to visit the most important historical sites. Among these, Dieppe and Vimy, where so many Canadians won distinction for their bravery during the first great war, drew my attention and that of my three companions, Commander Albert Giguere, Rev. Raymond Cossette, parish priest, and Mr. Harry Desaulniers, a Shawinigan merchant. Accompanied by a French guide, who was a very eloquent patriot, I had the opportunity of examining at Vimy the tremendous work done by our soldiers as a prelude to a glorious victory. I read many of the names inscribed on the base of the huge monument. Many of these names were well known to us. These soldiers gave their lives to safeguard our liberties. My feelings of respect, pride and gratitude towards these courageous men were somewhat mixed with a certain feeling of uneasiness, which I could not hide. I would have liked to see these graves decorated with a national flag. Let us hope that before long those who thus gave their lives will receive from their country this last tribute. Their sublime sacrifice is worth it.

As we are now in the Christmas season, I take this opportunity to offer to this house my best wishes. My greetings go first to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister and to every member of his cabinet. I wish health, happiness and a long life to these men who contribute so much to the progress and development of our country. I make the same wishes for all members of the Liberal party. I hope that Providence will keep them for a long time to come in their present places.

I would also like to offer my best wishes to the members of the press gallery who spare neither time nor effort to keep the public informed on all social and political events which concern them. Health, happiness and long life; may the work they take on be more and more appreciated all the time.

I would not want to forget the hon. gentlemen who sit on the left. I extend my best wishes to them. May Providence grant them and their families a great deal of happiness, along with good health, and may Canadians continue to have only limited confidence in their administrative capacity, for the greatest good of the great majority of the citizens of this country.

(Text):

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, last evening the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) indicated that the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) would be speaking some time today with reference to the Currie report. I think it is fair to say that most hon. members of the house have been waiting with some anticipation for that speech. I too have been waiting for it for several hours. But since he is still in his place and has not yet chosen to speak, I feel that I should say a few words by way of comment on what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had to say this morning.

At the outset I want to congratulate the Prime Minister for his forthrightness in the statement he made concerning the fact that there had been an earlier draft of the Currie report in which changes had been made before it was presented to this house, in confirmation of the evidence which I presented on Monday. As I say, I congratulate him on his forthrightness in taking the house into his confidence, as he did; although, along with many other members in this house, I was shocked by what he was called upon to reveal.

He has confirmed the fact that before this report was presented to the house an earlier copy was placed in the hands of the deputy minister of the department that was being investigated, and that that deputy minister apparently was given the opportunity to "vet" the report before it was put in its final form.

I congratulate the Prime Minister for his directness in replying to one of my questions when he said that he himself was a bit surprised that this course had been pursued. I think the surprise he felt was felt even more strongly by many of us in this house.

Here is a case of a department being investigated as a result of certain scandalous events that took place. That investigation arose out of a demand in this house that such an inquiry be made. The promise that the investigation would be made, that it would be thorough and that it would be objective was given to this house by the responsible minister. As we now know, the report is a serious indictment of at least certain sections of that department and the people who come under that minister. Yet it appears that before it was put in its final form, the top people in that department were given a chance to look at the indictment that was to be made of them and to suggest certain changes. Mr. Speaker, most of us in this house feel that is a scandalous way in which to carry out an investigation of this kind. I confess that I felt a bit sorry for the Prime Minister in that he had to admit to the house that this had been done.

I wish also to extend my congratulations to the Prime Minister for something else. I do it with respect to the restraint which I felt he exercised in relation to another aspect of this whole matter. I can imagine some individuals in public life trying to cover up the really serious aspect of the matter by dragging in any red herring that might be found. I can imagine some persons in political life trying to blow up the questions which he asked of me. But he merely asked—and let it go at that—as to how the earlier copy of this report came into the possession of my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He asked the question—which was one of natural interest; I find a similar interest all over this building—as to how that copy of the report came into the possession of my leader; but he asked it and let it go at that. In other words, he recognized the fact—and he made that clear to the house in what he said this morning—that the important aspect of the matter with which I confronted him on Monday, arising out of the fact that we had in our possession this earlier copy, was the question as to how the changes came to be made and why they were made.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been in touch with my leader by telephone since this morning's sitting. I regret that, owing to illness, he is not able to be with us this week. He expressed to me the same view as that which I took from the Prime Minister's statement this morning, namely that the important question is not how he came into possession of the earlier copy but rather as to how and why the changes came to be made. In the light of that fact, I say on behalf of my leader that he does not feel obligated to say anything further at this time as to how this report came into his possession. He feels that the important thing for him to do has been done, namely that use should be made of the information that was in his possession so the public might find out what had happened. It is now clear to everyone that if he had not done so—if he had not carried out that obligation by asking me to raise this matter in the house on Monday—we would never have known that this report, this indictment of the Department of National Defence, was placed in the hands of the deputy minister for him to "vet" before it was presented in its final form to the minister and, through him, to the house.

As I have already said, we regard this as a very shocking situation. To us it indicates the attitude that seems to prevail in the Department of National Defence. It has already been made clear in the Currie report itself that it is an attitude toward public expenditure which is scandalous; it is an attitude toward public property which is shocking to the Canadian people, but in addition to that there seems to be this feeling on the part of the Department of National Defence that it is top dog, and that nobody has the right to question its decisions or its wisdom, the way it spends money or the way it operates its affairs. When an investigation is made, it takes the view that that investigation must be submitted to that department and to its top officials before the results of the investigation are made known to the house and to the country.

I was similarly astounded on Monday—and I feel even more that way when I go over the records in connection with this matter—at the fact that the Prime Minister when he tabled the report on Monday, gave us at the same time a memorandum on the Currie report signed by the chief of the general staff. I shall have something to say in a few moments about one of the paragraphs in that memorandum, but what I am saying at the moment is that there seems to be this attitude in the Department of National Defence. To me it is so at the political level, with the minister, and it seems to be so at the general staff level as well, that somehow or other they feel they are top dogs, that they can run the show in whatever way they say. That attitude is clear from what the Prime Minister said in answer to a question which my deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) asked yesterday when he inquired as to why that memorandum from the chief of the general staff was presented along with the report. "Why, simply because the chief of the general staff asked that it be done." That was, in effect, the Prime Minister's answer. Well, who is running this government? Who is to decide what is to be laid before the house when an investigation is being made into this department? I thought it was understood that Mr. Currie was making the investigation, and that all we asked for, all we were to be given, was his report. But, said the Prime Minister yesterday, at pages 764 and 765 of Hansard, in the midst of the speech of my deskmate:

> The explanation was that General Simonds requested that it be done.

It reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of an incident back in the days when Your Honour first assumed the chair as Speaker of this house. I refer to the flour milling report. You remember the information that we got at that time. It appears that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) showed that report to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He did not like the looks of it. So he said to the Minister of Justice that that report must not be made public unless there was another statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the same time so that the report of Mr. McGregor would not be misunderstood. Well, we took a very serious view of that position then. I take the same view now with respect to the apparent insistence by the chief of the general staff that at the very moment the Currie report was tabled, indicting the Department of National Defence, there had to be at the same time a memorandum from the chief of the general staff making certain explanations and demanding that Mr. Currie substantiate some of the statements that were made in that document. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask you the question: Who is running the show around here, anyway? This is a democracy. The elected people are the ones who should be in charge, and I do not think the chief of the general staff even had the right to make a request like that to the Prime Minister, let alone the Prime Minister yielding to that request.

I have had something to say about the memorandum by General Simonds. I note in particular that the part of Mr. Currie's report that he dislikes the most is referred to in paragraph 6 of his memorandum. The reference is to a certain section in the first part of the report, which brings us directly to the notorious page 17. As I say, I appreciated the forthrightness with which the Prime Minister spoke this morning when he admitted, in reply to questions that were put to him later, that there were some questions to which he did not know the answers, and he said he would try and ascertain the answers in due course.

I think we have to be told somewhere along the line the full story about page 17 of the Currie report. The Prime Minister said this morning that he was informed that it was not the subject of discussion on December 1, at any rate, between Mr. Drury, the deputy minister, and the representatives of Mr. Currie. Later on in the same discussion this morning the Prime Minister said he had no explanation to offer for the changes on page 17. We find in the memorandum of the chief of the general staff that there is a particular complaint about page 17. We now know that the report, before it appeared in its final form, was in the hands of the deputy minister of national defence. We do not know yet whether he showed it to others. One of the questions I should like to ask is whether that copy of the original draft, which apparently has been returned to Mr. Currie, has on it the initials of other people who saw it, and if so how many people did initial it? At any rate, it is clear that it was in the department, that they had a look at it, and for reasons that have not been given, not been explained, it turns out that on page 17, which directs certain remarks against those at or near the top, certain changes have been made. As a matter of fact there were two changes on that page. One of them is already well known, the original having read:

> But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes at or near the top.

As everybody knows, this was changed to read:

> —it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up.

In addition to that there was a slight change in the rest of the wording of that page. It goes on to read in the original form:

> There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not present in the degree required.

The version laid on the table of the house by the Prime Minister has the word "always" inserted, so that it reads:

> It was not always present in the degree required.

Now, the interesting point about the changes on that page is that they seem to soften the indictment on that page and in particular they seem to withdraw a bit of the heat that was directed toward some of those at or near the top in the army and in the Department of National Defence.

I notice that during the course of this debate there is a tendency on the part of our friends in the official opposition to put all the blame at the political level, and I do not particularly quarrel with them; and I ask them not to get too excited for a moment because I agree with them that in our responsible form of government the final responsibility does rest with the ministers, with the elected people. But they, by putting the full blame there, are eliciting from backbench Liberals around the house interjections that suggest that backbench Liberals think the blame should be put on the general staff. What I do not like about that interchange and that conflict between the Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals is the "either or" aspect of it. It seems to me from the terms of Mr. Currie's report that blame has to be attached at both levels. Blame has to be attached to some of those at the very top in the army itself for permitting conditions which allowed these thefts and this pilfering to take place, and certainly responsibility for there being people at these top levels who would permit that kind of situation rests with the minister himself, and there is no doubt about it that the final responsibility is there. But I think we should make it clear that there is some blame attaching to some of the top army people as well.

Last night the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who I presume has read the report—although I wondered a bit, from some of the things he said—asserted that in his view the whole difficulty was not to be found in any fault in the auditing system, or other arrangements in vogue in the Department of National Defence, but rather in human frailty. Well, you do not have to read very far in Mr. Currie's report to discover that in his view the case is the very reverse. He tells us that there was an open door, and that the only reason there was not more of this was due to the honesty of so many of the great mass of those in the armed forces. I think this emphasis that the Minister of Justice placed last night on human frailty in reference to members of the armed services was unfair, because Mr. Currie says—and it is right there in the early part of the report—that it was a loose situation, an open door, and the only reason there was not more of this kind of thing was that the men in the armed services had not walked through the door that was left open for them.

Well, the whole situation certainly adds up to a shocking and disgraceful picture, and I hope there will be drastic action to deal with it. There are cries among some of the backbenchers on the Liberal side that something should be done to some of those on the general staff. Well, anyone in the army itself who is responsible for any of the machinery, the attitudes and the psychology—and particularly that psychology described at page 17—should be dealt with severely. But certainly at the same time, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a minister who has permitted this sort of thing to go on—and it has been drawn to his attention time and again; it is several years since some of us first referred to some minor things that the auditor general in his report drew to the attention of the Department of National Defence—a minister in whose department there is a state of affairs such as that outlined in the Currie report should be doing something else than being a minister of national defence. And I earnestly hope, even before we can get around to a chance to let the people of Canada decide upon this matter at an election, that the rumours are true that there is going to be a change, and that somebody else will be in charge of this Department of National Defence, important as it is to the people of Canada and spending, as it does, so large a proportion of the public funds of this country.

I must confess I was startled by the lighthearted and nonchalant references made a moment ago by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mott). His references were made to the sort of thing that happens under conditions of actual warfare. Surely that does not justify this kind of thing happening here in Canada in peacetime. I believe that upon reflection the hon. member will regret what he said today, making light as he did of these rather huge transactions in pilfering and in downright thieving. I do not believe the hon. member for New Westminster expressed views that he will stand by. I certainly think they are not the views of Liberal members generally, let alone the rest of us. I think, rather, that all of us take this whole question as one of very serious import and serious consequence, and I hope there will be action at an early date.

With regard to this whole question of changes that were made in the report, I say again that I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the forthrightness with which he dealt with this question this morning. The fact that these changes were made indicates two things to me. One is that the changes that were made, particularly on page 17, seem to be with an eye to drawing away such heat as can be drawn away from highly placed persons. I do not like that. If highly placed persons are responsible for these conditions, then the report should have said so, as it did in the earlier version.

The other thing I do not like, and that these changes suggest to me, is something to which

I have already referred, namely the attitude the Department of National Defence seems to have, that it is running the show, that even when its administration has been called into question and is being investigated it has the right to see the report on that investigation, in its earlier form, before it is finally presented to the minister for presentation to the house.

I shall say no more at this time. But I do regard, as do all the members of this group, this whole affair as one that is extremely serious.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is very surprising that the members of the government should have been sitting back for three days now, without having a statement of government policy with regard to this Currie report made by one of the ministers. It is even more surprising that this afternoon we should have had the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) sitting in the house for two hours or more, apparently ready to speak; and yet he has let Your Honour call for the vote on the sub-amendment, without rising in his place and making any attempt to justify or to clear up this question on behalf of the government. It is also worthy of comment that apparently the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has seen fit to give the junior member of the cabinet the responsibility of explaining the government's stand on this question.

In my 17 years as a member of the house there has not been a more serious or a more damaging report than this Currie report brought before the House of Commons. I am afraid members of the government, and its supporters in the house, do not realize just how serious the report is for the Canadian people. For it is highly critical, highly damaging, even after changes have been made which have the effect of reducing criticism of the government. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has just pointed out, it is so significant that this morning the Prime Minister was unable to explain the most damaging change, that which deleted from the original report the words "at or near the top" and substituted therefor the words "higher up". At the same time the word "always" was inserted, thereby greatly weakening the sentence which was so condemnatory of the Department of National Defence. This insertion makes the sentence now read, "It was not always present in the degree required", whereas the original report contained the sentence, "It was not present in the degree required."

This situation is even more serious because the efficiency of the Department of National Defence is most vital at this present time. We are in a period of world tension with the civilized nations of the world divided into two camps, both rearming. We are faced with what is known as a cold war. Canada for the first time is in the position where her shores, and in fact many of her cities and probably most of the key centres, would be under attack in the event of a third world war. We lie on the air route between the Soviet union and the United States, and if a third war should occur Canada would be another Belgium.

This world situation is not one that will end in a matter of weeks or months. It is generally accepted that this period of tension, this cold war, may continue for ten or fifteen or twenty years. Perhaps no one who is in this chamber today will live to see the end of the cold war. As things stand at the present time there will be an end to it only if we go into what will be a very hot war. I repeat that under those conditions the efficiency of the Department of National Defence is vital to the nation.

The efficiency of that department is vital for another reason. Our people are being called upon to make a great effort, essentially in support of this defence department. Our young men are being asked to volunteer for service in Korea and Europe. Many of them have been killed and several hundred others have been wounded. This call is going out to the young men of Canada to make a sacrifice for their country. We see these advertisements in the papers every week urging our young men to enlist, to do their part to help the country. Surely the one thing to which they are entitled, without any question, is to have behind them a Department of National Defence which is even more efficient than any other department of government. It is not a question of the staff, or the minister, or his assistant; the Department of National Defence as a whole should be the most efficient department of government in Canada today.

Not only are young Canadians being called upon for these sacrifices; all Canadians are being taxed to a crippling degree in order to support the work of this defence department. I was amazed to read in the press this morning a report of the speech delivered last night by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Unfortunately I was able to hear only a small part of that speech. This report states:

> Justice Minister Garson said last night in the Commons that Canada is not overtaxed and the government does not admit any large-scale extravagance or carelessness in the civil service.

The heading is, "Canadians Said Not Overtaxed". I do not know where the Minister of Justice has been in recent months, or in recent years in fact. He is probably the only Canadian in the whole nation who does not believe that the Canadian people are being overtaxed. He is just that much behind the times.

We have a sales tax in Canada of 10 per cent, the highest in the history of the country. This tax is levied at the manufacturing level and then pyramids as it goes down to the level of the person making the purchase. We also have an income tax which is the highest we have ever had in peacetime, and which is making it extremely difficult for hundreds of thousands of Canadians to save for their old age. They are being placed in the position where they have to rely on security measures of one kind or another. Our corporation taxes are so high that there is not sufficient money available in Canada for the development of our resources, and billions of dollars must be brought in from the United States.

As I have said, a great portion of this money which is being taxed away from the Canadian people is devoted to the work of the Department of National Defence. Almost half of our budget for this current fiscal year is for the requirements of that department. I repeat that if there is one department of government which must be efficient at this time, it is the Department of National Defence.

I submit that the Canadian people and this House of Commons are entitled to a full statement of what the government proposes to do to remedy the defects outlined in the Currie report. Furthermore they are entitled to have immediate action taken to clean up this mess. So far we have had no such statement from any minister of the government. It would look as though all we are to get is a delayed explanation by a junior minister. In saying that I do not wish to belittle the minister in any way because he is a friend of many years' standing. He is also a neighbour and one of my constituents.

An hon. Member: Does he vote for you?

Mr. Green: I have not much hope of getting his support in the next election, but still I have to be a little careful. I repeat that this is not a job to be handled by a junior minister of the crown.

Steps should be taken at once to increase the efficiency of the defence department. That cannot be done successfully by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I say that for several reasons. He too is a man for whom I have a great deal of respect, but I think he has the wrong portfolio. He has shown clearly that he is not sufficiently practical to clean up a mess of this kind. We need only refer to the report to find where he has been negligent, and I turn to page 712 of Hansard where we find this paragraph in the Currie report:

> Before reciting the irregularities and their circumstances uncovered by the R.C.M.P.—with the assistance later of the provincial police and the army provost corps—it must be said—

These are the important words of the paragraph.

> —that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

What greater condemnation could there be of the Department of National Defence? What greater condemnation could there be of the deputy minister; and as such it must be taken as condemnation of the minister himself. Long ago he knew or should have known of these conditions, and he should have seen to it that they were cleaned up. If he had been an efficient, businesslike administrator he would have had them cleaned up.

Then I also suggest that the attitude of the minister is condemned in a paragraph on page 716 of Hansard. The minister was one of the higher-ups at least, and he certainly was at or near the top. The criticism contained in this paragraph must be taken as applying to him as well as to others. I think it is a perfectly accurate criticism of the minister. The heart of the paragraph is contained in the words, "costs count not at all." That has been the attitude of the minister. I am going to read the whole paragraph because I think it is a very reasonable statement of what we would expect. It reads as follows:

> The situation was complicated by still another factor. The Department of National Defence (including the army works services)—

You will note that the army works services are only given attention by being included in brackets.

> —was largely staffed and manned by men whose military training had been received in wartime. Its establishment and administrative practices reflected more clearly the urgent need and exigencies of war, when speed is everything and costs count not at all.

By the way, the minister's training took place in that same period, and I suggest that he has the attitude referred to in this paragraph. I continue:

> The carry-forward of this war psychology must be coupled with inadequate training and resultant ignorance on the part of personnel of their administrative duties and responsibilities. There was, in addition, indifference and reluctance on the part of military personnel to concentrate on administration to the degree required. It was not perhaps unnatural that these latter needs were largely forgotten or deliberately overlooked as soldiers gazed forward into the unknown consequences of the Korean outbreak, and foresaw still greater wars not very far away. But, if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up.

In the unabridged or unrevised edition the words are "at or near the top."

> There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not always present in the degree required.

The original edition does not contain the word "always". The minister had exactly that same background and his faults were the same as those of the others who were involved. It is to that this reference is made. It is no wonder, Mr. Speaker, with this attitude that costs count not at all, that we find such heavy overpurchasing. We find tenders called for 62,000 serving forks. After protest is made we find that cut to 40,000 and then to 14,000. I hear now that the latest call for forks is only for 220, which is a great deal more in line with the number of serving or cooks' forks that are required. We have had the purchase of over a million pairs of shoes and all the other overpurchasing.

I prophesy that in the final analysis many of these things will be turned over to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation to be sold at fire sale prices. I think the time has come when civilian goods of this kind should not be purchased in such large quantities, because if there should be a demand for them they can be made quickly by the existing industries. That is the trend now in the United States. In the United States News and World Report of December 5 I read a statement that they are planning now in the United States to set up reserve capacity to produce the requirements rather than manufacture the actual goods in such large quantities and then stockpile them, thereby probably bringing about obsolescence in many items and altogether a great waste of money.

Just last week I had one more example of the way the Department of National Defence has been carrying on. I have here the specifications that have been sent out to the tailors of Canada for the making of a peaked cap for air force officers. The document is called, "Tailoring specification to guide private procurement." There are five written pages of specifications for air force officers' caps and two blueprints. Here I have the first blueprint, which has to do with the chin strap on the cap. There are half a dozen drawings on it. I do not know whether they go down to the millionth of an inch, but they go down pretty small. All of the first blueprint has to do with the chin strap to go on the air force officers' peaked cap. I see that on the blueprint it says: "Note: tolerance: unless otherwise specified all fractional dimensions $\frac{1}{32}$ of an inch." The blueprint of the chin strap is dated October 27, 1952 and is issued by the directorate of interservice development, Department of National Defence. There is a note on it to the effect that it has been drawn by one individual and that the order has been placed or approved—I cannot read the word—by another. It is approved by another individual and checked by a third. That is the specification for a chin strap for an officer's cap. It looks like a machine gun specification.

There is here another specification, even larger, for the cap itself. There is a view of the cap from the north, east, south, and west —and it is also down to $\frac{1}{16}$ or $\frac{1}{32}$ of an inch tolerance. It has also been checked by three different officials in this directorate of the Department of National Defence. Now, what earthly hope is there of having an efficient Department of National Defence when you have business carried on in that way?

I say further that the Minister of National Defence cannot organize this department efficiently because he has failed time and again to heed the warnings given in this house. Not only have they been given to him for years, but he has always answered that everything was all right; why were we worrying? It was all a lot of waste effort. His attitude in the house was so different from the attitude of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) when minister of national defence for air. In those days he came into this house and told us frankly what things were bothering him. He said: My department has been making mistakes in this regard and in that regard. I admit it. And he asked the members to help him out. He asked them to give him suggestions for ways in which those defects could be remedied; but there is nothing of that kind with the present Minister of National Defence. He does not admit errors, and he has been pitifully complacent about these warnings that have been given to his department.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is the one and only minister of the crown who can take adequate action to meet this situation. He and he alone can call for the minister's resignation; and what is required is a new minister. It is high time this Department of National Defence was put on a businesslike basis. Furthermore, the Canadian people are entitled to a statement by the Prime Minister on this Currie report. He cannot delegate his responsibility for explaining the government's stand to any other cabinet minister, and I hope he will give this house his views with regard to this whole question.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on the amendment to the amendment I wish to deal with that motion and to indicate the course we propose to follow in regard to it.

The amendment to the amendment is put forward in the following motion:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following:
> "(f) To recommend legislation providing for the payment to producers, in respect of farm-stored grain, of an advance equal to 75 per cent of the initial price as established at August 1 in each crop year."

In dealing with the amendment now before us, it must be realized that the rules do not permit us to introduce any amendment to the wording of this subamendment. We must deal with it in its present form, whether we like that form or not.

In effect this subamendment does two things. It is a proposal that legislation be introduced to provide for a cash advance to producers in respect of their farm-stored grain equal to 75 per cent of the initial payment the producer would have received if he had been able to deliver that grain to an agency of the wheat board. The other effect of this resolution is to express want of confidence in the government in regard to their handling of the very large grain crop this year.

In view of the fact that farm storage of grain is not normal in Canada under ordinary circumstances when line elevator storage is available, it does not appear desirable that legislation should be designed to encourage farm storage when satisfactory elevator storage is a practical possibility. On the other hand it now seems necessary, and urgently necessary, that something be done to make cash available to the farmers for farm-stored grain, if they are to meet their current debts and make the necessary arrangements for the next year's crop. That is the principle at issue.

I emphasized this in my own remarks in the early stages of this debate on the speech from the throne. I would like to quote what I said on November 24 regarding this very subject, and I am reading from page 27 of Hansard:

> The whole system of handling and distribution has broken down. The government, no matter what its explanation may be, has failed to take effective steps to provide for the handling of grain, in spite of the knowledge many months ago, and the warnings many months ago, that this situation was going to arise. In western Canada today there are many farmers, with huge quantities of wheat and other grains worth considerable sums of money, who are unable to get money at this time to cover their harvesting and living expenses because of their inability to deliver that grain to market.
> This is a situation with which the government should deal immediately. It is urgent and calls for attention without delay.

As evidence of the fact that the government has not been meeting this situation, I would refer by way of illustration to the evidence furnished by a reply which was given today by the Department of Trade and Commerce. In response to a query as to the capacity of the dominion government grain elevator at Lethbridge, the answer shows that in November, which was the peak month this year for the handling of grain, that government grain elevator—at a time when there is such an accumulation of grain in western Canada—had only one-third of its actual capacity occupied. In the answer by the Department of Trade and Commerce the capacity of that elevator is given as 1,250,000 bushels, but in November there was stored in that elevator 457,161 bushels. That is merely evidence to support the statement that the government should be taking action to deal with this question.

For that reason we certainly support the purpose of this subamendment in principle. Legislation should be introduced to make cash available for grain which it has become necessary to store on the farms because of the abnormal conditions this year.

In dealing with the wording of any amendment or subamendment it is not possible to cross every "t" and dot every "i". We cannot vary the wording. Dealing with this subamendment strictly upon the basis of principle, we unhesitatingly support the proposal for legislation which will meet the urgent needs of the farmers of western Canada at this time, in accordance with what I have already said on behalf of our party at an earlier stage in this debate. On the ground, and recognizing that much more needs to be said in regard to the details of the legislation and the procedure by which this principle would become operative, all of which can be dealt with when the legislation is actually before us, we do propose to support this subamendment and hope that the government will accept the principle which it establishes, so the farmers of western Canada may know that they are going to be able to meet the critical financial problems which confront them at this time.

The other feature of this subamendment is that it amounts to an expression of want of confidence in the government in regard to its handling of the present grain crop. From what we have already said there need be no doubt that we welcome the opportunity to express by our vote the strong criticism we believe should be directed against the government for their failure to deal with this situation which was so clearly anticipated many months in advance. With that matter I have already dealt in this debate. They have failed to take appropriate steps to meet a situation which had been openly discussed for a long time. They have failed to make transportation facilities available. They have failed to make arrangements under which the farmers can obtain the necessary cash for their daily requirements and their future production. On this ground we support the subamendment as an expression of criticism of the gross incompetence of the government in dealing with a situation which was apparent for a long time.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on this amendment to the amendment I feel that I should say a few words with regard to it. I am pleased that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has indicated that they will support the subamendment. As a matter of fact it is not asking for a great deal, if we consider the position of the wheat grower in the United States. We in western Canada farm under much the same conditions as do the wheat producers in the areas to the south of us. In the United States the wheat producers have what is known as a parity price for their wheat, based on the conditions which existed in that country from 1909 to 1914. Provision is made for a cash advance on farm-stored grain in the United States which is equal to 90 per cent of that parity price at the present time. That provision enables the farmer in the United States, under similar conditions, to obtain approximately $2 a bushel as an advance on farm-stored grain. In this amendment all we are asking is 75 per cent of the initial price of grain as determined by the government on August 1 of each year. On that basis, this year it would mean an advance payment of between 85 and 95 cents a bushel to the average producer in western Canada.

In view of the similarity between the conditions which exist in the two largest wheat-producing areas in the world, we feel that in western Canada we should have somewhat similar treatment. The fact that this or some similar payment is not made available means that in the fall of the year many of the producers in western Canada, in order to get cash to meet their obligations which come due in the fall, are obliged to sacrifice some other product which they produce. Quite often this takes the form of selling their livestock; and that is what has taken place over the last number of years. The farmer has not enough money available, under the initial payment and the quota, to meet his obligations. He is therefore obliged to sacrifice his livestock. That is one of the reasons we get congestion in our livestock market in the fall of the year, with the result that at that time prices to the producer are demoralized.

When I was in western Canada this fall we were marketing first-grade beef cattle at from 18 cents to 21 cents a pound, where they were under the weights required. Under the floor price legislation which was provided for beef at that time, an animal had to dress 700 pounds. There in western Canada, as I said, I saw first-grade beef cattle weighing from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds live weight, and dressing from 500 to 600 pounds, being sold for 18 cents to 21 cents a pound. After I came down east here to attend the session of parliament I happened to be on a farm in eastern Ontario, and the farmer showed me a return which he had received that day on a three-year-old Holstein steer which he had sold, and which weighed 1,600 pounds. He received 25 cents a pound for it. He received in the neighbourhood of $400 for an inferior beef animal which we were selling in western Canada, dressing somewhat less, for in the neighbourhood of $200.

If some provision were made whereby cash could be made available to farmers in Canada as suggested in this subamendment, I am certain that it would prevent chaotic conditions in the marketing of other agricultural products in the fall of the year. I see no reason why it cannot be done. It is all right for the government to say that the farmer can go to a bank and get money if he needs it, when he has good marketable grain in store on his farm. But there are many farmers, especially the smaller ones, who over the years have had little dealings with the banks. It is all right for the large farmer who has a section or two of land. He has probably had dealings with banking institutions over the years, and he can obtain the credit that is necessary to carry on in an emergency. The smaller farmer, however, the man who has not had dealings with the bank and whom the banker does not know, finds it exceedingly difficult to obtain the necessary credit.

I do not intend to press this matter further, but I think the government should give serious consideration to the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS FOLLOWING CORONATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I beg the indulgence of the house for a moment before it is called six o'clock. I have here a statement which was made in the House of Commons at Westminster this afternoon. It was agreed at the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers and representatives attending the economic conference on December 11 that Mr. Churchill should make an announcement before parliament rose on December 19. The announcement is in the following terms:

> I am glad to be able to inform the house, that after consultation between the prime ministers of members of the commonwealth, and in accordance with precedent, it has been agreed that a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers should be held in London immediately after the coronation next year.

I understood that Mr. Churchill made this announcement in the House of Commons at Westminster at or about half past three this afternoon.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. J. L. Deslieres for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, before addressing my remarks to the Petawawa incident and some related matters, I should like to dispose of the question that has been raised from time to time, I think twice yesterday, with respect to the retirement of Brigadier Connelly. I should like to do this by reading to the members of the house a statement prepared by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) which reads as follows:

> Hon. members are well aware of the confidential nature of the relationship which must exist between the Minister of National Defence and his service advisers.
> The head of each of the armed services is responsible for the efficiency of his service and it is part of that responsibility to make recommendations regarding the retention or retirement of officers having regard to the best interests of the service.
> The chief of the general staff recommended to me that Brigadier Connelly should be retired and after discussing the matter with the chief of the general staff I felt that the retention of Brigadier Connelly would not be in the interests of the services or of the public and therefore approved the recommendation.
> This retirement was dealt with entirely as a military matter and the Secretary of State for External Affairs had nothing whatever to do with it in any way.

That is the end of the minister's statement.

I have listened throughout the past few days with very great interest to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and his followers in their attempts to indict the Minister of National Defence and embarrass the government by playing up a relatively small matter into one in which they seek to involve the whole of the army and the whole of the Department of National Defence. The basis on which they seek to raise this amazing superstructure is the activities of a few crooks and thieves at Petawawa who stole and converted to their own use equipment and stores at the army works services depot there. By exaggeration and by irresponsible statements and unreasonable deductions, they have in my opinion succeeded in working themselves into considerable hysteria politically, which political hysteria they seek to pass on to the people of this country. Maybe that is just another way of saying that they appear to be endeavouring to play politics with the Currie report.

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, the minister cannot read that into any remarks which have been made.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): A whole lot worse than that could be read in.

Mr. Lennard: The Currie report speaks for itself.

Mr. Campney: I am sure now that any remarks of mine will not have any effect upon the members of the opposition in this regard.

Mr. Pearkes: Not if they are that kind.

An hon. Member: Or on the people of Canada.

Mr. Campney: On that point I disagree with my hon. friend opposite. It might be helpful to members of this house and to the people of Canada generally, whom after all we represent here—

An hon. Member: What representation!

Mr. Campney: —to have the situation reduced to its proper proportions and dealt with coolly and factually, and with due regard to the use of words and some sense of proportion. The situation at Petawawa arose primarily from the operations of certain crooks, some of them within the service and some of them civilians outside the service, who conspired together to steal and convert and turn to their own use certain stores and equipment at Petawawa.

I should like briefly to run over the narrative of that phase of the matter. I might say that in the late summer of 1951 the provost corps, the inspector of quartermasters' services and the auditor general's representative in checking over the situation at Petawawa, which was growing in activity at a tremendous rate, found some minor irregularities. They were not very great ones, but they were sufficient to lead them to be reported to the department. That report was under consideration and remedial measures were also under consideration when the letter referred to in Mr. Currie's report was received. That was in October.

As soon as this letter was received the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were asked immediately by the minister to make a thorough and complete examination of the situation at Petawawa. This the R.C.M.P. proceeded to do, assisted by the officers of the provost corps.

By February of 1952 sufficient information had been accumulated to indicate that a conspiracy did in fact exist, as I have intimated, and that individuals additional to those at first suspected were implicated in the conspiracy and theft. The minister immediately appointed local counsel, and later appointed Mr. J. W. Pickup, Q.C., now chief justice of the high court of Ontario, as senior counsel. Prosecutions were launched and that was announced by the minister in the House of Commons on April 21 last.

Those prosecutions were launched as promptly as the accumulated facts warranted and were pressed to conclusion as speedily as the processes of the courts would permit. Five military personnel and ten civilians were charged. Of the five military personnel, two were officers and three were non-commissioned officers. Four of the five military personnel were convicted and sentenced, as were eight of the ten civilians. In addition, disciplinary action was taken against a certain number of other military personnel as well.

The evidence adduced at the trials indicated that a fairly comprehensive system of collusion had been worked out between those within the service and those without. That is why it probably took longer than would ordinarily have been the case where a straight theft had occurred, to correlate the information and ensure that the guilty persons might be punished. That in brief is the story of the criminal side of the Petawawa matter.

I submit that in all the steps in that connection the minister acted with dispatch, the department acted with dispatch and the guilty people were in fact punished. I do not think there is anything very earth-shaking in that, because thefts do occur and conspiracies do occur. They occur in all phases of our day to day life. Because a bank is robbed, you do not seek to indict the president. Because gold is stolen from a mine, you do not start out by arresting all the directors.

These things happen. Nobody likes them; nobody approves of them, but they take place. The fallibility of human nature is not confined to any particular class of people or to any particular area. Yet from the strictures which I have heard, especially yesterday and today, it would appear that it is sought by opposition members to hold the Minister of National Defence liable for all these incidents of stealing, petty thieving and pilfering which occur throughout the tremendous properties, buildings and areas which the Department of National Defence operates. So far as the thefts at Petawawa are concerned, while nobody condones them, and certainly nobody approves of them, they were not as a matter of fact in the aggregate of very great magnitude—

An hon. Member: We don't know what they were.

[Mr. Campney.]

Mr. Campney: —and I think Mr. Currie's report indicated that.

Mr. Ferguson: How can you tell what they were?

An hon. Member: Mr. Currie does not know.

Mr. Campney: I do not know whether Mr. Currie knows, but he looked at all the evidence adduced in the police courts. He quoted a lot of it for the benefit of my friends opposite and he makes this finding or submission. On page 11 of the report he says:

> The evidence examined does not disclose irregularities involving relatively large sums of money, but, rather, an impressive array of petty irregularities on an extensive scale.

Again he says:

> No reliable estimate of the total loss can be prepared. It does, however, appear probable that the total loss resulting from misappropriations and irregularities by military personnel at Petawawa was not large.

Again at page 11—

Mr. Pearkes: Finish that paragraph.

Mr. Campney: —he said:

> The police, too, have been able to recover by far the greater quantity of the missing goods, and these have been returned to stores.

It seems to me that what I have stated is a fair and complete record of the thieving itself and of the incidents that took place at Petawawa. The situation was a local one and would ordinarily be treated as such and dealt with by the police and the criminal courts. There is no new evidence cited in the report that was not available in the criminal courts, and that was not used there. In short, all the incidents to which Mr. Currie refers by way of evidence, as it were, took place in 1950 and early 1951, and were all public property a long time ago.

But there is another side of the Petawawa matter, and I should now like to address myself to that. I refer to the question of the operations of the Department of National Defence at Petawawa. Coincidentally with the minister authorizing the appointment of counsel, the launching of prosecutions and the criminal proceedings at Petawawa, in view of the extent to which these things seemed to have prevailed from the information that had been gleaned, involving, as I said, five military personnel and ten civilians, the minister took the view that he ought to have the whole situation reviewed apart from the criminal prosecutions to see what was the situation at Petawawa within the departmental picture. Accordingly he appointed Mr. George Currie to make a complete investigation. I should like to quote a few sentences from the minister's statement in the house on April 21 when he announced the appointment of Mr. Currie. He said:

—I have engaged Mr. George S. Currie, chartered accountant of Montreal, a former deputy minister of national defence, to make a full investigation of the situation, security and accounting procedure for engineer stores, equipment and services at Petawawa and elsewhere . . . Everything possible will be done to get to the bottom of this situation and take such action and adopt such remedies as may be required.

I should like to observe in passing that the appointment of Mr. Currie was made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and was not made by the house or by the government. His appointment was made at the instance of the minister in an effort to find out what the situation was at Petawawa with a view to having that situation remedied. As I will develop a little later, by reason of the fact that Mr. Currie was appointed and engaged by the minister he worked with officials of the Department of National Defence. They worked with him. Everybody was interested in finding out what had really happened to permit a conspiracy of members of the service with outside civilians to develop at Petawawa. If the minister had been so disposed, I think he might very well have regarded Mr. Currie's report as a document privileged to him, but he did not take that view. He never did take that view.

On the other hand he never said in the house in any statement he made that he would table the report or that he would regard it as a parliamentary document. I am not raising the issue and I am not arguing it; I am merely saying the fact is that he caused the Currie report to be tabled voluntarily because he felt that members of the house should know what the situation was. I think in doing so he showed courage, although he has incurred certain opprobrium from the members of the opposition by reason of what was in the report. I want it to be clear on the record that the report was made by a man engaged by the minister as a minister.

Between the date of the appointment of Mr. Currie and the filing of his report Mr. Currie was given access, and properly so, to all records of the department and of the army works services and depots, and to all the information and assistance from the officials of both that he desired. The result was that he made a survey and a study not only of Petawawa, where the incident which provided the occasion for his appointment arose, but of army works service units at Toronto, London, Camp Borden, Barriefield, Vancouver, Regina, Quebec and Halifax. He visited army works service depots, studied their situations and based a report thereon.

He came to certain conclusions with respect to army works services in general and with respect to Petawawa in particular. His conclusions were in the first place that there had been some break-down in administration, supervision, accounting and security in the depots operated by the army works services, and I propose to deal with that a little later. He also stated, as indicated at page 2 of his report, that notwithstanding the fact that he did not think operations were all that could be desired, only at Petawawa were there any substantial losses from the irregularities. This is what he had to say:

It does not fit the facts to indict or to smear the whole army works services personnel because of the sins of a handful of crooks.

So far as I know he found no other handful of crooks than those at Petawawa, and he studied all depots throughout the country.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Campney: So far as his general recommendations and findings are concerned, he also stated that the system of accounting would seem to be a proper one but that it was not operated properly, and I should like to make some comment on that. Before I do so, I should like to deal for a moment—because I think we should look at these things practically and realistically—with the army works services, what they were and what happened to them in two or three years.

The army works services are chiefly maintenance units, small in size, which look after running maintenance and minor construction at army camps throughout the country. In most cases up until Korea or just before their work was not relatively very extensive. For example, at Petawawa camp in 1947 the army works services were on a sort of caretaker basis. It was a big camp, but they had about 100 personnel and spent probably $100,000 a year in maintenance of that camp. Now, as is indicated in Mr. Currie's report—and of course verified by the figures from the department—that has all changed. As he states at page 16 of the report:

During the 1952-53 period, the Petawawa detachment will expend something in excess of $1 million on its own account, as well as having administrative responsibility for supervising some $20 million of new construction—

In other words, from spending $100,000 per annum in five years that unit had to take care of spending $1 million and supervising another $20 million, while its personnel has increased from about 100 to between 400 and 500. I think any practical person will realize —in civil life or in army life; it doesn't matter—that to step up an organization from 100 to nearly 500 or we will say 450, and from spending $100,000 to spending $1 million per year and supervising the expenditure of $20 million per year as well is a big increase in duties and responsibilities in a short period of time. The difficulties that would be encountered in finding suitable technical people would be, and have continually been one of the most serious problems of the Department of National Defence ever since the expansion of the army started.

At Petawawa today we have two complete regiments with all ancillary services, over 4,500 people. We have a huge establishment that has to be looked after by the army works services.

I would now like to make a few observations with respect to what I said about Mr. Currie's statement that the accounting system seems to be all right but that it was not operated properly.

Mr. Adamson: Accounting if necessary, but not necessarily accounting.

Mr. Campney: I would like to make a few observations on that. In 1948 the Department of National Defence itself made an intensive study of the army works services and of the accounting and supervising system. A complete reorganization was effected, and now we have 16 works companies with 33 detachments distributed throughout Canada from Vancouver to Newfoundland and from the north to the south of Canada. We have a personnel of about 7,500. It was intended that this system of accounting and supervision would be introduced into the army works service units in 1950 and 1951 as fast as suitable personnel could be obtained. Mr. Currie, at page 12 of his report, recognizes the efficacy of this system when he says—and it is this system to which he is referring:

> The fault did not lie in the accounting system, which was a good one had it been operated properly.

I want to make some remarks on that later.

> It was a new system, based on American and British as well as Canadian experience, and embodied features which, theoretically, would have quickly checked irregularities as they appeared.

He also says:

> The accounting system, however, was not properly operated, nor were the regulation inventories methodically carried out.

That is true and there are reasons for it. The reaction on the part of any member or any citizen would be: Why was not the accounting system carried out? I think that is a fair and reasonable question, and it is a question that should be answered. I will try, in my humble way, to give an answer to that question, although Mr. Currie almost does it for me on page 15 of his report when he says:

> —the problems, difficulties and shortcomings of the army works services outlined above—which he had dealt with—

> —suggest that they have been caused for the most part—but by no means altogether—by the tremendous and sudden expansion of its activities brought about by the Korean war and by the large scale defence program involved in carrying out our NATO activities.

Again he says:

> The establishment approved for the army works services after the second world war did not envisage the sudden expansion which was to take place in 1950. It was designed to carry out a purely peacetime role of planning, development and construction on an annual expenditure of approximately $20 million. This establishment became quickly burdened under the impact of big scale rearmament. In September, 1950, the program was increased to about $80 million. In the following April, it was increased to about $200 million. The program envisaged in the 1952-53 fiscal year aggregates about $250 million. The magnitude of this responsibility is reflected in an investment in plant and buildings which now amounts to $750 million and is still rising.

The question which follows from that—because after all that is an enormous expansion—is, why could not the army keep up with the rapid expansion? Civilian industry cannot do it always, although it does do it sometimes. The pertinent question in my mind, and I think in the minds of all members, is why could they not keep up with it. Well, I should like to say that there are probably three reasons why the army was not able to keep up with that expansion. The first reason is, I think, the root of some of the difficulties that have been encountered in the army works services. The army works service depends, as far as its direction is concerned, on engineers and accountants. They must be available and they must be on hand at all those depots, and they must be competent and trained.

As the demand by the army for engineers and accountants grew, the civilian demand for the same people was also growing. As between the army and the civilian industry of this country, the civilian industry is not bound by any particular restrictions or regulations. They go out, and nobody can complain of it, and pay any price to get what they go after—if they can afford it. Now, the army has to operate on regulations, on rank, and on salaries and allowances. They cannot go out and get a captain of engineers today and pay him what they have to pay him, and then go out and get another one tomorrow and pay him something different. They have to operate within a framework. The same thing applies to their civilian supervisors such as accountants. In that connection, and I do not say so with any disparagement, they also have sitting over them a body known as the civil service commission. The civil service commission has its categories for accountants and it has its salary range. As far as I can tell from looking quickly at the relevant figures, an engineer entering the armed services from college, or an accountant after his graduation, will take about five years to arrive at the point from which he could start in very many commercial industries.

That is a real problem, and you do not solve it by drawing something out of a hat. The department had to do the best it could and it had to try and train a lot of people itself. The department did try to train them while work was piling up and piling up still higher. As reasonable people, can hon. members imagine how much time the meagre staff we had in those depots had for training other people while they were also carrying out duties many times in excess of those which they had ever carried out before? That was the problem the department had to cope with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question at this point?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister say that it was a shortage of trained staff which caused this difficulty?

Some hon. Members: No, no, no.

Mr. Campney: I would think that is so, because we were understaffed at those places and duties were ever increasing. There is no question in my mind about that. Of course there is always the human factor too. I am not ruling that factor out because the fallibility of people also has a bearing. When you have to get a large number of people in a hurry you cannot be quite so particular about the type of people you get; and the people you get, whether they are on the civilian side of the department or in the army, are just like everybody else; they are good, bad and indifferent. You do not get all perfect people; because whether it is an army unit or in the civilian services of the Department of National Defence, there are always a few people who go wrong. But who does not have such people? Commercial companies have them. Every department of government has them. You cannot avoid that.

I would ask hon. members to keep in mind at all times that while we were trying to solve these problems there was a continual burden being thrust upon the army works services which in some cases was almost fantastic as compared with what they had had to do two or three years previously. That is a real problem for anybody to try to solve. I do not think any reasonable man will fail to recognize the effect of that problem on the development of a large service in a short period of time, especially when we consider the increasing and expanding industrial life of this country.

The situation is now improved and is still gradually improving and will be restored, but it will take some time yet before all the various units are really what they ought to be. That is nobody's fault. It just cannot be done except gradually and steadily, and that is what we are trying to do. I think we should recognize that Mr. Currie was right when he said:

> It does not fit the facts to indict or to smear the whole army works services—

I quoted that language before.

Mr. Drew: What page is that?

Mr. Campney: Page 2.

An hon. Member: Page 87.

Mr. Campney: He says:

> It does not fit the facts to indict or to smear the whole army works services personnel because of the sins of a handful of crooks.

In other words we have to look at the two pictures. There is the case of the thefts and there is the case of the administration, and you have to look at them not only together but separately as well. I should just like to say—

Mr. Drew: May I ask at what point on page 2 that quotation is to be found?

An hon. Member: Have you not read it?

Mr. Campney: It should be on page 2. No, it is my mistake; it is page 3.

I have tried to show some of the reasons why I say the general situation was one that was created by circumstances beyond the control of the Department of National Defence or beyond the control of any organization to meet quickly and effectively in the light of the situation with which we were faced. I say that the opposition has sought to take the incidents at Petawawa and magnify them into a general criticism of our stores accounting system and, at least by inference, to say that the whole system has something wrong with it.

An hon. Member: And so it has.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is your opinion.

Mr. Campney: I should like to take one incident and set it off against that. That is the case at Plouffe park. I should like to quote not a member of the official opposition —because I have not heard any of them mention this incident—but a member of one of the opposition groups, in connection with that particular operation. No. 26 ordnance depot at Plouffe park is one of the largest in Canada, of course. As of November 30 of this year it had a stock of $97 million worth of goods—almost $100 million worth in fact—comprising 30,000 different types of items. This depot turns over $30 million worth of stock a year and handles approximately 230,000 separate items. When we were considering this particular subject in the select committee on defence expenditure, we made a visit to Plouffe park and after we had done so the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) at the next meeting of the committee on May 27 said, as reported at page 287 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence:

> What I wanted to see was a lot of detail. And all we did see was these principles whereas what I was interested in seeing was how these principles were put into effect, how the record worked, how the stock gibed up with the actual record of stock kept—those were details in which I was particularly interested. I am quite sure none of us have seen them in the time at our disposal yesterday but I got the impression that we only saw what we were expected to see. I may be quite wrong but I do want to see something else.

It was arranged that the hon. member should go down to Plouffe park, look around and check up in any way that he liked, and he did so. Then on June 3, in the select committee on defence expenditure he said:

> A week ago, Mr. Chairman,—

This is the hon. member for Winnipeg North again.

> —I expressed some dissatisfaction with the conducted tour since I wanted to see things that I did not see. I said in committee that I wanted to be foot loose and on my own.

Then he goes on and says that he was given an opportunity to see what he wished and he says:

> What we did was to take an indent at random and trace it all the way through till the stores asked for on the indent were issued out. I saw in detail what I had wanted to see previously, and from what I did see I am quite satisfied that the system down there is as good as human ingenuity can make it. Of course we have to take into consideration that weaknesses in the human factor will break down any system, but the various checks on individuals should be adequate to prevent any loss.

Then here is the final sentence, which I commend to hon. members of the house because it raises the perennial question of security which is always relative as between how much it costs and how much you can hope to save. There is no rule that is inflexible. At page 337 the hon. member for Winnipeg North says:

> To have complete security would make the cost so enormous that it would far exceed, I think, the losses that are sustained.

That is a comment by a member of one of the opposition groups with respect to a large operation, and I quote it for that reason—

Mr. Benidickson: Is that member not a professional accountant?

[Mr. Campney.]

Mr. Campney: I understand that he is a chartered accountant. I quote those remarks for this reason, namely that there is a tendency to make it appear that Petawawa practically represents the whole picture. One swallow does not make a spring and what happened at a little depot at Petawawa does not really indict the government if some thievery occurs at that place. As citizens of this country and as members of this house I think we should be realistic and practical. From the arguments we have heard yesterday and today it would appear that it is the feeling of the hon. members of the opposition that the Minister of National Defence, personally and physically, should stand guard over every railway siding, look after every stores depot and every airfield, and generally be in all places at all times and see what goes on everywhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Campney: But when we are spending almost $2 billion a year I think that is just another fantastic opposition idea, that he should be able to do that.

Mr. Ferguson: Nobody expects him to do that. They expect him to do his job and hire the proper people.

An hon. Member: Look who is talking.

Mr. Campney: I should now like to deal briefly with the recommendations of Mr. Currie.

Mr. Fraser: Before the minister leaves that—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Order; sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A question can only be asked with the permission of the minister. If the minister gives consent to the question being asked, it can be asked.

Mr. Drew: Give him a chance to ask it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not for the Speaker to give the hon. member a chance to ask the question. It is for the member who has the floor to decide whether the question should be asked.

Mr. Campney: I notice that my time is almost exhausted and I still have two or three points that I should like to make. If I have any time left I shall be glad to answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should point out to the house that the minister's time is limited to forty minutes, unless he has the unanimous consent of the house to continue at the expiration of his forty minutes.

Mr. Pouliot: On a point of order, I submit that the minister who undertakes the defence of his department has unlimited time, according to the rules of the house.

Mr. Campney: The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) on December 15 and 16 respectively made some reference to the question of recommendations made during the conduct of the investigation by Mr. Currie, and I should like to deal briefly with those observations. At page 695 of Hansard the hon. member for Nanaimo said:

> You will notice that a flat denial was given by the Minister of National Defence that there had been any interim report; that he has had no further communication other than that brief conversation, which is reported, with Mr. Currie. One cannot help expressing amazement, when one reads the first page of the report which was tabled today. At the bottom of that page appears these words:
> "It should be noted that interim suggestions made by me during my investigation have been already seized on, and important reforms are already being carried out."

On the following day the Leader of the Opposition said, as reported at page 759 of Hansard:

> On the very first page I find these words addressed to the minister—

And then he quoted the same excerpt from the report and said:

> Mr. Speaker, is it possible for any hon. member of this house to be in any doubt that those suggestions were made to the Minister of National Defence? Is it possible for any hon. member of this house to doubt that in any event those suggestions were brought to the attention of the Minister of National Defence?

The answer to that briefly is that Mr. Currie was appointed by the Minister of National Defence to look into the situation that existed at Petawawa and to check on other army works service depots and to advise him, to help him in arriving at any necessary changes or steps to be taken that would improve the situation. Mr. Currie and his assistants, from the time he was appointed, not only worked in conjunction with the service people and the civilians at all these depots but also with the staff at headquarters. He had access to all the files; he had all the information it was possible to give him, and he had every bit of help he could get from the department, either in outlying posts or in Ottawa. From time to time—there is nothing mysterious about it—his men observed weaknesses in the accounting division of the department and in other divisions also and detailed steps that they thought should be taken to improve the situation. These steps were taken. These steps were taken not by the minister. They were administrative steps taken all along the line wherever it was found that something could be improved. They were taken up with the subordinate officials, if they could be done in that way, and with other officials up to the deputy minister if necessary; but no reports were made to the minister. These were detailed recommendations making for the effective operation of the department. And I think they were proper. I think it would be wrong not to have made use of those recommendations as quickly as possible. But the inference that starts with that and continues along as if Mr. Currie's report was prepared or altered or handled by the minister or the acting minister is not true directly or indirectly, formally or informally, and I want to make that very clear.

I would like to refer briefly to the recommendations. In the time remaining at my disposal I am not going to go into them in as much detail as I had intended.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Temiscouata did raise the question as to whether the minister has unlimited time. I do not think I should be called upon to decide that, as I understand the house has given him unanimous consent, in any event, to continue.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Green: Go ahead.

Mr. Campney: I will not detain the house very much longer.

Mr. Drew: So that there may be no doubt, there is certainly consent to the minister who is speaking to proceed. But when the minister takes it upon himself to say that certain things are not true, in view of the fact that he was not even a minister of the crown at the time these events occurred, I trust that he will explain from whom he obtained the information on which he bases his present statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Campney: I shall be glad to do that. I obtained it by telephone from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton).

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is hearsay for you.

Mr. Chevrier: You tell that to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell).

Mr. Howe: You came all the way back just to say that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the kind of denial we get here.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Campney: The recommendations in the Currie report were 44 in number, and they were classified into five groups. I am not going to try to deal with them in detail, because no doubt the select committee on defence expenditures will want to do that. There are five classes of recommendations: those dealing with organization and control; those dealing with personnel; those dealing with accounting; those dealing with stores; and those dealing with security.

Of the ten recommendations dealing with organization and control, eight have already been put into effect and are operative now. I am not going to take time to analyse all those recommendations, but I should say that some of them were put into effect before Mr. Currie made his report or started his work, owing to the investigations and the plan that had been evolved by the department in 1948 and 1949.

Of those dealing with personnel, six recommendations in all, five have already been considered or put into effect or are about to be. Of the recommendations dealing with accounting, three have been put into effect. There were eight altogether. Of those dealing with security there are eleven recommendations, of which two have been put into effect.

The question of security is the most difficult of all the problems, I think, that confront the department. That is true for a number of reasons. It has been suggested that we put a fence around Petawawa, which would be about 70 miles. I do not know how that would work out. We have had a lot of suggestions on how to effect security in these large areas. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) touched the heart of the matter when he said that the question of security is always bound up with what it costs in relation to what you are likely to lose.

Those recommendations are all receiving study by the department; but they are not easy of solution.

Now, in concluding my remarks I should like to stress one point; that the basic problems of the army works services arose almost entirely from the stress produced by a cold war on a prosperous and expanding economy such as we have in Canada today. As a result we are in competition for technical personnel with people with whom, in some ways, it is difficult to compete.

I do not wish to maintain that our defence effort is perfect, but I do believe that it is an honest, serious and effective effort to meet the situation, and to provide as sound and effective a job as may be possible by the joint efforts of service personnel and civilians in the department. I should like to call the attention of the house to part of the statement made by the Prime Minister when he tabled the Currie report on Monday last and said, as reported at page 640 of Hansard:

> Though the report was concerned only with one relatively small branch of the Canadian army, the works services branch, and confirmed the investigation of the police that regrettable offences had occurred, it will be found that it contains some severe and sweeping statements which should not be taken out of their context because the report itself says, and I quote:
> "It does not fit the facts to indict or to smear the whole army works services personnel because of the sins of a handful of crooks."

And I commend this to hon. members in the house.

> I would hope, therefore, that in a matter of this kind no one would feel that any political advantage could be gained by taking broad, general statements out of their context in any way which might reflect in a wholesale manner on the great majority of loyal officers and men in the armed forces, and conscientious and hard-working civil servants in the Department of National Defence.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but from my observations, it would appear that the opposition have decided not to act upon that plea.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: This is going on in Camp Borden.

An hon. Member: A new leader.

Mr. Ferguson: Investigate Camp Borden.

Mr. Campney: That was a plea, Mr. Speaker, which I believe the Prime Minister made in the interests of the Canadian people and the defence effort of this country. I am beginning to wonder whether the members of the opposition are willing to sacrifice all those interests in the hope of acquiring some party advantage—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Rot.

An hon. Member: Pretty cheap.

Mr. Campney: —in respect of the defence effort which is now being made on behalf of the Canadian people. If they pursue the course they are following, they will create bitterness and friction between the services and the civil administration side of the Department of National Defence; and there has been lots of evidence of that intent in the house in the last two days.

Mr. Ferguson: Don't tell the public that.

Mr. Campney: The opposition will not succeed in that, but it is a dangerous thing to endeavour to do.

Mr. Drew: May I ask a question of the minister?

Mr. Campney: No, not until I have finished.

Mr. Drew: You are overtime now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You read for two hours.

Mr. Garson: You would make a good prime minister!

Mr. Speaker: If the minister does not wish to permit the question now, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) could ask it at the close.

Mr. Drew: I simply ask the question—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the minister gives consent to the asking of the question?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the minister was not a minister at the time, may I ask him if what he is now saying is also as the result of a telephone conversation with the Minister of National Defence?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Campney: That is the sort of question which the Leader of the Opposition sometimes—but not always—asks, and which I think requires no answer.

I would like to observe that the chief of the general staff and his service heads are doing a fine job. We have only to look at the results in Korea, in Europe and in Canada to realize that. We have an air force and a navy development, going on under service heads, that are outstanding, among all the nations in the whole NATO organization.

The civil side of the department is doing a very difficult job, and doing it well and effectively. Then, we have the defence research board which, in a quiet way, is doing a great deal of useful work. Success in our defence effort calls for the co-ordination of all these elements, service, civil, research and all the other elements which go to make up the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Ferguson: And the horses.

An hon. Member: Leave yourself out of it.

Mr. Campney: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that combination is doing a good job. I do not think that the depredations of a few crooks at Petawawa, nor all the wild and irresponsible propaganda the opposition is seeking to base thereon, are going to shake the confidence of the people of this country in either the government of the country or the Department of National Defence.

I should like to say one other word—and I may say in passing that I thank the house for having given me more time—I would like to say one other word, and this is to a large extent personal; that I regret very deeply, as I am sure most hon. members of this house do, that in the course of the remarks made by certain members in the last few days they have seen fit to make violent and, I believe, unwarranted attacks on the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in his absence from this house. I think this is greatly to be regretted, in that he is absent in Europe attending a meeting of the North Atlantic treaty council, as head of the Canadian delegation. That is a most important conference. It is a group with which we have allied ourselves and to which we are making a substantial contribution.

I do not say this because the minister needs any words of mine to defend him, because I can say without any hesitation at all that the Minister of National Defence by reason of his integrity, his industry, his proven ability and, above all, by reason of his great achievements in leading the Canadian defence effort to the heights it has attained in Korea, in Europe and in Canada, speaks much louder on his own behalf than anything I can say.

Mr. Drew: I simply draw attention to the fact—

Mr. Howe: You have spoken in this debate, friend.

Mr. Speaker: I presume the Leader of the Opposition is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: I simply draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that in his closing remarks the minister, who of course has no knowledge of the period that he was discussing, used the term "irresponsible" in regard to remarks that have been made during this debate.

An hon. Member: Very fitting.

Mr. Drew: I draw that to Your Honour's attention. In view of the very strict interpretation which you have placed on words during this debate I leave it with Your Honour to decide whether that is a proper expression in this debate.

Mr. Speaker: If the Leader of the Opposition takes exception to the word "irresponsible" probably the minister will not insist that it stand in Hansard. It is not a very severe term.

An hon. Member: Very accurate.

Mr. Speaker: Probably under the circumstances the minister would withdraw the term.

Mr. Campney: If Your Honour asks me to and rules it is unparliamentary, and asks me to withdraw I certainly will. It did not occur to me that it was an unparliamentary word, but I shall defer to your ruling.

An hon. Member: It was very true.

Mr. Drew: In view of the strict interpretations, and may I say new interpretations, which you have been making of certain rules—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: I place before you the word "irresponsible" and ask you to make a ruling whether that is or is not parliamentary as applied directly to statements of speakers from the other side.

An hon. Member: The chickens come home to roost.

An hon. Member: What would Charlotte say?

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition has the right to say that I have made new rulings or rulings which have not been observed previously. If I have done so, the Speaker has the right to do so and the house usually accepts them. I would not normally have stopped the use of the word "irresponsible" when used especially in the heat of debate and I would hesitate to say that that term is unparliamentary when referring to a statement made by a member of the house. If the Leader of the Opposition has any precedent he can quote to that effect, I shall be glad to enforce it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since you have asked me to make my comments on it I would point out that this word was not used in the heat of debate. The word was read from a written context.

An hon. Member: No, not like yours.

Mr. Drew: I would therefore ask you to decide as you have decided before, without any question, and make a ruling as to whether that word is parliamentary.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I make a ruling that it is unparliamentary of course I could not allow it to be used on any future occasion.

Mr. Knowles: Then don't do it.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the house would want me to be quite as severe as that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: If I allow the word to stand now any hon. member can use it in the future. I remind hon. members of that.

An hon. Member: We are not afraid.

Mr. Pouliot: Before you give your ruling—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking from my seat. I would point out that the effect of what you have just decided should be recognized by the house. Therefore I say that everything the minister said in his closing remarks was utterly irresponsible.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I had not made a ruling, but possibly in view of the statement by the Leader of the Opposition I should allow the word to stand.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I did not speak during the debate on the address in reply at the beginning of the sixth session of the 21st parliament. I preferred to comment on some of the bills brought before the house during the session. For this reason without further delay I would like today to congratulate the government for having complied with the legitimate wishes of all our compatriots by appointing a Canadian to the highest and most representative position in the country. Inasmuch as I am permitted to do so by the rules of the house, in the name of the electors I represent and in my own name, I respectfully congratulate the Right Hon. Vincent Massey upon his appointment as the first of a long line of Canadian-born viceroys.

The matter is not a new one. It had been discussed for a long time and this wonderful appointment was made in due course. All those whose love goes first to Canada who want to be Canadians above all were pleased with it. I said a moment ago that the matter was not a new one. Indeed, several years ago, in 1935, Mr. Maurice Ollivier, law clerk of the House of Commons, in his prophetical book, "Le Canada, pays souverain", wrote:

> The letters patent appointing a governor should be replaced by revised letters patent appointing a viceroy who should be Canadian.
> Why not avail ourselves of our status of full equality and fulfil the legitimate aspirations arising from our emancipation.
> The appointment of a Canadian would symbolize the growth, the increasing independence of Canada.
> Moreover, the appointment of a Canadian would be an excellent thing for Great Britain who would cease to be blamed unfairly for the mistakes of the representative of the sovereign.
> The British empire of yesterday is now a commonwealth of nations bound by common economic interests.

It is with extreme pleasure that I congratulate the mover of the address in reply, my very good friend the member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres), whose constituency is next to mine, and a very beautiful constituency at that. I know this from experience since I spent with the new member the trying days of his electoral campaign. You can see now that he carried this campaign to a victorious conclusion. I must add to these congratulations a tribute to the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) who discharged, as expected, in a wonderful manner the task with which he had been entrusted.

Mr. Speaker, we are now at the stage where the last vestiges of colonialism are going by the board. For several years now we have enjoyed the right to govern ourselves, that is to adopt the legislation which suits us best without taking into account the legislation of any other country. We have indeed obtained the right to negotiate alone our own treaties. We have obtained the right to a distinctive diplomatic representation abroad. We have abolished the right of appeal to the privy council, not only in criminal cases but in every other case as well. Our sovereignty is now complete. There remains, it is true, the right to amend the constitution, and on that point I should like to congratulate the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), as well as the government, for having obtained in 1949, on behalf of the federal parliament the right to amend our constitution in federal matters, a right that the provinces themselves have enjoyed since 1867 in provincial matters.

There remains only to obtain the right for Canada and its provinces to amend the constitution in those matters that relate both to federal and provincial rights. This, however, would not affect our autonomy, our sovereignty, for the simple reason that Britain would be only too glad to have the Canadian constitution, that is the B.N.A. Act of 1867, put completely into our hands.

It remains only for us to come to an agreement with the provinces on a method of amendment which would satisfy everyone, and which would protect at the same time federal and provincial rights, as well as minority rights which are exceedingly important to us. As a matter of fact, one should not forget that the federal members from the province of Quebec in Ottawa represent their province here as well as the provincial members, and that, like them, they are devoted to the tongue, traditions and customs of their ancestors.

However they do not forget that they have a sacred duty: not only must they be nationalists or provincialists but, above all, they must be Canadians. Quebec is our native land, but the whole of Canada belongs to us, it is our larger mother country; why should we, therefore, erect a wall around the province of Quebec, in order to isolate it from the rest of the world and, more particularly, from the rest of Canada?

Canada is a great country, a truly beautiful country; it is a land abounding in all riches and all beauties, from the St. Lawrence river to the Rocky mountains, and across the golden western plains. The whole country is our inheritance and what a shame it would be if we ever had the idea of transforming it into a sort of Balkan area, when ten distinct provinces would each be led by some petty dictator, who would deem himself free to manage everything to his own liking and solely to his own advantage.

I am bound to say that my patriotism oversteps somewhat the boundaries of my province, though I retain strong ties with the land where I was born, with that province whose faith, language and traditions I shall always uphold whatever the circumstances. I am still happy to be a citizen of a great and beautiful country and to assert that I am a Canadian.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) on the masterful speech he made on this matter, on December 2 last.

Mr. Speaker, there is another subject about which I should like to say a few words, as it is linked with the first: namely communism. In principle, we all agree that communism is our greatest, our most dangerous and most insidious enemy, an enemy that threatens and seeks to destroy us. There are many ways of fighting it. The first and easiest way is to denounce it, but unfortunately that is not sufficient and we must take other means, that is prepare ourselves to fight that enemy.

Russia has been arming and mobilizing her military forces for a long time now. What will be the use of our oratory if we are not ready to clash on the day of decision, with the communists, with equal forces or preferably with superior forces.

What will be the use of all our prosperity, of our wealth, of all the institutions we will have set up, of all the houses we will have built, of all the automobiles we will have manufactured and of all the tractors or other agricultural implements we will have placed at the disposal of our agricultural people, if we are to be invaded one day, Mr. Speaker, by these barbarians who are watching us on the other side of the Arctic. All these achievements, all that wealth would be taken away from us and we would be reduced to slavery by an hostile power.

It is true that taxes are high, but it is a small price to pay for liberty. Our freedom is more precious than all our wealth; these millions that we are spending on national defence are very little after all, although they may sometimes weigh heavily on our shoulders, compared with the safety they afford and guarantee. In other words, taxes are an evil, but a necessary evil, and are to be preferred to the evils that would befall us if, due to a lack of preparedness, we were to be shorn like sheep in the slaughterhouse.

All these taxes for national defence, all this revenue is provided by direct taxation, that is by personal and corporation income tax. Should we leave this field to the provinces and open our country to invasion?

If I may say so, Mr. Speaker—and I believe you will agree with me—should our country be invaded and conquered by the barbarians who live under communist rule, there would hardly be any more discussion of federal or provincial or minority rights. There would be little talk of the Christian religion, of our language and of our traditions.

That is what must be understood whenever there is any discussion over the apportionment of fields of taxation between the federal government and the provinces. I sincerely believe that the defence of this country and the survival of our nation are more important even than highway construction, important though that may be.

While we are on this subject, I must add that we should come to the assistance of those who need our help, who are hungry. I am referring to those countries which live in the shadow of communism.

One must admit that we have now in our warehouses a surplus of meat and that we have to pay for such storage in order not to lose this meat. So why not distribute this meat to those who are on the verge of rebellion or of falling prey to these barbarians? We would thus give them a foretaste of the real sense of democracy.

Mr. Speaker, having referred to income tax, I should like to repeat the request I made in this house on May 27 last, in connection with the worker's income tax. I believe very sincerely that the father of a family as well as the individual, with the present cost of living, is not sufficiently compensated by way of basic exemptions. In this connection, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) to the manner in which income tax collectors and their staffs go about collecting amounts which are in arrears of one, two or even three years. A letter is sent advising them that if the amount is not paid within fifteen days, a garnishee order will be issued and sent to the employer.

With the present cost of living, the ordinary worker finds it very difficult to meet his obligations and that is why in many instances, if the Minister of National Revenue institutes proceedings against them, that represents for these people a real catastrophe. I hope that my brief remarks on that subject will urge the Minister of National Revenue to convene his collectors in order to ask them, or at least recommend to them, to be a little more lenient, as well as remind them that they are our servants.

I am convinced that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), together with his advisers, can and must find other means of levying revenues for his needs, if such is the case, without inflicting so much harm on those I have mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to a subject to which I have already referred in the past. On March 19 last, I wrote a long letter to the Minister of Finance concerning taxes on cigarettes. I should like to discuss this matter during the few minutes I still have at my disposal. It is true that the last budget brought a reduction of three cents on a package of cigarettes, or of $1.50 a thousand. I remember that the minister had informed us that he had received a lot of free advice concerning this tax. I should like to tell you right now that I never gave any advice. I must admit though that had I been one of his financial advisers I would have liked to give him a bit of advice. Possibly the tax on cigarettes would not be what it is today. I have already asked him in the past to cut 11 cents off the tax—that was before the last reduction—not including of course Mr. Duplessis' additional 4 cents. This would have brought the price of our domestic cigarettes down to 35 cents.

Mr. Speaker, it must be admitted that approximately 50 per cent of our people smoke smuggled American cigarettes which they buy for 30 cents a pack, in order to save money. A pack of Canadian cigarettes would cost 43 cents—that is with Mr. Duplessis' 4 cent tax—and you cannot blame them too much, in view of the present high cost of living.

With your permission I would like to make a survey going back to 1932 when cigarettes sold for 20 cents a pack. At that time, as will be remembered, there was an excise tax of $4 per thousand and a sales tax of 4 per cent. With these figures for 1932 in our minds, let us come now, if you wish, to the figures for 1952. Cigarettes are now sold here at 39 cents a pack, not including the Quebec tax. We must not overlook the fact that the excise tax has jumped to $10 per thousand and that the sales tax has been increased to 10 per cent. Let us say that the increase in taxation is the basic factor in the price increase of our Canadian cigarettes.

Considering that the per capita consumption of cigarettes in 1941 was 746 cigarettes in Canada and comparing it with the American per capita consumption during the same year, we find that the latter was 1,575 cigarettes. In 1942, the Canadian excise tax was increased by $2 per 1,000 and, during the same year, in the United States, consumption increased by 200 to reach the figure of 1,775 cigarettes per person. In 1943, the $2 increase in the Canadian excise tax had the effect of increasing the per capita consumption in the United States to 1,925.

So, Mr. Speaker, realizing gradually that the price of our cigarettes was much too high, our people have been buying more and more American cigarettes. This is the cause of the gradual increase in the per capita consumption of American cigarettes in the United States, which reached 2,400 cigarettes in 1950.

I have no figures for 1951, but I am sure they are still higher, because we see more and more smuggled cigarettes in Canada. The figures I have quoted are based on American production and they prove once again that per capita consumption in the United States is much higher than it should actually be, because of Canadian purchases of smuggled cigarettes.

The Minister of Finance stated during the last session that the volume of cigarette smuggling had been exaggerated. I am wondering whether he was not alluding to the statements I had made in the house when I said that four out of every five people were smoking American cigarettes. I am not the only one who thinks so. To corroborate my statements, I would like to quote an article from the Revue de Granby entitled "Between the lines" and dated April 5, 1952. I quote:

> The budget brought down by the Hon. Mr. Abbott, who is hoping for a $9 million surplus in 1952-1953, will certainly not help police officers in their fight against the smuggling of American cigarettes. Citizens of the eastern townships will surely stop smoking Canadian cigarettes which cost 13 cents more per pack of 20 and continue to buy their smokes on the black market. Local club and hotel waiters tell us that 8 or 9 empty packages of cigarettes out of 10 left on tables by their customers are of American brands.

After reading that article we must come to the conclusion that some of our people think nothing of smuggling, as may be seen any day. On March 15, the Montreal Star published an item entitled "A judge tolerates smuggling". I quote:

> Mr. Justice R. Herbert Barton stated yesterday that smuggling of American cigarettes into Canada was not too serious a matter. During the hearing in Toronto police court of a case involving a taxi driver whose car had been seized because he had smuggled American cigarettes, the judge said: That is only smuggling and everybody is doing it.

When a judge makes statements of that nature, I believe it is high time for the Minister of Finance to take action and reduce the tax.

I am convinced that the reduction of $1.50 per thousand, or 3 cents per package, has not brought about the increase in sales of Canadian cigarettes anticipated by the minister. Unfortunately, smuggling continues to the prejudice of Canadian manufacturers and of our national revenue.

I would like to quote here from an editorial which I found in La Voix de l'Est of Granby, dated April 10, 1952, which bears out my contention:

> As for cigarettes, we believe that a three cent reduction is ridiculous and that Mr. Abbott should have reduced the price to 35 cents per pack of twenty cigarettes with a view to increasing the consumption in Canada. It is evident that, as a result of the budget speech, the smuggling of cigarettes will soar again, because a great many Canadians will refuse to pay 43 cents for a pack of cigarettes they are able to purchase for 27 or 30 cents.

In the face of all this evidence, one has to admit that the excise tax reduction which I suggested would have reduced both smuggling and per capita consumption of cigarettes in the United States and lead to an increase in Canadian consumption. We like to smoke cigarettes as much as the Americans do; we smoke as many as they do. How can you explain that consumption in the United States is twice as high as in Canada? The explanation is simple. It lies in the difference between the excise tax in the two countries. In the United States the excise tax, for 1952, was $4 per thousand whereas in Canada, even after the $1.50 reduction, it remains at $10 plus a sales tax of 10 per cent.

I do hope that we may cut down this far-famed excise tax when the time comes to bring down the budget. If we reduce this tax we will allow for the sale of cigarettes at a reasonable price. Moreover we will reduce smuggling and, by the same token, increase our own production and consumption.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that our manufacturers are subject to an abnormally high tax considering the price of their product, but I really believe it would be wrong to think that they would take advantage of a reduction in the excise tax to increase their profit. I really believe that the people of this country should not be left under a false impression, after the words spoken in this house by the hon. member from Bow River (Mr. Johnston) at the last session. That is why I would like to call your attention once more to the figures I mentioned a few minutes ago, while adding others in order to support my contention. 1932: retail price, 20 cents, excise tax, $4 a thousand, sales tax 4 per cent; 1952: retail price, 39 cents, excise tax, $10 a thousand, sales tax 10 per cent.

Since companies have, as you know, cartons of various sizes for sale to wholesalers, I shall take for comparison purposes the sale price of 100 cigarettes. In 1932, 100 cigarettes in 20-cigarette packs represented five packs at 20 cents, that is $1, excise tax of $4 a thousand, that is 40 cents, sales tax of 4 per cent or 1·3 cents, commission to jobbers, 10·5 cents, commission on retail sales, 17 cents.

The 100 cigarettes which sold for $1 in 1932, cost in taxes and commissions 68·8 cents; the manufacturer's selling price was therefore 31·2 cents or $1.12 for a carton of 18 packs of 20 cigarettes. For the purpose of my comparison, I shall now take the retail price of 1952 which is 39 cents. Five packs at 39 cents, retail price, represent the sum of $1.95, the excise tax at $10 a thousand, $1.00, the sales tax at 10 per cent, 6 cents, the jobber's commission, 12·2 cents, the commission on retail sales, 22 cents, or a total of $1.40½.

Cigarettes which sold at $1.95 a hundred in 1952 are costing, in taxes and commissions, $1.40½, the manufacturer's sale price therefore being 54·8 cents or $1.97 a carton.

It seems to me odd indeed to hear people criticize the manufacturers' profits, without knowing the facts. The cigarette manufacturers have, within the last 20 years, raised their price by 23·6 cents for one hundred cigarettes and by 85 cents for a carton.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Let us keep in mind that raw leaf tobacco for cigarettes sold for 20·5 cents a pound in 1932, whereas, in 1951, it had more than doubled and cost 44·5 cents a pound. The raw products of the cigarette industry number a thousand and more and they have also followed the mounting trend of raw leaf tobacco prices. Further, we must allow for the fact that the cost of living has also increased for the cigarette manufacturers from 1932 to 1952. Within the last 20 years, they have raised the wholesale price, and not their profits by 85 cents a carton, and yet the manufacturers are being accused of increasing their profits, when the government has, by means of taxation, raised the price of these products by $1.97 a carton. The cost of living index had reached 190·4 per cent in October 1951, at the time when the raise of two cents mentioned took place. The cost of living had also gone up for the employees, who had obtained repeated salary increases. One of these sister industries is established in our district; I am in a position to state that its employees are well treated, both from the standpoint of salary and of security for themselves and their families. That is why I deemed it necessary to reply in the house to certain accusations made here by another hon. member, who made them with no ill intent, I trust.

I can only express once again the hope that the excise tax will be lowered so that Canadian cigarettes may sell for 35 cents retail. Then, for the small difference, our people will certainly smoke Canadian cigarettes. The increase in production will make up for the difference in national revenue so that it would be approximately the same as today.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who more than 25 years ago sat with my late father in parliament.

I wish also to congratulate very sincerely the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) for the appointment of a citizen of Granby to the commission due to sail for South America on January 5.

Indeed, the city of Granby last week held a banquet to honour the general manager of the Granby co-operative who will be leaving shortly. I believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has found the most competent man in the province of Quebec in the person of the manager of the Granby Agricultural Co-operative. This is, to be sure, not only a tribute to the city of Granby, but to all the farmers of Quebec.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to offer my most sincere congratulations to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) who has finally given the city of Granby a long awaited post office building.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much for your indulgence.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before this debate concludes I want to say a few words with regard to the subject matter that was discussed for the greater part of today and yesterday. I want to refer, in a general way perhaps, to some of the remarks made by the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney). Before I do so, however, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) on being taken into the cabinet. However, I wish that the subject of his first speech had been more inspiring than the one with which he had to deal this evening.

Perhaps I had better begin with what the Acting Minister of National Defence said at the end of his speech, or close to it. He referred to the statement made in this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on Monday last when he tabled this report. He read from page 640 of Hansard and I will quote again the words which he quoted from the Prime Minister's statement. They are as follows:

> I would hope, therefore, that in a matter of this kind no one would feel that any political advantage could be gained by taking broad, general statements out of their context in any way which might reflect in a wholesale manner on the great majority of loyal officers and men in the armed forces, and conscientious and hard-working civil servants in the Department of National Defence.

The Acting Minister of National Defence quoted that statement, as well he might, with approval; but I suggest to you, sir, that many of his own statements from the report were taken out of their context. I imagine it would be unparliamentary for me to say that was done for political purposes.

Mr. Studer: What did your member get it for?

Mr. MacInnis: That does not excuse the Acting Minister of National Defence. He is an individual acting on his own, and quoting with approval the remarks of his leader in this house.

Mr. Studer: Your member was acting on his leader's orders also.

Mr. MacInnis: No, he was not; and there was nothing quoted for political purposes.

The first thing I would say in regard to the very fine statement made by the Prime Minister is that he must be naive—and I think he is not—if he believes that an opportunity of this kind could be let pass without political use being made of it by the opposition. That is the nature of our political institution. As a matter of fact there is nothing the government could do here that could please the opposition except the mistakes it might make, and the same would be true if those who are on the government side of the house were on this side and those who are on this side were on the other side of the house.

Mr. Lesage: They do not need to, because the opposition is making mistakes all the time.

Mr. MacInnis: That is to your advantage, if they are, and you should not regret it; but you had better be concerned about your own mistakes.

Mr. Knowles: Which are legion.

Mr. MacInnis: I mention that, sir, because it has been suggested that a committee on defence expenditures is being set up; that if there is any further information required in regard to this matter it could be referred to that committee. After listening to the remarks, and watching the exhibition that went on in this house tonight, can anyone believe that there would be any chance in the world, a chance in one thousand, that any information would be brought to light that would in any way reflect upon the present government?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What about the report?

Mr. MacInnis: Therefore if any further information is required, and I believe there is, the only way to get that information—and that is the way this information was obtained—is by appointing a commissioner who is free from the political associations that are inevitably connected with anything of this kind that is done here.

May I say in regard to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that he has taken, and very properly, a serious view of this report. In every word and in his attitude one could see that he is concerned; but the Acting Minister of National Defence made light of the whole thing tonight. He said nothing really of importance had happened; that nearly all of the recommendations, or in any case a great many of them, that were made in the report had already been put into effect. There is one answer to that, sir, and it is this. If the commissioner—and I hope I am using the proper term in regard to Mr. Currie—was not able to find in the department the result of those recommendations that the acting minister said had already been put into effect, of what advantage was it to put them into effect? Surely, just for the sake of making them he would not have made recommendations in regard to a condition which he had found had already been remedied by the administration. That makes nonsense of the whole report; and the report is not nonsense.

The Acting Minister of National Defence read this statement—and I assure him that this was taken out of its context:

> No reliable estimate of the total loss can be prepared. It does, however, appear probable that the total loss resulting from misappropriations and irregularities by military personnel at Petawawa was not large.

Then the paragraph goes on:

> My view would be, however, that the generally lax administrative situation would give rise to waste and inefficiency far more costly in loss than that covered by actual dishonesty. The evidence examined does not disclose irregularities involving relatively large sums of money, but, rather, an impressive array of petty irregularities on an extensive scale.

Here the Acting Minister of National Defence quoted five lines taken out of their context, while the rest of the paragraph was as damaging to the administration as anything could be. May I ask whether that was done for political purposes or not?

Then we go further back; I cannot give the pages as they are in the report itself and I am reading from the text in Hansard. The Acting Minister of National Defence said: If a bank is robbed, surely one would not blame the president for the loss of the money, or words to that effect. But if the president or the manager left the door of the bank open, surely he would be subject to criticism for doing so, and that is exactly what was done by the Department of National Defence.

The acting minister went on to say that though there were camps at Toronto, London, Borden, Barriefield, Vancouver, Regina, Quebec and Halifax, no maladministration was found in those places, or no petty thieving of the kind that was found at Petawawa. But Mr. Currie said far more than that. He said:

> The conclusion I have come to is that, while there has been a general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting, it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities over a prolonged period of time took place. The contents of this chapter are chiefly based upon my studies there, because of the existence there of a combination of factors: lax control, poor discipline and the presence of dishonest personnel. The combination proved disastrous.

The Acting Minister of National Defence glossed it all over as though it were of no particular importance whatsoever. Then he went on to take another few lines out of their context. He read this:

> It does not fit the facts to indict or to smear the whole army works services personnel because of the sins of a handful of crooks.

But he did not go on to read:

> At Petawawa, however, the crooks were present and took advantage of the situation, and it is an unhappy circumstance that the beginning of this investigation lies not inside the Department of National Defence and its full complement of regulations and supervising personnel, but with the receipt of an anonymous letter couched in the following terms:

Had it not been for the fact that someone took the trouble to write to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned these things would be going on yet. Surely, Mr. Speaker, under conditions of that kind the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is open to criticism. And it is sheer impudence for anyone to come here and talk on his behalf and say that he is not. Either he is responsible for what has happened or no one has responsibility at all in matters of this kind.

So I would suggest to hon. members on both sides of the house that, while we cannot altogether get away from political associations in parliamentary procedures, for the good of Canada and for the morale and good of the men who are now serving in the forces and who are carrying out their duties under most difficult circumstances, we should not allow such things as happened at Petawawa to go by without placing the blame where it should be placed, showing the people of Canada and the men in our armed services that we think more of the sacrifices they are making than to allow any laxity in administration, and through not paying attention to even small things. We should not allow, as it says here, a handful of crooks to do what has been done.

Let me repeat what I said in the beginning, that if there is any further information required in connection with this matter, it should not be referred to the committee to be set up on defence expenditures, because that is just the way not to find out what is going on. I have been here long enough and I have been on enough committees to know that the government majority on a committee, if they can prevent it—and there are fairly astute people on committees, including lawyers and others who are adept at covering up—will not let these things come to light. Things should come to light, if they are there.

I would suggest that if this matter does go to the committee on defence expenditures that is to be set up, the chairman of that committee, whoever he may be, should say, "Gentlemen, the lid is off. If there is anything here that should be exposed, then we are going to expose it, regardless of who is going to get hurt in the process". That is the only way in which honest, efficient and democratic government can be carried on.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join other hon.

members in extending my best wishes to Hon. Robert Mayhew, former minister of fisheries, who comes from British Columbia and who has now taken on a new task as the representative of Canada in Japan. He goes to this task after a long and distinguished career, and I am sure he will acquit himself with distinction in this new field.

I am particularly pleased that, finally, the government has recognized the stature of British Columbia by having seen fit to appoint two cabinet ministers from that province. I am pleased to note that the Prime Minister has chosen two men of proven ability to fill these two important posts. I would say to him and to his colleagues in the cabinet that they would do well if, very often, they were to listen to the sage advice of these two ministers. I might say, too, that British Columbia may now expect the completion of many of the things that have long been deferred. Perhaps with the persuasive eloquence of these two hon. gentlemen something will come to pass.

In passing I should like to make only one or two comments about private television. It seems to me that the government's policy in television is somewhat akin to its policy in respect of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I would like to be able to say that I thought the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been operated as well as Trans-Canada Air Lines; but I can say that there is a parallel in these two organizations in the fact that both retain for themselves any plums to be found in the business life of Canada, and they allow private aeroplanes or, as in this instance, private television to take the scraps that are left. Sometimes these scraps are in very doubtful spheres, so far as economics are concerned.

I would sincerely like to see the government give one private station out in Vancouver an opportunity to come in and begin to operate now. I have had the assurance from a man interested in putting his money into this field of enterprise that he could have television for Vancouver within six months. If that is so I would like to see the minister give that gentleman the opportunity to do so.

I would say also to the British Columbia cabinet ministers that I would like to have them prevail upon their colleagues to see to it that the committee on veterans affairs is set up again when we return after the Christmas recess, so that we may give careful consideration to the representations made in the brief submitted to us by the Canadian Legion.

Then I should like to speak for a moment or two regarding our highway on Vancouver island. I hate being parochial at a time like this, when there are so many grave problems before the House of Commons, but I think in this instance Vancouver island has been badly neglected. By some curious circumstance the trans-Canada highway goes to Vancouver, then jumps to Nanaimo, and then proceeds east to Victoria. Just how they arrived at the conclusion that Victoria should be the terminus of the trans-Canada highway, I cannot say. But I would ask the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) to consult with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the new members of the government from British Columbia, to see if we cannot have the trans-Canada highway go from Vancouver to Victoria, and thence due west to the head of Vancouver island.

Sometimes I hear my friends from Prince Edward Island being very sensitive about things that happen there. But if any of them ever wandered so far from home as to see the tremendous island we have out on the western coast, I am sure they would be impressed. I would recall what was said by Kipling many years ago, when he described our island as the fairest gem in the British crown. It is a reflection on Canada and on the trans-Canada highway policy when one cannot travel from one end of Vancouver island to the other. I would ask the responsible minister to consult with the government of British Columbia with a view to rectifying this very serious situation.

There is another highway on Vancouver island about which I have spoken before. I am happy that one of the ministers from British Columbia is to be the associate minister of national defence (Mr. Campney). I am referring now, of course, to the proposed highway from Port Alberni to Tofino airport. It is not generally known that far out on the west coast of Vancouver island we have one of the finest airports in Canada. This was one of the first airports opened during the war for the defence of the west coast. I pointed out last year when I dealt with this matter that there is no access by road to this point. The federal government have always contended that they are not interested in roads and should not participate in the building of roads, but this is the most westerly outpost of our air defences in Canada, and it is not connected by highway. As a matter of fact I can tell the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that this proved of great disadvantage during the last war. I am quite sure the fact that there was not a road in there cost us far more than it would have cost to construct a road.

There are business opportunities there. I think the minister could well go to the government of British Columbia and say, "We recognize that this is primarily your responsibility, but here is a quarter of a million dollars we will give you as our contribution if you will put a road in there." I think a road could be built for a million or a million and a half dollars. I submit that this government ought to make a gesture of that kind to the government of British Columbia and say, "We will make a contribution toward the road."

I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is not with us at the moment, as there is something I should like to bring to his attention. I have brought this to his attention several times before. We now have no passenger service on the west coast of Vancouver island, due to the fact that the Canadian Pacific steamer which had served the area for almost 70 years finally, like the one-horse shay, fell apart. The people in this area feel that the Canadian Pacific have had a monopoly there for about 70 years. I ask the minister and the maritime commission to make representations to the Canadian Pacific to renew this service. It is most essential to the life and development of that coast, and it should be renewed.

I come now to the subject that was covered very ably last night by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Garson). I should like to make some comments with regard to government policy in connection with budget surpluses. The other day the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) pointed this up very dramatically when he said that since 1945 the government has had an average surplus of $1 million per day. That figure is startling.

At the outset of my comments in this regard I should like to pay a sincere personal tribute to our very efficient Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I must say that I have always admired his courage in imposing these high taxes. I agree with him that they have been a deterring factor in controlling inflation. I think in that aspect he did a good job. I was glad to see him resist over the years the pressure that came from various parts of this house to impose controls on both prices and wages. If we are fair about it I think we would all say that in the long run he has proved to be right, because actually the cost of living is coming down and I think the inflationary trend is lessening.

But I think now with seven years of surpluses we have had about enough. There is no particular virtue in having a surplus all the time, despite the idea of some people that a surplus is always necessary. I think this is the time for a really healthy deficit. If I were the leader of a large group, instead of being an independent as I am, I think I would suggest that this would be a sound time to use up some of this surplus.

I often wonder whether we Canadians are not becoming a little soft. I know there is a saying that a rich man cannot get into heaven any easier than he can pass through the eye of a needle. I sometimes feel that with all the approbation we have been receiving in the United States press and the press of other countries we have gone perhaps a little too far with the surpluses we are having. Our premium dollar and other things of that kind seem to have gone to our heads. I think we would make better friends for ourselves throughout the world if we played a role that was a little bit poorer, and did not appear to ostentatiously have too much money.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made a statement the other day that rather intrigued me. He said that after all these surpluses are great stuff; and incidentally, I very seldom disagree with him. He told us that these surpluses are good things and that our grandchildren will rise up and call us blessed for not leaving them too much money to pay back. That may be true, but I think as we look back to our youth we must admit that things today are infinitely better than they were when we were young. If the trend continues, then we can expect that things will get progressively better. I contend that our grandchildren will not have too heavy a load to carry even though we do not struggle to pay off all our debt at the present time. I notice that the carpenters of British Columbia are thinking of a 30-hour week, which would seem to indicate that no one is going to have too heavy a burden to carry.

I think Mr. Ilsley did a very good job during the war when he paid half the cost of it from taxation as we went along. We must all agree that he pursued a wise course in that regard. Then as far as the balance is concerned, I think we have made a good job of paying off half of that because of the effects of inflation and the fact that today our dollar is worth only fifty cents compared to what it used to be worth. The present per capita debt is nothing to become alarmed about. In fact I think it could be increased some. Every time the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) brings in 12,000 or 15,000 people in a month we reduce that per capita debt quite substantially. Then when we consider the desirable birth rate we have in this country we must realize that that also is playing a part in reducing the per capita debt.

Canada has so many frontiers to be developed, and when we have surpluses of this kind I think we should look around to see where it can be invested so that the frontiers can be pushed back. After all, money at 3 per cent is pretty cheap money. It is the cheapest money anybody can get. I do not think we ought to strain ourselves at the present time after having reduced our national debt every year for seven years. We do not need to concentrate on reducing it any more at the present time.

Sometimes it is nice to be able to agree with a C.C.F. member like my good friend the hon. member for Moose Jaw. He says taxes are too high. If I remember correctly, he did not say all taxes are too high. He did not say anything about personal income tax, but he did say that the corporation income taxes are too high. I gather that he has some knowledge on that subject. It does not seem right to me that our government should own 52 per cent of every successful incorporated business in Canada; and I do not think they should overtax corporations and individuals to the extent of $1 million a day in order to pay off a debt on which we have to pay only 3 per cent. I think if the average businessman could get all the money he wanted at 3 per cent, he could pay that rate of interest and use the money for expansion of his business and probably make 10 per cent on it.

Once you give money to a government it just goes down the sink, and I would say that of any government. The moment we are able to show up here with a surplus my good friends away down to the left dredge up some brand new idea to get rid of it. And are they efficient at that type of thing!

I have a few suggestions to make, though I hate to make them in an election year. Perhaps I should save them for another year. I will say that I am not speaking with any correct knowledge of that event, so the opposition need not take what I say as an announcement of when the election will be. It seems to me that we have accumulated quite a lot of money, and we should look around to see how we can invest it wisely.

I have dealt with some of the things, and other speakers from British Columbia have mentioned how money might well be spent in the greater Vancouver area. I have mentioned some things that might be done on Vancouver island. However, I must commend the government—and I suppose it is as a result of the surpluses they have had—in that they now find they are able to say that Canada will go ahead on its own and build the St. Lawrence seaway. Coming from the west I know that in a parochial sense it probably will not do my riding any particular good, but I have always thought anything that is in the interests of Canada, such as the St. Lawrence seaway, is actually of benefit to us all.

The other day the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) mentioned that it might be a good thing to put some hard surfacing on the Alaska highway. I would commend that to the government as a good place to spend some money. I think a railroad is needed into the Peace river district. I am sure any hon. members who have been in that vast territory will realize what an empire it is and how much it needs opening up and development. There are millions of acres in the Peace river district, and agriculturalists tell me it is the finest land in Canada. When we bring immigrants into this country we tell them there are millions of acres of the finest land in Canada there and that they should go there and settle, but that is most difficult for anybody coming into the country, particularly as these people almost never have a large amount of capital when they come here. It is very difficult for them to go and open up country of that kind. It seems to me that it would demonstrate real vision if the government would go in there and as an experiment clear a million acres of land. I believe that could be done for around $35 million. I think it would be a good test plot, as it were, and that the government would be well advised to undertake a job of that kind to indicate to the people that they have vision and that they have the idea that this country must be opened up. So many people in Canada live in cities, and somehow or other they get the idea that is where the wealth is. That is not true. There is only one place from which wealth comes and that is from our forests, mines, farms and fisheries. The people who live outside the confines of the cities should receive credit for developing this wealth. I should like to see the government give them every possible encouragement.

There is another thing about which I have always been very sorry. I think hon. members will recall that when the pipe-line bills were going through the house in 1949 I suggested that perhaps it would be feasible for the Canadian National Railways to get into the transportation of oil. I pointed out at that time that perhaps the best freight revenue the Canadian National Railways will ever get out of that country is from the transportation of oil. However, I suppose the directors of the C.N.R. were probably too busy wondering about inside plumbing at Riviere du Loup or about what brand of paper cups they were going to use on the trains. They certainly missed the boat. When I think of these oil transmission line companies and the way such investments have appreciated on the stock exchange to three or four times their original worth in some cases, I believe we should have been able to advance $300 million to the Canadian National Railways for such a project. We have advanced them hundreds of millions since for other projects. If they had had the necessary vision at that time and had invested $300 million in this way they could perhaps have paid for their own capital reconstruction which we put through the house last year. To me it is a tragedy that they did not have the vision at that time to see what a chance they had. They may have missed the boat in that particular instance, but I would hope that in the future they will not make the same error.

I now want to make a few remarks with respect to the meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers in the old country. I realize we are going to have a debate on this matter later, but I am wondering if we could not have used a little vision there so far as our surpluses are concerned. I realize I am not an international financier. I have never studied economics in a university or anything of that kind, but it has always seemed to me that international and public finance are not too different from private finance. When business is slack in a country; when a manufacturer finds that he has a surplus of goods and that a particular customer is hard up and cannot afford to stock the goods on his shelves, the manufacturer goes to his bank where his credit is good and arranges for credit. He goes to the retailer and says to him, "I will put a stock of my goods on your shelves on a consignment basis. You need goods so you can carry on your business. I will supply you with the goods, because I have the goods and I have the credit." Is that not just about the position in which Canada is so far as the United Kingdom is concerned? Not only would this be an extremely good move so far as the business aspect of the matter is concerned, but it has always seemed to me that we have been missing the boat strategically so far as the old country is concerned.

I do not like to say it, but I have seen many times in many magazines that in effect the United Kingdom is in great measure our primary outpost of defence. It has been called our unsinkable aircraft carrier off the coast of Europe. If it is valid for us to continue to stockpile men and aeroplanes over there, to stockpile guns and equipment, then I submit it should be equally valid for us to make sure that we have a supply of goods over there that would be available in the event of war. Nobody wants war, but if it comes we are going to find the same situation that we had the last time. We will find that half the material we send over there in the first year of war will be lost through submarine action. There is no question about that. I suggest to the government that we look at this matter very carefully. As I say, we have many products that we could send over there. I can assure the government that there is lots of lumber and base metals in British Columbia for which we are looking for markets, and I can certainly assure them that there is plenty of canned salmon which would be an excellent product to stockpile in England.

Incidentally, one of the reasons the United Kingdom is short of dollars now for the carrying on of these purchases is the fact that they have had to stockpile. The fact that they did stockpile and then found themselves short of money has caused serious repercussions so far as the base metal mines are concerned, because they will fall short of money to purchase other things. These people say that the cold war does not look quite so hot or cold, and they say they might as well put these stockpiles on the market. As a result we have had tremendous fluctuations in the prices of base metals with very disastrous results to the base metal mines of British Columbia.

I would remind the cabinet—and they must be quite conscious of it—that we have a major shareholder's interest in all the primary industries of this country. So far as canned pork is concerned, I can assure my farmer friends that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has been doing a consistently good job in taking care not only of the pork producers but of the pork packers. They also did very well. It seems to me, however, when the same problem is presented with respect to the salmon industry in British Columbia the government more or less—I do not want to be unkind to them—yawn over that one. The British Columbia salmon industry this year—and I speak not only for the packers but for the fishermen—has had a very difficult time. The country is the senior shareholder in the salmon canneries and in the fishermen and their boats, and I would point out that the industry has lost millions of dollars in British Columbia this year. The industry not only lost 48 per cent of it; the government lost its 52 per cent, and I am quite sure that the returns of the Department of Finance from British Columbia this year will reflect that very serious situation.

So far as stockpiling is concerned, I should like to point out that salmon is something like scotch whisky. You can keep it for twenty years and it is better then than it was when you first bought it. As an old expert who knows what he is talking about as far as canned salmon is concerned, I offer that by way of comment.

If you will forgive me, Mr. Speaker, should I break a rule of the house, I want to talk about practical politics a little. I want to say to the cabinet and to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that we are not all crazy in British Columbia, despite what happened in the last provincial election. The folks out there are pretty sound, and I would say that 95 per cent do not like, and do not understand this Social Credit monetary theory; and people do not usually support things they do not understand. I will make another categorical statement and say that 75 per cent of them do not want to have anything to do with socialism.

I know the two ministers from British Columbia will give you sound and honest advice. If you listen carefully to what they have to tell you I do not think you will have too much difficulty in British Columbia in the next federal election.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is on the original motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted, I would have supported the amendment. Also, this afternoon I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West.

An hon. Member: Too late.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the main motion carries?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Mr. Speaker: The original motion is carried on division.

Main motion (Mr. Deslieres) agreed to on division.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the said address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That when the house adjourns this day, it stand adjourned until Monday the twelfth day of January, 1953.

Mr. Drew: At what time, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. St. Laurent: The standing order fixes 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Two-thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

EXTENSION OF EXPIRY DATE OF STANDING ORDER 92

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Clerk at the table has called my attention to the fact that taking this adjournment might breach the rights of those who have petitions to present for private bills, because under the standing order they have to be presented in the six weeks period from the beginning of the session. Under similar circumstances in other sessions it has been customary to pass a motion extending the time to equal the portion of the six weeks that is taken by the adjournment. I therefore beg leave to move:

That on account of the pending adjournment of the house, the six weeks period allowed by standing order 92 for the presentation of petitions for private bills be deemed to expire on Monday, January 26, 1953, instead of on Wednesday, December 31, 1952.

Motion agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS ON RESUMING

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on the 12th day of January we propose to take up the notice of motion by the Prime Minister for the setting up of a committee on defence expenditures. Then we shall take up the different notices of motions. I am not in a position this evening to give the order in which we shall proceed with these different notices of motions.

Mr. Graydon: What about private members' day?

Mr. MacInnis: Is January 12 not private members' day?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then the order would apply on Tuesday, instead of on Monday, January 12.

Mr. St. Laurent: May I venture to speak on behalf of every one of your colleagues in the house, Mr. Speaker, and on their behalf as well as my own express our very best wishes for a merry Christmas and a happy new year for yourself and your family.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m. until Monday, January 12, 1953, at 2.30 p.m.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I beg to table the public accounts of Canada, and the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table two copies in English and French of the Canada Gazette, part II, statutory orders and regulations, issued on December 24, 1952.

I should also like to lay on the table a summary of orders in council passed during the period December 1 to 31, 1952.

I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) will be glad to know that there are only about a third as many as were passed in the month of December, 1951. That is due, mostly, to the establishment of government contract regulations and land purchase regulations, under which the powers of the governor in council are delegated in certain cases to the appropriate minister and, in other cases, to treasury board.

[Mr. Weir.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: This action shows signs of improvement.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not the report from the commission on the Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project is available. If so, is it favourable, and is it the government's intention to go ahead with the project?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer the three questions separately. The information I have is that the printing of the appendices for the report will be complete on the 17th. We have asked if it cannot be advanced a bit so that we may be able to submit the report and the appendices to the Governor General and table them this week. I am not sure whether the printer will be able to comply with that request or not; but I fully expect that, if he cannot, they will be ready for tabling on Monday.

As to whether or not the report is favourable, I do not think I should answer that question until the report has gone to His Excellency the Governor General. I must confess that out of curiosity I read the first part of it, but I would not care to be further indiscreet about it or about action upon it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked the Prime Minister this question because Time magazine advanced all the arguments appearing in it, and I am wondering how that magazine got hold of it.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member knows that this is not the only instance where leaks have taken place.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this report not to be changed?

P.E.I. CAR FERRY SERVICE

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY—TRANSFER OF MANAGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Does the government propose to transfer the management of the Borden-Tormentine ferries from the Canadian National Railways to Canadian National Steamships? If so, on what date; and has the government of Prince Edward Island been informed of the proposed change?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of any such proposal.

An hon. Member: Try again.

NATIONAL LIBRARY

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Can he say whether any definite decision has been taken with respect to the construction of a building to house the national library?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should not venture to reply at once to a question in that form. There has been a decision upon a site for the national library, and an architect has been commissioned to prepare the plans for it.

In principle, the decision was made when the legislation was recommended to the house that there be a national library, when parliament saw fit, upon recommendation of the government, to appropriate the funds required for it. As soon as a decision to seek an appropriation is made it will be announced to the house.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

EUROPEAN DEFENCE COMMUNITY PROTOCOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I gave him notice, but I am afraid it was a little late to be of much use to him. Then, I did not bring my own copy of the question to the house so, in that respect, we are both in the same position.

In view of the news reports which came from Paris and Bonn in the latter part of last week indicating that perhaps the European defence community arrangements were going to be altered in a far-reaching fashion—

Mr. Mutch: Question.

Mr. Graydon: Well, I was not directing it to you, but perhaps you would like to answer it.

In view of this, will it be necessary to revise the protocol that was endorsed and approved by this House of Commons last spring? Perhaps the minister would indicate what nations have given legislative approval of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization protocol.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Before I attempt to answer that question, which deals with a very important matter, I would wish to know whether the reported statements to which my hon. friend referred will result in any particular proposals and, if so, what these proposals will be. Before we get word of the proposals it is most difficult to say what effect, if any, they would have on the European defence community and the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty.

Replying to the latter part of the question, I shall have to look up and see how many countries have ratified the protocol and I will let my hon. friend know as soon as I get that information.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF SUPERVISOR OF DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) or to the Acting Minister of Defence Production, whichever is appropriate. Is it correct, as reported in the press, that Mr. Hunter has been appointed to supervise defence expenditures and, if so, what were the reasons that it was felt necessary to make this appointment?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will allow this question to stand I shall be glad to get the information and give him a reply later.

RADIO BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO ABOLITION OF LICENCE FEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if the government has come any nearer to making a decision with respect to the abolition of the radio licence fee?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Not any nearer.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention today to take time to speak to any of these thirty-eight divorce bills, the second reading of which is now before the house. However, I cannot let the motion for the second reading of these thirty-eight bills pass without indicating my continued opposition to this method of dealing with divorces and my hope that even yet this parliament will find a better way.

Mr. Speaker: Will the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: These bills are referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

6. If so, in what manner?

Mr. Benidickson:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The railway does not publish freight earnings and expense figures on a territorial basis. However, as an indication of the trend of Canadian National Railways business in Newfoundland, the following table shows freight train miles for 1950, 1951, and eleven months for 1952. Comparable figures for 1949 are not available.

	(1) Year	(2) Year	Inc. 2 over	(3) 11 Mos.	(4) 11 Mos.	Inc. 4 over

T. EATON COMPANY, CHURCHILL

Mr. Knowles:

1. Are military vehicles and personnel being used to transport merchandise for the T. Eaton Company Limited, from the railway station at Churchill, Manitoba, to the commissary at Fort Churchill?
2. If so, by what authority and under what terms?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. No. However, twice weekly there is a run from the station at Fort Churchill to the commissary store, a distance of five miles, to pick up and deliver supplies. Since there is no express delivery, parcels which have been expressed to service personnel are also picked up and left at the commissary where they are collected by their owners. This arrangement, which is a convenience for all personnel stationed at Fort Churchill, does not necessitate the use of additional service personnel or vehicles.

2. Not applicable.

RETIRED FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS—PENSION INCREASES

Mr. Knowles:

Has the government given consideration to the provision of a cost of living bonus or other increase in the pensions of federal civil servants already retired? If so, what is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Lesage: The government's policy in connection with the granting of a cost of living bonus to superannuated civil servants has been stated many times in the House of Commons and in answers to questions. A complete statement was given by the Minister of Finance on January 28, 1949 (see Hansard for that date, page 42).

3. The army ordnance depot in Regina will continue to function there but ordnance depot facilities in the west will be increased by the addition of a depot in Winnipeg.

4. Transfer from the depot in Regina to the new depot in Winnipeg will be limited to the movement of approximately 50 selected personnel at a cost estimated at $8,810. These 50 personnel will be necessary in order to enable the new depot to function with efficiency from the outset.

5. The new depot in Winnipeg will enable army installations in Manitoba and the western part of Ontario to be served at reduced transportation costs. In addition, the new depot in Winnipeg will be used for supply of Fort Churchill which, at the present time, is supplied from central ordnance depots located in eastern Canada.

(b) None. In accordance with service practice, deserters are not considered to have been released or discharged from the service. Total desertions not subsequently apprehended or returned to duty were 2,005. The offence of absence without leave covers absences as short as one hour and most cases are dealt with summarily. Consequently no record of these is kept at national defence headquarters except in instances involving trial by court martial.

The present system of machine records has been in effect since October 1, 1946. To ascertain the number of officers who have been commissioned from the ranks prior to that date would require a manual check of over 5,000 personal files.

PETAWAWA—NAMES ON PAYROLLS

Mrs. Fairclough:

1. Were any names of persons listed on Petawawa payrolls which did not represent living human beings?
2. If so, how many?
3. At what rate of pay were they listed?
4. Was remuneration in cash or by cheque?
5. If the latter, who cashed the cheques?
6. Were deductions made for income tax purposes at source?
7. If so, what claims, if any, were made for exemption because of (a) married status; (b) other dependents?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, as this question concerns matters in which the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Justice are all three interested, I believe it would be appropriate that I answer it. The answer to the first question is "no" and therefore the remaining questions are not applicable.

As this answer will appear to differ from a two-line statement in the Currie report tabled on December 15 last, I think I should state the facts in this connection so far as it has been possible to ascertain them. I make this qualification because a part of the information is based on statements secured by the police from Sergeant Young who is now in the penitentiary and it is not possible to check all of them from official records.

In February, 1951, it was decided that an area in what is known as camp X at Petawawa should be cleared as quickly as possible. Teams and teamsters were needed, but only three farmers with their teams were found to be available for hire, even though they were to be put on the payroll at the highest rate authorized for tradesmen, namely, that of bricklayers at $1.50 per hour. As more were needed, Staff Sergeant Young hired horses on his own account from a civilian in Pembroke at $1 per horse per day plus feed and care, arranged with eight labourers to act as teamsters and had them placed on the payroll at $1.50 an hour as if they themselves were supplying the horses. The men kept their regular pay of 75 cents per hour plus 5 cents additional or 80 cents per hour and turned over the difference to Young.

Captain Baldock shared in this illegal profit, as he did in profits derived from certain other offences at Petawawa. There was no collusion between Young and the farmers who brought their own teams, and Young received no rebate from them. Both Baldock and Young have since been convicted and are at present serving penitentiary sentences.

The names on the payroll were the names of labourers who actually existed and who worked as teamsters. There were no false names on the payroll and no horses on the payroll. I am further advised that the customary income tax deductions were made against each one of these teamsters in accordance with his own personal family status.

Mrs. Fairclough: What I am interested in learning is to whom the 70 cents a day, or whatever it was, was charged for purposes of income tax. Was it charged to the teamster or was it charged to the owner of the horse?

Mr. St. Laurent: Deductions were made against each one of these labourers as if he were getting $1.50 an hour. The deduction was made in accordance with his own personal family status, whether he was single or married and had or did not have children, at the appropriate rates for that status. They have a credit against income tax which bears marks of the irregularities connected with the way in which the whole thing was engineered.

Mrs. Fairclough: It sounds like a good deal for the owner of the horse.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

Questions

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT PROPERTIES—MINERAL RIGHTS

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Who owns the mineral rights on soldier settlement and V.L.A. properties?
2. Who owns the mineral rights on soldier settlement lands reverting to the crown because of default in payment?
3. Do these mineral rights go with the property when it is later disposed of under the V.L.A.?
4. If not, for what reason?

Mr. Mutch:

1. Any mineral rights acquired in the purchase of land under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act are regarded as acquired by the crown in the right of Canada and are under the control and jurisdiction of the Department of Resources and Development. Any mineral rights acquired in the purchase of land under the provisions of the Veterans Land Act are acquired by and are under the control and administration of the director, the Veterans Land Act, in his capacity as an agent of the crown. When lands are sold under the provisions of the Veterans Land Act the sale includes any mineral rights held by the director.

2. The crown in the right of Canada.

3. Reverted soldier settlement lands are not disposed of under the Veterans Land Act. They are disposed of under the Soldier Settlement Act. When any lands are sold under the Soldier Settlement Act no mines and minerals are included.

4. Because of the restrictions incorporated in section 57 of the Soldier Settlement Act.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MILITARY TRAINING AREA, N. B.— CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Brooks:

For a copy of all correspondence from January 1, 1951, to date, exchanged between the federal government or any department thereof and the government of the province of New Brunswick or any department thereof, relative to the taking over of an area in Queens and Sunbury counties, New Brunswick, as a military training area.

He said: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that you allow this motion to stand. I think the minister has good and sufficient reasons for wanting it to stand, and I am quite willing that it should.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

INCOME TAX ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO MEDICAL EXPENSES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to remove the 4 per cent limitation from the section which makes provision for the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, there was in the former Income War Tax Act, and there is in the present Income Tax Act, a provision respecting the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes. This has been in effect since 1943. However, that provision is limited by at least three main conditions. In the first place, those medical expenses which can be deducted are only those expenses defined as such in the Income Tax Act. That definition was quite narrow at first. It has been broadened a bit from time to time but it is still, in the view of many of us, altogether too narrow. At any rate, that is one of the limitations upon the right to deduct medical expenses from one's taxable income before computing income tax.

A second condition which is attached to this provision is what is known as a ceiling. In other words, right from the start there has been an upper limit as to the gross or aggregate amount that any taxpayer can claim as a deduction for income tax purposes. That amount has been changed on two or three occasions. Indeed, a year ago the ceiling was raised so that it now is $1,500 for a taxpayer who is on a single basis and $2,000 for a taxpayer who is on a married basis, plus $500 per dependent up to a limit of four dependents, or a limit of $2,000 for one's dependents. That is the second limitation on this provision, namely, the ceiling, the present terms of which I have just indicated.

I said a moment ago that some of us are not satisfied with the narrowness of the definition of medical expenses. We feel that it should be much wider, and I want to make it perfectly clear that, although I believe that the definition should be broadened to include other drugs than those now covered, to include spectacles, hearing aids and other such items, nevertheless that request is not contained in the motion now before the house, for the simple reason that it is wise to make one request of this kind at a time.

With respect to the second condition, namely, that of a ceiling on the amount that can be charged, I support the principle of there being a ceiling. Prior to the change that was made last year I felt that the ceiling was not high enough, particularly in view of the increases that had taken place in the cost of medical care, but so far as I can see the figures that are set out now as a ceiling are more or less satisfactory. Therefore I am not asking for any change in that part of this provision.

I come now to the third of the conditions or limitations which is attached to the provision for deducting medical expenses. The third provision is what is sometimes referred to as a floor or, in other words, a stipulation that there can be deducted from taxable income only that portion of medical expenses which is in excess of 4 per cent of net income. When this provision was first written into the Income War Tax Act by Mr. Ilsley in 1943 that figure was 5 per cent. In 1944 the figure was reduced to 4 per cent. The story of that reduction is very interesting for, as I have pointed out on previous occasions, the budget resolutions of 1944 did not forecast any such reduction of the 5 per cent figure. There was, however, considerable clamour on the floor of the house for the wiping out of that floor or reducing it, and in response to the debate that took place on that occasion Mr. Ilsley came back later in the same session and reduced the floor to 4 per cent. However, there it has remained ever since 1944.

As hon. members know, the 4 per cent floor relates to one's net income, not just to one's taxable income. Thus, if a person is on an annual salary of $4,000 a year and is a married man, although his statutory exemption is $2,000—which means that he pays his income tax on only the other $2,000—nevertheless, when it comes to computing his income tax and to ascertaining whether his medical expenses are of any help to him, he can enter on the income tax form only that portion of his medical expenses in excess of 4 per cent of the total of his income—namely, 4 per cent of $4,000. In that case the first $160 does not count. It is only the portion of medical expenses above $160 in that example that can be allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose of this resolution which is before the house relates to one point and to one point only, namely that 4 per cent floor. It asks that the 4 per cent floor be wiped out and that consideration be given to the necessary legislation to make it possible for taxpayers to deduct their medical expenses right from the first dollar up to the limits that are set out in the act. It is well known to all members of the house and well known to the people of Canada generally that that right—the right to deduct for income tax purposes right from the first dollar up to the limits specified—is accorded to donations to churches and charitable organizations. All we are asking for in this motion is that the same privilege, the same right that is accorded to contributions that are made voluntarily, be accorded to those medical expenses which are met by taxpayers involuntarily or in other words because of necessity.

I am satisfied that there is wide support for this principle, for this request that medical expenses be put on the same basis as charitable donations, and that the 4 per cent floor be wiped out. In support of my contention that there is wide agreement with the request I am making, I remind the house that last year on March 26, 1952, this house passed unanimously a motion in my name which was similar to the one now before the house. I point out that the wording of last year's motion was slightly different from the wording of this year's motion and may I say immediately what the reason for the change is. The reason is that last year the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, who is now the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), in my view misinterpreted my motion in that he thought it was asking for something more than just the removal of the 4 per cent floor. He thought that I was asking for a complete removal of the ceiling as well. I have reworded the motion this year to make it clear that it is not asking for the removal of the ceiling. I would like to see the definition of medical expenses broadened but this motion just asks for one change, namely the removal of the 4 per cent floor.

Last year, once it was made clear on the floor of the house that that was all that was intended in the terms of my motion, the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance said in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that the motion was acceptable. As a result of that indication of acceptance by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, the motion received support in all sections of the house. Members on the opposition side were all in favour of it and a number of members on the government side, who on previous occasions were not so vocal, indicated their support last year by speaking to my motion. I refer particularly to the member for Rosedale (Mr. Henry), the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), the member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais), the member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), as well as the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. All of them spoke and either directly or by inference gave support to my motion calling as it did on that occasion for the removal of the 4 per cent floor. As a result of that support in every part of the house, the debate was a rather short one and it ended by the motion being carried unanimously by this House of Commons.

I made it clear during the course of the debate that I knew what that motion meant. It meant that we were asking the government to give consideration to the advisability of making that change. No one in this House of Commons thought it meant that we were giving the government the kind of direction which it absolutely had to carry out; but it is also true, and we have made this clear in the house, that whenever a private member's motion asks for consideration of something toward which the government is not favourably disposed, that motion is either withdrawn by a government member at the request of the government, defeated, or talked out. I can find in the time that I have been here no record of a private member's motion asking for consideration of monetary or budgetary matters being passed unless the government was actually favourably disposed toward the substance of the motion. I think it was quite proper for the press of this country, Liberal press as well as opposition press, to assume as it did from the passing of that motion on March 26, 1952, that one of the changes which could be anticipated in the budget that was brought down on April 8 would be the elimination of that 4 per cent floor. As everyone knows, when we got that budget on April 8 there was no change whatsoever in the floor. The minister, on the other hand, did make a change in one other aspect of the legislation, a change which did not concern many of us too much—a change in the ceiling; but he insisted that the floor had to stand. The minister did not like it because we moved a motion of no confidence later on with respect to the matter and because we berated the government both inside and outside the house for ignoring the wish of parliament in respect of this matter.

I want to tell the minister today that for him to stand, if he chooses to do so, and say that the government carried out the terms of that vote and did give consideration to the idea is not good enough; and in my view it is not playing fair either with parliament or with the people of this country. The fact is that he went against the wish of this house. As the minister knows, the year before last I had a similar motion before the house relating to income tax deductibility. It dealt with the deductibility of trade union dues for income tax purposes. It is strange how things work in this parliament, because on that occasion my motion was defeated by a vote in this house on February 26, 1951, and it looked as though we were faced with a much longer battle to get deductibility for trade union dues. But, lo and behold, on April 10 of that same session—April 10, 1952—when the Minister of Finance brought in his budget he made provision for deductibility for trade union dues despite the fact the government majority had voted it down on February 26, 1951. Last year the tables were turned. The house voted for the idea on March 26—the idea of deductibility of medical expenses right from the first dollar—yet the government rejected that wish when the minister brought down his budget on April 8.

Well, I do not know what is going to happen to my motion today but I certainly hope—and perhaps one can express such a hope with a little more confidence in view of the fact that everyone expects an election before long—that whatever happens to my motion today the government will act on this reasonable request, this request for fair treatment, this request which all Liberals in this house supported last year, this request which newspapers from one end of this country to the other agree is fair and should be supported. I hope action will be taken on it in this year's budget and that the 4 per cent floor will be wiped out so that taxpayers will be allowed to deduct their medical expenses right from the first dollar in the same way as applies in the case of donations to charity.

Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions, and this has been up quite often, as ministers and other members on the government side know, I have placed certain figures on the record and I think I should put a few examples on today. It is necessary to keep putting these examples on the record because income tax rates keep changing and the examples put on the record a year ago do not apply now. I would like to take a few examples to indicate what happens as between medical expenses on the one hand and charitable donations on the other. The examples I have worked out are on the basis of the income tax rates now in effect for the year 1953. In other words, based on the rates in the latest office consolidation of the Income Tax Act, which are the rates for a full year as given in the columns that the minister placed on Hansard on April 8 last year, I find that a married couple without children, having an income of $200 per month or $2,400 a year, are treated in this way. If they make contributions to charity in the amount of $200 per year, their income tax saving as a result of the deductibility that is granted to them will be $38 for the year 1953. I have taken into account both the general income tax and the old age security tax. The exact figures are these. Without any deductions, they would pay $68 general tax and $8 old age security tax, or a total of $76. But if they give away $200 voluntarily, they will pay only $38 and thus get tax relief to the amount of $38.

If that same couple is faced with medical bills that amount to the same figure, $200, an amount they are required to spend whether or not they wish to do so, the tax saving they will get on the basis of this year's figures is only $19.76. The reason for the difference between the $38 of tax relief for the $200 given away voluntarily and only $19.76 tax relief for the $200 spent involuntarily on medical expenses is the 4 per cent floor.

Let me take another example. This time it is a married couple with two children where the total income is $300 per month or $3,600 per year. Their total tax at this year's rates, without any deductions, would be $253. If they gave away $300 in the course of a year, the tax saving which will be granted them under the law as it now stands is $63. But if that same couple with two children and that income has medical expenses of the same amount, $300 a year, their income tax relief will be only $32.76. How can anyone, Mr. Speaker, justify that discrimination? How can the minister justify the fact that he gives to people $63 of tax relief for giving away $300 but gives them only $32.76 of tax relief if they are faced with the necessity of spending that much on medical expenses?

I go on to the case of a couple with an income of $5,000 a year, again with two children. Their total tax, without any deduction, would be $568. If they give away $500 during the year, their tax relief for that generosity will be $120. But if the same couple, in the same circumstances, is faced with $500 of medical expenses, their tax relief is only $72.

In the name of simple justice, Mr. Speaker, in the name of simple elemental fairness, we are asking that these two things be put on the same basis. I am not complaining about the deductibility granted charitable expenses. I quite agree with it, and I support the idea. I support also the ceiling which the minister has imposed upon the amount of charitable donations for which one can claim tax relief. But how one can consider charitable donations in one way and medical expenses in another is beyond my powers to fathom, and I think is beyond the understanding of people in all walks of life in all parts of this country. I have done quite a bit of figuring in this connection because it strikes me that, in the words of the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), who spoke about this matter on a former occasion, it is the little fellow who would really be helped by our proposal that the 4 per cent floor be wiped out.

As a matter of fact, if you take the examples I have given, you will note that the percentage increase in relief that is afforded goes down as you get up into these upper brackets, which is as it should be. This would not be the case if there were no ceiling, but there is a ceiling and I have no quarrel with that.

Let us look now at the little fellow with an income of $2,400 a year who is married and has two children. How he gets by, none of us really knows. Supposing there is such a person and he has no deductions, his income tax for 1953 will be $17 general tax and $2 old age security tax, or a total of $19. If that man gives away $100 in the course of a year —how he could do it I do not know—he would have tax relief for the full amount of his $19. He would have no tax to pay, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would thus contribute $19 to him for his generosity in giving away $100. But if that man with $2,400 a year, with a wife and two children, is faced, as in most cases he probably is, with medical expenses of $100 a year, how much tax relief does he get? He gets 76 cents. Tax relief in the amount of $19 is afforded if he gives away $100, but only 76 cents of tax relief is afforded if he is faced with medical bills of the same amount.

Now, that illustrates the point that it is the little fellow who would really be helped by the proposal that we put before the house at this time. I could give other examples, as I have done on former occasions. Really, my only purpose in doing it again is to bring those simple examples up to date in the light of the tax rates that will apply for 1953.

However, I feel that I should perhaps deal with some of the arguments that have been put forth from the government side on former occasions in opposition to this measure. There have never been any arguments against it from the backbenchers on the government side. They support it, but on occasion the Minister of Finance and his former parliamentary assistant have opposed the substance of this measure. Indeed last year, although the parliamentary assistant seemed to favour it when he spoke on March 26, when he defended the government's failure to make the change in the budget he opposed this whole idea in substance.

One of the arguments put forward by those who oppose this matter in substance is that 4 per cent is an average amount that Canadians spend on medical expenses, and therefore there is no point to allowing that as a deduction. The first thing I want to say about the use of that phrase "average" is in the form of a story, and it happens to be a story which I understand the minister himself once told to a gentleman whose loss we in this parliament and in this country feel very greatly. I refer to the severe loss we have sustained in the untimely passing of Dr. Clark, the former deputy minister of finance. His contribution to this country was an outstanding one. However, what came to my mind was a story I ran across some time ago. It is said that the Minister of Finance was one day having a little fun with his then deputy minister who was talking about averages. The story as I heard it is that the Minister of Finance asked Dr. Clark if he had heard about the fellow six feet tall who drowned in a lake the average depth of which was only five feet.

Mr. Abbott: The story was about the economist six feet tall who drowned in water that had an average depth of five feet.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for confirming the authenticity of the story, and underlining the fact that it was an economist he was worried about. I suppose ministers of finance have to be regarded as economists or pseudo-economists, at any rate. I would suggest there might be some danger in the story boomeranging, and the minister himself being drowned because of his reliance on this argument about averages.

Mr. Abbott: He is a very good swimmer.

Mr. Knowles: It is not swimming that is required this year.

Mr. Brooks: It is skating.

Mr. Knowles: It is not swimming that is required this year by the Minister of Finance and his colleagues; it is skating on the government's very thin ice.

Mr. Abbott: He is a good skater, too.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that he is a good skater, but even good skaters go through when the ice gets thin.

I want to say to the Minister of Finance, in line with the story that he himself told to the late Dr. Clark, that there is real point to the story; that it is no solution to people who are faced with heavy medical expenses to tell them that a portion of that is the average spent by Canadians. These people are still under financial strain because of these expenses. If there is to be any sense of fairness or justice in income tax legislation, I suggest that we should apply that fairness and that justice to these people.

The fact is that a great many people have no medical expenses at all during the course of a year. They are very fortunate. There are not many who go through life without medical expenses, and in the years in which medical expenses do catch up with them we think that they should get the fairest possible treatment from the income tax authorities. But just as we would do that for people in the years when medical expenses do catch up with them, so we are concerned this year with the people who this year will be faced with heavy medical expenses whether the minister calls them average or not.

In connection with this whole talk about averages, might I point out that no such rule applies to charitable donations. Why do you apply one rule to medical expenses—

Mr. Abbott: If we applied the average to charitable donations it would be only about one per cent of income.

Mr. Knowles: Well, whatever the figure is, I would like to see a substantiation of it. By the way, does that include all the tag days? If there is such a figure why does the minister apply the rule in one case and not apply it in the other? Similarly I might ask him, if he takes the view that income tax allowance is to obtain once you get over the average, why does he not apply it to the cost of living? I submit that $2,000, which is the total amount allowed a married couple today, is below the average cost of living. Therefore, if he is going to apply this rule of the average he must, without delay, raise the total exemption that is allowed both to single persons and to married people before they pay income tax. Therefore I strongly urge the minister to rethink his whole position about averages, to take to his own heart the story he told Dr. Clark, and not to press that phase of the argument any more.

Another argument put forward, of course, is that it would cost money; that it would deprive the treasury of a certain substantial sum of money. The figure put forward last year was in terms of $40 million odd. I am still not satisfied with the way in which that figure was computed. The then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance went into it in some detail on the floor of the house. He was also good enough to let me have the rather large chart on which the calculating had been done to obtain that figure. Basically, however, what seemed to me to be wrong with it was the assumption that to wipe out this 4 per cent floor immediately removed for income tax purposes 4 per cent of the national income of the country. The flaw in that argument, as I see it, is that there are a great many people who have no medical expenses at all in the course of a year, and many people who do have medical expenses are so far below the income tax exemptions that they do not get into the income tax paying class anyway. Therefore on that basis I am not satisfied that the $40 million figure that the parliamentary assistant gave us is a correct one. But even if it is, I suggest to the Minister of Finance that his government has cried "wolf, wolf" about the loss of revenue and the danger of a deficit in his budget a little too often.

The people of this country are not impressed by that argument any more. They have been hearing those cries for some time. We cannot afford this, we cannot afford that, but somehow or other we continue to afford some rather expensive items, very expensive in some instances, and still the minister comes out with huge surpluses. The people of this country also know that although the government argues that there cannot be reductions in taxation in the years in between elections, come an election year and some very substantial reductions seem to be possible. Well, I am counting on the fact that everyone expects this to be an election year and that it will result in a change of thinking on the part of the minister with respect to this matter to such an extent that he will not be concerned about the amount of money involved in wiping out this 4 per cent floor.

But I say again, even if wiping out the 4 per cent floor does cost $30 million or $40 million by way of loss of revenue to the treasury, even if it has to be made up in some other way, is it not supposed to be one of the cardinal principles of taxation policy that it should be on the basis of absolute fairness? If that is the case, I am sure the people of this country agree with me, indeed I am sure all hon. members agree with me, that it is not fair not to allow those first dollars of medical expenses as deductions for income tax purposes.

I named a few moments ago the members of this house on the government side who rose to their feet in the debate last year and supported my motion. Some of them and some others met me out in the hall afterwards and spoke to me in terms that I am not used to around this house. They thought that I had done a good service to bring in that motion; that it was a very good idea. There is no doubt in my mind that it always had support amongst all the members of this house, even though government supporters did not say so until they had been given the cue from the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

As I have already said, it received wide support throughout the country in the press of all shades of opinion and amongst Canadians generally. Why was there that support? Well, because there is a good deal of essential decency in the hearts of members of parliament and in the hearts of the Canadian people. That essential decency in these times says that when people are faced with medical expenses they deserve every possible consideration, they deserve fairness even from the income tax collectors. For my part and speaking for those of us in this group, we feel that even this is not enough. So far as medical expenses are concerned we feel, and we will come to it again later, there should be a complete program of national health insurance. This is only a drop in the bucket, only a step in the right direction, but it is a step in the direction of fairness, and I plead as strongly as I can with the house on this occasion not to backtrack, not to go back on what it did last year, but rather to pass this motion once again, and this time when this motion has been passed by this house I hope that the government will not say that negative consideration is sufficient, but rather that it will recognize that the house really believes in the principle of fairness with regard to deductibility of medical expenses, and that in this year's budget, which no doubt we will get just before an election, there will be a provision to wipe out that 4 per cent floor to permit people to deduct medical expenses right from the first dollar.

Before I resume my seat may I remind hon. members that I said in the early part of my remarks that the definition of medical expenses is really too narrow. You can deduct money that you pay to doctors, nurses and hospitals; you can deduct money that you pay for certain appliances; you can deduct money that you spend on certain specified drugs, but there are a great many things even in a strictly medical line which are not included.

It is also to be pointed out that when there is illness there are other expenses that face a family, and none of these of course is allowed. One of the ways in which the government could help to make up for the fact of the many expenses, extra help, extra food and all these things that come into the story of illness, is by at least removing this 4 per cent floor. May I remind the minister also that the provision he made two years ago to include insulin has, for many taxpayers, been inoperative because, while they may spend a good deal during the course of a year, if they do not get their expenditures over the 4 per cent level they receive no advantage at all. To describe as average the expense a person faces, when he has some illness which necessitates taking expensive drugs during the whole of his lifetime, is I suggest to be callous and indifferent to a very human situation.

So on all counts I suggest that never was a more reasonable request made to the House of Commons than that contained in this motion. And, just as the house passed it last year, I hope it will pass it this year, and that the government will act upon the wishes of the house and make this change in this year's budget.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out, this motion is in substantially the same terms as the motion he presented to the house last year and which, as he has indicated, was passed by the house, and without any objection on my part.

I was not able to be present at the debate, but my then parliamentary assistant did discuss the matter and did indicate that the government had no objection to the passing of the motion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would you have made objection if you had been present?

Mr. Abbott: No, I would not, because I gave my parliamentary assistant instructions that I did not oppose the motion, and my reason for not opposing it was based upon the terms of the motion itself.

The motion offered at that time was in most respects exactly the same as that now before the house, namely:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to remove the four per cent limitation from the section which makes provision for the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes.

Now, in the light of subsequent events, I think I was wrong in taking the course I did take, in indicating to my parliamentary assistant that there should be no objection to the passing of the motion. I did it because I felt that it would be wrong and illogical for a minister of finance, at the time budget matters were under consideration, to refuse to give consideration to any proposal.

Every day I am receiving proposals from taxpayers as to how tax laws should be amended; and on that occasion I felt that, in the terms of the resolution as framed, it should be allowed to pass. I must confess that, in my innocence, I did not realize that it would be represented to the country as being the unanimous opinion of the House of Commons that this should be done.

We know how these resolutions are passed. I was not in the house that day, and I do not know what the attendance was, but I assume it was perhaps average—or perhaps even less than average, because it was a private members' day. In any case it was passed without objection from the government. But because in its terms it is, I think, clearly a resolution which relates to the imposition of a tax, then, as we know, under our constitution proposals of that kind can be introduced only by a member of the government on recommendation of His Excellency.

Now, my hon. friend has said that this was not put before parliament as a direction to the minister. Well, I certainly think he is right in that; but he and his supporters have done their best to persuade the people of Canada that it was a direction.

It is all right to pass resolutions couched in these terms, relating to budget matters, if it is understood that they do indicate what they say, in the terms indicated, namely that the government should give consideration to certain matters. But the ultimate responsibility as to the fairness and the desirability of making these budget changes must rest with the government.

My hon. friend has, and quite accurately I think, outlined the history of this exemption, and the basis upon which it is granted. It was introduced by my predecessor, Mr. Ilsley, and the government of which he formed a part; and, as I have very good reason to know, he felt very strongly that provisions of this kind should contain a floor. There is a provision in the United States of, I believe, 5 per cent, and the ceiling there is somewhat different. I am told there is no deduction allowed in New Zealand or in the United Kingdom—but of course now in the United Kingdom, under the new health services, I would suppose that most medical expenses are paid out of the health fund.

I should like to take a few moments to indicate the philosophy behind the provision for a floor. In common with a good many other people in this country, and in the house, I have spent money during the last twenty-five years in raising a family. Unfortunately they are getting pretty close to a grown-up stage; but in the course of those years I have had to spend varying amounts in each year for dental care, for check-ups, for childhood diseases and so on. We have been extremely fortunate because none of our children has had serious illnesses, nor have my wife and I.

During those years however we have in each year paid out money in varying amounts. Perhaps sometimes it would be a few hundred dollars, and sometimes somewhat less than that—for these periodical check-ups, general child care and the like.

I see no reason in the world why I, or anybody else, should be in a position to deduct those normal expenses—and I prefer to use the word "normal" rather than "average". I see no reason why I should be permitted to deduct those normal expenses from my income before calculating my income tax, any more than I should be entitled to deduct expenditures for clothing necessary to keep the children warm, or food necessary to keep them alive.

I think it is unsound, in principle, that normal living expenses of the individual should be paid out of income before tax.

That is the basis upon which the floor has been established. It may be, as I say, that the floor is too high. Perhaps it should be less than 4 per cent. It started out at 5 per cent, and it has been lowered to 4 per cent. I am quite prepared to look at that question again. I am quite prepared to look at the question of whether there should be a floor at all.

However, I have endeavoured to indicate why I believe it is essentially fair that there should be some floor. Because one of the jobs that any minister of finance has to do is to try to spread the tax burden, which amounts now to something like four billions. He must try to spread the tax burden as fairly and equitably as possible among all taxpayers. If one taxpayer gets a concession or a deduction, then some other taxpayer must provide those moneys.

My hon. friend does not quarrel with the ceiling; he has never quarrelled with that. There may be a question as to whether the ceiling should be raised. I have a perfectly open mind as to that, and it is a matter of opinion. But quite obviously, both in my view and in his, there should be a ceiling. Otherwise the benefits of a deduction of this kind would be quite disproportionate as between those in the lower and others in the higher income tax brackets.

The question as to the definition and the eligibility of various expenses which would qualify for deductions is constantly under review. From time to time we have made additions in respect of the classifications of drugs and other expenses which can be claimed as deductions.

Those, then, are the principles upon which these deductions can be claimed. As I say, I have always felt that to be fair as between the different taxpayers in the country there should be some minimum below which a claim cannot be made for deduction of these expenses.

Then there is an added reason—and perhaps this is not an entirely compelling one: I refer to that of administration. I am informed that it would be extremely difficult—virtually impossible—to check claims for medical deductions if every claim, no matter how small, were eligible as a tax deduction. The case may not be completely analogous but I think there is considerable parallel between the type of insurance which some of us take out having a $20 or $40 deductible provision. We decide that we will insure ourselves for minor losses in connection with our car or other insurable property and thereby get a much cheaper rate for the greater expenses.

The philosophy behind this actually is that it is quite within the capacity of the ordinary individual to pay the normal expenses incurred for medical care or attention, but when those exceed what can be considered as a normal amount then, and then only, should there be special relief. That is the principle which lies behind the law as it stands now.

I am not going to take a great deal more time discussing the principles underlying this law. The cost of granting blanket exemption of 4 per cent, as suggested by the hon. gentleman, would be quite heavy. I am told that if everyone claimed the 4 per cent deduction, that is to say, 4 per cent on income as indicated under the act, the cost would be something over $100 million. The estimate of some $40 million which was given last year would mean that a lot of people would not claim at all for medical expenses or would be substantially below the 4 per cent. In any case the cost undoubtedly would be substantial. It certainly can be argued that more equitable and widespread tax relief can be afforded in other ways.

At this time of the year budget matters are under consideration. I doubt if many new points could be brought up in connection with this matter.

Mr. Rowe: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but just for clarification of his remark does he mean that the $100 million would be the cost if everybody deducted 4 per cent, or only those getting hospitalization?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that if the 4 per cent were applied universally on the incomes eligible for tax, in other words if the floor were removed and everybody was able to claim the 4 per cent, it would mean a loss of about $100 million.

Mr. Rowe: Families as healthy as yours would not claim it.

Mr. Abbott: That is quite true. I hope the majority of families are in that condition and I hope the majority of families are honest. But there are some who might be tempted to claim when perhaps they were not clearly entitled to do so and, as I say, it would be extremely difficult to check all the returns. I think the department would just have to take it on trust. One of the tests of a good law is that it should be fairly and fearlessly administered and that is one of the objections to a blanket exemption of this kind.

As I say, this is the time of year when we are giving consideration to budget matters. I intend again to give this question of deductions for medical expenses the most serious consideration, as I did last year. I said a moment ago that I doubted if anything new could be said on the subject. The hon. gentleman who resumed his seat a moment ago gave a most complete review of the arguments in favour of the proposal which he is putting forward. Other members on the government side have spoken on it; last year my parliamentary assistant spoke on it and I have spoken somewhat more briefly this afternoon.

Owing to assiduous and unremitting labours during the Christmas recess the treasury board was able to complete consideration of the estimates last Friday afternoon and I am now in position to have a fair idea of what our expenditures are likely to be next year. From here on, along with my officials and colleagues, I shall be giving constant attention to the budgetary proposals which I hope to bring before the house as early as possible. In that consideration I shall again carry out the wish expressed by the house in the resolution last year and which is again voiced in the resolution we are now discussing, that the government should give consideration to the advisability of removing—I am shortening it up—this floor.

Unfortunately I am unable to be here this evening. With the assurance which I have just given, that the matter will be considered again this year, I think perhaps it might be appropriate if I were to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Knowles: No. Let someone else speak to the matter.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister really wants to apply closure in this manner. It does not seem to be in accord with his usual practice. I wish to make a few remarks and I think some of my colleagues will want to say something. I wonder if the minister has strong reasons for applying closure in this fashion.

Mr. Abbott: I suppose this is highly irregular as my motion is not debatable.

[Mr. Abbott.]

CONSERVATION

PROPOSED CONFERENCE TO CONSIDER NATIONAL POLICY

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of calling a dominion-provincial conference on conservation with a view to the establishment of a national policy on soil, forest and water conservation and land use for Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I trust that when I have concluded my remarks in support of this resolution, which I consider to be of equal importance to the one just under discussion, no member of cabinet will rise and use the government's majority to forestall further debate. On the previous resolution apparently a number of members wished to express their opinions but they were prevented from doing so by the action of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in moving adjournment of the debate. Before going further I wish to say that personally I think it is an unfortunate circumstance, preventing the opposition from expressing their opinions in this parliament. It is a poor advertisement for parliament under the conditions that exist in this country at the present time.

I introduced this resolution at the last session, Mr. Speaker, and I spoke at some length on it. I know that quite a number of members were interested in speaking in support of this resolution. They represented all parties in this house but unfortunately, owing to the rules of the house, they were prevented from doing so. It is not my intention to speak at great length, Mr. Speaker, and I do not intend to repeat any of my previous arguments, but I do wish to deal with the matter from the point of view of the general demand for a policy on national conservation in this country and to indicate to the house the places where that demand comes from and the support for our proposal.

This is a subject in which I am particularly interested, Mr. Speaker, because not only have I been interested in conservation during the whole of my working life but I have practised conservation during the whole of my working period on my property in British Columbia. When speaking in support of this resolution last session, on March 26, 1952, I gave an historical review of the exploitation of natural resources throughout the centuries, and of the movement towards conservation in the United States and in Canada since the early days of this century, and stressed the need for establishment of a national policy on soil, forest and water conservation and land use in Canada based on co-operation between the federal and provincial governments and the people of Canada. I suggested an outline of action that should be taken under such a national policy, including: 1. The establishment of sound standards of management and utilization of natural resources as a result of scientific advice and investigation; 2. The establishment and financing of research work, and the co-ordination of these activities with the work of public organizations and individuals; 3. The development of a co-ordinated educational program aimed at the development of interest and co-operation of all Canadians from early school days on; 4. A program of co-ordinated publicity that would utilize the facilities of the press, the national film board and public organizations; 5. The establishment of a uniform law enforcement program in connection with the conservation of wildlife and other resources; 6. The co-ordination of the activities of all governments, at all levels, with public organizations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when speaking in this debate last session, at page 834 of Hansard, the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) had this to say:

This is perhaps one of the most important subjects that this house could deal with.

We agree with him in that statement and we believe that he thinks it is of great importance—and we are glad to know that he recognizes the importance of this subject. However, I was somewhat disappointed, Mr. Speaker, to read in the Gazette of April 24, 1952, the following statement which is entitled "Resources effort 'great'—Winters":

Minister Says Policy Aimed at Development and Prudent Direction

Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., April 23—Resources Minister Winters said tonight "very great strides" now are being taken to develop Canada's natural resources, "and to manage them with prudence".

He told the Chamber of Commerce here in a speech prepared for delivery that "there is no lack of a general policy for conservation and resources development", and that there is frequent and cordial co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, and with industry in this field.

Mr. Winters said the best sign that there is adequate co-operation "is that the development of Canada's resources is going on apace—"

I was somewhat disappointed to read that statement in the press. First of all, I think the minister's "frequent co-operation between federal and provincial governments" should be "continuous co-operation". I do not think it is an argument in support of a satisfactory policy just to say that it is evidenced by the fact that development of our natural resources is going on apace. That is no assurance that the development of those natural resources is being carried out along sound lines and in accordance with strict conservation principles.

As opposed to the minister's opinion, Mr. Speaker, I want to quote the opinion of an outstanding scientist who has given a lifetime of study to the problem of conservation of natural resources in Canada. I am going to quote from a book entitled "Conservation in Canada" by O. M. McConkey, at page 12. In that connection I want to say that Mr. McConkey is professor of field husbandry at the Ontario Agricultural College and he is recognized across Canada as a great authority on this subject. I might say in this connection in passing that O.A.C. is my old college, and without a doubt it has made a great contribution during the years to agriculture in Canada, and even throughout the world. Personally, I would recommend to anyone interested in this subject the purchase of this book which, I believe, was published first early last year, and to study what Professor McConkey has to say. In any event, as opposed to the minister's opinion in this respect, Professor McConkey has this to say:

> When we consider that as Canadian citizens we are guardians of our heritage of natural resources for future generations, we should establish permanent departments of conservation at federal and provincial government levels to co-ordinate and execute long-term plans of conservation of the nation's natural resources now.
> Canada has a great opportunity to carry out a national plan of conservation. Canada is a new country. We can take warning from the mistakes of old civilizations where the resources of soil, water and forests have been destroyed. We can heed the lessons to be learned from sound forest and soil management in those nations that have survived over the centuries. We have all the advantages of modern science and the known techniques of conservation. At present we are exploiting our forests, soils, minerals, and oil at an alarming rate. The speed of exploitation will increase with the modern world's insatiable demands for raw materials for industry and war.

Now, this is his concluding sentence in dealing with that subject:

> Do not let us be deluded by temporary prosperity. We should establish a long-term rational plan of conservation and administration of the natural resources of Canada now, before it is too late. We must not fail.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I want to contrast the opinion of that outstanding scientist, who has written a remarkable book and who has spent years of his life in studying this question as it applies to the Canadian situation, with the remarks of the minister when addressing the chamber of commerce in Sault Ste. Marie.

I should like to give a few indications, Mr. Speaker, of the growing demand for, and support for, a national policy of conservation in Canada. I am going to give a few illustrations from the press. The first one I want to give is a portion of an editorial written by the editor of the Country Guide in the November issue, 1952. The editor of this paper, Mr. Harold S. Fry, a very noted agriculturist in Canada with wide experience in agricultural matters, and with a wide knowledge of Canadian conditions as well as public opinion in the country in which this paper circulates, had this to say—the editorial is entitled "Sensible Conservation Policy":

> There is evidence that the provinces, who control our natural resources, are beginning to recognize, at long last, the need for a national conservation policy. Under the circumstances, the role of the federal government must necessarily be that of a co-ordinating agency, able to supplement the efforts of the individual provinces, where necessary, from the national treasury. The relationship calls for sound planning, good will and tact. The overriding interests of the nation, and the immediate interests of the provinces, must be harmonized to the advantage of future generations of Canadians, if we are to use these resources wisely.
> Since world war I we have heard a great deal about the conservation of natural resources. Special departments of government have been set up to guard and develop them. Indeed, more than 40 years ago, Canada established the commission on conservation, which, after 12 years of successful and lasting work, was dismembered to serve political purposes and its pieces distributed among several government departments. During the last quarter century, nearly all progressive countries have become increasingly concerned about the rapid rate at which the growth of population and of industry tends to use up resources. The United States, which produces close to half of the world's industrial output, is seriously concerned already about the rapid disappearance of its vast heritage of coal, oil, soil and underground water. European nations have recognized for many years the folly of wasting the resources which nature has provided. Canada's undeveloped resources are perhaps greater than those of any other industrial nation, in proportion to our population, but we owe this fortunate circumstance more to our delayed development than to our foresight.

There is another powerful and influential voice, Mr. Speaker, speaking in support of the need for a national conservation policy.

Now, that was an illustration from a paper circulated in the west. I want to read briefly from an editorial appearing in a paper circulated in Ontario. It is the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 21, 1952. This is what the editor has to say in an article on conservation entitled "We can control floods".

> What this country needs is a national conservation board to organize and integrate the program made essential by floods, soil erosion, forest depletion and many other factors. Canada is the only important nation in the civilized world with a government which gives no support to a sustained and general conservation program. It is spending a great deal on other things, which is money down the drain so far as permanent value is concerned. Those who are suffering from floods in western Canada have a substantial grievance against this government, which characteristically finds it convenient to do nothing about such matters until an election is about to take place. Floods do not await occasions.

There is another voice speaking in support of the necessity for a national policy of conservation.

Then, I wish to quote briefly from the Rural Co-operator of November 25, 1952. One paragraph in this editorial has this to say:

> We must have a long-term conservation program and it must be introduced at once, before deterioration of our soils takes place. We would ask the provincial and federal governments to join in this program, a feature of which might be the establishment of numerous small dams on tributaries of our main watersheds and the development of farm ponds.
> We believe the government of Ontario and our farm organizations must take action now to forestall a decline in the morale of our farm people and a repetition of the soil deteriorating practices of the thirties.

There is another voice, closely in touch with the farmers of Ontario, speaking in support of this policy.

I was interested, when reading the monthly letter of the Royal Bank of Canada of September, 1952, to read a most interesting article on the necessity for practising conservation in this country. I found it particularly well written, and written with a knowledge of the circumstances as they are today in this country. I want to quote one paragraph as evidence of support, and of the great awareness, of the need for this policy in Canada. It does not necessarily mean the spending of large sums of money by the federal government. It means effective leadership in order to coordinate the policies of the federal and provincial governments, and to create in the public mind a national conscience which will assure the preservation and conservation of our natural resources.

In this monthly letter I find this:

> The activities of government at all levels should promote and assist the conservation practices which are to be undertaken by individuals, and government must accept the responsibility for necessary enterprises which are beyond the capacity of individuals. Government must, too, bring in regulatory measures, which are the rules of the game, just as necessary in conservation as they are in transportation, communication and other enterprises that affect the public welfare.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that we in the C.C.F. heartily support this proposal, but strangely enough when the C.C.F. proposes planning or regulatory measures some people refer to them as dictator's proposals. I believe that all sensible and intelligent people realize today that, in our complex civilization and in this complex economic development, there is no question but that if we are going to progress there has to be increased planning by government and increased exercise of regulatory power in these matters.

Furthermore, we have one organization in Canada which has paid a great deal of attention to this subject. I refer to the Agricultural Institute of Canada. For some years it has had a committee studying this problem. That committee was composed of some of the outstanding men in Canada in connection with agriculture, water resources, forest resources and other matters concerning our natural resources. They have done the people of Canada and the governments of Canada a great service in devoting their time and attention so closely throughout the years to this very important question. I want to deal for a moment with a brief the organization has presented to the government in connection with this problem. I shall have more to say about that when the bill proposed by the minister concerning water resources comes before the house. I just want to quote two paragraphs of the resolution, and then briefly from the policy that the Agricultural Institute of Canada recommends:

> Whereas the Agricultural Institute of Canada developed, in 1948, a national soil and water conservation policy with the full approval of its members in all nine provinces, and presented this policy to the federal and all provincial governments at that time,
> And whereas that policy strongly urged that all federal and provincial soil and water conservation policies should give recognition to the importance of placing the administrative responsibility in departments of agriculture,
> And whereas the experience of the past fifteen years has proved that soil and water conservation are interdependent,
> And whereas in 1935 the federal government, facing the serious national problems of soil erosion by wind, and the necessity of the development of water resources to minimize the problems of drought, passed the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and later the Maritime Marshland Reclamation Act, resulting in incalculable benefits to the areas concerned; and decided that the administration of this conservation activity should be the responsibility of departments of agriculture,
> Be it resolved that the Agricultural Institute of Canada commends the government for its intention to provide legislation to deal with the very important problem of the conservation of Canada's resources; that a strong brief on soil and water conservation be submitted to the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet.

And this brief was presented, Mr. Speaker. I am also pleased to see that there is one more step toward the development of a national policy on conservation in the legislation the government intends to bring before the house, but we in this group believe that this is too piecemeal an approach; that the conservation of all these natural resources should be co-ordinated and should be directed as the result of the development of a national policy by this government.

I want to deal briefly with the recommendations mentioned in this brief. The basic arguments of the submission made by the Agricultural Institute of Canada are these:

(1) That efficient land use, which is dependent on soil and water conservation, is becoming of more urgent importance as the populations of Canada and of the world increase.

(2) That there is need for a clearer and more comprehensive national policy of soil and water conservation than has been operated in Canada to date.

Naturally when you talk about a national policy on soil and water conservation you include forest conservation, because forest conservation is related to both. I continue with the recommendations:

(3) That conservation and agriculture offers a highly complex problem, involving the services of trained personnel in many fields of agricultural art and science.

(4) That for all existing, or potential, agricultural land, soil and water conservation are inseparable.

(5) That the farmer must be considered the most important factor in the ultimate effectiveness of any soil and water conservation policy.

(6) That the farmer can be helped most by those who know his problems the best.

(7) That all experience shows the desirability of centring all administrative, planning and development responsibility in the field of soil and water conservation in departments of agriculture.

While dealing with this aspect of a national conservation policy, the brief deals particularly with soil and water conservation. I would like to deal briefly with the question of river bank erosion and river pollution. I did not have time to mention this at the last session, but I shall refer to it now because I think it is further evidence of the necessity for a national policy to cover all these fields. There is a great problem so far as river bank erosion is concerned in many places in Canada. It is a great problem on the Columbia river, which flows through the centre of my constituency. I understand that it is a great problem around lake Ontario and in other places in Ontario and other places. We have constant damage to river banks, in some instances to villages, towns and cities, and to valuable property, which goes on unceasingly but which fails to receive adequate attention. The menace, the threat, continues to be there because there is no national policy with respect to the problem of river bank erosion and also the pollution of rivers.

In my own constituency, Mr. Speaker, and in many parts of British Columbia, we had very heavy floods in 1948. The waters of the Columbia overflowed into the city of Trail and caused thousands of dollars worth of damage; in fact the lower parts of the city could have been completely inundated had not the citizens of the district and the officials of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and all concerned worked very hard over a period of a week, using all the modern equipment that fortunately was available, to build a large dike to keep the river back. But the threat is still there. Any time the Columbia river rises above its banks there is a threat to the city of Trail, there is a threat to other communities along the Columbia river and a threat to farming land and so on. Nothing is done to remedy this because all governments continue to pass the buck, because we continue to operate under legislation that was drafted years ago, and because we fail to have a national policy so far as conservation is concerned.

I am told—I do not know whether I will get it quite correctly—that the constitutional position is something like this. I notice that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is listening. I went into this matter very carefully; in fact I read many letters that had been written about erosion on the Columbia river by the federal government or the provincial government or any organization or any individual since British Columbia entered confederation, and I can say that it has been a continuing threat and a continuing problem on the Columbia river and in the various communities since that time; and it continues to be a serious problem.

I understand that from the constitutional point of view navigable rivers are the property of the federal government. I see the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) shakes his head. If I am wrong in that respect I should like to be corrected.

An hon. Member: Responsibility.

Mr. Herridge: Responsibility of the federal government.

Mr. St. Laurent: Responsible for navigation.

Mr. Herridge: So far as the use of the river for power purposes is concerned, I understand that is the responsibility of the provincial government. I understand that it is the kinetic energy of falling water that produces the power. Therefore, if the banks of the Columbia river overflow and damage the property of the city of Trail, since the city of Trail is the creature of the provincial government, it is actually the property of the provincial government damaging the property of the provincial government, and therefore the federal government has no jurisdiction. I understand that it goes something like that.

I am not a lawyer, and I may have got the matter slightly out of focus, but I do say that, Mr. Speaker.

For instance, the municipality appealed to the minister for assistance in building a river wall. There had been a river wall built in previous days, and I found that was done under some act during the depression that was for the general advantage of Canada; and they wanted it extended. I think the minister quite correctly said that it was not the government's place to deal directly with the municipalities; that it would be up to the provincial government to make representations. Therefore the city of Trail made representation to the provincial government. I understand that so far the provincial government has not made any representations to the federal government.

The point I wish to make is this. In my own constituency here is a continuing threat, which is a problem, and which has existed since British Columbia entered confederation. Because of the constitutional position, and because of our lack of a national policy on soil, water and forest conservation, governments continue to pass the buck, property continues to be destroyed, and nothing permanent is done about it.

I do think that is one problem that the federal and provincial governments should handle. It has to be met. Whatever is done has to be paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. In my opinion we need a policy that would cover a situation of this kind, which exists in many places in Canada.

The same thing occurs with respect to the pollution of our navigable waters. There is no policy concerning the prevention of the pollution of those waters. Expansion of industry means increased pollution of many of our great rivers. This situation indicates the need for a national policy to protect our waters.

I shall not say more on that at this time, because I am sure there are other members in the house who will have something to say on the resolution. Before passing on, however, I must pay tribute to the Department of Agriculture for the good work that has been done by that department throughout the years under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. The only thing required to make that act fully effective is its extension to all provinces in Canada, so as to bring the administration of the act within the terms of a national policy.

What we require more than money at the present time is leadership and co-ordination which will bring about the building up of a national consciousness in support of that policy. I wish to pay tribute to the science service of the Department of Agriculture. This service undertakes investigations in respect of various pests, insects and forest diseases. I know that in my district the science service has conducted some very interesting and worth-while studies. The work they do for the forest industry of British Columbia is highly appreciated by that industry.

All I suggest in the resolution is that all these good works should be placed together in a national policy so as to co-ordinate the activities of all these people so they may work in one direction with one general purpose and objective.

In addition to the organizations, persons, editors and other organizations I have mentioned, I would point out that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture supports a national policy of conservation. The Canadian Congress of Labour on various occasions has expressed strong support of a conservation policy in this country. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Forestry Association, many other organizations and thousands of people who are interested in this subject are urging the government to establish a national conservation policy. I cannot take time to mention many individuals, but I do wish to refer to two or three. I would refer first to a gentleman in Montreal, Mr. J. L. Van Camp of the Canadian Forestry Association, who has done a great deal of excellent research work and writing in connection with the conservation of our forests and water resources. I would draw attention particularly to a pamphlet he put out recently under the heading "Water is a Forest Product". This is an excellent pamphlet, and I should like to see it distributed generally throughout the schools of this country. Men like Mr. Van Camp are working behind the scenes and making a study of the problem so as to provide information which would serve as a basis for the establishment of a national policy on conservation.

Then in this connection I would mention Mr. A. Koroleff, who has done much research work in connection with water and forest conservation. I would advise anyone interested in the forest industry to secure a copy of his book entitled "Stability as a Factor in Efficient Forestry Management", published by the Pulp and Paper Research Institute of Canada. It is one of the best books on the subject to be found in recent years anywhere on the North American continent.

Then again I must pay tribute to Professor McConkey of the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph for his book "Conservation in Canada". I would recommend it to all members on all sides of the house. It represents years of thought and investigation.

Before concluding I should like to quote once again from Professor McConkey's book, where he says:

> The Canadian people have been blessed with a great and beautiful country, fairly rich in natural resources. It is ours to use wisely, and to hand on to future generations without waste.
> We need a change of mental attitude from the prevalent materialistic thought of getting rich quick through the exploitation of our natural resources to that of conserving and improving our resources—a love of our land. Learning about conservation is not enough. What is desired is the development of a conservation consciousness, which results in changed behaviour. The ideals, knowledge and skills of the school children of our country will have much to do with what happens to our land and its resources now and in the future. Conservation is a primary obligation of Canadian citizenship.

I should like to see the government give a lead in this direction. He continues:

> Education in conservation is an urgent need of our Canadian people at all levels, through primary and secondary schools, colleges, universities and adult education.

What I am saying this afternoon represents the viewpoint of the C.C.F. It represents the viewpoint the C.C.F. has presented continuously throughout the years. In its program, in its literature, on the public platform and in the House of Commons the C.C.F. has proposed consistently that a partnership of federal and provincial governments should take over the development and conservation of our resources in the name of the people. Then profit would be no longer the main incentive; proper care and economic development could ensure a higher standard of life for the Canadian people in perpetuity.

As I have said, conservation is the practice of keeping the economic activities of the nation, the activities of man, in harmony with mother earth and with nature. There is one thought I wish to express before taking my seat, and that is that interest in the conservation of natural resources produces cultural and spiritual values; perhaps I should say intangible values. They are immeasurable, and cannot be counted. History proves that those who love the soil make good citizens. We do not find any amount of violent crime in the country, in the rural parts of Canada. We do not find much delinquency in the rural areas. Those conditions are found in much greater degree in our cities. So far as the record is concerned, we find that wherever people are interested in their natural resources, are interested in the soil and are interested in nature, they can be accepted as those who are responsible citizens and with the greatest degree of stability.

For years the C.C.F. has preached the doctrine of the conservation of human and natural resources. Once again the soundness of our policy is being demonstrated by the increasing demand for the planned development of natural resources across Canada. There has been a wider and wider support of the ideas put forth and expressed throughout the years by members of this group.

Great progress in the conservation and planned development of natural resources has resulted from a national policy based upon the co-operation of federal and state governments in the United States. Prior to the development of a national policy in that country, little progress was made in that respect. I think a careful reading of the records of that country will indicate that its development has come about through the co-operation of federal and state governments, as well as that of organizations and individuals in that country. When that took place they began to make some real progress in preventing the further deterioration of their vast natural resources.

We in this group believe that Canada needs action now on this great question. That action can come only as the result of effective leadership by the federal government, based upon a national policy such as we suggest. More and more Canadians subscribe to the creed of a Nigerian chieftain who said:

> I conceive that the land belongs to a vast family, of which many are dead, few are living, and countless numbers are still unborn.

We in this group urge the government to give the Canadian people an opportunity to practise this philosophy by means of a national policy on soil, forests and water conservation and land use for Canada.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I support this resolution and practically everything said by the hon. gentleman who has just finished speaking. I would have been much happier if I had been adequately prepared to discuss this subject at the present time. There is probably no other subject facing us in Canada on which there is such a wealth of material, such a wealth of expert opinion and so much work done in connection therewith. The tragedy of the situation is that while work is being done, very little action is being taken.

The whole question of land use, water supply, and land and water tables is one upon which our whole economy rests. If by our carelessness, either in cropping or farming or in the use of our forests, we destroy the perpetual life-giving qualities of our soil, we destroy ourselves as a country. Many countries have done this in the past. Today there are large tracts of the ancient world which are nothing but desert but which in the times of Babylon, Greece and Rome were flourishing agricultural communities.

We have a far more recent and dangerous situation in our own North American continent when we see that every year—these are figures I do happen to remember—176,000 acre feet are carried down the Mississippi. That is the top soil, the very life, the very heart of this continent. While I have not the figures for our own rivers in Canada, particularly those flowing across the great prairie provinces, having seen the floods in Winnipeg and Saskatchewan I am satisfied that the same condition obtains here.

Lest somebody say, "You, an easterner, a man who is interested in farming, are talking about agriculture, a thing you know nothing about", I should like to quote as an authority a report with regard to the destruction of the soil, by one Leonard D. Nesbitt and published by the Alberta wheat pool. It is entitled "Save our Soil". In the introduction he quotes W. E. Bowser, of the Dominion experimental farms, and A. G. McCalla, of the University of Alberta, as follows:

> Permanency can be assured only if the soil is kept in good physical condition and the fertility is not allowed to become depleted. A soil depleted of its fibre, with a consequent loss of good granular structure will generally drift easily since fibre, even when well decomposed, tends to join the soil particles together. Soils rich in fibre are also generally much more resistant to water and wind erosion. Unless a farmer can afford to keep from one-quarter to one-third of his land seeded down to grass (or if possible a grass and legume mixture) his farm is not likely to produce satisfactorily over a long period of years.

He then goes on to discuss what he calls the creeping desert and he quotes Mr. W. S. Chepil of the dominion experimental station at Swift Current. With the permission of the house I should like to quote the words of this expert in connection with the condition which exists in that part of Canada. Mr. Chepil said:

> Provided we continue to exploit these lands for wheat production as in the past, and provided the change in texture continues at the same rate as during the last decade or so, these soils will change to virtual sand dunes within the next 50 to 150 years. Within the next 150 years at the same rate of exploitation, Saskatchewan alone will have a sandy waste covering an area of at least 6,000 square miles unless these soils are taken out of cultivation and sown to grass.

In discussing the further point of water erosion he quoted the Alberta department of agriculture, which made the following statement:

> The rich soils of central and northern Alberta, as well as those to the south, are being ravaged by an enemy more subtle and more insidious than soil drifting—water erosion. Many of the fields in our best soil areas show minute rills or gullies in the spring after the snow has melted and after heavy rains. These rills, which grow into gullies and then into ravines, are the fingerprints of the monster erosion.

I quote these experts because of the position in which we find ourselves in Canada and because of our responsibility to the world. Today the world is finding itself short of food. This may seem strange with our abundant surpluses here in Canada, nevertheless that is the fact. I think Sir John Boyd Orr has written about it extensively. Isaiah Bowman, at one time president of the American Geographical Society, has written about it at length in his book called "Limits of Land Settlement". Recently a British food minister—I think his name was Sir Josiah Stamp—wrote a book entitled "Land Use and World Population", I believe it was called, and he discussed the whole world. The interesting thing about these publications, all of them written on a world basis by world experts, is that they all came to the same conclusion, namely that the one place where food, particularly cereal food, could be produced in order to provide the world with the necessary proteins was on the North American continent. It was not in the forests of Africa, it was not on the pampas of Brazil and the South American continent, it was not in Asia, but it was right here on this continent; and we Canadians have the major responsibility in the matter.

The problem is thrown directly upon us of conserving that soil so that our food producing potential will remain as high as it is at the present time, and may increase. I have not Sir Josiah Stamp's book with me and cannot quote his exact words, but his theory is that the greatest potential source of population growth is in this country and the temperate zone of the United States.

There is the problem and there is the responsibility. I merely mention the situation because I feel that no member of this party or this house, and as a matter of fact no Canadian who in any way considers that Canada has a responsibility to the world, can neglect the vital problem of maintaining the fertility of the soil in the west.

I come now to the Pacific coast. The one thing that is limiting growth on the Pacific coast, and this is probably also true of British Columbia even with its abundant rainfall, is the lack of water. Today growth in California has almost reached a critical stage. Their rivers are being used to their maximum possibility. The water table on the littoral below the Sierras has dropped as much as 50 to 100 feet in the last decade, or certainly since the beginning of the war. Great dams, such as Boulder dam, are silting up, and the whole problem of providing an ever-growing population with water is daily becoming more critical. The same thing can be said to a lesser degree of the two northern Pacific states. Even in British Columbia, where there is such abundant rainfall, the incidence of drought this year is a warning that we cannot let go unheeded.

Coming now to the part of the country where I live, the rural section of old Ontario, it has been estimated that in order to provide adequate forest cover for farm land at least 14 per cent of the land should be under such cover. In many counties and townships in old Ontario and old Quebec, that part of the two central provinces south of the clay belt, less than 5 per cent, in some cases only 3 per cent, of the land has adequate forest cover. In other words we have depleted our forest cover to one-third of that which is considered to be desirable for a balanced economy by forestry engineers and agronomists, I believe they are called, who understand the business of land use. There is a great temptation for more and more land to be put to the plow and cropped, particularly when prices are high and when specialty crops such as tobacco command extraordinarily good prices, and it is understandable that more and more land should have its forest cover removed.

I want to make a suggestion to the government. I suggest that we have an optimum of 14 per cent forest cover over our agricultural farm belt in southern Ontario; and that the federal government, through grants in aid to the province, should work out with the province, and the province in turn with the county and township governments, a method whereby the local governments could be recompensed for the taxes lost on land given over to increased forest cover. My suggestion is somewhat along this line. If a municipality had 5 per cent of its land under forest cover and it was desirable to increase it to three times that amount, and if the taking of an extra 10 per cent of the land out of agricultural use and putting it under trees would decrease the tax revenue of the municipality, the federal government together with the province should work out a method by which the municipality could be recompensed for the loss of revenue caused by increasing the forest cover.

I want now very briefly to mention the timber industry as such and not in connection with forest cover. I want to quote a report which appeared about a year and a half ago written by John D. Gilmour, B.Sc.A., who also has a B.Sc. in forestry. He is speaking with regard to the use of our Canadian forests, and the title of the pamphlet is "Canadian Forest Policies are All Wrong". The first three paragraphs of his pamphlet are as follows:

> Canadians should check up on the management of their forests. Appalling deterioration has taken place during the last 50 years—a very short time in the life of a nation—and unless forest policies are changed speedily this country faces complete forest bankruptcy.

This appeared in the Canadian Banker, the periodical of the Canadian Bankers' Association; and he says:

> It is well that bankers, who are most vitally interested in Canada's long-term future, should interest themselves in forest management. The forest industries constitute the largest industrial group in Canada, contributing enormously to our domestic economy as well as to the maintenance of foreign trade and the earning of U.S. dollars.
> Although many among the best-informed Canadians despair of the forest future, because the problem is mainly a political one and wrong propaganda has for many years been at work upon the public, there is time yet to apply statesmanship and courage to find the right solution. Good examples are afforded by other countries.

I do not profess to know anything about the problems of forest management but I am quoting this article by an expert and I think he hits the nail on the head fairly well when he says the situation is political.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are we frightened of? What possible problem are we frightened of politically with regard to our forests? The major industry in Canada today is that of forest products; yet we have articles written and published in the most conservative—with a small "c"—periodicals such as the Canadian Banker saying that our whole forest industry faces bankruptcy. It is a problem which this house cannot fail to take most seriously.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that one of the worst criticisms which could be levelled against parliament is that in all the years I have been a member, fourteen of them now, the committee on mines, forests and waters has never met. Would it not appear that here is a problem—a technical problem if you like, but a vital problem—affecting our whole economy, about which we have done nothing. There have been resolutions like that of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge); there have been private bills similar to the one I brought in some years ago with regard to pollution; but the committee has never met to discuss this very vital factor in the economy of our country, the soil and the forest cover.

You would think that this house was not interested. You would think that this was something of minor importance. The very feeding of the world and the economy of our whole nation stems from the soil, and the forests stem from the soil. With the horrible examples of erosion, of flooding, of dust bowls, and the shocking example on this continent of the Pacific coast situation, as far as I know for nearly a quarter of a century we have never once thought it worth our while as members of this House of Commons to call that committee together and bring in experts to see if something could not be done.

These things are not likely to produce headlines. There is nothing startling in increasing forest cover, and erosion, except in times of great and sudden flooding, is a slow thing. It does not rage like a fire, though when the floods come their devastation is just as quick and just as complete. On this question of soil rests our security, our ability to build our population, our ability to do our duty as a world power, but we let it go. We let the soil become more friable, we let our forests burn, we let our rivers erode, we pollute our streams, and we destroy our wildlife. Why, Mr. Speaker? Why do we do these things? Why do we allow these things to happen? Why do we sit here and let our land be slowly consumed by this monster? I do not know.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have too much.

Mr. Adamson: Perhaps. My hon. friend says that we have too much, but I do not think we have too much, Mr. Speaker. I think we are late as it is in taking steps to put an end to this situation, and I earnestly request that the government set up this committee and let us get to the root of the whole problem of soil erosion, water tables and the very earth itself. There can be no possible question of politics in it; there can only be a question of survival.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): I should like to say a few words on this matter, Mr. Speaker, because it is of special interest to my constituency. For some time I have tried my utmost to have action taken on the reclaiming of one million acres of land. Nearly two years ago the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) and I took up this matter. My reason for taking part in this debate is that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) made the statement that soil conservation was C.C.F. policy. I beg to differ with him. It is certainly not C.C.F. policy in Saskatchewan.

For nearly two years I have tried to get the minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan to co-operate with the P.F.R.A. in the draining of the area between the Saskatchewan river and the Carrot river. There is a delta there which extends from the Carrot river to The Pas. It is a wonderful piece of land which could be developed and put under cultivation. The work would cost too much for the province, but not in co-operation with the federal government. I have tried to persuade two ministers to co-operate with the federal Department of Agriculture to get this great scheme for the Carrot river delta started. The hon. member for Churchill commenced working on the scheme at the same time I did. He has reached the point where Manitoba is talking of an agreement to take care of the Manitoba side of the delta.

I believe it is quite unfair to state that the federal government is not taking care of our land in western Canada. The P.F.R.A. in connection with community pastures, and the removal from cultivation of the dried-out area which has been put back to grass, has proven to be an outstanding piece of legislation. There has been co-operation with the provinces, and it has proven a great thing for western Canada. We are urging that the P.F.R.A. develop more land of this kind in the different parts of the three western provinces. It is good grazing land, but it is unsuitable for agriculture because it has periods of drought. We may go back a long way and say that it was a certain government's fault that this land was ever thrown open for homesteading. The land did provide a living for many people for a good long time. The P.F.R.A. has taken it over and is putting it back where it belongs, as grazing land.

The problem with regard to land and water conservation in the north is far different from the problem which we have here. As I have said, we have thousands of acres of small bush in my constituency. Since 1942 we have put about 50,000 acres of this bush land under cultivation, and it is now producing all kinds of grain. Some farmers are allowing their land to go back to pasture and some, on the advice of the P.F.R.A., are planting trees around their farms to make snow belts. There is no doubt that in time the northeast part of the province of Saskatchewan will do its share in providing food for the rest of the world.

Some years ago at one of the food conferences a member stated that there was not sufficient arable land in the world to give everyone in the world an American standard of living. I believe that is something we have to take into consideration. I believe one of the worst sights I have seen came to my attention in the province of Ontario. I am a great lover of the soil. I love to see the plow turn over the soil. I do not like to see a bulldozer removing good soil. Two or three years ago in the township of Etobicoke I saw bulldozers digging cellars in very good earth. If anything hurt, that did. I went up to the contractor and said, "Surely it is time we realized that there are thousands of acres upon which we can build houses without tearing up this good soil." He said, "This is going to be part of the city of Toronto." I believe it is time they got together and moved part of the city of Toronto up into northern Ontario, where it is possible to build houses without interfering with the food production of the country.

Some day we will realize that we have to take care of the good land the Lord has given us. I am sure that with good tillage, good care and good organization a great deal of land could be conserved. I am satisfied that we should co-operate with the provinces. In fact I would go this far, and say that in conserving land and water for the good of the people of Canada, we should not listen too much to the provinces. Our first duty to the people of this country is to provide food. It will not be long before the North American continent will need all the food it can grow. It will not be very long before there will be 185 to 200 million people in the United States, and it will not be long before there will be 20 or 30 million people in Canada. Then our wheat fields in western Canada, which are called the bread basket of the Anglo-Saxon people, will look pretty small to 200 or 300 million people. I am in favour of our joining together in Canada and co-operating to see that every bit of our land and every bit of our water are taken care of.

We need the South Saskatchewan dam; we need that lake of water across Saskatchewan. I am not going to go into that now; we can say more about it later on, but we need that. Five hundred thousand acres can be utilized on our western plains. That would feed a lot of people.

In closing I wish to say there is no reason why the Saskatchewan government cannot co-operate with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration and try to make that Carrot river delta as good a producing piece of land as the Portage plains.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I find there is much in what the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) has just said with which I can agree. The last two or three resolutions that have been produced by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) have been supported by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) and the hon. member for Mackenzie. This indicates that it is a subject on which there is very little political difference. I notice that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) applauds. It may be that because of the Christmas spirit we are going to have a happy time for the remainder of the session. However, I am not so sure of that.

I am going to try not to repeat what has been covered in the speeches that have been delivered by the previous speakers, because I know we are all in unison, as the hon. member for Mackenzie has said, in our belief that people must be fed. We are conscious of the fact that the population of this world is increasing steadily and that millions of people are starving to death every year. We are also conscious of the fact that 60,000 more people are being born every day than are dying. We are also conscious of the fact that it has been estimated that the deserts of the world are increasing by 50,000 acres every day, and it is almost terrifying to try to comprehend just what it means.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has moved this resolution which involves conservation of soil, soil use, forest and water conservation. I am not critical of it. It is so important that we can all agree with it. In fact each feature of the resolution is so important that they all seem to be smothered by the tremendous consequences that are involved. Therefore I am not going to enlarge on what has been said in that regard, except to say that I am in full agreement with it. Judging by the attention that has been given to the matter by those who were in the house I know that we can all agree. It is not a case of party politics; it is not a case of criticizing this government particularly for not having done more than they have done in the last number of years, or of criticizing any particular province; because in fairness I know that the dominion government has its sphere of responsibility. As much as they may intrude on provincial rights, particularly by using their taxation powers occasionally, at least they do respect the old basic principle that the provinces are responsible for civil and property rights, and they do not like to intrude too far.

For many years, as you know, Mr. Speaker, I have strongly supported our policies on agriculture. I have been keenly interested in agriculture, but I have been concerned to see so much money set aside for agriculture in this dominion. I am not critical of that. In fact I realize that there is no one in this house who has not at some time or other said that agriculture is the basic industry, the backbone of Canada, and so forth. We all know it is important; but I feel that sometimes we overlook other more important industries. Therefore I am not going to deal with water conservation, land use or the soil itself, because we know that the greatest God-given heritages we have are the first six inches of soil and the forests. Forestry is important. For many years it has been more important in your province, Mr. Speaker, than agriculture. In fact I think it is more important yet in that rich province to the east. Almost every province in Canada is vitally concerned. Forestry and forest products generally, as the previous speakers have said, have been to some extent overlooked. There is no industry in this dominion, Mr. Speaker, that gives so much to the national revenue of this country and gets so little out of it. No industry in Canada pays as much in taxes into the national revenue as does the forest products industry of this dominion, and no industry of any importance gets so little from the dominion by way of assistance.

In agriculture we have the central experimental farm and other farms supported by the dominion government; we have agricultural services supported by the government; we have all sorts of assistance from the dominion government running into hundreds of millions of dollars over the years. Again, Mr. Speaker, I do not say this in a critical mood of the present government. It has been the way of governments in Canada down through the years. So far as that is concerned no party in this house, neither the party forming the present government nor those who sit in opposition representing Her Majesty's loyal opposition, has any monopoly on how little it has done for the forests of Canada.

As has been said by the hon. member for York West today, we have smugly gone along and taken it more or less for granted. We have had all sorts of parlour criticism about what has been happening to our forests. I am not going to speak on that, or of what reforestation and keeping the ground covered with forests means to water levels. Every hon. member knows that very well. He who runs may read.

Not so long ago I read an article which said it has been estimated that a thick reforestation of five acres will raise the water table from 3½ to 4½ feet on fifty acres of land. Therefore it has a great effect on our whole national life, on climate, streams and all the rest of it. We know how streams have dried up even in our time because of lack of forests; and I do wish to mention the importance of the forest products industry of this dominion. As I have said, it is Canada's leading industry. It pays more into the treasury of this dominion than any other industry. It is first in the amount of wages paid in Canada. It is first in the employment of our people. It is first in value of exports to the United States, and plays a leading part in our trade with that nation. It stands first in importance in world trade. Our tremendous forest resources are of vital concern to the Canadian economy. No similar number of people anywhere in the world have at their disposal the vast forest resources we have in Canada.

I am pleased to speak on this occasion. I hope no one will suggest that I am speaking only because I am personally interested in this industry. It will be kept in mind that I am also interested in agriculture, and have been interested in it all the days of my life. Whether or not we get more votes on the hustings than do the government supporters who would look for the support of the farmers, we must not forget that the forest industries of Canada are vital to the economy of our nation. They were of great importance during the years of depression, and all down through the years have been of great value to this nation.

Despite high grain prices, I would remind the house that exports from the forest industries of Canada have for several years brought in more foreign dollars, chiefly United States dollars, than has agriculture. Perhaps there are only a few people who realize the truth of that statement. We have been in the habit of accepting agriculture as our chief industry, from the standpoint of the income it produces.

I know there will be those who will say that our forests are being depleted and ruined. There are policies of reforestation that are sound in principle and should be proceeded with. I give my support to this resolution because it brings a matter of great importance to the fore, to the attention of the house and the government, and gives the government an opportunity to sit in with the provinces. I am not critical of the fact that the present government has not gone all-out in a program of road-building, fire protection and protection against disease in our forests. That is not the function of the federal authority; rather it is that of the provinces.

However, it is a matter of vital national importance that, no matter what party may be in power, the forest industries should be given careful attention. When I refer to the forest industries I mean, of course, lumbering, logging and all those other occupations involved. All governments in Canada should consider the forest industry as of paramount importance, even surpassing agriculture. Thus far, this has not been done.

I have only a word to say about the utilization of forests. I know there are those who will say that the forest industries are depleting and ruining our forests. They will say that those who are interested in forestry are proceeding in a reckless and haphazard fashion. Well, that may be a popular, parlour criticism, but I suggest it is wrong. It is just as nonsensical as if I were to tell some of my friends from western Canada that they should not cut down a beautiful field of golden wheat because those of us from eastern Canada would like to look at it. It would be just as foolish for us to say that it would be a shame to cut down that wheat. The difference is that it takes 50 or 75 years to develop a crop in the forest, while in the wheat field it takes only a few months, perhaps six or eight. Sometimes it takes longer than others. In Ontario, where we grow fall wheat, we think it takes about a year to get a crop.

An hon. Member: Sixty-five days in the west.

Mr. Rowe: And it takes about 65 years to develop a tree.

Mr. Ross (Souris): They do not grow wheat in the west in 65 days, either.

Mr. Rowe: It may be that the hon. member who interrupted first comes from a pretty rich district.

I have made these observations in passing so that the matter may be placed before the house fairly. This is a subject familiar to many hon. members. Indeed I know the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as well as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) know about the great forest industry of their native province. But this industry is divided into different spheres.

I mention this feature in passing because, after all, trees are like people. They are born; they blossom; they come to full fruition. Then they begin to get a little gray on the top, the foliage becomes somewhat scarce. Eventually they begin to dry up, and finally they fall down and die, returning to the earth.

Mr. Hees: A sad story.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, it is a sad story; and, young as you are, some day you will realize the truth of it. There are some people who believe that because we have a beautiful forest it should not be cut down. I would commit the same folly if I were to say that because I have a beautiful crop of wheat on my farm it should not be cut. There is no harm done, if these crops are properly harvested.

How are our forests harvested? Twenty-five per cent of the forest products are used to produce logs and lumber, pit props, railway ties and the like. Then from 23 to 24 per cent is used for fuel, to keep our houses warm. About 22 per cent of the total forest depletion in Canada is used by the pulp and paper industry. It is interesting to point out that a greater proportion of our forests is lost through fires and insect pests than is used in the great sawlog and lumbering business or the great pulp and paper industry. Then more of our forests are lost from lightning and disease than the amount used to keep our houses warm.

We should keep these thoughts in mind when we consider what is happening in our forest industries. It is not my intention to speak at great length, but I do urge that the government give the matter consideration. True, this is a private member's resolution; but in the interests of soil conservation, water conservation, and everything involved in these great forest industries, I urge the government to give consideration at the earliest possible moment to the setting up of a dominion-provincial conference to study this problem.

Someone may ask what can be done. I know this government seems to be getting more modest every day. Perhaps it would hesitate to infringe upon civil and property rights in the provinces to any greater extent than it already has. I ask the government to approach this subject as one that is fundamental to our economy, one that is as important as agriculture. The whole standard of living of our people depends upon what is involved in this resolution. Soil utilization and water conservation, employment and wealth—all these things are involved.

I am not one who believes that the forests of Canada are going to be depleted; not at all. I have made personal observation of our forests being harvested over several years. In one area, within a period of 20 years, I have seen half a dozen trees growing for each tree cut down. We know that in Ontario one of the large pulp and paper mills is now going over the very same ground from which it harvested trees 50 years ago. The same is true of the province of Quebec, the province of British Columbia and other places. The forest wealth of this dominion is tremendous, but only about one-third or one-quarter is being utilized. The other two-thirds or three-quarters is growing up, falling down and dying as I have tried to describe.

I believe there is a great field for the closest possible co-operation between the provinces and the dominion, as previous speakers have urged this afternoon. I do not think it is a waste of trees, if they are properly harvested, to cut them in order to keep people warm. I do not think it is a waste of trees to cut them in order to provide permanent employment for thousands of people. More people are employed by the forest industries of this dominion than by any other industry. I know of several such places, but there is one with which I am familiar where the third generation is working in the same plant. If the trees are properly harvested, if there is proper management, if the proper interest is taken by the public and government to protect our forests, not so much from being improperly cut and harvested as from insects, disease and fire, then there will be perpetual production and perpetual employment.

About three or four years ago I had the opportunity of visiting a mill in Sweden. At the front of the mill was a stone on which it was indicated that it had been there for 600 years. I asked the manager what it meant, where the stone came from. He laughed and said, "The older it gets the more we think of it, because everybody asks about it. This was a saw mill 600 years ago." That company was cutting trees on the same area. That is why it is like agriculture, only it takes 65 years for the one crop to grow while it takes only 65 days for the other crop to mature.

In our provinces it has been left to the different companies to do their own road-building. These companies have to build roads and clean streams in order to make them navigable and in shape to take out the lumber. Roads are necessary in order to get the men in and the lumber out. Quite often it will be found that there is a gap of 40 or 50 miles between the roads of one lumber company and those of another just over the horizon. When a fire starts and is discovered by the fire rangers in their towers it is quite often found that it is inaccessible by road. Millions and millions of dollars have been spent by the forest industries of this country in the building of roads. Some companies have two or three hundred miles of roads on their limits. These are necessary in the carrying out of their operations.

It is true that a great amount of our forest wealth is being used. Every day the sun rises one hundred acres of Canadian forests are used to print the New York Times. I am mentioning only one, but I could mention other newspapers in the United States which are using just as much of our newsprint. It is said that is ravaging our forests, but the fact is that this wood is being cropped and is providing a lot of employment. These operations can be perpetuated.

This matter transcends Canadian politics; it is something indigenous to Canadian national life and our standard of living. I urge the government to give some thought to this problem. Probably it cannot be done by means of this resolution because with all due respect to the hon. member who has introduced it—I thank him for bringing it up at this time—it is almost too comprehensive; it covers almost too much. Perhaps he might say that one issue is involved in the others but I urge that there should be the closest co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments.

I urge the government to consider giving grants in aid to the provinces. I know they do not like to give money to provinces to be spent by someone else, but perhaps there could be a commission or a joint management scheme arranged to handle this assistance for road-building. I urge the government to give consideration to evolving a plan by which our forest rangers and fire fighters will be able to get to any trouble that may develop.

We sometimes blame the government for not having enough forest rangers when we see a fire ravaging a whole mountainside, but it must be remembered that a great many fires are due to lightning. This happens in districts where the trees have been infested with worms or disease and are so brittle that they almost explode when struck with lightning. The men who fight these fires should be able to get to them.

A scheme of roads in the forest areas of the different provinces would be of great assistance, and I urge the government to give some thought to providing grants in aid to the provinces in order that assistance may be given to an industry which provides more revenue for the national treasury of this dominion than any other industry, yet is receiving less because of what might be termed constitutional responsibilities.

There should be a conference between the provinces and the dominion to clarify what might be termed constitutional technicalities. The provinces are directly responsible for civil and property rights, but this great forest wealth involves our soil, our water tables and our national economy. So much is involved in this issue that the dominion government owes it to the Canadian people to give greater consideration and more attention to our great forest industry.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I did not take advantage of this opportunity to support my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). The resolution he has on the order paper is pretty broad, and one could wander very far afield. However, I am not going to do that this evening. I have two points I want to make that are germane to the resolution, and I am going to stick to those two points. They arise out of a memorandum I have in my hand from the Nova Scotia farmers' association.

During the recess, in fact on January 7, this association held a meeting in Halifax to which they invited all the Nova Scotia members of parliament for the purpose of putting before them certain matters that are bothering the Nova Scotia farmers' association. I was not able to attend their meeting because I was tied up with other matters, and told them so; but I received a copy of a memorandum from them which no doubt all other members from Nova Scotia received. In order to lay the premise for my few remarks I am going to quote a paragraph from the memorandum which is relevant to the resolution now before us. The memorandum deals with several other matters having to do with the problems of agriculture in that province, but they can be dealt with at a time when a subject is before the house to which they can be related. The paragraph I wish to read from their memorandum is as follows:

> For a number of years our provincial and national organized farm groups have been concerned with instituting some type of conservation of our soil, water and forest resources. In a recent reference made through the speech from the throne, it was intimated that such a program would be developed and administered under the Department of Resources and Development. We feel that any program of conservation which will be dealt with through provincial and national channels, and will ultimately concern the farmers of this nation, must be under the jurisdiction of trained men in the profession of agriculture working in close co-operation with our farmers, and we urge that serious thought must be given to this before our federal legislation is proclaimed. Soil and water conservation are inseparable and the experience of other countries in endeavouring to administer similar legislation in departments other than agriculture has left much to be desired.

I am in agreement with that statement. The speech from the throne did indicate that conservation measures such as are mentioned in the memorandum were being considered and would be undertaken by the Department of Resources and Development. I agree with the statement in the memorandum because I believe that particular function belongs to the Department of Agriculture. At the present time the Department of Resources and Development has at its head a very fine man who is highly qualified in his own profession, as an electrical engineer. By and large the technical personnel of that department have to do with construction, housing, the financing thereof and matters of that kind. I think it is a mistake to take a matter that definitely belongs in the Department of Agriculture and place it in the Department of Resources and Development, because I do not think we want to have the future of the agricultural industry of this country tied in with a lot of technicians who are already very much involved in problems they are finding it very difficult to solve.

On the other hand the minister at the head of the Department of Agriculture knows a great deal about agriculture and has for many years, both provincially and federally, administered legislation on the prairies and throughout the country that has had a specific relation to the subject matter of the resolution now before us. I think that is one point the government definitely should consider if they are going to embark upon a program of soil, land and water conservation as indicated in the speech from the throne. In my opinion the first thing they should determine is to place these measures under the jurisdiction of the department that is best able to deal with them, and I support the recommendation contained in the brief of the Nova Scotia farmers' association.

I do not want to go into detail, but over the years I have read quite a bit about the experience in the United States when they set up an organization apart from their department of agriculture and attempted to do the kind of job that it is suggested in the speech from the throne we are going to undertake to do apart from our Department of Agriculture. The government would be wise to read about the experience they had in the United States, because it left very much to be desired. I want to make that point, and I strongly urge the government to consider this matter and refer the whole problem to the Department of Agriculture.

Then I have a second recommendation to make to the government. For a great many years on the prairies we have had the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and there are many trained personnel who for a long time have been carrying on the type of work that is here visualized on a national scale. They have gained a great deal of experience. In order to obtain equality of development throughout the country, I believe that the government should consider at the earliest possible date the possibility of extending the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to cover the whole country. I think in that act they have all of the powers necessary to go into a full scale program of conservation of water, land and forest, and of reclamation. I think that act covers the matter on a regional basis in a way that we desire for the whole of the country.

As is suggested in this resolution in my opinion there are only two things the government ought to consider. The first is keeping the problem in the hands of the Department of Agriculture, and the second is the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act across the country with the necessary personnel to administer it in the other provinces. If that is done I think a base will be laid for a good over-all national development that would cover all the points suggested by the resolution now before the house.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) on stirring up so much discussion about a subject in which I am sure everyone has an interest. In my opinion it is more than an academic interest; it is a matter of the greatest importance to all of the people of this country. As the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) has pointed out, it is of the greatest importance to people everywhere, and I do not think there can be any disagreement between members on either side of the house about the desirability of conservation or even of a national policy.

The hon. member who introduced the resolution complained that members of other parties criticized the C.C.F. because they go in for planning. As I listened to him I found it very hard to disagree with the way he put his statement; but we do disagree with the C.C.F. for wanting to plan everything for us. In the course of his remarks, and I believe I am interpreting him correctly, he advocated a policy of nationalization of the soil, the forests and the things that grow in the soil, and I cannot agree with that.

This country has been wonderfully blessed by divine Providence with tremendous natural resources of soil, of forests and of water power; yet in almost every province from the Atlantic to the Pacific you hear complaints of shortages of one or another of them. I was told only yesterday that in the city of St. John's they are short of water, and that it is dangerous to extend the city any farther without making provision for additional water, for which they will have to go many miles. The federal government has advised investors in the United States that waters of the Yukon river cannot be diverted to develop an aluminum plant in Alaska because of the probable needs for development of water power within Canadian territory.

We are always hearing of tremendous floods and the soil erosion that follows those floods. I remember reading of a very distinguished Newfoundlander, Sir Edmund Gosse, who became librarian of the British museum, and who wrote that when his father first went to Newfoundland 150 years ago at the site of the town of Harbour Grace great forests of spruce and pine grew down to the seashore. Today all the territory is a barren, and the word "barren" in Newfoundland has tremendous significance. It means vast stretches of land on which only small shrubbery grows. The government is now making an attempt to get trees to grow in that area.

When you consider that when this country was discovered, and for centuries afterwards, these great forests stretched over much more territory than they do today, and that despoliation by man, by forest fires sometimes caused by man's carelessness, and by insects has destroyed so much of it that we are worried about the future, then I think this resolution is timely in drawing the attention of hon. members and of important sections of the country to this problem.

These various resources are all related. I suppose the soil is the principal resource because from the soil the forests grow and the forests protect the water supply; but they are all interrelated. I would put the forests first in the sense that by having good forestry and reforestation, and by protecting the forests, we protect the waters in the lands where the forests are and in that way we protect the soil to a certain extent. In Newfoundland we have suffered terribly through forest fires, many of them caused by the railways. The substitution of oil-burning engines for the ordinary coal engines on the railways has had the splendid result of decreasing forest fires. When you pass along the railway line in Newfoundland or in the maritime provinces and see vast stretches of formerly beautiful forest lands destroyed, with nothing left but those gaunt spectres that stand up and seem to be protests against the wrongful use of the land by man, then we see that the need for protection and conservation is great.

Many years ago there was a man in Nova Scotia named Frank D. J. Barnjum—I do not know whether anyone here remembers him—who for years sent out letters to legislators and others warning them that the future would be disastrous if we kept on with the policy of using the forest resources without reforestation. I am glad to say that in recent years more attention has been given to the protection of forest lands in Newfoundland than was the case formerly. Every year now we have a fire prevention week or a forest protection week when attention is drawn to the preservation of the forests which mean so much to the people there. The same thing applies in the maritime provinces and the province of Quebec. By lectures to students, by broadcast talks, by notices and through the press the public is advised of the importance of the forests and the forest products industry to the country. This afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) told us something that is a fact, that the newsprint industry today is the most important industry from a monetary standpoint. It exceeds in the value of its production the whole of the agricultural industry; and that is a tremendous statement for anyone to make.

In Newfoundland we use the forests to obtain building material, fencing material, firewood, pit props and also pulp and paper. I suppose in the other maritime provinces the forests are used for the same purposes.

The hon. member for Kootenay West seemed to advocate nationalization, a nationally directed policy, but when he was talking about the work that was being done in the United States, which he praised, he spoke of co-operation between the federal government and the governments of the various states. It seems to me that what is desirable in this country is co-operation. The speech from the throne, in referring to conservation of the water resources of the country, speaks of co-operation between the federal government and the provinces. The measure, of which notice has been given by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), implies co-operation and not a policy directed by the federal government. I do not think it would be advisable to have a policy directed from Ottawa. I believe it should be a matter of agreement, and the representatives of the different provinces and the federal government should get together.

Mr. Gillis: That is what the resolution calls for.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is the interpretation I put upon it, but that is not the interpretation the hon. member who introduced it puts upon it.

Mr. Gillis: It speaks for itself.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Let me say what it means.

Mr. Gillis: Did you read the resolution?

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, I read the resolution. I have the resolution here.

Mr. Gillis: Well, read it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. gentleman spoke of nationalization. I suggest that when he talks of a national policy—

An hon. Member: He has nationalization on the brain.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member who is interrupting me now must admit that the policy of his party is nationalization of everything.

Some hon. Members: Nonsense.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Other members of the C.C.F. party are interrupting and saying it is nonsense that the C.C.F. advocates nationalization of everything. Next we shall find they will become Conservatives. It is natural for our party to want to see conservation of the soil, forest and water resources of Canada.

I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) asked what could be done if there were a federal-provincial conference. I was going on to say what I think should be done. The federal government, through its various ministers, such as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), who seems to be a suitable man for that work, could act as a liaison agency between the different provinces. The federal and provincial governments could pool their knowledge and experience. All of them have had different experiences with different resources.

In Newfoundland we are probably more concerned with water power and forest resources than are the prairie provinces. Naturally on the prairies they are more concerned with the conservation of the soil. In any case the federal government, through its ministers, could act in a liaison capacity to bring the representatives of the provinces together and pool their knowledge and experience, and in that way a policy could be worked out by agreement and not by direction.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I rise to support the resolution of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I feel that he has done the country a service by proposing the resolution now before us, which requests that steps be taken to provide a national policy of soil, forest and water conservation and land use in Canada.

This afternoon I noticed that the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) seemed to think he was in the provincial legislature in Saskatchewan rather than in the House of Commons. He said something about a development program in the northeastern part of Saskatchewan, and wished the Saskatchewan government would help develop that area in co-operation with the P.F.R.A. I am not well acquainted with the issues involved but so far as I know the Saskatchewan government has always been prepared to co-operate with the P.F.R.A. in every way possible. However, the government of Saskatchewan does not want to turn over that land to the sole administration of the P.F.R.A. So far as the Saskatchewan government is concerned, I feel it has taken an active and growing interest in conservation. This is borne out by the fact that the budget of the Saskatchewan department of agriculture has increased five times since 1943-44. In addition to that increase in the budget of the department of agriculture, $750,000 has been allocated to capital account, mainly for irrigation and drainage projects.

To me the matter of conservation is simply the matter of using the land and water resources in the best way possible. Any program of conservation for Canada is a program that will help all parts of this nation. In looking over the various reports that have been made by agricultural authorities, certainly the maritime provinces and Ontario stand to benefit a great deal from a conservation program. A committee of experts on land use, meeting in Guelph in 1942, reported that there were 8,000 square miles of abandoned farm land in the province of Ontario, and that at the then rate of rehabilitation it would take 800 years to bring that area back into crop production. I believe that Ontario, because of its high rainfall and its rolling topography, has probably suffered more from water erosion than any other part of Canada. For that reason Ontario has a stake in a national conservation program. I feel that a conservation program is something that will appeal to all Canadians in all parts of our country.

The best person to undertake the conservation of land is the farmer who is operating that land. It is unfair to expect the farmer unassisted to conserve for posterity his land resources when he must make a living from year to year. Perhaps because of heavy debt the farmer must work his land in such a way as to obtain the greatest possible annual income. From personal experience and observation I can say that the western Canadian farmer is not in a position to follow the best land use practices. Even though a given part of his farm, from the standpoint of conservation over a long period, might be better used in the production of grass, in most cases the farmer is unable to do that economically because he has a mortgage on his farm or has obtained some credit and his creditors are knocking at the door. They want cash every year, so he is forced to grow a cash crop. He is forced to raise grain year after year, even though he may know that such a practice is not the best long-term land use for his particular farm.

If the farmer is to conserve his land as he would like to do, and as he needs to in the national interest, then some assistance must be given that farmer. This principle has been amply demonstrated by the experience of the United States department of agriculture. In the United States a farmer is paid a specific sum for carrying out a specific conservation practice on his farm. If we want our farmers to engage in contour farming, in a proper system of crop rotation, then the farmers will need some financial assistance and leadership from the federal government.

The House of Commons does not have to take my word for that statement. I have before me the words of L. B. Thomson, director of the prairie farm rehabilitation organization. He makes the statement that if we are to get proper land use and proper conservation of our soil resources, then in addition to an educational program there must be some financial assistance provided to individual farmers to undertake necessary and specific conservation practices.

I feel that it is in the long-term interests of our nation to provide a conservation program for our soil resources, particularly when we are aware of the fact that from our land we obtain our greatest new wealth. Our soil produces new wealth annually to the amount of over $2 billion. From the standpoint of keeping our economy buoyant and maintaining prosperity in the nation we need to make sure that agricultural production is maintained, yes and even increased. If we fail as a nation to conserve our agricultural resources, in addition to the eroded lands of Ontario and the maritime provinces we may have a return to the dust bowl conditions that prevailed in the three prairie provinces in the 1930's, and when those conditions prevail over a long period of time they do permanent damage to the productivity of the soil.

One of the most powerful weapons for peace and democracy in the world today is food. It is difficult to see how we can promote democracy when we on the North American continent are worrying about burdensome agricultural surpluses and doing little about them, while at the same time most of the citizens of the world are hungry. I say that a program of proper conservation, a program of expansion of our food production, together with policies to make that production available to the hungry peoples of the world, would be our best and most effective contribution toward peace in the world.

I come from a province that has never had a surplus of water. Nevertheless we have one source of water that might be utilized more effectively in the future than it has been in the past. I refer to the Saskatchewan river, and specifically to the development of the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project. In moving this resolution the C.C.F. have not attempted to show that we are promoting conservation and others are not. The same is true in reference to the South Saskatchewan dam. If there is one person in Canada who has done perhaps more than anyone else to promote the idea of the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project and the benefits that would flow therefrom to all the people of Saskatchewan it is our own federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Ever since 1935 he has toured that province year in and year out, election after election, explaining to the people of Saskatchewan the great benefits that would flow from the development of the South Saskatchewan dam, and we agreed with him all the time. As the elections were held the Minister of Agriculture became more specific.

Mr. Ferrie: No, you did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. Argue: Speaking at a meeting at Lemberg on June 23 in the 1949 election campaign, the Minister of Agriculture asked the people of his audience to send the Liberals back to Ottawa to complete the job. At that time he was referring to the completion of the South Saskatchewan river project. All the reports we are receiving now, including the answers given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), indicate that the report of the royal commission on the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project is going to be adverse. When the hon. member for Lake Centre pointed to the statement in Time magazine that the report would be adverse, the Prime Minister said: "Of course there are some leaks on some reports from time to time." I myself am not mainly interested in whether or not that royal commission recommends the development of the South Saskatchewan river project, because as far as I am concerned the main thing is not whether the royal commission recommends the completion of the project; the main thing is whether or not the government will proceed with the project.

Over the years, and indeed for a number of years, the P.F.R.A. engineers have recommended this project. They have given their estimates of costs from time to time; and even though, according to the reports, the commission, after a quick look, obtained an estimate that the cost would be $250 million, this does not prove at all to me that it is in any way correct when the best P.F.R.A. engineers have said that the cost will be less than half that figure.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think it would be better to postpone discussion on that project until the report has been tabled. The matter has been referred to a royal commission, and the commission has not yet reported.

Mr. Weir: Has it not? How do we know all these things about it, then?

Mr. Argue: Apparently the report of the royal commission has not yet been made available to hon. members.

Mr. Ferrie: Did you not get a copy?

Mr. Argue: As I understand it the sittings of that commission have been concluded, and it is a matter of printing or something else; then hon. members will be given the report. However, I would point out that the resolution we are discussing refers to conservation and the use of water resources. Because that is contained in the resolution I was attempting to point out that the South Saskatchewan river project is important to western Canada and particularly to Saskatchewan, and we feel that the best use should be made of the water resources in that province. I believe it is well known to hon. members, because it has been mentioned here many, many times, that the development of such a project would irrigate 500,000 acres of land. The development of the project would provide over 400 million kilowatt hours of electricity.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member again, but I think he will agree with me that the discussion of that problem might better be left until the royal commission has reported.

Mr. Argue: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I am willing to postpone discussion of the report until it has been made public, although I want to say that my whole purpose in discussing it at this time is not to comment on its contents, but merely to point out that the people of Saskatchewan are demanding and will continue to demand the completion of the South Saskatchewan irrigation and development project.

The resolution of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) refers to the development of water, land and forest resources. If we are to conserve adequately our forests, our lands and our water resources there must be legislation to make this possible.

I should like to point out, however, that we shall oppose any move to take land conservation and use out of the Department of Agriculture and hand it over to the Department of Resources and Development, or any other department. Surely no group is better qualified to deal with the conservation of land resources than the persons who have specialized in the subject, and who have obtained university and technical knowledge in the field of land use and conservation.

I see on the order paper a resolution which forecasts legislation to provide for the conservation of water resources, for which the federal government will pay 37½ per cent in respect of any project. Let me say to the government that this measure should not mean that the present program under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, controlled by the Department of Agriculture, is curtailed in any way. I hope it does not mean that there will be either a quick or even a gradual shift to the Department of Resources and Development any part of the land conservation program now under the Department of Agriculture. We in this group do not always agree with the Minister of Agriculture and the officials in his department; but I think it is agreed by all that the prairie farm rehabilitation program has been good, that at least at the top it is staffed by most competent persons, that nothing should be done to curtail the program, but that rather everything should be done to expand it. If we use the present facilities it offers and, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has said, make it applicable to all parts of Canada, and use the personnel we now have in the Department of Agriculture, we shall have taken a long step forward in conserving our land and water resources.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have found this debate particularly interesting, and for that reason I feel grateful to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and to other hon. members who have taken part in it. Because, as has been said, it is not a party matter; rather it is a matter in which we have common interest. My own excuse for taking part in the debate is some of the observations that have been made during the course of the debate.

I was, in the first place, surprised and perhaps the least bit shocked, by what was said by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), that the standing committee of the house set up for the purpose of dealing with these matters has not been called together for a good many years. I have asked myself why that was so; and the answer I have given myself is that perhaps it has not seemed very urgent, that other things have seemed more urgent, and that this has been allowed more or less to remain in the background.

I should like to make one or two suggestions. First of all, this is an urgent matter. These are increasing evils. There is increasing deterioration going on at the present time which, if not stopped, will become extremely serious. In that connection I should like to refer to a report made some years ago under the auspices of the dominion and Ontario governments, I believe, with regard to a small area in Ontario which was intensively investigated.

Having regard to erosion and other matters which have been referred to here tonight, it seems to me if we look back to that time we see that during the war—and the report I mention was made at that time—there was every intention of dealing quite seriously with this problem when the war should end. It was felt that this and other forms of activity would be necessary to provide employment.

I think if we look back we can see clearly that what has happened in the last several years is that we have been so busy exploiting new resources, notably mineral resources which, after all, do not re-create themselves —"one toot and yer oot!"—that these resources have been neglected. These resources which, as has been pointed out today, are perennial, provided we do not destroy them, have tended to receive far less attention than they otherwise would.

This leads me to ask whether the situation is satisfactory or unsatisfactory. I was a good deal reassured by one thing said this afternoon by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) because, like the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), I remember the letters which used to be sent out 25 years ago by Mr. Barnjum. He, as I recall it, predicted disaster unless we very quickly pulled ourselves together in the matter of forest conservation. As I say, I was a good deal reassured this afternoon by what the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said, though at the same time he stressed in the strongest possible manner the need still for a proper kind of conservation.

Leaving the forests for the moment and speaking about agriculture, we are all only too familiar as we go through the country, whatever part we are from, with the spectacle of abandoned farms, particularly due to erosion. I suppose that would have been dealt with much more effectively than it has been if it were not that, in spite of all our failings and in spite of all our neglect, we have had so much virgin land and so many new resources. In connection with agriculture we have produced plenty for our own needs, and sometimes almost more than we felt we could find places in which to sell it. That seems to have been the reason for our neglect.

As to the extent of the neglect, I should like to read a sentence or two from a report I hold in my hand which was made about the Ganaraska watershed. The Ganaraska is a little river emptying into lake Ontario at Port Hope. Anyone who has passed through that farming country would be delighted with its appearance and surprised to learn that it was suffering from severe deterioration.

I should like to read briefly from the introduction to the report, which is signed by Dr. R. C. Wallace, one time principal of Queen's university and before that, as hon. members will recall, an Albertan, and before that a Manitoban. Certainly few people have greater knowledge of Canada than has Dr. Wallace. The introduction to the report is dated December 21, 1943, and in it Dr. Wallace says, in part:

> Deterioration of soil, due in large measure to the removal of forest cover, has given rise to serious problems in many parts of Canada. The soundest and most economical methods must be found by which such land may be brought back into productive use. It is now well recognized that conservation projects should be included among the major enterprises, both for providing employment in the immediate post-war period and over the longer term, to help to stabilize the economy as a whole.

And later:

> On any basis, conservation is a pressing need. It is far from sufficiently realized how urgent the task of soil conservation is. If southern Ontario, in which the Ganaraska region lies, be taken as one of the older areas of Canadian settlement, it was estimated twenty years ago that 8,500 square miles of land was marginal or submarginal for agriculture. Recent observations show that in spite of the expanded conservation programs of the government in recent years, the submarginal areas are growing larger.

And finally he says:

> At the present rate at which remedial measures are being applied, it is estimated that it would take several hundred years to deal with the problem.

In other words the soil could be so robbed in a very few years that conservation would then entail a task lasting several hundred years. The problem is there, but of course nothing will be done about it unless we have a certain sense of urgency. Perhaps it will be said, "How are you going to have a sense of urgency about the growing of wheat when we have a so-called surplus of wheat?"

It seems to me that we have moved into an international situation where we have to have a sense of responsibility as well as a sense of marketing. As a boy I can remember feeling that it was rather surprising and rather fortunate that we on this continent were so well off, that we were so much better off than the people in other crowded parts of the world such as Asia, about which we read. But I accepted that as being a fortunate chance that I had been born in Canada and that we Canadians had these advantages. I probably felt that all we had to do was to be thankful for them.

But I think we all feel that we have moved into a different stage of history with the shrinkage of the world, as someone said, to the size of a baseball. I think everyone will agree that we have moved into a situation where we cannot afford to be irresponsible in the use of the land that we have. I was talking recently to a man who had just come back from India, and he spoke of what a distressing experience he had had in seeing crowded populations who hardly knew what it was to have a square meal.

I am not forgetting the humanitarian point of view because I know we all have that, but I think we have moved into a situation where it will be not only our duty but our interest to see that our lands and resources are conserved, that we grow the greatest possible amount of food. I am not overlooking what may be the immediate problem of finding out how we can fit this into world trading relationships, what techniques we can adopt and what relationships can be brought about so that what is grown here can be made available.

I just wanted to place these few remarks on the record. I am not purporting to say what exact steps should be taken. I have no quarrel with the wording of the resolution, as I feel that in spite of whatever other preoccupations we have we should not allow this matter of conservation to escape our attention. If we do so, one of these days we may wake up and find that the other resources which now are doing so much to assist our economy may not be needed as much as they are at the moment, and that all these particular workings which we now have will one day have disappeared. But as was pointed out earlier this day in this house, through the providence of God the resources we are now talking about are without end if we as the human agents do our part to maintain them.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I tried on one or two occasions before this to rise but it was not possible for me to get into the debate. I do not propose to take up much time in repeating the arguments that have been used by speakers who have preceded me in an effort to convince the house that this resolution should pass. I shall try to limit myself to dealing with a few things which perhaps have not been stressed to any great extent.

In the first place, I want to let it be known that those for whom I speak favour very much the tenor of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). We think it is timely. We think one of the most important results accruing from the discussion of a resolution of this kind is to focus the attention of the people throughout the country on the absolute need for all kinds of conservation activity, whether it be in the field of conservation of the fertility of the soil, the prevention of erosion, the conservation of water resources, the conservation of our forest growth or whatever else it may be. We do feel that influencing public opinion is one of the few remaining areas of effective action that are open to us.

We believe in a private enterprise system; we fight to uphold it and to continue it, but I must point out that one of the weaknesses of the private enterprise system, at least in so far as conservation is concerned, is that when you once have alienated resources from the control of the crown you have parted with any effective action that a government can take to conserve what is there, at least without interfering unduly with what we consider to be the rights of private enterprise.

This is particularly true in the field of soil conservation because in this country we follow the practice of selling the land to private holders. Once a sale has been consummated it is practically impossible for a government to take any effective action to see that fertility is conserved. But we can focus the attention of the people upon the necessity of carrying out all kinds of conservation methods, and publicity to be obtained through a debate of this kind is one effective way of doing that job. There will have to be a great deal of educational effort. Perhaps it is in the field of education where the results of a resolution of this kind will be most felt. I am glad at this time to be able to add my voice to the voices of those who have already spoken in support of this resolution.

I should like to see action taken to initiate some form of dominion-provincial activity. Whether a conference is all that is needed is something I have not decided at the moment. I lean to the view that after a conference such as is envisioned in the resolution is called, after it has considered the whole field of conservation and has perhaps suggested some type of policy, if the work is going to be really effective there will have to be a continuing dominion-provincial commission of some sort to follow up the work. Such a commission could continue investigations and make reports to parliament on its activities every year to keep us informed and help us in turn to educate the people back home about the essential nature of the conservation work that has to be undertaken. Therefore I would suggest to the house that a joint dominion-provincial conservation commission be considered along with the conference that has been suggested in the resolution. Already there have been quite a number of demonstrations of dominion-provincial action, and effective action at that, in the conservation field. I recall being quite closely associated with one or more of them, and I should like to say a word or two in connection with the two or three that I have in mind.

In the early days of this century it came to the attention of farsighted men in western Canada that something would have to be done to preserve the watersheds on the east slope of the Rocky mountains in the province of Alberta if we were ever to conserve and control the water flow and prevent the denuding of the forests, which of course would result in the drying up of the wellsprings of the great streams that flow across the western prairies. As a consequence of the farsighted recommendations of these men about 1910 or 1911, if I remember correctly, action was taken to set up what came to be known as the Rocky mountain forest reserve. That occupied an area of somewhere between 15,000 and 17,000 square miles. The area started at the northern boundary of Waterton lakes park and extended northward along the foothills of the Rockies to the northern boundary of about the 60th township. The area is all forest.

After the setting up of the reserve in 1911, efforts were then made to prevent forest fires ravaging the timber, and to try to conserve the growth as much as possible so the watersheds would be preserved. When the resources were handed over to the province of Alberta in 1931 an effort was made to interest the federal government in some dominion-provincial arrangement for protecting the watersheds. Not much was accomplished, however, until about 1938 or 1939, when I recall having made several trips to Ottawa from Edmonton, along with certain other ministers, to talk to the federal officials. At that time we took the position that the only effective way to conserve and preserve the watersheds of the eastern slope of the Rockies was to arrange some form of joint dominion-provincial activity and agreement.

We tried our best to interest the people in the western provinces as well as those in the east in our problem, but it was not until about 1947 that other farsighted men began to see the importance of entering into a form of agreement with the province.

In 1947 the dominion government and the provincial government of Alberta set up what came to be known as the eastern Rockies forest conservation board which was given authority to administer the whole area of the east slope of the Rockies and take whatever action might be necessary to preserve watersheds, build roads, provide fire protection, provide for the cutting of the timber where it became too thick, in fact in practice all branches of conservation and preservation. The work that has been done by the joint commission has been most commendable and effective. We feel that it offers an excellent demonstration of what can be accomplished by dominion-provincial co-operation, and we are certain that the continued flow of the rivers, particularly the North Saskatchewan and the South Saskatchewan and their tributaries, depends upon the successful conservation of the eastern slope of the Rockies.

No one knows how much that sort of co-operation has meant to the western provinces, even beyond the boundaries of the province of Alberta where the conservation project lies. We feel that, by preserving the watersheds through joint action of the dominion and the province, all the western provinces are going to benefit, and I am satisfied that in due course the waters now needed so badly in the dry lands of southern Saskatchewan will be made available as a consequence of that conservation. There is one example. It seems to me that what was accomplished in that instance can be extended into other fields.

There is another example I should like to mention. Several speakers have already referred to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and what it has done. That act of course is the sole responsibility of the federal government. There is a considerable amount of co-operation with the provinces in certain phases of administration; but what we should like to see, in addition to the extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to cover all Canada, is a little more inclination to take the provinces into the confidence of the federal government and let them help to make policy; because anything that touches so vital a spot in the provinces as does rehabilitation and conservation ought to be of concern to the provinces, and they should have some say in the formation of policy. They could have such a say under the proposed joint commission on conservation that I have already suggested, and I believe the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act could be made much more workable and effective if it were considered in the light of close co-operation between the two governments.

In the field of irrigation there has been a great deal of close co-operation between the province in which I live and the dominion government. Irrrigation projects and their development in southern Alberta have meant so much to our province and its economy, in fact so much to the whole economy of Canada, that a person could talk about them for a long time. Some of these irrigation schemes have been built as joint dominion-provincial projects, the two governments sharing the costs and the province taking the full responsibility for the colonization and management of the projects after they have been built. These projects have been very successful. Irrigation, in addition to making it possible to produce things on land that otherwise would not produce very much under dry conditions, does go further and succeeds to a very great measure in conserving the fertility of the soil. In any successful irrigation district in southern Alberta you will find that the fertility of the soil is being maintained and that erosion has been cut down to a minimum. Certainly wind erosion is very small compared with what it used to be. Not only that, but the farmers are practising the most intensive forms of conservation of the fertility of the soil. I imagine that with the present form of management of those irrigated lands we can expect them to continue producing in abundance for a great many years to come.

When I was in Germany in 1948 I went down into an area near Helmstedt on the autobahn, where the autobahn crosses the border into the east zone, and I visited some farms in that area. There was one especially where I had a chance to talk to the owner of the farm, and he said that the land he was farming had been in the possession of his family for nearly 400 years. The family had quite a history, and he said the very land that he was cropping sugar beets on then had been raising sugar beets successfully since the time of Napoleon. It is still producing 15 tons to the acre per year. That seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, to be an excellent example of real conservation of the fertility of the soil. It has only been accomplished because the people who were operating the land and who owned it valued it highly enough so they have been prepared to take whatever action was possible to see that erosion did not take place, to see that the fertility was not mined out of it, and that sort of thing.

There is this to be said about the land in Germany. The government did take a real interest in it and in every way possible did impress on the people of the country the necessity of using the most up-to-date methods, machinery, fertilizer, crop rotation and other conservation aids. As my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) says, the production of sugar beets, certainly in that instance, has been one of the best methods of conserving the fertility of the soil in that country. The same thing can be said of those areas in southern Alberta which have been producing sugar beets for as long as I can remember, and my memory goes back almost to the turn of the century. They have been raising sugar beets in southern Alberta that long, and some of those lands are still producing excellent crops of sugar beets and other things which the farmers use in their rotation program.

I merely wanted to mention that, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that wherever people can be made to see how important it is to preserve the fertility of the soil, and wherever they are given the information on which to build their programs; and at the same time wherever they are given an opportunity to produce those things which are best suited to the soil, then conservation results as a natural consequence of care in handling.

But it seems to me we are becoming pretty careless. As I understand from the debates that have been going on here since the session opened, we are letting the beet sugar industry languish. We are not doing what we should do to protect it. We are not doing what we can to see that a market with lucrative prices is there for the producers of sugar. If we allow that industry to go by default and be destroyed then, Mr. Speaker, we are deliberately taking steps to destroy the fertility of our soil; and all the conservation methods in the world which we might use would not restore it or bring it back.

Therefore I appeal to all concerned to weigh these things very, very carefully and see to it that whatever action we take as a federal government does not destroy the incentive to use care to preserve the resources with which God has blessed this great country. I would suggest by every means possible that the provincial and federal governments come to some agreement with respect to a national conservation policy in all these fields. Following the drafting of such a policy a joint dominion-provincial commission on conservation should be set up to report to this house regularly, and to make proposals for legislation that might be made effective by dominion-provincial action.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): I am very happy, Mr. Speaker, to have been fortunate enough to catch your eye on a matter of such general interest and importance. I am sure most of the members of this house would like to have an opportunity of saying a word, and I assure you that I will not speak long enough to prevent any other member from joining in the debate. However, I do want to deal with one or two points arising out of this particular resolution.

I have not had the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of hearing all of the interesting contributions that have been made to this debate, but I have listened with a great deal of interest to those which have been made while I have been able to be in the house this afternoon and this evening. It is quite obvious that there is unanimous agreement in this house on both the importance and the necessity of as broad a conservation program as is possible in this country.

When one looks at the variety and wealth of our natural resources, Mr. Speaker, one might think that we in Canada would be justified in having a tendency to be a little bit prodigal in our use of those resources. I am sure all will agree with me that in the past we have not been free from some grounds for complaint about the way our resources have been employed, and in some instances about a lack of thought for the future and lack of arrangements for conservation. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that besides doing a very creditable job in the manner in which we have developed and used our natural resources, in this country we have done a very creditable job in a number of directions in the field of conservation.

It has struck me during this debate that almost every member who has spoken has referred to one or more instances of important programs of conservation which are going on in his own area or of which he has personal knowledge. The western members have spoken of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the work that is being done under that legislation. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) who has just taken his seat has spoken of several other important matters of which he has personal knowledge. In the maritime provinces, for instance, we know of the excellent work that is being done under the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, a program which is bringing back into productive use much valuable land in the maritime provinces which had been won from the sea generations ago by the early settlers and which to a large extent had through neglect gone back to the sea. A great deal of the damage which had been done has been repaired and those lands are going to be a source of wealth and a resource for future generations.

In saying that much has been done one should not suggest that anything more than a very good start has been made in this country in the field of conservation of all our resources, forests, soil and water. My only complaint with the wording of the resolution which is before the house is that it calls for a dominion-provincial conference on conservation. It seems to me that at this stage the responsibility of this house, and of the government, is to make sure that we have a sound and effective program of conservation in all the fields which lie in the authority and responsibility of this federal government. We should bring into effect, so far as is reasonably possible, the kind of long-term programs which we believe will carry out our responsibilities in the fields in which we are obviously responsible.

I believe the announcement in the speech from the throne at the opening of this session of the government's plans for bringing forward conservation measures indicates that this government is acting in the manner in which I think it should act. It seems to me that a resolution of this house which would indicate to the nation that an immediate dominion-provincial conference on conservation should be called is premature, and would not contribute materially to the objectives which we all have in view.

I believe one proof of the point I am making is that a good many of the members who have taken part in this debate have, as I mentioned earlier, referred to the various fields of conservation of which they have knowledge, and have indicated that in those programs there is an effective and satisfactory element of co-operation between the federal authority and the provincial authorities involved. Certainly that is true of the particular program with which I am most familiar, the maritime marshland rehabilitation program. This is a joint program between the federal authority and the provinces. The federal government has taken the initiative and has supplied the greatest part of the money, equipment and technical personnel to do this work, but it has been a fine effort of co-operation.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the existence of that co-operation at the present time indicates that what is needed at the moment is not the calling of a conference, but steady progress along the lines on which we are already embarked. I should think that in the years to come, when further progress has been made, it may then be advisable to consider the calling of some sort of dominion-provincial conference. But so long as there are important fields of endeavour in which we could make substantial progress, and in which we are receiving, and can be confident of continuing to receive the amount of useful co-operation that is required, I believe that it would not be necessary for this house to pass a resolution demanding the calling of a dominion-provincial conference.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I indicate my wholehearted support of the principle of conservation, and my belief that these objectives will be fulfilled, but indicate at the same time my criticism of this resolution in its demand for that particular type of conference at this time.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that together with several other members of this house I had the opportunity last week of having a conference with the members of the executive of the Nova Scotia association of agriculture. This is a very active body representing the farmers of Nova Scotia, who invited the members of this house from that province to meet with them. I was one of those fortunate enough to be able to attend. At that time they presented to us a brief, to which reference was made earlier in this debate by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). One of the important recommendations in that brief dealt with this matter of conservation. It is a matter in which they are vitally concerned, and upon which they have had a great deal of discussion. They are anxious for progress to be made in the field of conservation, and the burden of their recommendation was that their studies indicated that in other countries where conservation programs were satisfactory, so far as soil conservation was concerned, they were carried out by the Department of Agriculture.

My views are that the problems of conservation are matters with which we must cope, and the only kind of action any sensible person can wish to have is effective action. I am sure this government will study the problems of bringing effective action to bear on the matter of soil conservation, the conservation of water and forest resources, and if it is found that the only effective and sensible way in which this matter can be dealt with is under the Department of Agriculture, then it will be done in that way. My study of the problem has not been sufficient to convince me just what the proper answer is, but I can assure all those in my province who are interested in the matter that it will receive the most careful attention, and that any proposals that are put forward will be formulated on the basis of a sincere and carefully thought out policy intended to achieve the objectives which we all have in view with the greatest possible speed, and with due regard to efficiency and economy.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I believe it is safe to say that all members of this house have welcomed this debate. From time to time it is refreshing to get away from the problems of the troubled world to give some attention to the position of our people at home, and to the future of this country. I think we are all optimistic about that. We know that we have a very large country. We know that it is a country that has been very bountifully endowed with natural resources, and we know that we have a position that is being recognized in the world today although there are only 14 million of us here at the moment. But that does not mean that this nation is going to remain a nation of 14 million people. In 1901 we had a population of 5¼ million. I will not be here to register my surprise, but I would venture the prediction that those who know what is going on in Canada at the present time will be disappointed if by the census of 2001 there are not 35 or 40 million people in this country. There is room for them and for a lot more. There is wealth for them and for a lot more, still undeveloped. But we must be careful and see that it is properly conserved, so that when our grandchildren, our great grandchildren and their grandchildren are members of a nation of many more millions than there are in this country at the present time there will still be enough of these natural resources to enable them to enjoy the kind of life we in this country can enjoy when the world is at peace.

I have been concerned with some of the publications that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) referred to and of which I took note. There is one more that I would call to his attention, a very interesting book published in the course of last summer by a forestry engineer of Quebec, Mr. Thomas Maher, entitled "Land of Milk and Honey or Wilderness of Cain". There are some parts of it with which I do not agree, but there are useful lessons one can learn from perusing it attentively.

We have made some mistakes; we have some abandoned farms; we have some places that might be in a different condition if other or somewhat different methods had been adopted in respect of them, but these are rather local problems. On the over-all picture we are not doing too badly. Last August I went up to lake St. John in the province of Quebec. There is a company up there marketing aluminum metal at the rate of $150 million worth a year, and all of our natural resources that are going into it are Canadian labour and electricity produced by the running water of our Canadian streams.

Then I went out to the west coast and stopped off at Trail. It will be recalled that 25 years ago there was an international dispute over the damage which farmers of the adjoining state of Washington, I think it is, claimed was caused to the vegetation in their state by the obnoxious fumes from the chimneys of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. There are no scars to show damage to any vegetation at the present time. Things grow out there, and they grow fast, and all traces of damage caused in that period have now disappeared. Since then those fumes have been applied to phosphate rock brought in from Montana, and the combination of the obnoxious fumes and the phosphate rock is $25 million worth of fertilizer a year; and every ton of that fertilizer, under normal growing conditions, means twelve additional tons of cereal crops.

Then I had the privilege of spending several hours each day for five days in the air over the mainland and over the island of Vancouver. I was tremendously impressed by the density and extent of the forest wealth of that Pacific coast, and rather felt that in spite of the large lumbering operations that have been carried on out there for so many years, and are still being carried on, we are not making any very great inroads into the forest wealth of that west coast. Perhaps my impression was somewhat strengthened by the fact that they were just about to open a $40 million pulp and paper plant at Campbell River where they are going to use nothing but refuse, sawdust, edgings, things that before were thrown away. That is an example of an improvement in our methods. We were wasteful, I think, in not making use of these things before, but we are getting over that.

Then I flew over to Edmonton and saw the tremendous progress that is being made on the petro-chemical plant. They are going to use waste there, too. I understand that before crude oil is used it has to go through refineries, and in the refining process there are some elements that do not go into the oil that is marketable. I had seen that in Sarnia, where there is a refinery where the waste goes from the oil refinery to the Polymer Corporation to make rubber, and that portion of the elements of that waste that is not taken to make the rubber goes over to the Dow Chemical Company for plastics and other commodities. Nothing is wasted but the little smell that you notice in the atmosphere. These are some of the things that are being done, and they rather convince one that we are becoming more careful, and that general conservation methods are being applied.

Of course when you come to deal with any specific item of natural resources you find that is something that belongs to the provinces and about which they are very jealous. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), when he was premier of Ontario, attended a dominion-provincial conference here and I remember—and I just looked it up to see how correct my memory was—that he enumerated the responsibilities of the provinces and what the provinces were doing, and the trained forces of civil servants they had built up to do that. I have no doubt that he remembers it, too. It is to be found on page 589 of the proceedings of the conference of 1945. After enumerating some other things he had this to say about natural resources:

> Ours is the responsibility for the development of the vast resources which made production possible in this country during the war. Nothing that the dominion government did, nor has been called upon to do in the past in the way of technical development, laid the foundation for that huge production from the natural resources. That was the result of the development and supervision of these resources by the provincial governments throughout the years.

He described other provincial responsibilities, and went on to say:

> I have only touched a part of the field that, until the compact of confederation is torn to pieces—and I too use the word compact—must be the responsibility of the provinces. Until the compact of confederation is torn to pieces, and please God it never will be, but until that is done, if these things are to be done at all they must be done by the provincial government. And to do these things, since long before confederation, the provincial governments have been building up skilled, highly trained and unselfish civil service organizations to carry out these great public responsibilities.

Well, here I rather shy away from using the expression "national policy" in connection with things of that kind. There are people who think that, when you use the term "national policy", there is some way in which the central authority is going to reach out and try to draw to itself some of the provincial jurisdiction. We do not want to do that. We want to have this country continue under the constitution that was set up, and we do want to co-operate with the provinces. There have been many declarations in the course of this debate of the extent to which this co-operation is working to the advantage of the whole Canadian public at the present time. There is on the order paper now a resolution to have enabling legislation which would permit the dominion government to co-operate and collaborate with the provinces in connection with the conservation of water resources. There is the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which has provided a method whereby there was co-operation between the central and provincial governments on smaller, more localized projects.

Well, we want to create an atmosphere that will remove this fear that there is any attempt by the central government, whatever party may be in power, to reach out and take away from provincial administrations the responsibilities and jurisdiction which, by the constitution, are theirs.

I have not quite the same misgivings as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) about the terms of this resolution. It asks that we consider calling a dominion-provincial conference to bring about a greater degree of collaboration and co-operation. Well, we are quite prepared to consider that. But we do not think it would be apt to produce very great results to do it right away or to do it on any wide scale. Let us continue to demonstrate, by the co-operation that will be taking place, that there are no ulterior motives in doing it, and that it is merely a genuine desire of Canadian citizens, to whatever administration they belong, to help the Canadian people of this generation discharge the responsibility they have to Canadian people of future generations to see that the resources of this country are not depleted, but are maintained, and will be available to be used by them, and will have increased productivity as the size of our population increases.

I think we can accept this recommendation that consideration be given to that. But I am sure the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) would himself agree that it would be better to have the house give consideration to this enabling provision, so that when we have a conference with them we can say to them, "The Canadian parliament has authorized us to go thus far with you to help you take the proper measures for the conservation of water resources".

I fully agree with the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) that the conservation of water resources depends upon proper forest cover over a large part of the soil of Canada. The hon. member said this was an industry that contributed largely to the federal exchequer; but it is also the property of the provincial governments and makes very substantial contributions to the revenues of those provincial governments. I am sure they are very jealous of their control over the policies that are to be in force and carried on.

The hon. member has had much more experience than I with what is going on in that connection; but I think we would both feel that the provincial governments have been doing very well, and that they have been enacting and administering pretty wise legislation for the proper management of their property, their forests on which they grant cutting rights, evidently renewable but cutting rights, only. The hon. member said that this goes on. I know that up in the lake St. John district, where I was, it has been going on now for a century, and that there are now growths that are better and more productive than the first that were taken off those same lands.

That is something that is progressive. We do not find in one year, or even in one decade, the situation they have in Sweden. It is the result of experience, and experience means trial and error. Some mistakes are made. Mistakes are corrected. You add one satisfactory experience to another satisfactory experience.

On the whole I think the warnings given by those who have written about the depletion of our resources are good and healthy warnings; but they must not induce too deep a pessimism in any of us. Because I do think that, given peace in our days, the management of the resources of this country is going to be sufficiently wise to enable us to look forward to a very substantial increase in population, without feeling that there are not going to be enough of those resources available for those generations to exploit and pass on to the generation that will follow them.

Once again, to all those who have taken part in this debate I hope I may, without sounding at all impertinent, offer congratulations, even thanks. I do so because I think it is a good thing from time to time in this troubled world, with all the international problems we worry about, to give some thought and attention to the brighter side of the picture, and to quicken somewhat that desire we have to do what appears to be necessary as our part toward preserving peace in our day, so that the conservation policies being applied and developed, and which should be expanded, will be productive of those results for the future generations which so many of us say, and so often, seem to have been in the designs of Providence for the people of Canada.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate, but some of the things said have made me feel that perhaps one more matter should be brought to the attention of the house and country.

It has been conveyed to me, on what I consider good authority, that about the only way we can be really sure of retaining the fertility of the soil is through having introduced into the soil from time to time organic matter from animals. I have been told that one may put fertilizers—nitrates, phosphates, and the rest of them—on the soil, and probably force a crop, but that ultimately soil bacteria will play a part which we must not overlook in the retention of soil fertility.

Having laid down this general principle, which I believe to be sound, I would draw the attention of the house and country once again to what I consider a dangerous trend in this nation in respect of the dairy industry. I am afraid we are neglecting that industry in a way which will probably cast upon us a certain amount of reflection in the minds of those who succeed us. People these days are so anxious to save five cents—practically all of us are that way—that they are ready to use margarine freely rather than pay additional money for butter. By reason of that fact it looks as though our dairy industry is going to suffer seriously. There are signs that this result has occurred and is occurring to a greater degree.

It has been brought to my attention that notwithstanding the introduction of margarine there are more dairy stock in Canada per capita than we had before we started using margarine. I am not just sure what may be the significance of that fact. It may be that the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease and certain other factors have entered into the matter, but if we continue to use the products of vegetable oils instead of butter I cannot see how our dairying industry can be maintained in the healthy condition it was in before we began using margarine and vegetable oils so freely.

I am quite sure that nearly everybody wishes he knew the solution. I am not prepared to suggest what is the solution. I believe that two provinces in our nation have forbidden the use of margarine. I am not quite ready to agree with what they have done, though it may be found in the long run that they have been wise in their decision. It has been suggested that subsidies be paid to help the dairy industry. I have not given the matter sufficient study and thought to be able to feel competent to make any recommendation in that respect.

But I do make this observation once more, that we in Canada should most earnestly study ways and means whereby we can have a greater number of dairy cows. It must be borne in mind that it will be quite impossible to conserve the fertility of our soil for future generations, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has so admirably expressed it, unless we have a large number of livestock on our farms.

Conservation

As a minor illustration of how serious this may be may I say that I suppose most hon. members have lived in a time when horses instead of tractors were used on our farms. Everyone knows that by the use of horses we were returning fertility to the soil in several ways. But now we no longer use horses as formerly and as a consequence that amount of fertility is not being returned to the soil. We operate barren tractors today, and the only thing that goes on the land is some burned oil which is more likely to impair the effectiveness of soil bacteria, or even destroy them, than to help them.

We cannot afford to fail to take cognizance of all these facts as we contemplate a policy for conserving the fertility of the soil. I feel that I have made my contribution, and it is this: we simply must give more attention to the preservation of our dairy industry.

On motion of Mr. Hodgson the debate was adjourned.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee be appointed to continue the examination of all expenditure of public moneys for national defence and all commitments for expenditure for national defence since March 31, 1950, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and in particular, what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; and that notwithstanding standing order 65, the committee shall consist of twenty-six members to be designated by the house at a later date.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I was away attending the meetings of the North Atlantic treaty council when the Currie report was presented to this house and discussed on December 15, 16 and 17 I feel that it would be the wish of hon. members, and indeed of others throughout the country, in view of the wide interest attached to this important document, that I should take advantage of the first opportunity of dealing with it on the motion to set up this committee and in the course of my remarks to indicate in support of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the reasons why I believe this report should receive the consideration of that committee, if and when it is set up.

In the debate which took place between December 15 when the Currie report was tabled and the Christmas adjournment on December 17, reference was also made to a number of other matters relating to national defence about which I may have something to say on another occasion. But today I intend to confine what I have to say to the Currie report itself and to matters relevant to it.

Before entering into this subject I should like if I may to make a personal reference. For the affairs of the Department of National Defence and the three armed services of Canada I am responsible under the statute under which I was appointed. I have accepted and have endeavoured to discharge that responsibility to the best of my ability. I have no intention of trying to dodge that responsibility. There has not been and there will not be any effort made to find a scapegoat. When we found that there had been wrongdoing, we laid prosecutions. When it appeared, as I said in the house on April 21, that there had been "grave irregularities", I appointed Mr. Currie to investigate the causes and to suggest some means to prevent their recurrence.

As he says, in the investigation he was given every facility. He made his report and by the time we had received it action had already been taken which anticipated the majority of his recommendations. The report shows that a good system of accounting had been worked out, approved and adopted, but was not carried fully into effect. No government department, no commercial enterprise, no large-scale undertaking can be perfect. In an operation of the magnitude of the expansion of the defence effort of Canada there are bound to be mistakes, just as by the law of averages there are bound to be some thefts and some fires. We have had these in the past and most certainly we will have them in the future. As I said in the house in 1947:

> While much progress has been made, no one appreciates more than myself that there is still a lot of work to be done in reorganization before we can provide a proper organizational and administrative basis for the defence forces that we may have in the future.

Perhaps I have been overenthusiastic in the defence of the armed forces against what I felt to be unjustified charges, and sometimes I may have been overoptimistic; but it is pretty hard to work with the armed forces of Canada without having high admiration for their fine record of achievement and without having faith in their capacity to do what is expected of them.

When things happened which were wrong and when they were brought to my attention I tried to take whatever action appeared to be most likely to put matters right. As long as I have the responsibility of speaking in this house for the armed forces of Canada I shall try to deal promptly with wrongdoing and to correct situations that need correction; but I am not going to blame others for shortcomings unless I am satisfied that they are responsible for them.

Some confusion has arisen regarding the handling of the report itself. First of all, let me emphasize, as the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) have done, that there was only one report, and that is the report signed by Mr. Currie himself. He did not make any other report. There was no interim report.

The only report Mr. Currie made was the report he signed. That was given to the deputy minister of national defence on Monday, December 8. Unfortunately, the fact that the signed report was dated November 26 seems to have given rise to some confusion. However, no copy of the signed report was received by the Department of National Defence prior to December 8, 1952.

Here I should point out that throughout this whole investigation Mr. Currie and those associated with him worked closely with the department and the army. Mr. Currie referred to "the ready and full co-operation" accorded to him. I am sure that he would be the first to say that a large part of the information he and his associates received came from the department and the army works services.

As regards the presentation of the report, most of the information I have was given to me by the deputy minister of national defence, Mr. C. M. Drury.

From time to time Mr. Currie's representatives, and on two occasions Mr. Currie himself, discussed with Mr. Drury the form in which the irregularities at Petawawa would be presented in the report. I believe that this was back in September or October. Mr. Davey, an associate of Mr. Currie who had been doing a large part of the investigational work, indicated to Mr. Drury that he proposed to list extracts from the R.C.M.P. files, attributing to the R.C.M.P. the information so given.

Mr. Drury was concerned as to how such information was to be handled, and this for several reasons. Its appearance might be taken to prejudice the criminal or military cases which were still pending. It might damage innocent persons, and it might compromise other police investigations. Mr. Davey showed Mr. Drury a typewritten draft showing the form in which it was proposed to present this information. Mr. Drury pointed out that the publication of R.C.M.P. investigation reports was something that the department had always endeavoured to avoid. These reports were confidential, and if they were not treated as such future police investigations might be hampered. Mr. Davey undertook to have consideration given to changing the form of presentation.

In a later discussion Mr. Davey said that changes had been made and Mr. Drury suggested to Mr. Davey that he might have a look at the revised form of presentation of the irregularities. Mr. Davey said that this was now embodied in the draft of the whole report and it was not Mr. Currie's intention that anyone review the draft before presentation of the report. Mr. Drury reported this conversation to me. I told Mr. Drury that in the interests of Mr. Currie, as well as of the department and the army, it would be desirable that the report should be as factually accurate as possible, and I thought that he might suggest to Mr. Currie that he let him see a draft of the report to check it for factual errors.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. Claxton: This would be about the 25th or 26th of November. Mr. Currie of course was perfectly free to follow that course or not as he wished. As he himself says in the letter to me of December 29:

> On the 26th November, before the checking and final consideration had been completed by me here, Mr. Drury, the deputy minister, called on the telephone from Ottawa. During his telephone conversation with me, Mr. Drury mentioned the minister and went on to intimate to me that it seemed desirable that the final text of the intended report be submitted to him (before the report was actually signed and delivered) in order that purely factual matters dealt with in the report could be verified as to their accuracy. I gathered that his reason for this was that in such connection there had been instances in the Mainguy report where purely factual matters of this nature had not been properly dealt with.
> While, during this conversation with Mr. Drury, I expressed some disinclination to follow such a course, the upshot was that it was understood that I would submit to him one of the two print reproduction copies above referred to, but solely for the purpose of enabling verification of factual matters and data dealt with in the report as so formulated. I decided that I would ask my partner, Mr. Cleary, to personally deliver the said copy to the deputy minister. I called Mr. Cleary, who was in Ottawa, and described the situation to him. That afternoon I had one of the two print reproduction copies which I had received from the printer mailed to Mr. Cleary, who, on the following day, the 27th November, delivered it in person to the deputy minister.

On Monday, December 1, Mr. Drury met Mr. Cleary, another of Mr. Currie's associates, and Mr. Davey, as has already been outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). As a result Mr. Currie made some minor changes, signed the report and forwarded it to the deputy minister under cover of the letter dated December 8.

It has been suggested in the house that it was wrong for anyone in the department to look first at the draft of the report, and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who is generally very fair, has even suggested in a radio broadcast that Mr. Currie should perhaps be blamed for showing the draft to the deputy minister. I cannot see anything wrong in what was done. I think that the suggestion that it was wrong arises from a misconception of what Mr. Currie was asked to do and what he was doing. Mr. Currie was not carrying on a criminal investigation. That was being done by the R.C.M.P., the army provost corps, and the Department of Justice. Mr. Currie was not investigating the Department of National Defence, and he was not investigating the Minister of National Defence.

As Minister of National Defence I had asked Mr. Currie to make an investigation for me of the causes of a bad situation which had been found at Petawawa and to recommend to me how that bad situation could be cleared up. I was afraid the bad situation might be more widespread in the army works services, and that is why I asked Mr. Currie to look at that whole branch of the army right across Canada. I wanted the truth and I wanted the kind of report which nobody would question. I did not want errors of fact anywhere in the report which might discredit the whole report and make it more difficult to implement any recommendations it might make to improve the situation.

I am glad, and I am sure the house is glad, that Mr. Currie accepted Mr. Drury's correction and took out the reference to the soldier who had been accused of stealing materials and using army labour to build a cottage because that soldier had already been acquitted in the courts and it would have been unfortunate to have done him the injustice of leaving in that reference. I am sorry the report contained the reference to the Canadian National rails which turned out not to be there, and I am sorry it contained the reference to the horses, though I am glad they were not on the payroll.

At the same time I can understand why Mr. Currie did not consider it necessary to check the irregularities at Petawawa very carefully. He was not carrying on the criminal investigation. He had another job altogether, to find the causes and recommend means of preventing their recurrence. That is what the report is supposed to be about. I am glad, and I know other hon. members are glad, that Mr. Currie found no new evidence of extensive irregularities and that he felt justified in cautioning us not to blame the whole army works services for the conduct of a "handful of crooks".

I still believe that the report would be a better report if these errors of fact I have mentioned, and a number of others, had not been left in it. That was what I wanted to have prevented when I told Mr. Drury that he might suggest to Mr. Currie that a final check be made for errors of fact. Of course it was up to Mr. Currie to decide whether to have that check made, and he did decide to do so, and he did make a few changes. But they were made on his own responsibility, and Mr. Drury did not even know which of them had been made until he received the signed report on December 8.

Like other hon. members, I was astonished to find that another copy of the draft, apparently a duplicate of the copy shown to Mr. Drury, had got into the hands of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and had been referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in the house on December 15. This copy was seen by the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) I believe on the same day. It appeared to be an exact duplicate of the report itself except that in the latter some pages had been reprinted.

The only copy of the draft received by the Department of National Defence was the copy handed to the deputy minister on November 27. That copy was returned to Mr. Currie's representative on December 8 at the same time that the signed report was presented. Consequently the draft in the hands of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could not have reached him from the Department of National Defence. As the release to unauthorized persons of a draft of a report of this character is a matter of great concern, I wrote Mr. Currie a letter on December 22, 1952, and received from him replies dated December 24 and December 29, 1952. I wrote Mr. Currie again on January 2, 1953, and received from him a letter dated January 7, 1953. I also wrote the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asking if Mr. Currie could see the copy of the draft received from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and I received a reply dated January 5, 1953. Meanwhile one of Mr. Currie's associates examined the copy of the draft given to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and examination made it plain that this copy was in fact one of the drafts prepared by Mr. Currie's printer. Mr. Currie wrote me to this effect in his letter of January 7, 1953. In the concluding paragraph of that letter Mr. Currie said:

> Everything which I have done by way of inquiry and investigation negatives the possibility that the copy in question could have got out in any stage or step between the printer's shop and my own organization and the department; but I still, of course, welcome any further investigation which the department or any other authority may deem it expedient to make from any angle or direction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister put that entire exchange of letters into the records?

Mr. Claxton: I would be glad to do so.

While the explanation as to how a copy got into unauthorized hands was the responsibility of Mr. Currie and remains his responsibility, it seemed to me and it seemed to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that the theft or other improper act by which the copy got into unauthorized hands was of such a general concern that it should be followed up and the R. C. M. P. were accordingly instructed to investigate and report.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Claxton: On January 8 I wrote the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and on January 9 I telegraphed Mr. Currie to that effect. To these messages I received a reply from Mr. Coldwell dated January 10, 1953. If I have leave of the house I would now like to table all of the correspondence to which I have referred. I may say that, whether it was necessary or not, I have asked Mr. Currie and the hon. gentleman if they had any objection and they said they saw none.

Mr. Knowles: Do I take it that you mean they will be reproduced in Hansard?

Mr. Claxton: Is that necessary?

An hon. Member: It should be on Hansard.

Mr. Claxton: As an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that these letters are to appear in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: In Hansard.

Mr. St. Laurent: As an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence, see appendix, pages 974-978.)

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Currie has since been in communication with me about the investigation which is still proceeding and about which it is not possible to make a further report at this time.

During the spring and summer of 1951, the Canadian Provost Corps was engaged in investigations at Petawawa military camp and during the same period, as a result of inspections carried out by the chief auditor and the inspector of quartermaster services, deficiencies were found at Petawawa indicating the need for increased supervision. At that time there was no evidence of any criminal act requiring prosecution.

On October 12, 1951, the anonymous letter referred to in the Currie report was received by the R.C.M.P. at Ottawa. There is nothing unusual about this—as everyone knows, a large proportion of crimes are reported and solved in consequence of tip-offs. The letter was forwarded to headquarters central command on October 16, 1951, and as a result, on October 29, 1951, the R.C.M.P. were requested by the deputy minister of national defence to carry out a complete investigation. This investigation was carried out in conjunction with the Canadian Provost Corps. It was commenced immediately and pushed through as rapidly as possible.

During this period no less than thirty-seven major construction projects were being carried out at Petawawa by employees of twenty-four different contracting firms. Anyone with any experience knows how difficult it is to enforce security over building supplies or the disposal of scrap in those circumstances. To be effective the investigation had to be carried on as secretly as possible. Moreover, as the alleged operations had extended over a considerable period, some officers and men had been posted to other units and the investigation had to be carried on at a number of different places across Canada, including Halifax, Vancouver and Churchill.

Those investigations indicated that some service officers and men and civilians had conspired together to commit a number of thefts and frauds in connection with the disposal of stores and with other operations going on at the camp. By March 10, 1952, the investigation had proceeded to the stage where prosecutions could be laid. A detailed summary of the reports of the R.C.M.P. and the provost corps was put before me. The thoroughness of the investigation can be judged by the results of the prosecutions and from the fact that neither in the court proceedings nor in the Currie report was any substantial additional information disclosed.

Mr. J. W. Pickup, Q.C., was engaged as special counsel and, on his appointment as Chief Justice of Ontario, he was replaced by another distinguished counsel, Mr. T. N. Phelan, Q.C. Five service personnel and ten civilians were prosecuted in the civil courts. Four service personnel and eight civilians were convicted.

The first prosecution was that of Staff Sergeant Young and it began with his arrest on May 13, 1952. The cases were pressed on with all possible expedition and despite intervention of the two months in the summer when the court did not sit all cases and appeals were disposed of by Monday, December 1, when the last case was dealt with in the military courts.

In addition to giving instructions that prosecutions might be laid, consideration was from day to day being given to the steps that should be taken to follow up disclosures made in the police investigation. The result was my appointment of Mr. Currie to make an investigation and report. In the telegram dated April 21, 1952, which already appears on Hansard of that day, Mr. Currie was asked to determine the causes and make recommendations to prevent a recurrence of the irregularities that occurred at Petawawa. His recommendations are contained in parts II, III and IV of his report. They contain many constructive recommendations with which I will deal later.

It has been suggested that reading the report from the end rather than from the beginning makes a very different impression. However, most people started, as one would expect, at page 1 and I am afraid that a good many of them stopped when they came to the horses. The first point I want to emphasize is that Mr. Currie says in his report that it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities over a long period of time took place. Now, Mr. Currie does not say in his report that he discovered any of the irregularities at Petawawa. Most of the irregularities there had already been discovered and that is the reason Mr. Currie was asked to make his investigation, and, in the words of my telegram, "to determine the causes and make recommendations to prevent a recurrence".

Since most of the irregularities referred to in this part of my report were already known to the department, and steps had been taken to deal with them before the investigation began, it would scarcely be necessary to mention them at all if they were not referred to in the report.

So far as I can discover the summary of nineteen cases given in the report was largely derived from confidential police reports to which, of course, Mr. Currie had access.

The Prime Minister gave the house on December 17 the information he had received from the deputy minister to the effect that page 7 of the draft had contained a paragraph stating that an army corporal had had a cottage built valued at $1,700 out of army materials and army labour for which no reimbursement had been received, or words to that effect.

Mr. Drury pointed out that this soldier had been already acquitted and consequently, as I have mentioned to the house, that passage in the draft was omitted in the report.

Yesterday the Prime Minister dealt with the question of horses. Now, there are a number of other cases in which the account given by Mr. Currie is not fully in accordance with the facts as they have been established in the course of our further investigation or in the courts. However, there is included among these examples of irregularities one statement about which I think I should say something, and that is the reference to the dam.

As the report has it, "a dam was built on Tucker creek at a cost estimated at some $3,000 or $4,000. Its utility is not clear to me and it was in any event not authorized by army headquarters". That is Mr. Currie's reference to this instance in his report. According to the information furnished to me by the chief of the general staff, the dam was built as a training exercise to create a source of water to fight fires. This dam was built on Tucker creek, which is a creek of roughly 15 feet to 20 feet in width, and during the summer it dwindles to a very small trickle. It happens that it runs at the western end of one of the target area ranges where live ammunition may cause fires. The closest other source of water is two and a half miles away. Tucker creek would provide a source of water for fire fighting, provided enough water is stored to permit mobile pumps to be used.

The construction of a dam there was advocated as far back as 1927, and again in 1931-32. Early in 1949 a dam was constructed there out of logs and earth with sand bags, but it washed out during the spring freshets in 1950. The following year, as a training exercise for the pioneers of the Royal Canadian Regiment and to build up a reservoir of water for fire fighting purposes, the area commander, with the approval of the general officer commanding central command at the time, had the dam rebuilt of cement. The cost of materials and civilian labour was about $2,000.

This project involved the restoration of the dam which had been washed out by floods. Now, under the regulations applicable at the time, such projects costing not more than $5,000 could be approved by the area or general officer commanding. That is the information given to me by the chief of the general staff.

These, and other cases mentioned by Mr. Currie, are the kind of thing that could be gone into further by the committee, if that is its desire. In the department, and in the army, we want to see that everything is done that can be done to discipline those who have been at fault, and so far as is humanly possible to prevent a recurrence. If I do not refer to the other cases at Petawawa, I hope that no one is going to say that I think what took place at Petawawa is not serious. After all, I do happen to be the person who, on April 21, informed the house that there were grave irregularities. I was also the one who took the view that the situation required a thorough investigation, who had an investigation made, and who had the result made immediately public.

I now turn to the constructive part of Mr. Currie's report, his recommendations as to what could be done to improve the situation in the army works services. It seems to me, in all fairness, we should put the report and its recommendations in proper perspective, and relate them to the problems and difficulties which the department, the army and the army works services particularly have encountered since the termination of the second world war—facts which are well known to everyone. I should like also to draw attention to some very important differences between the Department of National Defence and other government departments or indeed the work of the Department of National Defence and any civilian activity. These differences result from our form of government, as well as from the nature of the defence operations. They exist in every democratic country.

In other government departments there is a single line, a straight line of responsibility proceeding from the minister, usually through the deputy minister, to all the employees and agencies of the department. In defence, in addition to this chain of responsibilities on the civilian side, there is also the chain of command and the chain of responsibility on the service side. Since the new defence act came into effect in 1950 the service chief heads his service, and each service chief is responsible to the minister for the control and administration of the service. So far as service operations are concerned, each of the services is under the direct control of the chief of staff, who is responsible to the minister—subject, of course, to the scrutiny—and where required the action—of the deputy minister, particularly in matters of estimates, appropriations, financial control and accounting.

Now, let me point to another fact in the organization of the Canadian army which has some importance. The Canadian army, as is the case in most countries, is divided into corps. There are fourteen in all, and they include armour, infantry, signallers, etc. One of the corps is the Royal Canadian Engineers. The engineers, in turn, have two components, the field units which do the engineering work in the field and the army works services which have to do with accommodation and services at static establishments. The Currie report has, of course, to do with this latter branch, that is the army works services and this branch only.

In 1946, the army works services comprised twenty-nine works companies and detachments. The service was reorganized in 1948 into sixteen works companies comprising thirty-three major works detachments across the country extending ultimately from Newfoundland to Vancouver, north to Whitehorse and the Yukon and into the Northwest Territories and the Arctic. The responsibility of the army works services includes: (a) providing buildings for the active and reserve forces, whether by way of construction, purchase, lease or the renovation of existing buildings; (b) works for defence training and operations; (c) custody and care of army lands and buildings; (d) maintenance of buildings, training facilities and utilities; (e) operation of water, sewage and electric plants; (f) fire prevention and fire fighting services; (g) preparation of designs and specifications for buildings and other services; (h) planning of buildings and services required for mobilization; (i) handling of salvage for renovation or disposal—and that for all corps in the Canadian army.

The operations of works services from 1946 on extended to all the property the Canadian army had acquired before or during the second world war. This property was located in every part of Canada, and it was in every kind of condition. The buildings and installations constructed in wartime, which were being retained, were deteriorating rapidly. Most of them were designed to have a life of about five years. The army works services were responsible for the custody and maintenance or the renovation or disposal of all of this property.

An additional responsibility was placed upon the army works services with the decision to create "emergency married quarters", and between 1946 and 1948 a total of 4,500 of these were provided through the army works services. During this time too the Alaska highway was taken over from the United States army and the Royal Canadian Engineers army works services had to assume responsibility for its upkeep. The highway covers a distance of 1,250 miles to be kept open twenty-four hours a day the year round. Many of its bridges and culverts, etc., had to be replaced. For each year from 1946 to 1949 the program for the acquisition, construction and maintenance of army property amounted to approximately $20 million. That is the financial measure of the scope of the operations of the army works services during that period. For 1952-53 the program for the same purposes was in excess of $250 million, or more than ten times as much. The strength in 1949-50 was 806 service personnel and 2,936 civilian personnel and in 1951-52 it was 765 service personnel and 3,334 civilian personnel. Hon. members will observe how the civilian personnel outnumbered the service personnel in both years by three to one, or more. With this relatively small increase in personnel the army works services had to carry on the following operations:

(1) Continue their ordinary peacetime activities of maintaining existing active and reserve buildings and services;

(2) Continue to handle large stocks of surplus from the second world war;

(3) Supply personnel for the 25th brigade in Korea and the 27th brigade in Germany;

(4) Provide services to meet the additional needs of the army due to its increase from the figure of 20,300 before Korea to a figure of 49,800 two years later;

(5) Provide training facilities; and

(6) Have to do with the addition of buildings and permanent services such as roads, sewers, lights, etc., totalling in contracts placed or works undertaken, in the two calendar years subsequent to Korea, the sum of $125,283,905. This amount was represented in no less than 285 different construction contracts, and an estimated 4,100 additional projects involving a total of 7,268 buildings. Heavy as was the burden placed on all branches of the armed forces, it is fair to say that the outbreak of the Korean war placed on the army works services one of the heaviest burdens of the subsequent expansion.

Let us now direct our attention to the accounting system used by the army works services and which Mr. Currie calls a good one. Late in 1947 the quartermaster general decided that a system of cost accounting should be introduced into the army works services. In response to his invitation, a senior officer of the quartermaster corps of the United States army came to Ottawa to give the benefit of his advice. Shortly afterwards an officer of the directorate of works and accommodation was sent to Montreal to discuss cost accounting systems with Anglin-Norcross Limited and the Foundation Company of Canada Limited. This officer was then sent to Washington to study in detail the system of cost accounting used by the United States army corps of engineers.

As a result of this study, it was decided that a modification of the system employed by the United States army corps of engineers would most nearly fit the needs of the army works services and work was put in hand to prepare the details of a system for introduction into the army works services. The new system was developed and introduced in the army works services in 1949.

At about the same time, the British and Australians also studied the United States army corps of engineers cost accounting system and we believe that they are introducing similar systems into their own army works services.

This cost accounting system had the following main objectives: (a) accounting for materials and supplies; (b) job costing; (c) real property records; (d) installed engineer fixture records; (e) work feature cost accounts.

This system was approved in April, 1949. It was estimated that it would take at least a year and probably two years to put it into effect, provided, of course, that adequate staff would be available; so that if it had been possible to keep to the timetable the system would have been fully introduced by 1951. As it turned out, however, in June, 1950, Korea intervened and its challenging requirements had to be met.

The army works services was faced with the alternative of meeting that challenge with the resources available to them, or diverting their efforts in an attempt to achieve administrative perfection at the expense of operational performance. They really had no choice. They adopted the course which any soldier would choose and which I believe any Canadian would support. They met the operational requirements.

Both departmental audit reports and the Currie reports have indicated the presence of irregularities in the application of the accounting system. Difficulties have existed —and continue to exist—which have prevented the accounting system for the army works services from working satisfactorily. As is clear from the Currie report, the main difficulty has been to obtain qualified personnel to administer the system. This matter was referred to by the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) in his speech on December 17.

The army works services experienced the same problems as those of private industry in obtaining graduate engineers and other qualified technical and accounting personnel. There was and is a shortage of engineers throughout the country; and with both industry and the armed forces expanding, the shortage has become acute and still is acute. In addition to this difficulty, the army was handicapped by the salaries which it could pay graduate engineers as compared to those offered by private industry. How significant is this shortage of qualified engineers may be appreciated when I tell you that in the army works services today there are 111 officers and that out of those 111, 53 are university graduates.

Consequently, the army works services was unable to obtain as rapidly as desired the service and civilian staff needed to do the job and also to keep the accounts in the way they should have been kept. In February, 1952, a special team of representatives of the civil service commission, the chief auditor's branch of the Department of National Defence and the Canadian army was set up to make a survey of the army works services establishments in order to arrive at the numbers and qualifications of the staff required to operate the system and to determine the rates of pay which would have to be offered to attract the right type of person. Of course in the period following the institution of the system in 1949 there was not a moment when efforts were not being made both to create the right establishment and to recruit and enlist the staff required. This team to which I have referred completed surveys of the engineer detachments at Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Picton, Toronto and Camp Borden. As the Currie report indicates, and as our experience shows, this is a very necessary operation. It will be seen that in this particular respect the department and the army took action ten months before the report was delivered to me. However, Mr. Currie's investigation intervened, and as he was making a similar survey, and as there was urgent need for the service of the personnel involved to carry on with their own urgent regular tasks, this operation was suspended.

Since the Korean war began we have been short in the Department of National Defence at least 10 per cent of the civilians required at any time to fill the approved establishments—that is, within the whole department. That means that we have at all times been short between two thousand and four thousand civilian personnel.

A system of internal audit of the Department of National Defence was instituted in the month of February, 1948. It resulted from a study and report by representatives of treasury board, the comptroller of the treasury, the civil service commission and the department.

The position of chief auditor was advertised by the civil service commission and, in consequence of a competition which was held, Mr. J. A. Kidd was appointed. Mr. Kidd is a chartered accountant who had carried on his work in Saskatchewan before entering the service of the Auditor General. For some nineteen years he has been in the public service, mostly concerned with the Department of National Defence.

It should be emphasized that the chief auditor's branch carries on an internal audit of the work of the armed forces on behalf of the deputy minister. At the present time the chief auditor has a staff of 49 auditors and 19 others. Since the office was established the chief auditor has made a total of 1,185 reports. During the current fiscal year it is expected that about 350 audits will be made. Those audits are made of all units of the navy, army and air force, of the defence research board and of the inspection services.

The procedure is that the chief auditor prepares a report on each audit to the deputy minister. With respect to the army, a letter is then sent to the chief of general staff in the name of the deputy minister, drawing attention to any matters which require action.

Prior to August 1950 these letters were addressed to the quartermaster general. Since then they have been addressed to the chief of general staff. Prior to January 1952 the practice had been to forward these reports through engineer channels, to the command engineer concerned, instructing him to take corrective action and report. Since January 1952 these reports have been forwarded by the chief of general staff to general officers commanding who have been reminded of their personal responsibility in this connection.

The general officer commanding is required to take corrective action and report. His report is reviewed by army headquarters and the staff of the deputy minister. Naturally it is not possible in an operation of this size for these reports or correspondence to be handled or even seen by the minister, or for that matter even by the deputy minister himself. It is only the really serious cases that the deputy minister can be expected to review personally.

On March 24, 1952, the chief auditor made a general report to the assistant deputy minister who has to do specially with financial matters. This was of course before Mr. Currie was asked to undertake an investigation, which was on April 21. In this memorandum to Mr. Armstrong, the assistant deputy minister in charge of financial matters, Mr. Kidd said in part:

> The new system appears to have been well thought out and with proper supervision and staff should have been quite successful, but as indicated in a number of our audit reports, supervision has been almost entirely lacking and the quantity and quality of the staff inadequate. In five of the units visited it was claimed by officers in charge that insufficient and untrained staffs precluded carrying out the instructions properly while in seven other units tradesmen and labourers were observed performing accounting and stores duties. Some 95 officer positions on the establishment are said to be vacant.

Mr. Kidd then referred to corrective measures in progress:

> Following the submission to the C.G.S. in February 1952 of an analysis of these general conditions, action was initiated which it is anticipated will eventually remedy the major faults.
> (a) The chief instructor of the R.C.E. school at Chilliwack, B.C., has been instructed to visit all commands to advise and assist works companies with respect to the accounting system.
> (b) At the request of the quartermaster general a survey team of three investigators from the civil service commission, assisted by representatives of the chief auditor, the D.C.P. (that is, the director of civilian personnel, an official of the Department of National Defence, Mr. Lavergne, reporting to the deputy minister) and the R.C.E. has been set up to review the organization and staff requirements of the directorate of works and accommodation and works companies (Appendix B). It is understood that the civil service commission has been approached with a view to having the 95 vacant officer positions filled by civilian engineers, which in our opinion is a progressive move as the presence of one or more civilians in this capacity at each works company will make for continuity in the administrative staff and increased efficiency throughout the corps.
> (c) To meet the responsibility of internal audit and inspection required of the service, an establishment for a civilian inspection staff of seven has already been approved by the civil service commission.
> (d) It is understood that the D.W.A. (that is, the director of works and accommodation in the branch of the quartermaster general) on the instructions of the Q.M.G. is to prepare an analysis of our reports on which a general directive is to be prepared and sent to all works companies over the signature of the C.G.S.
> It is therefore considered that everything possible has been or is being done to remedy the adverse conditions presently existing.

That is the end of the quotation, and the end of the memorandum. Mr. Currie himself said of Mr. Kidd that the chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously.

Attached to the report of Mr. Currie, as appendix B, is a table prepared by Mr. Kidd. Mr. Currie did not prepare it, and no changes were made in it after March 24, 1952, although this table is the main evidence, apparently, of the breakdown given in Mr. Currie's report. You will recall that table. It has a column down the left, showing works companies and across the top are twenty different varieties of observations with X's underneath indicating the incidence of the observations.

Personally, I do not think "breakdown" as used in Mr. Currie's report is the right word. What we were trying to do was to work out an effective system of accounting. We simply did not have enough personnel to do that, and also to do the jobs which they were appointed to do. The system was only begun in 1949; but since the Korean war intervened in June of 1950, it was never possible for the army works services properly to implement the system, and at the same time to carry on the additional load imposed by the Korean war and sending the 27th brigade to Europe.

The breakdown to which Mr. Currie referred was, after all, a breakdown—if it was a breakdown—in keeping accounts, and not a breakdown in providing services and doing the essential work for which the army works services exists.

This table prepared by Mr. Kidd was attached by him to the memorandum dated March 24, 1952, to which I have just referred. Its purpose was to illustrate and emphasize the points he was making in his report, ordinarily a confidential report, to the deputy minister, particularly the need for additional supervisory staff. If you count the number of X's in this table, there being one X for each incident noted, you will see that altogether there are 154. They apply to most of the period during which the chief auditor was making audits of the units of the armed forces, including the army works service companies, and cover the work being done by 33 different detachments.

On my instructions the chief auditor and the judge advocate general have prepared a list summarizing the chief auditor's remarks in each one of these cases and then giving the explanation obtained from the unit and the resultant action taken. I have also had the judge advocate general look at these cases to see whether any further criminal prosecution should be laid or disciplinary action taken. He advises me that in his opinion there are only some 15 cases where there is evidence of the commission of a service offence. On my instructions the chief of the general staff is following up each one of these cases in the commands to see in what cases, if any, disciplinary action should be taken. So that you may see the character of the irregularities involved in these 15 cases let me read the note summarizing them, which is as follows:

Materials obtained or work started prior to authorization of project.
Requisitions on D.D.P. or L.P.O.'s split to keep within financial limits.
Accumulation of materials from completed works or materials removed from buildings not brought on charge in stock records.
Non-expendable stores issued to buildings without recording on installed fixture cards.
Unauthorized issue of stores and materials.
Failure to carry out stocktaking as required by the instructions.
Adjustment of discrepancies without reference to higher authority.
Estimated costs exceeded without review.
Cost of labour or materials charged against approved work orders not used on other jobs.

You will see that judged in the eyes of the civil courts and under criminal law these are not very serious crimes. But on the other hand they constitute things which should be stopped and which will be stopped in so far as it is possible.

However, right through, whether it be in the reports of the chief auditor, in the replies of the units or in the report of Mr. Currie, if I read them correctly and read his recommendations correctly, the main cause for all this has been a shortage of staff, particularly civilian staff, and in the services a shortage of engineering and accounting officers. Today in the army works services alone we are short approximately 1,700 civilian and 250 service personnel. That is under the establishments as they were increased following the review to which I have referred.

Until we have this personnel on the strength it will not be possible to rectify the situation fully as you and I would like. Of course this shortage of staff has been known to the army, to the department and to the civil service commission. It has continually been a source of great concern. Both the department and the civil service commission have been making continuous efforts to obtain the staff that was needed to do the job. An effort was made to get technical staff from other government departments, but without marked success. In addition to the usual advertisements of vacancies the civil service has repeatedly made special efforts to obtain applicants. As recently as September 4, 1952, the commission advised the department as follows:

It is felt that your technical directorates must be prepared to carry on with a shortage of staff in these fields since industrial agencies at the moment are required to do so.

The device mentioned by the Auditor General in his report of borrowing qualified personnel from civilian firms under special contract is possible on a limited scale in order to get special jobs done, but cannot work satisfactorily in accomplishing routine continuing operations in the works service, even if the personnel could be obtained.

The fact is that the expansion of the armed forces, the partial introduction of a new accounting system, the shortage of qualified personnel to administer it, the activities of 24 civilian contractors engaged on 37 major contracts at Petawawa during 1950-51 and 1951-52 combined to create a situation at Petawawa of which, as Mr. Currie says, a handful of crooks took advantage.

May I turn now to the recommendations made by Mr. Currie in his report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister does that, will he permit a question?

Mr. Claxton: I am following a consecutive order. I will answer the hon. member's question later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This question has to do with responsibility. Has the minister any information in answer to the $48 question as to who changed the words "at or near the top," which were so singularly altered?

Mr. Claxton: That does not arise out of anything that I have said. If there was any change of that character made it was made by Mr. Currie on his own responsibility before he signed the report. If my hon. friend has confidence in Mr. Currie, then he cannot have it both ways. If Mr. Currie decided to make the change it was because he decided that that change was desirable to be made.

May I turn now to the recommendations which are to be found at pages 728 to 730 of Hansard. They are 44 in number and were referred to by the Solicitor General in his speech. But perhaps I should bring the information on them up to date.

As I have said already, I believe that Mr. Currie, his associates and those in the department and the army regarded this whole operation as a co-operative effort to arrive at the causes and prevent their recurrence. The extent to which this project has been carried out by the department is indicated by the action which was taken before the delivery of the report. The extent to which the recommendations had already been put into effect was referred to by the Solicitor General.

Of the 44 recommendations made, 27 were being put into effect before the report was made or received by the department. Four more recommendations are regarded as urgent and will be carried out as additional manpower becomes available. Eight recommendations involve additional manpower and also involve very considerable sums of money, possibly more than any potential advantage would justify. These will be subject to further consideration. Three recommendations do not involve additional manpower and money but will require further study. One of the recommendations is not considered desirable to implement except in respect of new major developments, and one other appears to be unsuitable as it is phrased.

Having given a summary, it seems to me that hon. members might wish me to give, under the five main divisions already mentioned, Mr. Currie's recommendations and the comments of the department in each case. It would be very convenient if these could be printed in Hansard in parallel columns, but I am aware that that is really not in accordance with the practice of the house and I am not going to ask for unanimous consent that it be done. But I do inform the house that the comments on these recommendations which have been made in detail by the officials of the department are available and will be put before the committee on defence expenditure when it meets.

I do not need to tell hon. members that most of the recommendations will entail considerable increases in manpower and expenditure. With regard to the appendix in the Currie report proposing an increased staff at Petawawa, the new establishment for Petawawa, with the exception of the estimator recommended by Mr. Currie, was designed in November, 1951, by the department in co-operation with other government agencies, and the only addition of consequence made by Mr. Currie is that of the office of estimator. The establishment at Petawawa was increased from 23 military and 142 civilians to 35 military and 223 civilians. The increase in the army works services establishment at Petawawa was necessary because of the expansion of the army which led to the creation of home stations for two regiments and ancillary units at the station.

The increases in the army works services establishment at Petawawa and elsewhere were not in consequence of the Currie report but were initiated prior to the report to bring the army works services up to the strength required to do its job. Altogether these increases and those recommended in the report, because Mr. Currie incorporates these increases in his own recommendations, resulted in an increase from 1,088 military and 3,436 civilians to 1,109 military and 5,123 civilians, an increase of 21 military and 1,687 civilians. But at the present time, as I have indicated, on other establishments within the army works services in round figures we are short a total of 1,700 civilians and some 250 service personnel.

The increases involve an annual expenditure of approximately $5,246,000. The major portion of this increased engineer work load was due to the large number of civilians required for the operation of utility plants. The need to provide central warehousing was provided for in the approved 1952-53 annual estimates and new accommodation for companies and detachments was provided for in the approved 1951-52 estimates.

The report makes a number of recommendations regarding additional security measures. Many of these have already been put into effect and, of course, they will all be given consideration. I would be surprised, however, if we do not find that in some cases the cost of the full measure indicated would be out of all proportion to any reduction in losses which might result, and this of course is an important practical consideration. The theft at Farnham is a striking example of what I mean. The cost of providing good security over the period of six years after the camp ceased to be used would have been about forty times the loss suffered by the public through the theft of the property for which prosecutions were laid. It is always necessary to strike a balance between the cost of security and the possibility of loss.

Leaving aside such recommendations in the report as involve the complete relocation of gates, campsites, roads, compounds, et cetera, most of which are out of the question, and taking into consideration only those directly related to storage and safekeeping of engineering supplies and equipment, we have estimated that the additional cost merely for security fences at Petawawa alone would be $286,000 with an annual recurring cost for additional guards of $119,000. We have also completed estimates for another typical company at a similar establishment, namely, Camp Borden, where we estimate that the capital cost for fences would be $346,000, with an additional annual recurring cost of $139,000.

Applying these figures on a proportionate basis to other army works establishments, we arrive at an estimate of the capital cost for additional security and safekeeping facilities for army works services installations alone of $1,774,000, with an additional annual recurring cost for guards alone of $1,106,000. It may be pointed out also that, as we have said, in none of the cases at Petawawa was the loss attributable to lack of physical security. The degree of security must of necessity be related to the nature of the stores. Here the materials stolen were scrap, building materials, salvaged articles, et cetera. To what extent that additional manpower and expenses would be justified by the results may be open to question. Certainly, as I say, we must see to it that every justifiable measure that can be taken is taken to safeguard the people's property.

In addition to the steps to which I have referred which are in line with Mr. Currie's recommendations, I might mention a number of other things which we have done in connection with the army works services.

(a) A revised establishment has been created in the quartermaster general's branch regarding works and quartering.

(b) New establishments have been created for each works company and new stores depots.

(c) The army works services detachment at Petawawa has been raised to the status of a company, which has the effect of putting it under command headquarters and eliminating the channel through the area headquarters at Kingston.

(d) The civil service commission has approved the establishment for civilian personnel officers in the field directly responsible to the director of civilian personnel in the Department of National Defence.

(e) A board has been set up consisting of three senior army officers, a representative of the civil service commission and of the director of civilian personnel, which will visit army units with a view to examining their establishments and arriving at much more speedy decisions.

(f) The quartermaster general's branch has established a travelling inspection division which will follow up reports made by the chief auditor to see on the spot that desirable recommendations are immediately implemented without waiting for correspondence.

I come now to the series of 33 regulations which Mr. Currie says were broken. Reference is made to these at page 715 of the report as it appears in Hansard. Mr. Currie does not say when these breaches of regulations occurred but one can assume from the context that he relates them to the irregularities at Petawawa, though some of them may also have occurred elsewhere. I have asked the judge advocate general and the Department of Justice if there is anything in the report of Mr. Currie or anything brought out at the trials or in the police reports which would justify instituting additional prosecutions of service or civilian personnel, or taking any additional kind of disciplinary action in this connection. I have an opinion as regards criminal prosecutions from the deputy minister of justice and as regards disciplinary action and criminal prosecutions from the judge advocate general that, apart from the cases I have mentioned and some others that are the subject of further investigation, the only thing that might be indicated would be further disciplinary actions.

In concluding my reference to the Currie report, I should like to draw your attention to the paragraph with which he begins part IV, "Conclusions and Recommendations". He says:

> My report, I fully recognize, contains many discouraging features. The over-all situation is, however, by no means discouraging because of the fact that the cure for what has gone wrong in the past can be and, in fact, is being applied.

In my remarks I have endeavoured to give you the background so that you can understand the circumstances through which the grave irregularities which occurred at Petawawa did in fact take place. In giving this explanation do not think for a second that I wish to excuse or condone either the fact that the irregularities did take place or the fact that they could have taken place.

There are in this house a great many veterans of the two wars. They know, and the veterans all over this country—and there are a lot of them—know, and I think the public has a pretty good idea too that an army is not a Sunday school and soldiers are not saints. That does not mean that we should condone wrongdoing, but neither does it mean that you can expect to have an army in which all the officers and men behave perfectly. There are bound to be occasional misdemeanours and unfortunately there is also bound to be a certain amount of wrongdoing just as there is in the rest of the population.

Canadians have won for their arms a fine record in the first and second world wars—and now in Korea. What they have done has been accomplished because of their qualities, and that includes the quality of their leadership. Field leaders are selected because of their qualities of decision, of command, yes, of courage and initiative, and not primarily because of their superior ability as storekeepers or accountants. Yet each one of these has to have, in addition to his responsibilities for training and leading the formations under his command, responsibilities for the administration of what in civilian life would be a very large business operation.

Mr. Currie in his report has said that the amounts involved at Petawawa were probably not large. The estimate given to me by the police was that the total involved was probably less than $50,000. That is still their view. A very large part of all that was stolen has been recovered and the guilty have been prosecuted and punished.

What remains to be done is to ensure that any steps which are likely to bring results sufficiently important to justify the men and money involved should be taken and taken without delay and as fast as qualified personnel can be obtained. That will not ensure a complete cessation of irregularities and pilfering and even fraud and theft in operations of this magnitude. Unfortunately, we all know that these things do go on in civilian as well as military activities.

I would like to add, however, that the records put before the defence expenditure committee at its last session, and the information made available to me, indicate that the scale of losses due to service activities having regard to the value of the property involved are not any larger than those commonly experienced in civilian activities of a similar character.

Despite the fact that our operations are many times larger, I think you would find that the loss by thefts and pilferage in the armed forces is no larger than that in the major commercial undertakings of the country. When any one of these suffers a loss very little is said about it in the press or parliament, but it is seldom indeed that a loss occurs or a member of the armed forces commits a crime that it is not blazoned in print across the country.

Now, in consequence of this report and of the action we have taken and of the actions we will take, I hope that we can both improve the organization and increase the personnel so as to reduce our losses to the lowest possible figure. That is our constant aim and goal.

However, irrespective of the action we shall take, we shall continue to have losses, losses which, because of the size and nature of the operation, will appear to be very considerable indeed, but which, when viewed fairly and with a sense of proportion, will not be unreasonable. And if I may say so, we shall continue to have those losses no matter who is minister of national defence, even if the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) were minister of national defence, or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

An hon. Member: It won't be long now.

Mr. Claxton: I believe that the view I have just expressed will be confirmed by an experienced accountant like the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart).

We shall also continue to try to find ways and means of improving the organization of the armed forces and of the Department of National Defence. Now that the great majority of contracts for construction and orders for equipment have been placed and that we have so large a proportion of the manpower required throughout the armed forces as a whole, we will have more time, I hope, to spend on examining and improving and streamlining still further.

In view of the importance attached to this report and for the reasons already mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I move, seconded by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson):

> That the motion be amended by inserting after the words "March 31, 1950", in the fourth line thereof, the following:
> "and initially to give priority in their examination to the expenditures and commitments of the Canadian army works services as dealt with in the report of G. S. Currie, Esquire, chartered accountant, tabled in the House of Commons on December 15, 1952."

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I raise a point of order? May I make it clear that my point of order relates only to procedure and not to the substance of the proposed amendment. I will deal with that later.

My point of order is as to whether or not the amendment of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is in order. I draw Your Honour's attention to a citation in Beauchesne's third edition which you have often read against us on this side of the house when we have sought to move an amendment to motions setting up committees. Citation 546 reads:

> When the house is engaged in nominating the members of a committee, it is not competent for an hon. member to open the whole subject.

Committee on Defence Expenditure

I read that paragraph in order to put the whole citation on the record although it is the next paragraph which counts:

When the house is considering a motion, of which notice has been given, for the appointment of a select committee, a member cannot move in amendment that the committee be given wider powers than those which were set down in the notice. On the 13th March 1938,—

I interject to say that there is an error at that point; it should read 1939—

—a minister moved that a special committee be appointed to study the question of redistribution of electoral districts and to enquire into the methods whereby the source of campaign funds may be traceable. Two amendments were moved: one proposed that the committee's powers be extended so as to investigate amounts of contributions over $100 for the past ten years; the other proposed to investigate the methods whereby lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners in British Columbia may be enabled to exercise their franchise.

The Speaker ruled both amendments out of order on the ground that they raised new questions not contemplated in the notice of motion and proposed to extend the committee's powers far beyond those set down in the notice, and also that the necessity of giving notice will be nullified if such notice is not used as a guidance for the decision of the house.

If I had thought, Mr. Speaker, that any attempt would be made at this point to move an amendment of this character I would, of course, have had a number of references ready to quote by page number, and by chapter and verse. I did not do that. But in my own mind I can recall that when the motion was made to set up a committee to go into the question of old age security an attempt was made from this side of the house to move amendments to that motion, and Your Honour ruled those amendments out of order on the basis of the citation that I have just read. Similarly, a year or so ago, when there was a motion to set up a special committee on veterans affairs, the terms of reference of which were more restrictive than they had been on previous occasions, an attempt was made by the member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and by my deskmate the member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) to move amendments. Those amendments were ruled out of order, again on the basis of citation 546.

I recall also that in the session of 1952 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had on the order paper a motion for the setting up of a special committee on redistribution. I recall that after he had given notice of that motion there were certain changes he wanted to make in it. If my memory serves me correctly, he stated in the house that the reason he withdrew his motion and submitted another one through the usual channels of giving notice was that he was aware of this very citation and of the difficulty, if not the impropriety, of amending a motion to set up a committee once it has been placed on the order paper and had been moved in the house. As I say, Mr. Speaker, it was because of the action the Prime Minister took with respect to the motion for a redistribution committee last year that I could not imagine that any member on the government side would try this today. I did not, therefore, assemble these references page by page, but I am sure that Your Honour recalls them and they can be found if necessary.

I believe it is obvious, whether or not we agree with the substance of the amendment, that what happens when an amendment is moved in this way is that the question is placed before us without the required forty-eight hours' notice being given. At the same time, I may say that I do not see that the amendment is at all necessary, which is another procedural argument. After all, you are not supposed to move amendments that are unnecessary. I submit there are already sufficient powers contained in the motion as it is worded to enable the committee to send for papers and records, one of them being the Currie report. They can also send for persons, including Mr. Currie himself. So, Mr. Speaker, on the grounds of citation 546, and the ground that no notice has been given of this, I think it is out of order. There is also the ground that it is unnecessary because the power to send for persons, papers and records is already contained in the Prime Minister's motion.

Mr. Drew: There is another consideration that I would submit should be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, in giving consideration to this amendment. We have had on the order paper now for some considerable time a notice of motion in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The Prime Minister did not choose to speak when the motion was called and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) spoke on behalf of the government. Every hon. member in this house has had reason to assume that the motion we would be considering this afternoon as presented by the government would be the motion on the order paper. The effect of this is to place before the house a new motion by the government without notice.

I would point out also to Your Honour the fact that on a procedure of this kind the notice stands in the name of the Prime Minister, but the Minister of National Defence addressed his remarks to that motion and then moved an amendment which every hon. member knows will be supported by the members of the party who have shown a strong disinclination to show any independence of opinion in their voting in this house.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, is that kind of reference to the whole of the members, who belong to any other party but that of the hon. gentleman, in order in this house?

Mr. Drew: I regret—

Mr. St. Laurent: I addressed a question to the Speaker and I should like to have the Speaker's ruling on the question. I would rather have that than the ruling of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

Mr. Speaker: I understood the Leader of the Opposition was going to withdraw his remarks. The reason I did not rise at the time the Prime Minister spoke was that the Leader of the Opposition stood up immediately, and I understood he was going to withdraw any reflection he had cast upon members generally.

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to make a blanket withdrawal. Will you kindly indicate what words should be withdrawn?

Mr. Speaker: I understood the Leader of the Opposition to charge the leaders and members of certain parties in this house with having no independence of thought. I think those were his words. That, of course, is a reflection on those members. Every member must come into this house and be considered as being independent and not the servile follower of any party or of a leader. I believe that is the only meaning one can take from the words.

Mr. Drew: I did not use the words you have quoted, and I am asking you that you name the exact words that I am to withdraw before I am able to do so.

Mr. St. Laurent: I shall assist you, Mr. Speaker. I understood the Leader of the Opposition to say he had no doubt that this amendment submitted by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) would be supported by all the usual followers of the government in the house who have never shown any inclination to exercise any degree of independence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Drew: The words I used were that the motion would doubtless be supported by those who have shown a strong disinclination to vote against the government.

Mr. St. Laurent: We will have a transcript, and we will see whether my memory or that of the Leader of the Opposition is the more reliable.

Mr. Drew: I shall leave it to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Leader of the Opposition went further than that. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition did go further than that. I would not ask him to withdraw the remarks he has just quoted, but his remarks with respect to the members of this house showing no inclination to independence—it is the word "independence" to which I object.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the Hansard record is there, and I shall withdraw no word that is not indicated by you as being the word that I should withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: I shall have to have the Hansard record read. The word to which I object is the word "independence". The phrase to which I object is the reference to a lack of independence.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I ask you to have the record presented to you and to indicate to me the words to which you object.

Mr. Speaker: Then I would ask the Hansard reporter to read the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) immediately preceding the objection which was raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

Is a member of the Hansard staff walking out of the chamber? Will the Sergeant-at-Arms tell the member of the Hansard staff not to withdraw. Is the Hansard reporter in a position to read the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition immediately preceding the objection which was raised by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Abbott: He is not allowed to speak.

Mr. Speaker: The Hansard reporter has indicated that he is not in a position to read those remarks. I wish to assure him that I will not consider them unparliamentary so far as he is concerned. I do not like to hold up the proceedings of the house unnecessarily in connection with this matter. Has any hon. member any suggestion to make in order to get me out of this dilemma?

Mr. St. Laurent: If the Hansard reporter is allowed to withdraw, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that within a few minutes he can give a transcript of his notes. I can appreciate his reluctance to do a thing which would be unique in the annals of the House of Commons, namely to speak while the house is in session. I have no doubt that a transcript can be obtained in a few minutes, if Your Honour wishes to have one.

Mr. Knowles: Why not deal with the matter at eight o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances it will be necessary for me to deal with the matter at a later time this day.

Mr. Fleming: When you do so, Mr. Speaker, will you permit discussion in the house as to whether the words which the Prime Minister contended were said are actually offensive according to the rules of the house? I wish to make a submission that, even if the words which the Prime Minister says were used were in fact used, they are perfectly proper words to be used in this house. We must be becoming exceedingly thin-skinned around here if words like those cannot be used. It is one thing to make some reflection upon the independence of parliament. But to discuss the independence of members and independence of thought seems to me to be perfectly proper. It seems to me that is a perfectly proper matter for discussion in the house and always has been. So far as my study goes, I know of no rulings to the contrary.

Mr. Speaker: I will consider the whole matter later on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are you going to allow argument on that question? I think it is a matter that is deserving of argument.

Mr. Speaker: Order. At the moment no one is quite sure of the exact words used. Perhaps I should not say that no one is, but at any rate I am not quite sure of the exact words which have been objected to. When we know what those exact words are, we will consider the whole matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will argument then be allowed?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, is it your intention to allow the debate to proceed or are you going to make a ruling?

Mr. Speaker: I think the Leader of the Opposition was submitting an argument in connection with the point of order that was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I will allow him to continue.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that we have before us now an amendment to the motion of the government which, in effect, presents a new motion of the government with certain clear instructions. In the event that the Prime Minister should be surprised by getting the support of the members on his own side for this amendment, then of course—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Drew: —the result would be that it would not be possible to introduce any amendment which might have the effect of proposing a more expeditious course than that which has been placed before the house by this government. The device of having a member of the government move, without notice, an amendment to the government's own motion produces the effect of devising another gag for this parliament in which a majority shows some inclination at least to support the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Under a motion of this kind, if it receives that support which the Prime Minister seems to think is in some doubt, I would point out that there is no way in which the ordinary procedure in debate can be followed whereby the opposition is able to place before the house an alternative method to that which is put before it by the direct motion itself of which we have notice. The consequences of this procedure are simply to limit still more the rights of this parliament under the domination of the government which does not believe in the freedom of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: When the Prime Minister rises with such great indignation, as he did a few minutes ago—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And it was a little bit synthetic.

Mr. Drew: —and exceedingly synthetic indignation it was, I wish that he would take the time to read some of the Hansard records of the debates at Westminster from which we are supposed to draw many of our precedents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: If he sat in that house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that we are getting away from the point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has raised the question whether the amendment is in order. He has given reasons why he thinks it is not in order. At this time I cannot hear an argument on the rules generally and on what is the effect of the amendment. The only thing I can consider at this time is whether the amendment is in order or not, and nothing else.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, you will be called upon to consider the importance of the decision you make and its effect upon the procedure in this house because of the fact that your ruling in this case, as in others, will create a precedent. In examining that question I submit that it is appropriate to place before you the consequences of a procedure of this kind under which there is an effective blocking of the ordinary opportunity afforded to the opposition to place before the house alternatives which might produce a more expeditious examination of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Would that not be a matter for the house to consider and to decide? If that is the effect of it, would it not be for the house to consider and to decide whether the rules should be changed? I do not think it is a question which I should decide at this time. The matter which concerns me is whether this amendment would give the committee wider powers than those which were set out in the notice. Frankly I may say that if the discussion so far has been in order—that is a discussion of the financial sections—it would seem that this amendment would be in order. In fact, the argument went further than that, but even limiting it to that extent, if the discussion in the house with respect to the expenditures mentioned in the Currie report is in order, then it would seem to me that this amendment would be in order. Either they are both out of order or they are both in order. I am prepared to hear further argument. But I thought I should draw the attention of the house to the way the matter occurs to me at the present time. I would ask the Leader of the Opposition to direct his remarks to the point of order at this time.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Speaker, I will point out to you that in giving consideration to the effect of an argument in relation to a procedure which is something not fully dealt with by the rules as they now stand, I believe it is both in keeping with the practice, and that it is extremely important, that you have full regard to the consequences of any decision Your Honour may make.

I would point out that already it has been clearly indicated that we do not believe the Currie report needs to be referred to another inquiry. This amendment, added to a government motion now before us, has the obvious intention and purpose of embalming the Currie report. That is something which—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that has anything to do with the point of order; it deals with the question of the amendment itself. If the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. members in the house feel that way about the amendment, they can vote against it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: That argument goes to the very root of the amendment itself, not to the point of order, and at this time I can hear only arguments on the point of order.

Mr. Drew: Well, I shall leave this thought with Your Honour, that we had notice of a government motion standing in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). That was the motion we came here to debate; that was the motion of the government that we had the right to expect to deal with, as an opposition. There is no notice of any other.

If this procedure becomes the accepted procedure in this house, then at any time the government can prevent the ordinary rights of the opposition being exercised by the device of introducing a motion in the name of one minister, having another minister offer the motion, and then introducing an amendment to the government motion, without notice, thus taking away all the alternatives which would ordinarily be open to the opposition.

This will quite rewrite the rules of the house, and is still another attempt to limit parliament in the exercise of its functions on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: I should like to speak to the point of order, and I do so because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pretended to invoke as authority something which I had done or said in connection with a motion to set up the committee on redistribution. I understood him to say that I had recognized that it was improper, or that I had recognized the impropriety of attempting to amend a motion to set up a committee. It is not the first time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has misunderstood or extended things that I, or other members of the government, have said in the house.

What I said, and what I repeat, is that you cannot without notice expand the reference to a committee, and that you cannot, even with notice, do something that is futile and that does not add anything at all to—

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. St. Laurent: I am speaking to a point of order. There is one before the house now.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow two points of order at the same time.

Mr. St. Laurent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was saying that I quite admitted that you cannot, without notice, move to expand the reference to a committee, for the setting up of which notice has been given; and that you cannot regard as in order a motion that adds to or takes nothing from the terms of the general motion.

The two arguments submitted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are, first of all, that this would expand the scope of the reference to the committee or, alternatively, if it did not, that it would be quite useless.

Mr. Knowles: Either one or the other.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, it does not expand the terms of reference, which will have to do with all the expenditures and commitments of all the branches of the armed forces in every respect since the date mentioned in the resolution itself. And it is not useless because, though it does not empower the committee to do something they cannot do without being thus empowered to do it, it does direct them initially to give priority in the examination they have to make of the expenditures and commitments of all the branches, to those that are referred to in the Currie report.

Now, they would have the right to do that without an amendment. They would not be obliged to do it without an amendment. And the house certainly can direct them, if it sees fit, to do so, and initially to give priority to the examination of those items.

I suppose the hon. member will not be satisfied with my answer; but that is my answer.

Mr. Knowles: For once I agree with you.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is the answer to both branches of the hon. member's objection.

Now, I said I would speak only to the point of order. I shall have to reserve to some other occasion an explanation of language which the Leader of the Opposition has not understood, or has chosen to represent as being rather ambiguous. I never said I did not expect that there would be others who would be voting as I vote in this house—but not because they are not independent. It is because they, too, would feel that that was the right way to vote.

Mr. Knowles: If I may have a further word with reference to the main point of order, I should like to say something in the light of what Your Honour said and what has been said just now by the Prime Minister. If I may say so, I think the Prime Minister is getting close to the point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: —when he says that the amendment of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is either one thing or the other. Either it is an enlargement of the powers of the committee, or it is not an enlargement of the powers of the committee.

Mr. St. Laurent: I said that was your argument, that the amendment would be out of order if it were either an enlargement of the scope of the main motion, or proposed something that was useless.

Mr. Knowles: Well, Mr. Speaker, we might be misunderstanding each other; but in my view we are saying the same thing, namely that this amendment moved by the Minister of National Defence does one thing or the other—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Knowles: —either it enlarges the powers of the committee, or it does not enlarge the powers of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute, now—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: And in saying that I am only saying the same thing that was said to us when we moved to enlarge the powers of the old age security committee. I wanted to enlarge them with reference to the means test, and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) wanted to enlarge them with reference to disabled persons. We had the same argument again in setting up the committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would agree that to include disabled persons would have enlarged the powers it was proposed to grant to the committee.

Mr. Knowles: My point is—

Mr. Speaker: My difficulty is—and this is the aspect on which I would like some help—is the consideration of expenditures mentioned in the Currie report within the competence of the committee without this amendment and, secondly, is it within the powers of the house to in any way direct the committee to consider these expenditures?

Mr. Knowles: On the very point you are raising, I suggest that if it is giving the committee power which it does not have, it is out of order under citation 546.

Mr. Speaker: To help the hon. member may I read citation 407 in Beauchesne, third edition.

Mr. Knowles: That is just what I was going to read.

Mr. Speaker: This reads:

An instruction is a motion empowering a committee to do something which it could not otherwise do—

So far as that is concerned, I would suggest that such an amendment at this time would be out of order because no notice had been given. Then we read on:

—or to direct it to do something which it might otherwise not do.

Does not this amendment direct the committee to do something which it might otherwise not do? It might do it or it might not do it. The point is that it might otherwise not do it, and the proposal in the amendment is to direct the committee to do it.

Mr. Knowles: If it is a direction, in other words if it is something new, I submit that it requires notice. If it is not a direction I suggest that Your Honour go on and read further from the citation you are just now referring to, No. 407, where it says:

If the subject matter of an instruction is within the scope of the question referred to the committee then such instruction is useless and irregular.

Mr. Speaker: That must be read in connection with the words which I have read, that an instruction can direct a committee to do something which it might otherwise not do. Those words mean something. I do not think you can read the words which the hon. member has now read and say that the words which I read mean nothing. I should like to dispose of this matter, but if any hon. member has any other suggestion which has not been raised I will hear it.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: If I may with respect—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: May we have a little order?

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me that the rule we are considering here, No. 407, has been devised and worded in this way for a very particular purpose. Going back to what the Prime Minister said, if the committee might not give first consideration to the matters referred to in the Currie report, the amendment would direct that they should do so. Is not the wording put in that way so that so long as the matter is within the power of the committee to consider, then the order in which they consider it is a matter for the committee itself to determine? Therefore if the matter is within the scope of the subject matter referred to the committee, then an instruction to the committee that they proceed to consider that matter is useless and irregular.

It seems to me that is the reason those two sentences are used in citation 407. Therefore an instruction directing a committee to do something which it might otherwise not do is clearly out of order. It seems to me that once this house sets up a committee, the agenda of that committee and the time at which it will direct its attention to various matters or the matter which it has been asked to investigate is something for the committee itself to determine. The government has a majority on the committee, and the chairman is always a government member.

Therefore I submit that those two sentences in that rule, which Your Honour has suggested conflict, are perfectly consistent, and that if the subject matter of the proposed amendment is an instruction to the committee to do something which is already within the scope of its reference, then although the committee may do that if it chooses, nevertheless such an instruction is useless and irregular.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that those who are so anxious to hear from the report should object to the amendment. I cannot understand it. It is just splitting hairs. The motion has a very wide scope and the purpose of the amendment is only as a reminder. It is similar to a memo to notify the committee not to forget to do that. Hon. members who have just spoken have a short memory; and I think it is necessary to do that.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker, I do not often get into arguments on procedure, but as this happened in a committee of which I was a member I feel that if amendments of this nature are allowed they will have the effect of so refining and prescribing the terms of reference in motions setting up committees as to make the work of such committees almost meaningless.

If this amendment is allowed to stand what can happen is that a motion to set up a committee with certain terms of reference may be brought down in the house by a minister. The terms of reference may then be considered too broad and another minister may get up and make a substantive motion to reduce and limit the terms of reference. You would then have the possibility of making the work of the committee almost meaningless.

Surely in this case it is obvious that the Currie report is going to be one of the first things that will be discussed by the committee. Therefore the motion is redundant. The motion itself is quite broad, but it is out of order and would have that effect.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to Sir T. Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, fifteenth edition, which may be helpful to you in reaching a decision on this. I would refer you to pages 592, 593 and 594. There is a reference to the setting up of a committee at the bottom of page 592 which reads:

> If it is thought desirable that a committee should extend its inquiries beyond the limits laid down in the order of reference, the house may give the committee authority for that purpose by means of an instruction.

You were mentioning a minute ago the question of instruction. Then I quote again from page 593:

> If, on the other hand, it is deemed advisable to restrict the scope of the inquiry, or to limit the committee's powers, an instruction may be given to the committee requiring it to refrain from considering the matter, or doing the act which forms the subject of the instruction; and, if so desired, instructions may also be given to committees prescribing their course of proceeding.

I draw Your Honour's attention to the footnote at the bottom of page 593 which is explanatory of that last sentence which I have read, "prescribing their course of proceeding".

> Instructions may be given to committees at the time of their appointment, or at any time thereafter before they have presented their final report. Where an instruction is proposed to be given to a committee on its appointment, it may be moved immediately after the committee has been appointed; but it is more convenient to move it after the members have been nominated, and the quorum has been fixed and the committee given power to send for persons, papers and records. Notice of an instruction can be placed upon the notice paper, to be moved after the appointment of a select committee, or after the nomination of the members, or as an independent motion.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you might find some assistance there in determining this question, because it is obvious from what I have read that the practice as outlined by Sir Erskine May is to give instructions to a committee after the committee has been set up, and not during the course of the setting up of the committee.

Mr. Applewhaite: I hesitate to add my small voice to those of the experts who have already spoken, but it occurs to me that one quotation which I think is pertinent has not yet been submitted to Your Honour. We have before us and are discussing a notice of motion. Citation 315 of Beauchesne, third edition, reads as follows:

> A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice. A new notice must be given in the Votes and Proceedings under standing order 45, when a material change is to be made to a notice of motion before it is taken up by the house.

The question here seems to be whether or not a material change is to be made. As one who sat through the sessions of a very similar committee constituted under a very similar original notice of motion at the last session of this house, it was most noticeable that a great deal of the time of the committee, set up to examine all expenditures of public moneys for national defence, was taken in examining the details and the circumstances of pilferings, irregularities, losses, fires, etc., matters such as I think we all agree are the main subject of the Currie report.

Therefore to refer the Currie report to this committee is surely not exceeding the scope of the original notice of motion in the name of the Prime Minister, at least not exceeding it as it was interpreted by the committee during the last session. If that is the case, then surely it is in order unless it is so valueless as to be useless, and I would suggest that the word "might" in citation 407 does not involve a question of compulsion but refers to the opportunity of the committee to do or not to do something.

The other point that has been raised in this connection, and which worries me because I do not know very much about it, is the suggestion that if a notice of motion of this sort stands on the order paper apparently no one on this side should move an amendment because presumably—if this is not the argument I do not know what it is—by doing so the chance is lost to the opposition of moving an amendment. If I understand this discussion correctly, that surely does not make sense because it certainly seems to me that all that has to be done is to dispose of the first amendment in order to move another or at the moment, provided it is legally competent for some member to do so, to move a subamendment, dispose of the subamendment and the amendment, and move another one.

Surely no one is trying to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that once a notice appears on the order paper the sole right to move any amendment to it must rest with those who, because of circumstances, represent the minority in the house. I do not think that can be the intention at all of the rules or of those who have made that point.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that what the hon. member has said he quite correctly has stated makes no sense. What was pointed out was that there is a government notice of motion that has stood on the order paper for some weeks as the expressed intention of the government. Instead of the member of the government, in this case the Prime Minister, in whose name the motion stands rising to present his argument in connection with the motion, another minister does so. He then moves an amendment. In the ordinary course of events the minister in whose name the motion stands would make his remarks in support thereof and then, in accordance with the custom of the house, the opposition would have the right to speak in reply and on that occasion would then have the opportunity to present the first amendment which would be related to the motion itself.

Nothing I said can in any way be interpreted as suggesting that those independent members supporting the government who wish to move an amendment to a government motion are not perfectly free to do so. I have sought to point out that our procedure recognizes the division of the house into the government side and the opposition side. I sought to point out that the government in presenting a motion puts forward a proposition. It is then customary for the opposition to have an opportunity to deal with that primary motion and to attach to that motion such modifying amendment as in their opinion will improve the subject matter before the house.

The procedure now before you would change that course. I have only sought to indicate to you the effect of a decision in accordance with the argument that has been made, but under no circumstances would I wish to leave the impression that I was in any way limiting the independence of members on the other side of the house, which I would wish to see increased greatly day by day.

An hon. Member: Funny.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to make my ruling, but it is five o'clock. Shall I call it five o'clock or make my ruling?

Some hon. Members: Make your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members for bringing out so clearly the arguments for sustaining the amendment and also for declaring it out of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South referred to the time in the proceedings at which the directions or instructions should be given, but I would also refer him to the fifteenth edition of May, page 593, where it states:

> Instructions may be given to committees at the time of their appointment, or at any time thereafter before they have presented their final report.

Therefore instructions can be given to the committee at this time.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to three instances in which I did not allow amendments to a motion to set up a committee, but I think—in fact I am sure—that if he looks up the records he will find in every instance where I have not allowed the amendment it has been because the amendment would have widened the powers set out in the notice. If I thought that this amendment widened the powers of the committee I would have no hesitancy in declaring it out of order. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) spoke for a considerable time this afternoon referring to the expenditures and commitments dealt with in the Currie report. Not one member in this house rose and suggested that he was out of order. I think all hon. members will agree that he was in order. If it was in order for him to discuss those matters at this time, in my opinion it is within the competence of the committee to consider those expenditures and commitments, and in the first instance I would rule that this amendment does not widen the powers of the committee as set down in the notice of motion.

Another question was raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) as to the effect on the procedure in this house if this amendment is allowed to stand. May I say that many hon. members may agree with him; but if so, and if the amendment does stand, is that not a question for the house to decide? Is not that a question that the house must consider and decide, whether the rules should be amended so that such an amendment cannot be made? That is not a matter which I must determine at this time.

Another point was raised—in fact I suggested it—with respect to the value of the amendment and whether it added anything to the motion or directed the committee in its procedures; but from the citation in May you will notice that the house has power to direct a committee as to its procedure. The point therefore that remains to be determined is the reference made to citation 407 in Beauchesne, third edition, which reads as follows:

> An instruction is a motion empowering a committee to do something which it could not otherwise do.

I would state again that if in my opinion this amendment empowered the committee to do something which it otherwise could not do I would rule it out of order. But an instruction may be in the nature of a motion to direct a committee to do something which it might not otherwise do. This committee has wide powers. It can consider the expenditures, etc., set forth in the notice. I think it is agreed that it can consider the expenditures and commitments referred to in the Currie report. However, the committee might not see fit to consider those things. This motion would direct the committee to consider the expenditures and commitments mentioned in the Currie report.

In my opinion this house has the power to direct the committee to do so, and for the reasons I have stated I must rule that the amendment is in order.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is now five o'clock and that you wish to proceed with other matters?

Bill No. 81, for the relief of Madeleine McCartney Ratcliff.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before this motion is put may I again draw attention to the fact that it covers quite a number of bills. Indeed in this case the motion is for the second reading of thirty divorce bills. It is not my intention today, any more than it was yesterday, to take time to discuss these bills at this stage, but I do wish to register my continuing protest that we are still handling divorces in this way.

As hon. members know, it is my hope that some day we will decide to do it in some other way, and I take a little encouragement from the fact that at least one improvement seems to have developed out of the attention that some of us have been drawing to these divorce bills. That reform or improvement is that so far in this session every time a divorce bill has been called for second reading, at least it has been the case that the evidence has been printed and placed in our hands. That was one minor point that we used to complain about, namely that we were asked to proceed with these bills before we had the evidence. I hope the fact that that has been overcome means that attention is being given to the whole problem and that it will not be long before these and other divorce bills are dealt with in a more proper way.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bills read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

He said: Mr. Speaker, if I had hope that this bill would pass as readily as did the first private bill which came up today, or as readily as the thirty divorce bills just dealt with, I would refrain from saying anything at this time. I do hope that one of these times this bill will be given its second reading and referred to the standing committee on industrial relations so that progress may be made in writing into our national labour code a provision for the voluntary revocable check-off.

As I have indicated on previous occasions when this bill has been before the house, it is a measure which asks for a legislative enactment to provide the very minimum of what is known as union security. There are a number of ways in which union security can be provided, and I want to say that for my part I would like to see something even more effective and more useful than what is asked for in this bill. But at least this is a minimum form of union security, and it is already in effect in the labour codes of a number of provinces in this country. I have reminded the house on previous occasions of the fact that all parties in this house have, on various occasions, expressed their support of the principle of union security. In fact, all the opposition parties have been voting for this bill for several years now, and indeed there have been a fair number of members on the Liberal side of the house who, when a vote has been called, have stood up and voted for it. I am only surprised that the number of Liberals has been so few—it got as high as 17 two years ago—for at the last national Liberal convention, the one held here in Ottawa in 1948, it was made part of that party's platform that it stood for union security.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the provision in the bill is quite simple. It specifies that where a union is certified under the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, that union may request the check-off. If it does it means that the company is required to deduct from the pay of employees their trade union dues, and pay them over to the union, but only in the cases of those individual employees who indicate in writing that it is their desire that it be done. In addition to that provision, it is stipulated that after any person has directed that his dues be checked off in that way he can, at a later date, revoke that decision if he wishes to do so. In other words, that is the reason for the way in which this provision is defined, namely as the voluntary revocable check-off.

As I have already said, this is only a minimum way in which to guarantee union security, but at least it is a beginning. I have pointed out on previous occasions that this matter has been requested year by year by the major labour congresses in their representations to the government. I have no doubt but that it will be included in the representations they will make to the government again this year. I point out also that this is a provision in many of the provincial labour codes.

The only active opposition to this provision, so far as the federal law is concerned, of which we have been aware in recent years has been the occasional mimeographed circular distributed to the members of this house by the Railway Association of Canada. This association is, of course, an association of the employers, and that association from time to time has objected to this bill. The objection has been largely on the ground that it would involve considerable book-keeping. It has been pointed out in this house, not only by myself but by the member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and others who have supported this measure, that that is really a rather specious argument, particularly in view of the fact that employers make a great many other deductions at the request of their employees.

Well, to me it is significant that no such protest against this bill has been received as yet this year from the Railway Association of Canada. I dare to think that the reason no such protest has come is because of the ruling of the board that dealt recently with the railway dispute between the railway companies and their non-operating employees. Hon. members will recall that that board was headed by Mr. Justice R. L. Kellock, and the other two members were Mr. Paul S. Smith, appointed by the employers, and Mr. David Lewis, appointed by the employees. Majority and minority reports were presented. In other words, there were many points on which there was disagreement between Mr. Justice Kellock and Mr. Smith, on the one hand, and Mr. Lewis on the other. However, at least this question of the check-off was one upon which they were agreed. Mr. Lewis, in his minority report, pointed out that he would like to see an even greater measure of union security for railway employees than just the check-off, but at least he was glad to join with Mr. Justice Kellock and Mr. Smith in recommending that the check-off, so far as railway employees are concerned, be instituted.

Reference to this provision in the majority report is found on page 43. The significant sentence reads as follows:

> With regard to the check-off, the board is of opinion that, as every employee now has the same right as any other creditor to assign the whole or any part of any debt, present or future owing to him, the proposed clause is one that should properly form part of the new agreements.

I understand that on the basis of that report the check-off will shortly be in effect so far as railway employees are concerned. There is some question as to whether it will be on the basis of the Rand formula. At least what we are asking for in this bill is being accepted now by the railway companies of Canada, and in this case by their non-operating employees.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that since this group of employees constitutes perhaps the largest number of employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction, there is now no reason at all why there should be any reluctance or any resistance on the part of the government to writing this measure into the federal labour code. The wording of the section that would be added by the terms of my bill is, in fact, the wording that was drawn in the Department of Labour. The story behind that, briefly, is that in 1948 when the industrial relations committee was dealing with the federal code it was moved by the hon. member for Spadina, as a member of that committee, that the check-off provision be written into the labour code at that time. His motion carried, although it was on a very close division. After his motion carried, although it did not have the support of Mr. Mitchell, then minister of labour, the minister had one of his officials come back the next day and suggest that if this provision were to be written into the code perhaps it would be well to have it written in language that the legal advisers of the Department of Labour thought most appropriate.

The hon. member for Spadina accepted the language drafted by the legal officers of the Department of Labour, and it is that language which forms the main part of the bill now before us. Some members may wonder what happened to that provision which was written into the labour code in 1948. The fact is that when the bill came back to the house to be considered in committee of the whole, a private member on the government side moved that that clause which had been written into the bill in the committee be deleted. After considerable debate in this house that amendment carried and the provision which we thought we had won was stricken from the national labour code.

As I have already said, support for this measure has been growing. The number of members who voted to keep that clause in the bill in 1948 was 35. The next time there was a vote on this proposal was in 1950, when 45 members voted for it. The next vote came in 1951, on February 28, when 67 members voted for it, and included in those 67 were all the members of the opposition groups who were present and 17 members on the government side of the house plus the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson).

I am encouraged by that growth in support for this measure from year to year. I am encouraged also by the fact that this principle has now been accepted by the railway companies and by the employees. I hope that on this occasion we will not have the kind of argument against it that we have had on previous occasions, but that the house will agree to the second reading of this bill so that it may go to the standing committee on industrial relations for consideration by that committee.

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the sponsor of this bill on the revocable check-off. Two years ago a similar bill was introduced by the same hon. member. At that time I had occasion to make a few comments in this house with regard to the provision not only of the check-off or the nature of the check-off that was introduced in the bill at that time, but also with regard to my interpretation of the thinking of trade union people as to the type and the character of the check-off they required to give them the kind of union security they would need in order to have a healthy trade union organization.

I do not wish to be insular in again speaking on a trade union subject in this chamber, but I believe at this time we should review some of the matters that have been discussed on this question. I should like to take this opportunity to say that I was greatly impressed by the remarks made in the previous debate by our present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). On this occasion I desire to place on the record what I believe to be pertinent information with regard to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and I am going to take a couple of minutes to read into the record from page 639 of Hansard for February 23, 1951, an extract which I believe indicates responsible thinking with regard to the check-off. At that time the Minister of Labour had this to say:

If today parliament steps in to legislate on such matters as the check-off, another parliament at another time may attempt to settle the issue in quite a different way. Present legislation adequately promotes free collective bargaining and parliament should consider carefully before going beyond this point by resolving issues which parties to collective bargaining can best resolve themselves.

The ideal behind any industrial relations legislation, I believe, in a free enterprise economy is the promotion of sound industrial self-government. We may not possibly come nearer to that goal by legislating on such substantive terms of employment as the check-off.

Then the minister went on to say:

> The more I study it, and the more I see the operation of our Canadian Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, the more I like it and the more I feel that we should go slow in unnecessarily making it a policeman for either bargaining party. It may not be a perfect act, but there are not many things in the world that are perfect—

I agree with those words of the Minister of Labour. I would say that the act may not be perfect, but I would also say that in its present form it is the best means yet devised to produce a good climate for labour and management to meet in and to decide their differences responsibly.

In 1951 I said that I believed in the check-off that was negotiated, not one that was legislated. No one knows better than do trade unionists and management that there must be good will in every document that is executed and signed by both parties. At that time, of one union for which I had a great deal of respect, I said that when they again opened their contract for negotiations with management, they would be able to negotiate the kind of check-off that would be acceptable to the people embraced by that agreement, both at the management level and at the employee level. I do not like to take this occasion in the House of Commons to say that at that time I was right, as has been proven by the fact that just recently 17 major railway organizations were able to meet management around the bargaining table like gentlemen, to discuss their problems, to find ways and means of settling their differences, to include a check-off which goes far beyond the kind of innocuous check-off that is suggested in the bill before us, then to sign an agreement for a stipulated period of time and to work under that agreement with good will.

Now that it has been proven to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that matters of this kind can be negotiated, I am surprised that he should still pursue this question and persist in endeavouring to persuade the members in this chamber to support an innocuous kind of check-off that is not nearly as good as that which trade unionists and management have been able to agree on in recent months. In other words, if this provision is written into the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, it would not only be a floor but a ceiling, and it certainly is not as good as what the unionists themselves and management have been able to agree on.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for affording me the opportunity of saying, two years subsequent to 1951, that what I said in the chamber at that time has borne fruit and that my thinking on this question has been proven to be correct. Because I have the confidence of many trade unions people and am able to interpret their thinking correctly, I was able to suggest that subsequent to 1951 an agreement, which the men and management would say embodied good will, would be signed by both parties and would include a proper form of check-off.

I believe I said in 1951 that discussions of this type are useful. This one certainly serves a useful purpose in allowing me to tell Mr. Speaker and hon. members, and particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act has worked very well since 1948. I am confident that it will work well in the future, and that it allows the widest possible scope for labour and management to meet in a healthy atmosphere, and to arrive at agreements with good will. It will allow those in industry, including those engaged in transportation services, opportunities to work under collective agreements, and to enjoy the very best of working conditions made possible by legislation placed on the statute books by a federal administration.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time I have taken the opportunity to speak on a measure of this kind. I recall that when a similar measure was discussed last year I said that to a certain extent it would diminish if not extinguish the sovereignty of unions. I saw a smile on the face of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and even on the face of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I have not forgotten those smiles.

During the recess I took the trouble to find out if I was the only one who thought as I think in this matter. To my support I bring the good opinion of a very strong socialist in France, Daniel Guerin, who has written a book in two volumes entitled Où va le Peuple Américain?—"Where are the American people going?" In this book I found valuable information. If I am not too far out of order I would say that from the book I learned that the first sit-down strike occurred in 1914, and that a second one developed in 1923 by Mussolini in Milan and Turin. However, I must not go too far in making reference to the information I got from the book, because in doing so I would be out of order.

I should like, however, to place on record Mr. Guerin's opinion of the check-off. At page 217 of the first volume he says:

> The employers deduct from the payroll of the workers belonging to a syndicate the amount of syndical contributions, and send it to the syndicate. This combination is eminently favourable to syndical bureaucracy—

And this from a socialist!

> —because it insures the latter, in a comfortable chair, the regular coming in of funds. But the check-off has the worse inconvenience of deepening the ditch between the base and the direction of the syndicalized world.

Again I say that this is a socialist speaking.

> It establishes the employer, as Daniel de Leon said, as some kind of treasurer of the United States.

And Daniel de Leon was another socialist in the United States.

> The worker is under the impression that the fists, the patronate and the syndicate are but one and the same immense, anonymous machine, firmly installed above him, and against which he can do nothing. In not paying his contributions directly to the syndicate, or to his agent, on the very place of labour, he loses the habit, if he had it, of going to the office of the organization. He does not look at it as if it was his, and his connection with the syndicate's agent in the manufacture stays weak.

That is the opinion of a good socialist who has spent two and a half years making a survey in the United States. He looked into the capitalist world in that country, the formation of workers' unions, the situation of the coloured people, and the agricultural situation in the southern part of the United States. This is his opinion, an opinion absolutely unfavourable to the check-off. As my hon. friend has just said, I am not against the voluntary check-off, the check-off that develops after a getting together of employees and employers, after friendly discussion and friendly agreement within the union, when employers are prepared to accept the check-off and to bring it within the bounds of a special industry.

I think favourably of that procedure, and for this reason, that when there is an understanding between employers and employees there is at the same time a development of that friendship that is so greatly needed between these two groups in the community. We need that friendship and that perfect understanding because in the world, in Canada, there are those who live on misunderstandings between employers and employees. There is a philosophy that thrives on social unrest and misery. It thrives, too, on misunderstandings between employers and employees. It is certainly worth-while if employers and employees can get together more often and come to an understanding on points affecting an industry or a syndicate. It is beneficial to all concerned if a spirit of friendship can be developed between them, so that the syndical and the employers' worlds may understand each other better.

That is what we need, and that is why I ask at this time that the check-off be not given approval through a law passed by parliament, but rather that it be permitted to operate in certain industries on a basis of free and friendly understanding. This is the second time I have given my opinion in this connection. I was more interested, however, in placing before the house the opinion of a socialist who shares the philosophy of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and to point out that even the advocates of that philosophy entertain differences of opinion as to the desirability of imposing by force of law the provision for check-off in this country. I hope the measure will not pass this year.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions I have voiced my views on the principle of this bill. In fact this is the fourth time that a bill to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act has been presented for this purpose. I should like to make a few remarks tonight which I did not have the opportunity to develop at any length in the past.

At the outset I wish to assure my hon. friend that I have nothing against the check-off of union dues, in itself, or against any stronger measures of union security. On the contrary, I fully approve the principle of those measures. If there is anything within my control that I can do to increase the number of contracts in industry containing provisions for union security or the check-off of union dues I shall never hesitate to do it.

May I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I think the criterion which should guide this chamber in deciding whether this bill is desirable should be this. Is the underlying principle of this bill consistent with the basic principles of the act it intends to amend? From the arguments which have been advanced in support of the passing of this bill I am inclined to believe that this important aspect of the question has not been examined as it ought to have been and that no convincing case has been made to justify the change which it advocates in the statute at this time.

The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act embodies basic principles which should not be altered without reasonable cause or without applying the same measure of caution which was applied in the drafting and passing of that act. Those principles are freedom of association, certification of bargaining units, free collective bargaining on all matters subject to agreement between employers and employees, and compulsory compliance by both parties with the machinery set up for the settlement of all disputes.

Union security provisions, including any measure of check-off of union dues, have hitherto been considered as matters for collective bargaining. It is true as some hon. members have said, more particularly in this debate the sponsor of the bill, that in six provinces the labour relations acts include provisions for the voluntary revocable check-off. But in discussing the bill no one has given any indication as to what procedure was followed, whether management was consulted and had agreed or what was the situation as far as the check-off was concerned, in the provinces where such provisions were included in the labour acts.

Four important provinces, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec—the last two being the most highly industrialized provinces—have not yet deemed it to be in the best interests of good labour-management relations to enact such a provision. In the attitude which these provinces have taken, to stand by the principle of free collective bargaining, they are in complete accord with the federal act. They still believe that the time has not yet come to introduce any compulsory feature in the field of collective bargaining, that if they did this without previous consultation and a certain measure of agreement with and by both parties in industry they would be setting a precedent of unilateral if not arbitrary statutory action which might become dangerous in the future, in that it could be invoked by some other government for legislative action which might not be in the best interests of trade unions and of labour-management relations in this country. Once a legislative body has determined by statute and made compulsory a provision which is normally dealt with by collective bargaining it opens the door for more and more intrusions of the same kind by the state in a field which ought to belong exclusively to labour-management negotiations.

I have in mind to say a few words this afternoon on the recently-concluded agreement between the railroad companies and the employee brotherhoods, but I shall leave this until the concluding part of my speech.

I should like to remind my hon. friends that trade unions have gained in importance, in strength and in influence during the past decade to an amazing degree. If one reads the Labour Gazette today he will have an opportunity of realizing each month what this increased strength of the trade unions has brought by way of benefits to their membership. This is a clear indication that through the bargaining process the unions have succeeded in getting what was in the interests of their rank and file.

The principle of free collective bargaining is the cornerstone of the federal labour relations act. That should not be altered, any more than any other major provision in the act, without consultation with and at least a certain measure of agreement by both parties who will be affected by the change. That was the purpose of the then minister of labour, the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, when he submitted the initial draft of his legislation to the national bodies of management and labour.

On the one hand there was the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the dominion legislative council of railway transportation brotherhoods and the Canadian Confederation of Catholic Syndicates, representing labour. On the other hand there was the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Railway Association of Canada and the Canadian Construction Association, on the management side. The measure of agreement on the major provisions of the act which was then obtained from both sides was indeed gratifying. This consensus of opinion gave the assurance that the legislation was initiated on solid ground and should not be altered in its major provisions without determining and following the best possible procedure which would tend to safeguard the prerogatives of all concerned.

The initial draft of the labour act was submitted to and approved in its broad principles by the provincial ministers of labour. There was no necessity to do this, but the late Humphrey Mitchell showed wisdom in availing himself of the opportunity provided by a conference which was taking place with his colleagues in the provinces on other matters to seek their views and secure their agreement on the main features of the bill which was then being considered. This consultation has paved the way for the inclusion of section 62, which tends to promote as much uniformity of legislation as possible between the two levels of government and to make possible the administration of any provincial act by the federal Department of Labour if any province so desires.

These consultations with the provinces, management and labour organizations brought out valuable suggestions which contributed to the improvement of the initial draft of the bill. A second draft was prepared which was introduced here during the session of 1947, and was referred to the standing committee on industrial relations. It received serious consideration. The organizations which I have already mentioned were invited to appear before the committee. They did so and submitted their considered views on the proposed legislation. The bill was redrafted and reintroduced in 1948, thoroughly examined by the committee, and finally adopted and brought into effect on September 1, 1948.

The administration of this statute has given good results so far. It would be unfair and unwise, I submit, to amend an important feature of such legislation without seeking that measure of previous consultation and concurrence with all parties concerned, and not only a few of them. The Department of Labour is not and must not become identified with the interests of one of the parties in industry to the exclusion and seemingly against the will of the other. The minister and his officials have always striven to uphold and safeguard their position as mediator between the two parties, and in their legitimate effort to hold that balance they must be inspired and assisted by legislation and regulations which have been enacted in the same spirit of impartiality as between management and labour.

If parliament were to enact the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), what stand could it take if and when management organizations would attempt to obtain, by legislative action, provisions which might react against organized labour as has occurred in other countries? I should like, if I may, to cite here a few words of the late Humphrey Mitchell, which may be found in Hansard for 1947 at page 4231. He said:

> . . . may I say that we have received representations for the inclusion of measures severely curtailing union activities; from others have come suggestions which would involve, under certain conditions, the compulsory application of the principle of union security in collective agreements and the adoption of other innovations.
> We have not given effect in this legislation to such representations, since it is not the desire of the government to place impediments in the way of free collective bargaining between employers and their organized workers, or to legislate conditions or terms of employment that properly lie in the field of collective bargaining.

In the same speech on June 17, 1947, the late Mr. Mitchell had this to say:

> Human nature cannot be corrected by a law, and in the final analysis the major consideration in improving human relations between employers and employees is the simple matter of trying to see each other's point of view and developing mutual understanding.

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

There are other quotations from the same gentleman which would be of interest in discussing this subject, but I would hurry on to a reference which I should like to make to statements by my hon. friend and by others who supported him in the presentation of this amendment in years past. I refer to the debate which took place on the bill to put an end to the railway dispute which had resulted in a nation-wide strike in 1950. On August 30 the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) said that the house must try to "ensure that free collective bargaining and social justice will remain fundamental parts of our Canadian way of life". The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had this to say, as found at page 39 of Hansard of the same date:

> Nevertheless the workers are fearful—and I believe they have every reason to be—that if this bill passes employers will take it as a precedent and that whenever workers make demands there will be no further bargaining in good faith because employers will expect the government to make the same provision for them.

My good friend and practically my deskmate in the house, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), had this to say, as found at page 39 of Hansard for that session:

> Yet this bill could be construed as saying to the trade unions that in such and such circumstances you are no longer free to exercise your rights.

Further on he said:

> Neither today's government nor today's opposition in this house can undertake to say what the effect of passing this bill will be, though we say it is confined to a particular strike in 1950. There it is for all of us to see in the future. We ask ourselves the question, will it not be extended in the future by administrations less friendly to labour than our own?

As a matter of fact the hon. member for Spadina made a very thought-provoking speech on that occasion, and I should like to quote more of what he said. Further on he had this to say:

> I believe it would be nothing short of a national calamity if we were to substitute something else for the collective bargaining process . . . Compulsion can force the parties to submit to a given procedure. It may even force them to accept unwillingly certain results. But I think this house knows very well that forced obedience generates resistance and hostility. Far from being a cure, it is a source of further conflict and it multiplies strife instead of preventing it. Compulsion never removes the cause of the strife.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As it is six o'clock, the hour for private and public bills has expired. At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a committee to examine defence expenditures and commitments, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Claxton.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate in connection with this resolution which was in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and introduced this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), which calls for a select committee to be appointed to continue the examination of all expenditure of public moneys for national defence, etc., I would first like to call attention to the fact that members on this side of the house have for many years been pressing for committees to be set up to discuss and investigate the handling of moneys which were allocated to the Department of National Defence out of the public treasury in order to provide for the essential services for the defence of this country and for the fulfilment of those obligations which Canada has undertaken in the international field.

The reason we have been pressing for the establishment of those committees was that we felt there was sufficient evidence to indicate that the taxpayers' money was not being spent to the best advantage. I remember quite clearly that in my first session in this house after I had been elected in 1945 this question of the establishment of committees was raised. I am not going back to quote from the record as far back as that, but I would just like to put on the record a statement which was made by the present leader of this party in April of 1949, when at page 2322 of Hansard these words were used:

> In past years requests have been made for a select committee to examine this subject—

That is the question of national defence.

> —and to report to the house upon the basis of information of that kind. Without the delay involved in submitting any formal resolution I urge upon the government, in all earnestness and seriousness, the immediate setting up of a special select committee to examine the present state of our national defence and to make recommendations in regard to future organization and requirements.

In the year 1951, on May 8, the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) used these words, at page 2840 of Hansard:

> I think the only way we can do it at all reasonably is by means of a committee on defence. We have asked for such a committee every session during the past several years, and every session the minister has produced a number of what I would call excuses as to why such a committee should not be set up. I think there is no question but that this is the only way a real scrutiny of defence estimates and expenditures can be made by this House of Commons, and I would again urge the minister to set up such a committee.

In 1950 and again in 1951 I moved resolutions in this house to appoint such a committee. The wording of the resolution I moved on March 14, 1950, is to be found on page 730 of Hansard and is to this effect:

> It is expedient to appoint a special committee of this house to examine and report upon the Department of National Defence and the armed services of Canada; and that such committee have power to call for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time to this house.

Again the following year I moved a similar motion. In every case these motions were defeated by the supporters of the government casting their vote against them. Even though the committee which was set up a year ago, and the select committee which is being set up now to continue the work of that committee established a year ago were not entirely the type of committee that we were recommending in those days, I believe it is fair to say that that committee has achieved beneficial results to this country. This has been done even though the committee has found difficulty in obtaining all the information that it required, and even though at times its full endeavours, as I shall show later, have been restricted.

The main results accruing from the endeavours of this committee have been that there has developed in all service establishments across this country a general tightening up of the administration, undoubtedly due to the light of publicity which has been thrown on their system of organization and administration as a result of the researches made by this select committee. We are in favour, therefore, of establishing another select committee to continue the work which the select committee of last session started. We hope that a full opportunity will be given to that committee to investigate all the operations and expenditures of money by the defence services, as outlined in the resolution which is before us at this time.

This afternoon the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) dealt at some considerable length with the report that has been submitted by Mr. Currie, who had been asked by the minister last spring to inquire into certain alleged irregularities that it was suspected had occurred at the great camp at Petawawa, particularly in connection with the army works services. The minister read from a prepared statement of some considerable length, which took up some hour and a half of time this afternoon. I believe that the house expected a full and complete statement, because the minister had not been present when the Currie report was tabled. He was away in Europe on government duty. I should like to make an interjection here to welcome him back to the house, and to express my pleasure that he survived the flights across the Atlantic and the other perils to which he was exposed. We welcome him back in safety and in good health. Perhaps he would not mind my saying that it might have been just as well that he was not here when the report was tabled, because I doubt very much whether we should have gotten home for our Christmas recess.

However, the long report the minister has made requires further study, and I cannot hope to deal with it adequately this evening though I shall do my best to reply to some of the remarks he made. To begin with, he told the story of the works services and of the corps of engineers of the Canadian army. He pointed out that these works services had been reduced to very small strength a few years ago before the Korean operations started, and because they were understaffed they found that they had a tremendous amount of work to undertake. In his report Mr. Currie refers also to the same difficulties that the units of the works services experienced.

I should like to point out at this time that the reduction of those units, as well as the reduction of many other units, both fighting and administrative, was the direct result of Liberal government policy adopted a few years ago. This policy reduced these units to mere skeletons. The works services found that they were ill-equipped to play their part in providing that reasonable security which the Department of National Defence, under this government, was charged with providing in fulfilment of its obligations. It is no disgrace to the soldiers of the works services that they were few in number. I should like to emphasize the point that the reduction in the strength of these units was the direct result of the government's policy. When these units were faced with the rapid expansion which was required in order to meet the crisis which had gradually developed in Korea, they found that they had neither the equipment nor the personnel to provide that rapid expansion. These disturbances in the Far East were like the writing on the wall, and could well have been foreseen. These units, however, ran into difficulty because of the faulty government policy of those days.

Personnel had been demobilized and many of the old reliable works foremen, warrant officers, petty officers and so forth, had been let out at the end of the war. There was difficulty in providing personnel who were trained in administration, personnel who, through years of having to stretch the very scanty funds which were provided for national defence in those days, had grown up with the psychology that the taxpayers' money must be carefully guarded and made to go as far as possible. This psychology has perhaps a great many points which the younger soldiers have not as yet appreciated.

Then because of the hasty demobilization the various training camps across the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific had been allowed to deteriorate, with some of the equipment being looted, and some camps like that at Farnham finding that huts had been completely removed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask hon. members to preserve silence. Otherwise it is exceedingly difficult to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Pearkes: These camps had been allowed to fall into a state of disrepair, and so an extra burden fell largely upon the works services.

Then the minister went on to explain the table, appendix "B", which is at the end of the Currie report. He referred to a good many figures which I have not been able to study or check. In fact at one time I felt that I was almost back in school again dealing with some problem in algebra which went something like this: If X equals 154, and Y equals 33, then X over Y equals 15. I think those were the figures given by the minister, although he did not refer to the Y's. We shall have to inquire into those matters in further detail.

Then he went on to assure us that the Currie report had received consideration and that many of the recommendations had already been adopted. We forecast that possibility when this matter was under discussion before Christmas; and we can only express satisfaction that some action has already been taken on the recommendations made in the report.

To sum up that part of the minister's remarks, it would seem to me that he was once again giving us assurances that all was well. In fact, he almost appeared to be defending the army. Mr. Speaker, the army does not need any defending. It is the government which needs to be defended. It has been clearly demonstrated that, while there were opportunities for theft, fraud and dishonesty elsewhere, the army still refused to march through the door which had been left open to the would-be pilferer. No, Mr. Speaker, the army does not require any defending. It is for the government to defend itself and to explain how it has taken care of the $2 billion of the taxpayers' money which this department has been called upon to expend in the cause of national defence.

Last spring, as reported at page 2334 of Hansard of May 19, 1952, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said:

> Our job is to use every means possible so as to ensure that the utmost care is taken in safeguarding public property and in preventing loss, whether it be by fire, theft, fraud or any other means.

With that statement we most heartily agree, but it has to be shown that at the time the government was exercising every means it had at its disposal in order to prevent this loss through fire, theft and fraud. In the Currie report, almost at the beginning of it, when discussing the discovery of the irregularities at Petawawa Mr. Currie uses these words:

> —it is an unhappy circumstance that the beginning of this investigation lies not inside the Department of National Defence and its full complement of regulations and supervising personnel, but with the receipt of an anonymous letter couched in the following terms:

Then he gives the terms of the letter which called attention to the losses and which aroused the interest of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Then Mr. Currie in his report goes on to use these words:

> Before reciting the irregularities and their circumstances uncovered by the R.C.M.P.—with the assistance later of the provincial police and the army provost corps—it must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions.

Then he goes on and refers to appendix "B" which I have already mentioned, and he closes that paragraph by saying:

> Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported, and in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

These matters have been brought to the attention of the Department of National Defence. Surely the serious implications of a report by the chief auditor of the department should have been brought to the attention of the minister and government. It is for these reasons that I feel the government is charged with the responsibility; and the government has shown that it has not taken every possible means to safeguard the taxpayers' money, in spite of the fact that in that very spring the Minister of National Defence was declaring that his job was to take care of the taxpayers' money by every possible means.

Then the minister went on to say that nobody wished to question the report, but he himself proceeded to do so. First of all he raised the question of the horses, which has become a laughingstock and the gibe of every cartoonist across the country. He declared that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the day before had announced that there had been no horses on the payroll. However, I could not help remarking that the Prime Minister himself based those remarks partly upon information supplied by a man who had been convicted of dishonesty and placed in a penitentiary. He seemed to prefer the statement of a criminal to that of his own appointed investigator, Mr. Currie; because Mr. Currie distinctly says there were horses on the payroll under the names of non-existent labourers. Then the minister went on to say:

> There are a number of other cases in which the account given by Mr. Currie is not wholly in accordance with the facts which were established.

I do submit that Mr. Currie was sent to establish the facts. And no doubt Mr. Currie did establish those facts, even though they may not be particularly welcome facts for the government.

There is some question about a dam being built at Tucker creek at the cost of some $3,000 or $4,000. The minister explained that that was carried out as an exercise by the engineers. Well, I have no doubt that the engineers would be required to be exercised in the construction of dams. It is a fortunate fact—perhaps I should say it is a peculiar circumstance—that Tucker creek was in the centre of an area which many years ago was a favourite rendezvous of the Petawawa fish and game club.

Then the minister went on to explain about the Canadian National Railways, and the spur which Mr. Currie said had been taken up to replace the rails of the Canadian Pacific Railway spur, after the rails of the C.P.R. had been stolen, or at least after officials of that railway had protested against the sudden disappearance of those rails. The minister referred to these C.N.R. rails by saying: "I am sorry the report contained a reference to the Canadian National Railways. It turned out not to be so. I am sorry it contained a reference to the horses, though I am glad they were not on the payroll."

Regarding the C.N.R. track, there is a spur which leads from the Canadian National line into Petawawa Camp. It has been there for years and years, and everyone refers to it as the C.N.R. spur. If the rails had been laid by the government, instead of by the C.N.R., then I suppose in general terms it would be correct to say that they were not

C.N.R. rails. But for years and years that spur has been referred to as the Canadian National spur.

Then we were admonished to view the report in its correct perspective. I do not wish to go into every detail of the report, because there is no time for that; but I think one of the general and main points in connection with what Mr. Currie found is that there was a general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting. Those are the words which are to be found very near the beginning of the report, at page 2 of the typewritten copies. It is said that this resulted in or created a generally lax administrative situation. From that Mr. Currie deduced that such a situation would give rise to waste and inefficiency far more costly in loss than that covered by the actual dishonesty.

Then, dealing with Petawawa camp itself, he referred to a small group of crooks—and they were a small group—who did take advantage of the door which the government had left open for them so they could loot and pilfer from that camp. I think the majority of hon. members know what was taken from the camp, because it has been mentioned many times in the press across the country. One need only refer to the 550 tons of so-called scrap, which included many things which were far from being scrap, such as serviceable kitchen ranges, shower stalls and the like.

Then there was a question as to lumber which had been stolen during the process of clearing large sections of the camp. Cement had been taken or had not been accounted for to the extent of some 18,000 bags. I am told that about a thousand bags of cement go to make one carload, so one might almost say that 18,000 bags would be approximately a trainload of cement which was missing altogether.

Contractors had been paid for work which had not been done, or which was completed with the loan of army equipment and personnel.

In the attempt of the government to belittle what took place—and there has been a very definite attempt on the part of the government to belittle the general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting, as reported in the Currie report—this process of belittling has taken the form of trying to refer to these very considerable losses as being relatively small matters. It is possible that they may be relatively small matters when compared with the possible losses elsewhere, in areas which have not been submitted to the scrutiny of Mr. Currie and his team of accountants, because Mr. Currie's endeavours were limited to the relatively small field of the army works services, mainly at Petawawa camp, though he did investigate and did find some irregularities in other camps serviced by the army works services.

These are not relatively small matters if viewed in regard to the actual loss of taxpayers' money, and the lowering of morale that has been caused by all these losses, through the light of publicity that has been thrown upon them. When Mr. Currie was first appointed the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said:

> We felt that no better man could be found to do this job if we searched the length and breadth of the country.

Then he went on to point out that Mr. Currie was an ex-officer who had served during the first world war with distinction, that he had been a deputy minister of the Department of National Defence for a number of years, and that he was also a member of a very prominent firm of chartered accountants. It is certain that nobody on this side of the house, or anywhere in the house, disputed the fact at that time that Mr. Currie appeared to have all the qualifications which were necessary to carry out such an investigation. Now we are asking ourselves, why has Mr. Currie fallen from grace; because it is quite obvious that in their endeavour to play down and belittle his report they have not stopped even at casting reflections upon Mr. Currie himself. I wonder whether, when they made the appointment, they overlooked the fact that Mr. Currie, besides his qualifications as an ex-officer, a deputy minister of national defence and a chartered accountant, was also an honourable and honest gentleman.

I said that an attempt was being made to belittle this report. It started when the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) replied just before Christmas. In referring to quotations which have been made from the report by hon. members on this side of the house he described them as exaggerations, as irresponsible statements. Then last week on Vancouver island the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) referred to the Currie report merely as "threshing old straw." On Vancouver island the Solicitor General also referred to the report and said that it would not "cut much ice." The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was a little more emphatic, and when speaking at Kingston he is reported as having said that "it was a rehash in lurid language" of matters already dealt with by the courts or by the department.

I have read out some extracts from this report. It has been made available to every hon. member; it has been published in the papers. I defy any hon. member to point to any lurid language which is used in the report. The report is written in the most moderate terms, but it has stated honestly and exactly what the conditions were as they were found by Mr. Currie when he was making his investigation. Even though the Solicitor General may laugh, I think he will find it very difficult, with his knowledge of the English language and the meaning of words, to point to any sentences which really can answer to the description of being lurid in language.

Well, after drawing attention to these irregularities and to the losses which had been sustained at Petawawa camp, Mr. Currie draws various conclusions and makes these observations: Although the Department of National Defence auditors were warned again and again over a lengthy period that supervision and accounting were inadequate, no effective action was ever taken, with the result the situation grew progressively worse and the discovery of thefts, following investigation, came not from the department itself but from an anonymous letter to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; and again:

> No reliable estimate of the total loss can be prepared. . . How many more there may have been will never be known.

And again:

> There was, in addition, a serious collapse in security. There was little to prevent or to detect the organized plundering of military stores on a systematic scale. . . If there is excuse for inefficient accounting, there is none for the failure of security which is, after all, a prime military consideration. I take a serious view of this breakdown.

Perhaps the Solicitor General considers that lurid language. I do not know. I do not think it would answer the description of the word "lurid" as given in the Oxford dictionary, or in any other reliable dictionary.

Then there is a paragraph which has been quoted before in this house, and which is found on page 17 of the report, which summarizes the conditions to which I have already referred this evening. These are the lurid words of the framer of this report, Mr. Currie:

> The situation was complicated by still another factor. The Department of National Defence (including the army works services) was largely staffed and manned by men whose military training had been received in wartime. Its establishment and administrative practices reflected more clearly the urgent needs and exigencies of war, when speed is everything and costs count not at all.

That is again the direct result of government policy. The government had seen fit to remove many of the more senior, perhaps more elderly, staff officers of 1946-1947, and they had been replaced very largely by the younger commanders who had quite naturally grown up in this war psychology. I remember pointing out at the time the dangers of this policy. I made this statement in this house on the 6th day of February, 1947, when speaking in the debate on national defence, as reported at page 173 of Hansard:

> I suggest that all the substance has been taken out of our defence force and that today there remains only the wreckage of the overhead framework.

In those days the government had reduced the services to such a state that they were not in an efficient position to carry out their responsibilities. And even in those days attention had been called by the Auditor General, and by the auditors of the department as well, to the unsatisfactory accounting conditions which had existed. At the same time we were receiving solemn assurances that all was well, and that there were no irregularities or deficiencies in the various construction projects at Petawawa camp. Mr. Currie shortly afterward was carrying out his investigation, and he was reporting that there were unauthorized projects, that there were improper loans of material and that the rental of army equipment was taking place to civilian contractors.

In the recently published Auditor General's report for last year these irregularities are confirmed, and other cases have been cited that deal not only with Petawawa camp but with other army establishments throughout the country. He complains of the complicated accounting system which has prevented losses from being reported and brought to the attention of those responsible for the safeguarding of the taxpayers' money. I might cite as an example of that the mixing of gas and fuel oil at Churchill which, according to Mr. Sellar, seems to have cost the taxpayers somewhere in the neighbourhood of $75,000 or $80,000.

I do suggest that if the government were really determined to safeguard the taxpayers' money it would not have adopted the policy of belittling the Currie report. I think it is one of the tragedies of this whole unfortunate episode that the government should have adopted the attitude of ridiculing and belittling the report. It would have been far more seemly if they had swallowed the pill and decided that they would investigate the conditions thoroughly. It would have been far more seemly if they had, with a contrite heart, accepted all the recommendations made by Mr. Currie. It is a pill that they must swallow. It may be an unpleasant one, but unless all the ingredients of the pill are taken we shall never get the patient well again.

Mr. Rowe: They are choking on it now.

Mr. Pearkes: It was proposed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) this afternoon, and was also mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), that the report would be referred to the select committee which is now to be set up. I suggest that it is action that is required, and not the referring of the report to a committee. We might well examine the constitution of the select committee to be set up to continue the work of last year's committee. It is to consist of some 26 members. According to the constitution of the committee last year, 17 of its 26 members were members or supporters of the government. In other words, 17 out of 26 were Liberals. Six were drawn from the ranks of the Progressive Conservative party and three from all other groups in the house. Therefore if the representatives of the Conservatives and the other groups all voted together they were only able to marshal 9 votes against the 17 of the supporters of the government on the committee.

I do not think it is going too far to say that the committee was really a one-party organization. If members from the opposition groups wished to find out about certain matters and it was not the wish of the government that details along those particular lines should be revealed then these matters were a closed book to the committee. It was suggested that the committee should take up the question of Petawawa camp. That was refused. It was said that we must not go into the matter of Petawawa camp because the Currie commission was investigating it. There was some question about making inquiries regarding item No. 87(a) on a list provided for us, which item dealt with aircraft for the R.C.A.F. and the navy. One would think that a defence expenditures committee would be permitted to investigate the expenditure of a sum which at that time was listed at no less than $668,986,840, of which over $100 million was to be spent in that year. But no; the committee must not investigate any spending in connection with such a large sum of money as $668 million odd.

Obviously when the government does not like its actions to be queried it finds means in that committee and elsewhere to limit the investigations which the committee would like to carry out and the disclosure of information which should be brought to attention elsewhere. It is fairly obvious that no sooner had the Auditor General's report been tabled than officials of the Department of National Defence, unnamed of course, rushed into print and started to comment upon the remarks made by the Auditor General. This department is following the pattern set up by the government. It is resentful of any criticism which may be offered of it. We are uncertain whether the committee now to be appointed will be able under the circumstances to carry out the duties that have been assigned to it. Immediately after the house rose for the Christmas recess the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) communicated with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but it does occur to me that he is coming close to questioning the independence of the members of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: He has not gone quite to that extreme, but he is close to it. There is a rule of the house that every member is an independent member.

Mr. Cleaver: They are the only honest members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I felt that I should bring the rule to the attention of hon. members at this time.

Mr. Rowe: Let us be careful not to hurt anybody's feelings.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, when you rose to point out that you thought that I might be questioning the independence of members I was about to read a letter written by the Leader of the Opposition to the Prime Minister just before Christmas. I have the permission of the Leader of the Opposition to read it. In fact I think the letter has been published, and I do not think you will find anything in it that questions the independence of any member of the house, myself or anybody else. These are the words which were used in the letter:

> You said that the Currie report would be submitted to the committee on defence expenditures. One of my reasons for writing this letter is to point out that this procedure is neither necessary nor desirable. Members of the opposition who sat on the committee made a determined effort last spring to inquire into the situation at Petawawa. They were denied any opportunity to do so with the explanation that this might prejudice the trials of those already charged with theft, and also that Mr. Currie had been appointed to conduct an inquiry, which would deal fully with that situation.
> We need no inquiry into the report of another inquiry. We need action on the report now before us. It makes positive recommendations. You have expressed your confidence in Mr. Currie's integrity, ability and good judgment. We share that confidence in every respect. I submit that it is the duty of the government to act on those recommendations without delay. I further submit that it is the duty of the government to conduct a similar inquiry into every aspect of the organization and administration of the Department of National Defence. I repeat my request that Mr. Currie be given this authority.

Now, if those words were pertinent, as they were before Christmas, they are very definitely underlined now that the Auditor General's report has been received. We fear, as we have said before, that the defence expenditures committee may not be able to go into all the details of operations and expenditures of money that it would like to go into. Petawawa camp has been cited as one case and it is possible that the committee, in its final report or in its actions which will produce that final report, will reflect the will of the government rather than the rights of the citizens because, whether we would like to feel we can be independent or not, we do know that there is party discipline and that it is such that the government can rely upon the majority of its supporters to support it in anything it does. In fact, I would go so far as to say that in some respects we have travelled a long way on the road to Moscow and that we do live on the edge of a dictatorship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: It is the return trip that is tough.

Mr. Pearkes: In case the committee cannot fulfil all the functions that it would like to fulfil or that it is called upon to fulfil by the Prime Minister's resolution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), a further amendment which reads as follows:

(a) By striking out the words of the amendment, namely: "and initially to give priority in their examination to the expenditures and commitments of the Canadian army works services as dealt with in the report of G. S. Currie, Esquire, chartered accountant, tabled in the House of Commons on December 15, 1952", and,

(b) by adding at the end of the motion as amended the following words:

"and inasmuch as the report of G. S. Currie on the Department of National Defence is a matter of prime importance to the people of Canada this house is of the opinion that the said G. S. Currie should be authorized to continue his inquiries and conduct a similar investigation to that already undertaken into all aspects of organization, accounting and administration of the Department of National Defence."

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think the first part of this motion, part (a), is out of order because it is merely a negative of the proposal that these words be inserted in the motion. It is nothing but an expanded negative, and those who believe that the proper course would be not to have the words of the amendment in the motion have only to vote against the motion to insert them.

As to the second part, it is certainly not an amendment to the motion and certainly not the kind of proposal that can be put before the house without notice.

Some hon. Members: Ha, ha!

Mr. St. Laurent: My hon. friends may say "ha, ha" all they like.

Mr. Rowe: What a difference a few hours make.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to be out of order but I am afraid that the horse complex is having some influence upon the expressions that we have just heard.

An hon. Member: We know all about horses.

Mr. Rowe: And so do you fellows.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps I should sit down and allow the hon. gentleman to have his say.

Mr. Rowe: I will proceed if you wish—at any time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: This is something that proposes an alternative to the setting up of a committee and that, I submit, is not the kind of thing that can be done by amendment. I think that Your Honour made it quite clear this afternoon what the ruling that had been cited to you did apply to and what it did not apply to. You said that it did not apply to an instruction to do something in the committee that it would have the right to do but would not have an obligation to do if the amendment were not made. This is entirely different. This is the expression of an opinion:

"and inasmuch as the report of G. S. Currie on the Department of National Defence is a matter of prime importance to the people of Canada this house is of the opinion that the said G. S. Currie should be authorized to continue his enquiries and conduct a similar investigation to that already undertaken into all aspects of organization, accounting and administration of the Department of National Defence."

That, I submit, is not an amendment to a motion to set up a committee. It is something that is entirely foreign to the subject matter of what is now before the house.

Mr. Harkness: Technicalities.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that this is not a negative of the proposal to set up a committee. It leaves the motion to set up the committee intact.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I made that reference only with respect to part (a) of the motion which is a negative of the amendment to the motion. I did not say that the whole thing was a negative of the original motion, it is a negative of the amendment to the motion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it leaves the motion to set up the committee intact, and puts forward an amendment related to the subject matter of that motion. It provides a method by which there can be a real inquiry in accordance with the needs demonstrated to this house. I submit it is both in order and desirable that the amendment stand.

Mr. Rowe: It should stand, even though it is dangerous.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman is not as dangerous as he thinks he is.

Mr. Rowe: Wait and see.

Mr. Chevrier: We have been waiting for a long time.

Mr. Rowe: Let the public tell you. It will not be long now; they are waiting to tell you.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The amendment to the amendment proposes to strike out entirely the words of the amendment, and to substitute other words which are not relevant to the amendment. I do not think there is any precedent for that.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, are you giving a ruling now or will you hear argument on the point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I was starting to give my ruling.

Mr. Fleming: I did not know whether you were delivering your ruling or whether you were stating a point for discussion.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to abruptly cut off the hon. member if he has any representations to make. I have made one statement respecting my ruling, that the first clause of the subamendment is out of order because it proposes to strike out the entire words of the amendment and to substitute therefor words which are in no way relevant to the words which were struck out.

Mr. Fleming: May I say a word with respect to that, sir? The amendment which was offered this afternoon by a minister of the crown to a government motion, proposes that certain instructions be given to the committee with reference to the Currie report. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) says that the amendment just now introduced by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) is an expanded negative with reference to the subject matter of the first amendment offered this afternoon. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is not an expanded negative but an alternative method of dealing with the same subject matter, namely the Currie report. The subamendment proposes that Mr. Currie, the author of that report, be instructed to extend the report and the inquiry upon which he has already embarked.

Now, with respect, Mr. Speaker, that is not an expanded negative. In order to come within the rule the Prime Minister is invoking it has to be an expanded negative and nothing more. This is a great deal more. This deals with the same subject matter, and with great respect I submit that on the first point the Prime Minister's objection is not well taken.

On the second point, sir, the Prime Minister raises the ground that this is a new subject matter that is introduced. I take the view that, in its essence, the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Nanaimo is clearly in order if the amendment introduced this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was in order on the original motion. There cannot be any distinction in principle between these two amendments as to their being in order with reference to the motion that was introduced by the Prime Minister today. If it means that this amendment to the amendment is to be ruled out now by this appeal of the Prime Minister to subtlety, I think it will be clear to the house and the public just why it was that a government minister this afternoon introduced this amendment to a government motion.

Mr. St. Laurent: Could I ask the hon. member who moved this subamendment if the language is not somewhat erroneous. He speaks of striking out the words of the subamendment, and there is no subamendment. There is a motion and an amendment. I think the hon. member—

Mr. Pearkes: It should be "the amendment".

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. member meant the words of the amendment, and the word "sub" should be taken out.

Mr. Speaker: As I said this afternoon, I cannot be concerned with what the effect of either allowing or disallowing an amendment will be. If the rules of this house provide that the amendment should be allowed, then I will allow it to stand. If, on the other hand, they provide that it should not be allowed then I cannot allow it to stand. If hon. members are dissatisfied with the rules of the house then it is for the members of the house to change them, not for the Speaker of the house.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has referred to the amendment which was moved this afternoon, and stated that if that amendment was in order then the subamendment should be in order. I think the contents of the amendments are entirely different. The amendment which was allowed this afternoon directed the committee to give priority to a certain matter. I think all hon. members, upon reading the rules and upon reflection, will agree that such an amendment is in order.

I am now concerned with the subamendment that has been moved. The (a) clause of the subamendment purports to strike out all the words of the amendment and to insert other words which are not relevant to the words that are struck out. To that extent, the subamendment is out of order. The (b) clause of the subamendment proposes that this house is of the opinion that the said G. S. Currie should be authorized to continue his inquiries. The motion before the house is to set up a committee to do certain things. It does seem to me that the (b) clause is foreign to the motion which is now before the house.

Probably the mover of the motion had in mind the procedure on the second reading of a bill. On the second reading of a bill a motion can be made that the bill be not now read a second time but that certain further information should be sought, etc. I know of no such procedure with respect to the setting up of a committee. I have no alternative but to declare the subamendment out of order.

Probably at this time I should refer to certain words which were used by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) this afternoon. Before doing so, however, I should like to say that the Hansard reporter was correct in not endeavouring to read, on the floor of the house, the report which he had made of the proceedings in the house. I hope I did not embarrass him by suggesting that he should do so. I think the house will agree with me that in our service there are no more faithful or efficient public servants than the members of the Hansard staff. The only thing I can say is that he missed the opportunity of being the first Hansard reporter to make a speech on the floor of the house.

With reference to the words that were used this afternoon, may I say that I have here a copy of the Hansard report. I have had an opportunity of reading it and on doing so I find that no one—myself, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) nor the Leader of the Opposition—recalled exactly what had been said in the heat of debate. Under the circumstances I am satisfied that I should accept the words which the Leader of the Opposition recalled that he had used. In those words I can find no intention to reflect on the independence of any hon. member. Accordingly the incident should be considered as closed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will be interested to learn that it is my intention, at the conclusion of my remarks, to move another subamendment. I believe that my subamendment will be recognized as being in order. It has been drafted with a close consideration of the discussion that took place this afternoon, and I believe it meets the conditions that were laid down when the amendment of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was accepted as being in order. However, Mr. Speaker, before I get to the subamendment which it is my intention to move, I wish to say a few things with respect to the motion and the amendment now before the house.

We of this group support the idea of there being established once again a special committee on defence expenditure. We are fully conscious of the shortcomings of that committee, particularly because of the fact that it is composed of too large a majority of supporters of the government. If a committee of this type is to be effective, we feel that here is one place where the committee should be divided fifty-fifty between supporters of the government and opposition members in this house. In addition, I should like to see an independent chairman; but I am not just sure who is an independent member in this present House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I say that with all due apologies to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). At any rate, Mr. Speaker, we hope that this committee will be able to make inquiries that will be useful, and that some progress will be made in tightening up the administration—and in particular the financial administration—of the Department of National Defence.

Likewise we have no quarrel with the substance of the amendment moved this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence, which suggests that the defence expenditure committee should give priority to consideration of the Currie report. In saying this we have no illusions as to what is likely to happen. We are satisfied that there will be an attempt by the government members of that committee to whitewash that report. Nevertheless, in our view the report stands on its own feet and an attempt to whitewash it, though it may be done by a majority vote, will not be effective or successful in the eyes of the Canadian people who have been shocked at the disclosures which have come about as a result of the investigation made by Mr. Currie.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in our view the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) this afternoon, while it covered a great many aspects of the matter now before us, was one in which he completely overlooked what to us is one of the most serious aspects of this whole question. Not only did he, in our view, overlook what we regard as of serious concern, but he made comments which seemed to me to suggest that he would not appreciate the seriousness of the point even if it were drawn to his attention. The point that we feel is most serious about this whole business is the question as to the proper place of the armed forces in a democracy. Are they the servant of the state, of the people of the country through their elected representatives, or are they in charge? Are the armed forces entitled to dictate to the government and to push other people around? In our view there has been too much evidence of that attitude throughout this whole business, and that is our primary concern at the present time.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that during the last month several things have happened which have underlined our concern as to who is running the show, the heads of the army or the elected government of this country. Our first concern over that matter arose on the morning of December 15 when the Prime Minister tabled the official copy of the Currie report. Hon. members will recall that, when he tabled the report, he placed on Hansard at the same time a memorandum from the chief of the general staff. During the course of his remarks at that time he stated that he was giving us that memorandum because the chief of the general staff thought that the views contained in that memorandum should be given publicity at the same time as the revelations contained in the Currie report itself. When the Prime Minister was questioned by my deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), during the course of debate in the next day or so as to why he had done this, the Prime Minister interjected to say that he was prepared to give the answer right then and there. He said he did it because he was requested to do so by the chief of the general staff. In our view, Mr. Speaker, the chief of the general staff had no right to ask the elected Prime Minister of this country to table that memorandum, and in our view the Prime Minister had no right to accede to that request. We take a strong view of that whole incident as indicative of a state of mind on the part of the top officers in the army which is not consistent with democratic practice.

It should be made clear, Mr. Speaker, that though what we say seems to be by way of levelling blame at the chief of the general staff, it should not be forgotten that it is the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), it is the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), it is the government which is responsible for the kind of set-up that they have in the general staff, responsible for the attitude that the heads of the army display in a situation like this. They have to take the responsibility for it; and as the heads of a democratic state I submit that they are missing the whole point.

Now, that was the first evidence in this present story of the domineering attitude on the part of the military staff. The second evidence, in our view, was the fact that a draft of Mr. Currie's report was shown to the deputy minister of national defence, and perhaps was seen by others, with the result that suggestions were made as to changes that might be made in that report.

I shall have something to say a little later about the fact that a copy of the first draft of this report came into the possession of my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). But let it be made clear right now that no one doubts the authenticity of this draft which my leader received, and no one denies that changes were made.

Between the first draft and the second draft changes were made. For instance, on page 17 the words "at or near the top" were deleted and in their place were put the words "higher up".

The Prime Minister confirmed on Wednesday, December 17, that a copy of the first draft of the report had been given to the deputy minister of national defence, and that at least one other official in the department had seen it. When I asked whether the chief of the general staff had seen it, he said that he did not know. This afternoon the Minister of National Defence likewise confirmed the fact that that first draft of the report was placed in the hands of the deputy minister. And we learned one further item this afternoon from the minister, namely that prior to that first copy of the report in multilith, there was a typewritten copy showing the form in which the report was to be set up, and that that, too, had been shown to the deputy minister.

The Minister of National Defence said this afternoon that he could not understand why we were at all concerned about the fact that the earlier draft, or earlier drafts, were shown to the deputy minister. He made great play on the fact that it was he who had appointed Mr. Currie, and that it was his desire and wish that there should be this report.

I suggest to the Minister of National Defence that what this parliament and this country thought when Mr. Currie was appointed to do this job was that we would get a completely independent report—and I hope I can still use the word "independent" in this house. We had hoped it would be a completely independent report, objective and without any influence being brought to bear on the investigator by those being investigated.

Now, how anyone can imagine that there would be a complete lack of such influence, when earlier drafts of that report were taken to the people being investigated, is beyond my power to understand. The Minister of National Defence, although he is the minister and thus the head of the department and responsible for it, seems to partake of the attitude of his top officials and officers, because he told us this afternoon that when Mr. Currie objected to showing Mr. Drury the first copy—the first multilith copy—he, the Minister of National Defence, suggested to his deputy minister that further conversation be had about this, and that perhaps Mr. Currie could be persuaded to let a copy of his report in that form be seen by the department.

In other words, the Minister of National Defence is part and parcel with his military heads, and all the rest of them, in this feeling that in connection with any investigation that is being made into the affairs of that department, any report to be made upon the basis of that investigation can be seen by them before that report is put in its final form and presented to the minister for presentation to parliament.

In other words, along with the earlier incident to which I referred, here you have what to me is proof positive of the fact that in the military heads of this country today we have this feeling, that somehow or another it is their show, that they have the right to say what is to be done, that they have the right to run it, rather than it being the right of the elected people, or of the government chosen by the people of this country.

Mr. Speaker, to us this is a matter of principle which is extremely important, and we feel that this government has been in power so long that it has forgotten some of the basic principles of democracy. It has forgotten the relationship that should exist between the government of a democracy and the armed forces.

Mr. Ferrie: You sure have forgotten the principle.

Mr. Knowles: Now, after that part of the story, the next item which was of interest to me was to read in the press a day or two after we left here for the Christmas recess that the same chief of the general staff—and if I mention his name repeatedly, I say again it is the Minister of National Defence who is responsible for what the chief of the general staff does, and who is responsible for the whole attitude of the people who come under him—had issued certain orders.

Indeed as I have said, I was amazed to read in the press that the chief of the general staff had issued orders that members of the armed forces and employees of the Department of National Defence were requested not to discuss the Currie report. Well, Mr. Speaker, the more these things come to light, the more one wonders just how well those on the government benches understand the meaning of democracy. Surely it is inconceivable that employees of the Department of National Defence and, in fact, people in uniform, should be denied the right to discuss the Currie report. Well, it is inconceivable; but we have had so many displays of this arrogant and domineering attitude on the part of the top military people who do not seem to realize that this is a democracy, that perhaps it is all of a piece that they seek to deny the right to free discussion.

But while the chief of the general staff denies to the people to whom he can issue orders the right to discuss the Currie report, he does not hesitate to discuss it himself. One need only mention the memorandum he requested the Prime Minister to table on December 15, when the Currie report was first tabled. But there is now before us the December issue of the Canadian Army Journal. This issue is dated December, 1952, but apparently it came out only within the last day or two. So far as I can ascertain it made its appearance only yesterday.

I find on pages 2 and 3 of this issue a message to the Canadian army from the chief of the general staff. It is over the signature of G. G. Simonds, lieutenant-general, and chief of the general staff. Hon. members are aware of what is in this message, because it has been given wide publicity in the press of today. It is a very nicely worded document. It does not say members of parliament have been saying some things they should not have said, but the reference is very clearly to the discussions which have gone on in this House of Commons. It says, for example:

> In recent weeks and months the army has been the target of unremitting attacks from many sources. We have been criticized for the indiscipline of Canadian soldiers. We have been criticized for too much discipline. We have been criticized for extravagance and criticized for not providing a whole host of things which cost a very great deal of money. We have been criticized for lack of morale and accused of complacency and arrogance when we have shown or proclaimed a pride in the Canadian army.

Then he goes on, after a few more sentences, to say:

> Some of this criticism has been, and will continue to be, unfairly biased and irresponsible—

That is what the chief of general staff is saying about what members of parliament, in discharging their responsibilities to their constituents, have been saying here in the House of Commons. He says:

> Some of this criticism has been, and will continue to be, unfairly biased and irresponsible but that will be as clear to the citizens and taxpayers outside the army as to those that serve in it.

Perhaps it would not have been quite so bad for the chief of general staff to take to himself the right to make these comments about discussions that have taken place in parliament, if he had not already been responsible for an order requesting those to whom he can issue orders not to discuss the Currie report. The concluding sentence in this message from the chief of the general staff reads:

> I charge every soldier to apply himself in all those matters where we clearly need improvement but not to be discouraged or depressed by criticisms which are neither founded on truth nor justified in the light of our positive achievements.

Whose criticism is he referring to as neither founded on truth nor justified? The criticisms made in this House of Commons; the criticisms made by Mr. Currie? Apparently it is both. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is high time the minister, who accepts responsibility for all that goes on in the armed forces, took a look at this kind of thing and asked the question as to where it fits into the whole concept of democracy under which, in our view, the armed forces should be the servants and not the masters of the state.

Well, still another bit of evidence of this attitude has already been referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) who took his seat only a few moments ago. As hon. members know, there appeared yesterday the public accounts and the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1952. In this report there are a number of references to things that had been happening in the financial administration of the armed forces. There is reference to a brigadier who for three months was drawing two government pay cheques, one for his service as a civil servant seconded to duties here in Ottawa and one for his rank in the army. There is reference to an area commandant who had something to do with having a house improved to the extent of $15,000, when the amount approved for those improvements was only $800; and incidentally, it comes out now in the press at any rate that that particular person was Brigadier Connelly who was recently retired, and we in this house were not given at that time the information as to why he was retired. It raises another question. Why was this brigadier posted to Tokyo, if it was after the disclosures contained in the Auditor General's report with respect to his part in going beyond the financial regulations under which the Department of National Defence is supposed to function?

The Minister of National Defence said clearly, and I was not surprised—I would expect him to say what he said this afternoon, in view of his academic knowledge of democracy—that he is responsible for what goes on. Well, he is responsible for this. Immediately we get the tabling of Mr. Watson Sellar's report we get a blast from the officials of the Department of National Defence against Mr. Watson Sellar. Well, it is not the first time that the Auditor General has been criticized. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has criticized him on the floor of this house, and it is his right to do so; but I submit that the heads of the army are in a little different position, particularly in the light of what has been going on. When the same people who have been taking this attitude in all of the instances I have indicated here, again take that attitude today in the light of Mr. Watson Sellar's report, that is a clear indication that we have to check this kind of thing and ask the question whether or not the general staff of our army is getting out of hand and seeking to run the show which should be run by the democratically elected people of this country.

I could say more on this whole question, Mr. Speaker, because of our deep concern about it, but despite the fact that my forty minutes will not be up at ten o'clock I should like to finish by that time. As I indicated earlier, there are at least two other things I want to do. At the end of my remarks I have an amendment to move. But before I do that I wish to say something in reply to what the Minister of National Defence said about the earlier copy of the Currie report which came into the possession of my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

The Minister of National Defence expressed the view that it was a matter of serious concern as to how the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar got that earlier copy, and I am not surprised that there would be interest in that question on the part of hon. members opposite but I suggest to them that they will fail if they try to make a red herring out of that issue and try to blow it up and becloud the real issue, so far as our getting a copy of that report is concerned, which is the fact that changes were made, and that they were made after suggestions had been given to Mr. Currie's representatives by officials of the Department of National Defence, and perhaps by officers of the general staff.

However, this afternoon the Minister of National Defence said that he would like to table certain correspondence between himself and Mr. Currie, between himself and myself, and between himself and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I expressed the desire that that correspondence not only be tabled but that it appear on the pages of Hansard. That request was granted. I had a particular reason for expressing the hope that that particular correspondence would appear on the pages of Hansard. My reason was that I wanted everyone to be able to see what it was that the Minister of National Defence wrote to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The correspondence with me is of no particular significance, but it is on the record. I have not yet seen the correspondence with Mr. Currie, but I shall read it with interest. The Minister of National Defence wrote the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on January 8, 1953, and after expressing the hope that my leader's health would soon be better—and I am glad to report that he is making a splendid recovery following his recent operation—he went on to say that Mr. Currie had indicated that he would welcome any further investigation which the department or any other authority might deem was expedient to make from any angle or direction. Then after that the Minister of National Defence says:

> The R.C.M.P. are being instructed accordingly.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Knowles: The letter continues:

> Before, however, they start, it would be of assistance if you could make available to me any information that you may have bearing on this.

I thought that threats in the House of Commons, threats from one member of parliament to another, were out of order in this democratic set-up, Mr. Speaker. But here we have a veiled threat from the Minister of National Defence to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that if he is not prepared to give information as to how he got his copy of the report the R.C.M.P. will be put on the job.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Knowles: All those hon. members who are shouting "why not" are simply revealing that they have no understanding of the importance of the independence of parliament, which is definitely threatened by this attitude on the part of the minister.

Mr. Claxton: May I ask just one question? I have interrupted no one in this debate, but does the hon. member know that the letter received by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, his leader, was not stolen?

Mr. Fulton: That is a sensible interruption!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: I have been in touch with my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, since I came to Ottawa and he has given me the letter which he received from the Minister of National Defence and also a copy of the reply which he wrote to the minister. I only regret that my time is running out and that I have not time to read the full terms of that letter.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: It is not necessary because it will be on Hansard. It was put on Hansard this afternoon and hon. members can read it. In my view it is an excellent letter when one realizes that my leader dictated it in hospital without having any chance to refer to the authorities in connection with this whole question. Now, Mr. Speaker, by way of contrast with this—

Mr. Martin: Question.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Knowles: What question?

Mr. Martin: The Minister of National Defence asked a question.

Mr. Knowles: I thought I answered the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Claxton: I thought the loudspeaker apparatus was very good, Mr. Speaker. The question I asked was this: Was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre aware of the fact that the letter received by his leader and referred to by him in the house, which is the subject of his present remarks, was not stolen?

Mr. Hees: So what?

Mr. Fulton: The question is not improved by repetition.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry; I misunderstood the Minister of National Defence. When he said "letter" I thought he was referring to the letter from the Minister of National Defence to my leader.

Mr. Claxton: I beg your pardon. I made a mistake there. It is a draft of the report. I am sorry I used the word "letter". I was referring to the draft of the Currie report, of course.

Mr. Knowles: The minister admits that he made a mistake. It was a report that my hon. leader received and not a letter. There was no letter with it whatsoever.

Mr. Claxton: That is right; the report.

Mr. Ferrie: Who stole the report?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: It had been my hope to conclude my remarks by ten o'clock.

Mr. Cannon: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Cannon: Will the hon. member tell the house who stole the copy of the report and who received the stolen goods on the part of the C.C.F. party?

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the hon. member if he has stopped beating his wife?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: That's the way to go.

An hon. Member: Isn't that bright?

Mr. Knowles: I am afraid I shall have to renege on my promise to try to finish by ten o'clock. I will have to take a bit of time to conclude what I have to say on the next occasion this matter is before the house, but between now and ten o'clock I do want to—

Mr. Larson: Will the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Knowles: Save it for the next day.

Mr. Larson: Is he prepared to answer the question put by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon)?

Mr. Knowles: I wish to let the house see how differently matters of this kind are dealt with in another parliament. I refer to the parliament of the United Kingdom, often referred to as the mother of parliaments, a place from which we still have a great deal to learn. I have in my hand a copy of the Hansard of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom for June and July, 1938.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members may recall a very interesting and significant incident that occurred during that year in the United Kingdom when a member by the name of Mr. Sandys put a question on the order paper—

Mr. Cannon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if a member permits a question does he not have to answer it?

Mr. Speaker: It is in the discretion of the hon. member who has the floor.

An hon. Member: He used it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Dickey: He answers if he has an answer.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Sandys, as hon. members may recall, placed a question on the order paper of the United Kingdom House of Commons which revealed that he was in possession of certain information that the government thought he was not entitled to have. As a matter of fact it was information covered by their official secrets act. The report that came into the possession of my leader was not covered by any official secrets act. It was not a government document. The minister himself said today that there is only one official Currie report, the one that was tabled in the house on December 15. The document that came into the possession of my leader was not a government document at all. I submit that the government has no right to question my leader with respect to how he got it. If Mr. Currie wishes to do so that is his business, but it is not a government document that we are talking about when we refer to the report received by my leader.

Mr. McCann: You have contended all day that it was a government document.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of National Defence said today there was only one.

Mr. McCann: You have contended all day it was a government document. You said it was a government document.

Mr. Knowles: The first draft of a document which was later presented to the government.

Mr. McCann: You did not say that.

An hon. Member: Don't bother with that backbencher.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, getting back to the story of Mr. Sandys, when that question appeared on the order paper of the British House of Commons he was called into the office of the attorney general, corresponding to our Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and asked to disclose the source of his information. He refused. The attorney general of the United Kingdom government of that day—

Mr. Fleming: A Labour government?

Mr. Knowles: No, 1938.

Mr. Fleming: I thought you said 1948.

Mr. Knowles: The Chamberlain government, a Tory government, very much Tory. The attorney general of that day told Mr.

Sandys what the law was and that he was liable to a certain fine or to imprisonment for two years. Mr. Sandys said he would seek advice on the matter. Within a few days he was up on the floor of the British House of Commons raising a question of privilege over the fact that he had been interrogated in that way by the attorney general. I am sorry that time does not permit me to read what took place.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: The result was a very interesting procedural and constitutional debate in the mother of parliaments over the rights and privileges of members of parliament. A motion was moved by the then prime minister, the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, and such well-known figures as the Right Hon. Clement Attlee and the Right Hon. Winston Churchill took part in the debate. The remarks of Sinclair, Churchill, Attlee, Henderson and others—and I shall give the quotations the next time we come back to this matter—were all to the effect that the government had the legal right to take action against a member of parliament but in the name of the rights and the privileges of parliament it should not do so.

It was made crystal clear by men like Churchill, Attlee and others that if you told members of parliament that they would have to disclose their sources of information you would strike at one of the very springs of the whole democratic process. I invite hon. members to read that most interesting and important debate and then to compare what happened there with what is happening here. There in the mother of parliaments they respect the privileges and the freedom of individual members of parliament. They have an idea of the independence of members and they expect members of parliament to be free to serve their constituents and to do what they think is best for the well-being of the country. Not only was there this interesting debate on the floor of the house, but a motion was passed to set up a committee to go into the whole question. The committee made a report which is contained in a document from which I could also quote. Look at the difference.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask a question?

Mr. Knowles: No; next time. When I finish my speech I will be glad to answer a dozen questions from the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie). Note the difference, Mr. Speaker. Over there the whole concern is to protect the privileges and the freedoms of members. Here when a member like my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, receives information which he feels it is his duty to have brought before the House of Commons, he gets a letter—while he is in hospital—threatening the use of the R.C.M.P.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I believe I have another eight or ten minutes, Mr. Speaker, and I will reserve the conclusion of my remarks until I come back to the subject at the next opportunity. Before I close, however, perhaps I might indicate, so that you will have it, sir, and so that other members will know what it is, the terms of the amendment that I intend to move, and which is to be seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), at the conclusion of my remarks. The amendment will read as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:
> "and to give consideration to the desirability of recommending that Mr. Currie be asked to conduct a further inquiry into any other expenditures and commitments covered by the terms of this resolution."

On motion of Mr. Knowles the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow is private members' day. We will proceed according to standing order 15.

Mr. Fraser: The government will be glad of that.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Dear Mr. Currie:

Having returned over the week end from the meeting of the North Atlantic council, I take this opportunity of acknowledging personally the receipt of your report on investigation of army works services which was handed to Mr. C. M. Drury, deputy minister of national defence, on Monday, December 8, and which reached me in Paris on Sunday, December 14.

I find from Hansard for December 15 that Mr. Stanley Knowles, member of parliament for Winnipeg North Centre, stated in the House of Commons that he had been comparing some of the pages in your report which had been tabled in the house that morning with, and now I quote from Mr. Knowles, "the same pages in another printed copy of the report" which had been in the possession of his leader for a few days.

The Prime Minister and Mr. Campney inspected the document in Mr. Knowles' possession which bore the same date as your report and appeared to be the same in form and type as the report itself, though it was unsigned and had textual differences referred to by Mr. Knowles. This would lead one to believe that what Mr. Knowles had in his possession was a duplicate copy of the draft of your report dated November 26.

As you know, your representative on November 27 left with the deputy minister one copy of a draft of the report bearing the date November 26 and reproduced in the same manner and by the same process as the report itself, for the purpose of checking for errors of fact. The deputy minister had conversations with your representatives on December the 1st, and pointed out what he felt to be some errors of fact in the draft, and on Monday, December 8, when your representative delivered five signed copies of the report to the deputy minister of national defence, the deputy minister handed back the draft he had received on November 27.

I am informed by the deputy minister that to the best of his knowledge this was the only copy of the draft received by the Department of National Defence, and as it was returned to you, I would therefore conclude that the one in the possession of Mr. Knowles cannot have come from the department.

On December the 8th, five signed copies of your report were handed to the deputy minister, with a letter of transmittal dated December the 8th. The signed reports are dated November 26, though they contain some textual changes which would appear to have been made after December the 1st. What has been a source of some confusion is that the signed report submitted on December the 8th and the unsigned draft submitted to Mr. Drury and the unsigned document in the hands of Mr. Knowles are all dated November the 26th.

I am sure you were as surprised as I was to learn that this document should have got into the hands of Mr. Knowles, or his leader, before the signed report was delivered to the Department of National Defence, and I should be grateful if you would cause inquiry to be made and advise me how it happened that a draft of your proposed report came into the hands of anyone not authorized to receive it.

Yours sincerely,

The Honourable Brooke Claxton, D.C.M., Q.C., M.P.,
Minister of National Defence,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Minister,

On my return from New York this morning I am in receipt of your letter of the 22nd December relative to the situation therein referred to in connection with my report on the investigation of the army works services.

I had, of course, seen from Hansard and from press reports of proceedings in the house the mysterious developments in connection with some copy of the report invoked by Mr. Knowles as being in the possession of his leader.

At the moment, this whole situation is beyond comprehension, and I have been having and am continuing to have the fullest possible inquiry and investigation made at this end, with a view to getting to the bottom of it, if possible.

I shall advise you more fully at the earliest possible date.

Yours sincerely,

29th December 1952

The Honourable Brooke Claxton, D.C.M., Q.C., M.P.,
Minister of National Defence,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Minister,

With further reference to your letter of the 22nd December and my acknowledgment thereof dated 24th December, I now give you further particulars in regard to the print reproduction and submission of my report.

Some time prior to the completion of my report in the form to have it print reproduced, I asked my partner, Mr. Davey, to call upon the deputy minister of national defence and to tell him that I did not propose to show him a copy of my draft report. On the 5th November 1952 Mr. Davey called upon the deputy minister of national defence and told him that, notwithstanding our exchange of factual data from time to time for purposes of verification, I had no intention of submitting a draft of the report in final form prior to the actual signing and delivery of the report itself. Mr. Davey reported that the deputy minister agreed they should not see any draft report.

On the 19th November there was delivered to the printer in Montreal (later referred to) a typescript of my report for the purposes of print reproduction thereof. On the 25th November two print reproductions of my report were delivered by the printer to my office for checking and final consideration. Under the offset print reproduction process used by the printer, it is the practice to run off all copies required to complete the anticipated final full order, which in this case was one hundred copies. This he did, but only ten (10) copies were actually assembled as units, of which two (2) were delivered to my office as already stated, and the other eight (8) stayed with the printer and were at all times so kept and were there when the final prints (with all changes and/or additions) were required by me. If changes or additions are necessary, the pages involved are reproduced in their entirety. I had promised that the report would be delivered to you on or before 30th November, and, had not the delay occurred through sending a copy to Ottawa, I feel I would have been able to sign the report on the 26th November. This accounts for the final report being dated 26th November.

On the 26th November before the checking and final consideration had been completed by me here, Mr. Drury, the deputy minister, called on the telephone from Ottawa. During his telephone conversation with me, Mr. Drury mentioned the minister and went on to intimate to me that it seemed desirable that the final text of the intended report be submitted to him (before the report was actually signed and delivered) in order that purely factual matters dealt with in the report could be verified as to their accuracy. I gather that his reason for this was that in such connection there had been instances in the Mainguy report where purely factual matters of this nature had not been properly dealt with. While, during this conversation with Mr. Drury, I expressed some disinclination to follow such a course, the upshot was that it was understood that I would submit to him one of the two print reproduction copies above referred to but solely for the purpose of enabling verification of factual matters and data dealt with in the report as so formulated. I decided that I would ask my partner, Mr. Cleary, to personally deliver the said copy to the deputy minister. I called Mr. Cleary, who was in Ottawa, and described the situation to him. That afternoon I had one of the two print reproduction copies which I had received from the printer mailed to Mr. Cleary, who, on the following day, the 27th November, delivered it in person to the deputy minister.

The printer already referred to has been in business in Montreal for many years and enjoys a reputation of meticulous care in maintaining the confidential nature of his business. This I had ascertained from sources which I considered reliable, before entrusting the work to him. I have attended at his office and plant and have examined the manner in which he handles his business, and I cannot believe that the copy in the hands of unauthorized third parties could have been obtained from him.

I am most anxious that this matter should be cleared up as soon as possible. If I could have an opportunity of examining the copy referred to by Mr. Knowles as being in the possession of his leader, I feel there are certain characteristics peculiar to the first print reproduction copies received from the printer which would enable me to determine whether the copy in the possession of Mr. Knowles or his leader could, in fact, have emanated from that source. Failing being given an opportunity to examine this copy, I would welcome an investigation by some competent authority as to the origin of this mysterious copy.

Yours sincerely,
G. S. Currie.

Dear Mr. Currie,

Following the receipt of your letter of December 29, I made inquiries and found that Mr. Knowles was in Winnipeg. Accordingly, I am writing to him by air mail, but it may be a few days before I get a reply and I hope that in the meantime it may be possible for you to trace the means whereby a copy of the report reached Mr. Coldwell.

Questions which naturally arise are the following:

Am I correct in understanding from your letter that all the ten copies that were put together have been accounted for?

Have the other ninety copies also been accounted for?

Has the printer been able to satisfy you that no other copies were made?

Yours sincerely,
Brooke Claxton

Dear Mr. Knowles:

Following my return from the meeting of the North Atlantic council, I told Mr. Currie that the information given to me by the deputy minister of national defence made it seem impossible that the copy of the draft of Mr. Currie's report which was given to Mr. Coldwell could have come from this department. I asked Mr. Currie to explain how a copy of the draft could have been given to Mr. Coldwell.

In order to help trace this, Mr. Currie has now asked if he might see the copy of the draft held by you.

I would be glad if, to facilitate this inquiry, you could either let me have the draft for Mr. Currie or hand it to him direct, so that this check might be made and the draft returned to you.

The draft will, I assume, be available for production in parliament if that is required in connection with the work of the house or its committees.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Claxton:

Thank you for your letter of January 3, with reference to the copy of the draft of Mr. Currie's report which was delivered to Mr. Coldwell. I note your request in connection therewith, and I shall be glad to discuss the same with Mr. Coldwell. As you know, he is at present in hospital, so that unless I hear that he is discharged therefrom in the meantime I would prefer to wait until I return to Ottawa on January 12 before taking this matter up with him.

Trusting this will be satisfactory, I am,

Sincerely yours,

The Honourable Brooke Claxton, D.C.M., Q.C., M.P.
Minister of National Defence,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Minister,

I have your letter of the 2nd instant.

In reply to the specific questions which, as you say, naturally arise the answers which result from my detailed investigation here are as follows:

You are correct in understanding that all the ten copies that were put together have been accounted for.

As regards the further 90 unassembled prints of each page—to be used eventually to make up the 100 complete copies (as per order) I have ascertained as a result of detailed inquiries in the printer's establishment that it is impossible to account for an even 90 of such prints. The reason is that, as per the printer's usual practice, they make some over-run to allow for defects or spoilage in any of the pages or sheets of the order; and in the circumstances I have found it impossible to have them account for each so created sheet or page which might be put to make up a complete copy.

The observations above made cover your third question as to whether the printer has been able to satisfy me that no other copies were made.

As you are aware, my representatives had an opportunity yesterday afternoon of seeing in Ottawa the mysterious extra copy. Having regard to its physical attributes and characteristics there appears to be no doubt that this copy is one of the first offset prints made in the printer's shop here; and I have today so informed the printer. How it got from the printer's shop into the hands of unauthorized third parties is still a complete mystery.

Everything which I have done by way of inquiry and investigation negatives the possibility that the copy in question could have got out in any stage or step between the printer's shop and my own organization and the department; but I still, of course, welcome any further investigation which the department or any other authority may deem it expedient to make from any angle or direction.

Yours sincerely,
G. S. Currie

Dear Mr. Coldwell:

I have learned that Mr. Currie is satisfied that the copy of the draft of his report received by you is one of the offset prints made in the printing shop in Montreal.

Mr. Currie has made an investigation, at the conclusion of which it is still a mystery to him as to how the copy of the draft in question got into the hands of an unauthorized third party.

He writes me:

"Everything which I have done by way of inquiry and investigation negatives the possibility that the copy in question could have got out in any stage or step between the printer's shop and my own organization and the department; but I still, of course, welcome any further investigation which the department or any other authority may deem it expedient to make from any angle or direction."

The R.C.M.P. are being instructed accordingly. Before, however, they start, it would be of assistance if you could make available to me any information that you may have bearing on this.

It is greatly to be desired that as full information as possible be placed before the house when it meets next week and this is why I am writing you, although I understand that you are still in the hospital. If it would assist in any way, I would be only too glad to call on you or to have anyone else do so.

I hope you are having a speedy and complete recovery.

Yours sincerely,
Brooke Claxton

G. C. Currie, Esq.,
Aldred Building,

Montreal, P.Q.

Dear Mr. Currie:

I have been studying your report to me on the army works services with a view to ascertaining whether there has been negligence or incompetence of which I have been unaware and regarding which action should be taken.

Unfortunately, the report has not been of such assistance to me in this regard.

You say at page 17—"The carry forward of this war psychology must be coupled with inadequate training and resultant ignorance on the part of personnel of their administrative duties and responsibilities. There was, in addition, indifference and reluctance on the part of military personnel to concentrate on administration to the degree required... But if this spirit permeated the lower echelons of the army, it is more difficult to condone the same attitudes higher up. There, a higher degree both of intelligence and responsibility is essential. It was not always present in the degree required."

From what I have heard of the conduct of your investigation, and from the language of the report, I conclude that you were more concerned with assisting the army to rectify an undesirable situation than with attempting to fix responsibility, but your remarks quoted above are open to the possible interpretation that there came to your knowledge evidence of incompetence or irresponsibility on the part of particular senior officers or officials. In order to assist me in determining what action should be taken, I would be grateful if you would advise me whether you have any such evidence and if so if you would let me have it.

Yours sincerely,
Brooke Claxton

In your letter of January seven received yesterday you say that you would welcome any further investigation which the department or any other authority may deem it expedient to make from any angle or direction. As your letter indicates that the copy of the draft received by Mr. Coldwell is one of the first offset prints made for you in Montreal, you will no doubt wish to continue your own investigation of how a document belonging to you should have fallen into other hands. In view of the wide public concern and of the desirability of fixing responsibility I have asked that the R.C.M.P. should make their own investigation and report and I feel sure that you will give them every assistance.

My dear Colleague,

Confirming our conversation yesterday, I will be glad if you would have the R.C.M.P. investigate and report on the way in which a copy of the draft of the report by Mr. George S. Currie got into unauthorized hands.

I sent you yesterday copies of the correspondence with Mr. Currie, Mr. Knowles and Mr. Coldwell in this connection.

You will appreciate the desirability of having as much information on this as possible to give the house when the motion to set up the committee on defence expenditures comes before the house on Tuesday.

No doubt officers of the R.C.M.P. will begin their investigation by ascertaining the name of the printer and how the matter was handled from Mr. Currie and members of the staff.

Yours sincerely,

Hon. Brooke Claxton,

Dear Mr. Claxton:

Thank you for your letter of January 8 and for your kind words wishing me a speedy recovery.

I have been making satisfactory progress since my recent operation and expect to be out of the hospital very shortly. I regret, however, that I shall be unable to return to my regular duties for some time.

With regard to the copy of the Currie report in my possession, I cannot disclose the name of the person who gave me this report without betraying the confidence and trust he has seen fit to place in me.

I believe that I have the right, indeed, a duty, as a member of parliament, to place before the house a matter pertaining to the public interest. I think that you will agree with me that I could not have carried out this duty if I had felt obligated to reveal the identity of the person who handed me the report. Indeed, for me to divulge this information now would have the effect of deterring members of parliament in the future from bringing to the attention of the house matters in the public interest because they were not in a position to disclose the source of their information.

Yours sincerely,
M. J. Coldwell

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

INADVERTENT TABLING OF DRAFT LETTER

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege, during the debate yesterday I was asked to put on Hansard certain correspondence but I find that I did even more than I was asked to do. As the file had just been handed to me, through inadvertence I put on Hansard a draft of a letter addressed to Mr. Currie which had been prepared for my consideration.

Mr. Casselman: And marked "confidential".

Mr. Claxton: That was the way to mark it at that stage. It was neither signed nor sent. This appears in the righthand column of page 977 of Hansard for January 13, and I hope a correction will be made.

[Later:]

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the information which has been given to the house by the Minister of National Defence, and having regard to the fact that the letter to which he has referred has been placed on the record, I wonder if he would look at it and answer this question. Should not the word "such" in the second line of the second paragraph be "much"?

Mr. Claxton: The letter was never considered in such detail as that. It was offered to me, I said I did not agree with the idea, and that was the end of it.

Mr. Drew: The minister has misunderstood the nature of my question. I am not questioning the choice of words. I am suggesting that the word that appears here is not likely the word that appeared in the copy that was presented, that the word "much" seems to be the word that likely appeared there, and I am asking the minister if that is not correct.

Mr. Claxton: I do not see any advantage in editing here a letter that we never decided to send.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since this point has been raised, the letter is on record, and it at least is a clear indication of what the minister was thinking at the time and may be very helpful.

Mr. McIlraith: No, no.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: Oh, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting in this house for one moment that the minister writes a letter of this kind without thinking.

Mr. McIlraith: He did not write it. That is the point.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Therefore I have asked—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is nothing before the house at the present time except a statement by the Minister of National Defence that a certain letter appears in Hansard which he had not intended should appear.

Mr. Claxton: And which I did not write and did not dictate, and as soon as it was submitted to me I decided that the idea was not a good one. No consideration was given to the language whatever.

Mr. Drew: Then may I ask the minister how it is that his signature is reproduced in Hansard?

Mr. Claxton: I imagine that was added at some stage either by a clerk or a printer, but it was not signed.

Mr. Drew: Has the minister thought of conducting an inquiry as to who put the name there?

Mr. Fulton: Call in the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Graydon: Did the C.C.F. get that letter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we should proceed with the orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING NOTICES OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. Speaker: I feel I should inform the house that yesterday afternoon the chief of orders and notices received from the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) a notice of a motion of an amendment to the motion to set up the committee on defence expenditures. The amendment was handed to me and I can find no provision under our rules or practices whereby such a notice can appear either in the Votes and Proceedings or in the Orders of the Day. Accordingly I could not direct that the notice should appear. In fairness to the hon. member for Eglinton I felt that I should make this statement.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the statement you have made to the house. I think it is a matter of general interest to all members. From time to time you and your predecessor have made rulings rejecting amendments which have been offered in the house on the ground that they introduced new matter and could not be introduced without forty-eight hours' written notice. It was because of that ruling that I sought yesterday to give written notice of an amendment which I proposed to introduce to the government motion then under consideration in expectation that after the conclusion of the forty-eight hour period I would have the opportunity of moving the amendment.

The ruling that you have indicated means that under no circumstances when a government motion is under consideration can a private member, under the present rules of the house, give notice of an amendment. You have indicated it cannot go on private members' resolutions because it is an amendment to a motion under debate, and there is no provision for its going on the order paper under government notices of motions. Therefore at the present time, Mr. Speaker, while such amendments have been ruled out from time to time on the ground that the forty-eight hours' requisite notice had not been given, the rules of the house do not make any provision for giving that forty-eight hours' notice.

I thank you for bringing the matter to the attention of the house because I think it will be agreed that there is a gap in our procedure, and if the rules committee should be reappointed at the present session, as I hope it will, it might well give consideration to an amendment of the rules of the house to permit the giving of notice by a private member of an amendment of a government motion under such circumstances.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure you have satisfied yourself, Mr. Speaker, that there is no provision for such notices at the present time. It is the intention to move for the reconstitution of the committee on rules, and I quite agree with the hon. member that this is a matter which should receive their consideration.

[Mr. Speaker.]

LEVEL CROSSINGS

INVESTIGATION BY BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the house that the government has asked the board of transport commissioners to make a thorough investigation of the railway-highway crossing problem in Canada. For some time the government has been giving consideration to this problem which, because of expanding motor vehicle traffic and improved highways, has become one of national concern in respect of the present need for protection, safety and convenience of the public.

The railway grade crossing fund was established in 1909 under the Railway Act for the purpose of aiding in the actual construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public with respect to certain railway-highway crossings. From 1909 to March 31, 1952, a total of $13,327,000 was expended by the government of Canada through this fund. The annual amounts paid into the fund have varied from $200,000 in 1909 to $1 million at the present time. The act of 1909 provided for a contribution from the grade crossing fund of an amount not exceeding 20 per cent of the cost, with a maximum of $5,000 for any one crossing. The act of course was amended from time to time, and in 1950 provision was made for a contribution not exceeding 40 per cent of the cost where the total cost does not exceed $150,000 for any one crossing, and where the cost exceeds $150,000 a contribution not in excess of 40 per cent with a ceiling of $150,000. The contributions of other parties, such as railways, municipalities, counties and provincial governments, vary with each project as determined by the board after hearing applications for contributions from the grade crossing fund to eliminate or protect railway-highway crossings.

As I have just indicated, the Canadian government has made substantial contributions through the railway grade crossing fund towards the railway-highway level crossing problem. However, it may be that certain restrictions in the existing legislation, and the present basis of contributions by the railway companies, the provinces and the municipalities, tend to impede the improvement and elimination of many grade crossings. In the circumstances, therefore, the board of transport commissioners has been directed to undertake a thorough investigation into all phases of the railway-highway crossing problem. It is our earnest hope that their investigation, which will cover all ten provinces, will result in the submission of recommendations, the implementation of which will serve to effect a material reduction in the number of fatal accidents. I now wish to table order in council No. 52 which was passed this day.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE THE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY TO SWIFT CURRENT-MAPLE CREEK

Mr. Irvin Studer (Maple Creek) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 101, to amend the Representation Act, 1952.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Studer: Under the Representation Act, 1952, the entire constituency of Maple Creek was incorporated with a portion of the constituency of Swift Current and named Swift Current. The object of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to preserve the name of one of the first constituency units in Saskatchewan, and certainly the most historical, in the name of Maple Creek. Having the two names, Swift Current-Maple Creek, designating the largest settled and most important constituency in this country, will be a source of satisfaction and pride, not only to those living in that area but to all of the people in Canada and, incidentally, make the seat safe for democracy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PETAWAWA—SPUR LINE

Mr. Argue:

1. Did the Canadian National Railways own the spur line running into the ordnance depot at Petawawa that, according to the Currie report, was removed?
2. If not, to whom did it belong?
3. What was the value of the spur line?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer this and the next two questions orally.

The answer to the first part of the question is no; to the second, the Department of National Defence; and to the third, this spur had not been in use since shortly after the end of the war. The police estimated the value of the rails stolen and sold to Jacobson at approximately $505.50. Jacobson has since been convicted and is at present serving a penitentiary sentence.

CURRIE REPORT—CHILD'S ROCKING HORSE

Mr. Argue:

1. For whom was the child's rocking horse, referred to in the Currie report, constructed?
2. Who ordered its construction?

Mr. Claxton:

1. It was made in Toronto for the young son of Major-General C. Vokes, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O., C.D., who was then general officer commanding, central command.

2. A private soldier at General Vokes' headquarters, on his own initiative, constructed it as a Christmas present for the general's child. The workmanship was rough and the soft wood and nails used in it were obtained from the engineer works detachment. The hairs for the tail were obtained from—

An hon. Member: The horses.

Mr. Claxton: —a civilian milkman.

An hon. Member: Horses carry "tales".

Mr. Claxton: The saddle was made from a sheepskin lining of an old coat of Mrs. Vokes. The scrap iron used in constructing the foot rests was obtained from a local hardware store. When it came to the notice of General Vokes that some public property had been used without his knowledge, he had the value of the materials assessed by the engineers. The assessed value of $9.50 he paid to the Receiver General.

Mr. Argue: Might I ask a supplementary question of the minister? What was the date of the payment made by General Vokes to the Receiver General?

Mr. Claxton: I will be glad to look that up, Mr. Speaker.

PETAWAWA CAMP—SCRAP IRON

Mr. Argue:

Of the some 550 tons shipped out of Petawawa camp as scrap iron, approximately how many tons were composed of serviceable material such as kitchen ranges, cannon heaters, shower stalls, sinks, and the like?

Mr. Claxton: Of the figure of 550 tons, given by Mr. Currie in his report, 45 tons were quite legally sold as scrap. Regarding the remainder, material of this character had been mostly collected from demolished huts and had already deteriorated to the point where it was no longer serviceable. It was intended to examine it to see if any of it might be renovated and made serviceable, and what should be disposed of as scrap.

This material was illegally added to the scrap being sold under contract and came into the hands of the firms of Jacobson and the Pembroke Salvage Company, which was associated in these contracts with the Jacobson firm. Jacobson, Young, and Baldock were prosecuted for offences, including that of taking this material illegally, and were sentenced to two years. Most of the material has been recovered.

PENSIONS

DISABLED PERSONS—CO-OPERATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of co-operating with the provincial governments for the purpose of providing pensions, equal to old age pensions, for all those who are incapacitated and unable to earn their living, regardless of age.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I deal with the resolution I would like to welcome back to the house the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). We would like to tell him, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), that we think they have been doing a creditable job at the United Nations. We just hope they will be long spared.

Looking at the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare, he is more like what he was when he came into this house—he has reduced considerably. Whether or not it is from sweating up in the committee, if he keeps on he will have a splendid opportunity of trying out for our big event in the spring.

Mr. Fulton: Is that the election?

Mr. McIvor: This resolution will be supported by my hon. friend the member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) who has another resolution on the order paper similar to this. This is not the first time that I have brought this matter up in the house, but I hope it will be the last time that it will be needed. I am not going to speak long because I want it to go to a vote so that the house will know, and the government will know, that the people from coast to coast are interested in this matter. It is the most important resolution that will be brought before this house this year, because of its extent and because of the outstanding need.

I have received a great many letters which I am not going to read, because hon. members know the need just as well as I do. I have received long articles and a great deal of information from the trades and labour council of Fort William, as well as from others. I congratulate the government of Ontario upon going along the line of social security which we on this side of the house are following. We commend them heartily for passing legislation granting pensions to those who are incapacitated. Not only that, but I know there are cases where the help has really come from the province of Ontario and therefore, from one province at least, we shall receive wholehearted support on this question.

I might divide these cases into three classes. The first class of those who are incapacitated might be those who are not able to work and earn a livelihood like the ordinary individual, but who can get around by means of a wheelchair. The second class would be those who cannot get around in a wheelchair or by any other means but who, when placed at a desk or a table, can use their hands, their speech or their head to earn something. They cannot earn a great deal because there is a limit to the amount of goods which they produce that friends and other individuals can purchase. The third class, Mr. Speaker, with which I am most concerned are those who can neither get around nor earn a dollar. To me those individuals need to be fed and clothed; they need to have medical attention and nurses. They are just like newborn babies, the most helpless things in the world. I say, therefore, that the government of Canada should certainly take care of these people. Hon. members can see that this is a very important resolution. I am going to try to cut down my speech so that we can get a vote.

You have all seen the wheelchair brigade. We would not like to be there, and because we are not there we should be willing to help them. These people are more needy than old age pensioners; they are more needy than many of the blind, and more in need of help than those who get relief through unemployment insurance. I have wholeheartedly supported all these things in the house, but I will not support any other social security measure until there is provision made for these people. I include health insurance in that, for which I worked so hard for two years on the committee. This measure is needed more than health insurance for Canada. Some people think that these are the forgotten people, but they are not. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) last year informed me that there was a committee of the Department of Labour, national health and national defence, who are working with representatives in the different provinces to find a way of taking care of these people as well as the incapacitated veterans.

I realize that if the measure is adopted it will mean more taxes. I expect even the members of the opposition, who think we are so highly taxed, to support this resolution because I believe they are human and they recognize the needs of these people. I would just interject here that Canadians pay lower taxes than the people of the United States, Great Britain, New Zealand or Australia. When I visit some of these people I realize that one cannot help them merely by giving them something of one's own. It is a job for the Dominion of Canada. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is in his seat today because he wants to support this motion. He wants to let us have the benefit of his judgment. He is going to show us his warmheartedness by not allowing this motion to be talked out. I should like to speak for an hour, but my common sense and better judgment tell me that I should allow others to have their say. Thank you for your consideration.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): This resolution we are discussing today, Mr. Speaker, has been before this house on many occasions. I remember speaking on the matter and supporting it on at least two or three occasions. I assure the hon. member who introduced the resolution that I am not going to talk for any great length of time. I want to see the motion voted upon, and I want to hear the minister make a declaration on the matter.

The resolution, as introduced by the hon. member today, is extremely broad, but the intention of it is to provide people who are disabled and unable to earn their own living with a pension. The phrase used in the resolution is:

—who are incapacitated and unable to earn their living, regardless of age.

This phrase is open to some criticism, but I am going to regard the resolution as favouring the principle of providing pensions to people who are unable to earn their own livelihood or who cannot be rehabilitated. These people are classed as totally and permanently disabled. Under these conditions, I am going to favour the resolution, and I think that the introduction of legislation along these lines will be a real advance and extension of our social security. It would fill a very serious gap. Public assistance is given to these individuals, and I will cite some forms this assistance takes. It takes the form of pensions under existing legislation. First in this class, I would put the veterans legislation. Secondly, I would place benefits under mothers' allowance; then workmen's compensation and care in institutions for those who are chronically ill; homes for the aged; and hospitals, especially those hospitals for incurables. Lastly, there is the matter of direct relief from municipalities.

It is unfortunate that in Canada there is a grave lack of institutions of this character, especially of institutions for those who are chronically ill or incapacitated or even those who are classed as incurables. Very often people who are in this class are unable to procure any type of accommodation. Any person who has had any experience in trying to place a person who is incapacitated or totally disabled in some form of institution will understand that there is great difficulty in obtaining accommodation.

There is grave difficulty in obtaining an institution which is qualified and which can provide that type of accommodation. I am constantly receiving letters with regard to the matter which has been raised by the hon. member today in his resolution; and I am sure that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) also receives such letters. These letters usually take the same form. They inquire about the possibility of a pension for some member of the family who is disabled. I receive letters from parents who unfortunately have an invalid in their family, where the parents are becoming old and are worried about what will happen to the invalid when they pass out of this world. One can understand anxiety of this type when the parents, owing to the age they have attained, look forward to the future and wonder what is going to become of a son or daughter who is disabled and unable to earn a living. I have had personal experience in trying to place some of these people and I assure the house that, while the number of these cases is not large, there is still that difficulty in obtaining accommodation.

This brings us back again to the question of either hospitals for those who are chronically ill or hospitals where completely disabled people may receive some measure of care. I am proud that my native province of Ontario was the first of the provinces in Canada to introduce legislation of the type suggested by the hon. member in his resolution; and although legislation of this type has been in force for only a short time in Ontario, the benefits are becoming apparent and have been received as a blessing by those who are entitled to them.

When a measure such as that suggested by the hon. member is introduced consideration must be given to persons who are a burden not only to themselves but to their families and often to the community. Without financial assistance these people face a serious problem, and the financial burden is probably greater than the husband, the wife, the parents or the relatives can bear, and perhaps the community cannot give adequate financial help. Legislation of the type proposed in the resolution would alleviate these conditions, and the disabled person would have a measure of independence and would be able to pay his own way.

There will, of course, be certain limits with regard to incapacity and inability to earn a living, and these limitations will have to be defined. The definition of words like "incapacity" and "disabled" will involve some measure of difficulty, but a clear definition can be found if we study what has happened in the United States. In 32 states legislation of this type has been passed; but in those states rehabilitative or restorative treatment has not always been considered as part of the program. We are aware that at present a rehabilitative program is receiving some study in this country and we can consider the resolution as affecting those who have never participated in the labour forces.

Let me give some of the definitions of some of the states with regard to disability and incapacity. I will take first the state of Illinois in which the following definition has been approved:

> An individual has a permanent disability when he has a physical or mental impairment, (1) irreversible or (2) progressive and not amenable to treatment, or (3) requires treatment which is extremely hazardous or of questionable benefit. The disability is considered total when it constitutes a complete handicap in relation to useful occupations within the individual's competence.

Then as to the state of Utah, I quote from their definition of permanently and totally disabled:

> That the individual has some physical or mental impairment, disease or loss that substantially precludes him from engaging in useful occupations within his competence, such as holding a job or homemaking.

These are definitions that we shall have to study when we prepare for this type of legislation. Let me read the definition given by the state of Wisconsin:

> A totally and permanently disabled person is a person found by medical authority to be so totally and permanently disabled physically as to require constant and continuous care.

That sounds like a really good definition. The state of Michigan grants aid to disabled persons under the following definition:

> A disabled person is one who has a physical or mental impairment which cannot be corrected within the foreseeable future and who by reason of such impairment is unable, without help of any person, to carry on the minimum of activity essential to daily living as determined by the state social welfare commission.

The state of Vermont defines a disabled person as follows:

> Crippled persons have been legally defined as persons crippled by the loss of limbs which prevents them from performing the necessary work to earn their maintenance when such crippled condition is due to the impairment or loss of function of motor or muscular activity due to disease or injury affecting muscles, joints or nerves.

It will be noted that there is a wide variation in the definitions of what comprises a totally disabled and incapacitated person, as witness the different definitions in the 32 states in the United States where legislation of this type has been introduced. But in all of those states it will be noted that they have restrictive definitions and generally do not consider restorative or rehabilitative treatment as part of their program. It is extremely difficult to estimate the number requiring such assistance. The rates in Canada for disability and invalidity could not be considered accurate when estimating the number of cases. One must take into account the number of cases receiving assistance under such conditions as workmen's compensation or veterans' allowances.

Mr. McCann: May I ask a question?

Mr. Blair: Yes.

Mr. McCann: Has the hon. member the Ontario definition?

Mr. Blair: The Ontario definition is "totally and permanently disabled."

Mr. McCann: But what is the explanation of "totally and permanently disabled"?

Mr. Blair: A person is totally and permanently disabled—I am not quoting now but this is my interpretation—if there is not hope of recovery or if the disability is such as to preclude them from ever engaging in any form of gainful employment. That would be my definition. I have not inquired into the two words that are used, but those two words come into the Ontario act, and that has been my interpretation.

I was saying that as to workmen's compensation and veterans' allowances the number of persons who are benefiting under such forms of care would also have to be considered. The government of Australia has an insurance plan for invalidity, and the incidence in that country is 9 per thousand of population. I have not the incidence in the province of Ontario, for which the minister might ask, but the incidence in Australia under present conditions is 9 per thousand population. That might be a higher rate than we have in Ontario because there may be some difference with regard to social security legislation already in existence in Ontario as compared with that in Australia. Also Australia may have a higher rate than the province of Ontario on account of the number of people who receive care in hospitals and institutions. But when this plan was first started in Australia—and I think that was in the year 1910—the eligibility requirements were extremely generous and the number of recipients was estimated at the beginning of the plan to be two or three persons per thousand population. The program at present is wide in its scope and they have also had the experience of having an act that has been in force since 1910. The act in Australia is much wider in the coverage of cases than is the plan in existence in Ontario at the present time. However, there is this difference to be noted, as I said before. There may be in existence certain types of legislation of the nature that I have suggested, like workmen's compensation and mothers' allowances which exist in Ontario, but which do not exist in Australia.

It would be rather difficult at the present time to obtain statistics from Great Britain regarding the coverage of cases, because it might be bound up with the national health plan which does exist in England. The program of aid to the disabled came into existence in the United States in October, 1950. In that country the federal government and the states share the cost 50 per cent each.

We could also give consideration to meeting the needs of disabled persons who reside with their families or with their relatives, and for whom the relatives provide care and maintenance. In some of these cases there is no doubt that the family is financially able to maintain the disabled person, but there are other cases where it places a severe strain upon the family and upon the financial reserves of either the relatives or the family. In these cases, if a disabled allowance were granted it would assist the disabled person to pay his own way, and it would allow him to retain his independence. In most of the cases of disability under consideration these people require constant and continuous care. It is not necessary that these people be placed in hospitals, because the acute phase of the disease, or the accident which has caused the disability, is passed. The patient may be cared for in his own home, and thus save expense to the relatives who cannot meet the expense of maintaining a case in the hospital.

There is no doubt that many of these cases are still remaining in some of the hospitals because the relatives have not had the money to meet the expense of maintaining them in their home. I point out that the maintenance in a home of a person who is physically disabled creates a problem, owing to the lack of facilities for nursing care and of the expenses involved.

There are certain physical disabilities which are caused by, or included in, some of the following diseases or injuries. I suggest some of these cases to the house for the purpose of clarifying the situation and to point out the need of these cases for special care. Hon. members will recognize, from the list that I am going to give, the urgent necessity of dealing with some of these things. I place in the first class various forms of paralysis, probably acquired in childhood, such as poliomyelitis or infantile paralysis and spastic conditions. I place also in this list diseases like cancer, injuries to the spine, probably by accident and not covered by workmen's compensation or insurance, or they may have been born with some of these disabilities. Arthritis is a crippling disease. At the present time I think of one case which I saw the other day, which would come into this class, and which I think a pension would benefit greatly. Then there are various forms of amputations. Some of these can be rehabilitated. Then there are severe types of heart disease. Oftentimes the patient has no money and is unable to care for himself. It is a chronic condition and a pension would help these people a great deal. There are certain classes of epileptics, although there are epileptics who are taking their place in industry with guarded machinery, and are really doing a good job. There are others who are unable to earn their livelihood. I list these disabilities and I give the house these examples. I again emphasize the fact that many of these disabilities require almost constant care. A pension would meet the needs of a person who is disabled and it would be a great help to the family or to other people who have had to assume the care of these disabled persons. Municipalities give direct relief, but even this form of care cannot be considered satisfactory.

In previous debates on this resolution, or a similar one, in this house I have never heard a dissenting voice. Physically and mentally handicapped patients should receive care. That has been recognized by the house in all previous debates. It will be an advance in the field of social security, and I think people generally will recognize it as a necessary act. I have always felt that people who are disabled, such as those we have been speaking about and who have not had the benefit of good health, who may be physically handicapped and unable to maintain themselves, should be placed in the welfare group. When the Old Age Security Act was passed we recognized the needs of our aged people. It is possible that some of these people have never been and are not now physically handicapped. There is a great gap in our social security program and especially for those people who are handicapped, who will never be able to work and who have no hope for the future as far as a cure of their disability is concerned. I plead with the government that, since this resolution is before the house once again, we close this gap and that physically and mentally handicapped people be given an opportunity for better care.

This resolution has always met with the approval of the house on previous occasions. I have never heard one hon. member dissent from it and say that he was not in favour of it, but invariably it has been talked out. We should have a statement from the minister today telling us where he stands on this matter, and whether he is prepared to give these deserving people a pension and to take them into the welfare group.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I want to support this resolution. I cannot discuss it from a legal point of view nor from the medical point of view. I can discuss it only as a dirt farmer. I know it would be a tremendous benefit to many people in this country who are unable to earn their own living. On many occasions we have had representations from different organizations who have spoken for people who were unable to earn their own livelihood. We know of men and women who have had children who have never grown up. They have been a drain on their parents during the whole of their lives. When the old folks get up in years their greatest concern is, what is going to happen to their offspring who have not been able to look after themselves. As I understand this resolution, it would take care of these poor people.

Then we have a group of people between the ages of fifty and sixty-five—mostly women, I think—who, when they reach that age, are worn out and are unable to provide for themselves. This resolution would take them in and do something for them. I know a lady in my constituency who has worked all the days of her life scrubbing floors in a large hotel, and doing that kind of work. During that time she has paid into the unemployment insurance fund. When she reached the age of fifty she was not able to get down on her knees to scrub floors. She applied for unemployment insurance. They said: "Well, have you lost your job?" She said, "No, I have not lost my job but I was sick and unable to work." They said, "We cannot do anything for you." I think this resolution would take care of people like that. It would provide them with something for a rainy day. I would hope that what would be paid would be not less than what an old age pensioner gets.

Then the question always comes up: Can we afford it? This government and previous governments have always found the money for anything worth while. I do not think there will be any trouble about that. If you explain to the people what a tax is for, if it is something legitimate and really needed you will have their support. So we would have no trouble getting taxes to pay for it.

The resolution deals to some extent with the federal and provincial governments. I hope that there will be no passing of the buck as there has been in other cases. When the act or the amendment to the act is brought in I hope that there will be no room for any misunderstanding and that these people will get this as of right.

I do not want to take up any more time this afternoon except to say that I am sure the rest of my group are behind me in supporting this resolution. I hope the minister will make a statement and tell us just how far he is prepared to go in making this resolution a reality, and that we can have a vote on it to see what is the view of the house. In my years here I have never found anyone who was against a resolution of this kind.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I consider this resolution to be one of extreme importance. We welcome an opportunity of again expressing our views. On previous occasions we have sponsored similar resolutions and have brought forward the matter time and time again during debate. I repeat, we welcome this opportunity of offering our unanimous support.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) is to be commended for having sponsored the resolution. Because he is an esteemed and conscientious member of this house, because he is a Liberal member of this house, we trust that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) already has sent word forth among Liberal members to give this resolution their unqualified support.

I well recall that when we served on the old age security committee in 1950 this matter kept coming forward time and time again. While we were not authorized under the terms of reference to deal specifically with the handicapped, we found it virtually impossible to keep a consideration of these persons out of the committee. I am quite confident that when we submitted our findings to this house we had them in mind. I should like to refer to finding No. 9, reported on page 101 of the report of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on old age security. Speaking of premature ageing and invalidity the committee asserted:

> The reverse of the problem of retaining older workers in the labour market is that presented by the prematurely aged and invalids who are obliged to retire from employment before their normal time. The committee has been deeply impressed by the evidence presented as to the position in which invalids and incurables find themselves at present. It has also received representations from organizations representing the blind, and blindness is, of course, part of the total problem of invalidity. The committee has felt, however, that the terms of reference established for it ruled out the possibility of a detailed examination of this problem as it applies to the younger age group.

Finding No. 23 is reported on page 103 of the report. This is headed "Other Claims to Priority" and reads:

> Finally, in its study of the old age security systems in effect in other countries, and in its consideration of the evidence presented by representative Canadian organizations and individuals, the committee has had to keep constantly in mind the place of old age in an over-all social security program. While the terms of reference of the committee have limited its study to the specific field of old age security, it has not felt it advisable to overlook the fact that there are other areas of social need in which governments, both provincial and federal, may be called upon to take in the future a substantial measure of responsibility.

I repeat that time and time again during the deliberations of that committee we heard from members representing all parties in the committee that the time had come when something specific and concrete should be done for persons who are incapacitated and as a consequence unable to provide for themselves.

The national advisory committee on the rehabilitation of the disabled estimates that there are approximately 150,000 people in Canada of working age who are victims of accident and disabling illnesses, including mental illnesses and so forth, and who are in dire need of support. I am not unmindful of the fact that some action has been taken toward providing rehabilitation services. Possibly I could go so far as to say that considerable action has been taken with respect to that one aspect of the problem. In looking over the report of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951, I notice that reference is made to the fact that during the course of the year activities in the field of rehabilitation were directed primarily towards preparations for the national conference on the rehabilitation of disabled persons which took place in Toronto during the first three days of February, 1951. Let us not forget that that is almost two years ago. It states here that the conference was scheduled originally to take place during May in the previous year but was postponed for certain very good reasons.

I notice in the report that the conference, which carried on its deliberations through two working committees, one dealing with vocational guidance, training and placement of handicapped persons and the other with the medical aspects of rehabilitation, approved a large number of resolutions. It recommended that the federal government appoint a full-time co-ordinator of rehabilitation activities in Canada and that a national advisory committee be established to co-ordinate the work of rehabilitation planning.

I noted when examining a recent issue of the Labour Gazette that reference was made to this problem of rehabilitation. On page 1566 of the December, 1952, issue of the Labour Gazette, under the heading "National Plan for Rehabilitation of Civilian Handicapped being Drafted", it is stated that the national advisory committee would hold another meeting in September of 1952. I was deeply interested in the reported comments of some of those who are members of the national advisory committee. Dr. G. Fred McNally, who is chairman of the committee, stated that the period of broad examination of the problem was over. Once again I should like to emphasize that he said that the period of broad examination was over and that the time had come for positive action on specific objectives. To quote his exact words, he said:

> The committee must live up to the expectations of thousands of Canadians, physically handicapped and unable to work, who look hopefully to it for efforts which will ultimately help them to a full, useful and productive life.

I also notice that Mr. Ian Campbell, national co-ordinator of rehabilitation, said, speaking of his trips to various provinces of Canada:

> Wherever I went people, working with the handicapped, appeared to be encouraged by the fact that we now have a national headquarters for rehabilitation, and that the government of Canada has taken action in this field.

I stated earlier that I wanted to emphasize the fact that I fully realized that work, effective work I believe, has been going on for two years in the field of rehabilitation. Before I leave this point may I add that Mr. Campbell, in speaking of the objectives, asserted:

> —money is not spent on the rehabilitation of the handicapped. It is invested in their future.

I think that is absolutely correct. He says:

> Who can doubt the wisdom of a program that makes the dependent independent, makes the non-producer a producer and makes consumers of wealth creators of wealth?

I stated that was my last reference but I find that I desire to make one more. I wish to refer to three resolutions adopted by the committee last September. Here is the first one:

> A broadening of the Canadian vocational training scheme so that handicapped persons may obtain academic and pre-vocational training needed for specific employment.

I am going to inquire of the minister exactly what action has been taken up to the present time with respect to these resolutions. The first one to which I have made reference has to do with a broadening of the Canadian vocational training scheme so that handicapped persons may obtain the academic and pre-vocational training needed for specific employment. I should like to know what has been done. After all, these recommendations were made last September. Here is the second one:

> Organization of the rehabilitation program at the provincial level but with federal grants for such aspects as medical care, training and placement.

[Mr. Shaw.]

We are vitally concerned about this matter and I think the minister should indicate to us whether anything has been done with respect to that resolution. In the third place they made the following recommendation:

> A "pilot" survey on the physically handicapped now registered for work with the national employment service in Montreal.

Possibly the minister could indicate in the course of his observations whether that survey has been made or is under way. If it has been completed, then I believe the results should be made known to us. I certainly desire to commend the national advisory committee for the work which I know they have done in this field. I also wish to commend the Department of National Health and Welfare and the minister and his officers for what has been done in this respect. I hope that the minister is able to report progress in keeping with the spirit which I am told prevailed throughout the meetings of the national advisory committee.

That deals with one aspect of the problem only, the rehabilitation of those who are capable of rehabilitation, but it does not solve the whole problem by any stretch of the imagination. I stated a moment ago that, according to the advisory committee, there are 150,000 people of working age in Canada who are, using the broad general term, incapacitated. Let us not delude ourselves into believing that, because the report speaks of them as being of working age, they are capable of working. I do not know what percentage of this group would be incapable of working. Only a comprehensive survey would provide that answer.

I should also like to know if any information has been procured with respect to the number of persons who may be incapacitated but who cannot be included within that group of working age, which I presume may be from 16 to 60 years of age. We have that other group of wholly incapacitated persons. I am not so concerned about the difficulty, if there is one, in ascertaining the degree of incapacitation because I know that so far as veterans are concerned under the Pension Act there is a medical board with a competent medical staff, and they are presumed to be in a position to ascertain whether a man is suffering from a 10 per cent disability or 100 per cent disability. I cannot see why a similar committee, board, or whatever you want to call it, staffed with competent medical men, cannot do just as competent a job with respect to our incapacitated people.

I realize that certain incapacitated persons have been taken care of. I realize fully that when the old age security measure was introduced we brought into that group certain incapacitated persons. I realize that we brought a great many incapacitated persons into the Old Age Assistance Act. As indicated by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), I realize fully that in some instances widows' pensions are provided under mothers' allowances acts and that under other measures we have taken care of a number of them. However, I have to take issue mildly with him so far as taking care of them under unemployment insurance is concerned, because my understanding is that once you become physically incapacitated you can qualify for no benefits whatsoever. I think that was just a slip on the part of the hon. member for Lanark.

We feel that at this particular time, Mr. Speaker, two years after the national advisory committee had its first meeting, and possibly many years after the Department of National Health and Welfare began to look into this matter, we should have a fairly comprehensive and up-to-date report from the minister during the discussion of this resolution. We have in Canada an association of incurables. I want to pay my tribute to the executive members of that association, and particularly to Miss Eva Warden, who took the initiative in organizing these persons into an association. To those of us who saw them here a couple of years ago, most of them in wheelchairs, it was a pathetic sight. They were not asking for charity. They were asking for a place in our general field of social welfare. They were asking for an opportunity for those possessed of any physical or mental ability to be able to engage in productive enterprises.

I realize fully the importance of that field, but in discussing the matter with them I have also come to realize that they recognize that there is one very serious problem that must be taken care of right now, the problem of those who are wholly incapacitated. I know that representatives of the association of incurables have met the minister. They have indicated to me that he has always given them a very courteous reception but their efforts have not always culminated in the end result for which they were hoping. However, I think he gave them courage and hope. Of course the minister is capable of doing that without too much effort. Nevertheless I still have a good deal of confidence that it will not be too long before their wishes will be fully realized. I do not know whether or not they have seen the minister recently. If not, conceivably they have arranged to see him. I have the idea that they probably will. I have before me their resolution, which I shall not read, but it indicates clearly and definitely that they feel that pensions are a most necessary part of whatever general program is adopted to take care of the problem of the incurable.

I am going to take my lead from the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I realize fully that one could talk on and on with respect to a matter of this kind, but let me conclude with this one observation, that, while I know that we should soon be giving consideration to certain amendments to the Old Age Security Act, the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act, I am conscientiously of the opinion that before we do more in those particular fields—where we have at least done something for those people—we should do something for those incurables. That is particularly so for those who are incapable of earning a living.

Now, I do not want that statement to be misconstrued. I am not wholly satisfied with all aspects of our old age security program or our old age assistance program, but I do feel that if we are going to move forward at all with respect to social welfare we should move in this direction and make some provision for these people—so that we can thus bring into their lives some ray of hope. They have waited a long time. They have been patient—and I think the minister will confirm that statement. While I did not sit in on any of their conferences with him, I dare say they were modest in the form of their presentations before him. I trust that before too long they will be able to say that the minister in the past has demonstrated his concern and brought results in other fields of social welfare and has now done the same thing for them.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I agree completely with the principle expressed in this resolution, which is to pay a $40 a month pension to all people who, through disability, are no longer able to earn their own living. After all, it is exactly the same principle as that embodied in the Old Age Security Act, which assumes that when a person reaches the age of 70 they are no longer able to earn their own living and are, therefore, entitled to a pension.

Now, if a person has a disability which cannot be cured, and if that incurable disability is such that the person cannot be taught a trade which will enable him to continue to earn his own living and provide for his family, then I firmly believe that person should be assisted by the government in the form of a pension.

However, I believe that the very first thing to do is to try to cure that disability, and, failing that, to try to teach that person a trade. This will require a well planned and well carried out rehabilitation program, both physical and occupational.

Now, an example of a physical rehabilitation case is that of a man who is only suited to do heavy manual work and who develops a bad hernia. If the hernia is not cured, the man is prevented from continuing to earn his living, and he simply has to remain in idleness. However, if it is made possible for that man to have an operation for that hernia and it can be cured, he can continue to earn his own living.

An example of an occupational rehabilitation case is where a man loses his sight. In a great many cases that man can be taught to handle his old job by the use of guards and aids supplied to him by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. If that is impossible owing to the nature of his old job, then the great likelihood is that he can be taught a new trade. That sort of thing is going on all the time where opportunities are provided for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind to step in and carry out their very excellent work.

Those are only two examples of what can be done to make it possible for those who have become incapacitated, by accident or disease, to continue to earn their own living. I am firmly convinced that no worth-while person wants charity or to continue in idleness. What they do want is to be able to continue to earn their own living and to retain their independence. I believe that a well planned and well executed rehabilitation program, worked out in co-operation with the provinces, will, in the great majority of cases, make this a reality.

It is well known to all of us that at the end of the last war a very great number of disabled veterans were either taught a new trade or taught how to continue with their old trade despite their disability. I believe that if this same kind of program is carried on on the same kind of scale throughout Canada, a great many more people in industry would be able to continue to earn their own living than is today the case.

I believe it is the responsibility of the federal government to work out with the provinces such a rehabilitation program, and I very much hope that the rehabilitation committee, which has been in operation now for a year, is steadily working toward that end. Like the member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), I am looking forward very much to hearing a report from the minister today on the progress of that committee.

I believe that a rehabilitation program such as I have outlined would ensure that all disabled persons would have the right, which I believe should be the right of every citizen of this country, to have the opportunity to cure their disability and, failing that, to learn a trade by which they can continue to earn their own living and remain independent. In cases where that is absolutely impossible, I believe that the government should pay those people a disability pension equal to the old age pension.

As the member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) pointed out this afternoon, the Ontario government has given a very good lead in matters of that kind. Since the first of January of last year, they have been paying a disability pension of $40 a month to disabled people. This has provided very much needed relief to a large number of disabled people, and I believe that is the kind of thing we should aim at here in this parliament. I believe that the federal government should co-operate with the provinces and make this kind of pension available to all permanently disabled Canadians.

I earnestly urge the minister to see that steps are taken to make this a reality at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to congratulate the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) on bringing in this resolution. We have both worked towards bringing in a resolution of this kind for some considerable time. I believe the last time I spoke on a resolution similar to this was on March 7 last. I also spoke about this in the year before.

I would like to have the resolution which I have on the order paper coupled with this resolution, Mr. Speaker, so that it will save the time of the house. My resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into early consideration the advisability of including in their social security program the payment of pensions or maintenance allowances, equal and similar to blind pensions, for the unfortunate crippled people of Canada.

If these two resolutions are coupled I am sure they will be considered by the government. Whatever decision the government makes will be influenced by the way in which the parties of this house agree to such legislation.

In this day and age, when there are pensions for people who are not nearly as deserving as these unfortunates, I think the time has come when we will have to do something. Having been nearer to the people than I am here in the House of Commons, having been the reeve of a municipality for some ten years, I have had the opportunity of going into many homes where people were not able to earn a dollar for themselves. I certainly realize the stresses and strains which can be put on families who have to depend on the allowance given out by rural municipalities. The municipalities have to depend for their revenue on land taxes, and in these times the municipalities are finding it very difficult to obtain additional revenue for things of this kind.

I represent seven different municipalities in the constituency of Springfield, and there are approximately five of these cases in every municipality. Since there are about 175 municipalities in Manitoba, this would mean that some 875 people would be benefited by such legislation. The municipalities would benefit also in not being charged for this relief. There is no doubt but that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has gone a very long way in bringing help to many people in Canada, but I believe this is also a problem which the dominion should handle. It is something that should be thoroughly considered. The dominion government takes full responsibility for the returned soldiers, and I am sure that when this problem is thoroughly considered it will be found that these unfortunate people should not be the care of the province but should be the responsibility of the dominion.

We are asked where the money will come from. A few years ago people thought that the introduction of family allowances would break the country. Since that time it has been found that these allowances stimulate buying power. I believe that money for this purpose can be found in the same way as it was found for family allowances. If cheques were issued to these needy people by the dominion government, it would create buying power for others who have the capacity to produce.

Like the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), I do not wish to speak at length on this matter. I want to see this motion come to a vote. I hope the other members in the house will see fit to terminate their speeches before six o'clock so that a vote can be taken.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I am not going to speak at any length either, Mr. Speaker. I believe most of the members of this house who have had any experience in the municipalities realize the necessity for the legislation proposed in this resolution. The resolution asks for a pension for incapacitated people, and I am not going to couple the question of rehabilitation of the handicapped with it because I think that is a separate problem. I am glad the resolution has been moved by a government member. I believe the last time it was before the house it was moved by a government member. Apparently they have done some thinking about it in the last few years; at least they should have. I am disappointed in the fact that nothing has been done other than think about it. There has been no legislation, and no indication of legislation.

So far as the minister is concerned, I am reasonably sure of his opinion on this matter. I am sure also that he has not been able to persuade the treasury board, or something like this would have been provided along with old age security. This particular type of legislation, Mr. Speaker, would fill in the gaps in our social security program. There is a very wide gap there, and perhaps the most pathetic sight in our country is the people who would benefit by this legislation. In my own riding I have about 84,000 people. The constituency covers an area of about 14 miles, and when I am at home I sit in the middle of it. I see a great many people who would come within the provisions of such legislation as is proposed here. It is a sad sight, and it is difficult to have to tell most of these people, when they come to talk to you about their problem, that the only relief provided is by the municipality.

I am thinking particularly at this time of the women in the age group 50 to 65. There is a fifteen-year gap there. I am thinking of the women who raised families and contributed sons and grandsons to the armed services. The average woman living in a home on an average income has had a rather tough life. While she may not be a paraplegic, as defined by the medical people, she is incapacitated to the extent that she has broken down prematurely under the pressure of maintaining a home on an inadequate income. Such people finish up without even a home; with no income and requiring medical attention. These people are not being helped by the provincial government either. There is no provincial legislation under which they can be helped. I have placed hundreds of cases in the hands of the provincial welfare department, only to be told that there was no provincial legislation under which these people could be helped. They become a charge on the bankrupt municipalities. Most of the municipalities across this country are bankrupt, or very nearly bankrupt. It is there that these people must seek relief, and there is no relief there for them.

Think of an old lady between 60 and 65 who comes in and tells you her pathetic story. She has no home, and has been living with friends and neighbours. Some of them are diabetics and require insulin every day, which is a costly process. Then we have to tell them that there is no relief provincially; there is none nationally, so they have to go over to the relief committee of the municipality. When they go there they are told, "We have not the funds to care for you." It is nearly time we reached the point of doing something about it.

Then there is the case of the paraplegic, the person who is permanently crippled. Many of them are born that way, and many are crippled by injury or the lack of medical attention. A while ago there was a pilgrimage here, and I am sure all members recall the gallery full of wheelchairs that we had exhibited in order to emphasize the necessity of doing something for these people. Many of these people sit alone in lonesome silence. Others have the problem of raising funds for the care of chronic illnesses and diseases, and some are being supported by recipients of the old age security pension. There is a considerable burden there.

I believe the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) placed the number of these people at 150,000. Perhaps quite a number could be weeded out if you followed a definition of "incapacitated". There would not be very much money involved. I believe the government should, at this time, consider doing something for them. Now, the government may not want to pass a national pension act or make money available to the provinces, in view of the fact that this is a municipal responsibility. From a provincial standpoint, Ontario is doing something about the matter, as is Saskatchewan, so we would not have those provinces to contend with. I think Alberta does something, too. If the minister would take under consideration the problem of checking with the municipalities across the country as to the number of incapacitated people they have who would be affected by this kind of legislation, and making grants in aid to the municipalities to supplement their income, so the matter could be administered from there, I think it would be a good thing. As to a municipality that could take care of itself, you would not have to help it. But if, instead of making a grant in aid of that kind to the province, which involves more administrative cost, it was given to the municipality where it could be handled directly, in my opinion you would save a great deal of money that would be wasted in administration if it went to the province. I think something like that could be done for immediate relief without raising the whole question of another pension.

But I think the final answer to the thing is this. What Canada needs is an over-all social security act. With the piecemeal legislation that we have now, including old age assistance by the provinces, pensions to the incapacitated in Ontario and some of the other provinces; with the millions of dollars that are collected by charitable organizations across this country for the purpose of supposedly helping people of this type, in my opinion the money wasted in administration and in the duplication of machinery would more than pay for a pension to people in this category. I think the government has got to get around fairly soon to the establishment of an over-all social security act whereby you can take in your old age pensioners, your old age assistance recipients and your incapacitated people, and buttress all that with an over-all health program. Definitely the biggest item in this type of legislation is the medical cost which has to be borne by these people without any income. I believe an over-all act administered by the national government and handled from here would have the effect of cutting the administration cost you have now across this country in duplicated services. I think you would save enough money to pay for this pension by tidying up all your social security measures in one over-all act.

I know the minister is just straining at the leash to get to his feet and tell us that his department has given this matter a great deal of consideration and that within the foreseeable future the necessary legislation will be brought down to take care of this particular problem.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up much time. I am anxious that this resolution come to a vote and am still more anxious that it become legislation as soon as possible. I happen to have three cases in my own village in which, as a result of the act that is now in force in the province of Ontario, these people have been taken off the relief rolls of a burdened municipality. I think the same thing will apply in many cases across the Dominion of Canada. Every one of us knows that our municipalities are burdened with taxes they can hardly bear; they cannot stand any more.

This is necessary legislation, and it is going to take some of the weight off the municipalities as well as being of benefit to those who will receive assistance. For instance, a totally disabled person is bound to be on the relief rolls in 90 per cent of the cases. In my municipality in the province of Ontario they receive approximately $4 a week. That is a meagre handout to anybody who is on his back and unable to work and earn a living. I see that the resolution suggests a pension equal to the old age pension so this legislation, if it came in, would provide a pension of approximately $40 a month. That would be a grand idea. It would be a grand help to those in need. I thank you for the opportunity of making these few remarks.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I think everything that can be said in support of this resolution has been said, and I am glad that everything that has been said has been in support of it. I should simply like to endorse what has been said and to register my support also. I am impelled to do that by representations which have been made to me by individuals and by organizations, and indeed by my own inclinations. I think we have long passed the day of the doctrine of the survival of the fittest with regard to the care of these incapacitated people. As to those who are blind, we have assumed our responsibility although I think perhaps we have not gone far enough yet. The abolition of the means test with regard to pensions for the blind would seem to be the next logical step that we might take.

We have seen members of an organization of incapacitated or incurable people. You will probably remember, Mr. Speaker, that we had them with us here some time ago. A year or two ago they came to see us in our offices. At that time I was impressed by the lightness of spirit and the brilliance of mind displayed by many of these people. They are capable of some constructive and useful work. As a matter of fact, many are doing some now. But to ask them to compete in the open labour market of the country is simply cruel and inhuman.

In the days of my youth such people were the recipients of private charity. They were looked after by their relations as best those relations could afford to do that duty or else —which was a good deal worse—they were the recipients of public charity. In that type of charity it is certainly more blessed to give than to receive. When we occupy ourselves in charity we have a feeling of virtue which is its own reward and a certain warmth around the heart from the knowledge that we can help others less fortunate than ourselves.

But I suggest that it is often difficult for the recipients of either form of the charity which I have mentioned. I would suggest that we might give ourselves collectively as a nation, rather than individually, that warm feeling I have mentioned, and at the same time give to these people not only sustenance of their bodies which is needful to them but also something which in my opinion is just as important, namely a spirit of independence of mind, so they would feel that they have some dignity and some right to live and to enjoy, to some extent at least, those things which are enjoyed by people physically more fortunate than themselves.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up much time in speaking on this resolution; but having spoken on behalf of the incapacitated at each session from 1945 down to the present time, I wished to say a few words at this time. My purpose in rising is to endorse the principle of this resolution and to say to the minister, on behalf of the people I have the honour to represent, that they are looking to him now to bring in the legislation he considers to be necessary to carry into effect the request contained in this resolution.

That is all I have to say at the present time. We have listened to some excellent speeches on this matter not only today but in former years. I want to commend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for introducing this resolution. I also wish to say that the learned doctor, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), has given us the medical side of it in language we can all understand.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): As one who has been privileged to enjoy the very best of health during my lifetime, I want to give my wholehearted support to the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I have spoken on this matter on a number of occasions during the past four or five years. We have been put off the beam a little bit by the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that a survey was being made by the provinces in order to deal with this matter. I believe the survey has been completed, and we expect action at this session and no later.

Having spoken of my own good health and looking back over the years since I have been here, like many others I realize that because of conditions imposed upon me I have great difficulty in making a living for myself and my family. Having that in mind, I can realize very clearly the position in which these people who are physically handicapped find themselves, and also the position in which many of the people who are responsible for those incapacitated persons find themselves when they are unable to do very much for those unfortunate ones.

I feel that this legislation should be enacted during this session. I understand that a committee from the organization for the blind interviewed the Minister of National Health and Welfare today. They asked for two things in particular, namely increasing the pension from $40 to $50 a month and removing the means test. I hope the minister will take cognizance of the representations that have been made to him and that he will see to it that this request is granted, and that before this session concludes, that is, that before we have another election he will get down to business and see that pensions at least equal to old age pensions are provided for those physically incapacitated.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the proposer of this resolution speaks of the advisability of co-operating with the provincial governments. We have been informed here this afternoon that Ontario has an act which provides pensions for incapacitated persons, and I believe that similar legislation exists in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. It gives me great pleasure this afternoon to draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that in Newfoundland we have legislation dealing with this very subject. It was passed in December, 1949, nine months after the province came into confederation. Under that act a monthly allowance may be paid out of funds provided by the government——to adults or families who through mental or physical incapacity or other exigency are unable to provide in whole or in part by their own efforts or from income or other resources necessities essential to maintain or assist in maintaining a reasonably normal and healthy existence.

Incapacity is defined as——a condition of physical or mental illness or disability of such a nature as to render a person incapable of maintaining himself or his family and from which there is no reasonable prospect of recovery within a period of three months from the date of application for an allowance.

I am sure hon. members are familiar with cases of incapacitated persons, fathers or heads of families, who come to them and detail their sad circumstances. If there is no legislation of that kind on the statute books of the province, or if some provision is not made by the municipality, the situation is very desperate indeed. During the last couple of weeks, and especially during Christmas time, people came to me who had not gone through the right channels, and I was able to assist them and put them on the right track. They were not aware of this provision. I was able to assist them to get consideration from the dependents' allowances board, and they will get the pension during their incapacity.

My reason for taking part in this debate was chiefly to draw the attention of the house to the fact that Newfoundland, which is the youngest province, has legislation of this kind. At the same time I feel it is not fair that a province—and this applies to all provinces except the two major ones—that has not the sources of revenue that the central government has, should have to bear this burden. The resolution refers to co-operating with the provinces. It seems to me that the funds to meet this liability should be provided by the central government.

I should not like to see any further extension of the power of the central government in regard to the examination of persons as to their qualifications for such an allowance or pension. I feel that it should be done by leaving the matter in the hands of the provinces with the central government providing the money.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, like other members of the C.C.F. group I believe that the long-term solution of this problem lies in an over-all national health program. Nevertheless I am quite ready to support the measure before us, even though it be piecemeal legislation. After all, I suppose, one cannot expect those who support the Liberal party and the Liberal government to be Liberals in a hurry. They tell us that the Liberals who are in a hurry sit in this corner of the house.

Mr. Pouliot: Why do you speak like that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister said that at one time.

Mr. Noseworthy: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we are making progress even though we are still under a Liberal government. There is a very excellent committee under the auspices of the minister's department known as the national advisory committee on the rehabilitation of the disabled, which is apparently getting down to the job of helping these people, helping them in the way of securing treatment to regain their health to the point where they can assist themselves, and also helping them in the matter of retraining. If one can judge by the recommendations which were passed at the last meeting of that committee one may conclude that it is on the road toward doing a reasonably good job. But notwithstanding all that is being done, there are still some very large gaps in our social security program, large gaps pertaining to these incurables.

In the first place, I can find no reliable estimate of just how many such people we have in this country, how many unemployable incurables there are in Canada. The bureau of statistics tell me that they are unable to find any estimate, and no effort has been made to acquire any accurate estimate of the number of these unemployable incurables. I notice that the Canadian association of the incurables estimates that there are probably 48,000 unemployable incurables in the province of Ontario alone. I have no idea just how close that comes to the truth, but certainly the time has come when we should at least find out how many of these people there are in Canada. It would seem that we have not been too considerate of these people, in that we have not even tried to find out how many there are needing such assistance.

As has been pointed out already, at the last session of its legislature the province of Ontario introduced legislation to assist disabled persons. But here again is an example of how stupid government legislation can be. That act could do a good job with the minister in charge being in full sympathy with its provisions, but the regulations are that to be eligible to receive assistance under the act one must be both permanently and totally disabled. I have people in my riding who have been certified by the medical committee of the provincial department of public welfare to be permanently disabled, but because they can still dress themselves if given enough time and can struggle from one room in their house to another without having to be carried, they are not considered to be eligible for help under that act.

I am sorry the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) is not present today, because one case has been brought to my attention which has been before the Department of Veterans Affairs and the provincial department of public welfare. This is an air force man 33 years of age, who had served four years and eight months in the air force. He is a victim of what the medical authorities call progressive muscular dystrophy. This means that he is gradually losing the use of all his muscles. He has not been able to work for over two years.

The Department of Veterans Affairs say that this disease is not the result of his service, that it was not brought on because of conditions experienced during service. The man states that while in the service he felt his hands becoming numb but did not report that to the medical officer. Therefore he receives no assistance or consideration from the Department of Veterans Affairs. The provincial department of public welfare cannot help him under the new act. While he is permanently disabled, while there is no known cure for his condition and no likelihood of his being able to work again, he is not considered to be totally disabled because he can walk to the toilet himself without having to be carried.

This simply illustrates how stupid some government legislation can be when it sets out to help people. I suggest that any action which is taken to help these unfortunate people should provide for more generous regulations than those laid down by the government of Ontario in their new act. The time has certainly come when we should provide for those who cannot be cured or rehabilitated, and who must depend for support either upon relatives or the public generally. I sincerely support the measure before the house and hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will be able to prevail upon his colleagues on the treasury benches to give the kind of help we are asking this afternoon.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to repeat the things which have been said already in support of this measure. I desire merely to make it known that I am heartily in support of this resolution and will vote for it. I think the case of Social Credit has been put forward quite adequately by former speakers.

I wish merely to point out that there is no conceivable reason why the implementation of what is called for in this resolution should entail any increased taxation. I believe at the present time this country is carrying as great a taxation burden as it should be called upon to carry. I submit that our ability to provide assistance such as is envisaged in this resolution should depend upon our ability to produce goods and services. Certainly no other view could be realistic.

The production of Canada in 1952 has been estimated at between $22 billion and $23 billion worth of goods and services. Surely it ought to be possible to provide the rather meagre assistance suggested by this resolution without adding to our taxation burden. With our production as great is it is, if we must increase our taxation in order to provide this amount of assistance to our people then it is clear that our financial system is unrealistic. We should therefore examine the possibility of learning how to do more of what is physically possible, by a reformation of our financial system.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. gentleman for bringing in this resolution. This is typical of the sort of thing he does in this house. His heart is all-out for people who are underprivileged and need assistance. This resolution is meant to assist a group of people in this country who greatly need assistance.

I agree with the hon. member that the work of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) at the United Nations has been a great credit to himself and to Canada. We were all pleased to observe the manner in which he stood up against the delegates from Russia and other communist countries, how he engaged in debate with them and with his most courteous and able manner was able to hold his own and warrant the commendation of the press of the United States, certainly of this country, and of Great Britain and other countries.

An hon. Member: What has this to do with the resolution?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It has a lot to do with it, because the voice of Canada was heard at the United Nations. The world was learning that Canada is a great and humane nation, and that in offering leadership to the rest of the world she was prepared to put her own house in good shape. You know what Robert Burns said, that if each before his ain door swept, the village would be clean. If by passing legislation such as is proposed in this resolution we show that in every sense we are a Christian nation, we will then be able to present a better claim for leadership before the world at the United Nations or any other conference or world parliament.

I want to say at the same time that taxation is very high in this country, and that there will be an unwillingness to add to that taxation; but the implementation of this resolution would not necessarily add very much to the amount of taxes the average person would pay. Canada has shown a very good example to the world in its care for aged people, its old age pension legislation, its mothers' allowances and the work that is being done in the field of health and welfare and hospitalization.

Turning from these matters, great work has been done in the field of labour through the abolition of child labour, the limiting of hours of work, improvement of conditions for workers, the introduction of the eight-hour day, and more recently the approach to the five-day week. As I have said before in the house, there is a possibility that we can travel too rapidly along these lines inasmuch as so many countries in the world do not have that sort of advanced legislation.

As we know, half our revenues today are being spent on defence to maintain armies and make ourselves strong together with our allies. Our men are in Korea and on the continent of Europe. They are learning that other countries on the face of the earth are not as well off as Canada and that other countries face real problems in even maintaining a bare existence, let alone having the type of advanced legislation that we have in Canada.

So far as the old age measure is concerned, I believe an amendment should be introduced to permit pensioners to earn money in excess of their pension. I think it is a harsh thing to prevent these people from earning any money. In my opinion men of advancing years can offer great service to every community. I do not say that they should be engaged in industry generally, but I think our legislation could be amended in order to allow a man receiving the old age pension to work in any kind of industry which does not call for the use of machinery and power equipment of that kind. Masonry is a lost art in this country, and there are men of years who are skilled in this craft. They know how to take a rough rock, break it and make a beautiful wall, arch or doorway. There are others who know the mysteries of gardening and are skilled in landscape gardening. Why not permit them to enter into work of that kind? Let them engage in carving, woodwork and any kind of handicraft where machinery is not used.

Men of intelligence and advanced years know the beauties of the landscape. They understand the planting of trees and things of that kind. Why not employ such men in the forests to thin out underbrush, plant new trees and thus add to the wealth of our country? Many of them are men of art who are skilled in sculpture or music. Why not permit them to engage to the full limit of their ability in these occupations and thus add to their own income and certainly to the beauty and comfort of those about them? They would set a good example for the young people who are coming along. Many of our young people are so mechanically minded and so attached to the machine age that they are losing touch with the crafts, skills and arts that are so essential in any country.

By releasing men of advanced age to carry on such work we would be adding to the wealth of our country and certainly to its beauty. Then there is the field of invention. If an old man has skill in a certain line and has an inventive mind, why should he not be encouraged to pursue that hobby and gain any advantage he can derive from such inventions, the proceeds of which should be credited to him and not deducted from his pension? The same thing applies to women, who are so often skilled in the arts of needlecraft, weaving, the dyeing of textiles, household management, and so on. I think it would be a forward step.

People might very well go to the province of Quebec and study some of the homecrafts that are flourishing there. I had the opportunity of spending some time in that province not long ago, and of visiting some of the farmhouses. I admired the beautiful works of the hands of artistic people in carving, woodwork, the manufacture of household furniture, etc., all of which added to the beauty and delight of living in the rural communities of Quebec. I am ashamed to admit that I had to wait until now before visiting the province of Quebec. While I was there I was struck with the fact that a very prosperous civilization has existed there for all these centuries based upon land which, in the west and in Ontario where I was born, in very many cases would not be considered worth cultivating. Yet I found the nicest homes and the most flourishing communities in areas which had been deprived by nature of the fertility of soil which produces the abundance of the west, and the fertility to be found particularly in the valley areas of Ontario. It seemed to me that we really do not have to have fertile land and a luxuriance of natural production in order to have a strong and virile people. I was reminded of a story about Glengarry—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member not getting away from the resolution?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): When I am speaking about Glengarry I am always in order in this house. The anecdote which I hope you will permit me to relate is a perfect illustration of what I have in mind with respect to the resolution. A city man from Montreal, brought up in the midst of the club life of St. James street and with all kinds of luxuries was driving his car through Glengarry county and he came to one of those rocky farms where you see a mile and a half of fence made out of field stone, and where the land has only three or four inches of topsoil. Inside the fence were a team of horses and a wagon, and a man who was lifting rocks and throwing them into the wagon. The city man paused on the roadside and looked at the impoverished field and the Glengarry fellow lifting the rocks and tumbling them into the wagon. He was a big redheaded chap, a Scotsman, I suppose—

An hon. Member: It is a good job he was not an Irishman.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The Montreal man said, "What do you grow in that field? What can that field produce?" The Glengarry man picked up another rock bigger than any of the others, tumbled it into the wagon and said, "Men."

If we pass a resolution such as my hon. friend has introduced this afternoon, we will make a much happier and much better future for a great number of men and women throughout the country—old men and old women. And to whom should we render service if it is not to those old people who have borne the burden in the heat of the day in one part or another of this country?

So I am all for the resolution and for the work that is being carried on, as I say, by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin); and I hope this resolution may pass this house.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, if I rise to take part in this debate it is to reaffirm what I have said before in this house. In 1949, when taking part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I said this, and I am quoting from Hansard of September 16, page 19:

> To increase social security, I would suggest to the government, if I may, that, in so far as our financial means allow, a pension plan be inaugurated for needy invalids. This would be looked upon favourably by the people of Canada.
> Up to the present time, the government has provided for the blind, for the aged, for children; certain provinces grant pensions to needy mothers. The time has come to consider those poor unfortunates who, by accident or by birth, are crippled for life and gaze with sombre melancholy upon the happiness of others. A pension scheme designed to help them would ameliorate their plight. The kindness of the state would atone to some extent for the harshness of life.

There is no one more in favour of the resolution than I, and I would like to see it go through this chamber at the earliest possible time. When last I spoke in this house certain quarters seemed to put blame upon me because I spoke in English. I am glad to be able to say a few words in the course of our debates in the language of the majority of this house. In doing so I have the conviction that I am serving the best interests of my constituency, the best interests of my province and the best interests of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to go on in the French language, that language which I was originally taught and in which I continued my studies. Its clarity, its conciseness are such that we feel we must use it when the occasion requires it. I think that today is such an occasion when we must use the French language to ask the government of this country—all the governments of this country—to consider the unfortunate circumstances of those who have been incapacitated by some terrible accident or who were crippled at birth and are fated to remain so throughout their life.

Is their anything sadder than a visit to any of these charitable institutions where we find hundreds and thousands of human beings lying in pain, past expecting anything but what may come from Heaven, through their prayers, or from individual charity? The government of this country—all the governments of this country—must seek a solution to this problem, which is the problem of our sick and crippled people.

I admit that our latest old age pensions act takes care of approximately one-third of these unfortunate people. There still remain two-thirds comprising, so I am told, roughly between 50,000 and 60,000 persons awaiting government aid, that is aid from all the governments of this country.

They read in the newspapers and learn through the news and radio, besides being told by their relatives, that family allowances are being paid, that old age pensions are being given without a means test to all people 70 years of age, and that old age pensions are even granted to those who are 65 years of age. And they sadly ask themselves: When will our turn come?

I wish to congratulate the sponsor of this resolution. I also wish to congratulate him for having introduced such a resolution after the measures we have adopted in order to settle once and for all the case of our fellow citizens who are 70 years of age and more. This draft resolution is timely and necessary and all persons of good will in this house must rally behind the hon. member who has introduced it in order that this bill may become the law of the country.

However, in reading the notice of motion, I note that we are asked to consider:

—the advisability of co-operating with the provincial governments for the purpose of providing pensions, equal to old age pensions, for all those who are incapacitated and unable to earn their living, regardless of age.

It appears from the context of this resolution that the federal government cannot intervene, in spite of all its eagerness to do so, without obtaining first the co-operation of the provinces.

I remember that when family allowances were discussed in a certain province, it was argued in the legislature of that province that the legislation which the House of Commons intended to adopt in regard to family allowances was unconstitutional because it violated that section of the constitution which gives to the provinces the exclusive right of legislating in matters pertaining to education.

I understand that the enacting of legislation to assist incapacitated people would have no such scope. Still we must admit that it is impossible to arrive at practical conclusions without the co-operation of the provinces. There is nothing though to prevent us, the members of the House of Commons, from acting in such a way as to enlist the co-operation of the provinces in order to solve, once and for all, the problem of those unfortunate people who, languishing in hospital or staying with their families, often shed tears over their plight. There is something here that goes beyond a duty of public charity. We have adopted pension systems with a view to assisting those who were better off than these. We must look for a way, difficult though that may be, to make these unfortunate people—I hardly dare say the happiest people on earth, since we could never manage to do that—at least somewhat more comfortable, to alleviate their plight.

In conclusion I wish to thank the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) for the kind thoughts and pleasant words he has had for the province of Quebec. The people of that province are attached to their traditions, history and way of life, but they are never happier than when they are sure that our fellow citizens from the other provinces understand them.

(Text):

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): I should like to join the other members who have taken part in this debate by saying how pleased and happy we are that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has introduced this resolution.

Mr. Knowles: He wanted it voted upon.

Mr. Balcom: Well, that may come. I am sure the hon. member for Fort William and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) consulted each other in the preparation of their respective resolutions. By this time I believe we should all know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has always been very sympathetic and open to conviction when any appeals of this sort have been made to him. There have been very few of them, if any, that have not been received graciously.

I noticed that none of the speakers who preceded me suggested just how much assistance might be given, other than is conveyed in the resolution which broadly states that some pension should be provided. No one has suggested how it might be administered other than as a pension; and no one, of course, has suggested the cost. The cost perhaps may be the least of these factors.

In this matter of helping the incapacitated, the Department of National Health and Welfare has for years been making a generous contribution through assistance to hospitals, particularly children's hospitals. We all know that if some of the damage suffered by children is remedied early in life, the young people can grow up to be useful citizens and support themselves. Personally, I know that the children's hospitals in Nova Scotia, particularly the one in Halifax, are grateful for the assistance given. It has only been by reason of this assistance that they have been able to continue their work.

Social security has become a very popular phrase in recent years, Mr. Speaker. In the numerous discussions of this topic, social insurance has received the major emphasis and is sometimes considered the only issue, yet the gaps in our social service must not be overlooked. In referring to other measures, we sometimes refer to the means test which has become rather unpopular in Canada and other countries. However, the comments on the means test are unrealistic and impractical. If we think of the needs of the people and the ways in which those needs can be met within our economy, we must accept the fact that a government assistance plan based on a means test is an essential. Public assistance is recognized by all to be necessary until other social security measures are more practically and more adequately developed. In any period in the foreseeable future it will continue to be necessary. There will always have to be provision for the residue of those in need and for those who, for various technical reasons, are not eligible for other assistance.

Since there are those for whom specific provision is not made under insurance and other schemes we must, whether we like it or not, include a means test program in our provisions for those in need. I would presume that was included, even though not mentioned, in the resolution. I believe that, to date, the program is twofold. How do we reduce the number to whom public assistance offers the only security in time of destitution or when they become incapacitated? How do we provide a public assistance program that will give some security, that will be a constructive measure for the person who is in need of its help, and which will be satisfactory to the community and those residing among us?

There are many different views about our planning for social security and welfare. Let us consider here only the significant ones. There are many constructive views about the administration of public assistance. At the present time the national revulsion to the means test is a reaction to destruction. This means test is supposed to be destructive to the person to whom it is applied. There is a difference in the attitude to the old age assistance and mothers' allowance programs as compared to the social assistance for the needy. These are all public assistance and government programs. What makes the difference in attitude? The administration is not better in the former than in the latter. The difference is largely in the public attitude towards the causes of illness. There is little or no stigma attached to the fact of being incapacitated. In our present economy, the difficulty of making adequate provision for such an eventuality is recognized by most of us. We therefore do not attach personal blame to the person who has not been able to provide adequately for a crippled member of his family.

The development of categories for assistance was probably necessary in the process of changing public attitudes. I hope the time will come when we can eliminate such categories; when our communities and provinces will be prepared to recognize a responsibility to people who are unable to provide themselves with the necessities of life; when public assistance will be given on proof of need, and the question of why the person is in need will not determine whether or not he or she receives help, although it will certainly influence the other constructive services which may be available.

How can we make a government assistance program constructive? Government assistance costs the people money. In its short-term planning a constructive program will cost more money than an inadequate one. Good legislation and good administration are dependent on the community, on the people's attitude to the problem, and upon their willingness, of course, to spend and to ensure that the program is good. The public attitude has also its effect upon the recipients, upon those who hesitate to apply, upon their self-respect and their morale, upon their ability to recognize and perform their obligations as citizens, and upon their attitudes to themselves and to society.

We have come some distance from the time when the pauper was disqualified from all citizenship rights, although remnants of those old days still remain. But I am afraid we are still far from the point where destitution does not carry with it some element of personal disgrace, which makes it difficult for the destitute, crippled or incapacitated person, regardless of the cause of his condition, to remain a respected and contributing member of society. We have trained ourselves to think that a person contributes only if he is economically productive.

In approaching this resolution and giving it consideration we should certainly change our thinking in that regard. This consideration forces us back to the reason the community has for establishing a public assistance program. Why does society give public assistance? And after all "society" really means government. The motives vary, and the nature of the program depends on those motives. I outline them here without attempting to assess their relative importance in different communities. We give to people in many instances when we see them almost reach the point of starvation. That is a grudging, negative attitude associated with our discomfort in the face of human suffering.

We must protect the incapacitated from the results of destitution. I think that is what the hon. member had in mind when this resolution was introduced. The effect may be upon their health, their safety, our personal income; that is yours and mine, for example. The result can be a loss to the property owner because a crippled person cannot pay rent; or it can have an effect upon the total economy in the loss of purchasing power and of manpower. The result may be in the ultimate cost in the increase of disease and crime because, as you are aware, an incapacitated person in many instances has an extremely active brain, and this brain can easily be diverted if such people are not able to enjoy the things that you and I enjoy in our way of life.

We are profiting by the conditions which are to some extent responsible for destitution. Hence we must look on the care of the incapacitated as a necessary expense which we are obliged to shoulder. We have almost no alternative in that case. We are obliged to shoulder that responsibility. Why? Because with the advent of urbanization, industrialization and such conditions, there are consequent changes in our economy and in many cases these are the causes.

Mr. Speaker, there are some other points with which I should like to deal further and if I have your permission I should like to quote from a Canadian welfare council paper of May 1, 1952. In it there is an article by Mr. C. A. L. Murchison, Q.C., which was given before a conference on social welfare in Toronto. Mr. Murchison knows what he is talking about because he is a member of the unemployment insurance commission, he helped to organize the national conference on the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped which was held in Toronto in 1951, and he is now a member of the national advisory committee created on the recommendation of that conference. Mr. Murchison says:

> While I cannot make any suggestions on the manner in which Canada can inaugurate and carry out a rehabilitation program, I can suggest that you look at what has been done in the United States of America, another federal state. In that country each state is responsible for the administration of its rehabilitation program. Certain standards are fixed by the federal authority and if the individual state develops its rehabilitation scheme according to the approved standards, then it becomes entitled to financial assistance from the federal authority. The example set and experience gained by the people in the United States might provide a reasonably sound precedent for consideration by the authorities concerned in this country.
> It should be clearly understood that there are certain constitutional barriers standing in the way of direct participation by the federal authority in any social security scheme. This was the case when, in 1935, the federal government sought to introduce unemployment insurance in Canada. You will remember that the privy council ruled that the federal authority had no jurisdiction over such matters, and it was not until the British North America Act was amended, in 1940, that jurisdiction over unemployment insurance was conferred upon the federal government.
> The rehabilitation program will, of necessity, bring into active participation at least three important services which are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, and I refer to those provided by the departments of public welfare, health and education, and possibly a fourth—the departments of labour. In our thinking on such a program, we must keep in mind that whatever administrative duties there are to be performed will have to be under the provincial authorities.
> This situation brings up the question of what part of the program is left for the federal authority to assume. It would seem that, apart from the services which can be given to the plan by the special placements branch of the national employment service, federal participation might be limited to the making of grants in aid.
> I sincerely hope that there is no one present who is of the opinion that I am placing too much emphasis upon the constitutional problems confronting the Canadian rehabilitation program. In my opinion it would be entirely wrong for anyone to acquire the view that the federal government should by-pass constitutional law on the subject and inaugurate and directly administer such a program.

He goes on further but that is as much as I shall quote from Mr. Murchison. There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that the incapacitated should be given an opportunity of earning their livelihood, of holding their self-respect, and in so far as possible put on the same footing as you and I. They should not be too dependent on their relatives. That used to obtain many years ago but times have changed, and in any case the relatives are having a difficult time to get along.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) give a definition of what was meant by "incapacitated". It seems that practically every province and every part of Canada and the United States have a different meaning for it. The resolution says:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of co-operating with the provincial governments for the purpose of providing pensions—

That may be fine for some provincial governments, but I think I can speak for the province of Nova Scotia and say that our province is head over heels, not in debt, but in difficulties with respect to raising sufficient money to meet their present requirements. Therefore I cannot altogether agree with the mover of this resolution that the provincial governments should be precipitated into a scheme such as this without full consultation with them and without many meetings and many surveys, so they will not be caused greater financial difficulties than they are experiencing at the present time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the discussion that has taken place is expected to be followed, as indeed several hon. members have suggested, by a statement from me as Minister of National Health and Welfare. In taking part in this debate, I propose first of all to indicate what is being done in the important field of rehabilitation, apart altogether from whatever cash benefits are received by various segments of the population of Canada.

It will be seen from this kind of review that a great deal is already being done by all levels of jurisdiction in this country regarding the important question raised in the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I think it would be advisable for us to recall the actual terms of the resolution, which reads:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of co-operating with the provincial governments for the purpose of providing pensions, equal to old age pensions, for all those who are incapacitated and unable to earn their living, regardless of age.

The house has already expressed its gratitude to the hon. member for Fort William for introducing this resolution at this time, and I am sure we all agree that much good can flow from a discussion, dispassionate and fair as this debate has been. It should not be forgotten that, in introducing family allowances, the veterans' charter, the national health program and in doing other things in these fields, this government has provided a background in health and welfare that should serve, and it must serve, as a proper basis for consideration of this particular problem.

All of the social services in Canada cannot and should not be designated for the sole competence of one governmental authority. It would be wrong for the federal government to assume full control and full interest in all phases of social welfare and of health activities. That is not only good government in a confederation such as ours, but it is also the view of the ten provincial governments of our country. As one who has to take part in conferences with the provinces from time to time, may I say that I have been reminded by those provincial authorities that there are fields of action which are peculiarly fitted for their interest; that there are fields in which there can be joint endeavour, but under no circumstances should we, in a country such as ours, seek to arrogate to Ottawa full authority and full and exclusive interest in all phases of welfare and health activity.

It must not be thought, however, that in saying that I am now preparing a complete defence against doing anything in the field of rehabilitation and providing cash benefits for our invalid population, or for those who are incapacitated and on that account unable to provide full maintenance for themselves and their families. For the fact is that while in Canada there is no single disability cash benefit scheme, there are nevertheless under various programs—mostly federal but also under provincial auspices—at the present time some 325,000 disabled Canadians who are receiving assistance at a cost of $110 million a year, almost 80 per cent of which is borne by the central authority. That is a considerable proportion of the population. It is a fact that has not been emphasized here today. Those who have argued for this proposition, and argued well, have failed, it seems to me, to emphasize the important contribution already being made not only by the provinces but by the federal government in this important matter.

It must not be forgotten that in 1952 there came into being in this country the most comprehensive old age security system of any country in the world, and that scheme has a very definite bearing on this matter. Likewise, in that same year, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), and I convoked a conference, which was held in the city of Toronto, on the question of rehabilitation, a very important prerequisite to a satisfactory system of disability pensions.

At that conference the ten provinces of Canada were represented, as well as the voluntary health and welfare agencies of the country, hospital, medical and allied professions, the three departments of the federal government, organized labour and management, universities, social welfare organizations and so on. The conclusion of that conference was that in developing programs in this field careful consideration must be given to the place of disability allowances in the physical and vocational rehabilitation of the disabled. Consideration must likewise be given, of course, to the constitutional position, to administrative difficulties and to the relative priority of disability pensions in the over-all social security program.

I was interested in the observations of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) who strongly supported this measure. I recalled at once the contributions which he made to the discussion, and they were valuable contributions, during the sittings of the committee on old age security in 1950. His observations will be found at pages 808 and 810-11 of the minutes of the committee. Just to single out one set of questions and answers to indicate what his view then was, I would remind him and others of what he said. The following were some questions put by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing):

> Q. I was going to point out in 3 the recipients have objected to the means test; I think workers in the government service have objected; and I think members of parliament have objected. This brief proposes that beyond 70 years we should remove the means test but it transfers it to the age group 65 to 69, with greater intensity than ever before? —A. It is not a means test.
> Q. Well, who is going to say whether a person is prematurely aged or not?—A. It is a health test, not a means test.
> Q. Who is going to say that?—A. Medical officers. Mr. Blair: You cannot do it.

It will be found that throughout the deliberations of that committee the hon. gentleman emphasized the difficulty of using for the purpose of the receipt of cash benefits the yardstick of total disability. That merely emphasizes the point that was made at the conference in Toronto as to the administrative difficulties.

Now with regard to rehabilitation. As I said a moment ago, almost $11 million is made available to the provinces under crippled children, mental health and tuberculosis control grants. Very substantial proportions of this money are used for rehabilitation purposes. Then again, $100,000 a year is provided by the Department of National Health and Welfare to national voluntary agencies engaged in rehabilitation work. The department offers valuable consultative services to the provinces and to private agencies in such fields as blindness control and mental health. Federal-provincial aid is being given to special federal-provincial projects to provide surgical operations to restore the sight of selected blind pensioners.

Today I, along with many members of this house, received two delegations representing the various blind associations of our country.

They came to ask the government to give consideration to increasing the basic pension for the blind and to removing the means test. In dealing with this application I pointed out that these associations and the provincial and federal governments had been able to bring about a great improvement in social welfare measures in so far as they apply to the blind. When one is considering the particular question under discussion one would have to bear in mind our obligations to the blind as well as our obligations in other fields.

Likewise the federal government, through the Department of Veterans Affairs, provides welfare services and treatment for disabled veterans. That service includes rehabilitation activities as well as cash benefits for many thousands of veterans who come within the ambit of the resolution now under discussion.

Now with regard to the large segments of the population which are covered by provisions fully as generous as those envisaged in the resolution now before us, I would point out that all persons between the ages of 65 and 69 years with insufficient means to provide for their own needs are taken care of through federal-provincial old age assistance programs. Those 70 years of age and over are cared for under federal old age security legislation regardless of means. It is correct therefore to state that the objectives of this resolution are being already realized in so far as those of our population over 65 years of age are concerned.

Then with regard to blind persons, all adult blind persons regardless of age who are unable to earn their own living are taken care of under the new federal-provincial blind persons' allowance program. It is worth noting that the blind are the largest single group of civilian disabled, and represent perhaps one-third of the total number of those who are incapacitated.

With regard to our veterans, I think it is desirable to remember that all our veterans who served in both world wars are covered by provisions even more generous than those contemplated in the present resolution. Over 200,000 disabled veterans are now receiving assistance, either in the form of pensions or war veterans allowances.

At the provincial level there are a number of important provisions for the disabled. Everyone in this house knows that the provincial governments have developed comprehensive provisions for partial and total disability benefits under their workmen's compensation programs. In most provinces where a husband is prevented from working by physical or mental disability aid is provided under a system of mothers' allowances. As an example of what is being done for tuberculosis victims, most provinces provide special allowances for persons incapacitated by that disease. At least one province, Alberta, has a provision for widows' pensions which covers a small segment of the disabled group below 65 years of age. Newfoundland has its dependents allowances act which takes care of the disabled, among others.

It is therefore clear that a large proportion of our disabled population, all those over 65 years of age, our war veterans, all our blind, those who have been injured by industrial accidents and other similar groups are covered already under one or other of the programs I have described.

Last year the province of Ontario went a step further in introducing a new plan for the disabled. The initiative which that province took seems to suggest that possibly disability pensions, like workmen's compensation and mothers' allowances, can best be taken care of by the provincial governments to the extent that they cannot be subject to insurance principles. I know that is the view of the government of Ontario from the discussions I have had with them.

It certainly is the view of at least three other governments that this is a field which they can best attend to, though they do not all agree that there should be no financial participation by the federal government. When we embarked upon the old age security program we had in mind the fact that we were assuming a greater responsibility, not only for those 70 years of age and over but for the group which would be covered under the new act, those between the ages of 65 and 70 years. We were relieving the provinces of a great financial responsibility. Their financial load has been very considerably reduced as a result of our old age security program.

To come back to the scheme in Ontario, I have not seen official figures as to the extent of that program. I understand that the number of recipients is not large and that consequently such a program is well within the capacity of the province. I hope to be able to announce the results of our health-sickness survey within a very few months, and that will reveal, I think, that this problem is not as great in the proportion of disabled people as might be thought, particularly when one takes into account the 350,000 individuals in the country who are now receiving cash benefits in one form or another through the federal government. It may be that the survey will reveal that, just as this group is within the capacity of the province of Ontario financially, so too will it be well within the financial capacity of municipal and provincial governments throughout the country.

In any event it seems to me that these programs can best be handled provincially because there is a precedent already, and because of the heavy administrative problems involved, administrative difficulties which were ably pointed out in the old age security committee by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) a year ago. So with this in mind it might be well to note that the federal government's assumption of the total cost of old age security payments for those 70 and over has reduced provincial expenditures on old age pensions by more than $18 million a year, and our estimate would be that the kind of scheme envisaged by the proposition now before the house would certainly not cost the provinces anything like that in total. Because, it seems to me, we are now doing our share in respect of this problem and because we have other great obligations, I could not get up in the house at this time and accept this resolution without qualification, much as my own human instincts and sympathies, like those of every other hon. member, might lead me to do. I could not do that in the light of the situation which I am describing to the house, and also because of other things that the government yet hopes to be able to do in these wide humanitarian fields for the people of this country.

It is not that these things should not be done, and not that they will not be done. I firmly believe that the attitude taken by the province of Ontario will be emulated by other provinces in the period that lies ahead. Therefore it seems to me that we must look at the whole question in the light first of all of the kind of country in which we are living. There can be no argument about our unanimous wish to see that provision is made for the individual who is incapacitated to the point that he cannot provide for himself or his dependents. There is no doubt that he has a strong and justifiable demand for assistance at the hands of the community. Of that there can be no question. The question is what jurisdiction of government should bear the responsibility.

In answering, one will have to emphasize that the federal government has assumed the cost of family allowances, a burden of over $28 million a month, a social welfare measure bringing security to over four and a half million children in two million families every month, and has undertaken an old age security program that will cost well over $300 million this year, which cost will increase because of the increase in the ageing of our population. It has assumed the cost of these two measures together with the national health program, the veterans charter and our contributions to the unemployment insurance scheme, as well as half the cost of old age assistance, and in addition there is the reserve of projects that the Canadian people will want to have in store for future action.

It seems to us that we can develop these schemes in partnership with the various provincial governments, and this is one phase of activity which I believe most of them are prepared to undertake and which I believe they can do better than we. The administrative difficulty is very great, as we have found in administering those problems of rehabilitation that come directly within our own sphere of activity.

I believe this discussion serves a useful purpose. Reference was made a few moments ago to the fact that I had been at the United Nations, and the hon. member who proposed the resolution was kind enough to speak of the work which I was able to do there. This is the first opportunity I have had to comment on that reference and I should like to make this observation, it being the first chance I have had in the house since my return from the seventh assembly.

Canada was honoured at that assembly in more ways than one, and perhaps in no more effective and impressive way than by the very able and constructive manner in which Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) carried out the assignment of president of the general assembly. One of the things that impresses the various delegations to the general assembly, as indeed it impresses anyone who attends the meetings of the various organs of the United Nations, is that there is a sound appreciation on the part of most countries of what Canada is doing in the field of health and welfare. That is particularly true, of course, at the economic and social council. It is true on the part of those who go to the world health organization, as the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) have reminded the house.

When we come to consider suggestions such as are put forward today it is important for each of us to recognize what we have done in these fields and not to belittle the accomplishment. There has been no belittling of that accomplishment in any part of the house today. The debate has been on a high level and of high order. There has been a common recognition of the importance of the problem, but perhaps not a sufficient appreciation of the extent of rehabilitation that is now going on in the country, and perhaps not a sufficient appreciation of the extent to which cash benefits are now being extended to so many people by one of the several government authorities in the country, the federal government.

Later in the session I hope to be able to announce a program in connection with a phase of activity in our department that will not be unrelated to this matter, although it will not be directly in answer to what is requested in the resolution. I must make it clear that it will not provide for disability pensions, but it will be a matter closely related to this problem and to many other phases of activity with which our department would normally be expected to be concerned.

I should like to take this opportunity to say to those who have made representations today and to the various organizations of the blind that the submissions they have made will receive the most careful consideration and attention at the hands of the government. The blind are one group of many in the category of disabled and incapacitated individuals in this country. It is the first group among the disabled to have received assistance at the hands of government in Canada on the federal level.

I think we can be proud of our achievements. I am not speaking only of the government, although I speak of it too because this government has great achievements to its credit over the course of the years in the field of health and welfare. I am speaking of the contribution that has been made in a co-operative way between those various groups and ourselves.

First of all, we have increased the basic pension three times. We have met almost 100 per cent the proposals put forward in the six-point program which the Canadian National Institute for the Blind offered to us three years ago. In every particular but one so far we have recognized their full demands.

On the other hand there is the work we have done in setting up, under the national health program, the glaucoma clinics, the remedial surgery program that is going on in this country to improve the sight of the blind. These are programs of the first order, about which perhaps not sufficient has been said.

I might take this opportunity of urging those provinces in the country that have not agreed with us on this remedial surgery program not to delay but to come in so that we can provide relief for many blind pensioners who can yet have their sight restored by capable and effective surgical operation. Under that scheme the federal government pays 75 per cent of the total cost involved, and I am happy to say that in 70 individual surgical operations on people who were receiving blind pensions, and whose hope for the restoration of their eyesight had long been given up, we were able to effect under this program significant restoration of sight in over 40 cases. That kind of program is one we want to see continued, and it is one that is closely related to this whole question of rehabilitation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we set up under the program conceived by the former minister of labour and now ably carried on by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), in conjunction with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and myself as Minister of National Health and Welfare, a scheme by which we sought to provide for co-ordination in the field of rehabilitation of the handicapped and incapacitated of our country. We have set up a national advisory committee composed of the representatives of organizations in the country best suited by tradition and knowledge to deal with this problem. In addition to that we have appointed as co-ordinating officer with residence here in Ottawa, serving in the Department of Labour, the former head of the workmen's compensation board rehabilitation service in the province of Ontario. It is his job to try to develop a program in conjunction with the provinces both for the rehabilitation and for the financial assistance, in time, of those who through no fault of their own find themselves incapacitated. That is a scheme which is based on the kind of programs other countries have followed. I believe it marks a very definite step in what we are doing both in terms of meeting the proposal that is before us today and also in effecting and completing what we are doing for the rehabilitation of the incapacitated and for others in the country.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says "question" and I want to say to him that the big question that is before us today—

Mr. Knowles: Let us have the vote.

Mr. Martin: —is whether or not we have gone too far in this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us have a vote.

Mr. Martin: Speaking for the government I want to say this. The government of this country is firmly of the view that there cannot be too much interest in humanitarian questions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As long as it does not come to a vote.

Mr. Martin: This government and this party will always support the interests of suffering humanity.

Some hon. Members: The vote?

Mr. Martin: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) obviously is not interested in these problems that have to do with human welfare, otherwise he would let me point this out. While I believe the kind of society that he advocates is one that possesses within itself the seed of its own destruction, I do say that those who argue against the welfare state make a tremendous mistake. If by "welfare state" they wish to put the emphasis on "state", then, of course, I agree with the suggestion and deplore the sinister implications involved in the phrase. But, if by "welfare state" we mean that the government of the country should be concerned with the welfare of its people, then I am unashamedly a strong protagonist of the welfare state.

Mr. Knowles: Let us have a vote then.

Mr. Martin: So is the government of which I am a member and it is because of that conviction—

Mr. Fleming: That you are talking it out.

Mr. Martin: —that this government has brought in family allowances, the veterans' charter, old age security and the national health program. It is because of that it has been able to effect a measure of co-operation with the provincial governments that as Minister of National Health and Welfare I am justified—

Mr. Diefenbaker: In talking this out.

Mr. Martin: —in saying to the hon. gentleman who proposed this resolution that it has at least served the purpose of giving all of us an opportunity to appreciate the great progress that has been made in the field of health and welfare in this most favoured among the nations of the world.

Mr. Knowles: You have talked it out again.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Fournier (Hull) moves the adjournment of the debate. It is six o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: We should have a vote on the motion.

Mr. Speaker: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Half a minute to six.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker said it was six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue the debate on the motion to set up a committee to examine national defence expenditures. Then we will take up the items on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Justice.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

P.E.I. CAR FERRY SERVICE

WOOD ISLAND-CARIBOU—NEW VESSEL

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like to make an announcement pertaining to the automobile ferry service between Wood island, Prince Edward Island, and Caribou, Nova Scotia. At the present time the service is operated by the Northumberland Ferries Limited, which receives an annual subsidy of $158,000. The operation of this service is most important to the economy of Prince Edward Island, and the use made thereof in recent years has been increasing continuously.

While the economy of Prince Edward Island is well looked after by the Borden-Tormentine service in so far as railway communications are concerned and for highway traffic originating or terminating in the western section of the island, it has become increasingly important for the agricultural products of Prince Edward Island to be provided with an efficient automobile ferry service from the eastern part of the island to Nova Scotia. The present operator of this service finds it impossible to raise the necessary capital to acquire a new and more efficient vessel, in order to cope with the traffic offered.

I am pleased to announce to the house that the government has decided to construct a new automobile ferry vessel, which should be ready for operation in 1955. A decision has not yet been reached as to which agency will operate the service when the new vessel is ready to go into operation.

ANTI-SEMITISM

INQUIRY AS TO RECENT SIGNS OF GROWTH IN EASTERN EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) of which I have given him notice. Can he enlighten the house on the implications of recent signs of growing anti-semitism in the Soviet union and the satellite countries in eastern Europe?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman has said, he was good enough to give me notice of this important question.

The ominous and familiar pattern which seems to be developing within the soviet world is a matter which must be viewed with deepest anxiety—especially, if I may say so, by citizens of Jewish faith in Canada and other countries. Communist action against Jews has been recently highlighted in the purge in Czechoslovakia. There have been indications that similar purges may be in the making in other satellite capitals. The news from Moscow that six Jewish doctors have been arrested in that city, charged with fantastic and obviously trumped-up crimes, fits into the same pattern. There has not yet been time for the Department of External Affairs to receive sufficient information on this latest development to make possible a balanced assessment of its probable implications. That it may prove to be a very serious matter indeed is, I think, obvious to all of us.

Terrible atrocities stemmed from unbridled anti-semitism in nazi Germany. It would be a great tragedy and crime if the rulers of communist Russia were now planning to revive this dark and evil force from the past and to make use of it for their own ends.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

QUESTION AS TO ACTION BY GOVERNMENT RESPECTING CERTAIN PASSPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Is the government going to follow the example of the United States and pick up the passports of people who have attended the so-called peace conferences behind the iron curtain?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is a very important question of policy and I do not think I should be asked to give a reply to it at this time without notice. I can say however, that our policy in regard to the possession of passports by Canadian citizens, —that a passport is merely a certificate of national identity—has not been changed and I do not know that it is about to be changed.

SHIPPING

COLLISION OF VESSELS "PHYLLIS W" AND "GAESTANO S" OFF NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): May I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, with reference to the ramming of the fishing boat Phyllis W off Centreville, Nova Scotia, allegedly by the Gaestano S, Gloucester dragger, if he can give the house any information concerning the action the department proposes to take.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I wish to thank the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply to him I can say that the department has asked the Halifax office for a complete report of the alleged incident. When this report is received it will be very carefully considered to see what action, if any, will be taken.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED INTENTION TO BROADCAST A CHILDBIRTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the Minister of National Revenue aware of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, through its press and information service, is announcing that on January 29 it will broadcast a childbirth? If so, what action is the government proposing to take?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I am not aware of the matter, but I shall have it referred to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and give the information later.

POSTAL SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO TWO MAIL DELIVERIES PER DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Postmaster General say, Mr. Speaker, whether or not press reports are correct that two mail deliveries per day will be re-established at an early date?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I did not see the press reports to which my hon. friend refers, but eventually when the estimates come before the house I shall make a statement on this matter.

ELIGIBILITY OF PERSONS OVER SIXTY FOR CHRISTMAS EMPLOYMENT

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General arising out of an advertisement which appeared in the Toronto papers, a copy of which I sent him yesterday. Were persons over sixty eligible for temporary employment in post offices during Christmas week?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I want to thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his question. Persons over sixty were eligible for temporary work during Christmas week in post offices, provided of course they were physically and mentally equipped to do the work. No doubt, however, preference would be given to younger men if available.

FINANCE

QUESTION AS TO RECENTLY ANNOUNCED LOAN OF $100 MILLION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance respecting the recently announced $100 million 3¾ per cent loan to be offered to the public. My question is this. Because of the prevalent rumours and speculations as to the purposes of the loan, will the minister tell the house the specific purpose or purposes for which the loan is to be used?

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The hon. member was good enough to give notice of his question to the Minister of Finance, and the minister asked me to thank him for that. Before leaving, the minister prepared an answer to the question, and he asked me to read it if the hon. member put his question today. The answer reads as follows:

I announced that the government had authorized an issue of $100 million par value 25 years 3¾ per cent bonds. These bonds will be sold in instalments to Bank of Canada which will in turn make the new issue available to investment dealers and banks for distribution among interested investors.

The new bonds will be dated January 15, 1953, will mature January 15, 1978, and are callable at 100 per cent and accrued interest at any time on or after January 15, 1975 on sixty days' notice.

I referred to the changes in market levels which have occurred in recent years, particularly since the time prior to the invasion of Korea when the last issue of long-term marketable bonds was made. I stated that the government had decided not to undertake at this time a conventional type of offering of the new issue of 25 year bonds. Nevertheless it is felt very desirable that steps should be taken to establish values in the long-term area in order to facilitate in due course a conventional offering of long-term bonds at some later date. Accordingly the new issue has been created and will be distributed by sale in instalments to Bank of Canada and subsequent sales by Bank of Canada in the market from time to time at prevailing prices. The proceeds of the loan will be paid into the consolidated revenue fund and will be disbursed for general purposes of the government.

Mr. Graydon: Will you be able to get par when you sell them?

CURRIE REPORT

INVESTIGATION BY R.C.M.P. INTO ALLEGED DISAPPEARANCE OF COPY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and ask him whether or not any information and complaint was sworn out in connection with the incident respecting the first Currie report before the mounted police were called in to investigate. If there was no information under the Criminal Code, then upon what basis are the mounted police used except under the direction of the attorney general of one or other of the provinces? I am just wondering about the basis.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): So far as we know, Mr. Speaker, no information had been laid prior to the action which was taken to investigate the alleged theft of the document in question. I understand that Mr. Currie himself had instructed private detectives to secure some information which indicated the possibility at least of irregularities, and it was to investigate those irregularities that the mounted police were instructed to act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That still does not answer the other question. Is it possible for the Attorney General of Canada to use the R.C.M.P. for investigational work in any province without the assistance or co-operation of the attorney general of that province? I thought that was the basis upon which the minister had always worked.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Fleming: Answer, if possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF SUPERVISOR OF DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Acting Minister of Defence Production): On January 12, Mr. Speaker, the member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) asked the following question:

> Is it correct, as reported in the press, that Mr. Hunter has been appointed to supervise defence expenditures and, if so, what were the reasons that it was felt necessary to make this appointment?

The answer is that Mr. Hunter's appointment as financial adviser to the Department of Defence Production was announced by the Minister of Defence Production on January 5, 1953. Mr. Hunter, who has been successively a member of the departments of munitions and supply, reconstruction and supply, trade and commerce, and the Department of Defence Production since its inception, was named to replace Mr. O. A. Matthews whose appointment to the board of transport commissioners became effective on January 1, 1953.

The position of financial adviser has existed in the Department of Defence Production since its inception and has been held in succession by Messrs. H. G. Hesler, L. D. Hudon, O. A. Matthews and the present incumbent. The terms of reference of this position have remained constant. The position is identical to the one which was created early in world war II, and existed in both the departments of munitions and supply and reconstruction and supply.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a committee to examine defence expenditures and commitments, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Claxton.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I indicated during the course of my remarks on Tuesday evening, Mr. Speaker, that it was my intention at the end of my speech to move an amendment. I should like at this time to indicate the terms of the amendment that I shall move. It will be seconded by my deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). It is, in fact, an amendment to the amendment, and it will read as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:
> "and to give consideration to the desirability of recommending that Mr. Currie be asked to conduct a further inquiry into any other expenditures and commitments covered by the terms of this resolution."

I shall actually move this subamendment at the conclusion of my remarks. I am taking the liberty of sending copies of it to you now, Mr. Speaker, so that you may have it in your hands and have an opportunity to look it over.

When I was speaking on Tuesday evening I was at the time of adjournment dealing with the government's disregard, in my view, of the privileges of parliament and the established principles respecting the independence and the rights of members of the House of Commons. The evidence I gave of that disregard was to be found in the letter which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) wrote to my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), in which he threatened him with the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police but suggested that before the R.C.M.P. were put on the job my leader might help him out by giving certain information. I contend—

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege may I say that the letter contains no threat or implied threat whatever.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no? Why was it written?

Mr. Claxton: It states a fact.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I will not argue with that assertion by the Minister of National Defence. The letter is on the record and those who read it may judge for themselves.

Mr. Fleming: It speaks for itself.

Mr. Knowles: I will come back to that aspect of the matter in a few minutes. Before

I do so, however, I should like to confront this house with this question. Why is it that the government is trying to make a red herring out of the fact that an earlier copy of the Currie report came into our hands?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Absolutely wrong.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the raucous interruptions that are now taking place indicate the answer to that question. The answer is that the government and the supporters of the government are smarting under the fact that they were caught in the act—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You were caught in the act.

Mr. Knowles: They were caught in the act of seeing in advance a copy of a report that was supposed to be independent, that was supposed to give the minister what he said he wanted, namely the truth. They were caught in the act of seeing that report in advance and of having the opportunity to suggest changes in it.

An hon. Member: Absolute rubbish.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the seriousness of what the government has been caught doing is far worse now in view of what the Minister of National Defence said on Tuesday and in view of the correspondence with Mr. Currie that he placed upon Hansard. At the moment I refer to the correspondence that he intended to place on Hansard, not the letter that he placed there inadvertently. When one reads that correspondence and when one takes note of what the Minister of National Defence had to say the other day, it becomes clear that Mr. Currie did not want to submit his first draft to anyone in the department for the purpose of looking it over. I remind the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that on December 17, when he made his statement on this matter and answered certain questions, he made a definite statement in answer to a question of mine. As reported at page 829 of Hansard, I asked whether it was the general practice, as to reports which are made on any particular department, to refer them to the head of that department before the report is presented. In part of his reply the Prime Minister said:

> I was quite surprised to learn that this investigator had felt that it was the proper thing to be done.

I think all of us who were here in the house at the time remember the forthrightness with which the Prime Minister made that statement. I for one shared his surprise that anyone would think that this was the proper thing to do. But, Mr. Speaker, as a result of what the Minister of National Defence said on Tuesday and as a result of his tabling his correspondence with Mr. Currie, it now comes out that Mr. Currie did not think it was the thing to be done. Mr. Currie was opposed to showing to the department an earlier copy of the report that he eventually made to the minister. Not only was he opposed in the first instance to showing a copy, but Mr. Drury, the deputy minister, agreed with Mr. Currie that that should not be done. But despite the reluctance or the disinclination of Mr. Currie to show an advance copy to the department, despite his contention that it should not be done, despite the agreement that Mr. Drury expressed with that position, the Minister of National Defence suggested to Mr. Drury that he press Mr. Currie on the point; and it was only after the Minister of National Defence got into the picture and put that pressure upon Mr. Currie that he finally, reluctantly and despite his disinclination to do so, let the department see the report on certain conditions which he spells out in his letter.

When I put my question to the Prime Minister on December 17, he said that he was surprised that Mr. Currie thought this was a proper thing to have done. If he was surprised that Mr. Currie thought it was a proper thing to be done, what does he think now? Does he not think that he owes an apology to Mr. Currie for suggesting that Mr. Currie thought this was a proper thing to be done, when it is clear that Mr. Currie had no such view? What does the Prime Minister think now of the Minister of National Defence who was responsible for this course of action at which the Prime Minister was surprised? Not only did the Prime Minister give the answer to my question which I have already read, but in his own prepared statement that he gave us that morning of December 17, 1952, as reported at page 827 of Hansard he said this:

> The inquiries also disclosed that Mr. Currie and his representatives discussed this matter with the deputy minister and that the suggestion was made that the deputy minister might go over the draft, when it was ready, and point out any inaccuracies in the facts reported which had been obtained from the department itself. The deputy minister mentioned this suggestion to the minister and the minister authorized him to go over this draft but told him to be extremely careful to make no comment about anything but the facts that had been obtained from the department.

I admit that that statement is capable of different interpretations, if one wants to put different interpretations on it. But the plain and simple interpretation that seems to me to arise from it is that the Prime Minister, when he made his inquiries following my question on December 17, was informed that the suggestion that the report should be seen in the department first emanated from Mr. Currie, that it went from Mr. Currie to Mr. Drury and then that Mr. Drury reported that to his minister, the Minister of National Defence, and that the Minister of National Defence agreed. But the story that the Minister of National Defence told us on Tuesday of this week puts it in reverse. From the minister's statement as well as from Mr. Currie's letter, it is clear that the idea of this report being "vetted" in the department did not originate with Mr. Currie. It originated in the department. When Mr. Currie refused, the minister himself took the opposite position, and he has to take the full responsibility for being the one to put pressure upon Mr. Currie to do what Mr. Currie did not want to do and to do what the Prime Minister on December 17 said he was surprised to learn had been done. I therefore submit that this question is a fair one to ask the Prime Minister: Is it not time that he made an apology to Mr. Currie, and what is he going to do about the action of the Minister of National Defence in putting that improper pressure upon Mr. Currie?

Mr. Speaker, I understand why the government is trying to find some red herring, some way in which to becloud this issue; because the plain fact is that they are caught in the act right down the line. The Minister of National Defence stood up here in the house the other day and said that what he wanted, when he asked Mr. Currie to make this investigation, was the truth. Those were his words: "I wanted the truth". It now turns out that he wanted some official of his to see that truth before it was put in final form to be presented to parliament. What kind of truth is that that one is asking for if, when your department is being investigated, you ask for the right to have the so-called truth about your department "vetted" before it is put before parliament?

The Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) referred to this matter when he spoke on December 17 and suggested to us in this house that we should be extremely grateful to the Minister of National Defence for letting us have this report. After all, according to him, it was just a little personal document out of the minister's desire to have the truth about his department, and he was exceedingly generous—he was courageous—in letting us have it; and we should show our appreciation of that courage and of that generosity by not making such open attacks on the Minister of National Defence.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the more one goes into this whole story the more it is true to say in this very simple language, the government has been caught in the act of doing things that it had no right to do as the government of a democratic country. I suggest that someone has got to clear up this discrepancy in the reports given to us on December 17 by the Prime Minister, and on Tuesday of this week by the Minister of National Defence, and that in that connection we have got to know just where the cabinet stands on this whole issue of how this question was handled.

Now, Mr. Speaker, not only has the government been caught in the act of making these changes and of pressing Mr. Currie to do something that he did not want to do, but the government has, as I said on Tuesday night, been caught permitting its top military people to take unto themselves authority and a position which it is not correct for them to take in a democratic state. I want to come back to that for just a minute, Mr. Speaker, because I felt on Tuesday night that that was the most important—

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Knowles: —part of what I had to say at that time, namely, that the most serious issue—

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired, and he may continue only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Knowles: I thank the house, Mr. Speaker. I shall be just a very few minutes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Claxton: Go ahead.

Some hon. Members: You can't take it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I gathered that there was general consent to the hon. member continuing.

Mr. Knowles: I sincerely thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the house. I shall express that appreciation by being just as brief as I can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: And I thank the house for their approval of that sentiment, too. Therefore for a minute or two we are on good terms. But I now want to repeat and underline the importance of the issue which I raised on Tuesday night, namely, that we are in a very bad way in a democracy if we allow the military people, the top brass, to assume an attitude of superiority to the civil authority, to the elected government of this country. I need not repeat at this time the five examples that I gave on Tuesday night of ways in which, in my view, the military people, the chief of the general staff, and the officials of the minister's department, have been dictating to the government, yes, dictating to the Prime Minister, in a way that they have no right to do, and I call upon this government to put the military in the place in which it belongs as the servant of the state.

Now, with this I will close. I just wish to give the house three or four quotations from the debate—

Mr. MacDougall: Give us your amendment.

Mr. Knowles: I have already given the amendment to the Speaker, and I shall put it when I sit down. I have already indicated to the house that in my view the Sandys case of 1938—in the United Kingdom parliament—is one that this government should study very closely. Here was a case where, when the attorney general of that government interrogated a member of parliament as to where he got certain information, it became not a question that was referred to the police, not a question for further threats, but a question for an important historical constitutional procedural debate in the mother of parliaments that took place on June 29, 1938. It covers eighty columns or forty pages of the British Hansard, so obviously I cannot read very much of it. But let me give one or two quotations from some of the really important people who took part in that debate. For example, at column 2166 I find the Right Hon. Clement Attlee said this:

> If it is once thought that members of this house can be brought up and interrogated and obliged to give up the sources of their information when they speak in this house, on the ground that it was suspected they were using official information improperly got, there would soon come a cutting away of members of this house from the public service, and there would be apprehension among members of the public service when mixing with members of parliament. They might easily say something which a member might use afterwards, and it might be traced to them.

That is part of a lengthy speech in which Mr. Attlee emphasizes the importance of the principle that was at stake, the right of individual members of parliament to receive information and to use that information in whatever way they thought was best for the good of the state without being pilloried by the executive of the day.

Similarly, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill spoke in the same debate, and it is a Churchillian masterpiece which I shall not attempt to read in full, in which he said in part:

> A member of parliament has a duty to discharge. If he has information he must try his best to make that information effective upon the government. He must make sure that a minister knows the truth.

He goes on to say that even if it is unpalatable truth he must get it to the minister, even if he has to use it in debate or in question time in the house.

He goes on to tell of his own experience at times when information came into his possession, perhaps a little irregularly, but information which he was able to use to the advantage of the state. While telling of one of these experiences he said:

> But I am bound to say that it came to me with a shock of astonishment to learn that he would have been entitled to send the attorney general to me to ask me where I got that information.

Mr. Churchill was referring to the prime minister. His speech is to be found from column 2173 to column 2182 in the British Hansard of June 30, 1938. Later on in the speech he gives five or six examples, some of them involving himself, some of them involving others, where information leaked out which members of parliament were able to bring to the attention of the government, with the result that real good was done to the state.

Then I turn to Sir Archibald Sinclair. Let us bring a Liberal into this as well, and I find that at column 2171 he said:

> Certainly, the government have the right to exact strict loyalty, discretion and obedience from their servants, but members of parliament are responsible to the people whom they represent in this house. They are not responsible to the attorney-general or to any minister of the government. It would be deplorable if all sources of information were dried up. There may be some dangers, but there are great safeguards. There is the power of Mr. Speaker to disallow questions. There are great safeguards, and there are still graver dangers in the encroachment of the executive upon the rights of parliament.

That is something that this government should pay some attention to, and they should note the next sentence which fits so well here:

> Governments are too apt to confuse danger to themselves with danger to the state.

Then my last quotation, Mr. Speaker, comes from Mr. Arthur Henderson and is found at column 2194 of the same Hansard in which he said in concluding a very effective speech:

> Once you destroy parliamentary privilege and make it impossible for members of parliament to listen to anyone who comes to them with information which, rightly or wrongly, is conceived to be in the public interest and which that member of parliament should receive, issues will be raised which will strike at the very foundations of parliament. I hope that it will now be decided beyond a peradventure that the privileges of this house are still to be maintained and will be enforced, in order to protect any hon. member in relation to his parliamentary duties.

It is unnecessary for me to comment, Mr. Speaker. These quotations speak for themselves, and I feel I should respect the privilege the house has given me to go on for these extra minutes by taking no more time on this occasion. Therefore I will conclude at this time by moving, seconded by my deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"and to give consideration to the desirability of recommending that Mr. Currie be asked to conduct a further inquiry into any other expenditures and commitments covered by the terms of this resolution."

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned his amendment the other evening, and I have had an opportunity of considering it. It gives me some concern, in several aspects. I think the house has agreed that consideration can be given to directing a committee to do something which it has the power to do, but which it might otherwise not do. This amendment would come within that ruling.

However, there is a limit to what a committee can do. A committee obviously can do what is included in the terms of a motion under which the committee is set up. There are also other incidental things that the committee can do.

Would the recommendation to retain Mr. Currie to continue his inquiry be a recommendation which that committee could make to the house? The committee obviously could not direct Mr. Currie to do that, by itself. The recommendation, if made by the committee, would be to continue an inquiry that Mr. Currie had started, and the report of which is before the committee.

After giving that point careful consideration—and I do not think I shall hear argument on it—I have come to the conclusion that on that ground the amendment should be allowed to stand. But I should point out the reason I am allowing it to stand on that ground is that it would be a recommendation that the person who made the report should continue.

There is also a technical point which I could raise, and that is whether the amendment is an amendment to the amendment or an amendment to the main motion. I think if I were being very technical—for which I hope I have not a reputation—I could consider that as a serious argument.

In allowing the amendment to stand I do not want it to be considered a precedent which must be followed.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope no one will have the impression that because I rise at this moment I intend to question the ruling you have just made. Nothing would be farther from my thoughts than to do that.

I would not have considered it necessary, or even useful, to enter again into this debate on the Currie report, were it not for two speeches made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and particularly for the one he has just concluded. But I feel very strongly about two aspects of those speeches, not so much because of their bearing on the present situation, but because of their possible effect on the thinking in this House of Commons, and among the public, about proper democratic processes, and the proper relationship between the civilian authority and the armed forces on the one hand, and the proper conduct of the executive and of members of parliament in relation to public affairs—and even in relation to party strife between groups of members of parliament in relation to public affairs.

Now, the hon. gentleman is sometimes inclined to set himself up not only as an authority, having made profound studies of parliamentary practices, constitutional traditions and parliamentary rules of procedure, but also as an example of rectitude for the rest of us to follow in our own public conduct. There seems to have been some indication at least on this occasion that members of the official opposition, by their applause, are taking the hon. gentleman at his own valuation.

Because of that I feel that, having a responsibility of leadership in this house, I would be remiss in my duty if, by my silence, I allowed the impression to be created that I agreed with any of the views expressed by the hon. gentleman on those two main branches, namely the proper relationship between the civilian authority and those responsible for the armed forces, and the proper relationship between the executive and members of parliament, and between members of parliament and the general public, and the manner in which it is proper for them to envisage their responsibility, and to shape their conduct accordingly.

Now, I wish to make it quite clear that I cannot agree with the hon. member on those aspects. I wish first of all to deal with the proper relationship between the civilian authority and those responsible for the organization and the training and—yes—the fighting of our armed forces, when they have to fight.

There is no doubt that under our system it is the civilian authority that is supreme; but there is also no doubt that those at the head of our armies do, as they have done ever since we have had armed forces, carry and discharge very heavy responsibilities to the nation to which they belong.

Mr. Harkness: We all agree with that.

Mr. St. Laurent: Now, the hon. gentleman seems to suggest that, whatever happens or whatever is said about them, they must remain silent, and still be satisfied to carry on and to discharge their heavy responsibilities.

Well, with that I do not agree. Nor do I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) that they have to be dumb, so far as everybody else is concerned, and not utter a word, except through the minister.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Wright: The Prime Minister has said that I suggested they should be dumb. I did not suggest they should be dumb. I said they should speak through the minister who represents them.

An hon. Member: The same thing.

Mr. St. Laurent: I wish first of all to call attention to some of the expressions used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on Tuesday. At page 968 of Hansard he is reported to have said this:

> The point that we feel is most serious about this whole business is the question as to the proper place of the armed forces in a democracy. Are they the servant of the state, of the people of the country through their elected representatives, or are they in charge? Are the armed forces entitled to dictate to the government and to push other people around? In our view there has been too much evidence of that attitude throughout this whole business, and that is our primary concern at the present time.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not had any evidence of dictation to the government or of pushing people around. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

> Hon. members will recall that, when he—

The Prime Minister.

> —tabled the report, he placed on Hansard at the same time a memorandum from the chief of the general staff. During the course of his remarks at that time he stated that he was giving us that memorandum because the chief of the general staff thought that the views contained in that memorandum should be given publicity at the same time as the revelations contained in the Currie report itself. When the Prime Minister was questioned by my deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort, during the course of debate in the next day or so as to why he had done this, the Prime Minister interjected to say that he was prepared to give the answer right then and there. He said he did it because he was requested to do so by the chief of the general staff. In our view, Mr. Speaker, the chief of the general staff had no right to ask the elected Prime Minister of this country to table that memorandum, and in our view the Prime Minister had no right to accede to that request.

I take full responsibility, Mr. Speaker, for having acceded to that request and I disagree with the hon. gentleman in his statement that the chief of the general staff had no right to make that request. I submit that he had a perfect right to make that request and that it was a request about which I had to take the responsibility. I did take the responsibility of putting that document before the house at the same time I tabled the report, and I did so because there was a certain part of that report which, though it was a report dealing with only the works branch of the army, might be interpreted as applying to the whole army. If it were interpreted in that way it was in my opinion, as in the opinion of the general staff stated to me, something that would be very damaging to the organization and morale of our army.

What is it that is contained in the memorandum? It is printed at page 640 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> Army Headquarters
> Ottawa, 15 December, 1952
> The Minister
> I have read the report on the investigation of army works services by Mr. George Currie.
> He reaches conclusions and makes recommendations which must be the subject of careful study before I am in a position to advise you as to the extent to which remedial action has already been taken and what other steps I would recommend.
> In defining his task Mr. Currie states "I have conducted an investigation into the deficiencies and other irregularities of the engineering detachment of the army works services at Petawawa and elsewhere".
> However, included in Mr. Currie's report are statements which may be interpreted by the public as a condemnation of the competence, integrity and efficiency of the army as a whole. I refer particularly to the statements in the last paragraph of part 1 of his report.

This has already been referred to in the house as page 17 of the offset reproduction of the report. I continue:

> I understand this report is to be made public and if such statements made by Mr. Currie are interpreted by the public and the serviceman as having reference to the army as a whole the effect will be most damaging.
> I, therefore, request that Mr. Currie clarify publicly whether such statements are intended to refer, as his quoted opening remarks would appear to indicate, to the engineering work services only, or whether they are intended to refer to the Canadian army as a whole. If the latter is the intention then I would further request that Mr. Currie provide publicly the facts upon which such opinions and observations are based.

Under the National Defence Act the chief of the general staff has the responsibility for the Canadian army, and if a statement is made and put forward by the government without any qualification, or any hint that it does not agree with it, that is interpreted as reflecting upon the competence, integrity and efficiency of the army as a whole, I think it is the duty of the chief of the general staff to wish to have that cleared up, and if that is the conclusion that is ultimately arrived at I am sure that anyone worthy of becoming at any time the chief of the general staff would feel that he could do nothing but abandon his position and let somebody else take over the responsibility who is going to discharge it in a more competent and efficient manner.

Here in this country, you know, public service, not only on the civilian side but on the military side as well, is provided by men many of whom do so at personal sacrifice of their own pecuniary interests, and the main and practically the only compensation they get for the sacrifice they make is the personal satisfaction of feeling that they are doing something useful for their nation and their fellow citizens. When it becomes apparent that they can no longer have that feeling, or can have the feeling that it is shared by those with whom they are performing that work, then there is no further reason for them to continue in office. Does anyone imagine, Mr. Speaker, that I would be doing for anyone but the public service what I have been doing for the last four or five years for the pecuniary compensation that I get for it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: Does anyone imagine that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) did what he did during the war years for the pecuniary compensation he got out of it? Fortunately there are many in this country—and I think it would include practically everybody in this house—who feel that when there is a service to be performed for the country and for their fellow citizens it is not the pecuniary compensation that is going to entice them to give that service. It is for the moral satisfaction they get out of it that they are doing their part, as their ancestors before them did their part, to build up the country and to pass it on to future generations as a good country of which to be a citizen and a good country in which to live.

All that was requested by the chief of the general staff was that if this document, which might have that ambiguous implication, were going to be made public, there should be an opportunity for clearing up the ambiguity and saying whether or not it did refer to the competence and integrity of the whole army set-up or whether it referred to the few crooks—and I am paraphrasing the expression used in the report—who had been guilty of irregularities, yes of crimes, for which our courts of justice have meted out to them the sentences they are now serving in our penal institutions.

If, in attempting to clear up that ambiguity, it was cleared up in a way that might reflect upon the competence and integrity of the whole army, then the chief of the general staff requested that further facts be made public to show on what the condemnation of their competence and efficiency was based. I think that it was not only the right but the responsibility and duty of the chief of the general staff to all the loyal officers and men under his command to take that position and to ask that the ambiguity be cleared up, and if it were maintained that a reflection was meant to be cast upon the efficiency of the whole service, then the facts upon which that assertion was made should be made public so that effective methods could be adopted to have and to maintain in this country the kind of competent and honest military forces upon which we have fortunately had the privilege of relying in two world wars where perhaps our very existence as a nation was at stake.

A second point with which I wish to deal is the statement made by the hon. gentleman that the chief of staff had no right to say—and I think his words were—"to the personnel of the service and the employees of national defence" that they were not to discuss the Currie report. Again, the hon. gentleman knows that the chief of staff never attempted to make such a suggestion to the employees of the Department of National Defence. The hon. gentleman knows that that direction was given on December 15 in the form of a signal which reads as follows:

> From: Can Army
> To: Wescom, Pracom, Cencom, Quecom, Eascom
> For GOC from CGS.
> Now, I take it that means: From Canadian army headquarters to western command, prairie command, central command, Quebec command, and eastern command, for general officer commanding from chief of general staff.
>
> Para One The report covering the investigation by Mr. George Currie of the army works services is about to be tabled in the House of Commons.
> Para Two It is possible that interested parties may attempt to obtain comments on this report from serving personnel. I would therefore remind you that this report is a privileged document in the hands of the government and it is obviously improper at this time for any serving officer or man to make any comment on it.

"Privileged document" I take it here is not "privileged document" as my hon. friend from Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I, in court parlance, would understand it. We would probably not describe that as a privileged document although it was a document which was in the hands of the government and which was about to be tabled in the House of Commons. I think that this was a wise direction to say that possibly——interested parties may attempt to obtain comments on this report from serving personnel.

And—

—it is obviously improper at this time for any serving officer or man to make any comment on it.

Now, that is the second incident of the "dictation" referred to by my hon. friend, and to the "pushing around" referred to by him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are they free to discuss it now?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think it would be proper for them to be discussing it. I think that it is proper for them to wait until there has been some opportunity to obtain that clarification of the ambiguous portion to which the chief of staff refers in the memorandum addressed to his minister and with which, because of the absence of his minister, he asked me to deal.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Prime Minister permit a question? Does the Prime Minister know whether there was any order by the chief of the general staff requesting "that no discussion be entered into by employees of the Department of National Defence on the m/n report"—the reference being to the Currie report? If the Prime Minister does not know of any such order, perhaps I can have this little slip investigated.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the hon. gentleman had better have that little slip investigated because the information I received was that the only direction given by the chief of staff was the direction that is included in this signal which went out from headquarters on December 15. That is the information I have and I have information that implies that there was no other attempted instruction given by the chief of staff.

In connection with that matter what the hon. gentleman said was:

Indeed as I have said, I read with interest in the press that the chief of the general staff had issued orders that members of the armed forces and employees of national defence were requested not to discuss the Currie report.

I have seen nothing in the press to that effect and the information I received is that this signal to the general officers commanding the various military commands throughout the country was the only direction given.

Mr. Knowles: When the Prime Minister is through I will come across and show him the slip to which I refer.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman has already shown me something the source of which has become a matter of considerable concern not only to me but to a great many of the public.

An hon. Member: A red herring.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not anxious to share any confidences with the hon. gentleman which have been obtained in the way in which it appears that a copy of Mr. Currie's work was obtained.

The hon. gentleman went on to say that——while the chief of the general staff denies to the people to whom he can issue orders the right to discuss the Currie report, he does not hesitate to discuss it himself.

I assume that the hon. gentleman was referring to the terms of the memorandum I have just read. I submit that that memorandum is no discussion of the Currie report. It is a request that what the chief of staff looked upon as an ambiguity, an unfortunate ambiguity in the report, might be cleared up.

Another point with which I would like to deal quite briefly is the Canadian Army Journal to which the hon. gentleman referred. Now, I have here a copy of the Canadian Army Journal, the December number, and I have been informed that the message to the Canadian army from the chief of the general staff was written and sent in for inclusion in that publication in November before any part of the working papers or of the Currie report had come before the Department of National Defence—and long before there had been any criticism in this house of anything referred to in the Currie report. Now, the hon. gentleman has been very severe in the language he used with respect to this general message from the chief of staff to the Canadian army. It is true that the effect of this message was featured quite prominently in Canadian press dispatches that were published, perhaps before the first one I saw which was in a newspaper dated January 13. But it is not surprising that the press should, even if it had this for weeks, think that it was something of interest to the reading public to be featured in its news columns at that time.

This message was written because of a large number of critical references to incidents occurring in the army, and published over a period of months in some of the Canadian newspapers. The copy of his message to the Canadian army written by the chief of staff has annexed to it a large number of newspaper clippings, none of them subsequent to the date of the first showing of the working paper for the Currie report to the deputy minister of national defence. Now, I think that this message from the chief of the general staff to the Canadian army is quite a proper message for one to issue to personnel for whose morale he is responsible, as he is for the competence and efficiency of the army of which he is the chief. That is all I wish to say about these relations between the civilian authority and the army. No one will gainsay that under our system the civilian authority is supreme in our constitutional set-up, but no one will gainsay that the armed forces are essential to the subsistence of our constitutional set-up, and no one will gainsay that their competence and efficiency depends to a certain degree upon the respect in which those who are at the head are held, and are entitled to be held, by the nation which they serve.

Now, the second matter with which I shall deal is the receipt and use of a stolen working paper, prepared on behalf of a professional man, and which the hon. gentleman thought it was his duty, in the public interest, to use in this house.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) if he is in a position to say categorically that it was a stolen copy?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think I will be in a position, within a very short time, not only to say that it is a stolen document but to say who stole it. But just drawing conclusions from obvious facts, I think it is quite obvious that that document was not obtained from the Department of National Defence. There was only one copy delivered to the Department of National Defence on November 27, and it was returned to Mr. Currie's partner on December 8 when the signed report was then delivered to the department.

The information contained in Mr. Currie's letter is to the effect that there were only ten copies of the offset pages stitched together, and his investigation had been such that he was able to account for all ten of them. There had been additional pages, some ninety or more perhaps, which had been prepared at the same time in the printer's office and neither Mr. Currie nor the printer was able to account for every copy of every page that had been offset in the same process and at the same time. At first he did not believe the copy was one of the offset copies, but it turned out to be one of them. He was allowed by the hon. gentleman to inspect the copy, and he and his representatives satisfied themselves that it was one of the same offset copies as had been prepared by this printing firm.

Now, that copy found its way into the hands of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). At that time it did not appear to be very serious. This was a document that was going to be tabled, and whether or not one got advance information about it did not seem to be very important. When the hon. gentleman first mentioned it here on December 15 he was quite surprised that there had been, in the report as finalized and signed, any modification from the working paper of which he had a copy. But when he spoke on December 17, and when he spoke yesterday and again today, he knew from the information that I had given to the house that this was not a report nor a copy of the report, but this was a preliminary working paper which had not been completed, which had not been signed and which differed in some respects from the report which was made and which was signed.

There is no other possible suggestion for it being elsewhere than in the printer's office than the suggestion that someone improperly took it out of the printer's office and delivered it to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Graydon: It might have blown out of the window.

Mr. St. Laurent: No, those pages had not been stitched together, and I do not think the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) would seriously suggest that it would so happen that 74 pages would be blown out a window, picked up in the alley and from there brought to the member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Knowles: That would be an ill wind that blew the Liberals no good.

Mr. St. Laurent: The experience of the Liberals has not been that Providence treats them in that unkind way.

Now, I am assuming that this copy was taken without Mr. Currie's consent or without the consent of anyone authorized to give consent on Mr. Currie's behalf, and without the printer's consent or the consent of anyone authorized to give consent on the printer's behalf. In common parlance that is usually referred to as stealing. The whole situation has all the earmarks of the copy having been taken away in a manner which is called theft. I would think that possibly under the circumstances there would be such public-spirited citizens that, if they felt they had come in any way into possession of information that was essentially of interest to the security of the state, and that they did not trust the members of the government or any supporter of the government with that information, they might think it was a proper thing to convey it to somebody other than a member of the government or a supporter of the government. But I think that the obvious choice they would make would be to convey it to the leader of the official opposition whose duty it is to see to it that information of real interest to the public becomes available to the public. This document did not go to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). It went to my hon. friend's leader who has not yet become the leader of the official opposition.

Mr. Fraser: And never will.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not want to make any prophecies. After all, I am in my own country, and no one is a good prophet in his own country. I therefore leave it to the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). However that may be, the fact that this document did not go to the leader of the official opposition seems to nullify the suggestion that it might be in the discharge of a patriotic urge to save the country that it was being communicated. I am not saying that this was the case, but if it was being handed to the leader of the C.C.F. group as an implement to be used in party strife, all I can say is that I would deprecate it greatly if our politics sank to the level where, in the conduct of our strife with each other, we had to have agents to steal confidential documents or had to have agents to tap telephone wires.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is something of the same nature and something about which—

Mr. Fulton: The government of which you were a member was the one to have that done.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not catch that interjection. This amplification system is convenient in some ways but it does not allow you to catch all the interjections which come from the various corners of the house.

Mr. Fulton: Especially those you do not want to hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will tell my hon. friend that, except when he is making a long and repetitious speech, I like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Fulton: The same thing may be said about others.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think there are privileges that members of parliament have, and that those privileges are not only sacred to them but are essential to the proper functioning of our democratic institutions. Quite frankly, however, I may say that I do not think those privileges require us to receive stolen property and to make use of it. We are all of us responsible to the public and each one of us is responsible to the electors of his constituency. I do not think that anyone wants to set himself up as too severe a judge of others; but there are definitely implications—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no brief for anyone but I do not think that the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not think that the Prime Minister or anyone else in this house has a right to say of a member of parliament that he is a receiver of stolen goods.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to insist upon a technical legal definition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should hope not.

Mr. St. Laurent: But I suggest that no one is entitled, because of his privileges as a member of parliament, to have in his possession a thing that has been stolen if he knows it was stolen.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. Is the Prime Minister suggesting that my leader knew that he was receiving a stolen document?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not making any suggestion at all. I am merely commenting upon facts which are already notorious to the Canadian public.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a question of privilege. I think that, on mature reflection, the Prime Minister will realize that statements like that should not be made. The other day, Mr. Speaker, you ruled that a suggestion about independence—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh yes, Mr. Speaker, you ruled that even a suggestion from this side of the house that members were not independent was dangerous to the privileges of parliament. I hold no brief for wrongdoing, and I know nothing about this matter; but surely the Prime Minister dare not make such statements.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am subject to your direction, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wright: I rise on a question of privilege. In my opinion—and I think a reading of Hansard will prove that I am right—the Prime Minister has implied that the leader of this group received stolen property knowing that it was stolen.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Wright: I think a reading of Hansard will indicate that; and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw any such implication.

Mr. Speaker: I did not understand the Prime Minister to make that statement. I will leave it to him. The Prime Minister knows whether or not he made that statement.

Mr. St. Laurent: What I stated was that this was a stolen document, and that, prior to coming into the possession of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), it was in the hands of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I do not know how it got there, but it is a stolen document. To anyone who does not know any more than I know about it, it appears to be a stolen document. I think that anyone who has it would feel some concern as to whether or not it was a stolen document.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order or question of privilege, may I say that I feel it is a particularly serious matter, especially in view of the unfortunate absence of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The Prime Minister keeps using language that suggests that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar knew, when he received this document, that it was stolen, and I object to that language.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear what is being said because there are so many interruptions.

Mr. Knowles: If the Prime Minister did not mean that and will say clearly that he did not mean it, I will not press the point further. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that, in addition to this language, a few minutes ago the Prime Minister said he did not think it was necessary for us in parliament, in the pursuit of our privileges, to have agents out getting this kind of property. That is a suggestion that my leader had an agent out trying to get this property, something which is completely false. As a matter of fact—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That point can be denied later on.

Mr. Knowles: I deny it categorically.

Mr. Speaker: The question I am concerned with at the moment is whether the Prime Minister has at this time stated that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar received the report knowing, at the time he received it, that it was stolen. I did not understand him to say so. I should like to clear up that point.

Mr. St. Laurent: I did not intend to say that he knew it. I intended to suggest that circumstances were such that he might very well be thought to have known it. I do not know whether he did or not—I hope he did not.

Mr. Graydon: Why don't you clean the whole thing up by withdrawing?

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not going to clean the whole thing up by withdrawing anything I have said because I cannot, by anything I say, manufacture facts nor alter facts that have taken place.

Now, with respect to the suggestion that the letter printed in Hansard of Tuesday constitutes a threat, I cannot read it as being such. Was it, or was it not, proper that any efforts be made to find out how this confidential document went from the printer's office to somewhere else? I say from the printer's office, though until the matter is cleared up there could be suspicion on every person connected with both the printer's office and Mr. Currie's office.

It is known—and it is nothing to be ashamed of—that both in the printer's office and in Mr. Currie's office there are people who take an active interest in party politics, and who have done so, exercising their proper democratic right. Until this matter is cleared up everyone who could possibly have done this thing of communicating one of Mr. Currie's working papers to somebody unauthorized to have it is equally subject to suspicion. All that was said to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was to notify him that at Mr. Currie's suggestion the R.C.M.P. were being—

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps there was no suggestion about the R.C.M.P., but Mr. Currie's suggestion that there might be further investigation. The R.C.M.P. were being asked to make that further investigation. Well, what would the hon. gentleman have said about the Minister of National Defence if he had requested that the R.C.M.P. continue that investigation without giving any notice whatsoever to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar? This is merely information that the R.C.M.P. is being asked to follow up the investigation that Mr. Currie has been making, and the suggestion that if he felt it proper to say where the document came from it might facilitate the investigation. There is no veiled threat there, no attempt to coerce, no attempt to put pressure upon anybody, and no attempt to draw any red herrings across the situation that the hon. gentleman qualifies as "having been caught in the act". That is a suggestion made with respect to the changes that appeared between the working paper and the draft that was finally signed by Mr. Currie.

Those changes were made entirely upon the responsibility of Mr. Currie, who was making a report to the Minister of National Defence, not a report to the House of Commons, not a report to the governor in council, but to the head of the Department of National Defence. I was surprised that there had been any prior discussion of the terms in which that report was to be made. But the hon. gentleman and I do know that when the Mainguy report about the navy was published it did contain factual mistakes that were used in an effort to throw some discredit upon it. And I do not think it is strange that the minister should have hoped that this report would be as free from mistakes, factual mistakes, as possible.

The thing that I wonder at is that there were not more comments made to Mr. Currie's representatives about some other things which appear to be factual mistakes in the terms of this report. As I remember it, there was not anything at all said about the horses, and we now have it quite clear that there were no non-existent persons placed on the payroll, and there were no horses placed on the payroll. Perhaps I might take this opportunity of referring to a remark of the hon. member for Nanaimo in his interesting speech, following the Minister of National Defence, that because I had made a qualification about the information I got, we appeared to be more ready to accept the testimony of a man who is now in the penitentiary than the categorical affirmation of Mr. George Currie.

Well, I hope the hon. gentleman understood that when I was making that qualification it referred only to such matters as were not those that would appear in the official documents. The names of all those who were put on the payroll are on the payroll, and they are all names of existing persons. What I was qualifying—

Mr. Graydon: They were playing proxies for the horses.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, perhaps the hon. gentleman has not had the experience I have had of acting sometimes as a teamster. I do not think that the teamster is a proxy for the horses that are pulling the load. What I was making the qualification about was as to the refund that was handed back by the teamsters to Sergeant Young who had provided the horses. That does not appear on the payroll. That information was gathered from written confessions made by Sergeant Young both to the provost corps officials and to the R.C.M.P.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Now, he is a man who has been convicted and who is now in the penitentiary. Like the hon. member for Nanaimo, I would not care to vouch for the absolute accuracy of everything he said. His statement was that the teamsters retained the ordinary 75 cents plus 5 cents and refunded the remainder to him. Now, that cannot be checked from official records. That is an illegal, irregular transaction that took place between these teamsters and Sergeant Young, and that was the part of my statement upon which I was making the qualification.

While I am dealing with them, I should like to refer to one other point. On Tuesday night the Leader of the Opposition made a broadcast on the Canadian network, the text of which had gone out and was distributed for release at 7.45 eastern standard time. I have it on good authority, from persons who listened to the broadcast, that there were some additions in what went over the air that were not in the text. The reference in the text to the Petawawa horses is this:

> The thought of horses on the payroll in the name of non-existent men has been a cause of merriment, and understandably.

It certainly has been the cause of merriment, and the subject of some pretty clever cartoons. I have it from the testimony of persons who heard what went over the air that over the air it was in this form:

> The thought of horses on the payroll in the name of non-existent men—that was reported by Mr. Currie and hasn't been seriously challenged yet—that has been a cause of merriment, and understandably so.

This went over the air on Tuesday night, but I am convinced that it had been recorded for broadcast before the statement I had made in answer to the question of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), which I think would be taken as at least quite a serious challenge to the statement that there were horses on the payroll in the name of non-existent men. But I know from my own experience that frequently there are recordings made that go out over the air at the release hour or date.

Mr. Graydon: That was his working paper.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, no; the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) suggests that the text was a working paper. It was a paper that was delivered to those who are interested in getting the text for release at the time the broadcast was made, while the working paper we have been discussing here was just about ten days prior to the date that the report was completed and signed, and actually delivered.

Unfortunately, however, many of those who heard the broadcast did not hear that there had been any answer to the question of the hon. member for Hamilton West as to what were the actual facts about the horse incident that had, understandably, caused such merriment.

Now, with respect to the amendment suggested by the hon. member, Your Honour has said that this is a direction which would be in order. It certainly appears to be a direction to the committee to do something that they would have the right to do without being directed to do it, and therefore something within the ruling you had previously made. But in view of all the facts which surround the Currie report at this time, I feel that the committee should be left to its own good judgment as to what it might or might not do in that connection, after it will have had an opportunity of hearing the witnesses, including Mr. Currie himself. And, though it is in order, I propose to register my vote against the hon. member's amendment, when we reach the appropriate time to do so.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, we in this group pressed for many years to have the committee on defence expenditures set up. We spoke in favour of it last year, and we are glad to see it set up again this year. During the last session I think the committee did a great deal of extremely valuable work. But all we did in that committee was to learn something about the organization of the armed forces, and to obtain a background for work to come.

I feel now that the committee is ready to proceed with its investigations into the realm of defence expenditures, to look into the entire field and to come forward with some mighty valuable results. To date we have not actually investigated to any great extent in regard to the actual defence expenditures. But if the committee set up this year works fearlessly and without thought of political affiliation, if it works without thought of endangering the stand of any party, then I think we can make an extremely valuable contribution, and one that will reflect great credit upon the members who comprise the committee.

I am not going to say much about the contents of the Currie report. We put our position quite clearly last fall with respect to it. I would repeat at this time that at no time have we put the blame on the shoulders of the army, but rather we feel that the blame for the entire situation lies with the administration of the Department of National Defence. We do condemn the government for not paying strict enough attention to the spending of the taxpayer's dollar in this regard. We find that today we labour under a tax structure which bears a ratio of five to one with that of 1939. The people's savings are beginning to become pretty well depleted. The dollar has devaluated to the point where people are having difficulty in meeting their bills. The least they can expect is full value for the defence dollar.

Canadians are entitled to and are demanding that we have strict honesty, maximum efficiency and maximum economy in the carrying out of our defence program. In this connection I should like to place on record part of an editorial from a recent edition of the Calgary Albertan. This is what it says:

> The armed forces are notoriously wasteful and inefficient and apparently not much can be done about it. But unless there is an effort to control it, it can get completely out of hand. That's what happened here. There was no effort to control it. Certain senior officers must take immediate responsibility, but ultimately the defence minister, Mr. Claxton, must answer to the people.

I take it that this editorial refers only to the administration and the accounting in the army, and not to its ability in action. All hon. members know about the reputation and the ability of our army. Last fall the Acting Minister of National Defence said that in their rush to get men to fill these positions they had to take the good, bad and indifferent. I agree with him. They got the good—and all the army, with very few exceptions, is good. They got the bad—yes, they got a few crooks, as is pointed out in the Currie report. They got the indifferent; and in my opinion the indifferent are the entire Department of National Defence.

The acting minister said further that we had a shortage of staff, and the other day the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) reiterated that statement. If that is true, why were they so eager to let out so many civilian employees and so many of the personnel of the armed forces, when they knew that a dangerous condition might arise, and that these people might be needed in the near future?

Then, too, if they want to know where to get some men, perhaps they could borrow them from the Department of National Revenue; because some of the so-called little Hitlers who are running around the country checking up on people for their income tax returns might do a mighty good job digging into what is done in the Department of National Defence. And if they are half as good as some of them think they are, then that is the place for them.

Last fall the acting minister made reference to a bank robbery, and said that if a bank were robbed the president was not held to blame. But if the president left the money out on the sidewalk he would be to blame. And we find a similar situation in this instance, because the goods in question were left in the open, with no security measures being observed. They were just asking to be picked up by these people who are described as crooks.

He said, too, that if there were shortages, or that if there was embezzlement within a bank, the employees involved, and not the bank manager, had to pay the shot. The same reply could be made again, that if, through his lack of management, the bank manager made embezzlement possible, then he would be at fault and would be blamed accordingly. Not only that; if a report were made on that particular bank and those findings were made public, they certainly would not be turned over to the bank manager first for his O.K. and correction before being given out. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) may feel, from the fact that he asked Mr. Currie to make this investigation, that he was justified in asking for the report before it was presented to parliament. I also agree that it would be regrettable if there were any mention in the report of the young chap who was acquitted. I also should not like to see R.C.M.P. records put in such a report; but the fault in that regard lies with the minister because when he turned over the job to Mr. Currie he should have made clear what he wanted and did not want in the report. We do not like getting a watered-down report like this one in the House of Commons.

I noticed that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today called the papers in the hands of the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell), working papers. That is the first time that expression has been used in the house. It is a happy thought devised by someone in the government in order to make appear less objectionable the actions of the minister in putting pressure on Mr. Currie to force him to make certain changes in the report before it was signed and delivered.

That brings me to the subamendment. Mr. Currie was appointed to investigate, and made his report. The minister intimated yesterday that the report was of very little value. In the letter of the minister which was accidentally placed on Hansard, and which I understand actually was not sent, the minister told Mr. Currie that. It certainly gives the minister's viewpoint on it.

The fact that Mr. Currie did yield to pressure has caused members of the house to lose a lot of confidence in him. Unlike the Minister of National Defence, we feel the report has been an extremely valuable contribution but we regret that Mr. Currie allowed himself to be intimidated. Therefore in the opinion of this group Mr. Currie's usefulness is pretty well at an end because, for entirely different reasons, he has lost the confidence of members on both sides of the house. We cannot support the subamendment which asks that Mr. Currie be requested to continue and investigate the entire defence structure. We feel instead that a judicial inquiry should be carried on. We believe that a royal commission should be appointed to dig into the defence set-up, including contracts, buildings and everything else relating to defence and defence construction, and that a report should be made to the house as quickly as possible.

Coming to the amendment moved by the minister, he said yesterday that the loss, which was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50,000, was practically negligible when compared with the total expenditure. If that is so and he feels that these losses are of little consequence, why does he insist on the defence expenditure committee looking into the matter first before investigating anything else? Mr. Currie pointed out that there were irregularities. They have been investigated and some of his recommendations have been carried out. The losses incurred have been made known. In my opinion the report has served its purpose.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's statement on the report and his reference to Mr. Currie, and the fact that any political damage which could be done by the report has been done, I wonder whether or not this could be a move to keep the committee from digging into further defence expenditures, investigations which might be embarrassing.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would not be according to the facts. Read the reference before the house and you will see that it covers all expenditures.

Mr. Fair: Then we had better let the committee get at the facts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, I was amazed that the Minister of National Defence would move such an amendment to the motion; first, because it has never been done; second, it would appear to me that it is an indication of lack of faith in the ability of the committee; and third, as I said before, it might be interpreted as a means of bogging down the committee in work which has already been hashed over.

I just want to say one word about the report and the criticisms issued by the chief of the general staff. Many of the points covered by the Prime Minister this afternoon were well taken, but I sometimes wonder whether or not the request that the members of the armed forces should not talk on this subject might come as the result of a fear that people might learn something that he did not want them to learn. I also wonder just how far the chief of the general staff would go and how long he would last if his statements, severe as they were, were contrary to rather than in favour of government policy. It seems to me rather strange that the chief of the general staff would instruct the men under him to keep silent but at the same time get up and speak himself. It is very much like the socialists; they always believe in socializing everyone but themselves, and it just does not make sense.

Mr. Bryce: Keep to the Department of National Defence and never mind socialism.

Mr. Thomas: I do not intend to take any further time of the house, but I do want to say that in my opinion this whole thing is another indication of the total disregard this government has for parliament, for parliamentary procedure and for the people whom these members represent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house for almost thirteen years, and I must say that in those years nothing has ever happened to equal what took place this afternoon. I cannot understand the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in charging a member of this house with one of the most serious criminal offences with which a member can be charged and then finally, having made that charge—unwithdrawn—having recourse to the explanation that he believed that that was a fact.

This is a sorry day for parliament—for the preservation of this institution where, in the discussion of public affairs, however heated we may become on occasion, the maintenance of the proprieties must at all times be upheld and meticulously observed, not only by private members but by the Prime Minister as well, whose rights are no greater than those of any private member in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should add that I hold no brief for those who have done wrong, and if wrong has been done it should be punished.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I see the Prime Minister coming in now so I am going to repeat what I have said. In all my experience in the House of Commons, having seen him through the years observing those proprieties without which parliament cannot be preserved, this afternoon was an occasion the memory of which I can only hope the years will erase. The Prime Minister charged a member of the House of Commons with a serious criminal offence, with no more proof to date than an investigation. I say to the Prime Minister that trials do not take place in the House of Commons. They still remain in the courts. I am disturbed by what the Prime Minister did this afternoon. I think he did it in one of those moments of very great annoyance when discretion leaves as annoyance mounts.

I know nothing of the story connected with the migrations of the document and how it passed from hand to hand. However, my mind goes back, sir, to 1949 when the Prime Minister, speaking in the city of Regina, said there was only one difference between Liberals and C.C.F.—that the C.C.F. were Liberals in a hurry. That might be an explanation of the reason they acquired the document before it came officially to the notice of the house.

Mr. Martin: That is the best part of your speech so far.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This afternoon I am not going to be sidetracked into dealing with the army and the responsibilities of the C.C.F. for getting possession of documents before parliament had them, however embarrassing those documents may be to the government. After all, the issue is—and I say this to the Prime Minister—what are you going to do about this? The Canadian people today, taxed as never before, are not asking us to fight sham battles in the House of Commons or to raise smokescreens regarding circumstances under which documents came to the public gaze. What they are asking the government of this country is to see to it that for every dollar spent for defence a dollar in value will be secured, and that waste and extravagance will end.

One of the things the Currie report did was to give proof, and final proof, of many of the allegations made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and those associated with him, many of them soldiers distinguished in war. Over the years they have stated in this house that waste and extravagance existed in this country. The government intends to do nothing, having appointed Mr. Currie and having placed on his head the halo of all perfections, but set up a committee in parliament with a large and overwhelming majority of Liberal members to determine whether the investigator came to the right conclusion.

That is a strange procedure. I know that on occasions—and I am sure this applies to the Prime Minister—having had a case tried as Currie tried this case and being dissatisfied, being on the losing side, I would have liked nothing better than to get together with the judge or, in the absence of the judge, friends of the losing litigant to review the findings of the judge in order to make them more palatable. That is exactly what is being done by the motion before the house. I thought that today the Prime Minister would stand up in his place and, instead of giving us a lecture on how parliament should act, do something such as was done during the first world war when there was wrongdoing. The prime minister of that day did not ask that the committee of parliament to be set up should be overwhelmingly Conservative. What he asked was that the public accounts committee be set up, and that it go to work and bring in, unfettered by any consideration, the truth as the truth was revealed.

I have before me the debates of that time. I enjoin the Prime Minister even yet to follow that example in setting up this committee. Committees of parliament heretofore in dealing with controversial matters have never shown that independence of their master's voice that is to be expected in a committee that is to review the review made by Mr. Currie, the appointed representative of the government. In 1915, when the public accounts committee was convened, Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden gave these instructions through a representative to the committee and the committee acted on them. I quote from page 2604 of Hansard for April 15, 1915:

> I want to say that if there is any information the committee want, or any wrongdoing, then as far as the government is concerned we want to ferret it right to the bottom; we do not want to shield any person.

Later on he said:

> The government is determined to protect fully the interests of the country in this and in all cases and to take such proceedings as may be necessary for that purpose. I want to repeat here again that so far as this government is concerned they want to prosecute their investigation to the very utmost limit.

Again, on another occasion:

> As representing the government I have stated that we want to get to the bottom of these matters.

With those instructions from the Prime Minister and his representative, the committee met and brought forth evidence of wrongdoing. It exposed wrongdoing instead of adopting the attitude that is being adopted in this case, of trying to have a committee set up in order to review the findings of the umpire appointed by the government, dissatisfied with those findings.

I was amazed at the statement the Prime Minister made this afternoon. Just as a matter of information, I asked him when the army would be able to talk about the Currie report, when the ban against free speech in the army would be removed. The answer he gave was in effect that he presumed it would be after the committee had reported on the report. That is a new type of freedom of speech, the right of the men in the armed forces to voice their opinions on the Currie report after the government has taken that report and put it through the whitewash of a committee which is apparently being set up for that purpose. No, Mr. Speaker, you cannot erase the words of that Currie report. I believe it is in the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam that it is written:

> The moving finger writes; and, having writ,
> Moves on: nor all your piety nor wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

The Currie report stands as one of the greatest indictments of a government ever rendered, for its failure to discover waste and extravagance. It supports the stand taken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). Every time they brought this matter before parliament they were ridiculed. Now the report tells the story.

A rewrite job cannot remove the findings made in that report. It provides the final proof of what Canadians have suspected and have been speaking about from one end of the country to the other, that there is waste, extravagance and negligence of the government in the administration of expenditures for our defence, not only in Petawawa camp but elsewhere. It is not the army that is responsible, and it is not my hon. friends to the left who have the unexpurgated working papers. The responsibility rests upon the government of this country and upon the Prime Minister. It is not discharged by him by reading a lecture to the house or placing himself, as it were, above these things, as if grandchildren were acting rather naughtily without his knowledge.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister had an opportunity of making a declaration that where wrongdoing existed—not the petty thievery to which he referred, but where waste and extravagance existed—it would be eradicated. Instead of taking such a stand, a stand which would have won the keen admiration of the members of this house and of the people of this country, he took it upon himself to devote his time to certain things—if they are wrong that has yet to be established—which in no way afford an escape-hatch to the government for its failure to carry out the responsibilities that it must carry out. When Canadians are being taxed at the highest level in Canadian history, surely they have a right to ask that the attitude of the government will not be that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) —"What is a million anyhow?"—or the recent attitude of the Prime Minister following a suggestion by one of the members of the opposition—". . . that would be only a $3 million saving". The government may set up a committee, and the committee may act as it would act if it were directed, but it cannot remove these two portions of the report which read as follows:

> The conclusion I have come to is that, while there has been a general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting, it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities over a prolonged period of time took place.

Those are the words concerning a general breakdown. Where is there anything of hope for the Canadian people in the message of the Prime Minister today? Calumny of political opponents cannot answer what the Canadian people are asking us in this parliament to do, to end waste and extravagance, realizing that our defence problem will possibly last for generations. Surely the taxpayers of Canada have the right to ask that they be relieved, by the practice of the luxury of denial of waste and extravagance on the part of the government, so they may look forward to reductions in taxation; and by that I do not mean cyclical reductions where the cycle comes around just prior to an election. On the same page of the report, negligence and downright stupidity are revealed in these words:

> —it must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years.

Carelessness is nothing recent; it has continued over a period of years. The report continues:

> The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

If ever there was an indictment of a department, surely that is one. I am glad to note that the minister said he is not looking for any scapegoats. As far as I am concerned we have had enough animals in this matter without a scapegoat. No minister need become a scapegoat. The responsibility is that of the government and of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and it cannot be discharged by placing the responsibility or the blame on the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) alone.

Then, at pages 715 and 716 the report continues:

> There was in addition a serious collapse in security. There was little to prevent or to detect the organized plundering of military stores on a systematic scale, although apparently comparatively little of it took place. If there is excuse for inefficient accounting, there is none for the failure of security which is, after all, a prime military consideration. I take a serious view of this breakdown. If it is easy to pilfer military stores, then, by the same token, it is easy to sabotage military equipment.

Then again, a little later on:

> As mentioned earlier, I consider the security measures in force at Petawawa and elsewhere inadequate.

In other words the condemnation extends to lack of security at Petawawa and other camps. The responsibility for that rests upon the government of this country, and it is a responsibility that is not discharged by the setting up of a committee to ascertain whether or not it will be possible to secure a report that will consist of a varnish or an embroidery of wrongdoing instead of a demand on the part of the Prime Minister and his cabinet that this kind of thing must end.

Yes, we are "spending ourselves to destruction." That is what Lenin said. One of the hopes of communism is that in raising our material defences we shall so continue as to weaken our defences of the soul and of the spirit, that private enterprise will cease. When I look at the Canadian record of expenditure which is revealed again in the Currie report, I think it indicates, as we realized after Korea, that for the billions of dollars spent before that date we had little or nothing to show.

I think one of the records that has been established by this government is this. Never before have so many Canadians paid such high taxes for so little defence. That, in effect, sums up the record, Mr. Speaker. The report indicates that waste and extravagance have taken place. It also indicates that the road is one of uncontrolled spending and that, regardless of warnings given by spokesmen in the opposition on defence matters, by the hon. member for Nanaimo and others, the same conditions prevail in even exaggerated form. If some of the information that comes to members of parliament, and which has come to me, is in fact correct, it indicates that in the building of airports in this country waste is not one of those things that is being denied by careful accounting on the part of the government.

What is the government trying to do? They want to set up a committee. They make a microscopic examination with regard to some of the mistakes that they say exist in the report. No amount of explanation with regard to horses can ever eradicate one thing and it is this. However they were there, there was in fact fraud connected with their being there; and no denial on the part of the government can answer the allegation that at Petawawa there was in fact a situation that has given to Canadians as a whole a horse-laugh but at the same time a realization that if such things could exist, there is no limit to the extent to which waste and extravagance could go undetected.

We ask for action. The Canadian people are asking for action. They are asking for a reduction in taxation. Mr. Speaker, the by-elections in the last two years have indicated clearly that the Canadian people have not that confidence in the government which the government has in the committee that it intends to set up to examine the report by Mr. Currie.

Rights of parliament? Mr. Speaker, no one wants wrongdoing. But the synthetic rage exhibited by the Prime Minister today will not give an answer to the Canadian people, to the question as to why it is that waste and extravagance exist. The people of Canada are beginning to realize why taxation is at its present high level. I am sure that if it continues much longer the Canadian people will be saying to the government what Cromwell once said: "You have sat too long here for any good you have been doing. Depart, I say, and let us have done with you."

Mr. Speaker, the by-elections reveal the people's feelings. In 1935 Mr. King—and I have his speeches here—was answered by those then on the government benches in the same way: "We have a majority". His reply was in effect: "It is a phantom majority. It may be able to secure results now but it is no longer representative of the desire and the wishes of the Canadian people." I believe that today Canadians are not asking for smokescreens by the Prime Minister, and not for annoyances built up over the discovery of a document which, according to the Prime Minister, should not have been brought before parliament. What the people want to know of this government is this, and I come back to it because it is the subject in the minds and hearts of Canadians. Are you no longer qualified to meet the challenge to do away with waste and extravagance? Have you become all-powerful? Must a man like Pitt in Winnipeg be dismissed, or rather translated into other spheres because he did not show the respect to the members of the government, or to some of them, that those members believe they are entitled to? Have we come to a position in this country where, regardless of what is being done, a committee is to be set up the purpose of which is as clear as one's hand in front of him? That purpose is to dissuade Canadians from believing in the integrity and the capacity of Mr. Currie who last March, April and May was pictured by members of the government as a man fitted in every way to discharge his responsibility with honour, with integrity and with responsibility.

What is the committee going to do? It is going to sit; it is going to review the Currie findings. Does anybody in this house suggest that those findings will not finally be diluted by the kind of examination that will take place? Will they not be given a gloss and a polish? Will the rough things not be removed, the elevations removed and the depressions filled in?

Mr. Studer: Why do you always ask for them?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Until that is done the Prime Minister says he believes it is fit and proper that the members of the armed forces of this country should not be permitted to discuss the matter. They are frightened; they are afraid to give any information any more. They are afraid to tell a member of parliament anything because if they do they place themselves in jeopardy. I am not speaking about this report now; I am speaking about the fact—and I say it to you, Mr. Speaker—that wherever one's parliamentary rights are interfered with each and every one of us has a responsibility, whatever our party, to oppose it. And if we come to a point where our sources of information are dried up by threat or fear of intimidation, then we are indeed placed in a position where wrong will be concealed, where the things that ought to be revealed will be kept under the kind of lid the Prime Minister and those associated with him believe will result from the setting up of this committee.

Members of parliament have no privileges to do wrong. Their privileges are restricted as they should be restricted. Indeed, our privileges are fewer than those of members of the British parliament. When approaching parliamentary buildings they have the right over approaching traffic, and are thereby preserved from potential injury. We do not have that here.

We can learn from the British parliament, and the quotations already given indicate above everything else that a principle is at stake, whatever the party may be, whoever the individual in parliament may be. The independence of members of parliament must be maintained inviolate and not subject in any way to challenge unless a criminal offence is committed.

I am not going to say anything about the answer of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), but on several occasions when he has been asked "Why are you not doing something in that matter?" I have heard him say, in effect: "We cannot; the Attorney General of Canada dare not use the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Prosecutions under the Criminal Code are a matter for the attorney general of the province." I remember once he read me a lecture on the subject of the use of the police force. I am reminded too of the one he read to the house urging that appeals to the privy council should be abolished in order to remove colonialism from Canada; and he was the first one to appeal when he was dissatisfied with the judgment and secured one there that undermined the constitution.

I say this to him: He had no right to utilize the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police unless a charge had been preferred or an information laid, or unless the investigation was in pursuance of the attorney general's direction. I am pointing that out to him because I am quoting in effect the stand he has taken repeatedly.

Whatever happened in so far as that document is concerned, what annoys the government is that it was found out that the report brought before parliament had received treatment, the Lux treatment, in order to remove any stains on the government that may have been there. I sometimes wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the reports we receive and the answers given in reply to parliamentary questions do not indicate that a similar form of treatment has been accorded them before being tabled in the House of Commons.

Parliament has its rights. Without parliament freedom cannot be maintained. Wrongdoing it will not condone. But parliament dare not allow its national police force to be used in any way that may be considered political, or to have a political purpose in mind. That is the most serious situation, as I see it, in connection with this matter. Using the mounted police—

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): National security.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: National security, Mr. Speaker! I know my hon. friend was speaking jocularly. After all, it was government security that was the consideration. There is nothing in national security that in any way would have been interfered with in that document. The only security the government could possibly find in danger was its own reputation and its own security. I am glad my hon. friend brought that up because it clarifies the atmosphere—

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Not to me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —he being in need of information of a dependable character in that connection. As a matter of fact not one iota of national security is being undermined, not a suggestion of it, in any line of that entire report. But, Mr. Speaker, it does reveal in lurid colours, not in lurid words, a government spending without sufficient check billions of dollars and boasting about the surplus they have and the number of extra dollars they take out of every Canadian. They boast about their capacity to tax. What Canadians want them to be able to do is boast of their ability to assure that for every dollar spent there will be a dollar in defence, and not waste and extravagance.

Mr. Ferrie: They can do it, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are doing it, too? I hope the Prime Minister puts my hon. friend on that committee, because he will be an unprejudiced member. Today I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) owed a duty to parliament not to endeavour to conceal, not to raise a smokescreen in order to cover up what the report reveals. What he should have done was come before parliament which, after all, is based upon trust, and apologize to the Canadian people for having permitted conditions like this to exist, and instead of repudiating them when discovered, prosecuting only a few of those small wrongdoers. He should have given the assurance to parliament and the people of Canada that what has happened is past, but that it will not happen again.

There was no such promise, no such undertaking. Instead of such an undertaking there is a motion for the setting up of a committee for the purpose—and I repeat this—of reviewing the findings of the man who, they said with all the power at their command, was a man that they would trust. Trust! And when he made a return they ordered him, they directed him—and this was without the Prime Minister's knowledge—to bring in the findings, the work sheets, to see whether the work he had done would meet with the approval of those whose responsibility it was to see that things like that did not occur. I say the time has come for parliament not to be setting up such committees.

An hon. Member: That is news.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Someone has said to me, "Well, some of your members have asked for committees of parliament." Yes, and I have asked for them in the past. But from the experience I have had, with the exception of the committee on external affairs, and in a lesser degree the committee on radio, as well as one or two others, the conclusions at which they arrived had all the spontaneity that a directed verdict from the government would demand.

That is not what the Canadian people want. Currie spoke as he saw the evidence revealed. He wrote it down in a report, and he made recommendations; but it was suggested that he remove some of those factual things that would shock the sensibilities of the government. When the report is finally produced, and the government finds itself in a position of being indicted, it asks for the setting up of a committee, a jury of its own, to determine whether the judge came to the right conclusion.

Is there that degree of responsibility in an attitude of that kind that you, Mr. Speaker, as the custodian of the conscience of parliament, would expect? If Currie was what he was in March and April last, the epitome of propriety, a man of infinite capacity and integrity, why set up a committee in 1953, eight months later, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the conclusions he arrived at were, in fact, the proper ones?

We tried to move an amendment, but we did not succeed. Your Honour found that our amendment was not within the rules. When I heard the Prime Minister close his remarks today by saying that he would vote against having Mr. Currie continue with the investigation, I wondered why.

Mr. Martin: He did not say that.

Mr. Lesage: That is not what he said, and you know it. He said he would vote against the amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That he would vote against the amendment—and I thank my hon. friend for that interruption, because it indicates that he is in favour of Mr. Currie; but is going to vote against giving Canada an opportunity of using Mr. Currie's services to find wrongdoing where it exists, to reveal waste and extravagance wherever it may be found and, above everything else, to do what the Canadian people sent us here to do—to save them money and end this orgy of waste that is going on across the country, so as to assure Canadians a dollar's return for every dollar spent in defence.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it would be very difficult for me, a new and inexperienced member, to follow the dramatic oratory of the experienced parliamentarian from Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). But throughout his speech I noted such a similarity to a speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), which I intend to quote in a few moments, that I do not think it necessary to pay further attention to what the hon. member said, any more than to point out that at the beginning and at the close of his most dramatic address he drew analogy between the Currie report and a case in court.

Of course no one is better qualified to draw that analogy, because the hon. member has a reputation well known in the courts. Yet he said that referring the Currie report to a committee was like calling in the judge and talking over the case. Well, I think the hon. member in his career has, on more than one occasion, known of cases referred to a court of appeal on some point. I think, sir, that if I had been sitting where he sits and had been making his speech, and he had been over here, he would have folded his arms and said, "Where, oh where, Mr. Speaker, is the principle of the grand old Tory party that parliament is always the final court of appeal?"

We are debating a resolution which asks—

> That a select committee be appointed to continue the examination of all expenditure of public moneys for national defence and all commitments for expenditure for national defence since March 31, 1950, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and in particular, what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein.

And then the powers of the committee are set out. To this resolution an amendment and a subamendment have been moved, both of which tend either to guide or instruct the committee in the carrying out of that resolution.

I was a member of the committee that sat last year, and I presume the duties of this year's committee will be much the same, namely to investigate all expenditures for national defence. But it will be only natural that some priority will be given to those expenditures which have been made the subject of charges or criticisms against the government.

It is earnestly to be hoped that this year the charges and criticisms which will cause the committee a lot of work may be at least reasonably well founded. Last year I permitted myself to be quite impressed by a speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) who, I regret, is not in his seat at the moment. It was a good speech, well delivered. It was impressive and I, not having the experience then that I have now, was quite impressed. He said, as found at page 1797 of Hansard for May 1 last year:

The Petawawa incident is something which does more than merely raise the necessity for charges being laid. It is a great deal more than that. Let us remember that this is not the first time that there have been extensive thefts from camps here in Canada. This is not the first time that there have been warnings to the Department of National Defence that it was necessary that there be careful supervision of the military establishments of this country. There was, for instance—apart from other lootings in other camps—the dramatic episode at Farnham in Quebec where, for all practical purposes, it was discovered in December, 1949, that a whole camp had disappeared. That camp was equipped with plumbing, electrical fixtures, wiring, sinks, showers, refrigerators and all the things that go along with camps . . . That camp disappeared except for a few of the walls and the foundations which could not be conveniently moved. Of more than 100 wooden structures—and very solid wooden structures they were—in that huge camp area, an undisclosed number had been lifted intact from their foundations by a heavy-tracked vehicle and sold for prices ranging from $25 to $50 to farmers and other residents in the eastern townships at that time.

I think perhaps I am to be forgiven for having been quite impressed by that charge, and I decided when I was made a member of the committee that I was going to find out about that one. Eventually we got to it. We did not get to it right at the start but finally we did, and you will find the proceedings with respect to it reported at page 246 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of last year's committee. The witness before the committee at the time was Mr. E. B. Armstrong, assistant deputy minister for finance, Department of National Defence. I shall have to weary the house with a few of the questions and answers. I was the questioner and Mr. Armstrong was the witness. They are:

Q. What is the total amount of our investment at Farnham when it was an operating camp?

A. The total investment at Farnham was $96,344.40.

Q. And that covered a camp of something over 200 buildings?

A. That covered a camp of something over 200 buildings, plus the services that went into the camp.

Q. And of these 200 buildings, thirty-one were stolen?

A. Of these 200 buildings thirty-one were stolen, yes.

Q. And twenty-six of those stolen were recovered?

A. Twenty-six of the thirty-one were recovered.

Q. The net loss in buildings was five, is that right?

A. That is right.

Q. Were any of the stolen buildings latrines?

A. I beg your pardon?

Q. Were any of the stolen buildings latrines?

A. Nearly all of the buildings at the camp had latrines in them.

Q. When the camp was in use what was the nature of the buildings that were stolen?

A. The missing buildings—I will give you a description of them: there were thirteen large latrines, three small latrines, three shower huts, nine kitchens, one orderly room, one quartermaster's stores, and one storage building.

Q. Were there only thirty-one buildings standing at the time of the theft?

A. Oh, no, sir, all of the buildings were standing at that period. There were 214 buildings.

Q. Then the whole camp had not disappeared?

A. No, sir.

Then at page 247 there are these questions and answers:

Q. I have never seen the camp. The camp was of such a nature that two men could provide adequate day and night coverage in all parts of the camps at all times?

A. The court of inquiry found that there were insufficient security guards to assure 100 per cent security and in order to have the number of guards the court of inquiry considered necessary it would have involved adding fourteen additional guards, which would have cost something in the neighbourhood of $30,000 a year for salaries.

Q. Mr. Chairman, the witness has just told us that to have complete coverage of the camp would have required fourteen additional security guards at an annual cost of approximately $30,000. What was the value of everything you had at Farnham at the time of the thefts?

A. The total value would be approximately $10,000, about one-tenth of the original investment.

Lower down on the same page there are a few more questions. I read:

Q. —Did the court of inquiry or some investigating body make some recommendations in this connection, and if so what was done about it?

A. There was a court of inquiry. Would you like me to read the findings of the court of inquiry?

Q. Yes.

A. First, that engineers stores, buildings and ordnance stores, had been irregularly removed from the camp and that the original cost of such loss was $27,534.92. Secondly, these stores, etc., were removed during the calendar year 1949. Thirdly, two civilian caretakers had been directly implicated in the unlawful disposal of this material. Fourth, that the provost corps and the R.C.M.P. on investigation had located certain quantities of stores and buildings. Fifth, that the net loss after depreciation and recovery of missing material is $3,551.16 and that this represented the net loss to the crown. Sixth, that absolute security would entail the employment of sixteen men at a salary of $1,500 per annum. This would cost $24,000 per year against the then present cost of $3,000.

So, Mr. Speaker, the Farnham bubble burst. The bombshell delivered so forcibly by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in the house turned out to be not even a child's firecracker but a very wet and very defunct squib. Surely that justifies the wording of the editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of January 14 in which it is suggested that criticism should "be based on knowledge rather than on gossip and conjecture." If reducing wild statements of this sort to the facts is whitewashing of the government; if reducing the charge that a whole camp has disappeared so there are no buildings left except a few walls, to the fact that 31 buildings were taken, of which half were privies or latrines, and 183 were left intact; if bringing out the facts with respect to charges of that sort is whitewashing the government, then I am glad to plead guilty.

With respect to the charge that this or apparently any committee would whitewash the government because there would be a Liberal majority on the committee, I wonder if any opposition member who brings that idea forward does so seriously. I would point out to them that the proportion of government to opposition members on the committee as set up last year was far less favourable to the government than was the proportion in the house, and whether we like it or not, whether they like it or not, the proportion in the house is one which was dictated by the electorate of the country. I think they will find that in any parliamentary institution anywhere in Canada, irrespective of the political colour of the government of the day, an effort is made to set up parliamentary committees roughly reflecting the party membership of the house, and in this house if there were not a substantial number of Liberals on every committee I do not know where you would get your committees.

A point which was made in connection with the committee by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), who I regret is not in his seat at the moment, was the complaint that there was difficulty in obtaining information. You will find that he said in his recent speech, as recorded at page 969 of Hansard, that the committee had difficulty in obtaining the information it wanted. I should like to refer to an incident in the last committee to see whether or not there is any real justification for that particular complaint. On page 287 of the committee's proceedings—and at this time the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) was present—the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), who is not a supporter of this government, made this statement after we had visited one of the department's establishments:

Mr. Stewart: I would like to say this: I thought the visit was not as instructive as it might have been for what we were seeing there were principles and principles are very excellent. We have ten principles which are called the Commandments but when they are put into practice they do not always work out the way they should.

What I wanted to see was a lot of detail. I asked one officer down there. "Can I see certain things?" and he said "I am sorry, you will have to ask somebody else; you are on a conducted tour." So, I saw some other person who holds a more responsible position in the system and I said, "Can I be a loose leaf around here?" and he said, "I think you are going to see everything we can present to you and the committee." And all we did see was these principles whereas what I was interested in seeing was how these principles were put into effect, how the record worked, how the stock gibed up with the actual record of stock kept—those were details in which I was particularly interested. I am quite sure none of us have seen them in the time at our disposal yesterday but I got the impression that we only saw what we were expected to see. I may be quite wrong but I do want to see something else.

Then the chairman speaks.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Stewart, at your convenience anything you want to see will be made available to you.

Mr. Stewart: What I wanted to see was very elementary.

The Chairman: You just say when and it will be arranged for you to go down and ask for whatever you want to see.

Those arrangements were made and on page 313 of the proceedings you will find this—and the member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was being active for the Conservative party:

Mr. Macdonnell: Could I interject one thing, Mr. Chairman? Would it be fair to add that while you say it was all unanimous, the report of the steering committee, it was felt that if any individual member here wished to make special arrangements to carry out some further inquiry that could be done.

The Chairman: I indicated that at the last meeting, Mr. Macdonnell, that if anyone wished to do that, facilities would be made available to them.

That brings me to page 337 of the committee's proceedings. I would like to point out that the hon. member for Winnipeg North did go to the trouble of making his own personal investigation; that exactly the same opportunity was offered by the chairman of the committee to representatives of the Conservative party but they, for reasons which they no doubt saw fit, did not take advantage of it. At this time the hon. member for Winnipeg North was speaking and the member for Nanaimo was not present. As a matter of fact, this was the 3rd of June and someone else had been substituted on the committee for the hon. member for Nanaimo. At that time I understand that there was a provincial election going on in British Columbia. The member for Winnipeg North said:

A week ago, Mr. Chairman, I expressed some dissatisfaction with the conducted tour since I wanted to see things that I did not see. I said in committee that I wanted to be foot loose and on my own, but the reporter has me down as saying "Can I be loose leaf around here." If I said that I should be filed away, but I assure the committee that I did not say that. However, Mr. Armstrong made arrangements for me to visit the depot on Friday and I went down there with him and Mr. Kidd and I wish to express my thanks at the moment to Mr. Armstrong and to Colonel Denney, to Major Suttie and Lieutenant Colonel Holliday as well as Mr. Kidd for the help they gave me. What we did was to take an indent at random and trace it all the way through till the stores asked for on the indent were issued out. I saw in detail what I had wanted to see previously, and from what I did see I am quite satisfied that the system down there is as good as human ingenuity can make it. Of course we have to take into consideration that weaknesses in the human factor will break down any system, but the various checks on individuals should be adequate to prevent any loss. To have complete security would make the cost so enormous that it would far exceed, I think, the losses that are sustained. I am satisfied with the result of my visit and the only comment I wish to make on it is that the next time was have a witness such as Mr. Armstrong coming before the committee and dealing with a subject such as the one we have been dealing with, that it would save a lot of time in committee if we could see the things that we are discussing before we discuss them.

That was not a statement by a supporter of this government. The hon. member for Nanaimo in his recent speech made some statements with which somebody has to take issue, and I have elected myself that individual. Last year the committee sat in April, May and June. The first arrest following the Petawawa incident was, I understand, on May 13. The hon. member for Nanaimo was hardly fair and hardly correct when he stated on page 964 of Hansard for January 13, 1953:

It was said that we must not go into the matter of Petawawa camp because the Currie commission was investigating it.

That was all the hon. member for Nanaimo said on the subject. His own leader, whose letter he quoted with approval, wrote, as appears on the same page of Hansard:

Members of the opposition who sat on the committee made a determined effort last spring to inquire into the situation at Petawawa. They were denied any opportunity to do so with the explanation that this might prejudice the trials of those already charged with theft and also that Mr. Currie had been appointed to conduct an inquiry . . .

I was at practically every meeting of that committee, and so far as I know everybody agreed that Petawawa was sub judice. Some members of the committee may not have agreed that was sufficient reason for not going there. On the same page of Hansard, 964, again I think the hon. gentleman was far from fair to the committee when he said:

There was some question about making inquiries regarding item No. 87 (a) on a list provided for us, which item dealt with aircraft for the R.C.A.F. and the navy. One would think that a defence expenditures committee would be permitted to investigate the expenditure of a sum which at that time was listed at no less than $668,986,840, of which over $100 million was to be spent in that year. But no; the committee must not investigate any spending in connection with such a large sum of money as $668 million odd.

It happens that in that particular instance the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) was the active Conservative on the committee following up the expenditures. I would like to say that the member for Calgary East was extremely careful and extremely fair to the committee and to the department in that he made it clear that no answers to his questions would be expected if they in any way interfered with national security. Why the hon. member for Nanaimo did not see fit to include that in his speech is something for which I cannot account.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would he not agree that I was never satisfied that the denial of information was justified?

Mr. Applewhaite: I would hardly agree with that because the hon. member's questions were usually so very carefully and politely worded. For instance, at the bottom of page 412 of the committee's proceedings this appears:

Mr. Harkness: I did not ask for the numbers or anything of that nature. All I have asked for was a breakdown of the amounts for the four types and I could not quite see how that could affect the security angle.

Mr. Drury: The breakdown of the four types would enable a reasonable estimate to be made of the size of each—

I still think that the member for Calgary East was extremely fair and reasonable.

Mr. Harkness: But is it not a fact that I never agreed that the information should be denied?

Mr. Applewhaite: The hon. member prefaced most of his questions with security reservations.

It seems to me that this is the first time in my short experience here that the official opposition have not been 100 per cent all-out for a committee. It seems to me that I have sat here and heard them ask for committees on almost every possible facet of the nation's business until the Prime Minister put this resolution on the order paper to appoint this committee. Now we hear a great many criticisms against it, the chief one being that it would be in the nature of a whitewash. We hear from certain quarters—I believe a spokesman for the Social Credit brought this up this afternoon—that a royal commission should be appointed to follow up these matters which would normally be referred to this committee. If the members of this house are going to claim that a committee appointed by this government is going to do a whitewashing job, are those same members not going to make the same complaint about a royal commission appointed by this government with the additional complaint, which I think would have merit, that months and perhaps years of delay would result before any sort of finding could be brought down.

The opposition asks for more information for the committee. I have not been here for very long but I am told by people on more than one side of this house, who have been here for many years, that more information was supplied to the defence expenditures committee last year than has been supplied to any committee of this house within the memory of these men. I know from personal experience that the volume of typed returns which came in as a result of the questions, and the detailed answers we got from the witnesses, were quite sufficient, had there been no other parliamentary business going on at the time, to keep the members of that committee fully occupied for ten or fourteen hours a day. Those members of the committee who sat there day in and day out, whether or not the subject under investigation was spectacular, will agree with the truth of what I have said.

I should like to refer to a speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) on the radio program "The Nation's Business". I doubt if there is any member in the house who is accorded more general respect than the hon. member for Vancouver East. In this recent broadcast he made, as he always makes, an excellent speech. One may not always agree with everything he says, but you have to admit that he says it well and makes it sound very reasonable. In dealing with the Currie report he stressed the angle that the Currie report indicates a tendency toward a breakdown in security. I believe he has a point there. He pointed out with perfect justification that there are tremendously dangerous implications if in this country our security breaks down. I should like to say to the hon. member for Vancouver East, and to those of his party, that the security of this country is not likely to be enhanced so long as the mentality exists in Canada that the obtaining by any means or the retaining of unauthorized property is a legitimate or natural proceeding.

In the first half of his address the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred at considerable length to Mr. George Currie's discussions with the department. I am neither a member of that department nor very high in its confidence, so I do not know of what these discussions consisted. Undoubtedly the member for Winnipeg North Centre felt that such discussions should not have been held. I suppose the majority of the members of this house are or have been at some time the heads of some sort of organization, perhaps a law office with three or four employees or perhaps a large factory with 300 or 400 employees. I suggest that if any of them suspected that there was pilfering or a leak of some kind in their organization, they would call in a chartered accountant to investigate the matter. This chartered accountant would be working for them to find out the answers to the problems that were troubling them.

Are you going to tell me that one of these employers would not have the right to discuss his own problems with the auditor who was called in to assist him in solving those problems? Unless I have this thing all wrong, Mr. Speaker, the impression seems to be held by a great many people that the Currie investigation was a secret investigation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for this house. According to the way I look at it, it was an investigation for the Minister of National Defence. The minister asked for an investigation of his own organization. It seems to me that that auditor and the minister personally could conceivably and justifiably have gotten together every few days as the investigation went along, to find out how the thing was going along and to see if either could give any assistance or information to the other. Why not?

There is another aspect of the Currie report which I should like to mention briefly. May I ask you to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Speaker, in replying to the comprehensive outline given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in which he quite frankly pointed out the shortage of manpower available when we were hit by the Korean conflict, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) stated that the shortage of forces of any kind was due to this government's policy in approximately 1946 and 1947.

To that statement I do not think anybody can take any exception. But had this country been asked by this government in 1946 or 1947 to maintain a standing army—which is what it would have been—the size of that which we now have, I wonder what we would have heard from the opposition, and what criticisms we would have had as to adopting a military attitude, as to wasting the public funds, and so on and so forth, at a time when, let me remind you, the whole world was war-sick and peace-minded, and when disarmament was practically the keynote of the policies of all the democracies.

Oh, yes, they may say, but what about Russia? This is a fine example of one particular attribute which the opposition has in unlimited quantities, namely a comprehensive hindsight. Mr. Churchill, Mr. Truman nor any of the other great leaders of that day in the world were able to foresee the situation in which we find ourselves today. However, the hon. member for Nanaimo does not always make statements with which I disagree. In the course of his speech, as reported at page 961 of Hansard, he said:

> It is for the government to defend itself and to explain how it has taken care of the $2 billion of the taxpayers' money which this department has been called upon to expend in the cause of national defence.

With that statement I entirely agree. It is for this government to account for those expenditures, and that is exactly what this committee is being set up for. As to the hon. member's criticism of the make-up of the committee, I had already dealt with that matter before the supper recess. But if he is against such a committee, if he is against this government making its defence before a committee appointed by this parliament, where are all these Conservative claims for the supremacy of parliament? Where have they gone? The hon. gentleman's real complaint is not the appointment of this committee. His real complaint is the verdict which was rendered by the electorate in 1949, as a result of which we find ourselves with the set-up we have today. He admitted that plaintively and I quote his own words as reported at page 964 of Hansard:

> Therefore if the representatives of the Conservatives and the other groups all voted together they were only able to marshal nine votes against the seventeen of the supporters of the government on the committee.

It is perhaps tragic from the hon. member's point of view, but that is the situation; and it would be a much more exaggerated situation were the defence to be made in detail in this house instead of in a committee appointed by this house.

The hon. gentleman suggests that what is needed now is not more committees but action on the report. In that connection he read into the record a letter written by his own leader which stated in part:

> You said that the Currie report would be submitted to the committee on defence expenditures. One of my reasons for writing this letter is to point out that this procedure is neither necessary nor desirable.

And further on:

> We need no inquiry into the report of another inquiry. We need action on the report now before us. It makes positive recommendations.

For once the official opposition does not want action by a committee, for the first time in its history. It says it wants action on the report. It has got it. The minister has already outlined that. It has got action on most of the recommendations, most of which were implemented before they were even made. The hon. member for Nanaimo complains because the department is, to use his own words, "resentful of criticism". As reported at page 964 of Hansard he said:

> This department is following the pattern set up by the government. It is resentful of any criticism which may be offered of it.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seems to agree. It seems to me that these opposition members are resentful of any effort to straighten out the record in the face of the wild charges which have been made by some of the opposition members. They also appear to me to be resentful of anyone's defending himself against any charge which they may see fit to make.

If I may, I should like to turn my attention for a moment to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who is in his seat and who—it should be said, to be fair—is always in his seat except when he is on his feet. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has been the one all through this incident to take the lead in bringing before the house the mysterious unauthorized copy of the Currie report, seems to me to have adopted the attitude of the young man who tosses a coin in the air and confidently expects it to come down both heads and tails. As reported at page 972 of Hansard, he stated:

> The report that came into the possession of my leader was not covered by any official secrets act. It was not a government document.

He said on page 968:

> Between the first draft and the second draft changes were made.

He complained earlier, on page 655:

> I have since had an opportunity, which I had not had at the time I asked my question this morning, to compare some of the pages in the printed report which was tabled this morning with the same pages in another printed copy of the report which has been in our possession for a few days.

Either it is or it is not a report which was the property of the Department of National Defence. How can they justify their criticism of the supposed changes in the report if it was not a government report; and how can they object to, shall we say, conjecture from this side of the house as to how it came into their possession; if it was a copy of a confidential report which was then to be, but had not yet been submitted to the minister, is not there some justification perhaps for our feelings of criticism?

I hope this committee, as the resolution says, continues with its investigation. Even the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) admitted in the beginning of his remarks that last year the committee did accomplish some beneficial results. It can accomplish a lot more. It can accomplish those results only after it has been set up and has been put to work. I should like to see that done at the earliest possible moment, and I would express the hope that when it has been constituted the Liberal members appointed thereto will be looking for facts and not for headlines.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the tabling of the Currie report in this House of Commons on December 15 was a major event in current Canadian political history; and whatever has been said since, as this issue has moved from one climax to another, will never subtract one iota from the importance of that event.

I wish to go back, however, to events that occurred in the week prior to the tabling of the report in this house. This story was unfolded to us by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the statement he made several weeks ago. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was absent on duty in Paris, and the report came into the hands of the Acting Minister of National Defence, the Solicitor General (Mr. Campney), we were told, on December 9, as he was departing for Toronto, catching a train. Now, it is interesting to follow up this important mission upon which the Solicitor General was embarking at the time this report was placed in his possession. Was it an event of great national importance that took him away from the capital at the moment this report was placed in his hands as Acting Minister of National Defence? Actually the mission the Solicitor General was embarking on as he took his train for Toronto on that occasion was to address a certain Liberal group which met the following day, and in the course of his address to that political group—

Mr. Campney: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Fleming: There is this wrong with it: The tabling of this report in the house was delayed at least a couple of days by reason of the fact that the minister concerned was more involved at the moment in fulfilling some partisan engagement than he was in attending to the nation's business; that is all.

Now, what did the minister have to say on this occasion in addressing this particular meeting?

Mr. Campney: May I just say that I stated very clearly that the reason the tabling of the report was delayed was in order that it might first be put in the hands of the Prime Minister, and of the Minister of National Defence. The event to which my hon. friend refers had nothing to do with it.

[Mr. Applewhaite.]

Mr. Fleming: The only thing that is wrong with the hon. gentleman's reply is that it does not jibe with the record as we have been told of the events. But let me go on to what was said on the important mission that took the minister away, when there was no time to consider the Currie report. He is reported in the Toronto Daily Star of Tuesday, December 9, as having said to those he was addressing:

> But let us, above all, tell the people of this country what we have done.

Further down in the article he speaks of "Canada's fine contribution to collective defence, and the complete freedom from graft or scandal in the national government."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: And, Mr. Speaker, the minister had in his possession at that time the Currie report which exposed the greatest national scandal in this country since the Beauharnois scandal was exposed by Mr. Bennett twenty years ago. Here we have a typical example of Liberal propaganda, the minister leaving this report behind in Ottawa and apparently not having time to read it, and making a statement which is so completely contradicted by the facts that were then available.

Now, sir, it is no wonder that there is so much confusion on the part of hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this whole matter, because there has been hopeless confusion in the government's approach to it ever since the Currie report was tabled in this house. A variety of contradictions and confusion on their part is nothing new. We who sit in this house see it opposite continually, but on this occasion it was perhaps a little more marked because variety apparently was unlimited.

The first approach by the government members of this house was reflected in a speech made on December 16 by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Robertson), who apparently went out of his way to seek to put the blame on the "top brass". Then you remember that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke in the house on the same day. He was met by a chorus of interruptions by hon. members opposite, who sometimes find that about the only way they have to participate in proceedings, in which they kept shouting about the "top brass". That apparently was the way the matter stood at that time. The idea, the strategy of the government—at least of its followers—at that time was to place responsibility on those who are called the top brass.

Then you remember, Mr. Speaker, how significant it was that in the discussion of a matter of such vital national importance the Prime Minister remained silent. There was plenty of opportunity for him to participate but when it came to putting up a minister on Wednesday evening, December 17, to make the first statement on behalf of the government, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, who was it that should have made that statement? I submit to you, sir, the statement should have been made by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister did not make the statement. He put up instead the junior member of the cabinet—

Mr. St. Laurent: When you are Prime Minister you will decide what minister should speak.

Mr. Fleming: —a man who had no responsibility for events that are referred to in the report. He was not a member of the cabinet at that time. He had been a member of the cabinet for only a few days. I do not think it was fair to the Solicitor General to put him in that position at that time. It was, in my submission, the responsibility of the Prime Minister; but that responsibility was not discharged.

The next stage, Mr. Speaker, was the statement made by the Solicitor General on the evening of December 17, and it was very interesting. What was his approach to the question? It became obvious at once, because the minister had not gone any more than a matter of several minutes before he struck the key note, and it was this: The whole matter of the Currie report was, as he put it, "a relatively small matter". Further on in his remarks he said: "in the aggregate it is not of very great magnitude". Further on he complained about the exaggeration of the opposition, although everything we had said had been drawn directly from the text of the report.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we had an opportunity of gauging the government's approach at that stage. The attempt at that point was to play down the report, to minimize it, to make it appear that after all it was a trifling matter, and it was nothing for anybody in the country or in parliament to get very much excited about.

Well, it was not to be expected that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would be silent very long, and he turned up at Kingston the following Saturday night and made a statement there. It is reported in the Toronto Daily Star of December 20—

Mr. MacDougall: That is all old stuff.

Mr. Fleming: I think it is high time the hon. member had his memory refreshed on some of these things. I know he does not like being reminded of some of these silly statements the ministers are making as they flit around the country, but he is going to hear one or two more if he stays in the house. Here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said about the Currie report:

> But I also think Mr. Currie, as a professional man, was rather extravagant with some of his statements, when all he was supposed to do was report on facts and suggest improvements.

Apparently Mr. Currie, in the view of the strong man of the cabinet, has committed the cardinal offence of going outside what he was supposed to do. Apparently in passing some words of judgment, for which the Canadian people ought to be grateful to Mr. Currie, he did something he was not supposed to do; and therefore he has come under the censure of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Then, of course, come the things which occurred during the Christmas recess. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), out at the coast, referred to the report as "threshing old straw". The Solicitor General (Mr. Campney), becoming vocal again, talked about exaggeration, and said that the report would "not cut much ice". I think every hon. member will find out that if the report does not cut much ice, it will at least fan the fires of indignation on the part of the Canadian people against this government for its hopeless inefficiency.

Now the Solicitor General has again become vocal, and on this occasion in Toronto. He is reported in the morning press of that city as having said last night in a speech to the Davenport Liberal association:

> The Currie report has ballooned out of all proportion to its importance.

And then he said further:

> In a business as big as defence is today, there would always be untrustworthy people. They are no more numerous at Petawawa than in any other large business.

And then this significant statement appears:

> The Currie report, said Mr. Campney, is an exposure of normal thieving.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: And then:

> "Nobody is pleased about thieving, but you can't stop people from stealing".

So we have it summed up that what went on at Petawawa was merely normal thieving; and apparently it became normal because it took place under a government which has proven itself so hopelessly inefficient in stopping it. That is the measure of the normalcy.

Mr. MacDougall: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fleming: I would ask the hon. member to reserve his question until later.

Then we had the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today. At last the Prime Minister was drawn into this debate—at last. With every indication of reluctance he was drawn into it. He said if it had not been for some statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) he would not have participated in this debate. Well, why not? Is this debate so relatively unimportant that the Prime Minister thinks it is beneath him to participate in it? I say this: More power to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if he was responsible for, shall we say, drawing or luring the Prime Minister into this debate. And I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that reluctance on the part of the Prime Minister is all part of the government's tactics to play down this report and picture it as something very unimportant, something to be minimized.

There are two major issues which have emerged in the discussions of the Currie report, both of which, in my submission, are of the highest importance to the Canadian parliament. The first has to do with the importance of the report, and the second has to do with responsibility.

As to the importance of the report, the confusion of the government was climaxed when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) used these words here two days ago in reference to the report: "this important document". At long last we have a minister who says this document is important. This is the report that other members of the government, including the Acting Minister of National Defence, were saying was a relatively unimportant matter. Now finally, the Minister of National Defence has corrected the minister who was acting in his absence, and who had referred to the contents of the report as a relatively small matter.

Again, the Minister of National Defence said, and very properly, in his speech in the house two days ago that he did not want anybody to consider that he thought what has happened at Petawawa was not serious. Well, that may be a guarded admission; but at any rate we have a minister who seems to say it is serious, and who makes the statement that this Currie report is an important document—and this in the face of statements directly to the contrary by other ministers. In the second place there is an admission on the part of the minister that what happened at Petawawa is serious—and this after other ministers have been saying that it is a matter of no great magnitude.

That admission by the Minister of National Defence, sir, really was not necessary, because the country well knows how important this matter is. The country has attached a great deal of importance to the Currie report and the shocking scandals which have been exposed by it. And I say that no amount of denial or propaganda or gainsaying or cajolery on the part of ministers or government followers will ever minimize the importance of this report. It has, indeed, revealed the worst scandal in the affairs of government since the Beauharnois scandal was exposed twenty years ago. Make no mistake about it, it has shocked the Canadian people. It has shocked the Canadian conscience.

The other important subject, I said, was that of responsibility. And so I go back to a statement made by the Prime Minister when he spoke in the debate on the address in reply on November 24 when, making reference to the subject of fires and thefts and extravagance in the Department of National Defence, he had this to say:

> Much is made of the few regrettable incidents having to do with thefts which have occurred in camps, having to do with fires which have broken out in camps, and incidents of that nature. These are deplorable; but has anyone tried to hold the presidents of the banks responsible because the Boyd gang broke into and robbed the banks? Has anyone attempted to hold a high official of the Bank of Nova Scotia responsible because there is a report that that bank was successfully defrauded of the sum of $250,000 recently?

Mr. Speaker, that of course was uttered before the Currie report had been handed to the government. But it was uttered with reference to a directly comparable matter; and the Prime Minister was taking great care, in public, to wash his hands of personal responsibility, or of governmental responsibility, for anything in the nature of fire, thefts and extravagance within the Department of National Defence.

That has been the tone set throughout the debate; at least it was until two days ago. There has been a denial of responsibility by the Prime Minister, a denial of governmental responsibility, notwithstanding that the institution in which we are meeting this day owes its existence and its dignity to the fact that parliament looks to the government collectively to be responsible for what happens in departments of government entrusted to the charge of ministers.

Well, the Minister of National Defence very properly in his speech two days ago said that he took full responsibility for what happened in his department. That is the first time any minister or government spokesman has said such a thing since the Currie report was tabled. Other statements have been directed toward a denial of government responsibility.

And, sir, now that the minister has accepted responsibility, under the principle of collective responsibility the whole cabinet bears the responsibility for what has happened. In retaining the minister, the government shares full responsibility with him, and in equal measure. And let me say this to the Liberal majority in the house, that in now retaining in office a government which shares full responsibility for what has happened, that Liberal majority in the house now shares the responsibility of the government for permitting it to continue in office.

The speech made by the Minister of National Defence two days ago was an interesting if not too impressive attempt to explain away the report, its recommendations, its criticisms and its exposures. It was no light paintbrush that he applied. Had one not known the background, and been a complete stranger to the issue before coming into the house, one would have had the feeling that he should have cheered the minister and expressed gratitude to him that things were not very much worse than they were.

An hon. Member: That's for sure.

Mr. Fleming: I can tell hon. members opposite that the attempts that have been made by ministers and government supporters in this debate this week to deliver attacks on the Currie report—and not always frontal attacks, but rather stealthy attacks—are not going to have the effect of discrediting either Mr. Currie or the report he has written, and in the writing of which he has performed a service to the Canadian people of the highest magnitude. Yes, any attempt to wash the horses out of the report will only call to mind the fact that that, as we have been told now by the Minister of National Defence, was one of the matters the deputy minister of national defence took up with Mr. Currie and invited him, before his report was submitted to the government, to eliminate from the report. Mr. Currie stood by his statement that horses were placed on the payroll under the names of non-existent labourers.

An hon. Member: Horselaughs.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Currie stands by that, and I think we will want more than statements obtained by the government from a convict now serving a penitentiary term to convince us that Mr. Currie was wrong in the statements he made and by which he stuck.

Mr. Fraser: Now the government is stuck.

An hon. Member: You are stuck right now.

Mr. Fleming: It will not serve, either, Mr. Speaker, to reduce the long list of reprehensible and scandalous practices that are revealed in the report, quite apart from horses entirely. The shortcomings of the Department of National Defence, as exposed in the report, are summed up by Mr. Currie in the expressions, and I am quoting his own language: "general breakdown in the system of administration", "lax control, poor discipline and presence of dishonest personnel. The combination proved disastrous"; "a fundamentally loose situation", "the accounting records were in a chaotic condition", "a serious collapse in security". Are these the matters which the government now invites us and the Canadian people to gloss over and consider to be of little or no importance?

No, Mr. Speaker, it will take a great deal more to satisfy the conscience of the Canadian people, in the face of these exposures by an eminently capable investigator, than the kind of statements we have been hearing from the ministers. Let it not be forgotten, sir, that warnings were plentiful. This whole investigation was started, if you please, as the outcome of the receipt of an anonymous letter, but Mr. Currie has been at pains to point out that previous warnings had been numerous. He had this to say, as found at page 712 of Hansard:

> —it must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from Appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

What did the deputy minister of national defence do when what he had done in calling these reports of the chief auditor to the attention of the quartermaster general had been ignored? Apparently he did nothing further. What did the minister at the head of that department do? Well, sir, it remains yet to be told to the house whether the minister was aware of these reports of the chief auditor of his department. I hope the minister will tell the house some time before this debate concludes whether he was aware of the reports of the chief auditor of the department to which reference is made in the paragraph I have just read. If he was not aware of these reports being currently received, then why did he not know? Why, as the responsible head of the department, did he not make it his business to be acquainted with important reports submitted by the chief auditor of the department? If he did know, then why did he not direct that action be taken promptly?

We are hearing now about government willingness to take action promptly when a situation arises. What about these precious months—yes, years—that have gone by when no action whatever was taken? Hon. members will not have forgotten that in the defence expenditure committee last year reference was made, as appears at page 173 of the proceedings, to reports that were being sent in to the department running back, if you please, to June 2, 1949. There were about a dozen of these reports. Was the minister aware of them? If he was not aware of them why was he not? If he was aware of them, why was action not taken to deal with the scandalous conditions they exposed?

Then there is the question of extent. The Solicitor General (Mr. Campney) went to great pains to play down the matter as one of not very great importance in the aggregate. That is not what Mr. Currie says. Mr. Currie puts a very different complexion upon the facts. As found at page 714 of Hansard, he says, after referring to the catalogue or enumeration of some of these scandals and irregularities:

> These, then, represent the ascertained cases of irregularity at Petawawa. How many more there may have been will never be known. It was apparent from the beginning of the investigation that the accounting records were in a chaotic condition and would be of little use in determining the nature and extent of irregularities. It is impractical and perhaps impossible, regardless of the time which might be spent on examining records, to try and determine by this means the amount and value of the deficiencies.

He did not stop there, because in the following column he went on to say:

> My view would be, however, that the generally lax administrative situation would give rise to waste and inefficiency far more costly in loss than that covered by actual dishonesty.

When the Solicitor General flits about the country making political speeches before partisan audiences and says that it is a small matter in the aggregate, involving not more than $50,000, I confront him with the statement of Mr. Currie that the loss cannot be measured and in any event, even if the loss could be ascertained, it will never begin to compare in cost to the country with the greater loss through waste and inefficiency.

Let us not forget that in his report Mr. Currie put the responsibility where it belongs, at the higher levels, and if he did not carry the words "at or near the top" into the final edition of the report at any rate it is quite obvious from the first edition of the report that Mr. Currie had none other in mind than the responsible head of the department, and perhaps the deputy along with him.

These facts are inescapable. But we now have additional disclosures, Mr. Speaker, since the report of the Auditor General was tabled in the house three days ago. If hon. members will take the trouble to refer to page 24 they will find that esteemed gentleman draws attention to parallel situations existing within the Department of National Defence. He points out that there are at least eight accounting systems, indicating that no sustained effort has been made to achieve uniformity in systems within the services. He catalogues a long list of problems that arise as a consequence of this diversity of accounting systems. He says there is no civilian authority answerable to parliament exercising direct control after procurement and, further on, that general efficiency is not maintained. He draws attention to some specific cases, one of which is where a brigadier received pay for a civilian position in the department for which there had been no competition, while still drawing army pay.

He also draws attention to such a case as we find in item 67, where the department authorized the purchase of a house for an area commandant for $14,000 and authorized expenditures on it of $800. Apparently these limits of authority do not mean very much in a department which is run so loosely, because we find that—> —renovation costs approximated $15,000, and these outlays were made without the consent of the deputy minister being obtained to spend in excess of $800. The result is that the house now represents an outlay of around $29,000, exclusive of materials drawn from army stores.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have proof abundant of the utter looseness of control in this department and the way in which the hard-earned money of the Canadian taxpayer is being thrown around.

An hon. Member: Who was the brigadier?

Mr. Fleming: Now, sir, I turn to the subject of the course of the debate in this house, because I have to submit to you, sir, that the house has been grossly imposed upon in the course of the debate. There have been—

An hon. Member: Who was the brigadier?

An hon. Member: We fired him.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: These raucous interruptions sound less like human interruptions than the neighing of many horses.

Some hon. Members: Whoa!

Mr. Fleming: It is not unusual at all, Mr. Speaker, for discrepancies to exist, but here we find discrepancies as between the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). The Minister of National Defence was at great pains in his speech of two days ago to stress the fact that there was no interim report. If you will look back to what was said in this house on December 4, you will recall that the minister was invited by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), at page 321, to say whether he had——received any positive recommendations from Mr. Currie in regard to the subject matter of his inquiry, in writing or orally, and if so is the minister prepared to convey to the house some information as to the nature of the recommendations which have been made?

The Minister of National Defence on that occasion said in reply that he had seen Mr. Currie on one occasion only. That was when he was in the department, and that he had had no other communication of whatever kind with him.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it may be that the minister had not received any formal communication from Mr. Currie, but Mr. Currie has made it abundantly clear in his report that he made a number of interim suggestions. He says:

It should be noted that interim suggestions made by me during my investigations have been already seized on, and important reforms are already being carried out.

Now, Mr. Currie obviously was making recommendations and those recommendations were being carried out in the department. They involved changes in the department. Was the Minister of National Defence so unaware of what was going on in the department that he knew nothing about these recommendations, that he knew nothing about the steps being carried out in the department to give effect to the recommendations? If that was all he knew about what was going on in the department, the minister can be deserving only of censure on the part of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Then, sir, is it not only right and proper that this House of Commons should be entitled to frankness and candour on the part of the minister; that there should not have been any cavilling when there were questions asked about interim recommendations in communications either oral or written? It is obvious that there were no written communications, but what about all these oral communications? The Leader of the Opposition was not just asking about things Mr. Currie may have said to some officer down the line, he was asking about recommendations that had gone into the department, and the minister indicated that he knew nothing about them and took it upon himself to say that he had received no such communications.

Then, sir, let us remember this, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) drew attention to this matter this afternoon. When the Prime Minister was asked about this matter in the house on December 17 he certainly gave the house the impression that the idea of having the draft report submitted to the department before the report was finally signed and submitted originated with Mr. Currie. You cannot read the statement of the Prime Minister in any other way. He said at page 827 of Hansard of December 17:

The inquiries also disclosed that Mr. Currie and his representatives discussed this matter with the deputy minister and that the suggestion was made that the deputy minister might go over the draft, when it was ready, and point out any inaccuracies in the facts reported which had been obtained from the department itself.

Then at page 829 he was asked if it was general practice to refer draft reports to the department in such instances. The Prime Minister expressed disapproval and said:

I have never been an investigator. I was quite surprised to learn that this investigator had felt that it was the proper thing to be done.

Yet, sir, we learn now with the tabling of the correspondence in this house two days ago that it is established beyond all question that the suggestion that that draft report should be submitted to the department emanated not from Mr. Currie but from the department. And it goes further, sir. The idea did not originate with the deputy minister; it originated with the minister himself, on his own admission in this house two days ago. He instructed the deputy minister to communicate with Mr. Currie and Mr. Currie expressed, as we can see by the correspondence, opposition to submitting the draft report, indicating that he had no intention of submitting the draft report for "vetting" in the department. Yet, apparently, pressure was continued and Mr. Currie permitted one of his officials to come up here and discuss the draft report with the deputy minister. Following that changes appear in the report, and the changes are not confined to factual matters. The changes in some cases extend to and include observations of a critical nature.

Now, sir, that leads me to make this observation, that the Prime Minister owes an apology to this house. The house was misled by the words the Prime Minister used on December 17 into thinking that this idea originated not with the deputy minister but with Mr. Currie. The remark was made this afternoon that the Prime Minister owes an apology to Mr. Currie. I say that he does, but I also say that he owes an apology to this house and the Canadian people.

Sir, the government is trying so hard, in the face of this embarrassment, to find a scapegoat, to find a red herring, to find a way out; and that unquestionably has a good deal to do with the attempt to make capital, as they are attempting, out of the way in which knowledge came to the now absent hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and how that draft report came into his hands.

An hon. Member: Which side are you on?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: It was stolen.

Mr. Fleming: An hon. member says it was stolen. Well, Mr. Speaker, if he has that information I suggest it is his duty to give it to the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will take note of the information that the hon. member indicated he possesses and will, in keeping with the tactics he is practising at the expense of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, send a letter to the hon. gentleman as he did to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, threatening him—very subtly perhaps, but threatening him nonetheless—if he does not give the information to the R.C.M.P., who have been given the distasteful and improper task of conducting this investigation, ignoring the proper law enforcement channels in this country.

Well, sir, I think the whole matter is clearly summed up in the words Sir Archibald Sinclair used in that important, and memorable debate in the British House of Commons on June 30, 1938, when dealing with the Sandys case, a directly comparable situation, he had this to say:

> Governments are too apt to confuse danger to themselves with danger to the state.

Here we have a situation where a government, obsessed with its own love of power, having had power far too long for its own good is saying, in effect, that obviously this situation is not good for us and therefore it cannot be good for the state. The Canadian people are not going to be misled by sophistry of that kind. The independence of this parliament means a great deal more to the Canadian people than to be frittered away by the methods the government is practising at the present time.

I wish to add this, sir. If complaints are made in this house about statements being made by the chief of the general staff, they are not to be answered in the way the Prime Minister this afternoon sought to answer them. The Prime Minister ought to know, he has been in public life long enough to know, that the chief of the general staff is not precluded from voicing his opinion on matters of this kind, but there is a way to do it. The chief of the general staff or any other person, whether in the armed services or in the civilian service of the government, has a method of complaint open to him, namely to go to the minister at the head of the department. He is the man who makes the statement. The proper course of the chief of the general staff was to give his complaint to the minister, and let the minister make it. That was the proper constitutional course. Any interference with or departure from that course will be fraught with very grave dangers to the whole principle of the supremacy of the civil authority.

I add this, sir, about the way in which the government spokesmen, even the Prime Minister this afternoon, are trying to make it appear that what is involved here is an attack on the army. That is not going to impress anybody. What is involved here is not an attack on the army; it is a criticism of the Department of National Defence and the way it is being run from the top. It has been made clear times without number, it is made clear in Mr. Currie's report, that the army is not to blame. He gives credit to the army for the fact that in the face of the looseness which has prevailed throughout that Department of National Defence, the irregularities were not more grave than they were. Everyone who has spoken in this debate in this house dealing with these exposures has been at pains to point out that the army comes out of this matter with a clean bill of health, but not the Department of National Defence and not the minister.

That is the issue, and that issue is not going to be obscured by any attempt to draw red herrings across it, because it is perfectly clear in what is being done that the government has encouraged and abetted the chief of the general staff to depart from the proper constitutional course. The chief of the general staff is quite entitled to entertain his opinions and to communicate those opinions; but the proper constitutional course is that he should communicate those opinions to the head of his department.

I am going to conclude by saying this, sir. Apparently the government is now trying to drag the matter out by proposing that the committee on defence expenditures, when it is set up, should investigate the investigator or investigate his investigation. Well, that is quite unnecessary, sir. It would do them much more good if they were to get on with the job of cleaning up the mess which Mr. Currie has exposed.

I have nothing but the strongest words of condemnation for the adroit manoeuvre of this government in introducing an amendment to this resolution to set up a defence expenditures committee. The very idea! The Prime Minister introduces a resolution and another minister of the government gets up and moves an amendment to it. Sir, it was a monstrous and devious device to prevent other amendments from being introduced—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Fleming: —by members of the opposition. The responsibility for—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Fleming: —preventing Mr. Currie from carrying on and completing an investigation of this department, of which after all he has investigated only one small segment, one branch of the corps of engineers, will rest with the government. If they step in and prevent Mr. Currie from being instructed to do the thing we have urged that Mr. Currie should be instructed to do, the responsibility will rest with the government and those who support them, in denying to the Canadian people the investigation of conditions in this Department of National Defence which ought to be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. MacDougall: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Whoa, whoa.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Whoa, whoa.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. members kindly resume their seats. Do I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) wants to ask a question?

Mr. MacDougall: The hon. member who has just spoken said he would permit questions.

Mr. Fleming: Certainly.

Mr. MacDougall: May I ask the hon. member if he was ever in the army?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, I was in the reserve army. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the idea is to cast some reflection on an hon. member. I think, in view of the matter being—

Mr. MacDougall: You have answered the question. Sit down.

Mr. Harkness: Was the Prime Minister in the army?

Mr. Fleming: I do not know whether the hon. member—I would not have thought it of him—had anything back of that question. If he did, and it is a matter of interest to any member, I would be glad to discuss the matter at any time, here or privately, with him. The matter is quite open for me to discuss, and I shall be happy to discuss it with him.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member asked a question—

Mr. MacDougall: I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Fleming: I shall be glad to answer the hon. gentleman's question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired, and the question can only be asked with the unanimous consent of the house. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I believe that not long ago you heard a burst, such as we have just heard, in connection with the case of Brigadier Connelly. I am sure we understand what has happened since. I should like to bring to the attention of this house—

Some hon. Members: Whoa, whoa.

Mr. Ferrie: Some of you cannot ride a horse, but you might holler. The Minister of National Defence has rendered a service to this country of which all of us are proud. During the last few days he has been strongly criticized in this house, but I want to congratulate him upon what he has done since 1951 in cleaning up what happened at Petawawa. Even the Currie report does not say anything about irregularities in other parts of the country.

Mr. Harkness: What? It does.

Mr. Ferrie: He does not say anything about irregularities in other parts of the country.

Mr. Harkness: There are 158 of them.

Mr. Ferrie: He puts it all in Petawawa.

An hon. Member: He speaks of a general breakdown of administration.

Mr. Harkness: You should learn to read.

Mr. Ferrie: That is all right. So should you. Mr. Speaker, you can see just exactly where these gentlemen are going. What are they trying to do? Let us go back a few months, and what do we find? We find that these gentlemen to our left were doing just exactly the same thing as they are doing now in connection with something that was going on in the province of Saskatchewan. They were blasting another minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferrie: Yes, they were even blasting the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Ferrie: What happened? They went into committee, and what happened in the committee?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whitewash.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Speaker, there was the same cry: the committee was going to whitewash; it was going to be bridled; it was going to be everything, and we were all going to ruin.

An hon. Member: They hogtied the committee.

Mr. Ferrie: It is too bad they did not hogtie you.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are far too many interruptions.

Mr. Ferrie: The same thing applies with regard to the hon. gentlemen who went after the committee last year. Now we have the same thing going on this year. They are taking up the time of the house trying to put a blanket—

An hon. Member: A horse blanket?

Mr. Ferrie: They are trying to put a blanket over the whole issue.

An hon. Member: Just keep going.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Some hon. member has said, "Just keep going". May I ask those who are interrupting not to keep on.

Mr. Ferrie: There are no brains behind it, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that the minister has done a really good job.

An hon. Member: Of what?

Mr. Ferrie: Now I am going to say something—

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Ferrie: —that will hurt every one of you.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Ferrie: Oh, yes. Do you gentlemen to my left ever get any printing done? Do you believe in security? Do you believe in the things that are right in this country?

An hon. Member: Sure.

Mr. Ferrie: I do not think some of you do.

Mr. Graydon: Be careful.

Mr. Ferrie: Let us analyse just exactly what has happened.

Mr. Harkness: We believe so thoroughly in the things that are right that we want this government out.

Mr. Ferrie: Let us analyse just what happened. There was a printing job that was done. Where was it done?

An hon. Member: On the payroll.

Mr. Ferrie: It was done in the office of a gentleman, as he was supposed to be. This gentleman ordered some printing done. But another gentleman, we will say, had these copies distributed some place. We will now leave that point. This printing was done. Do you who are on my left want to say that even when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) makes a statement in the press that there was a leak, he does not say anything? He says there was a leak, but it was not in the Department of National Defence.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Ferrie: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is right there in the newspaper, and his photograph is there.

An hon. Member: What date was that?

Mr. Ferrie: That was on December 17, 1952, if you want to know.

An hon. Member: Go on. Get going in high.

Mr. Ferrie: Just be quiet. You haven't any brains.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think too many pleasantries are being indulged in. A few interruptions are allowable, but I think there are too many and that hon. members have gone a little to the extreme in their interruptions.

Mr. Ferrie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As far as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is concerned, he made the statement that there was a leak. I am more concerned about this leak than I am about the Currie report.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Ferrie: For the simple reason that I see no reason why that report that was put out prior to the official document should have got out of the hands of Mr. Currie.

An hon. Member: Who took the bridle off?

Mr. Ferrie: If hon. gentlemen to my left are going to condone this sort of thing, I would say that there is something radically wrong with their thinking. I was going to make a charge the day we adjourned for the Christmas recess, but the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was not in his seat. I therefore postponed the idea until we came back. Now I think it is high time we took this matter seriously. In printing firms we have jobs to do that we do not want the world to know about. I am sure all the people in Canada feel the same way about it. Can you say that you can take a copy belonging to somebody else, give it to a member of parliament and then say that he has a right to keep it, even if it was not stolen? We will give him the benefit of the doubt. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was a school teacher. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was a preacher—

An hon. Member: And printer.

Mr. Ferrie: —and printer. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) was also a teacher and is supposed to be a professor.

An hon. Member: No horse traders?

Mr. Ferrie: Let us analyse these three gentlemen. One of these gentlemen read it. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) read it, because he is reported in the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix as having said that the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was the man who threw the bomb into the Liberal party.

Mr. Knight: On a question of privilege, may I say that the hon. member has quite misunderstood anything I said on that occasion. It is not the first time he has misunderstood many things, but on this occasion he has certainly misunderstood what I said. I did not make any remark about throwing a bomb into the Liberal party. I think they have thrown one into their own party.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Speaker, the article says:

> Mr. Knight added that "it was one of our men, Mr. Knowles (Stanley Knowles of Winnipeg North Centre) who dropped the bomb".

That is the statement which appeared in the Star-Phœnix sometime during the Christmas recess.

Mr. Knight: Is the hon. gentleman asking me to explain that statement?—because I would be very pleased to do it.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Ferrie: I want to make this statement. These three gentlemen knew absolutely that this draft copy they had in their possession, and which did not belong to them, should not be kept by them. What did they do? They kept it. Did they do what they should have done?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Ferrie: Did they turn around and—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order should not what the hon. member is saying be watched very closely so that we do not have any duplication of what happened this afternoon?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There is no point of order in that. Why do you give instructions to the Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I will listen to the debate carefully, as I always do.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You always do.

Mr. Ferrie: I believe that these three men knew it was wrong to keep that draft report. They should have done one of three things. Did they send that report to the man they believed owned it, Mr. Currie? No, they did not do that. Did they send the report to the Speaker of this house? They did not do that either. They kept it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the third thing?

Mr. Ferrie: The third one is, did they table it in the house as a document they did not own? They did not. They cannot tell me that they did not know this thing was wrong, and I am more than surprised that the Tories are backing them up.

Let us analyse this a little bit more, and as a soldier would view it. I was only an ordinary, common soldier, and I view this with some alarm. Soldiers at Petawawa stole certain things. They took those articles out of the camp and sold them to certain persons in the vicinity. These men were picked up by the police, and when they were picked up they admitted buying the stuff from the soldiers. What happened to them? The soldier and the civilian were sent to jail. What is the difference? Is there any difference between stealing plumbing and taking a document? As somebody has said, this document did not belong to the gentleman who kept it. The plumbing did not belong to the civilian who kept it. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the intent was exactly the same in both cases.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is very clever in what he is saying.

Mr. Ferrie: You would not answer my question; sit down.

Mr. Knowles: I am not asking a question; it is a point of order. As I say, the hon. member is very clever in what he is doing but he is trying to say—

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): You don't like it?

Mr. Knowles: He is trying to say—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): And doing it very well.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear the point of order if there are so many interruptions.

Mr. Knowles: He is trying to say that our possession of this document—

Mr. Martin: State your point of order.

Mr. Knowles: He is trying to say that we have a stolen object in our possession—

Mr. Martin: Don't make a speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Your Honour took the view this afternoon that it was not to be expected that a member would say of another that he was the receiver of stolen goods, and I suggest that the hon. member should be very careful.

Mr. Speaker: I took the attitude this afternoon that one hon. member could not say of another that he had received a stolen article, knowing it to have been stolen. So far as I know there is nothing wrong with having goods in one's possession which have been stolen. The crime is in the knowledge that they were stolen.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member said the intent was the same.

Mr. Speaker: I want to be fair about this; I think it is important. The intent of what?

Mr. Ferrie: He would not let me finish.

Mr. Speaker: The intent of the thief may have been the same.

Mr. Knowles: The member said that our intent was the same as the intent of the people who stole things, and who are now in the penitentiary.

Mr. Speaker: No; I think the hon. member misunderstood him or did not hear him correctly. I am sure he did not say that.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): They are very jittery.

Mr. Gardiner: Bad conscience.

Mr. Ferrie: The reason I said the intent was the same is that it is expected that gain will be gotten out of it. That is the reason of the intent. The soldier who took the article and the civilian who bought it expected to get gain out of it. The gentlemen who kept these documents expected to get gain out of them, and that was the reason they kept them. If they did not intend to get gain out of them why did they not send them back to Mr. Currie or to the Speaker, or put them on the table of the house?

[Mr. Knowles.]

There is another thing about which I am very much concerned. In our society we have four classes of people whom we trust with our secrets. One is the doctor. We allow our doctor to consult with another doctor. We have the lawyer, and when we go to him we expect him to keep our secret. Then we have the banker, and when we take our business to him we expect him to keep it secret. Finally, we have the chartered accountant; and when we consider that Mr. Currie heads that big firm of chartered accountants and he allows a leak, allows a document to get out of his possession, I say this is something that should be considered in the house, something that should be taken seriously and should not be called a red herring. We should all think about it.

The people of Canada are wondering whether their business today is going to be taken care of, whether this chartered accountant is taking care of their business, when some of those documents in his care can be taken out and given to a member of parliament.

This is a very serious situation which has now developed. So far as I am concerned it is of more concern to the people of Canada than the Currie report. It should be considered seriously. Why should these men betray society to such an extent that we cannot trust, or feel that we cannot continue to trust those whom we have trusted through the years, in the development of our civilization.

Why has this come about? Because one body of people, one splinter group in the House of Commons, think they have a right to a document that belongs to the people of Canada. They have it in their possession before it is tabled on the floor of the house. I say in all sincerity it is high time this was stopped, so that confidence may be given back to the people, confidence in the form of society in which we have always trusted.

Those who did wrong will be punished, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). But let me add that in the eyes of the people of Canada these three men knew what they were doing. The one man in Saskatoon, according to his statement, must have read the document. And then we must keep in mind the other two men, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). They should have done the right and proper thing. They should have sent back this draft report to Mr. Currie. If they had done that they would still be worthy of the trust of the people of Canada, which they cannot claim right now.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker,—

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about some order here?

Mr. Garson: May I crave the indulgence of the house, and of the hon. member for Calgary West for just a brief intervention in this debate. I have to be out of town tomorrow, and this evening I should like to answer a question raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I shall be only about ten minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe that would meet with the approval of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Garson: Thank you. May I thank especially the hon. member who has taken his seat.

As I said, my only purpose in intervening in the debate tonight is to deal with a point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre this afternoon when the orders of the day were called. His question, I think, was a fair one; but I am sure that upon reflection my hon. friend will agree that it was hardly one that should be asked on orders of the day for he understands, of course, that an hon. member is not supposed to make a speech when asking such a question, nor should a speech be made when one is replying.

I take this first opportunity to deal with the question he raised. It so happens that the blue copy on which my answer is set out also contains his question. I have had a copy of his question made, and I shall now refer to it. My hon. friend asked me whether——any information and complaint was sworn out in connection with the incident respecting the first Currie report before the mounted police were called in to investigate.

As will be recalled my answer was that, so far as we knew, no information had been laid prior to the mounted police being asked to investigate.

Then my hon. friend asked a second question:

If there was no information under the Criminal Code, then upon what basis are the mounted police used except under the direction of the attorney general of one or other of the provinces?

And then, a little later on, taking the position that my reply to that question was not, in his view, adequate, he reframed his question as follows:

Is it possible for the Attorney General of Canada to use the R.C.M.P. for investigational work in any province without the assistance or co-operation of the attorney general of that province?

That question, I suggest, was asked in respect of an attempt which was being made to find out what disposition had been made of a document prepared by Mr. Currie at the instance of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). Mr. Currie himself had already at that time made a diligent effort to determine what this disposition was. He wrote in a letter from himself to the Minister of National Defence which is set out at page 977 of Hansard for January 13:

How it—

And he was referring to the document in question.

—got from the printer's shop into the hands of unauthorized third parties is still a complete mystery.

Everything which I have done by way of inquiry and investigation negatives the possibility that the copy in question could have got out in any stage or step between the printer's shop and my own organization and the department; but I still, of course, welcome any further investigation which the department or any other authority may deem it expedient to make from any angle or direction.

In the light of this suggestion, it did seem desirable to the government that it should make an investigation, and that in this connection it should use the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for that purpose. To investigate the disappearance of a document in mysterious circumstances is to carry on an investigation wholly on a voluntary basis, which really had nothing to do with the administration of justice. The federal government is in the same position in this regard as any other person interested, as a private person in, for example, the loss of property. Mr. Currie himself in this case had hired private detectives. The government utilized the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There is, I suggest, no constitutional issue involved here such as I think my hon. friend's question implied, although he did not so state. The position in fact is no different from the investigation which was conducted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the provost corps into the irregularities at Petawawa camp. The position is that where government property or some other matter of federal government concern is involved, federal authority is ample to authorize investigations such as the one in question here. I think it would seem rather a strange action for the government, confronted with the terms of Mr. Currie's letter and with the need to conduct an investigation, to go out and hire a private detective firm when it already had a very efficient police force for that purpose.

In his long and distinguished career I am sure my hon. friend must have defended a great number of cases of this kind where counsel acting against him were instructed by the federal authorities, because the fact is that the practice followed in this case is not by any means unusual. The usual practice in connection with a prosecution where the federal government has some interest, such as a breach of any statute administered by the federal government or involving fraud against or theft from the government, or even involving a criminal statute which is of national concern such as the Official Secrets Act, is that the investigation into the facts is conducted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or some other executive officer of the federal government, but usually the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

If the facts justify such a course, an information or complaint is laid by the federal officers just as is the case in a private prosecution. If the accused is then committed, the provincial attorney general takes over on the trial by indictment or speedy trial unless, as frequently happens where circumstances warrant it, and as they did in all of the Petawawa cases, arrangements are made by our counsel with the provincial attorney general to carry on the prosecution to completion. I know it is probably carrying coals to Newcastle, but with regard to the question of the right of the federal government—notwithstanding the fact that the administration of justice is one of the subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial government—to enforce federal statutes such as the Excise Act, the narcotics act, the Customs Act and so forth, that is fully covered in a case which I would cite for the special benefit of my hon. friend. I refer to the case of the Proprietary Articles Trade Association and others, appellants, and the Attorney General for Canada and others, respondents, reported in 1931 Appeal Cases, at page 310. I refer particularly to pages 326 and 327, and in order to clear the matter up finally I think I might read a quotation from those pages. It is not very long.

Mr. Fulton: Are you working under the Excise Act in this investigation?

Mr. Garson: No, no. I have already covered that point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this under some drug act?

Mr. Garson: No, this was under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes, sure.

Mr. Garson: One of the arguments raised in this case, which was taken to the privy council, was that the act invaded the field of property and civil rights on the one hand or the administration of justice, each of which is a matter of provincial jurisdiction, and this is how these two arguments are disposed of at the conclusion of the judgment. The reason I mention the property and civil rights item is that I am afraid I might be quoting a little out of context unless I did so. The portion of the judgment in question reads this way:

> If then the legislation in question is authorized under one or other of the heads specifically enumerated in section 91, it is not to the purpose to say that it affects property and civil rights in the provinces. Most of the specific subjects in section 91 do affect property and civil rights but so far as the legislation of parliament in pith and substance is operating within the enumerated powers there is constitutional authority to interfere with property and civil rights. The same principle would apply to section 92, head 14, "The administration of justice in the province," even if the legislation did, as in the present case it does not, in any way interfere with the administration of justice.

The next sentence is very apt to the point I am making.

> Nor is there any ground for suggesting that the dominion may not employ its own executive officers for the purpose of carrying out legislation which is within its constitutional authority, as it does regularly in the case of revenue officials and other matters which need not be enumerated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question?

Mr. Garson: Surely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the legislation with respect to which the mounted police are being used in this particular case? Is it the Official Secrets Act?

Mr. Garson: I thought I had made it abundantly clear. I thought I was almost repeating myself once or twice when I said that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police could be used quite properly to investigate in those cases in which a federal act was involved or in which a fraud against or theft from the federal government was involved, in the same manner—I would ask my hon. friend to keep his seat until I have at least finished the sentence—

Mr. Fulton: I am not even thinking of getting up.

Mr. Garson: —as when an alleged theft takes place in a departmental store, we will say, where the police of the departmental store investigate the facts, lay them before the police and carry on. We have at least as much right as the ordinary citizen in that regard.

Mr. Fulton: What has been stolen from the federal government?

Mr. Garson: This is the practice and, as I said a few moments ago, I am certain that my hon. friend from Lake Centre has acted in scores of such cases in which crown counsel opposing him were instructed by the federal authorities.

Mr. Cruickshank: A lot of these lawyers have never had a case yet.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, like most Canadians I was deeply shocked last December 15 with the main findings of the Currie report. Also, like most other Canadians, I was struck by the conclusions reached concerning government spending habits and accounting procedures noted by Canada's Auditor General in his annual report tabled this week. I have been further shocked by the apparent inclination of the government, through certain cabinet ministers and private members, to belittle these findings and also, indeed, to try to discredit the authors of these findings and to prevent a full investigation of other phases of government spending that might reveal further and perhaps far greater losses of the taxpayers' money.

Several of my colleagues have already discussed these matters in some detail. I will not deal further with the Currie report and the Sellar statements except to say that I agree completely with the policies advocated and the comments made by my colleagues. I wish, however, for the balance of my address to discuss another matter related to defence expenditure and the handling of public moneys which is of considerable concern to the house. Members of parliament are elected by the people of Canada to direct the affairs of the nation, and they have a responsibility to Canada greater than that of any other employees in the country, whether they be civil servants or members of the armed forces. A member of parliament should be, like Caesar's wife, above suspicion. We have a duty to the Canadian public, among others to scrutinize carefully the spending of the moneys levied from the taxpayer, and to the greatest possible extent eliminate waste and inefficiency, careless accounting and dishonesty in that spending. Quite properly the major share of that responsibility rests upon the members of the party forming the government. We of the opposition ranks also quite properly have a duty to the public of scrutinizing the performance of the government and pointing out to the government any action or lack of action on the part of servants of the government or members of the government which indicate failure on their part to discharge their responsibilities to the Canadian public.

In the performance of that clear duty, as a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition I am required to bring the attention of this house to a matter of far greater import than the amount of public money involved. It concerns, I regret to say, a member of this house. Through a presentation of the facts as I have gathered them, I trust that the member concerned, and the government of which he is a supporter, will be enabled to give to this house and the Canadian people an explanation that will clearly show this member to be in the category of Caesar's wife. And, if such an explanation cannot be given, then I trust this member and the government will take the only possible corrective action.

This matter concerns the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. George), who is also officer commanding one of the great regiments now in Canada's reserve army, the 8th Princess Louise's (New Brunswick) Hussars with headquarters at Sussex, New Brunswick. I have not had the pleasure of meeting him during my one year in the House of Commons. The Parliamentary Guide records his noteworthy career during the last world war, his service as an officer with the regiment he now commands, service in Canada, North Africa and Europe, from 1940 to 1946. He was elected to the House of Commons as a Liberal party supporter in June, 1949, representing the constituency of Westmorland.

Before going on with the facts of the matter at issue I wish to say a few words about Canada's reserve army. Like many another member of this house and many thousands of men across our nation, I have enjoyed a long and happy association with this section of our armed forces which I believe can quite properly be called Canada's vital second line of defence. As a boy bugler and signaller in the old Calgary Highlanders for some years prior to the last war, and as an N.C.O. and officer with the same reserve unit during and after the last war, I am proud of the association with so many good Canadians who have given freely of their time and efforts, without regard to monetary considerations, in order to strengthen the defences of our country.

The reserve army of today is at least as vital to Canada's defences as it was during periods of danger in the past, and this nation owes a greater debt than it generally realizes to the young and older men who, in the ranks and as officers, are giving freely of their time and efforts to maintain an effective second line of defence. The current rates of pay and allowances cannot be said to be fair and full compensation for the sacrifices of time and effort made by the great bulk of men in Canada's reserve army.

Within the ranks of the reserve army, and indeed among the great bulk of Canada's armed forces, there is a strong feeling that all who serve should be treated fairly; that special advantages should be given to none; that those who take advantage of special situations for their own personal gain should be ruthlessly weeded out. The armed forces, I might say, are simply a cross-section of Canada's citizenry, made up of men and women of normal honesty, concerned with the welfare and security of their neighbours and their nation, as well as their own welfare and security.

In a minority of humans there is a tendency, when they see some around them taking advantage of circumstances such as inadequate or poor administration, or security of accounting, to climb aboard the gravy train and grab their share of the loot. This was true at Petawawa and certain other defence establishments in Canada about which this house already has some information. It is probably true in many other phases of Canada's $2 billion per year defence effort, where a tendency to free spending without adequate control is unfortunately becoming increasingly evident.

Mr. Cruickshank: Quit reading it and say what you think yourself. He is reading every word of that.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Nickle: I will deal with you later. With the majority of human beings there is a tendency—

Mr. Cruickshank: You could not finish if you did not read it.

Mr. Nickle: —or a strong desire to speak up. I might say in explanation, Mr. Speaker, that I am dealing with a very delicate subject this evening and for this reason I have extensive notes.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: I don't need a lawyer to assist me. I have many times agreed with the hon. member about oil, which he understands; but when he gets up and reads every word he is saying about a member who is unfortunately not in the house, I say that your duty, sir, is to see that the rules are applied and that he does not read.

Mr. Wright: The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) knows very well that well over 50 per cent of the members on his side of the house read every word of the speeches they made before Christmas.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) if he does not agree with me that I have objected to members on my side of the house reading—

[Mr. Nickle.]

An hon. Member: They didn't pay any attention to you.

Mr. Cruickshank: Maybe they didn't pay any attention, but I am trying to bring to Your Honour's attention the fact that the hon. member being condemned is not in the house. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) never notified him that he was going to read this attack—speaking on something he knows nothing about—although he may know something about gas, as I agree.

Mr. Nickle: On a question of privilege, sir—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. member for Fraser Valley rose on his point of order, I thought the hon. member for Calgary West was going to give some explanation of what he is doing with his notes.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker, as I started to explain before being interrupted, I am dealing tonight with a subject of some delicacy and some importance to the members of this house in total, to the hon. member for Westmorland, and to myself.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Did you give him notice?

Mr. Nickle: For that reason, sir, because of the delicacy of this discussion and this matter I am using extensive notes, and I hope I will have your permission to use these extensive notes of the matter on which I will now go into in more detail.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should intervene and inform the hon. member that it is not up to the Speaker to give permission to an hon. member to read his speech. As he knows, speeches are often read during the two long debates that take place every session, the debate on the speech from the throne and the debate on the budget. Tolerance is often exercised by the Speaker during those two long debates. When it comes to other matters before this house, especially if hon. members rise to points of order, the Speaker has no alternative but to apply the rules which are that members are supposed to express their opinions and not read speeches.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley has also mentioned the fact that the member speaking is making an attack on a member who is not present in the house. The point would be well taken if the language used by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) were offensive or unparliamentary. There is nothing that prevents an hon. member from expressing his views, as long as he does not use unparliamentary language.

I refer the hon. member to citation 302, Beauchesne's second edition, which reads:

> The Speaker feels more strongly his duty to interpose and check language which seems unparliamentary with regard to an absent member.

I noticed that the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. George) was absent. So far I have not heard any words which may be construed to be offensive or unparliamentary as applied by the hon. member for Calgary West to the member for Westmorland. The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Nickle: I shall continue, not reading a speech but using my notes as a guide to what I have to say. Dealing again with the question of the hon. member for Westmorland, I may say that in recent months there has come to certain members of this house, including myself, information to the effect that unduly large pay and allowances have been claimed by and paid to this member in his reserve army capacity. That information, from sources I will not name, was sufficient to justify further investigation.

During the last session of this house a series of questions was placed on the order paper by my colleague, the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard). The questions were designed to obtain complete information as to pay and allowances of reserve force officers in Canada's four army commands during the calendar year 1951, in all cases where the year's payments exceeded $800. The answers were tabled in this house on Friday, November 21 last, following the opening of the current session. The answers listed by name and rank 260 officers of the reserve force, ranging from brigadiers down to captains, who received in pay and allowances for their services to Canada in the year 1951 amounts exceeding $800. The average amount received was under $1,000.

There was only one payment on that long list exceeding $2,000. This was the amount of $2,495.01 that was paid to Lieutenant Colonel E. W. George, who is the hon. member for Westmorland. The amount of pay and allowances to him was about double the average payment to all other lieutenant colonels on the list, and was about $770 more than the second highest payment to an officer of the same rank. At the rate of pay in effect during 1951, $367 per month for lieutenant colonels, the hon. member received army pay for a total of 204 full days in that year, if it were assumed that the total sum paid did not include some expense allowance.

It may be assumed, of course, that some expense allowance was included, and the number of days of actual army pay would represent less than 204 days.

It is of interest, however, to note that the second highest payment to reserve force officers was to a brigadier, who received $1,884.87 in pay and allowances or $610 less than the hon. member. At the prevailing brigadier's rate of pay, $689 per month, and assuming that the total payment did not include any expense allowance, the highest paid reserve brigadier claimed pay for service totalling only 82 days. Now, it might be logically assumed that Colonel George claimed army pay for a greater number of days of service than any other reserve officer because he actually devoted many more days and part days to the command of his reserve army regiment than any other reserve army officer in the country. As most hon. members are doubtless aware, attendance at two parades of a reserve unit entitles a man or officer to one day's pay. In addition, full pay is allowed for service days in annual training camp, and for days devoted to administrative duties. Presumably, Colonel George devoted a sufficient number of part and full days to his duties as officer commanding his regiment to qualify for the pay and allowances claimed and paid. The only question that could be raised was as to why his number of service days should have been so much greater than that of other officers of similar rank and responsibility in the reserve forces.

This week a further question was raised with the tabling of the public accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952. A check of the latest public accounts, covering nine months of 1951, the year for which Colonel George's army payments are on record, coupled with a study of the public accounts for the previous year, which included the other three months, makes my statement of today necessary.

During the calendar year 1951 the House of Commons sat for 142 days during the session period January 29 to June 30, and for a further 82 days between October 9 and December 29 of that year. These periods total some 224 days out of 1951.

The public accounts show that the hon. member for Westmorland claimed sessional indemnities and expense allowances in their maximum amounts for attendance in the House of Commons during the calendar year 1951. Allowing the full 15 days of absence, on grounds other than illness, permitted before deduction from indemnities, the hon. member presumably attended in parliament some 209 days in 1951. It therefore appears obvious, sir, that in his dual capacity as a member of this house and as officer commanding a reserve army regiment, the member for Westmorland claimed for and received from public funds payment for more days in 1951 than there are days in a calendar year. It must be assumed that he devoted no time whatsoever in 1951 to his personal affairs or running his farm in New Brunswick.

The hon. member, sir, and this government of which he is a member, should without delay make a full explanation to this house, and to the public of Canada, as to the rather extraordinary situation disclosed in the answers given my colleague, the hon. member for Wentworth, by the Department of National Defence, coupled with the information contained in the public accounts of Canada. Inasmuch as no public returns are yet available for the calendar year 1952, I would suggest that the answers to be given might also include full information as to the year just concluded.

The situation, sir, is one requiring full explanation because of the unique position of responsibility to Canada occupied by all members of this parliament. It requires full explanation, too, because of the special responsibility placed in all commissioned officers of Canada's armed forces. Full explanation is particularly necessary in this case, sir, because the hon. member for Westmorland is one of the government party members of the committee on defence expenditure, charged with the specific task of analysing and checking the vast expenditures for defence being made by our nation.

Mr. McIlraith: The committee has not yet been set up.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize any other speaker—it is now ten o'clock in any event—I should like to say a word in connection with the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle). I am only making these remarks at this stage as a caveat because I am not quite sure of the exact status of the accusations which have been made in the course of this debate by the hon. member against the member for Westmorland (Mr. George).

I just want to leave this thought with hon. members. It might well be that this type of accusation—which after all could mean that a breach of privilege has been committed by the hon. member for Westmorland—would be of the type that should be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections. If that is so, I think it should be done by a distinct motion. As I say, I am not sure of the point. I was merely looking it up. It may be that the matter will be pursued by other hon. members in the course of this debate. This is a motion to set up a committee to examine the expenditures made by the defence department. There is no question that the expenditure referred to has been made and that it appears in the public accounts. But as to the point that this money referred to as paid by the Department of National Defence has been received by a member of this house, that matter may well constitute, as in the opinion of the hon. member it seems to, a breach of privilege and might, I submit, well be of the type that has to be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections. It therefore might be out of order to discuss it on this motion. I am not making a ruling. I just want to give this point further thought and to consult Mr. Speaker about it. However, I wanted these remarks to be made before the matter is concluded.

On motion of Mr. Cruickshank the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue this debate and, if it is concluded, we shall take up the items which appear on the order paper under the name of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier).

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 16, 1953

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES ACT

CHANGE IN FORM OF TITLES FOR USE IN CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 102, an act respecting the royal style and titles.

He said: This bill is to secure constitutional approval of changes envisaged in the royal style and titles which were agreed to at the prime ministers' conference in London in December. It was decided that they should be recommended to the respective parliaments of the commonwealth. It is to carry out the agreed minute which was tabled in this house on December 15, as printed as an appendix to Hansard of that date.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ASSESSMENT OF INCOME TAX ON PENSION FUND REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I would like to ask a question, and although I did not give notice to the minister, the matter was up before and it is this. Has consideration been given to permitting employees of the Canadian National Railways, who are in receipt of excess contributions under the original pension plan, to be relieved from reporting such refunds as income, as though they were received during the current year?

I understand that representations to that end have been made and I would like to know the result from either the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). I do not know which minister is looking after it.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, some consideration has been given to the matter. As the law stands now, the amount received is taxable in the year it is received. However, we will take the question as notice and if there is further information we can get for the hon. member we will be very glad to give it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Might I ask a further question in that connection, since it affects many employees? They claim they were given promises to that effect.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is nothing controversial about this. They claim that they were promised to that effect and I wonder whether the Minister of Transport is in a position to say whether they were, and in any event whether he would recommend that something be done along the line suggested in my first question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have given some attention to the problem and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that no promise was given in so far as the Department of Transport was concerned. I have received representations from the chairman of the committee established under the pension scheme and I intend to discuss the matter with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on December 17, as recorded at page 832 of Hansard, I asked this question of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann):

> Will the government take steps leading to the appointment by the house of a special committee of the house at an early date to review the report and operations and policies of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

The minister's reply was:

> Mr. Speaker, the government have no objection to following that course and I will place the matter before my colleagues immediately.

I wonder if the minister would indicate whether it is the government's intention to place a notice of motion to that effect on the order paper at an early date so that the committee can be appointed and launch on its inquiry very soon.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact the motion has been drawn and, as has happened in years gone by, we are awaiting nominations from the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs to complete the personnel of the committee.

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The minister has no right to make the statement he has just made, because it has not been the practice to make these nominations until the house has approved the motion to set up the committee. If the minister will indicate that that will be done, the nominations will be readily forthcoming.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I should allow a debate on the matter at this time.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a committee to examine defence expenditures and commitments, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Claxton, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): When the house rose last night, we were discussing the matter of the Currie report. Before dealing with that matter specifically, I want to make a few remarks about the speech made yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I must say that I was surprised that the Prime Minister should have displayed what I considered to be a waspish bad temper with regard to this matter. Perhaps it was brought about by the weakness of the argument which he had to make. Knowing the Prime Minister as we do in this house as having always been a fair-minded person, I did not expect that he would stoop to use what I at least consider to be sly insinuations and innuendoes against the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to draw attention away from the poor administration of the Department of National Defence. To me, that seemed to be beneath the dignity of the Prime Minister, and beneath the dignity of the position which he occupies.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar needs no defence from me in this house. His record over the years has been one of meticulous care and good judgment in the debates of this house. At no time has he ever tried to take advantage or to use innuendoes against any other member of this house. As a matter of fact, in my opinion, the whole matter of this working paper which came into his hands has been overemphasized. It is not the first occasion upon which the members of this group have had alleged irregularities in various government departments brought to their attention. In every case, we have carefully considered the use to be made of that information and intended to use it in the public interest. In some cases, we have seen fit to do nothing about it. In other cases, we have seen fit to bring it to the attention of the minister concerned when we felt confident that he did not know of the irregularities, and if they were brought to his attention he would take the necessary action immediately to correct them. I am pleased to say that in most instances that has been the case.

In the matter of this working paper which came into the possession of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, we did not have the same confidence because, in that working paper, this was stated:

> Before reciting the irregularities and their circumstances uncovered by the R.C.M.P.—with the assistance later of the provincial police and the army provost corps—it must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from Appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years. The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

What confidence could we have that action would be taken had the working paper which came into our hands been submitted to the minister himself? I should like to ask the minister or the associate minister whether copies of the chief auditor's reports, given to the deputy minister, had been placed in the hands of the minister himself? If they were, why did he not follow them up and take the necessary action to correct these practices which, according to Mr. Currie's report, had been going on, not for months but for years. There are some very pertinent questions which I think the Minister of National Defence has failed to answer in that respect. I want to say that the type of innuendo that was used in the house yesterday was the sort of thing that one might expect from a second-rate debater on the hustings in the heat of an election. Certainly, it was not the type of thing one would expect from the Prime Minister of this country in dealing with a serious matter of maladministration in one of the largest spending departments of this government.

An hon. Member: You don't like it.

Mr. Wright: To me, the seriousness of this matter is that the taxpayers of this country, from whom in 1951 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) saw fit to collect $1,725 million for our armed forces and last year collected taxes of $2,100 million, are going to ask questions. They are going to wonder whether they should be taxed to the extent that they are taxed for our armed forces, unless this money is going to be used for the purposes for which it is being collected. They will want to get dollar value. If we want to have national defence in this country, then we have to have the confidence of the taxpayers in the Department of National Defence. Certainly, they cannot have that confidence today, following the issuance of this report and other incidents which are happening in this department. Yet, when we suggest that the government should give consideration to having Mr. Currie inspect some of the other parts of the Department of National Defence, the Prime Minister rises and states that he does not consider it is necessary.

As a matter of fact, the corps that has been investigated is only a small portion of our armed forces. Here is what the minister stated with respect to that. It is found on page 936 of Hansard for January 13, 1953.

> Now, let me point to another fact in the organization of the Canadian army which has some importance. The Canadian army, as is the case in most countries, is divided into corps. There are fourteen in all, and they include armour, infantry, signallers, etc. One of the corps is the Royal Canadian Engineers. The engineers, in turn, have two components, the field units which do the engineering work in the field and the army works services which have to do with accommodation and services at static establishments. The Currie report has, of course, to do with this latter branch, that is the army works services and this branch only.

After listening to some of the speakers on the government side of the house, one would think that Mr. Currie had made an investigation into all branches of the army and that only in the case of the camp at Petawawa were any irregularities discovered. That is not the case at all. His investigation covered only a small part of the army. I believe that this particular works division spent only about $150 million in the year 1951 out of about $1,725 million voted for the army in that year. This year they are spending a little bit more of the $2,100 million voted for the army during the past year. But there are other corps in the army, and to say that everything is lovely in all of the other branches in the army is something which I do not think can be justified by the findings of the Currie report itself. Here is what Mr. Currie had to say with regard to that matter, as appears at page 712 of Hansard:

> The conclusion I have come to is that, while there has been a general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting, it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities over a prolonged period of time took place. The contents of this chapter are chiefly based upon my studies there, because of the existence there of a combination of factors; lax control, poor discipline and the presence of dishonest personnel. The combination proved disastrous.

It is perfectly evident that there was lax administration not only at Petawawa but in government departments and that there was poor accounting in the defence forces right across the Dominion of Canada; but only one branch, namely the works services division, has been investigated to date.

To say that in the defence expenditure committee we can have a thorough investigation of the other branches is, in my opinion, just nonsense. It takes a chartered accountant to do that work. It takes a great deal of close investigation to dig out the facts in these cases. That fact was evidenced by Mr. Currie's report as to what took place at Petawawa. He said out of five thousand different articles being purchased for that camp, he took one, namely cement, to try to make a thorough investigation into what happened with regard to the disposal and the purchase of cement in that camp. He said he chose that example because, in his opinion, it was the easiest one to follow. Yet, with his accountants, he said it took him three weeks of continuous work to trace what happened to one article in the camp at Petawawa. What chance has a defence expenditure committee, composed of members in the proportion of three government members to one of the opposition, to dig into the thousands and thousands of articles which are being purchased for the army right across Canada today? What chance have they to make a thorough investigation? It is just nonsense to talk of it. Any member of this house who has sat on these committees knows that it is only when you have competent chartered accountants to check the books and to follow through that such a thing can be done.

This defence expenditure committee would be sitting here for the next three years before they could complete an investigation; and I do not think we are going to be here for three years. I rather expect that something will take place inside of the next three months; and as far as the investigations of this defence expenditure committee are concerned, I rather expect that they will be kept busy considering something that has already been investigated. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) moved that the first thing that should be investigated by that committee was the Currie report. He cannot have it both ways. In one instance he says that the Currie report is a report about incidents that have already happened and have already been investigated and corrected. Then he says that he wants the committee to spend its time doing further investigation on the Currie report. What nonsense! It is as if there was nothing else to be investigated in the Department of National Defence except the report of Mr. Currie which indicates right through that there is something else which should be investigated. That is indicated not only in the Currie report. The Auditor General in his report to the house, which was just tabled the other day, also indicates that there are other things in the Department of National Defence which should be investigated with regard to the auditing and the accounting system used in that department. Let me read just two or three of his recommendations. At page 24 of his report he states:

(a) No clear distinction has been drawn between stores procured for stockpiling or the equivalent, and those for normal peacetime needs;

(b) Long-term usage is to regard stores as service property with responsibility for accounting and custody vested in various components of the service forces. The consequence is that no civilian authority answerable to parliament exercises direct control after procurement;

(c) Each service accounting system has forms for similar purposes but the forms, generally, are not standardized throughout the services;

(d) Practices governing service promotions are not such as to safeguard against officers with insufficient accounting experience being placed in accounting control of large inventories. A like situation exists with respect to those responsible for warehouse management—

It is quite evident that the Auditor General agrees with Mr. Currie that the auditing systems being used in the army are not what they should be and that further investigation and correction should take place with regard to them. That is all our amendment suggests. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) moved the following amendment:

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"and to give consideration to the desirability of recommending that Mr. Currie be asked to conduct a further inquiry into any other expenditures and commitments covered by the terms of this resolution".

That is simply asking that Mr. Currie be authorized to go ahead and investigate these thirteen other corps in the army in order to see whether the accounting systems there are what they should be. Yet the Prime Minister indicates that he will not support that recommendation "to give consideration".

What does that mean? It means that I shall be greatly surprised if every Liberal member in the house does not support the Prime Minister. I shall be surprised if the committee will, of their own initiative, go ahead and ask Mr. Currie, in the face of an adverse vote here in the house, to investigate further the other departments in the army. It is just ridiculous to think that they would do so. Yet it is quite evident that that investigation is necessary. It is quite evident that the accounting systems are not what they should be in departments of the army other than the Royal Canadian Engineers works services division. Not until some outside authority goes in, inspects those accounting systems and sees that they are operating effectively will the people be satisfied. Only then will the taxpayers of this country, who are providing the huge sums of money that are necessary for our armed forces at this time, be satisfied and feel that their money is being spent in a proper manner in the Department of National Defence.

Another point raised by the Prime Minister yesterday was with regard to the conduct of the chief of the general staff in this country, and whether he had or has the right to go into print and comment on a matter of political importance which is being discussed in this house. I just cannot agree with the Prime Minister in what he had to say in that regard. I do not see why the chief of the general staff, if he has some statement to make, or if he thinks that there are reports in the press which would reflect on any part of the army, cannot make his protest through his minister here in the House of Commons. I think it is a terrible precedent to set in a democratic country, to allow the heads of our armed forces to enter into a political discussion on a matter which is being discussed on the floor of this house. If we allow that, where are we going to stop? Are the deputy ministers of other departments, when their estimates are before this house, when something is being discussed with regard to their estimates, going to be able to go to the press and issue statements which might have political implications in them? Surely the Prime Minister did not mean that when he made his statement yesterday in the house.

We all respect the part that our armed forces played in this country during the last two wars. There are many members in this house who belong to the armed forces, and who are just as jealous of their rights and privileges as is the Prime Minister; but to try to use that as a shield against maladministration in the Department of National Defence is wrong, in my opinion, and I am surprised that the Prime Minister should attempt to do that in this house. During the war there were many things that might have been discussed by the heads of the army, navy and air force, but not in one instance that I can recall did they go to press. If they had something to say they said it through their ministers here in the House of Commons, because they had confidence in those ministers, because they knew that those ministers could and would defend them in the House of Commons, and defend them against any imputations which might be raised either in the press or here with regard to their efficiency or to their honest administration of the departments. But apparently today they have not got that same confidence. Apparently today the chief of the general staff feels that he has to go to the press or that he has to issue statements. Why? The only conclusion one can reach is that he has not confidence in the Minister of National Defence and his ability to defend the army here in the House of Commons. That is a sad state of affairs. I would say it is a state of affairs that only the Prime Minister can correct here in this House of Commons. He has given no indication to date that he intends to correct it. He has given no indication that he intends to take any action that would effectively clean up some of these incidents that are happening.

We heard the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) in a speech earlier during this session indicate that in his opinion certain construction contracts at Penhold, Alberta, were not just everything that could be desired. Other hon. members have indicated what they believe to be irregularities. But what action have the government taken? None. The excuse given by the Minister of National Defence, by the Prime Minister and by the backbenchers on the Liberal side of the house, is to try to cover up, to try to make little of the incidents which have happened. Well, if that is to be the attitude of the government, then I am afraid that the taxpayers of this country are going to think twice before they vote for a government that spends the amounts of money that the government are spending today on our armed forces without having the proper supervision of the spending of that money, without having proper accounting systems in all corps of the army to see that that money is being used to the best advantage to secure the maximum of defence for this country. It is only when that takes place and when this government shows more initiative in the taking of the proper action, that we can hope to have the maximum of national defence in this country. It is nonsense to talk of it otherwise, and I would strongly urge that every hon. member support our motion, support the motion that Mr. Currie be given the authority to investigate all branches of the army, in their expenditures and in their accounting system since March 1, 1950, as indicated in this subamendment.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word at this time on behalf of the printers of Canada, a craft with which I have been associated all my life. Whether or not this document was stolen does not concern me so much as this, that some printer may have violated the ethics of the printing office by allowing a copy of the Currie report to go out of a printing office without authority and wrongfully.

I say that the printers of this country observe a very high code of ethics, and they will learn with great regret of the removal of this document from the Montreal printing office. If this office is under the International Typographical Union I assure you that I will expect the executive of the union to make a most careful inquiry and to fix on their behalf the guilt in this matter.

As I say, there are no finer craftsmen in Canada than the printers, and upon no group of people do we rely so much as upon the printing industry. The affairs of this parliament could not be carried on without the co-operation and service of these men, who work diligently handling the documents of the country, some of them very secret documents and very valuable, and who take care of them and go to every length to preserve secrecy and decorum in handling the documents of this house. If we are to tolerate the removal of an official document, such as the report mentioned in this house, what is to prevent some printer, on the eve of the delivery of the budget speech in this house, from extracting a copy of the budget speech and using it for his own profit or for the profit of those about him? The speech from the throne setting forth the policies of the government would not be inviolate. Under this system, if persons are allowed to use these documents, a certain political or financial group would be able to procure a copy of the speech from the throne hours before it was delivered in this house and exploit it. Similarly, financial statements of banks, mining companies and other industries would be open to those who would desire to make gain by wrongfully securing news and information in advance. And, as I say, official documents of a secret nature between nations would not be safe. Therefore to condone this sort of thing is to follow in the best pattern of communism, where the extracting of plans, drawings and documents is reduced to a fine art, as has been exemplified in the recent trials in Ottawa and at Washington where enemies of the country were brought to book on charges of espionage.

The very press of the country would be handicapped if the character of the printers was not such that documents are released on a certain date for publication. And there is not one printer from one side of this country to the other, from one coast to the other—not one publisher—who would think of violating an official speech sent out by leaders of the nation to be released at a certain hour on a certain day.

I say the whole tradition of the printing industry in Canada is the very highest, and that there has always been that desire to safeguard confidential information and to make the printed word a sacred thing in this country. So much for the printers.

I am one who has not been swept off his feet by these revelations from Petawawa. They are serious, of course. I would be the last to condone wrongdoing such as has been shown at Petawawa. Each member in the house has been placed in the position where it is necessary for him to express himself with respect to the charges which have been made against the Department of National Defence. At the same time I think we should keep the picture in proper focus.

For the most part the crimes and misdemeanours at Petawawa were not to be compared with those committed elsewhere in Canada not so long ago. The opposition seeks to shake the very foundations of the country because some junk dealers made off with certain materials from Petawawa. I desire to tell this house of wrongdoing which overshadows the whole story of Petawawa.

In the wake of war—and the very spirit of war is waste and destruction—there have always been revelations of this kind. Speaking in this house on December 1 the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) drew attention to scandals associated with the Crimean war. Then he came along farther to the South African war, and referred to the waste associated with that conflict, and the aftermath of that unfortunate war, which took a good many Canadian lives, too.

I am old enough to have been in Ottawa in 1908 when there was another Petawawa scandal. Certain officers were charged with this, that and the other thing. I think it all simmered down to the fact that a lot of moth-eaten uniforms, and so on, surviving from the South African war, which the army service corps had in storage, in warehouses in Ottawa, had been surreptitiously removed and sold, or something else. That was a seven-day scandal in Ottawa, and was an aftermath, as I say, of the South African war.

The hon. member for Nanaimo did not go on to refer to world war I. If he had, he could have told, from firsthand knowledge, of the profiteering and waste which was tolerated. This is no time to revive references to those events—the horse deals of that era, the thefts and pilfering that went on. I am inclined to believe that Petawawa is merely incidental to the conclusion of world war II and the cold war era, in which we have existed these last few years.

Perhaps this house has never heard some of the revelations concerning the Alaska highway. I bring that up today, because I represent the riding through which the Alaska highway was constructed, and I feel it my duty, as an independent member of parliament, to bring forth the truth wherever it is possible to do so.

"And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." I would like to give some of the facts regarding the Alaska highway, of very recent memory. Violent death was too often recorded in connection with the building of that highway. There the plunder, and the outright theft and destruction of goods, from 1942 onward, was such as to cause Canadians to hide their faces in shame, to think that anything like that could happen in Canada. Fortunately things did not get into the press and were not kicked around in the House of Commons for political purposes, as have been the comparatively trivial crimes and misdemeanours at Petawawa.

Let me draw attention to one thing that happened on the Alaska highway in February of 1943. Two truckloads of TNT explosives were driven into the town of Dawson Creek and, through the utter carelessness of the contractors responsible, and the army officials who had control of the contractors, an explosion occurred which killed 21 persons, wounded an unknown number and wrecked most of the town. Two soldiers were burned to death in the Dawson Creek jail, like animals caught in a trap, as a result of the fires that spread from that explosion.

Well, one might say that that was a war period, that the Americans were on the Alaska highway, and that we had no responsibility. The Alaska highway was farther away from any theatre of war in 1942 than it is today. It was a scandalous thing, and responsibility for it has never been officially fixed, although large sums of money were paid in damages and many buildings were rebuilt to replace those destroyed. A modern hotel has been built upon the ruins of the one destroyed by that explosion, an explosion which resulted from the sheer negligence and carelessness of those in charge.

I was at Fort Nelson on a certain occasion when five thousand gallons of high octane gasoline were wasted through the neglect of army personnel. This was in 1944, and each gallon would be worth at least $4 at that time and at that place.

In 1942 two bulldozers, valued at $35,000 each, were being transported across Charlie lake on the Alaska highway. The boat tipped over and 17 men were drowned.

Two truckloads of groceries, two complete lorries loaded with groceries—and these were army lorries, driven by Canadian soldiers—were stolen from the officers' mess at Fort Nelson, along with the trucks. The groceries were sold by the soldiers, and cached at a certain farm at Fort St. John. Arrests followed, but I do not know what happened—whether the prosecution was carried out, or whether the men went to jail. I venture to say that those two truckloads of groceries were probably worth, in dollars, as much as all the miscellaneous junk stolen from Petawawa.

It was stated by persons who should know that fourteen thousand pieces of equipment at an estimated value of $10 million disappeared on the Alaska highway from 1942 until 1945. This included acetylene torches, Delco lighting units, and other units for lighting army camps, lathes, power drills, electrical equipment, transformers, automotive accessories of all kinds, automobile and truck tires, and all the other gear used in road construction and in the building of airports.

It was said that 500 trucks disappeared, along with certain gasoline shovels and other heavy equipment. In one place a hundred large cast-iron stoves, army stoves, for heating army barracks, were thrown over the bank and covered over by bulldozers, so that they could be removed later by the thieves.

Sugar and other food supplies, which were of great value at that time, and particularly at points hundreds of miles from the railhead, were stolen or disappeared. Army blankets and clothing disappeared; and Indians and others are still digging up loot along the Alaska highway, as the result of the epidemic of that time.

When authorities proceeded to investigate alleged irregularities at a large repair depot at Mile 49, where $100,000 worth of equipment such as lathes, hammers and drills were installed, the building was mysteriously burned down overnight, along with all records. In 1942 and 1943 free gasoline was pumped at all stations for all comers, contractors, tourists, visitors, and everyone. The trucking contractor made the most of this flood of free gasoline. At Fort Alcan an entire building 120 feet long, and probably the same width—I might say that this building included the jail—was stolen along with all its contents.

The Alaska highway spree continued right under the noses of the top brass of the Canadian army. You might say that the Americans who were there were responsible, that the United States army was in there and they were responsible, but nothing of the kind was the fact. We did not surrender to the United States army any authority whatsoever respecting law enforcement. In keeping with the epidemic of plunder and corruption, there was a total lapse of law enforcement at certain points.

Ace-away games were the order of the day. This game is very popular in my part of the country. Dice are used and anyone who has shaken craps is just a novice in the use of the ivories as they have to be used in ace-away. This game flourished right along the highway and it was not unusual to see a man risk a hundred dollar bill on a throw of the dice. In fact, thousand dollar bills were risked on a throw of the dice throughout the Northwest and Yukon territories. The hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons) will be able to confirm this. Whisky was $80 a bottle at Watson Lake and there was lots of it. Here is something for the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). United States cigarettes could be had at five cents a package or fifty cents a carton. There was a direct violation of the Canadian customs regulations.

I do not propose to discuss the Canol project as that was paid for wholly by the United States government. Hon. members will remember that a Truman commission in Washington investigated this project. The waste, the theft and the sabotage associated with that project was on a superlative scale. Steamboats and barges disappeared entirely from the possession of the authorities. Most expensive technical equipment was plundered and scores of motor trucks vanished along with bulldozers and accessories and equipment. I was at Fort Norman and personally saw acres of buildings piled high with tractor parts worth millions of dollars. These were later sold or disposed of, but the world will never know how much was carried away unlawfully.

Let me quote just one incident. At Fort Norman some of my friends sought to purchase a refrigerator unit which was attached to a barge. This was a large unit and in good condition. The farmers thought that they could acquire it as it would be a good place in which to store beef, dairy products and so forth on the farm. But the hinges of the door had been destroyed. Soldiers, in order to fasten the door in its place, the hinges having been broken off, had taken sides of Swift Premium bacon and spiked them in place as a substitute for the hinges. On the highway and on Canol carloads of the most valuable tinned goods, such as tinned hams, disappeared.

Some may think that I am out of order in bringing these facts to the attention of the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

An hon. Member: Join the opposition.

An hon. Member: Keep on going.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I would remind the house that the young army captain who was sentenced at Petawawa, a man with a most brilliant record, received most of his training on the Alaska highway. That goes for many of the other men from Petawawa who have been sent to the penitentiary. They worked on the Alaska highway and many of them saw, at first hand, these terrific examples of wrongdoing which went unchecked by their superior officers.

I have a certain feeling of compassion for some of these men. I do not wish to see wrongdoing condoned. The law has taken its course and they must abide by the decision of the court. But I have a feeling that these young men were exposed to temptation on the highway long before they ever came to Petawawa. Probably they came there after the episodes which I have mentioned, but you cannot discuss Petawawa without recalling the chapter relating to the Alaska highway.

I am not accusing any of the senior officers of wrongdoing in this connection, but I am one who believes that a man should not consider himself holier than anybody else. The hon. member for Nanaimo was the general officer in command of the Canadian army for the Pacific in the years that I mentioned, 1942 and 1943.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member will want to keep the record straight. The Alaska highway was not under the Pacific command in those years.

An hon. Member: Just keep the record straight.

[Mr. Murray (Cariboo).]

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member was general officer commanding the Pacific command in 1942 and 1943 and that was in the Pacific area. General W. W. Foster was appointed as a special liaison officer. It got so bad up there that they had to appoint General Foster to take charge so that he could report direct to the war cabinet at Ottawa. So the hon. member for Nanaimo was not held responsible after that first year of construction. Anyway I do not think he should be held responsible and I do not charge him with anything. But I do think he should have a little compassion for those who are being so viciously attacked over Petawawa.

I do not say that he knew what went on on the Alaska highway, but I will say that the outrages on the Alaska highway resulted primarily from the presence in the country of the United States army which introduced a system of ethics which were at least startling to Canadians.

At the same time, had there been charges in parliament over the Alaska highway disgrace in the years 1942, 1943, 1944 and thereafter, the hon. member and other senior officers in the Canadian army would have been greatly worried over matters which had got out of hand, certainly through no dereliction of duty on their part. Worried also would have been Mr. G. S. Currie, author of the Currie report, who was deputy minister of national defence throughout the period I mention when these crimes and misdemeanours were committed.

Mr. Hees: What government was in power at the time?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I am not going to saddle the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), a young man with a great career ahead of him and a great record back of him, with crimes and misdemeanours which were committed long before he took office.

Mr. Hees: This government was in power. It is the same old government, the same old stuff.

Mr. Gardiner: Where were you at the time?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It is clearly evident that the shouting and tumult over Petawawa is for political purposes chiefly. It is unfortunate that the House of Commons should be compelled to pause for so long a period to hear debates which have become so bitter and so unprofitable. We have the great task of NATO on our shoulders; we have heavy responsibilities in Korea and on the continent of Europe. We have a list of national problems facing us which call for attention and solution. And yet we sit here day after day in the midst of bitter accusations, the hurling of epithets, personal charges and so on, over something trivial by comparison to the things I have mentioned here. It is indeed trifling. I am afraid that some of the language used in this house will greatly discourage our participation in the United Nations war effort and it will discourage enlistment in the armed forces for Europe. By exaggerating Petawawa we are playing into the hands of our enemies.

An hon. Member: You mean the opposition?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I express the opinion of a good many people across Canada when I say to this parliament: Let us get on with the job.

Mr. Nickle: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I understand that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Nickle) wishes to ask the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) a question.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I will be glad to answer.

Mr. Nickle: Is it your intention, sir, to indicate that the responsibility for the failures in proper handling of defence funds in Canada rests with the United States army?

Some hon. Members: Don't answer.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The United States army is a great and powerful force for good in the world today. They make their mistakes, as the Canadian army does, but they keep on with the task.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is going to be extremely difficult for me to make a more effective case in dealing with Mr. Currie's report and the necessity for continuing the investigation started by him than has just been made in the speech so carefully read and eloquently delivered by the member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), who has just taken his seat. Because never was there more clearly shown—and for the first time in this parliament—just what has been going on in this country over a period of many years as a result of lax administration of the defence department.

I shall use the words used by the member for Cariboo himself. To quote him, under this Liberal administration—and this government is a direct descendant of the government then in power—during the war and during the period of events which he described on the Cariboo highway there was an "epidemic of plunder and corruption". Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure if any one of us in the opposition used those words, accurate and apt as they are, to describe some of the things which went on, we would be called out of order.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Did he not use much of this kind of argument in connection with the campaign in which he won his seat and came into this house?

Mr. Fulton: I most certainly did not.

Mr. Gardiner: It was the issue of the campaign.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know what the purpose of the hon. minister's question is, but it shows that he knows as little about the political atmosphere in British Columbia as he does about agricultural conditions there.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I know plenty about both and my hon. friend used all this information.

Mr. Fulton: Let me tell the minister that what he states is not so, and—although I know that others are not particularly interested in this—I will say for his benefit, that neither my campaign nor, so far as I know, the campaign of any other Conservative in British Columbia, was carried on on the basis just described by the minister. It is of course the minister's purpose to distract attention from the fact that one of the members who support the government in this house has described what took place under a Liberal government, of which this government is a direct descendant, as an "epidemic of plunder and corruption", but those words will stand.

Yet when we suggest not that the Currie report has shown an "epidemic of plunder and corruption", but merely that the Currie report should be taken at its face value as demonstrating that there was a fundamentally loose situation with respect to the administration and control at the top level in the Department of National Defence, when we say, just take those words—very much more moderate than the words used by the member for Cariboo—at their face value, and go on from there and try to see what can be done to remedy that situation, we are accused of making arguments for political advantage. We are accused of gross exaggeration and it is stated that we are taking a minor incident at one camp and trying to make a major issue of it.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the member for Cariboo has done a great service to this parliament and this country by placing this matter in its proper perspective. Surely no members on the government side, unless they deny completely the accuracy of what has just been said by one of their own supporters, can now be heard to say that Mr. Currie's report was not fair, reasonable and accurate in the words he used to describe the situation which he found—or to deny that—it is now a certainty that if what went on in this administration as described by the member for Cariboo is correct, then the situation described by Mr. Currie is established as fact.

That brings us very directly to what I think this house should devote its attention to—a twofold question. Firstly, where does the responsibility lie for the situation which the Currie report disclosed and what is to be done about that responsibility? Secondly what is to be done to clear up the situation which that report describes? It is significant and disturbing that, in connection with this matter of where responsibility lies, the government still seeks to evade its ultimate responsibility in connection with conditions which exist in the administration of the department—where there is such a laxity of control that these events could take place. It is true that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) says that he accepts responsibility. But, Mr. Speaker, those words themselves, not followed by action on his part or on the part of anyone else, mean nothing. Simply to say, "I admit responsibility", and then to continue a situation which is exactly the same as it was before makes the words and the utterance of those words a completely meaningless gesture.

When we consider this question of responsibility it is most important to recall what Mr. Currie's report establishes so clearly, namely, that this was not a situation about which the minister had had no chance to inform himself and no chance to take remedial action. On the contrary, it was a situation about which he could have been and should have been fully informed long in advance of the time when it actually came to his attention.

The situation revealed by the Currie report is a most serious and complete indictment of the administration of the Department of National Defence. That department is concerned perhaps more vitally than any other not only with the security and welfare of Canada but also with the economic well-being of the country—because of the fact that it spends approximately half of all the money which is now being taken from the Canadian people as a result of the huge burden of taxation they are called upon to bear. Yet, when this house is discussing a matter of this importance, a matter where the responsibility so clearly rests with the government—and the whole government—we find that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) does not even bother to speak in support of his own resolution. Surely, it must be unique in the annals of this parliament, Mr. Speaker, or of any parliament, for the leader of a government, which is under such justifiable criticism on the subject of its lack of protection of public moneys, to move, without any explanation at all concerning that situation, a resolution which he knows will launch a thorough discussion of the whole question—indeed, a resolution designed for that very purpose—but to give it only a nod of the head; and to think that the people of the country would be satisfied with that fleeting show of interest. Yet that is what happened. Oh, it is true that the Prime Minister was yesterday provoked into speaking on an issue completely irrevelant to the main matter before this house and before the country, that is, the question of how this extraordinary situation arose and what is being done to deal with it or prevent its recurrence in the future. On that subject the Prime Minister was, and still is, completely silent.

When we consider the question of responsibility for this situation, and the denial of responsibility by the government, it is well also to remind ourselves of the attitude first shown by government supporters when the report was tabled in the house. You remember that attitude, Mr. Speaker. I do not think there is a member in this house who will not recall with a sense of shame that it was an attitude of seeking an immediate scapegoat, and it found expression in the words of the members on the government side blaming the "brass hats". We all remember the disgraceful and degrading efforts of government members to suggest that the army staff alone was responsible for this situation and, by seeking to make that staff the scapegoat, to relieve the Minister of National Defence and the government of a responsibility which was justly theirs.

I think that the house and the country will recall with interest an article which appeared in the press on December 16. It was written by a correspondent for whom I have the greatest respect as a well-informed member of the press gallery, and a responsible writer. But it is well known by all that he happens to be a member of the gallery who is particularly close to influential and well-informed sources within the Liberal party. I refer to Mr. J. A. Hume, the parliamentary correspondent for the Ottawa Citizen. In an article in the evening Citizen of December 16, under the heading "Findings anger Liberals", he said this:

> The Currie report on lax administration by the Department of National Defence and works services branch of the Canadian army has aroused the chagrin and anger of Liberal M.P.'s.
>
> A long standing distrust of defence department "brass hats" has been revived and with it suspicions of lack of energy, alertness and waste and extravagance of some of these officers.
> The fear that billions in tax money has been improperly administered in peacetime is felt—

I may interject that it may well be felt, and it might well be treated more seriously by some hon. members on the other side in this house.

> —and with it embarrassment that similar huge sums were handled during world war II without any misdemeanours being uncovered.

Those misdemeanours have, of course, just now been uncovered by the revelations made by the hon. member for Cariboo here today.

> Government supporters are depending on the Prime Minister and the cabinet to demonstrate to those lax in their responsibilities that inefficiency and perhaps worse will not be tolerated by the taxpayers.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if government supporters were, in fact, depending upon the Prime Minister and the cabinet to demonstrate that attitude, how disappointed they must have been. In that respect, they would share the disappointment of members of the opposition because the prime responsibility stems right through from the Minister of National Defence to the cabinet. But the whole government has refused to accept responsibility, and nothing has been done. Of course, this article was referring to the hope then felt by the Liberal members of this house that this anger would be taken out on the brass hats, as they were calling the senior staff officers, and members of the army generally. That is what they were hoping. Some of them appear finally to realize the unfairness of that attitude.

For this situation does not involve criticism of the army itself. This situation, as is made so clear by the Currie report, stems from a fundamentally loose control at the top levels of departmental administration. The responsibility for that, Mr. Speaker, rests only in one place and that is on the minister of the department and through him on the government of this country.

Just in passing, Mr. Speaker, some reference should be made to the statements of General Simonds. I want to make it clear, to emphasize and re-emphasize, that there is, on the part of the official opposition, no criticism of the army for this situation. The responsibility rests on the failure of departmental administration to function properly at the top. While I believe that General Simonds pursued an unwise and incorrect course in making the statements that he has made, I am very definitely of the opinion that he may have felt that he was forced to do so by the fact that no one on the government side said what should have been said immediately, namely, that the responsibility rested on the government at the ministerial level, and not on the staff. He may have felt himself forced into making this statement by the fact that no responsible government member came forward to say what is true, namely, that the responsibility for this situation is at the very top level.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, when this improper and shameful campaign was being carried on in the house which suggested that brass hats were responsible, the government benches maintained complete silence. This suggestion was condoned by the Prime Minister and all the members of his cabinet by their silence.

Mr. Fulford: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and just to get the record straight, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has taken responsibility. He was not here when this matter was first brought out, because he was doing NATO work.

Mr. Fulton: But the Prime Minister was here, and others, but nothing was said. I should also draw to your attention now that the government is so uninterested in this matter, and so little prepared to assume the responsibility which properly rests on its shoulders, that there are three—I was going to say three but a fourth has just come into the house—ministers present at this time.

An hon. Member: That is because you are speaking.

Mr. Cruickshank: They have nothing to listen to.

Mr. Fulton: Neither of the ministers responsible for the defence department is in the house during this debate.

Mr. Gardiner: May I inform my hon. friend —I know he does not want to be unfair— that there is a council meeting going on which, of necessity, had to be held this afternoon. Perhaps the three of us who are here should be at the council meeting instead of listening to this nonsense.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I walked out of the council chamber—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: On a question of privilege.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I walked out of the council chamber one moment ago just to listen to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: I can well understand—

Mr. Cruickshank: You are wasting your time here.

Mr. Fulton: I can well understand that the remarks being made would be unwelcome enough to the Minister of Agriculture. But if there is anything in them which is nonsensical, I think that in a matter of this seriousness and importance it would be more appropriate, if I may suggest it, that the minister, rather than just make that broad and unfounded assertion, would advance his own views and demonstrate why the views now being advanced are, as he describes them, nonsensical.

Mr. Gardiner: If I think there is anything worth while in the remarks to answer, I will answer them.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest that the minister may do that in his own time, and that in fact this matter is important enough to justify more than the type of interest which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has just demonstrated he takes in a matter of this seriousness.

Mr. Cruickshank: Talk sense, not nonsense.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, there are some people to whom, unfortunately, sense will always be nonsense.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is too bad that the hon. member did not get the British Columbia leadership.

Mr. Fulton: This particular effort on the part of government members to deny the government's responsibility and, somehow or other, to fix responsibility on the army, and particularly to suggest that those who criticize the government on the basis of this report are criticizing the armed forces, has unfortunately been continued by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) himself. But he does it in a more subtle way. In his speech the other day dealing with this matter, he showed himself to be an extremely subtle gentleman indeed. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that he suggested that to make criticisms on the basis of the Currie report is to criticize the armed forces. This is the way in which he did it. As reported at page 932 of Hansard the minister said as follows:

> Perhaps I have been overenthusiastic in the defence of the armed forces against what I felt to be unjustified charges, and sometimes I may have been overoptimistic; but it is pretty hard to work with the armed forces of Canada without having high admiration for their fine record of achievement and without having faith in their capacity to do what is expected of them.

Mr. Speaker, with that statement as it applies to the armed forces, we all agree. What we go on to say is that it is unfortunate that the country is not as well served at the top level of departmental administration as it is by its soldiers, sailors and airmen in the services. But notwithstanding this attempt to suggest that those who criticize the government on the basis of the Currie report are criticizing the armed forces themselves, parliament should not allow itself to be led away by this attempt at diversion by association. Parliament should continue its direct criticism of the situation which prevails at the top in the department and which permitted this situation to arise.

Then further in assessing this question of responsibility, it is important to observe that there were many opportunities to discover the situation and to take effective action earlier in order to remedy it. I am not going to read again that portion of the report found at page 712 of Hansard where Mr. Currie makes it so clear that the minister and his immediate associates had plenty of opportunities to realize that there was this laxity in control. I refrain from doing so because it has been quoted frequently in the house. It can be found at page 712 of Hansard. However, what I want to emphasize is this. In addition to the frequent reports made by the department's own chief auditor, the official opposition had repeatedly requested an opportunity to examine the whole question of the efficiency of the Department of National Defence and the matter of its control of the moneys which it was spending to prepare the defences of this country. We had repeatedly asked for a committee of this house on defence. Your Honour will recall that that request was not met until last year when a committee with extremely limited powers—and one whose powers were further limited by the attitude taken by its chairman, supported by the government majority on that committee—was set up. It was not until last year that such a committee was appointed.

It is interesting to note what the Minister of National Defence himself said in reply on those previous occasions when we requested that such a committee be set up. As I say, we had asked for it nearly every year until it was first granted last year. I have taken only some extracts from three successive sessions of this house and here we find the Minister of National Defence on those occasions admitting his responsibility and the responsibility of the government for everything—not just for some things, but for everything—that went on in the Department of National Defence. Here is what he said as reported at page 2323 of Hansard of April 4, 1949:

> We have responsibility, through parliament, to the people, and we face that responsibility every day.

And a little later:

> I say it is a fundamental concept of our constitution that we meet parliament every day, answer questions, deal with problems of administration. We are responsible through parliament to the people—

"We, the government", in the minister's own words, are responsible for matters of administration. Again, as reported at page 1946 of Hansard of November 18, 1949, answering the request for a parliamentary committee he said this:

> In other words ultimately this parliamentary committee in effect would have to do with the management of our defence forces and their administration and planning, as is the case in some ways in the United States, rather than that being done ultimately, as it is now in Canada, by the cabinet itself, with a responsible minister.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note those words:

> —the management of our defence forces and their administration and planning . . . by the cabinet itself, with a responsible minister.

Again, on March 14, 1950, as reported at page 757 of Hansard, the Minister of National Defence said:

> Here the members of the government are appointed because the party they represent holds a majority in the House of Commons. They meet parliament every day. They are responsible collectively for the exercise of the functions of government, and they are responsible through parliament every day to the people.

It is therefore obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in 1949, 1950 and all the preceding years, on every occasion when we asked that parliament should be given the opportunity to look into the question of departmental administration, the minister refused it on the ground that he and he alone and his cabinet colleagues were responsible for these matters of administration, and he gave us the assurance that everything was perfect in that respect. How different is the tune today. Does the minister now accept the responsibility? Does he now say that and prove it by acting in accordance with his words?

Mr. Cruickshank: He said that yesterday.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman is a little bit impatient and perhaps a little bit hard of hearing.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member is making statements that are not correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the hon. member is a little bit hard of hearing. I have drawn attention to the fact that the minister had said the other day "I take responsibility," and just how meaningless those words were. What about his cabinet colleagues? And what is he doing about that responsibility?

An hon. Member: He told you.

Mr. Fulton: What is he doing about that responsibility? How is the minister discharging his responsibility to make sure that those events cannot recur? I shall have something to say about that matter in a moment when I come to the question of what is being done to cure the situation which this report reveals. But the minister now seeks to take refuge behind the fact that the job of managing his department is too big. As reported at page 939 of Hansard of January 13 he had this to say by way partially of excuse of what had gone on:

> Naturally it is not possible in an operation of this size for these reports or correspondence to be handled or even seen by the minister, or for that matter even by the deputy minister himself. It is only the really serious cases that the deputy minister can be expected to review personally.

But, Mr. Speaker, that does not alter the fact that the minister nevertheless is responsible for the organization of his department, and that the government is responsible if the minister does not handle that organization properly, or if he does not tell them that the department has grown too big for one minister to control. And the government are doubly responsible if, when it is suggested that the department has grown too big, they do nothing about it. It is well known, Mr. Speaker, to you and to all other hon. members, that for a period of a year or more the suggestion has been made from well-informed sources that the task of handling and controlling the Department of National Defence had grown too big for one minister. The government are doubly responsible because, with that knowledge, they did nothing and allowed this situation to develop.

It is no excuse, either, to say it is too big for one minister, because they knew that or should have known it, and it is particularly no excuse to say, my staff—whether the civil service or the armed forces—did not tell me what was going on. Because whether the staff in that sense be civil or military, Mr. Speaker, the responsibility is the same. The responsibility is that of the minister at the head of the department, not that of the staff.

Because the matter has come up I want to quote an authority in reference to what the Prime Minister said about the position of the chief of the general staff in making statements, as well as in connection with this whole question of responsibility for the situation which the Currie report reveals. The authority I am referring to is the work entitled "The British Constitution" by Professor Jennings, one of the best-known authorities on that subject, who says at page 143 and following:

> The responsibility of ministers to the House of Commons is no fiction, though it is not so simple as it sounds. All decisions of any consequences are taken by ministers, either as such or as members of the cabinet. All decisions taken by civil servants are taken on behalf of ministers and under their control.

I pause, Mr. Speaker, to interject that in this connection the military heads are in exactly the same position as the civil service in connection with defence matters and the administrative set-up of the Department of National Defence. Professor Jennings goes on:

> If the minister chooses, as in the large departments inevitably he must, to leave decisions to civil servants, then he must take the political consequences of any defect of administration, any injustice to an individual, or any policy disapproved by the House of Commons. He cannot defend himself by blaming the civil servant. If the civil servant could be criticized, he would require the means of defending himself. If the minister could blame the civil servant, then the civil servant would require the power to blame the minister. In other words, the civil servant would become a politician. The fundamental principle of our system of administration is, however, that the civil service should be impartial and, as far as may be possible, anonymous.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: I regret sincerely that I cannot. My time has practically expired, and I would prefer, if I may, to continue without interruption.

One has only to remember that in this connection the military, in their relation to the minister in matters of departmental administration, and in matters of that kind, are in exactly the same position as the civil servants to realize the important implications of that principle:

> The fundamental principle of our system of administration is, however, that the civil service should be impartial and, as far as may be possible, anonymous.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are left with the question: What is the Prime Minister going to do by way of accepting the responsibility which rests upon him for this extraordinary, this serious situation, which the Currie report has disclosed? What is he going to do to discharge the responsibility not only to the House of Commons but to the people of Canada, the taxpayers of Canada, whose money is thus being wasted and who are without any assurance that steps are being taken, and will be taken, not only in the works services department reported on by Mr. Currie but in the other branches of the Department of National Defence, to make sure that these situations will also be cleared up? I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister owes an apology to the taxpayers of Canada, firstly, for allowing this situation to develop, allowing money to be wasted, and secondly, for taking so little interest in the matter as he has shown so far in the course of this debate, and for taking no effective steps to deal with that situation.

What do we see? There is no sign that action is to be taken. The Minister of National Defence says that there is not even a breakdown. He criticized Mr. Currie. In a most extraordinary passage in his remarks on page 939 of Hansard he says:

> The breakdown to which Mr. Currie referred was, after all, a breakdown—if it was a breakdown—in keeping accounts, and not a breakdown in providing services and doing the essential work for which the army works services exists.

What an extraordinary defence to the Currie report to say that this breakdown, if it is a breakdown, is not a breakdown, although it is a breakdown of accounting. What does the minister think that accounting methods are set up for but to protect the financial interests of the people of Canada and to control the administration and the location of the property which their tax moneys have purchased? Then the minister says that the irregularities do not matter anyway. He takes defence in the fact that an army is not a Sunday school and soldiers are not saints. He says at page 942 of Hansard:

> There are in this house a great many veterans of the two wars. They know, and the veterans all over this country—and there are a lot of them—know, and I think the public has a pretty good idea too that an army is not a Sunday school and soldiers are not saints.

The minister should remind himself that veterans—and there are a good many of them in this house and throughout the country—are also taxpayers. Veteran taxpayers will not be very much impressed by the minister's arguments that these irregularities do not matter, that the fact that their money is being squandered, wasted to the extent permitted by a fundamentally loose system of administration at the top levels of the department, does not matter because armies are not Sunday schools and soldiers are not saints. The veterans and taxpayers of this country will not be satisfied with inaction; they will want a continuation of the investigation which Mr. Currie has shown himself to be probably the most highly qualified man in Canada to undertake, and they will want action to rectify maladministration where it may be disclosed to exist. They will not be satisfied with what the government offers them, a reference to a committee, a review of a review, to have the Currie report referred to a committee—and that by way of an amendment introduced by a member of the government to the government's own motion.

What an extraordinary situation, typical of the government's inability to act to clean up this whole situation. The Prime Minister introduced a motion, which stood on the order paper for many days, indeed, over the Christmas recess. We all knew its purpose. Certainly, the government knew its purpose. They had lots of time to think about it, and yet, when it is introduced in this house, when the time comes to discuss it, the Prime Minister, with that extraordinary indifference which he has shown in this matter, as though he were a superior being standing on a lofty pedestal, with naughty grandchildren running around his feet, really no concern of his—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: You are from British Columbia; don't be as low as that.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: "Order", my foot! That is pretty low, coming from British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: So he merely gives it the nod, and leaves it to somebody else to speak in support of his own motion. And then we find the extreme of indifference in that that minister, one of his own colleagues, introduces an amendment to his Prime Minister's motion that the committee should review the Currie review. What a most extraordinary spectacle—a government going all ways at once. They are trying to ride too many horses, and riding them in opposite directions. That is a situation which will not give satisfaction to the people of this country—

Mr. Cruickshank: Every horse has two ends.

Mr. Fulton: —who wish to see some assurance that their tax dollars are spent wisely. They will not be satisfied by the spectacle of a government too complacent to be consistent, too arrogant to explain its inconsistencies, and too weak and confused to know where it is going. But the people of Canada know what they want.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, they showed that at the last election.

Mr. Fulton: And they will show you at the next. They want to see an investigator who has shown his qualifications, as has Mr. Currie, given a free hand to continue that investigation into the Department of National Defence and its administration, so that he may bring to light further ways in which the money of the taxpayers can be saved, and then action taken to implement his recommendations so that we may know that we will get a dollar's worth of defence for every dollar that is spent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Thank God we haven't too many Rhodes scholars.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I intend to make no attempt to analyse the Currie report, or to discuss that whole matter, serious as it may be. As a matter of fact I had my inspiration for saying a word or two at this time from the speech made last night by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie).

It is not likely that that gentleman would flatter himself that anybody would pay any particular attention to his speech. However, he did devote a certain amount of attention to me, and therefore his speech holds some interest for me at least.

It is fortunate that the house has its lighter moments, and I think we experienced one of them when the hon. member spoke last night. Amidst the serious business and the frustrations of debate in the house, with which we are bedevilled, we do need a member, like the hon. member for Mackenzie, who will make a speech occasionally and give us cause for laughter.

During the greater part of his speech I was attempting to understand what he meant. However, his words, like his comprehension, seemed vague. I shall give the house now a sample of his logic. I would direct the attention of hon. members to what appears at page 1049 of Hansard, because I think they will find it interesting. It would seem that the hon. member for Mackenzie is interested in psychology, because he makes an analysis of myself and two of my more important colleagues. This is what we find in Hansard:

Mr. Ferrie: Let us analyse these three gentlemen.

The three gentlemen are my honoured leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and myself. He refers to me, at one point of his speech, as "one man in Saskatoon"—and that is an interesting title. He said:

Let us analyse these three gentlemen. One of these gentlemen read it.

The "it" refers to that mysterious copy of the report which, one way or another, came into our hands. Then he goes on:

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) read it.

That is a bald statement, I must point out, a statement with no attempt to produce evidence to support it.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) read it—

And then, this is the logic.

—because he is reported in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix as having said that the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was the man who threw the bomb into the Liberal party.

That, sir, is his idea of logic. As I said last night, I did not use the expression that Mr. Knowles, or anybody else, had thrown a bomb into the Liberal party because, as I said yesterday, that was not necessary. It had already been done, by themselves—by a bomb which exploded among them, at their own feet, and which is causing the disintegration of this government, and of the Liberal party upon which it is based. That surely is evident, and becomes increasingly clear during the course of this debate.

However, to go back to what my hon. friend said—and this caused me some amusement, because I was interested in how he distinguishes the various characteristics of the professions. He said that there were four classes of men who never betrayed a confidence, and listed them as doctors, chartered accountants, lawyers and bankers.

These, said he, were all pledged to secrecy.

Then he comes forth again, with the kind of logic to which I have already referred, and says that because Mr. Currie is one of those who, as it were, are sworn to secrecy, and yet allowed some information in the form of a report to leak out of his office, therefore Mr. Currie and the whole report must be condemned.

I am flattered by the hon. member's reference to me. He even dignified me by allocating to me some promotions. This is what he said:

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) was also a teacher and is supposed to be a professor.

Well, I did not like to interrupt him, but I could have said that I have never been promoted to that high degree of eminence. It flattered me, nevertheless, when he referred to me and to my leader as ex-school teachers. Referring to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre he used the word "preacher", and suggested that a man of that type, of that high calibre, knew that the report should have been sent back immediately.

He said at one place I should have sent the report back to its place of origin.

The one man in Saskatoon—

Says he—

—according to his statement, must have read the document.

[Mr. Knight.]

And so, in line with his logic, the man from Saskatoon should have sent the report back. He neglected, of course, to mention one trifling matter, one which I suggest is relevant to the argument, and that is that in the first place the man from Saskatoon does not know the origin of the report; the man from Saskatoon has not even yet read the report; and the man from Saskatoon saw it only once—and that at a distance, in the hands of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Of course, that is just a trifling detail to the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Then there was the interesting matter of the bombshell. Mr. Knight, according to the Star-Phoenix—and this appears to be the view of my hon. friend—is reported to have said that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre threw the bombshell into the Liberal party.

Let me say that I did make a speech in Saskatoon. Let me say to my hon. friend that it was a well attended meeting of very interested people. What I was doing was simply describing the dramatic situation which took place in the House of Commons. I said that the throne speech debate was dragging along; nobody was paying too much attention. And then, suddenly, into that lethargic situation my hon. friend threw a bombshell—the bombshell, of course, being the disclosure of the report which at the moment he had in his hip pocket. But there is no reference whatever to throwing bombshells into any party.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Was it stolen?

Mr. Knight: That is a sample of what took place in connection with the bombshell.

Mr. Ferrie: Why did you say that a bombshell was thrown, if you had not seen the report and did not know anything about it? You say you were ignorant of the fact that it was in existence. Yet, why did you say anything about the bombshell?

Mr. Knight: My hon. friend has simply misinterpreted my words—

Mr. Ferrie: Oh, we always do, according to you.

Mr. Knight: —as he misunderstood the meaning of them last night. Before my hon. friend came into the house I had just pointed out that he was somewhat weak in logic when he says that I must have read the report. Forsooth, because I said that my hon. friend had thrown a bombshell into the quietness of the house. I submit that my hon. friend's statement is not logical. In any case, I have just explained the incident and if my hon. friend will read Hansard tomorrow perhaps he will be able to understand it.

I come now to more important people and I want to say a word or two about the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I speak more in sadness than in anger in regard to the Prime Minister. I do not care to what party he may belong, the prime minister of this country is my prime minister. I expect the prime minister to have dignity, honesty and integrity; I expect a degree of culture and a degree of dignity. I thought that he fulfilled those conditions and I have been trying to think it today. I have often so maintained, even among those who are his political enemies and upon the public platforms of this country. I had placed him upon a pedestal. I think those who have heard me speak in public will endorse that statement. I am most reluctant to knock him off that pedestal. I have not knocked him off that pedestal; he has of his own volition stepped down to a lower level than that on which I had placed him.

When he stepped down into the mud he entangled his feet in the mire that has entangled the feet of lesser men. When he stooped to pick up a handful of mud to cast at the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) the only result was, not that the mud remained upon the recipient but that some of it stuck to the hands of the thrower.

Mr. Studer: Better get washed up.

Mr. Knight: Except for the notable speech which he made last night, the hon. member has made a name for himself in this house chiefly through the medium of vulgar interjection. No man in this country can throw mud and make it stick on the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The hon. member has served his country in this house for many years. He is known to all of us as a man of unquestioned integrity and honesty.

I am reminded of an attempt of this sort which was made once before when my Liberal friends across there cast their eyes at the floor in shame at a speech which was made in this house by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart). Even though that matter had been burning in his mind and heart for twenty years, even if it was the result of old feuds and old spite, it was no more true on that account.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Knight: Is my hon. friend asking a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ferrie: —I think it is most unfair to speak of a member who is so sick that he cannot come here today to defend himself.

Mr. Knowles: What was the Prime Minister doing yesterday?

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member for Mackenzie has not been long enough in the house or sufficiently observant to know that in these cases we do not speak personally. I am speaking now of a member of the Liberal party who undertook at one time to let loose a diatribe against the hon. hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar of which Liberal members in the house were particularly ashamed. As far as I am concerned, if the hon. member for Yorkton is sick, I am sorry to hear it. I wish him good health and every other good thing and I trust he will be quickly restored to this house. But that does not alter the fact that, while we do not engage in personalities, we are concerned at the moment with the breakdown of the government of this country.

If I can bring that to the attention of the people of this country so that they will change the government, then I am justified in doing what I am doing. There is a lot of talk in this country to the effect that we of the opposition groups are glad to take advantage of any point in order to make political capital at the expense of the government. What would you expect us to do? I say to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), a gentleman whom I respect: If you were sitting in opposition on this side, what would you and your cohorts be doing? Is it not the proper function—

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question in view of the fact that I have been referred to?

Mr. Knight: Wait until I have finished my sentence.

Mr. Gardiner: In view of the fact that I have been referred to—

Mr. Knight: May I finish my sentence?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would appear that the hon. member who is now speaking is not giving his consent.

Mr. Knight: If in the course of showing the failures and inconsistencies of this government, if in the course of propounding constructive and alternative policies to the government of the day, we of the opposition parties can win the good will of the people of this country and gain for ourselves a few votes and ultimately replace the government which we are now criticizing, is there any blame to be attached to us? Is not that one of the immemorial functions of an efficient and vigilant opposition?

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question?

Mr. Knight: I should like to deal with one other thing and perhaps when I am finished the right hon. minister will not want to ask any questions. I should like to say a word or two about the late Mr. Mackenzie King, and I do not intend to say anything derogatory about that right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Is this in order on a motion to set up a committee?

Mr. Knight: I shall say nothing against the late prime minister. De mortuis nil nisi bonum. If you can imagine that he succeeded as he himself was sure he would succeed, in being able to communicate as it were between two worlds, I can see him shaking his head in sorrow and shame at the actions—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order. This house is discussing a motion to set up a committee to examine national defence expenditures and I submit the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. Knight: On a point of order.—

An hon. Member: Horses.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have no objection to horses.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) wishes to speak about certain decisions made or positions taken by the former prime minister, it is probably in order. I do not think he wants to do anything else.

Mr. Knight: What I propose to do, and it is relevant to the question, is to show what the former Prime Minister would have done in this particular instance which, may I say, he would not have allowed to occur or at least to reach the stage it has. I can see him in my imagination out behind the curtains, shaking his head at the political ineptitude of his successor and his cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Temper, temper.

Mr. Knight: What would he have done? Although I have never yet been at a cabinet meeting—

Mr. Dewar: You never will be there, but you can dream.

Mr. Knight: I can see him at the head of the table with that stubby little pencil writing the first draft of the resignation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) as soon as these things came out, as soon as there were reports of inefficiency and maladministration in this Department of National Defence. That resignation would have been written out and my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence would have been asked to sign it. Then the late prime minister would have gone out and chopped off the two top heads of the army administration. Then he would have come into this house and made the speech of his life.

Mr. Dewar: That is the first thing they do in Russia.

Mr. Knight: He would have said that he had personally saved this country from military rule. He would have said that no military authority must be allowed ever to have influence on the civil rule of this country. He would say that he had saved this country, and then he would have done what this government has not the courage to do. He would have dissolved this house and gone to the country and won an election, something that this government knows it cannot and will not do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knight: I shall simply close my remarks by saying that the Currie report is a terrible indictment of this government; and that no whitewashing in the committee or anywhere else will cover up the dark shadows. The committee which the government propose to set up is not to investigate the crime but to investigate the investigator. Let the government go to the country now, and the public will decide.

Mr. Gardiner: I said that I still wanted to ask a question when my hon. friend finished. Have I his permission to ask it now?

Mr. Knight: Certainly.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, for my own benefit, and I think the benefit of some others, I would like to be clear on one point.

Mr. Knight: Is it a question or a speech?

Mr. Gardiner: It is a question—perhaps two but one anyway. Are we assured that the leader of the C.C.F. party would have followed exactly the same procedure which was followed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in connection with this matter? The whole argument is based on the idea that the leader of a party is of a particularly high type politically. Does the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) take responsibility for all that is being said with regard to this matter? He has not been in the house at all since it came up.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, as I say I do not know too much about the details of the incident.

Mr. Dickey: You have proved that, but answer the question.

Mr. Knight: That is what I propose to do. The right hon. minister has asked me, as I understand it, if the member for Winnipeg North Centre has followed the same course that the member for Rosetown-Biggar would have done had he not actually been ill, but had been in the house. Is that right?

Mr. Gardiner: It was the reverse, but either way will do.

Mr. Knight: It is the same thing. My answer is that as a member of our caucus I know that the member for Winnipeg North Centre has been in constant consultation with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and has received his approval—in most cases ahead of time—for those subjects on which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was to talk in this house.

Mr. Gardiner: Might I ask a second question?

Mr. Knight: No.

Mr. Gardiner: I wish to ask a second question as a result of the answer received to the first.

Mr. Knight: I submit that the minister has no right—

Mr. Dewar: Don't be afraid.

Mr. Knight: I am not afraid. Let him make a speech; he has forty minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) does not wish a question to be asked, it is his privilege.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it is my privilege to make a speech and I have the floor for the moment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knight: I am asking you, sir—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: How can I hear anything if I have two members standing on the floor of the house both trying to speak? I recognize the member for Saskatoon.

Mr. Knight: I am asking you, sir, for a ruling, as Speaker of this house, whether the Minister of Agriculture has the right to ask that a question be put on the record when I refuse to answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon had the floor. When he resumed his seat after concluding his speech he agreed that the Minister of Agriculture might ask one question. That question was asked.

Mr. Knight: And answered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Now, as a result of the answer which was given, the minister requests permission to ask another question. To this request the hon. member for Saskatoon answered in the negative. The minister pursued his attempt to put his question or to obtain consent from the hon. member and the latter persisted in refusing. Now the minister says that if he cannot ask a question he is entitled to make a speech.

However, I am confronted with this position. Before the hon. minister rose the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) stood and asked to speak. Is he going to speak or is he going to yield to the minister?

Mr. Adamson: I wish to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): This rather amazing debate in which we have the spectacle of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) calling the leader of the C.C.F. party a receiver of stolen goods and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) his fence, rather suggests from what has already happened that he, the Prime Minister, like Laocoon, is becoming entangled. I trust that his fate will not be that of the Greek of old.

An hon. Member: What about Confucius?

Mr. Adamson: Confucius merely played a musical instrument. He did not throw a spear even at a wooden horse.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is a defence committee for? Surely we must consider that it is to investigate, examine, question, and if necessary advise the government and members of the Department of National Defence, both in and out of uniform, on the vital problems of the defence of Canada. If we in this parliament, and as members of the defence committee, do not do a job in this regard we are not fulfilling our duty to the country and to those who elected us.

My objection to this proposed amendment by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is that it shows that the government has a conception that we are called on to fight a limited war. This is suicide for Canada. The one overwhelming and dynamic fact, unpleasant as it may be, is that we must be prepared to fight an unlimited war. There is no such thing in the modern world as a successful limited war.

Mr. McCulloch: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the hon. member is supposed to be reading his speech. He should be adhering to the rules of the house.

Mr. Adamson: I am not, of course, reading my speech. For the aggressor to be successful, the war must be unlimited. Let us not fool ourselves that the Russians do not realize this. Russia has always lost limited wars and always won unlimited ones. She knows this and did not forget the lesson of the Russo-Japanese war, which the Japanese unfortunately did.

I contend that the job of a defence committee is to deal with the whole broad problem of national defence, and not to be hamstrung by having to concentrate on one small non-combatant branch of one service. The Currie report has been made. The facts are known. The report deals with a series of matters and has some serious implications, yet the sums admitted by the minister are small compared with the over-all cost of defence which approximates $2 billion this year.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) complained that to provide guards for a place like Farnham would cost a great deal more than the value of the place so guarded. Now, he has admitted that the Currie report established defections of some $50,000. Actually Mr. Currie, in his report, stated that the amount of defection and thievery could not be adequately and completely calculated, and it might be greatly in excess of this.

Let us assume that the minister admits the $50,000. He is sending this report, which is past history and every word of which has been investigated, to the defence committee. The defence committee sits once a day. The cost of one sitting of this parliament is in the neighbourhood of $10,000. Therefore to send this report to the defence committee is to add at least $10,000 a day to the cost of the investigation. Now, Mr. Speaker, a similar situation might be the case of a man who has had a bad accident. He has a broken leg, a ruptured appendix, a coronary thrombosis, a blood clot on the brain, a gunshot wound in his back, and an ingrown toenail. When the doctor comes, the doctor deals with the ingrown toenail first. Something similar to that is being done by sending the Currie report to this committee.

Mr. Currie mentioned also the case of military security. It is impossible to place a dollars and cents value on military security. When a department store loses goods from its warehouse, there is a finite and calculable value of the goods lost. The theft of a piece of military equipment, which may have little or no commercial value, could disclose methods which our armed services intend to use in combat as well as the type of equipment to be employed. If information like this is compromised it may cost the lives of many Canadian servicemen, and also the loss of a future major operation. It is quite wrong, therefore, to regard military security only as a dollars and cents matter.

It is useless to say that security cannot be provided. The atomic energy commission in Chalk River has provided adequate security, and the area is extremely large. I am convinced also that no one but an atomic scientist could obtain much useful information from Chalk River. However, a 15-year-old boy picking up a proximity fuse, an unexploded bomb, a guided missile or a new type of shell, could quite easily give our enemies a great deal of information about our production methods and the type of weapons we were using.

War is a hideous waste, but this waste of our capital and materials becomes even more hideous if it does not produce the sinews of war which will enable our men to fight and win. To fight and not win is far worse than not fighting at all. Let us look, therefore, at our arms production and particularly our production of aircraft.

The policy of the Canadian government with regard to air is a purely defensive one. It is Canadian policy not to have bombers but to concentrate on interceptors and fighters. This decision takes into consideration our industrial capabilities, and possibly has some merit. With the cost of some of the new bombers being as great as pre-war battleships, it would probably place too great a strain upon our economy to expect Canada to produce large numbers of the latest type bombers. Yet the logistics of the decision could, I feel, have been profitably discussed by the chief of the air staff or his technical officers with the defence committee. If we are, therefore, producing an air force which, apart from an anti-submarine section, has the sole function of stopping enemy bombers, we had better look at the sort of job we are doing.

Our defence is based on two aircraft, the F-86 Sabre and the CF-100, both of which are good aeroplanes. According to a press story this week the F-86 is being produced at the rate of approximately forty a month at the Canadair plant in Montreal. The CF-100, we are told, was to be produced by this time, that is January, 1953, at the rate of twenty a month at the Avro plant at Malton. The production figures for the Sabre have been made known and published, but not those for the CF-100. What I think the committee should know is how many CF-100's have actually been produced and are being produced per month at this time. Have we, in fact, produced twenty from the production line—not from the special hand-tooled assembly line, but from the actual production line? There can be no question of security here as the figure for the Sabre is given quite openly in the press. The only reason for withholding the information with regard to the CF-100 can be that the production figures are shocking.

There is an even more serious question in the matter of production, and that is the question of effectiveness. The modern bombers such as the Avro 698 or the new Boeing or the other United Kingdom type called the Monarch are all capable of speeds approaching that of sound. Their effective operational altitude is from 40,000 to 50,000 feet. Therefore, to intercept them, we must have an aeroplane which can climb to those altitudes and fly at and maintain speeds considerably in excess of that of sound. Neither of the two fighters we have at the present time can do this, and they would be practically useless as effective barriers to such bombers.

The United Kingdom and the United States now have these delta-winged craft. How long will it be before Russia has them? We cannot safely count on over five years. What are we doing to design and construct a fighter with the characteristics necessary for successful combat? If our sole aim in the air is to be protective, surely it is fundamental that we should have some idea of what sort of protectors we are going to have. Is it not the function of any defence committee to be informed—yes, to demand to be informed—about such a basic matter?

I feel that no parliament can divest itself of the responsibility for national defence. The old days of the professional soldier are over. Today every citizen is part of the defence of his country, and the better he is informed the more effective he can be. These basic problems therefore must be discussed and studied.

I suggest that men like Air Marshal Douglas Smith, the air member for technical services, with his engine and airframe specialists, and Dr. J. J. Green, as well as Dr. Solandt, could most profitably come before the committee.

The design, construction and production of such a plane with a mach. rating of 1·3 to 1·5 is a difficult problem because it will require an entirely new profile and new engines. It could possibly take up to eight years to get one into production. We have known of the Avro 698 probably for at least two years, that is if there is any liaison between the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F. Have these two years been wasted, and the job of providing a counter to this aircraft not yet begun?

I mention these figures about aircraft because they strike at the very fundamentals of the job of providing national defence for this country. If the committee on national defence is to do anything, it must see that the country gets adequate national defence. Otherwise of what use at all is it? Why should it be called? If it is to see that we get adequate national defence it must deal with these problems—technical ones, if you like—such as the basic one of whether we can produce aircraft which will do the job of protecting us and our allies from attack.

In the committee we have to see whether this is being done. There is no question of security. The people of Canada must understand the difficulties of the job ahead. We have been given too much soothing syrup in the past. We have been treated with a sort of continuous effusion of Dr. Pangloss that everything was perfect in this most perfect of all worlds. If the Currie report has done nothing else, it has opened the eyes of the Canadian people at least to the dangers of national defence and the problems which lie ahead. There should be no excuse for any committee on national defence not going into these problems.

Mr. Harris: Who is delaying it?

Mr. Adamson: The minister is delaying it by the device of putting the Currie report before the committee on national defence. He is delaying it every single day, as we were delayed last year in the committee.

I now come to another question which must be given consideration and must be decided. I refer to the question of ordnance. The policy followed has been to divest ourselves of United Kingdom type artillery, in particular the 25-pounder. We were told that, for the sake of unification of arms, we were to send our 25-pounders to NATO countries, which we did, and to be supplied with United States 105 millimeter guns. We divested ourselves of the 25-pounders—enough for three divisions, I think. When our troops went to Korea, because of United States policy we found that there was a critical shortage of ammunition. Instead of our own gunners having our own guns and our own supply lines for ammunition, we found ourselves to be hostages to United States policy. The tragic reports of two rounds per day per gun, which have been authenticated over and over again, are a result of this policy.

Mr. Knowles: Five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Adamson: I shall be through with this matter in just a minute, Mr. Speaker. This question of artillery and the question of the unification of arms were decided by the government without any discussion with the committee and, in my opinion, it has led to tragic results.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the order paper I note that, as items No. 45 and No. 46, there are two bills which have been reported by a standing committee of the house. Shall I take the two in the same motion? Is it agreed that the two bills, one respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company and the other to incorporate Peace River Transmission Company Limited, be considered at the same time in committee of the whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 41, respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company.—Mr. Bennett.

Bill No. 42, to incorporate Peace River Transmission Company Limited.—Mr. Murray (Cariboo).

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are several divorce bills on today's order paper. Shall they all be taken under the one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 94, for the relief of Jane Louttit Dormer.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 95, for the relief of Roger Loiselle. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 96, for the relief of William Oscar Gilbert.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 97, for the relief of George Magner. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 98, for the relief of Teodora Szablity Szentirmai.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 99, for the relief of Arthur Piche. —Mr. Winkler.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the house will realize, this bill is identical in form to one which I have moved on two or three previous occasions. The purpose of the bill is to free parliament from the necessity of processing divorce bills. I am sure it is correct for me to say that no one in this house likes or approves of the fact that we are handling divorce in this parliament of Canada at all.

I readily recognize the opinions that have been expressed on former occasions about divorce, and as to whether or not the passing of this bill would seem to be an acceptance of the fact of divorce; but I would point out that, whether we like it or not, we already have a divorce court in Canada for people in those provinces where there are no provincial divorce courts. The provinces concerned of course are Quebec and Newfoundland. I for one respect the desire of the majority of the people in those provinces that there should be no divorce within the confines of those provinces.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we in this parliament also have certain rights. In particular I feel that we have the right to be free from the necessity of constituting ourselves as a divorce court. I am sure that we are not proud of the manner in which we conduct our court proceedings when we become a divorce court. As a matter of fact unless some of us, particularly in this group, choose to make an examination of these cases, they go through in batches. We have not really got into high gear yet, so far as this session is concerned. If my arithmetic is correct, I believe that so far we have given second reading to only 74 of these divorce bills. However, we did 38 of them at one crack, 30 at another, and just a few moments ago we gave second reading to six more. As the session goes on this number will probably amount to 250 or 300, if the records of former sessions are any indication.

Now, as I say, Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that we have in Canada, here in the parliament of Canada, a divorce court, to which persons of the provinces where there are no divorce courts have access. Hon. members concur in that fact every time these divorces are put through in this House of Commons. It seems to me that it would not be altering that situation by one iota, so far as principle is concerned, so far as recognizing the fact of divorce is concerned, if we were to decide, on the one hand, that we are not going to establish divorce courts in the provinces where they do not want them—the fact of the matter is we could not do it, but let it be clear that we do not want to—but on the other hand, let us exercise what is our undoubted right to transfer the handling of these divorces out of this parliament, out of this building, and put them into some other court, some other building, right here in the city of Ottawa. In other words, my suggestion is that the place where this job is done should be transferred from this building to another building a few hundred yards away, at the same time making it crystal clear that we do not ask that this be done within the boundaries of the provinces where divorce courts are not desired.

It is on that basis that I make again, through the medium of presenting this bill, the suggestion that the Exchequer Court of Canada be given authority to deal with divorces from the provinces where divorce courts are not established.

As everyone knows, the exchequer court is for most, if not all, of the rest of its functions a circuit court. That makes it possible for it to sit in various parts of Canada. To make sure that if this bill passes the exchequer court would not sit within the provinces of Quebec or Newfoundland when hearing divorce cases, there is a section in the bill which provides that the Exchequer Court of Canada, in dealing with divorce cases, would do it only here at the city of Ottawa. In other words, Mr. Speaker, there is clearly no change so far as the basis of divorce is concerned. There is no change so far as the accessibility of a divorce court to citizens in those two provinces is concerned. The only difference is the place where these people would go who are faced with what they feel to be the unfortunate necessity of seeking a divorce.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that on former occasions there has been strong criticism of this bill by some hon. members, and on one or two occasions we have had a vote and it has been defeated. There has not been much change in the make-up of this house since the last vote, and I do not suppose that one should expect a radical enough change in opinion that on this occasion the bill would pass. However, I hope that by continuing to bring this measure before the house, sufficient attention and consideration will be given to it so that, one of these days, a way will be found to deal with divorces which is less reprehensible and less offensive to all of us than the manner in which we are now doing it.

I suggest that if there are those who feel that the procedure here suggested, of referring divorces to the Exchequer Court of Canada, is not a satisfactory one, an obligation and responsibility rests upon them either to stand in their places and say that they are satisfied with doing it here in the House of Commons, or to suggest some other way.

It is not often that when a member moves second reading of his own bill he suggests to other hon. members a procedure other than that of simply voting for it. But, knowing how hon. members feel about this question of divorce, I would not feel at all badly if someone were to move, as an amendment to my motion for second reading, that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a committee. It would indicate at least some progress if an amendment of that kind were moved and carried, because it would make it possible for us to go into this matter in detail, and to have a thorough discussion as to what would be the best way of solving a problem which, I am sure, is felt deeply by all of us.

This is not a question of where we stand on divorce, or whether we approve of it. As a matter of fact, no one really approves of divorce. There are some in the house who feel that under no circumstances should it be entertained. There are others who disapprove of it just as much, but who face the fact that there are situations where there seems to be no alternative.

And so I say I would welcome the reference of this bill, or even the subject matter of it, to a committee so that it might be discussed fully. I am not going to offer any such amendment. I could not, in any case. And let me make it clear at once that I have not done what was done by the government the other day; I have not arranged for one of my colleagues to move an amendment to my own bill. But if anyone who is interested in the matter feels that that is a suggestion worthy of consideration, let me say to him that I would not object to that procedure. In other words this is not an issue of the kind one wants to see resolved in line with his way of thinking, and his way only. Rather I believe I am doing a service to parliament in bringing before hon. members of the house a suggestion dealing with a problem which concerns all of us. I hope it will be looked upon in that spirit, and that we will consider whether on the one hand the bill should be passed and consideration of divorces referred to the Exchequer Court of Canada or, if that is not acceptable to the house, at least that its subject matter should be referred to a committee so that serious consideration may be given to this problem.

Hon. members will recall that at the close of the last session I gave the house some statistics as to the amount of time we had spent considering divorce cases. All told, the aggregate of time so spent has been considerable. However, when it is divided among the number of divorces we deal with it amounts to only a few seconds for each divorce put through this parliamentary divorce mill.

Hon. members will recall that I have given a picture of the tremendous pile of printing involved, so that if one stacked up all the copies of divorce bills and evidence prepared for us, and for members in the other place, it would make a pile considerably higher than the peace tower. Add to that the fact that these cases involve matters that surely are not the business our constituents sent us here to deal with, and I am sure it is fair to say that all hon. members would like to get rid of this business from the House of Commons.

I earnestly hope the house will give serious consideration to finding a way to implement what is the desire of all of us. I believe the solution contained in the bill is the best one; I have not heard a better one. Therefore from my point of view I would like to see the bill passed. But if there are those who feel that there should be some discussion, and that some better way could be found, I should like to hear from them. At the moment, however, I place the bill before the house in the hope that serious consideration will be given to it.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assert immediately that I am strongly opposed to the bill moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because, in my opinion, it would facilitate applications for divorce and increase their number, especially in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland.

I take that stand because my conscience compels me to do so and because I want to justify the confidence placed in me by the people of Lake St. John county who, thank God, still consider marriage indissoluble and the home sacred.

Before speaking on the merits of the bill before the house, I would like to say a few words about divorce itself. As a Catholic I am opposed to divorce. I am against it for reasons of a religious, social and family character. Marriage is a divine institution that cannot be dissolved by human justice. Our civil law, sanctioned by the constitution of 1867, asserts that marriage is indissoluble.

The family is the moral structure of the nation and every citizen must consider it his duty to resist any attempt to weaken the cornerstone of society, to oppose any measure which might undermine the very foundation of the Canadian nation. Statistics show that countries with the lowest birth rates are also those where divorce flourishes and the first victim is the child who is consequently deprived of the enjoyment of a home where harmony prevails, where husband and wife respect each other, where good example and the practice of sound Christian virtues are to be found.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), summing up the situation, said in this house, on March 24, 1944:

> In Quebec not only is there no jurisdiction to deal with divorce, but there is a pre-confederation law which was continued in force by the British North America Act, and which will remain in force until this parliament chooses to deal with it, as it has jurisdiction to do under section 91 of the British North America Act. This pre-confederation law declares that marriage is dissolved only by the natural death of one of the spouses. Whatever the authority you set up, as long as this law holds good in that province, no court will be able to grant any divorce.

The confederation act gives the federal government the right to legislate in so far as divorce is concerned. For obvious reasons, none of the lawmakers who have succeeded one another since 1867 has deemed it proper to enact a general divorce law. Every petition for divorce submitted to parliament is an exceptional case. The legislator retains his absolute right to accede to or to refuse the petition of the person who wishes to obtain a divorce.

From a legal point of view, it would be an entirely new situation were we, through general legislation, to delegate our powers to the exchequer court. It would be the admission of the principle at stake and the interested parties would no longer have to seek passage of an exceptional bill, to seek a privilege, but would go to a court of law to claim, with due proof, the exercise of a right, of an absolute right enjoyed by every citizen of this country. There is no doubt that the federal parliament has a right to hand over to the exchequer court divorce bills for Quebec or Newfoundland.

But if it were to do so, we would have in our statutes two conflicting texts, the one authorizing the breaking off of the marital tie, the other, that is section 185 of the civil code, proclaiming the indissolubility of marriage; faced with the obligation of making a choice, I do not hesitate to decide in favour of the application of the principles of divine right which were sanctioned by our civil law long before confederation.

Those who favour divorce courts seem to entertain a mistaken view of marriage and the law pertaining to it. Marriage is not a mere personal question, but a public one also. It concerns the prosperity of the nation and its effects may have far-reaching social consequences; that is why the lawmaker must be careful when preparing any measure tending to condone the granting of divorce.

The law must be concerned with the common welfare and not merely with the practical side of things. The sponsor of the resolution or those who support it tell us that they were not elected to pass divorce laws, but the federal parliament has had jurisdiction in this matter ever since 1867 and it is their privilege to vote in favour of such bills, as it is mine to oppose them.

If the people of Quebec and Newfoundland are opposed to the establishment of divorce courts, why do the representatives of the other provinces seek to force this system on them?

Finally, I should like them to understand that they will not succeed in having accepted a divorce court for the province of Quebec, because in my opinion, such a measure is anti-social, anti-Christian, and directed against the family, and the remedy will not be found in the establishment of a court, but in the suppression of divorce itself. That is why I shall vote against any divorce bills presented in this house and against any measure such as this, which tend to condone it.

Mr. P. L. Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, every session we are faced with a number of divorce bills which we are supposed to pass or to reject.

Mr. Speaker, I am expressing my personal opinion and that of my constituents in congratulating those members who have protested against the institution of a divorce court in those provinces which, up to now, have refused to insert such legislation in their statutes. You have spoken for a logical and sensible cause. Did not our gracious Princess, who has now become our beloved Queen, addressing a group of 3,600 mothers, tell them that divorce has become a dangerous scourge of society?

Here are the words which Princess Elizabeth spoke in London on October 18, 1949:

(Text):

"We live in an age of growing self-indulgence, of hardening materialism and of falling moral standards. I would go so far as to say that some of the very principles on which the family, and therefore the health of the nation, is founded, are in danger.

When we see around us the havoc which has been wrought above all among the children by the break-up of homes, we can have no doubt that divorce and separation are responsible for some of the darkest evils in our society today.

I do not think you can perform any finer service than to help maintain the Christian doctrine that the relationship of husband and wife is a permanent one, not to be lightly broken because of difficulties or quarrels."

The princess urged the mothers to help others give their children that "sound Christian teaching which is essential to us all, but which is sadly lacking in so many homes today."

"As we all know", she said, "a child learns by example and therefore it is not only most important for us to see that our children say their prayers and go to church, but also to practise Christianity in our own lives. We surely cannot expect our children to do what we are too lazy or indifferent to do ourselves."

(Translation):

There we have, Mr. Speaker, the advice given to her subjects by a young mother who was then 22 years of age and is now our sovereign and Queen of a great empire. Her advice is as sound as it is excellent and it shows great foresight for a person of her age. She wisely unfolds before us the disaster that divorce has in store, not only for those who claim legal separation but also for a whole nation.

It is not surprising that there is so little understanding between nations. In my opinion, if we want peace, we must begin by having it in the family. When we have learned to love one another, to respect one another, man will no longer seek to separate what God has united.

In closing my remarks, I would add that while the world is allowed to go to ruin, we must be strong enough to fight against the current. Let us be the bold defenders of family life. Let us make other people understand the grandeur and beauty of the Christian marriage. We shall thus help ensure, in a constructive way, the prosperity of our country, the happiness of our brethren and the salvation of the whole Canadian nation.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, several hon. members have repeatedly criticized in the house the manner in which we deal with divorce bills. However, many of those who criticize that procedure believe that it is yet the better way of dealing with them and that we should not change it.

Soon after the opening of this session, as during the previous sessions, a bill was introduced which, according to its mover, would aim to correct a situation that does not please anyone, that several would like to do away with but that many prefer to tolerate. The bill would enable the exchequer court to pass judgment upon applications for divorce from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland which, according to the law as it now stands, must be dealt with by the upper house.

I have listened to and read with great attention the numerous speeches on the matter. It is only reasonable to expect that the majority of those speeches should be made by members from Quebec and Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker, I have yet to hear a representative of those provinces say that he approves the bill as it now stands. That means that the parties concerned do not want it. Have we not there sufficient grounds for insisting that the provinces concerned be given the right to decide for themselves whether they want divorce courts or not.

Divorce Jurisdiction

Upon reading debates of previous years, one finds that several members are of the opinion that under our legislation it seems that divorces may be too easily obtained. Consequently, many young people get married without giving enough thought to what they are doing. They marry without due consideration, thinking that if things go wrong it will be easy to remedy the situation; people get the idea that they will be able to obtain a divorce easily and start over again. Unfortunately, in several cases, the husband or the wife, and often both of them, have already been married two, three or four times if not more often.

Even then, I say that the passing of this bill would not be justified. On the contrary, I hold that divorces could then be more easily obtained in the provinces concerned.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said in this house that we might be called upon to grant a considerable number of applications for divorce, 250 maybe. As a matter of fact, in the years gone by, applications for divorce which have been granted by us have reached approximately that figure on the average.

On the other hand, according to statistics, in the province of Ontario, for instance, applications for divorce reached 2,400 in a single year. With due allowance for the difference of population between Ontario and Quebec, one can easily imagine what would be the number of applications for divorce in the province of Quebec if we were to pass an act setting up a divorce court in that province.

One must bear in mind that divorce is fatal to the family. The hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) made this point very clear. We are all agreed that the family is the pillar, the cornerstone of civilization.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to quote a few lines from the collective pastoral letter of Their Excellencies the archbishops and bishops of the civil province of Quebec on the labour problem, under date of February 14, 1950:

> Man is born, grows up and is reared in a family, which he leaves only to get married, to give birth and education to other human beings.

It may be that since the last world war young married couples have had many reasons to want a divorce, but the passing of the bill now before us will not provide us with a solution to the problems which beset these unfortunate young couples.

What I have just said is borne out by another excerpt taken from the pastoral letter I have just mentioned. I quote:

> During the last war especially, young girls, married women and even mothers were attracted by industrial or business occupations. They found there an opportunity to get their share of prosperity and thus forget the hard times of many years of unemployment. Even after the war, a great many of them have carried on their work, either because they were money-greedy, or because they found it necessary to supplement an all too meagre family income. The results have been a lowering of standards, as far as paternal authority, marital faithfulness, domestic harmony and stability of family principles are concerned; and yet those are the things which have safeguarded our people's integrity and which should always be considered as the basic factor of the prosperity and moral strength of every nation.

If there exists some means to enforce the laws, I am all for it. But within our reach, there is a much more efficient method; I refer to the education of children and young people. When children are very young, their parents assume the easy task of their education; but with the passing of years, they are often left to their own devices. Why should we not demand with some insistence that our educators drill into the minds of our young people the deep meaning and the importance of marriage and of the responsibilities it implies, that is to say to teach them what are the duties of married couples.

Mention has already been made in the house of those clubs which offer courses to those who wish to prepare themselves for matrimony. Those courses are intended for young men and young girls. Such a method of education should be popularized among our young people.

This week, in a church here in Ottawa, I learned that lectures would be given to those who are engaged, in order to teach them the Christian principles of marriage. We must teach these young men and these young women the true meaning of marriage. The calling of the married woman is such a noble one; she must be a good wife and a good mother. The married man plays just as noble a part, for it is he who must protect the family and earn its livelihood.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the way in which the divorce petitions from Quebec and Newfoundland are heard is unpleasant, it is repugnant to a great many people and there are some who assert that it is to be condemned. But that is no reason to replace it with another method which would produce still worse results.

The number of divorces is already too high in these two provinces; we should not contemplate a system which would only increase it.

Never shall Quebec accept the principle of divorce. The mover of the bill and his friends imagine that they have hit upon the right solution; they are convinced that this legislation can, in no wise, affect the religious beliefs or the rights of the provinces concerned.

But this is just where they are mistaken. At the present time, the exchequer court is not authorized to hear divorce cases from Quebec and Newfoundland, unless some bill like this one allows it to do so. If the bill were adopted by parliament and became part of our statutes, it would lay down a rule according to which, in Quebec and Newfoundland, marriages might be broken on grounds of adultery. It would thus imply a recognition of the principle of divorce and of the dissolution of marriage—a thing which no real Catholic could accept with a clear conscience.

Quebec's civil code stipulates that only death of one of the spouses may release the other from the promises exchanged during the marriage ceremony. This legislative text supersedes all other texts, including the British North America Act.

When the provinces affected wish to recognize divorce, they can take the necessary steps. I declare that our mission is not to impose upon them a measure which they do not want.

The majority of the population of Quebec is against divorce but there is a minority which wants to have access to divorce. The rights of that minority have not been encroached upon and it does not deem to have been discriminated against, for, since 1867, it has the right to petition parliament for a special act granting the right to a divorce.

I believe that this minority should not be deprived of this right; that is why I believe we must maintain the present procedure, however reprehensible it may be.

I am strongly opposed to the adoption of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

(Text):

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question? Could he say in what way the handling of divorce by the exchequer court would be any more offensive to the views of the people of Quebec, or any more offensive to the British North America Act, than is the handling of divorce session after session here in the House of Commons?

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Speaker, I shall say to the hon. member that by agreeing to the passage of this bill we would recognize divorce.

Mr. Knowles: You recognize divorce three hundred times every year.

Mr. Dumas: This procedure is permitted by the British North America Act. It has been recognized, and is the law, that wives and husbands can come to the other place and explain their case. A bill can then be sent here. Since 1867 this privilege has been extended to those who want a divorce. In the case of Quebec it is a privilege of the minority, and this procedure is the only way we can protect the rights of the minority.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate. In doing so I am sure of one thing, and that is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Cnetre (Mr. Knowles) has not a copy of my text, because I have none. I shall speak in French about this very important matter which concerns Quebec. I am opposed to this legislation, and the hon. member knows quite well why I am opposed to it.

(Translation):

First, as far as the principle of the bill is concerned, section 2 states as follows:

> The Exchequer Court of Canada hereinafter referred to as "the court" shall have jurisdiction to entertain an action for dissolution of marriage from a person domiciled in the province of Quebec . . .

We are opposed and always will be opposed to the dissolution of marriage, because it destroys the most essential element of our society, the family. Dissolution of marriage wrecks not only the home but the family, upon which rests the kind of society in which we live and wish to continue to live.

The family has been defined—and I know that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is a Christian, like the rest of us—as a society based upon natural law and formed according to a God-made pattern for the reproduction of the human race.

I do not have to demonstrate that divorce has become a plague in every country of the world. In contributing to the increase of divorce we are not rendering any service to society and the family.

Let us examine the figures given in the Canada Year Book for 1951. Before 1900, divorces in this country averaged approximately twenty a year. For instance in 1918, we see that there were 114 divorces in Canada, and 608 in 1926. We also see that in the province of Quebec, 177 divorces were granted in 1945; 290, in 1946; 348, in 1947; and 292, in 1948.

On the other hand, considering the number of divorces in provinces where divorce is granted by a court of justice, we find in Ontario 1,940 divorces, in 1945; 2,639, in 1946; 3,509, in 1947; and 3,107, in 1948.

We also find that divorces are granted by the thousands where special courts have been set up, while in the provinces where divorce is still under the jurisdiction of this parliament, the number is so much lower that it should open our eyes.

Therefore, to be logical, my learned friend would have to admit that the bill of which he is the sponsor would lead to an increase in divorce cases in the province of Quebec proportionate to the one recorded in the other provinces.

Now, since we are opposed in principle to the dissolution of marriage in the province of Quebec, we do not wish to make any step in a direction which would likely increase divorces in the province where we live; in fact, if we could even legislate in such a way as to restrain the number of divorces in the other provinces, I think we would render a service to the whole country in helping the Canadian family which has to be assisted, protected and defended by the governments of this country.

There is another reason why we must, we from Quebec, object to divorce under any disguise, before all courts of justice and even before this parliament. It is that in the province of Quebec, under our civil code, it is recognized that marriage is indissoluble. Therefore, if we adopted a federal legislative measure which would conflict with the provisions of our civil code, we would be treading upon very dangerous constitutional ground.

We know how much we had to fight to protect the autonomy of the provinces. We know that, in all our provinces, people wish for an ever-increasing autonomy.

We try to respect the autonomy of the provinces, and were we to pass the legislation introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we would have in the province of Quebec a constitutional conflict which would not make for Canadian unity nor for the good relations which should exist between the provinces and the central government of Canada.

If my learned friend could convince this parliament that his bill would bring about a decrease in the number of divorces, I am sure he would find in the province of Quebec supporters for the legislation he puts before this house year after year. But so far he has failed to say, let alone to prove, how such legislation could bring down the divorce rate in the province of Quebec.

On the contrary, every time our learned friend speaks to the house on this matter, we can hear, in the other provinces, some people asking that grounds for divorce be made more numerous and divorce easier. The legislation suggested by my learned friend is such as to give hope to those who entertain these ideas. It is more difficult to go before parliament than before a court of law.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote what the Right Hon. Prime Minister of this country (Mr. St. Laurent) said on this subject. I am quoting Hansard for June 20, 1950, page 3891:

> The matter to be dealt with consists of a fundamental declaration of the law and that is why the hon. member who introduced this bill took the precaution to declare that the exchequer court would have jurisdiction and would have the right to dissolve a marriage. That, however, would be legislating for the province of Quebec. It would be within the power of this parliament, but still it would be legislating on a matter which is extremely distasteful to the large majority of the people of that province.

To sum up my remarks I would say that on the question of principle I am opposed to this proposed legislative measure which is again being introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in order to facilitate the dissolution of marriage. As a citizen of the province of Quebec and in view of the laws under which we are governed in that province, I am opposed to this bill and I shall vote against it if it comes to a vote.

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the superb speeches delivered by the members for Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier), for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Dube) and for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert). They have made use in this house of arguments which, from my personal viewpoint, are irrefutable.

The member from Nicolet-Yamaska has established, with adequate proof, that the creation of a divorce court placed under the jurisdiction of the exchequer court would bring about an increase in the number of divorces in the province of Quebec; my colleague has based his thesis on statistical data, referring to the number of divorces granted in other Canadian provinces which have their own divorce court. If you care to study this data for a while, you will see that the divorce petitions from the province of Quebec, which are directly addressed to parliament, are those of immigrants who have just entered Canada and are imbued with ideas prevailing in certain parts of Europe. Only very occasionally is it possible to find among the divorce petitions from Quebec a few submitted by people who have long been residents of the province. Most of the petitions are signed by newcomers who are not familiar yet with the traditions of our old province, and who do not know about the things which have built up the strength of our ethnical group.

When New France was ceded to England, there were approximately sixty thousand French-speaking Canadians. There are now more than four million of them. This increase has been made possible by the respect we have held for our family and our religious traditions. These traditions of ours are dear to us because they are based on common sense and on the undeniable fact that a nation reaches its fullest maturity only if it shows respect for the fundamental cell of any society or any country, that is, the family, as one of my colleagues was saying a few moments ago.

An examination of the explanatory notes printed alongside the text of the bill the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has introduced shows that—

It merely transfers the hearing of divorce petitions, in the case of persons residing in these two provinces, from parliament to the Exchequer Court of Canada and it provides further that the said court shall hear such divorce cases only at Ottawa.

This is childish! It is well known that Ottawa is not far from Montreal, nor is it far from Quebec city. The adoption of such a bill would mean in principle the establishment of a divorce court for the province of Quebec on the border of that province.

I note that it is six o'clock and I end my remarks satisfied that I have prevented the passage of the bill.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume at eight o'clock the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DEFENCE EXPENDITURE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the appointment of a committee to examine defence expenditures and commitments, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Claxton, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Speaker, before the debate adjourned at five o'clock for the house to consider private bills I was discussing the adequacy of our aircraft production, in view of the very special job which we as Canadians had elected to do, and I was endeavouring to point out the problem of producing fighter and interceptor aircraft which would be effective against modern bombers.

My point, and I wish to repeat it, is that I believe these matters, technical though they may be, involved though they may be, difficult of solution though they may be, are subjects with which this parliament, and particularly the defence committee, should deal. I think it was a defect of the set-up of the committee last year and, particularly in view of the amendment moved by the Minister of National Defence, more so this year, that the defence committee will be dealing with matters of expenditures, and more particularly with the misappropriation of sums of money. I am of the opinion that the job of a defence committee is to see to it that the defences of this country are adequate. We represent the people of Canada; we in this parliament have a responsibility which we cannot delegate to experts or others. While under the British system of government and opposition the executive must take responsibility for the decisions made, nevertheless those decisions and the reasons for them are a subject on which we, and particularly the committee, must share responsibility and must be informed.

In the United Kingdom there is a device by which a technical member of the armed services reports not only to the committee but directly to the cabinet on matters of a technical and operational nature which the British government has discovered is too much for the minister who has the political responsibility in the house to deal with. These questions which I am bringing up tonight are technical questions which should be dealt with on the technical level. It is unfair and unwise to expect the minister to have all the answers to all these questions.

We now come to the question of whether members of the defence services should speak, where they should speak and how they should speak. I believe that under our system, flexible as it is, there is a place for the technical members of the defence services to speak on these problems, and that is in the committee. It is for that reason that I have raised the question of the effectiveness of our air protection.

To deal with it in detail, these are the sort of questions which are asked me and for which I have no answer. My constituents feel that there should be some answers to them. With regard to the Avro I was asked: How seriously has the production lag of the CF-100 affected R.C.A.F. training, and have our NATO squadrons been equipped with them? Much has been said about our NATO squadrons. The CF-100 is a particularly useful aircraft for that sort of service. Another question is this: Why have so many Canadian engineers and technicians left Avro, men such as Edward Aitkin, who was the designer of the CF-100 and the jet liner; Paul Dilworth and Winnett Boyd, designers of the Orenda engine; Richard Fairthorne, who was the industrial relations manager; John Berry, who was the director of manufacturing, and Elwood Butler, who was the treasurer. These men have all left this company which, if not our major producer, is at least our second largest aircraft producer in Canada.

Why has that happened? Why have these head men left, these technical men who helped to design and bring into early production one excellent engine, an extremely useful medium range commercial jet aircraft, and a very good long distance interceptor? Nearly all the original staff have left. My friends and those with whom I talk question me as to what is wrong with this concern. I have heard—and this is general talk—that there is considerable resentment, that the Canadian personnel are being supplanted by United States and United Kingdom personnel when the Canadian personnel did the pioneering and brought the three types of aircraft into production the whole way from the drawing board. I think the defence committee is entitled to an answer to the problem of Avro Canada. I am a booster of Avro Canada. We have produced three first-class pieces of equipment, the jet liner, the CF-100 and the Orenda engine. Yet what is the production? Why was the jet liner production stopped? There must be an answer. It is not a matter of wrongdoing; it is a matter of national interest. Probably hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money have been put into this concern. What are we going to do about it? If we are to have a committee to look into defence expenditures, then surely this would be one of the first things we should inquire into.

This becomes especially true when right next door is de Havilland, where three types of aircraft have been designed. These are all Canadian types, and are known as the Chipmunk, the Beaver and the Otter. When I visited that plant the 421st Beaver was on the production line, being prepared for the United States air force. It is the only Canadian firm producing a Canadian-built aircraft for the United States air force. It is a firm that has sent aircraft to forty different countries; bear in mind that I am referring to de Havilland of Canada, not the parent company.

It has sent its product to forty different countries and eleven different air forces. Yet not one of those aircraft has been ordered by the Royal Canadian Air Force. What is the reason for this? The United States air force has paid the de Havilland company the compliment of stating that it is the only aircraft producer in North America that is up to date and on schedule in its deliveries.

Here is a Canadian company with Canadian personnel, using Canadian designs, Canadian engines, Canadian materials and Canadian workmen, and situated right next door to Avro, or at least comparatively near. Why on one side of the town line do we have this very successful aircraft company and, on the other side, an aircraft company which is constantly running into difficulty? Is it because of government interference?

These are matters which the defence committee should discuss. Let us consider Canadair, which is a subsidiary of the Electric Boat Company, now known as General Dynamics Corporation. Canadair is a very successful aircraft producer. Admittedly the company is producing aircraft of United States design with United States engines, and has open to it the advantage of a pipe line of United States machinery and instruments. For this reason it does not run into many of the difficulties confronting Avro. Nevertheless it is producing as was announced in the press at a rate of approximately 40 per month. Under the circumstances that is an excellent record.

It is also producing the T-33 trainer, which is a jet aircraft. Canadair is a private company. As a matter of fact when it became a private Canadian company I availed myself of the privilege of buying a few shares of its stock. Let me say that, even as a small shareholder in the company, I get infinitely more information about it than I do as a member of parliament or of the defence committee. I pay taxes and my constituents pay taxes to support this great company and pay for the production from it. Yet I, as a member of the defence committee, do not get as much information about details of production and the problems connected therewith as I do in the role of shareholder in the company.

Surely that is wrong, Mr. Speaker. This is one of the things the defence committee should consider, and one of the blind spots in our whole defence mechanism. There is no wrongdoing here, nothing like that. It is simply a matter of giving proper information, and having proper discussion of the problems with the people's representatives. We are supposed to answer to our constituents. We are not supposed to return to our homes and say that we are satisfied with what we are told across the floor of the house by a minister and his deputy, who cannot possibly have all the details of the problem.

I earnestly hope that when the committee is set up the terms of reference will be broadened so we will know not only that the money being expended is adequately and properly expended, but that it results in fighting material which will be useful and effective. If we do not do that we are not only negligent in our duty, but it may almost be said that we are traitors to our cause.

For that reason I protest against the amendment by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), which would confine the discussion in the committee to a matter which although serious has already been reported upon. Why not let the committee proceed immediately to a discussion of the real defence problems of Canada? Remember this, that last year Russia produced 22,000 aircraft and 63,000 aircraft engines. They were good aircraft, and good aircraft engines. We are not playing this game for marbles; we are playing it in deadly earnest. And if we do not produce an effective fighting machine we might as well wash the whole thing out, and surrender now.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on December 15, and for a day or two following, we in this chamber had a somewhat unusual experience. For the moment—no, not for the moment; for two or three days—that spirit which we see across the gangway, and with which we are so familiar; that spirit which has been described in an old phrase becoming somewhat abused and a little hackneyed but still, I think, very descriptive, "that tranquil consciousness of effortless superiority" to which the government treats us so frequently—that, for the moment, was absent.

There was a considerable amount of hurrying to and fro. In plain words the Currie report had been a bit of a bombshell. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his opening remarks took it very seriously. He did not pretend that he was not unhappy, and he spoke of it in terms which I think were calculated to make us all feel that it would be taken very seriously. Speaking of the report he said, as reported on page 640 of Hansard:

> In cases where action has not already been taken along the lines of such recommendations, the government and the department are acting with dispatch, and will give most urgent consideration to these recommendations.

So far that was good. I think we were entitled to believe that this was going to be taken seriously, but that did not last very long. It was not very long before the old self-satisfaction and what I can call only arrogance and disregard of the usually accepted rights of parliament were back and in full play. As a matter of fact, on the 15th itself that attitude was brought back from a rather unexpected quarter, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who is usually a man one can do business with and talk to in a reasonable manner. The Minister of Finance stepped out of his usual quality and put closure on us. I shall explain in a minute what I mean by closure. I think in fact that it was closure.

We had been debating the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member had spoken, and then the minister spoke in what I thought was a most reasonable manner. However, he gave no indication of what was to follow, and then at the end of his speech he said that he thought there was not any need of discussing this any further at the moment, and moved that the debate be adjourned. I managed, perhaps with a little forbearance on your part, Mr. Speaker, to ask him if he really did want to apply closure. But apparently he did; therefore that was—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member state how he connects what he is referring to now with the motion before the house?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am just giving this as an illustration of the return of government arrogance to which I was referring. I was just giving this as a means of laying a foundation.

An hon. Member: It may be in the sand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That remains to be seen. I was saying that when you suffer an indignity or deprivation of your rights it does not really help you very much if it is done in a nice way. I remember reading an essay on murder in which the writer stated that he once knew a bulldog that murdered a brother bulldog "with pleasing circumstances of good taste." Nevertheless the bulldog was murdered. Our right to have that debate was murdered by the genial Minister of Finance.

That was on Monday night. As I say, after that there was a return of the old arrogance, and by Wednesday night it was back in full play. On Wednesday night we had a speech by the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) who took the line that this report did not cut much ice at all. He was in a pleasant mood and he philosophized. He said, among other things, "the fallibility of human nature is not confined to any particular class of people or any particular area."

I was surprised a minister of the government would admit that fallibility could be on both sides of the gangway, but at any rate he did say that, and then he went on to say that this was a relatively small matter. If by saying it was a relatively small matter he meant that these irregularities had been discovered in a small area of the operations of the Department of National Defence and that there was every reason to believe they had spread throughout the whole area; if he meant that it was a relatively unimportant matter by reason of the fact that we would find vast numbers of other irregularities, then I would be ready to agree with him. But I do not think that was what was in his mind. I think he was just trying to pooh-pooh the Currie report and suggest that really it was the naughty opposition that was making a fuss about nothing.

I think it has been said more than once on the opposite side that there was to be no scapegoat, but I think every attempt has been made to turn the opposition into a scapegoat. As has been said in this house in the last few days, when security is mentioned it is not the security of the nation but the security of the government. Therefore we must realize that there is a very genuine feeling in government circles—we must recognize it and face it—that when anyone tries to seriously criticize the government, to suggest that anything is wrong, it amounts almost to treason and that the people who do it are misguided and perverse.

Our good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had something to say on this. He has been around a bit. He got down to Kingston where he spoke to his political buddies and said that really this report did not amount to so much, it was just a lot of lurid language. I think that was the phrase he used. He said it was simply blowing up and magnifying things that did not amount to very much.

That was on December 17. But by this time the press had begun to have something to say about it, even the friendly press, what some people might call the tied press, although I would not use that word myself. They began to show signs of discomfort. The Winnipeg Free Press, which always makes a valiant attempt to find whatever good can be found in this government, said things which indicated that they had a real feeling of discomfort. They said:

> Certain points in the Currie report raise such grave issues of public policy that immediate comment cannot be delayed.

And again in the same editorial:

> Neither excuses nor delays will suffice. The public will expect and must receive immediate and drastic remedial action.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

It is not surprising that people were uneasy because after all the seed of the Currie report fell on fertile ground. There is not a single member of this house, there is really not a single person who goes about the country who has not heard story after story of serious extravagance in defence expenditures. One hardly knows what to believe and what not to believe. You know that a great deal of it must not be believed; yet when serious statements are made, such as were made in this house by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) with regard to the air station in Alberta, and when the suggestions that he made have never been answered so far as I know, a situation arises in which it is almost impossible to know what not to believe. In other words, without much stretching of your imagination you are ready to believe almost anything.

As I said a moment ago, these mistakes, this chaos, this disorganization were widespread. The grave words which Mr. Currie used at the very outset of his report were such as to make even the most thoughtless stop and think. I should like to read briefly from the report as set out on page 712 of Hansard as follows:

> The conclusion I have come to is that, while there has been a general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting, it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities over a prolonged period of time took place.

A breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting! Now we come to the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). Before he spoke he had the benefit of knowing what had been the reception of the report throughout the country. He had seen the fertile wit of the cartoonists in full play. He had read the strong statements in the press. As a result, the Minister of National Defence did not attempt to brush off this report. He suggested there were certain errors in it. He did it in a rather nice way. Although there was a rather considerable amount of what I can only call smearing of the report, nevertheless he made it clear that he had not taken it lightly and that he had already adopted a good many of the proposals and was going to adopt more.

His excuse in effect was a very simple one. The minister said that when there suddenly had come upon them the pressure caused by the war in Korea and so on, they found a great accretion of work and that they really had a choice between getting the physical work done—the buildings built and so on—and the carrying out of this construction with ordinary business prudence and ordinary business methods. He said in effect they were not able to do both.

It is only fair to say, and I wish the minister were here to hear me say it, that the minister had previously—notably in September of 1950, I think—given us a most glowing account of the work of the department. It was like a department made in heaven. There did not seem to be any defect of any kind that could approach it. Nevertheless the minister did say in this house last Tuesday quite frankly that certain things had had to be neglected. I do not suppose that the minister found it pleasant to say that. It was making a certain concession which the minister has not been very good at making. I say that it is very much as if the chief executive of a company had been given a job to do, had been authorized to go and make certain expenditures and so on, and had come back at the end of the time and said: I have made these expenditures. The building is built, but I cannot tell you how much it cost because we could not follow ordinary business procedure. I do not know how much it cost; I do not know how much material was wasted, and I cannot tell you anything about it except that we did get the building built. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if in civilian or business life the chief executive came back and made such a statement to his directors—well, let us say that he would be in some difficulty; leave it at that.

The Montreal Star had something to say about this, and the Montreal Star is not exactly unfriendly to this government. It made what I would call a valiant attempt to come to the minister's assistance. It praised his speech and said it had lifted the subject onto a higher plane. Nevertheless it seemed to admit and did admit indeed that there were very serious questions that needed looking into. It said this:

> It is Mr. Currie's belief that this failure to keep accounts properly opened the way to waste and inefficiency which might be far more costly than anything actually stolen by a handful of crooks. This is the point on which the opposition can most usefully direct its fire and a debate on that level should be welcomed by all sides.

I hope to confine myself to that, Mr. Speaker, except that I wish to point out that in Mr. Currie's report there is a suggestion that the task to be done goes far beyond anything that the Montreal Star seems to have thought of, far beyond what the minister seems to have thought of, which puts this problem in its position as a tremendous problem which needs all the energy, knowledge and ability that we can put into it.

First of all it needs a full investigation of the facts so that we know where we start. That, incidentally, is one of the things which we on this side of the house have been asking for, and I find it utterly impossible to understand why it should be denied.

Coming to the set-up of the committee, the first thing I shall refer to is the fact that the committee is going to be asked to operate without the assistance of the man who has already made this inquiry and who apparently is going to be stopped from going any farther. I want to read what Mr. Currie said about the broad over-all problem which we face. It states the problem in language so clear that no one can possibly misunderstand it. I just want to point out that I think the idea is getting more and more abroad that this problem is far more than the problem Mr. Currie covered. It is hard, as I shall point out, to assess that problem in terms of money because Mr. Currie told us that he found it impossible to find out how much money had been spent. I read now the part of the report which I think sets out the real problem, and it is a problem of magnitude and importance that is hard to exaggerate:

> What is needed now is the creation of a system—

Mark the words "the creation of a system"—not the remedying or alteration or modification, but "the creation of a system".

> —designed to fit the economic and efficient administration of a large and long-sustained preparedness program inside a national economy operating at full blast.

I doubt that words can make that clearer. I doubt if it is possible to make it clearer that it is a tremendous problem. We on this side of the house have always contended that it was a tremendous problem and that those who sit on the other side have never understood that problem. I think we have clear-cut evidence now that they never did. I will go on:

> This involves the abandonment, by all administrators of the program, of the war psychology with its emphasis on speed with resultant wastefulness and extravagance, and the substitution of an alert, economic and efficient operation, flexibly designed, to be sure to meet emergencies, but designed also to become a more or less permanent part of Canadian life and government.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this goes far beyond the task given to Mr. Currie at Petawawa, but it is presented by him as a result of his experience and with his knowledge of the need that we have today. Now, if there is any doubt whatever as to the gaps in our organization, as to the want of organization, let me turn for a moment to the report of the Auditor General. In section 56 of his report under the heading "Service Forces Accounting" he says:

> Stores. Surveys made of accounting systems—there are at least eight—

And I repeat, Mr. Speaker,

—there are at least eight—indicate that no sustained effort has been made to achieve uniformity in systems within the services. The result is that mandatory directives are specialized, particularly with respect to the army.

I asked the Auditor General to inform me further about these eight systems. I understand that the navy has one and the air force has one. They were much later in creation, of course, and their system is more modern; but there are six in the army. I asked the Auditor General what the phrase "mandatory directives" meant. I will repeat his statement:

The result is that mandatory directives are specialized—

He explained to me that it refers to printed instructions. Remember that there are six different systems, Mr. Speaker. There are huge books of instruction, and I could hardly believe my ears when he told me that they ran into literally thousands of pages.

One of the difficulties is that a man trained under one of those six systems does not become readily transferable to another. He will find himself not at home there. I point out that I think the Auditor General, in his own way, is underlining what Mr. Currie has told us about this need for the creation of a system.

I want to read a word from the Winnipeg Free Press of January 3, because it grapples fairly firmly with the question of economy in military expenditures and I think it is worth repeating what they say. Economy is very much in the minds of the people to the south of the line and very much in the mind of the Winnipeg Free Press. I always read the Winnipeg Free Press with the feeling that it won't be unduly unfair to the government. The Free Press says:

Recently in these columns it was pointed out that the most promising field for economy at Ottawa was the $2,100,000,000 voted for defence. It was noted with regret that members of the government from Mr. St. Laurent down all set aside this item of $2,100 million as untouchable . . . This attitude, of course, is unrealistic . . . General Eisenhower, in promising large scale economies in federal expenditures, relied almost entirely upon the savings which he knew could be made in the United States defence expenditures. On this score, General Eisenhower must be considered to know what he is talking about. Not only does he propose to cut billions of dollars out of the United States defence appropriations, but he has repeatedly declared that this can be done without reducing the defence force by a single front line soldier or effective weapon.

The extract I am quoting winds up by saying:

Hitherto the St. Laurent government has taken a discouraging and non-cooperative attitude with respect to economy.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to remind the house that the Currie report indicated a general breakdown in the system of administration, and that correcting the irregularities is only part of the job of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the government. I have drawn their attention to the broad comprehensive statement of the task as indicated by Mr. Currie in the extract I read about the creation of a system. At the present time the members of this house have no means of judging the facts, and for this reason we in this party moved a subamendment designed to have Mr. Currie continue and broaden his work. This subamendment was ruled out of order, but the C.C.F. have now moved a subamendment which is in order. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) says he will vote against it. I know it is unparliamentary to suggest that you can predict how members of the Liberal party are going to vote, but on the face of it I shall be greatly surprised if there are any defaulters, except possibly the genial member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) who seems to flit about at times from one party to the other.

What I want to know is, why is the government against this amendment? Is it conceivable that they would vote against it if they thought a further report by Mr. Currie would reveal a good state of affairs? I suggest that it is not conceivable. If they felt confident a further report by Mr. Currie would reveal a good state of affairs I believe they would have no objection whatever. The only reason they are against it is that they fear there will be further unpleasant revelations. Now, if I am justified in saying that—and I certainly say it with the fullest conviction—and if this government refuses to allow a further investigation, I believe the government has forfeited the right to be respected by the people of this country. Remember, we are not talking about small things, we are talking about big things.

I thought the reason the Prime Minister gave for voting against this subamendment was trivial. I was surprised that a man of the Prime Minister's standing would give such a reason. What he said was that he felt the committee should be left to its own good judgment after they have had an opportunity of hearing the witnesses, including Mr. Currie himself.

Well, Mr. Speaker, was the committee left to its own good judgment with regard to consideration of the Currie report, or is there an amendment now before this house virtually giving a directive to the committee? Does anyone suggest that if this subamendment is voted down the committee, in its own good judgment, will extend the investigation by Mr. Currie? No one will seriously suggest that.

Let us look for a moment at the reasonableness of this request. As I said a moment ago, it is difficult to determine the amount of money involved in the area dealt with by Mr. Currie. I believe it would probably be well up to the mark if I suggested the amount involved might be $20 million or $25 million. If anyone with knowledge wishes to correct me I shall be happy to be corrected. I am just pointing out that if it is $20 million, then it is one-hundredth, and if it is $25 million it is one-eightieth of the total of $2 billion. I am suggesting that it does not make sense, having got a report on this one-hundredth or one-eightieth or one-fiftieth or one-twentieth, for the government now to say that we will not have this investigation extended. I believe there is only one interpretation the people of this country will place upon that. The people of this country will resent it just as much as I resent it.

We listened to an interesting speech by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) that indicated a fair attitude with regard to the committee. I want to say this, without at the moment contradicting anything the member for Skeena said but reserving all rights, of course: that it is pure self-deception to suggest that a committee holding occasional meetings can get to the bottom of these matters. Let me read a little extract from what Mr. Currie said just to show you the job he had, and then ask yourselves whether a committee which will meet twice a week, and the members of which have a dozen other things to do, could do anything but scratch the surface, particularly when they lack the benefit of the expert assistance we wish to have.

Let me read what Mr. Currie said about his difficulty and then picture the committee, even assuming all the members of the committee were single-minded and wholehearted in their desire to find the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Assume that, and then listen to this from Mr. Currie:

> It was apparent from the beginning of the investigation that the accounting methods were in a chaotic condition.

Later he says:

> It is impractical and perhaps impossible, regardless of the time which might be spent examining records, to try and determine by this means the amount and value of the deficiencies—
>
> This conclusion is based upon the results of a single determined effort to ascertain by accounting methods the extent of the shortage existing in the case of a single item of stores. Cement was chosen as a test case, largely because the number of suppliers of that commodity were few in number and easy to find. Six weeks were spent in the effort—

Committee on Defence Expenditure

> The over-all shortage appeared to be some 18,000 bags, much of which may have gone into unauthorized projects of one kind or another. It was impossible to ascertain exactly what had happened.

We have an area, Mr. Speaker, say twenty or fifty or a hundred times as large as the area Mr. Currie worked in, and it is seriously suggested we are going to be able to really do an effective job on, let us say, $1,900 million when Mr. Currie took weeks and months in a smaller area.

I have long ceased to hope that anything I or anyone else in the opposition can say will make a dent in the government mind. Even in the few years I have been in this house I think the situation has changed. I think each year that goes by that tolerant, and sometimes not so tolerant, feeling regarding the opposition grows—"Oh, after all we are just a lot of boys doing our best". The idea that we could ever, by any stretch of the imagination, take the place of the people across the way seems to them beyond the realm of practical thought.

We are used to that attitude, Mr. Speaker. I suppose we have to take it as we find it. I am sure that when one cannot question the independence of government members one certainly cannot question their sanity, but there is an old adage which one could quote which runs this way:

> Whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad.

I suppose that arrogance, in a way, is a form of madness—one of the lesser forms—but I never think it is any less dangerous because it is exhibited by people whom, in our day to day relations, we like. In fact I think it is much more dangerous when it is exhibited by people of this nature than it is when exhibited by people whom we dislike; because if they were people who were utterly impossible in every way, not just in this way and a few others, as I say, they would be much easier to deal with.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have now spoken as long as I should. One of the great difficulties of this business we are in is, of course, that most of the articulate people in this country, most of the people you hear much from and about, are inclined to be yes-men. Over the years I have been terribly depressed to find out how often that is true. You know what I mean, Mr. Speaker. Everybody knows what I mean. I refer to the number of people whom you meet who say, "Yes, yes; that is true. Yes, they have been there too long; I hope you turn them out, but of course I do business with the government. You must not quote anything I say."

Happily, however, there are in this country a great many people who are not widely known. What they say does not come to the ears of the government. They do not make money out of the government, and they can still think their own thoughts. I have a feeling that they may have some thoughts about this report. I have the feeling that if the thing is stifled here and now—however pleasantly it is done—a great many people up and down the country will not like it. I think they will say, "Couldn't take it, eh?" I do not think they will like the hush-hush and cover-up, and that is what we face here so far as we can see. There has been nothing to indicate that that is not the line to be taken.

All I can say is this. We know, Mr. Speaker, that the government have all had halos made for them. The less important ministers have little halos, the more important ministers have bigger halos and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has a great, resplendent halo. We know how those are made. We know the publicity methods. We admire the skill of those publicity methods, Mr. Speaker, and sometimes I suppose we wish we were as good at them ourselves. But they are there; they are built up; they are swollen up. You can see them puffing themselves up now. They say, "This poor fellow will never get anywhere; he is only a member of the opposition." But, Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling about these people who are not much seen, and whom nobody knows much about—they will have a vote, and I think they will rub some of the tinsel off those halos unless something is done to investigate this thing properly.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part to some extent in this debate on the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that a select committee be appointed to examine national defence expenditure. That resolution was on the order paper for some time prior to the Christmas recess. Two or three days prior to our rising for the Christmas recess the much anticipated Currie report was tabled in this house; that was done on December 15. As I said, this motion of the Prime Minister had been on the order paper before the recess; and when it was proposed the other day, the Prime Minister presented the motion without elaborating upon it himself. However, the Minister of National Defence, who had been away in Europe on government business when the report was tabled, made an extremely lengthy speech and wound up by moving an amendment to this government resolution giving to this proposed committee a directive that they should investigate Mr. Currie and his report.

In this motion it is pointed out that the committee shall consist of some 26 members. A similar committee last year consisted of that number of members, 17 of them being supporters of the government; that is roughly a majority of two to one. It was the desire and the wish of this party, because of conditions prevailing throughout the defence department as a whole and throughout various parts of this country, that Mr. Currie might be given the job of investigating the entire Department of National Defence and its ramifications. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), when speaking on this motion and the amendment, moved an amendment to the amendment which would have brought about this result. However, it was ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker. Since then we have had another amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which asks that Mr. Currie should continue the investigation into the entire Department of National Defence.

I think we should remember that Mr. Currie's instructions, to begin with, were to survey a small portion of the Department of National Defence, namely one branch known as the works branch. When the Prime Minister spoke the other day, following the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he was rather angry and wound up his remarks by stating that he certainly would vote against this amendment. I think it would be safe to guess that he will be followed by most of the government supporters in this house. That means the government are opposed to a proper and thorough investigation of the Department of National Defence and the conditions that now prevail in this country.

As to the report, I think it has justified the request made by the leader of this party and other members during the past three years. They have pointed out the difficulties in the organization and administration of this department and the many shortcomings therein, and in the past by resolution have asked that a committee of this house should be set up dealing with the Department of National Defence in general, its organization, administration and other matters; and on every occasion this committee has been refused by the Minister of National Defence speaking on behalf of the government. I think the leader of this party has been justified in this report.

To deal with the report itself, which is contained in the appendix to Hansard of December 15, on the first page in part I Mr. Currie points out as follows:

> The conclusion I have come to is that, while there has been a general breakdown in the system of administration, supervision and accounting, it was only at Petawawa that extensive irregularities over a prolonged period of time took place.

Then over in the next column he states:

Before reciting the irregularities and their circumstances uncovered by the R.C.M.P.—with the assistance later of the provincial police and the army provost corps—it must be said that internal warnings had not been lacking in the Department of National Defence. The chief auditor of the department had performed his functions conscientiously. Time and again he had reported unsatisfactory conditions. This is clear from appendix "B" which summarizes his findings over a period of years.

He then goes on to point out that situation. He says:

The deputy minister in each case had directed the quartermaster general to investigate and report. Lack of adequate action at this point had, however, caused a progressive deterioration in the situation. Aside from reports being delayed for considerable periods of time, the record shows the next audit revealing conditions similar to those previously reported and, in some cases, worse. The process is then again repeated.

In the next column on page 713 he goes on to point out that—

A dam was built on Tucker creek at a cost estimated at some $3,000 or $4,000. Its utility is not clear to me, and it was, in any event, not authorized by army headquarters.

In certain cases, persons buying army material were asked not to make cheques in payment (in whole or in part) to the receiver general but to individual army personnel. The amounts thus paid did not reach the public treasury.

On page 714 he deals with the attempts to estimate losses. He says:

These, then, represent the ascertained cases of irregularity at Petawawa. How many more there may have been will never be known. It was apparent from the beginning of the investigation that the accounting records were in a chaotic condition and would be of little use in determining the nature and extent of irregularities. It is impractical, and perhaps impossible, regardless of the time which might be spent on examining records, to try and determine by this means the amount and value of the deficiencies.

In his next column on the same page he states:

The over-all shortage appeared to be some 18,000 bags.

He is dealing with cement. It has been pointed out that he picked this item out of some 5,000 items and carried on an investigation which took some six weeks, which disclosed a shortage of 18,000 bags, roughly eighteen cars, or a trainload of cement, that had disappeared from the Petawawa camp alone. He says:

It was impossible to ascertain exactly what had happened.

Then he goes on to state:

No reliable estimate of the total loss can be prepared.

In the next paragraph he deals with the breakdown of the accounting system. He said:

The fault did not lie in the accounting system, which was a good one had it been operated properly. It was a new system, based on American and British as well as Canadian experience, and embodied features which, theoretically, would have quickly checked irregularities as they appeared.

On page 715 he deals with the failure in security and says:

There was in addition a serious collapse in security. There was little to prevent or to detect the organized plundering of military stores on a systematic scale, though apparently comparatively little of it took place. If there is excuse for inefficient accounting, there is none for the failure of security which is, after all, a prime military consideration. I take a serious view of this breakdown. If it is easy to pilfer military stores, then, by the same token, it is easy to sabotage military equipment. My recommendations in this respect are fully outlined later.

There are many more pages in the report. When the report was tabled in the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) he also tabled a report from the chief of the general staff, General Simonds, which in itself was proof that General Simonds had had access to this report before the members of this house and before it was tabled in the house. I am one of those who believe that was quite improper. There is a difference of opinion right now as to whether the members of the armed services should be ordered to keep quiet about this matter, as they have been. Apparently at this particular time the chief of the general staff issued an order to the members of the army that they must not discuss this report, or matters pertaining to it. I think that is rather unfair. If the members of the armed services are to be so dumb, are not to be allowed to speak on these matters, then I think the chief of the general staff is exceeding his authority by playing politics in the way he is now accused of doing.

In this respect a rather interesting editorial appeared in the Gazette of January 14 under the title: "This appears somewhat irregular". It deals with the manner in which the chief of the general staff issued his orders to those serving under his direction. It states:

When the Currie report was tabled in the House of Commons a most extraordinary thing happened. Also presented was a bitter attack upon the report, or parts of it, written by the chief of the general staff. If any attack was considered called for, it ought to have come from a member of the cabinet, preferably from the minister concerned with defence. It is no part of the duties of the chief of the general staff to enter into controversy with those he may conceive to be his critics.

This is a lengthy article, which goes on to point out how improper this matter is. It states:

If he feels that there are grounds to resent or refute any charges that have been made, it is his duty to present the matter to the member of the cabinet under whom he serves. And it becomes the duty of the member of the cabinet to bring his case to the attention of the house, if he considers it sound. But it is not for General Simonds, or any other military officer, under our form of constitutional usage, to engage in controversy with any critic.

And more especially the elected critics of this house. The editorial goes on:

Quite possibly in all this there is only fumbling, and a failure to recognize clearly what is happening. But if matters are permitted to proceed in this manner, the government cannot escape the charge that it is either permitting the chief of the general staff to play politics, or it is playing politics with the chief of the general staff.

That is a situation which should not prevail in connection with a matter such as this. If there was any doubt cast upon the efficiency of the Department of National Defence in the general findings of the Currie report, then I think the facts are pretty well borne out by the public accounts of Canada and the Auditor General's report for the year 1952 which was tabled in the house the other day. The first item on page 24 of the Auditor General's report was referred to by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) who just took his seat. It deals with service forces accounting. Section 56 on page 24 states:

Stores. Surveys made of accounting systems—there are at least eight—indicate that no sustained effort has been made to achieve uniformity in systems within the services. The result is that mandatory directives are specialized, particularly with respect to the army. Various other special problems also exist, in particular:

The hon. member for Greenwood pointed out these eight different systems. I think he said there was one for the navy, one for the air force and six for the army. The section goes on:

(a) No clear distinction has been drawn between stores procured for stockpiling or the equivalent, and those for normal peacetime needs;

(b) Long-term usage is to regard stores as service property with responsibility for accounting and custody vested in various components of the service forces. The consequence is that no civilian authority answerable to parliament exercises direct control after procurement;

(c) Each service accounting system has forms for similar purposes but the forms, generally, are not standardized throughout the services;

He deals at considerable length with this matter of accounting in the services. Then in section 62 on page 25 he says:

On February 11, 1952, the state of the army pay accounts was drawn to the notice of the department as it was felt corrective action should immediately be taken. The department has acted, but the basic problem remains—that of adjusting an accounting system, designed after the recent war for a permanent force smaller than it now is, to a widely scattered and relatively large number of accounts.

Then in section 63, page 26, he points out that another case was in connection with the assignment of pay to the wife of a soldier. It was put into effect; but after some $508 was paid it was ascertained that (a) the soldier had not signed the form, (b) he was not married and (c) $508 had not been deducted from his pay.

Then in section 65, on the same page, we find this:

A presumption would be that a serviceman on becoming a civil servant is not eligible to receive two pay cheques for his services. However, in the audit five cases were noted where officers continued to receive service pay after they became civil employees of the Department of National Defence. One case will be used to illustrate. A brigadier was posted at Ottawa and during 1951 was in status of seconded to civil duties under the deputy minister of the department. Order in council P.C. 44/5733 of October 27, 1951, founded on a recommendation of the civil service commission, created an $11,500 civil position and authorized appointment of the brigadier without a public competition being held to fill the position. From January 1, he has received civil pay at the $11,500 annual rate. From January 1 to March 31 he was also paid the pay and allowances for his rank, he being treated for service purposes as on service special termination leave. As a result, in the three months period he received $2,790 from the army and $2,875 as a civil servant.

An order in council of the government permitted this condition. Other irregularities are listed in this Auditor General's report. That, in itself, is a far greater indictment than the Currie report. Hon. members will realize, of course, that the Auditor General is responsible to parliament, rather than the government. Had he not been directly responsible to parliament I presume the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), or someone on behalf of the government, might have urged him to change his report and recommendations as, admittedly, the Minister of National Defence hoped to have Mr. Currie do in his report to the house.

Mr. Hosking: He did not say that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He said he had discussed it with Mr. Currie, and that Mr. Currie thought he should report direct.

Mr. Hosking: What page is that on?

Mr. Ross (Souris): In the minister's speech the other day. If the hon. member will look up that speech he will see where he mentioned this matter, and that it was the wish of Mr. Currie that he should not adjust these paragraphs in his recommendations.

Mr. Hosking: I do not want the hon. member to make any mistakes.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There is credit coming to Mr. Currie for having wanted to make an independent report. Yet by some manner of means some changes were made in his recommendations.

When he was appointed to investigate the works services branch his very fine qualifications were pointed out by the minister. It was said that he had a fine reputation, that his company was a good one, and that he had had valuable experience in the Department of National Defence. Indeed, I think it was agreed throughout the country that he was an outstanding individual. Certainly he has all those qualifications which would enable him to make a further investigation throughout the whole department, in its various branches. If such an investigation were carried out I am sure other shortcomings and instances of inefficiency in the department would be shown.

On November 26, as reported at page 105 of Hansard, a speech was delivered in the house by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), in which he set forth what, in his opinion, were many irregularities at the Penhold camp. He asked quite pointedly at that time for an investigation into that whole situation. Since then he has received no answer from any responsible member of the government. It is strange indeed that someone has not made a statement in the house on this matter.

We hear of many other such cases at different points throughout the country. I think the taxpayers of this country, many of whom have difficulty, on ordinary salaries, making provision for their families, in view of the present inflation, should be given an explanation. The taxpayer's dollar is now worth slightly less than 50 cents. Tax deductions make it difficult for him to provide for himself and his family; still he must listen to these reports concerning gross extravagance, waste and inefficiency in this important department of government.

Certainly this condition displeases many people throughout the country. On that point, and directing attention to the degree of dissatisfaction with the government's attitude on this report, let me say that in the mail this morning I received a letter from a friend of mine who, in the past, has been a supporter of this government, and who states:

> It might be well to advise the government, for their own security, that in future all commissioners be warned as follows: Commissioners, in order to curry favour, must ask Mr. Howe to write their report.

I presume that has reference to more than the Currie report because, as I listened last night to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) pointing out the rights of parliament, and the majority the government now has in the house as a result of the election in 1949—

Mr. Hosking: Have you not heard that before?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have heard it many times. When I heard it this time I was reminded of the fact that in the general election of 1949 the majority of electors in Canada cast their ballots, not for this government, but against it; and the statistics will prove the truth of what I say, if any hon. member wishes to check it.

Mr. Hosking: Are we all here dishonestly?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not saying it was done dishonestly; I say it happens this way because of the electoral system. If the hon. member has any doubts he may check with the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Hosking: Do you say we should not be here?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I say that the majority of electors who cast their ballots at the 1949 election did not support this government.

At that time we had the illegal withholding for a period of ten months of the flour milling report of the combines commissioner. This was done with the full authority and knowledge of the Prime Minister, and on behalf of the cabinet, thus making the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) the number one law breaker in this country. The public were not given that information during the election campaign.

Mr. Hosking: You would not say that in Manitoba.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A lot of things happen in parliament which are not too charitable, may I say to the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer).

Mr. Adamson: Pay no attention to the Mau Mau back there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am sure the citizens of Canada will find it difficult to understand why the Prime Minister and his supporters will find it necessary to vote against the request for a proper investigation into all phases of the operations of the Department of National Defence. I think everybody realizes that there is great inefficiency in the administration of that organization. They want a better answer than has yet been given by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). I was amazed at the arguments of the Prime Minister with respect to this Currie report. As has been pointed out before, I think he owes an apology to Mr. Currie and what is more important, he owes an apology to the citizens of Canada for this state of affairs.

Along with others who have made some study of this matter I believe that the Department of National Defence with its three branches of army, air force and navy, with the tremendous amounts of money it spends in procuring equipment and training men, is altogether too large for one minister. This has been pointed out to the government in the past year or two but no action has been taken with respect to that problem. I think that is most unfair to the overburdened taxpayers of Canada at a time such as this.

I doubt if there has ever been a time in the history of this country when greater inefficiency has been exemplified in any department of government than has been shown by this department, quite apart from the scandal brought to light by the report. I hope that the Prime Minister will still change his tactics and adopt a different attitude. The government owes a great deal more to the citizens of Canada than they have received since the tabling of this report or in the handling of this department which is responsible for the expenditure of so much money.

I repeat the words of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that never have so many Canadians paid so much in taxes for so little defence. I shall continue to fight for a greater investigation into these gigantic expenditures and inefficiencies.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak until ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Shaw: To those hon. members who say "hear, hear" I suggest that they remain within earshot of the bell because as far as I am concerned there will still be an opportunity to vote before ten o'clock. I feel that on this occasion I must register a protest in order to give expression to the strong convictions I hold in connection with the course of procedure which the government has asked this House of Commons to adopt with respect to the defence expenditure committee.

When this session of parliament opened on November 20, 1952, there appeared upon the order paper a resolution calling for the establishment of a select committee of this house to continue the examination of all expenditures of public moneys for national defence and so on. I examined that resolution most carefully at the time and was wholly satisfied with it. It suggested that the committee might examine commitments for expenditure for national defence and indicated that the committee would be expected to report from time to time its observations and opinions thereon, and in particular what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government might be effected therein.

Those terms of reference are very broad. There is absolutely nothing in that resolution which would prevent the committee deciding to consider the Currie report. For many years I served on the defence expenditure committee, or the war expenditures committee or the defence expenditures and economies committee as it was called from time to time. I found that the committee always exercised pretty good judgment in ascertaining which field of investigation it should undertake. One of the first things done when the committee meets is to determine the matters into which it shall examine; it then proceeds to examine them, following which it makes its report or reports to the House of Commons.

To me the government action in moving an amendment expresses lack of confidence in the personnel of this committee. In my opinion it is almost an expression of condemnation of previous committees which have been set up to do the same type of work. I think I know why this amendment was moved. On December 15, before the house had had an opportunity of considering this motion to set up a defence expenditures committee, the Currie report was tabled.

If in referring to the Currie report I happen to call it the Murray report by mistake, I hope you will understand my reason for making that error. This afternoon I listened with a great deal of surprise to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray). As a matter of fact I was seated behind the curtains, and I could not believe my ears. I came into the chamber and I still could not believe I was hearing what was being said. Of course the hon. member for Cariboo did not tell us very much that we did not know already. But I am still confounded as to why he said what he did, except that conceivably he intended toward the end to pin responsibility for the whole thing upon one member of this House of Commons. When he was informed that any attempt to pin responsibility on an individual member of this house was literally impossible, the whole thing blew up squarely in his face.

I trust that the government will suitably reward the hon. member for Cariboo for his contribution. In fact if you are going to present him with a plaque you might come to me and I will suggest what should be put on it. I cannot tell you now because I doubt if the expression would be parliamentary.

When the Currie report was tabled, not only were the Canadian people dumbfounded; they were shocked. There is just no question about that. When expressions such as "fundamentally loose situations", "accounting records in chaotic condition", "general breakdown in the system of administration", "serious collapse in security" and "lax control and poor discipline" appeared in the press the tax-burdened Canadian public were shocked.

They were shocked for two reasons. First, they realized that probably Canada's defences were not what they had been cracked up to be. Second, as tax-burdened Canadians who, as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) indicated yesterday, were paying almost $5 for every $1 they paid in 1939 for defence, not only were they shocked; they were very angry. No discussion here and apparently no amount of explanation is going to dissuade the Canadian public from this feeling which has become so firmly held by them. Not only is it a matter of the Currie report; there is evidence upon evidence quite apart from the Currie report indicating that all is not well with respect to Canadian defences.

I will even go so far as to repeat something of what I said on November 26 last in connection with defence construction. At that time I was obliged to devote a considerable part of my speech to a situation which had surprised and shocked me regarding defence construction. Since that time a good deal of additional information has come to me which indicates further reason for investigation, and also serves to confirm what I said on that occasion. I am not normally a suspicious type of person, but I can only conclude in my own mind, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment by the government has as one of its—I dare not say "purposes", but I will say "effects"—the sidetracking of an investigation which in my estimation would cause the Currie report to pale into insignificance.

The Currie report, as we have been advised, indicates—although chaotic conditions would not enable the investigators to determine it exactly—a loss of something in the neighbourhood of $50,000. Mr. Speaker, I dare say that at Penhold alone that sum would pale into insignificance when compared with what I am personally convinced was the situation. Incidentally, it has been corrected to some extent. One of my principal efforts was its correction, and I am not unmindful of the fact that things began to move in a hurry about the time this was brought forward and that the situation has improved a great deal. I do not hesitate to say that because, after all, I have as my guiding principle with respect to that matter the desire to see the Canadian taxpayer get a dollar's value for a dollar spent on defence. I could have handled the situation in a different way if I had had other purposes in mind. As I say, I am glad that certain things began to happen and that certain corrections began to be made, but I am still not entirely satisfied with the situation. It is just too bad that the horse in this case got out before the door was closed. There was no reason for certain things occurring which did occur at that airport or air station, things which I know have happened at other establishments in Canada.

After the Currie report was brought down and after the house adjourned for the Christmas recess, we were informed by the press—and sometimes they come very close in their indication of what is going on behind the scenes—that the government was desperately seeking an out as far as the Currie report was concerned. I personally have come to the conclusion that they think this is the out: We will move an amendment so that the defence expenditure committee will not be allowed to go into whatever field of investigation it desires, and so that it will be pinned down to the Currie report.

The rather startling thing is that Mr. Currie did make a report and we have his report with respect to the conditions which prevail. We have his 44 recommendations. The minister asserted that 27 of them were already being carried out before the report was ever received, and I assume that he wanted us to believe from his observations that probably all 44 were being carried out now. I hope they are, but that is all the more reason, Mr. Speaker, for this being a rather strange procedure.

The minister brought in the amendment at the end of his speech on Tuesday last. He did not go into detail as to what he actually had in mind in respect to the work of the committee in relation to the Currie report, although I do recall that in referring to the dam he did indicate that it might be one matter they could go into. But the minister himself gave an explanation there which I hope was the correct one.

Now, do they simply want the committee to endorse what the minister said was already being done? After all, just what is the purpose of the amendment? If there are to be further inquiries with respect to the Canadian army works services, then I for one am absolutely convinced that if it is to be worth —I was going to say a tinker's dam but that I imagine is unparliamentary—we should have a judicial inquiry. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), after having received an anonymous letter back in 1951 indicating that there were irregularities, did appoint Mr. Currie. I have every reason to believe that Mr. Currie was extremely competent and had a competent staff under him to conduct the investigation. We have heard time, time and again of the extreme difficulties which were encountered by Mr. Currie in trying to obtain the information which he finally was able to secure. Anyone who has served on the defence expenditure committee must conclude that, as far as the committee is concerned, it will become hopelessly bogged down. It cannot expect anything else.

I repeat that if Mr. Currie, with all the help he had, encountered all these difficulties, the problem will become utterly impossible as far as the defence expenditure committee is concerned. But it may have one value, Mr. Speaker. It may kill time. It may kill a lot of time and an election may take place before it has finished killing time. Maybe that is to be the great value of it.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that if the government actually want to go into this whole situation as far as defence is concerned, and clean it up, there are two things they can do. They can arrange to have a judicial inquiry made as far as the army works services are concerned, and they can set up the defence expenditure committee. I would be very much surprised if, in the light of what I said in my speech of November 26—although I hate to refer to my own speech—they could not save the taxpayers of this country scores and scores of thousands of dollars by inquiring into defence construction.

On November 26 I pointed out one thing which I considered highly irregular, and I notice reference to the same thing is made in the Currie report. I do not intend to hash over any ground I covered last November but recommendation No. 30, Mr. Speaker, says:

> Prohibition of loans of materials, stores and equipment to civilian contractors is desirable.

Last November I stated there was plenty of evidence to indicate that there was not a contractor at Penhold, for example, who had sufficient or adequate equipment to carry out his contract, and that they were using certain R.C.A.F. equipment.

That is bad from two points of view. First, it is costing the Canadian people far more than they are aware of to have certain defence projects completed. Second, one can see the position in which it puts the prospective bidders for contracts if one contractor who desires to bid knows that he is going to be allowed to use government equipment. The other fellow does not know, so the first fellow can underbid him without any difficulty at all. I have reason to believe that situation prevails. That is one of the very bad features of it.

Then, of course, there is this question of extras paid to contractors. It is a matter that has to be straightened out sooner or later. The government calls for tenders through its appropriate agency. We are led to believe that if a contractor bids $3 million for a certain contract and is given the job, that is what the project will cost. But, Mr. Speaker, that is far removed from the truth because of the policy of paying extras. As I say, I could continue speaking about this for some time; evidence I have received since November makes me feel very keenly about the matter.

The effect of the government amendment will be that this committee, I would bet my bottom dollar, is not going to get near this matter. If they do not get near it, they are missing one of the grandest opportunities to save the taxpayers of this country, as I said a moment ago, a greater amount of money than some hon. members in this house may at the moment believe.

Let me repeat what I said earlier, Mr. Speaker. My prime consideration in this whole matter is to see that we get our defences in shape, and to see that the Canadian taxpayer gets a fair shake, as we say, with respect to the expenditure of his money. We are confronted with a situation in Canada today where, as I said, we are carrying the heaviest tax burden we ever carried in our history. At the peak of the war we were taxed for defence about $2.80 for every $1 we were taxed in 1939, and it is now in the neighbourhood of $4.80 or $5. The Canadian taxpayer also knows from experience that his dollar is devalued, his savings are gone and he is having an extremely difficult time to get by.

My experience with the Canadian taxpayer is that he knows we have to have defences. He knows of the threat that confronts us. He is prepared to pay the shot for defences and I, as a member of parliament, am prepared to vote those moneys which are essential for adequate defences. But if these people come to the conclusion—and I am afraid that many of them are coming to the conclusion—that it is costing them about 30 per cent more for their defences than need be, then there is going to be a far more powerful reaction than the government has experienced up to this time. It is significant that in my particular part of the country where Penhold is located—then the Currie report comes on top of that—some of the most severe critics of the government are the persons who have always derived some pleasure from calling themselves Liberals. When I was home during the Christmas recess they were the ones who were most vociferous in their condemnation of what was going on. As I say, the reaction to these things will pale into insignificance in comparison to what the reaction might be if action is not taken, first to clear up this Currie situation in the right way, and then to go into that field of defence construction where we can save the Canadian taxpayers plenty of money.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I can assure hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that I do not propose to make a long speech at this stage of the debate, but I do believe I should say a word in reply to the speech just made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw). I should like also to refer back to an earlier speech he made on November 26, and to assure him and hon. members that what he said at that time did not fall on deaf ears, as he may perhaps think and as some other members indicated in speeches made in this debate. The reason I am taking part in this debate is that the construction operations in question are carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, acting as agents for the Department of Defence Production, which in the first instance is assigned responsibility for carrying out these projects for the Department of National Defence.

From time to time reports have reached me about what have been termed irregularities at Penhold, Namao and Cold Lake in Alberta, as well as other areas where construction projects have been carried out in Canada. In each instance we try to get to the bottom of the matter and ascertain whether the rumours are true, and to make corrections where there are irregularities or defaults. Hon. members will, therefore, be pleased to know that following the speech by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) I had a number of meetings with my colleagues, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), who is of course immediately interested, the Solicitor General and their officials. We examined each of the points raised by the hon. member. I was satisfied that in the vast majority of instances there were logical explanations with respect to the points he raised. In a number of other instances there were corrective actions that could be taken; and where it was indicated, corrective actions were at once instituted.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member say tonight that he noted some improvements following the speech he made in the house. I hope he will take that as an indication that his speech did not fall on deaf ears, and that we are interested in making corrections where corrections are indicated. In our meetings we considered that, with respect to these projects in Alberta as well as elsewhere, the points could be effectively answered, and that the place to do so was in the committee once it has been set up. My only point in rising tonight was to assure the hon. member that when this general subject matter is before the committee, his points will be dealt with in a manner that I hope will meet with his complete satisfaction.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) said he would sit down before ten o'clock. It is a fact that I shall not sit down before ten o'clock, so if Your Honour wishes to call it ten o'clock now we could adjourn this debate. Otherwise, we can carry on until ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Nowlan the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Monday is private members' day, so we shall proceed according to standing order No. 15.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

END OF VOLUME I
